her astonishment, to inform the Swedish government that Soviet peace negotiations with the Finnish government in Helsinki would be possible.²⁰¹ Stalin could not have had any intention of conducting actual negotiations, given that planning was well under way for an immense Soviet offensive. Rather, the despot likely wanted to break any momentum, such as it was, in possible Western military assistance to the Finns. In February 1940, Stalin ordered Beria to recall Gorsky and shut down the entire Soviet intelligence station in London, for having served as a conduit of “disinformation.”²⁰²

MASSACRES

On February 10, 1940, in response to an article in Pravda summarizing a journal story about his heroic prerevolutionary underground exploits in Baku, Stalin lashed out at inaccuracies (pointing out he had never edited the oil workers’ newspaper) and the portrayal of Voroshilov (“Comrade Voroshilov was in Baku for only a few months, and then left Baku without leaving visible traces behind”). In the letter, which he marked “not for publication,” Stalin also cast doubt on the reminiscences used in the article, indicating that the memoirs had likely been “dictated” by journalists.²⁰³

Around this time, death sentences based upon fabricated evidence were implemented for cultural figures, as well as former NKVD first deputy Mikhail Frinovsky, former deputy foreign intelligence chief Spigelglas, former intelligence chief and Comintern operative Trilisser, Yefim Yevdokimov, and Redens, Stalin’s ethnic Polish brother-in-law (part of a “Polish diversionary-espionage group”). Frinovsky’s wife was executed the day before him; their son, a high school student, was executed not long thereafter. Under interrogation-torture, Redens had admitted his complicity in the annihilation of innocent people while working atop the NKVD in Ukraine, Moscow, and Kazakhstan. His wife Anna—Nadya’s sister—and their two boys were not touched, and the family continued to live in the elite House on the Embankment and were allowed to visit Svetlana at Zubalovo (but not the Kremlin).^{204}

The principal executioner was usually Vasily Blokhin (b. 1895). The son of a poor peasant from central Russia, he had risen to become the NKVD's head executioner already in the mid-1920s and was known to insiders by his signature brown leather cap, brown leather gauntlets above the elbow, and brown leather apron. He had survived the transition from Yagoda to Yezhov, and then to Beria, although the latter had evidently tried to have him arrested as a Yezhovite, assembling the requisite compromising materials.^{205} To Blokhin fell the honor of executing Yezhov.^{206} In a last statement to the "court," held in the prison warden's office, Yezhov repudiated the espionage and terrorist charges and requested that his aging mother and adopted daughter not be touched. "I purged 14,000 Chekists," he stated, "but my enormous guilt lies in the fact that I purged so few of them." He was cremated at the Donskoi Monastery Crematorium, his ashes dumped into a mass pit, joining those of Tukhachevsky. Yezhov's very last words were for the despot: "Let Stalin know that I shall die with his name on my lips."^{207}

"Yezhov was scum," Stalin told the new deputy aviation commissar, Yakovlev. "A degenerated person. You call him at the commissariat, they say he's left for the Central Committee. You call the Central Committee, they say he left for a job. You send someone to his residence, it turns out he's lying in bed, dead drunk. He destroyed many innocents. We shot him for that."^{208}

Massive artillery barrages began to strike Finland, then, on February 11, in frosts reaching 31 degrees below zero (minus 35 Celsius), Timoshenko's onslaught via escalating artillery barrages, known as a Wall of Fire, commenced on the Viipuri axis. Rather than attempt a war of maneuver through partially frozen swamp with dispersed forces, Timoshenko massed more than 450,000 Soviet troops, against perhaps 150,000 Finns, on a single point, in classic Napoleonic fashion. Within the week, the Red Army finally had pierced the Mannerheim Line, forcing the Finns to retreat. (Voroshilov at first refused to believe Meretskoy's phone report that the Red Army had broken through.) Soviet artillery tore the colossal Finnish concrete emplacements right out of the ground, as if trying to make up for their earlier humiliation.²⁰⁹ On February 15, a much-relieved yet feverish and nauseated Stalin was again examined by his doctor. "In front of Stalin on the table was a map of Finland," the doctor recalled. "Stalin took a large, thick pencil and drew in the course of the war and then, tapping the pencil, said, 'Any day Vyborg will be taken.'"²¹⁰

On the same day that Timoshenko's offensive began in Finland, Stalin deepened his bargain with Hitler, after difficult negotiations, with a new Commercial Agreement (February 11, 1940). The Soviet Union agreed to supply Germany with 650 million reichsmarks' worth of raw materials during the next eighteen months, promising fully two thirds in the first twelve months, while Germany pledged to furnish the same amount of industrial goods, but over twenty-seven months—a significant Soviet concession.²¹¹ The cornucopia for Germany included Soviet feed grain and legumes (1 million tons), oil (900,000 tons), scrap and pig iron (800,000 tons), phosphates (500,000 tons), iron ore (500,000 tons), platinum, chromium ore, asbestos, iridium, and albumin. The earlier vague promises for German "industrial deliveries" were now, at Stalin's insistence, enumerated in four lists covering forty-two pages: a fully equipped Panzer III, five Messerschmitt Bf 109 E and five Bf 100 C fighters, two Junkers 88 bombers, two Dornier 215 light bombers, and one Fa 226 helicopter, as well as extra engines, artillery pieces, armored vehicles, gun sights, and extensive spare parts (piston rings, spark plugs, propellers, submarine periscopes), and the massive naval ship the Lützow. The lists also specified turbines, locomotives, excavators, cranes, forges, diesel engines, and steel tubing. There was even a list covering possible future Soviet interests.²¹²

In China, the renewed “united front” was coming undone. Under Japan’s savage array of air power, artillery, and armored forces, China was losing every engagement on the battlefield, but not the war. First the Nationalist government had abandoned north China, trading space for time, then, after being evicted from ever more territories along the coast, had retreated to the western interior, whence it conducted sabotage and flanking operations designed to outlast Japan and its shoestring logistics.²¹³ Finally, Chiang Kai-shek launched a multifront counteroffensive. Once again, he confided in his private diary that the threat of the Chinese Communist party to the country, whom he saw as collaborating with Japan, exceeded the threat of the latter.²¹⁴ Zhou Enlai, in a long report, claimed a party membership of nearly half a million, and an Eighth Route Army of more than a quarter million (additionally, a New Fourth Army was said to number 30,000). At the same time, the Communists’ budget was in severe deficit: about $358,000 per month, a tidy sum Zhou requested from Moscow. His request amounted to more than 40 percent of the Chinese Communists’ total military and civilian expenditures. On February 23, Dimitrov sent Stalin a draft letter intended as a response, and two days later he managed to speak with Stalin on the phone. “Cannot see me about Chinese affairs,” Dimitrov noted in his diary for that day. “Very busy. Has not read the material he was sent. ‘There is a lot of paperwork I am not finding time to read. Decide for yourself.’”²¹⁵

Dimitrov concluded his diary entry: “We shall give the assistance.”²¹⁶ Zhou Enlai, who had been in Moscow for treatment of a broken arm (he had fallen from a horse), set out for Yan’an, the Red capital, carrying with him a Comintern resolution that afforded the Chinese Communists great leeway in making decisions based upon fluid local circumstances. Mao took advantage by tightening his grip. Dimitrov telegraphed Mao (March 17, 1940) that Zhou “will personally inform you about everything we discussed and agreed upon regarding Chinese affairs. You need to seriously consider everything and take decisive measures completely on your own. In case of disagreement with us on some questions, please inform us promptly and tell us your reasons.”²¹⁷ Such deference from Moscow to foreign Communists was unheard of. Mao seized upon the Comintern document to appoint his own loyalists and lay plans to set up new Communist bases in China.²¹⁸

Also against the background of Finnish events, in early March 1940, Beria had reported to Stalin that “a large number of former officers of the Polish army, former employees of the Polish police and intelligence services, members of Polish nationalist counterrevolutionary parties, participants in uncovered counterrevolutionary uprising organizations, refugees, and so forth are held in NKVD USSR camps for POWs and in the prisons of the western provinces of Ukraine and Belorussia.” He added, on the basis of informants, that they were “sworn enemies of Soviet authority full of hatred for the Soviet system,” and that each was “waiting only for his release in order to enter actively into the struggle against Soviet power.” Some had had the temerity to write petitions pointing out that if, according to Soviet propaganda, the USSR was not at war with Poland, then they could not be held as POWs. To expedite their sentencing, Beria recommended that a troika be formed, made up of himself, Merkulov, and the head of the NKVD’s first special department. Stalin, using blue pencil, crossed out Beria’s name, underlined Merkulov’s, and wrote in “Kobulov.”²¹⁹ On March 5, in the name of the politburo, Stalin approved a troika and a “special procedure” for executing the 21,857 captured or arrested Polish officers, civil servants, and intellectuals. Voroshilov, who had had to surrender jurisdiction over POWs in the Polish campaign to Beria, also signed the execution order, along with the redoubtable Molotov and Mikoyan. The officers of the Polish army—some of whom were ethnic Ukrainian and Jewish—were murdered at several sites, including near Smolensk, in the Katyn Forest.²²⁰

Soviet liquidation of the Polish officers in captivity took place around the same time as a similar Nazi action across the border under Hans Frank, who, explaining his operation, stated, “I admit, utterly openly, that this will cause the deaths of thousands of Poles, above all from the leading stratum of the Polish intelligentsia.”²²¹ Soviet preparations for the executions might have commenced as early as January 1940. Through agents in Britain, the Soviets likely picked up on recent French whisperings to employ exiled Polish forces (“volunteers”) to attack Soviet positions in northern Finland, around Petsamo, a scenario that eventually could have had Polish army officers inside the USSR playing the role that the Czechoslovak Legion had played in 1918—namely, sparking a civil war.²²² But whatever the anxieties, the massacres ultimately flowed from a bottomless well of Soviet-Polish enmity.²²³ Families of the executed, who were deported to Kazakhstan, were told nothing; all too many would not survive their own ordeals. A handful of top Polish officers, such as General Władysław Anders, were kept alive, perhaps for future use; some others survived by offering their services to the NKVD. The Katyn Forest slaughter would prove to be not just another epochal Soviet state crime, but a strategic blunder.

All of this occurred in strictest secrecy. For the Soviet people, fairy tales persisted. A Member of the Government, with Gelovani in a cameo as Stalin, premiered on March 8, 1940. The film opens in spring 1930, when a poor peasant, Alexandra Sokolova (played by the radiant theater actress Vera Maretskaya), joins a collective farm and becomes its chairman, courageously coping with all the obstacles to collectivization: other villagers’ distrust, false accusations against her, bureaucratism, wrecking. The heroine is seen growing into her position, breaking free of her patriarchal husband in the name of the new life, speaking with authority in the name of the people, and eventually being elected a deputy of the new USSR Supreme Soviet—the strongest female character to emerge in Soviet cinema to date.²²⁴ The Soviet press was preoccupied for several days with celebrating the fiftieth birthday of the head of the actual government, Molotov (March 9, 1940), affording him the designation “very major figure.”²²⁵ On March 10, two months shy of his forty-ninth birthday, Mikhail Bulgakov succumbed to nephrosclerosis, an inherited kidney disorder.²²⁶ The Master and Margarita and many of his other works remained unpublished.

REVELATION

On March 12, the Finnish government, reeling from Timoshenko’s furious Wall of Fire that had reduced Viipuri, now renamed Vyborg, to a bombed-out hulk and opened the road to Helsinki, capitulated. The NKVD reported that Finland appeared to be on the verge of total military collapse. Stalin refrained from trying to overrun the country entirely (which had not been his intention in the first place). He did not deign to participate in the numerous sessions required to hammer out the details of Helsinki’s acceptance of defeat. Molotov, reversing the original offer to cede a large part of Soviet Karelia, now claimed a chunk of Finnish Karelia, plus the Karelian Isthmus right through to Vyborg—well beyond prewar proposals. This was more territory than the Finns had lost in the fighting. When they objected, Molotov snapped, “Any other great power in our position would demand war reparations or all of Finland.” When the Finns pointed out that in 1721, Peter the Great had paid compensation for the expansion of Russia’s Baltic frontier, Molotov barked, “Write a letter to Peter the Great—if he orders it, we will pay compensation.”²²⁷

The consequences of Finland’s civilian leaders’ prewar refusal to cut a deal struck the country like a punch in the face.²²⁸ “The terms of the peace are onerous for us,” stated Tanner, a participant in the failed negotiations, “but the government is happy that the agreement does not limit Finland’s sovereignty and independence, and that the program of Kuusinen’s government has been abandoned.”²²⁹ Flags in Helsinki flew at half-mast, newspapers appeared with black borders, and the radio played funeral dirges.

Two of Stalin’s fiercest émigré critics had stood with him regarding Finland. Living in France, Paul Miliukov, the former leader of the Constitutional Democrats (Cadets), observed of the Winter War, “I feel pity for the Finns, but I am for a Vyborg province.”²³⁰ Trotsky, too, had supported the USSR in the clash with Finland, imagining, like the ideologue Zhdanov, that the Soviet invasion heralded the onset of a Finnish class-based civil war. Trotsky argued that, just as in Spain, it was right to be on the side of the left, although it was proving difficult for Finland’s workers and peasants to rid themselves of landowners and the bourgeoisie. The reality, of course, was that Finnish workers and peasants had staunchly supported the “bourgeois” regime. After the war, Trotsky wrote that Stalin’s “authority has been dealt an irreparable blow.”²³¹

Stalin allowed the Helsinki government to retain the nonaggression pact with the USSR, rather than a mutual assistance pact of the kind imposed on the Balts.²³² He seems to have been keen to avoid, if not further international complications with the Western powers, at least their seizure of a foothold in Scandinavia under the pretext of “aiding” a victimized Finland. It also bears recalling that in tsarist Russia, Finland had had special status (and, for a time, its own constitution). Stalin was perhaps also chastened by the Finns’ military resistance. “We knew that Peter I fought for twenty-one years to cut off the whole of Finland from Sweden,” he would explain to the Soviet military the next month, perhaps in order to indicate why Finland was not being annexed.²³³

Small countries, in the unforgiving international system, had to be smart—and the smaller the country, the smarter it had to be, particularly if its geographical location attracted the close attention and calculations of the great powers.²³⁴ The Finnish government, morally in the right, had been geopolitically in the wrong. Back in 1938, the leaders of Czechoslovakia—diplomatically isolated but possessing an advanced army—had shown themselves unwilling to pay the price of war against Hitler for their independence. In 1939, the diplomatically isolated but under-armed Finns chose to fight, yet it was their neutrality, not their sovereignty, that had been at stake, a fact recognized by the hamstrung Finnish negotiator Paasikivi and Field Marshal Mannerheim and, belatedly, by Tanner and the rest. Hitler's appeal on behalf of ethnic Germans abroad had been revealed as a lie, a mere pretext to swallow the whole Czechoslovak state, but Stalin's security concerns for Leningrad, even if they evoked a history of Russian expansionism, were not a pretext.

Finland paid a heavy price for the avoidable war. Nearly 400,000 Finns (mostly small farmers)—upward of 12 percent of its population—were forced to evacuate the newly annexed Soviet territories for rump Finland, leaving homes and many possessions behind. Finland lost 11 percent of its land and perhaps 30 percent of its prewar economic assets. Beyond the significantly greater territory it was forced to relinquish, compared with what it would have lost in prewar political concessions, Finland suffered at least 26,662 killed and missing, 43,357 wounded, and 847 captured by the Soviets. The Finns had been adamant about not relinquishing the Mannerheim Line of defensive emplacements, but it was now lost. ("Even after it had been blasted and penetrated in many places," observed Alexander Solodovnikov, who traveled by car in spring 1940 from Leningrad to set up a Russian-language theater in newly conquered Vyborg, "the 'line' amazed with its monstrous, agglomerated, ingenious pillboxes, bunkers, concrete blocks, and concealed traps.")²³⁵ The Finns would end up losing their cherished neutrality, too (becoming aligned with Nazi Germany).

Great powers usually can expect to have considerable room to recover from even the most egregious mistakes, but that room, in the late 1930s and into 1940, had vastly narrowed. Thanks to the Finnish resistance, the 105-day Winter War proved even more costly to Stalin than to the Finns. The despot did obtain a more secure border for Leningrad, as well as security for the ocean port Murmansk, while the Red Army, including its command, did get valuable, albeit painful, combat experience.²³⁶ Still, the Soviets lost an astonishing 131,476 dead and missing; at least 264,908 more were wounded or fell to illness, including the frostbitten, who lost fingers, toes, ears. Total Soviet losses neared 400,000 casualties, out of perhaps 1 million men mobilized—almost 4,000 casualties per day.²³⁷ (Later, Stalingrad would produce around 3,300 per day.) Another 5,486 Red Army troops were captured, most of whom, upon returning home, would be sent to the Gulag for the crime of falling into enemy hands. Of course, the giant scale of losses was kept secret, but during a discussion of the war's lessons, one Soviet general nonetheless snapped, "We have won enough ground to bury our dead."²³⁸

The shocking Red Army failures of December 1939 overshadowed not just the impressive corrections of February 1940, but even the fact that, in the end, the Soviets had won the war decisively and exceeded their objectives.²³⁹ Foreign intelligence services had been knocking themselves out trying to gauge the strength of the gigantic Red Army, and now they believed they had the answer: it was impotent. They overlooked the special circumstances of roadless, marshy terrain and deep-winter combat, just as Stalin and his commanders had overlooked them at the outset. The German general staff wrote on New Year's Eve 1939–40 that the Red Army was "in quantity a gigantic military instrument," but "the Russian 'mass' is no match for an army with modern equipment and superior leadership."²⁴⁰ Even after the Soviets had turned the tide, the Germans, as well as the British and the French, remained confirmed in their prejudice that the Soviet Union was a colossus of clay. On March 31, 1940, Hitler, in a closed speech in the Chancellery to his commanders, called the USSR a

“tenacious adversary” but went on to say that “the Russian is inferior,” and the Soviet army “without leadership,” undermined by Jewish-Bolshevik lies.^{241}

Soviet military doctrine, in its most sophisticated versions, had long stressed aggressive counterattack, decentralized command, and organizational flexibility, but within such a rigidly hierarchical political despotism, only the first principle was realized in practice. In Finland, shocking chaos in the rear services had severely handicapped military operations, and hypercentralization and the inexperience of commanders meant they could not adapt or take initiative on the battlefield. Both the horrific casualty count and the immense expenditure of ordnance testified to the depth of the problems. But Timoshenko had managed to improve both coordination and flexibility, implementing combined attacks of air and armor, as well as continuous vertical and horizontal communications with superiors and neighboring staffs and services. At the same time, Stalin, relying on Mekhlis, had political indoctrination recalibrated to emphasize the discipline and traditions of the Imperial Russian Army. From late 1939 into 1940, the Soviet press published articles on the military genius of Alexander Suvorov, the eighteenth-century generalissimo, as well as Great Russian nationalism, and transformed Finland into a “patriotic war.”^{242}

The contribution of that notable shift, in the case of Finland, remains hard to gauge. The conscript soldiers—peasants from collectivized villages or workers from factory barracks—on their first trips abroad, with the mission of “liberating” the exploited Finnish people from “White Finns,” encountered the well-built, well-equipped homes of ordinary Finnish people. The Soviet lads, and especially their commanders, as in Poland in 1939, madly looted sewing machines, gramophones, bicycles, kitchen utensils, silk stockings, women’s dresses, shoes. That said, despite record-breaking frosts, horribly inadequate supplies, and incompetent commanders, Red Army morale had not cracked. Soviet conscripts and reservists often fought on even after having been encircled, entrenching their tanks as makeshift pillboxes.²⁴³ True, NKVD detachments blocked retreat, and even then there were desertions. But the Soviet troops' failure to crush the Finns had aroused a widespread desire to defend their honor. On the front lines, Soviet colonels and captains, themselves conscripts, knew the Red Army could fight.

Among outsiders, only Finland's field marshal Mannerheim—the former tsarist officer—grasped the truth about this contradictory beast. “In the higher ranks there were signs of a kind of inertia,” he observed, indicating that the Red Army had reproduced the shortcomings of the army under tsarism. “The Russians based their art of war on the weight of material, and were clumsy, ruthless, and extravagant. There was a striking absence of creative imagination where the fluctuations of the situation demanded quick decisions.” With equal perspicacity, again almost uniquely, he comprehended the Red Army's immense brute power, a profligate yet determined fighting machine, one of the hinges of the twentieth century.²⁴⁴

FATHERLINESS

Stalin evidently admitted to Shaposhnikov that “concerning Finland you were right.”²⁴⁵ Such an admission of a mistake, even in private, was exceedingly rare for him. It was likely made possible by his respect for Shaposhnikov, a feeling that redounded to a Shaposhnikov protégé, Alexander Vasilevsky (b. 1895), who had graduated from the General Staff Academy in 1937 and joined the party the next year (when admission was reopened). Vasilevsky's father was a priest; his mother, the daughter of a priest. In 1939, he had become a deputy chief of the general staff's operations directorate and had assisted in preparing the Winter War plan of battle that Stalin did not use. In the first half of March 1940, after a long meeting in the Little Corner, Vasilevsky returned to staff headquarters to issue orders based upon the decisions. Suddenly, Poskryobyshev called to say that he was expected at the post-meeting supper at Stalin's Kremlin apartment below the Little Corner. He rushed back and was seated next to Shaposhnikov.

Stalin pronounced one of the many toasts to Vasilevsky's health, then unexpectedly asked why, after graduating from seminary, Vasilevsky had not become a priest. He answered that he had had no such intention. "At that, Stalin smiled through his mustaches and observed, 'I see, I see, you had no such intention. Understandable. But Mikoyan and I did want to become priests, but for some reason they would not take us. Why, I do not understand to this day.'" After this playful gesture of solidarity, Stalin asked Vasilevsky why he did not help his father financially. "As far as I know, one of your brothers is a physician, another is an agronomist, a third is a military commander-aviator and a well-off person," he remarked, underscoring his familiarity with Vasilevsky's personnel file. "I think all of you could be helping your parents, and then the old man could long ago have broken with his church. He would not need the church in order to survive." Vasilevsky had been scrupulously avoiding contact with his father; recently, when he got a letter from home, he had run straight to the party organization at the general staff to confess. Now, Vasilevsky recalled, "Stalin said that I should immediately reestablish contact with my parents and give them systematic assistance and inform the general staff party organization about the authorization to do so."²⁴⁶

Vasily Stalin, in the latter half of March 1940, completed his two-year course of study at the military aviation school near Sevastopol with marks of "excellent," according to a report sent to Stalin. He received the rank of air force lieutenant.²⁴⁷ Later that year, he would marry Galina Burdonskaya, a student of the Moscow Polygraphic Institute, also nineteen years old, who lived in a communal apartment. Stalin would not be informed until after the wedding. “You’re married; so be it,” he would write to Vasily in red pencil. “I pity her, marrying such a fool.”²⁴⁸

A RECKONING

A harsh internal Soviet reckoning of the Winter War—which would make no mention of Stalin’s errors or his prior murderous rampages—commenced on March 26–28, 1940, at a Central Committee plenum, two weeks after hostilities ended. Molotov reported on the settlement with Finland, prompting Litvinov to criticize the course of foreign policy since his dismissal, while predicting that Germany would attack the Soviet Union. Molotov tried, and failed, to cut Litvinov off; Stalin remained silent.²⁴⁹ Voroshilov gave an unusually self-critical opening report and offered to resign.²⁵⁰ Mekhlis was one of those who piled on (hearsay accounts have Mekhlis complaining that “Voroshilov cannot stand Mekhlis,” which was true, and likely reflected how every officer in the room felt).²⁵¹ But Stalin upbraided his attack dog for “a hysterical speech,” called Mekhlis “a good man, a hard worker, but unsuitable for army leadership,” and praised Voroshilov for conceding his errors. “It does not happen often around here that a people’s commissar speaks so openly about his own shortcomings.”²⁵²

Stalin, in the discussion, brushed off the circumstance that the war had been launched in winter. “We are a northern country,” he said, and “if our military leaders had studied the history of the Russian army and followed the fine traditions of the Russian army, then they would know that all of our most impressive victories were won in winter.” He mentioned Alexander Nevsky against the Swedes on the ice, Peter the Great against the Swedes and Charles XII on the Baltic, Alexander I’s conquest of Finland from Sweden, and Kutuzov’s victory over Napoleon.²⁵³ Stalin also criticized the army’s use of biscuits instead of dried bread toasts (sukhari), stating that in Finnish frosts, the biscuits froze and became inedible. “Kutuzov, a real

count, visited the soldiers to see what they were eating, but the 'self-made count' Kulik did not do that. (General laughter.)” Despite this dig at Kulik, Stalin praised the artillery. “Now we know the secret of how to smash a fortified defense line. We are the only country that knows this secret. The answer is that first you need to crush the enemy physically and morally with heavy artillery, and after that send in the infantry.” Stalin added, “The rank and file constitute superb material, but the commanders turned out not to be on the heights. . . . The goal is to improve the commanding corps and then our army will be the best in the world.”²⁵⁴

On the final day of the plenum, Ribbentrop coincidentally instructed Schulenburg, in Moscow, to revive the invitation of a reciprocal trip by Molotov to Berlin. “It goes without saying that the invitation is not to be confined to Herr Molotov,” the Nazi foreign minister telegraphed. “It would suit our own needs better, as well as our really ever closer relations with Russia, if Herr Stalin himself came to Berlin. The Führer would not only be particularly happy to welcome Stalin in Berlin, but he would also see to it that he would get a reception commensurate with his position and importance, and he would extend to him all the honors that the occasion demanded.” Schulenburg replied that he felt confident Molotov would fulfill his obligation to reciprocate, albeit not in the current circumstances, for it would undermine the appearance of Soviet neutrality and potentially risk inviting a Western declaration of war against the USSR.²⁵⁵ Molotov, in a speech to the Supreme Soviet on March 29, 1940, venomously denounced Britain and France, insisting yet again that the Soviet Union would never become a “weapon of the Anglo-French imperialists in their struggle for world hegemony.” He said that a British buildup in the Near East might entail “objectives antagonistic toward the Soviet Union.”²⁵⁶

All the while, Soviet merchants were still shopping in Berlin. Also on March 29, Ivan Tevosyan, a German-speaking ethnic Armenian from Karabakh, met Göring. The corpulent Luftwaffe head promised shipments of the contracted Junkers 88 airplane in April and May, noting that “there has never been an instance in which I, Göring, did not keep my word,” and adding that “the interests of both countries demand that Germany and the Soviet Union are together. This is the Führer’s opinion. He has decided this firmly and irreversibly. . . . This wish of Hitler is known to the duce; England and France know about it.” Göring further observed that “he personally had told the Finns repeatedly that it was senseless for a small state to fight with such a large country and had recommended accepting the USSR’s conditions.” Tevosyan—who had barely escaped Beria’s clutches as an alleged “German spy”—underscored the friendly character of bilateral relations, “reconfirmed in the February 11, 1940, economic agreement,” but he pointed out that although the Soviets had shipped everything required of them, “Germany so far has not made a single shipment to the USSR, not one rivet.” Göring interrupted to express his regrets at this news of German delays. “I give you my word, I am the guarantee.”^{257}

On March 31, a Karelo-Finnish Soviet Socialist Republic was established through the merger of Soviet Karelia and territories annexed from Finland (part of the Karelian Isthmus and Ladoga Karelia). The KFSSR became the twelfth Union republic, but the only one whose titular nationality, ethnic Finns, made up a minority of its inhabitants (around one quarter). Stalin soon named Kuusinen the KFSSR’s head of state.^{258}

Back in Moscow, at a follow-up military conference on the Winter War (April 14–17), Stalin scapegoated his head of military intelligence, Proskurov.^{259} In the war’s run-up, Soviet military intelligence had produced a photo-and-sketch album of the Mannerheim Line (possibly based on maps delivered by the Germans after the 1939 Pact signing). This album lay on Meretskov’s desk.^{260} True, there had been subsequent modernization of the defense belt. But Meretskov misunderstood or ignored the implications of the fortifications for his battle plan.^{261} That said, extreme hypersecrecy seems to have kept some centrally held intelligence from being shared with the Leningrad military district, to which Stalin had handed the war effort.²⁶² More broadly, one young military intelligence officer on the front, who later defected, observed, plausibly, that “the maps of Finland supplied to us by military intelligence were extremely poor, an indication of sloppy work. . . . Ironically, we soon found that the maps of that part of the Soviet Union were just as poor.”²⁶³ Proskurov, in the discussion at the military conference, pushed back against the criticisms leveled by Stalin, Mekhlis, and Meretskoy, whose own head was on the line.²⁶⁴ Meretskoy complained that the army command had no access to foreign newspapers, with their wealth of information about the course of military matters. “An intolerable situation,” Stalin interjected. Proskurov pointed out that information from foreign newspapers was translated into Russian, just not circulated. “Why?” Stalin asked. Proskurov: “It contains slander against the Red Army.”²⁶⁵

Proskurov, a hero aviator, took the fall (and, later, a bullet to the neck).²⁶⁶ Stalin did criticize himself, too, albeit indirectly. “We expected to bag an easy win,” he stated (April 17, 1940). “We were terribly spoiled by the Polish campaign.”²⁶⁷ It was the royal “we.” His main theme was that the Russian civil war “had not been a real war, because there was no artillery, aviation, tanks, and mortars used.” One more heroic cavalry charge was not going to drive off tanks and artillery. “What hindered our commanding staff from conducting the Finnish war in a new way—not by the civil war style, but in a new way?” Stalin asked rhetorically. “What hindered us, in my view, was a cult of the traditions and experience of the civil war. How did we evaluate commanders: ‘Did you take part in the civil war?’ ‘No, you did not take part—then get lost.’ ‘That one, did he take part?’ ‘He took part—let’s appoint him.’” Stalin urged everyone—really, himself—“to renounce the cult of the civil war, which only reinforces our backwardness.”²⁶⁸

Stalin's closest civil war crony, Voroshilov, suffered guilt, anger, and anguish over the regime's massacre of so many innocent officers in the Red Army and his complicity therein. One night at the Near Dacha, during the Finnish events, the despot and his defense commissar went at it. They all must have been even drunker than usual. Stalin "was in a white-hot rage and berated Voroshilov severely," Khrushchev recalled. "He got irate, jumped up, and [verbally] went after Voroshilov. Voroshilov also blew up, got red in the face, rose, and hurled Stalin's accusation back in his face. 'You're to blame in this! You annihilated the military cadres.'" True enough, although Voroshilov had signed 185 extant execution lists—fourth behind Stalin, Molotov, and Kaganovich. After Stalin answered him in kind, "Voroshilov picked up a platter with a roast suckling pig on it and smashed it on the table."²⁶⁹ That pig, in a way, was plucky little Finland—the "pig rooting around in the Soviet garden," in the dismissive phrase used on the eve of the war—but now it was also Voroshilov's military career and, by association, Stalin's military diletantism.

LEARNING

With its strong incentives for lying and an absence of institutionalized consultation or corrective mechanisms, despotism is particularly prone to strategic blunders, and yet despotic systems—and despots—can learn. The Winter War launched Stalin's belated military reeducation, which was a long time coming.²⁷⁰ Prior to the Finnish experience, the Spanish civil war had delivered valuable firsthand experience in sabotage operations behind enemy lines, had battle-tested Soviet weapons systems, and had enabled study of Nazi Germany's arsenal. The initiative to collect this valuable information was taken by Soviet military men whom Stalin then mostly murdered, but the data and analyses remained for their successors. Case studies of individual battles in Spain became available for study at Soviet military schools, in order to assimilate the tactical and operational lessons for artillery, tanks, airplanes, navy, and combined operations, much of which was published in the army newspaper, Red Star, for the broadest possible audience. Voroshilov and his aides selected key material on Spain to present to Stalin.^{271}

Some key lessons that had been drawn from Spain were blatantly misguided. Kulik, for example, had concluded that the use of large mechanized tank units had turned out to be wrongheaded, for in Spain the infantry had not been able to keep pace with the tanks.^{272} He was hardly alone in this misreading, but with Tukhachevsky and others murdered, Kulik's misread had gone largely uncontested, and Stalin had approved the Red Army's dismantling of stand-alone mechanized tank units. Lessons from the border war with Japan were distilled by Zhukov, who was holed up in Ulan Bator. His long report labeled the incompetent commander he had relieved a "criminal" and underlined problems arising from poor battlefield communications and inadequate intelligence, but overall, he called the engagement "a victory which, in our view, should be carefully studied by all commanders." This document was completed only in November 1939, not in time for the Winter War planning.^{273} But Zhukov and Stern had improvised back into existence stand-alone mechanized units and demonstrated, in practice, the devastating effectiveness of massive application of tanks and aircraft. Now, after Finland, these units would make a belated comeback. Nonetheless, in front of the full military during discussion of Finland in April 1940, Stalin belittled the brilliant 1939 victory in the border war with Japan.^{274}

Development of military technology involves strategic decisions concerning manufacturing capabilities and spare parts availability, cost, ease of use and repair by soldiers, and, of course, effectiveness in combat, all decisions that take time to unfold. In the meantime, the enemy's technology can improve.^{275} The consequences of mistakes can be immense. Kulik would soon block the placement of the advanced F-34 guns on the

T-34 tank, which would be launched into mass production in fall 1940, largely because the superior gun was not his initiative.^{276}

One hard Spanish lesson that the Soviets had learned was the squandering of their initial aviation advantage. The Soviets were winning the quantitative arms race with Nazi Germany, producing 4,270 airplanes in 1936 (to Germany's 5,112), 6,039 in 1937 (to Germany's 5,606), 7,727 in 1938 (to 5,235), and 10,362 in 1939 (to 8,295).^{277} But German quality had improved more significantly. Germany had opened a gap with its upgraded Heinkel bomber (He-111), which was capable of carrying 3,000 pounds of bombs, and its Messerschmitt fighter (Me-109), which had a range of 400 miles, a high rate of climb, a bulletproof fuel tank, and a top speed of 350 miles per hour, and had shown its deadliness at Guernica.^{278} The belated Soviet responses—Yak-1, Yak-7, MiG-3, and LaGG-3—finally appeared in 1940, but only in experimental production.

The despot summoned the thirty-six-year-old aviation commissar, Shakhurin, and his deputy, the thirty-three-year-old Yakovlev (the designer of the “Yak”), to the Little Corner, and they arrived in the middle of a large gathering. Without asking them to sit, Stalin began to read aloud from a letter written by an airplane designer who complained that he had a brilliant idea for a new killer plane but that the deputy commissar would not brook a rival and was blocking the innovative design, forcing the letter writer to appeal directly to “the Central Committee.” Silence ensued. Yakovlev responded that the designer had never actually approached him. (Shakhurin did not know anything about the proposed plane.) “Of course, he should first of all have spoken with both of you,” Stalin allowed. “Not speaking with you, and writing a complaint about you, is not the way. I don't know about this proposal—maybe it's a good airplane, maybe it's a bad one—but the promised specs are alluring.” Stalin then asked how much it would cost. They answered, “8 to 9 million [rubles].” Stalin ordered it built, adding, “I ask you not to go after this designer for writing the letter. . . . For you it is unpleasant, probably, that such letters are written. But I am pleased. By the way, it is not the first letter.” As Yakovlev neared the exit to the Little Corner, Stalin called out. “Do not persecute the designer for writing the complaint; let him build the plane. We shall risk the millions; I shall take the sin on my soul.” The plane was duly built. It crashed on its maiden flight, taking with it one of the country’s best experimental pilots.^{279}

All the while, significant interruptions were occurring in German deliveries of contracted military weapons as called for in the new commercial agreement. Stalin began demanding a new short-term trade agreement with Germany to ensure compliance. Mikoyan, in mid-April 1940, complained to his German interlocutors that he could “no longer afford to make a fool of himself, in practice conducting a bilateral exchange of goods but unilaterally delivering goods to Germany.” Stalin had been retaliating for the German shortfall: out of a contractual 1 million tons of grain for Germany, fewer than 150,000 had been delivered.^{280} Soviet oil deliveries had barely reached 100,000 tons, just one ninth of the contractual amount and less than 15 percent of German stocks.^{281} But Romania was supplying huge multiples of that in oil, while Swedish iron ore shipments dwarfed Soviet supplies to Germany. The major Soviet contribution would come in feed grain and legumes. The original 1 million tons of grain would be raised to 1.5 million, and the Germans soon sought yet another 1 million.^{282} In the face of Germany’s nearly insatiable demand, Stalin raised prices.

RED ARMY RESURRECTION

At the conclusion of the Finnish war military reckoning, on April 17, 1940, Stalin formalized the appointments of three new deputy heads of the Council of People’s Commissars: Mikhail Pervukhin (b. 1904), the chief engineer and then director of the Moscow Energy utility, who had rocketed to first deputy commissar of heavy industry in 1938; Alexei Kosygin, who had been a shop foreman on a factory floor as late as 1937 before becoming textile industry commissar in 1939; and Vyacheslav Malyshev, a locomotive designer and the recently named commissar of heavy machine building. They joined Molotov's six other deputies: Mikoyan, Kaganovich, Nikolai Bulganin (b. 1895, chairman of the state bank), Nikolai Voznesensky (b. 1903, head of state planning), Vyshinsky, and Rozaliya Zemlyachka. The latter was an old revolutionary terrorist (b. 1876), but otherwise these were predominantly economic managers.

Notwithstanding these promotions, the terror continued to cast its shadow. In May 1940, no annual reception took place at the Kremlin for the young graduates of military academies, where arrests and executions during the terror had damaged the level of instruction. On May 4 and 5, Stalin, the immediate retinue, and surviving military elite were gathered in the form of a commission of the Main Military Council to codify the lessons from Finland.²⁸³ No one on that commission, or at the various meetings with Stalin present, blamed the tough going in Finland on the terror, but the thought was on people's minds. At a separate May 1940 meeting on military ideology, Dmitry Pavlov, a Spanish civil war veteran and high-ranking tank commander in the Finnish war, stated, "We had so many enemies of the people that I doubt that all of them could have been enemies." He added, "Here it is necessary to say that the operations of 1937–38, before Beria arrived, so compromised us that, in my opinion, we would [otherwise] have easily had our way with an adversary like the Finns."²⁸⁴

Military personnel changes were the most consequential since 1925. On May 7, 1940, Stalin named Timoshenko defense commissar and kicked Voroshilov "upstairs" to the post of deputy chairman of the Council of People's Commissars—making him the tenth.²⁸⁵ The despot also promoted Timoshenko to the rank of marshal. Stalin had always been taken by Voroshilov's gifted sociability and doglike loyalty, insurance against a Bonapartist coup, but the price of his military shortcomings had become too high and the despot had hit upon a replacement. The peasant boy Timoshenko had won Stalin's trust in a way that the brilliant aristocrat's son Mikhail Tukhachevsky never could.^{286} Returning the number of marshals to five, Stalin also promoted Shaposhnikov and the dense Kulik.^{287} Two days before, Stalin had colluded with Beria to have Kulik's beautiful Jewish second wife, Kira Simonich, kidnapped. The despot then pretended he had no idea where she might be, advising Kulik to remarry and forget the "nympho female spy." She was the daughter of the former okhranka chief in Helsinki who had been executed by the Cheka in 1919; her first husband had been a NEPman with foreign connections; her two brothers, one of whom had been an officer for the Whites, were arrested for espionage; her mother left for Italy in 1934. Nonetheless, Kulik had refused Voroshilov's entreaties to divorce the fetching Kira.^{288} Such compromising associations would have been more than enough to bury any Red Army officer; Kulik, in addition, had been a Socialist Revolutionary, not a Bolshevik, before the October Revolution. He supplied a steady stream of denunciations on the other military men.

Two of the five marshals (Voroshilov and Budyonny) were civil-war-era cavalrymen who defended the role of horse-riding troops deep into the era of tanks and planes. The strategically literate Shaposhnikov—the highest-ranking former tsarist officer still around—had not been able to block the wrongheaded breakup of mechanized divisions, but he had closely advised Stalin on the military operations to recover the old tsarist borders.^{289} Nevertheless, the despot soon replaced him as chief of staff with, of all people, the Finnish-war failure Meretskov.^{290}

The big story was Timoshenko: the defense of the socialist motherland now rested upon his shoulders. On May 7, 1940, at a celebration of Tchaikovsky's centenary, Timoshenko appeared in the imperial box at the Bolshoi in a threesome with Stalin and Molotov—a Kremlinological signal to the elite, whose whispers could be counted on to spread word of the coronation. With the transfer of the defense portfolio, a chastened Stalin also allowed Timoshenko to conduct a genuine investigation into the state of the Red Army.²⁹¹ He sent Timoshenko to inspect key Soviet military districts in person. The despot and his new defense commissar forced through sweeping reforms, including greater discipline and genuine basic training.²⁹² Military production, already immense, was savagely ramped up, including the mass manufacture of machine guns, which Stalin's idiot cronies had dismissed but the Finns had put to devastating use. Mikoyan negotiated new defense-related trade pacts with more than a dozen countries, which forced still deeper shortages on the Soviet populace in order to free up resources for export.²⁹³ Timoshenko oversaw a hasty expansion of officer training: in 1940, the Soviet Union counted eighteen military academies, plus eight military departments at various civilian universities, as well as 214 schools (uchilishche) for the army and six for the navy. Training courses lasted from forty-five to ninety days. The defense commissar also rushed to extend rail lines and build airports—a target of 950 by the end of 1941, meaning more than 300 new ones.²⁹⁴

Stalin approved the reintroduction of the ranks of admiral and general on May 7, 1940, as well. Meretskov would be among those promoted to full general, while naval commissar Kuznetsov became a new admiral. “Stalin by that point did not entertain objections,” Kuznetsov recalled. “A kind of thick cloud had formed around him of bootlickers and obsequious types who blocked the necessary people from accessing him. For us, young people raised up by the ‘unquiet’ 1937–38 period and striving out of inexperience to ‘develop our own views,’ we quickly learned that our part was to listen more and speak less.” Still, Kuznetsov noted that “back then I bowed before Stalin’s authority, not doubting anything that emerged from him.”²⁹⁵

There were some 1,000 senior officer promotions altogether. Zhukov, who had remained in Mongolia and missed the Finnish campaign, was among those elevated. Voroshilov recalled him from Ulan Bator, and Stalin summoned him to the Little Corner. “I had never met Stalin before and I went to the meeting very agitated,” Zhukov recalled. “Greeting me, Stalin, puffing his pipe, immediately asked, ‘How do you assess the Japanese army?’” Zhukov gave a detailed answer, after which Stalin inquired about the performance of Soviet troops and the Soviet commanders Kulik, Dmitry Pavlov, and Nikolai Voronov. Zhukov claimed he had praised the latter two, but not Kulik. After further discussion, Stalin said, “Now you have combat experience. Take over the Kiev military district”—which Timoshenko was relinquishing—“and use your experience in the training of the troops.” Zhukov returned to the Hotel Moskva but could not fall asleep. “Stalin’s external appearance, his soft voice, his concreteness and depth of thinking, his attentiveness in listening to the report, impressed me greatly.”²⁹⁶

Stalin also authorized Beria to release more than ten thousand Red Army officers from the Gulag.²⁹⁷ Colonel Konstanty Rokossowski, who had been arrested as a Polish spy, had been released on March 22, 1940, without explanation, after thirty months in confinement. He had served under Timoshenko back in the Volga military district. Rokossowski, aged forty-four, had refused to sign confessions to crimes he had not committed, but his toes had been smashed to bits with a hammer and nine of his teeth knocked out.²⁹⁸ He was promoted to general. The regime feared its own returning soldiers who had seen the capitalist world. The Finnish general staff had organized an occasional newspaper for Soviet POWs. Under the rubric “Truth is dearer than everything on earth,” the first issue stated, “We consider that your main misfortune and the misfortune of the entire Russian people consists in the fact that you do not at all know the truth about the life that surrounds you. Your authorities kept you isolated from the whole world and told you only what they thought you needed to know. Fate had it that by falling into captivity in a free country, you got the chance to know the truth about how other nations live. . . . You will learn the truth and will be able to compare your life with the life of other countries.”²⁹⁹

• • •

STALIN EMERGED from the war he launched against Finland with both a crushing victory and a severely impaired military reputation, emboldening the country’s potential enemies, maybe even more than he had with his executions of his own military. He also undermined further the Soviet Union’s international standing as a supposed bulwark of peace. “My anti-Communism, half suppressed by my friendships and the need for Soviet support against the Third Reich, burst forth,” noted the French intellectual Raymond Aron of the fall of 1939. “Those who did not denounce Stalin and the German-Soviet pact became unbearable for me.”³⁰⁰ In Philadelphia on November 17, 1939, Professor Carlton Hayes, of Columbia University, noted the convergence of German, Italian, and Soviet “force against Czechs and Albanians, Poles and Finns.”³⁰¹ Hayes spoke at the first academic conference devoted to the concept of “totalitarianism,” which would provide a cudgel for principled opponents of the Soviet regime, both on the right and on the left.³⁰² On April 25, 1940, Rudolf Hilferding, the Austrian Marxist luminary and author of Finance Capital (1910), published an essay in the Menshevik émigré paper in Paris, titled “State Capitalism or Totalitarian State Economy?” He lent his authority among socialists to the view that in the Soviet Union, as in Germany and Italy, politics determined economics, and that the Bolsheviks had “created the first totalitarian state, even before the name was invented.”³⁰³

The Red Army, in 1940, would acquire five times as many weapons as it had as recently as 1935.³⁰⁴ Stalin also appeared to have caught a stupendous break: on May 10, 1940, Hitler attacked the Low Countries and France. The despot could scarcely have hoped for more.³⁰⁵ Previously, during what now, in retrospect, became the First World War, the Russian general staff had shuddered at the thought that a quick German rout of the French would lead to a separate peace on the western front, which in turn would give Germany a completely free hand against Russia in the east.³⁰⁶ But their fears were misplaced: the fighting had lasted four stalemated years. Surely France, assisted again by Britain, even with the Soviet Union on the sidelines, could again stalemate Germany?³⁰⁷ Like the British, Stalin seemed to have a high opinion of French military capabilities.³⁰⁸ With a presumed protracted war in the west, he seemed set to gain all the time needed to correct his mistakes, and force-modernize the massive Red Army.

GREED

Stalin takes advantage of the hour. . . . All from our success. We make victory easy for the others.

JOSEPH GOEBBELS, *diary entry, June 28, 1940*¹

If the Germans propose a partition of Turkey, then you can reveal our cards.

STALIN, *instructions to Molotov for meeting with Hitler, November 13, 1940*²

BRITAIN AND FRANCE had supplied weapons to Finland and contemplated attacking a strategic vulnerability—the insatiable thirst for oil—of both the Soviets and their trade partners the Germans, with whom the Western powers were at war. In what was designated Operation Pike, the idea emerged to launch air raids using airfields in Syria, Turkey, and Iran to obliterate the rigs, refineries, and storage tanks in Soviet Baku, Grozny, and Batum. The British put out rumors that the plans were afoot, evidently in part to distract the Soviets from possible Western operations planned to defend Scandinavia, but the Royal Air Force did not undertake reconnaissance flights over the intended Caucasus targets until after Finland had capitulated. Of course, any Western bombing of Baku might have backfired, rendering the perennial British-French accusation—that the USSR and Nazi Germany were in alliance—into a reality. Be that as it may, Pike never occurred.³ A French threat to intervene militarily on Finland's behalf had never materialized, either: Daladier had once more left the key decision to Chamberlain, and when nothing came of it, the French leader resigned. The upshot was the worst of all worlds: Stalin had escaped without damage, but with his profound distrust of the British and French reinforced.⁴

Hitler, in April 1940, had occupied Norway and Denmark with relative ease, protecting his vital raw material imports from Sweden. On April 9 in Norway, Major Vidkun Quisling seized power in a Nazi-backed coup d'état. Nazi assertions that the Wehrmacht had been compelled to seize these countries to protect them from British-French violations of their neutrality were repeated in the Soviet press. Molotov voiced Soviet approval of the Nazi occupation of Denmark and Norway to Schulenburg, wishing Germany a complete victory in these "defensive measures." The British, he added, "have gone too far."⁵ Similarly, Zhdanov, on April 13, stressed that "from the USSR's point of view," it was "more pleasant, useful, and valuable to have nearby not the anti-Soviet Anglo-French allies who intended to attack either Germany or Leningrad, but a country that is in friendly relations with us."⁶ Four days later, at a meeting with the high command, Stalin complained of Britain and France that "they are, you know, fighting a war over there, but it is a weak war; either they are in combat or they are playing cards. They might suddenly make peace."⁷

Stalin and his minions were dead wrong on the latter point. On May 10, 1940, Germany smashed into the Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxembourg, on a path to France. Luxembourg effectively did not oppose the German occupation, while the Netherlands capitulated on May 15; the Belgians did so slightly later (without even consulting their French allies). Such was "the peace" between the Nazis and the Western powers: further conquests by Hitler.⁸ A disgraced Chamberlain announced his resignation to the cabinet. His fate had been sealed with the abysmal failed defense of Norway, which had sparked a searing debate in the House of Commons on May 7–8. (One conservative MP had admonished him, "In the name of God, go.") No one had contributed more to Britain's Norway debacle than Winston Churchill, who, as first lord of the Admiralty, was responsible for naval operations. But aided by Conservative rebels, Churchill outmaneuvered his main Tory party rival, foreign secretary Viscount Halifax (a member of the House of Lords, not the Commons), and got himself named the prime minister of a new coalition government with Labour.

Churchill, the scion of a British aristocrat and an American heiress, was lucky to be alive. Back in December 1931, he had been struck by a taxi on Fifth Avenue in New York City, after looking the wrong way while crossing the street. “A man has been killed,” a witness had called out erroneously.⁹ Churchill was a staunch imperialist, perhaps even more so than Chamberlain, having advocated for using poison gas against rebellious Kurdish tribesmen in Iraq, a British mandate. Also like Chamberlain, Churchill was ready, for the sake of the empire, to bargain with nasty types, but, unlike Chamberlain, he viewed the German national character as dangerous under certain leadership, such as Hitler. Regarding Munich, Churchill had prophetically told the House of Commons that Britain “has been offered a choice between war and shame. She has chosen shame and will get war.” In 1940, many British elites were still waffling, urging a “settlement” with the Nazis. Chamberlain remained in government as lord president of the Privy Council (responsible for much of domestic policy, which did not much interest Churchill) and as formal leader of the Tory party. When Chamberlain entered the House of Commons on May 13, 1940, for the first time since resigning as prime minister, the “MPs lost their heads, they shouted, they cheered, they waved their order papers, and his reception was a regular ovation.”¹⁰ Churchill, however, steadfastly refused all entreaties to seek terms with Hitler, a man he would never meet, but whose measure he took.¹¹

Born the same decade as Churchill, Stalin missed these important cues. The ideologically blinkered despot tended to be dismissive of all British “imperialists,” lumped together, and kept in force the Comintern directive that “not fascist Germany, which entered into an agreement with the USSR, but reactionary anti-Soviet England, with its immense colonial empire, is the bulwark of capitalism.”¹²

Stalin had gone in deeper than ever with Nazi Germany. After the signing of the most recent commercial agreement, in 1940, Soviet demands had gone through the roof: they sought the nearly finished “surplus” cruisers Seydlitz, Prinz Eugen, and Lützow, and the blueprints for the battleship Bismarck, 31,000 tons of armor plating, torpedoes, ammunition, artillery, dehydration equipment (for synthetic fuel), steel-hardening technology, and all models of German planes in production (Messerschmitts, Dorniers, Junkers, Heinkels). The Germans were incredulous. Stalin, through Mikoyan, employed pressure tactics, holding up grain and oil deliveries, which induced the Germans to deliver some thirty state-of-the-art warplanes. He also interceded to reduce some Soviet demands. But Molotov and Mikoyan insisted to the Germans that the partially finished heavy cruiser Lützow had to be handed over. On May 26, 1940, for a price of 104 million reichsmarks, Germany allowed the ship, renamed Petropavlovsk, to be towed to Leningrad for completion, with their help.¹³ The Germans were worried that Soviet intelligence would be able to duplicate advanced German construction methods.¹⁴ Soviet counterintelligence would outfit the German team’s residence with listening and photographic devices, and promptly set up a honey trap with a young beauty.¹⁵

Stalin was still obsessing over Trotsky as well. On May 27, word came to the Little Corner that the NKVD had failed, yet again, to assassinate the exile, despite an assault on his villa by some twenty men and the discharge of more than 200 bullets into Trotsky’s bedroom. Beria demanded a report from the head of the operations team, Sudoplatov, then whisked him to Stalin’s Near Dacha, a half hour’s drive from Lubyanka, so that the operative could report in person on the failure—and on new plans to fulfill the assignment. Stalin was said to have asked a single question, then issued instructions: the entire global Trotsky surveillance network should be put on the line to eliminate Trotsky, because once Trotsky was eliminated, the need for surveillance would disappear.¹⁶

Beyond his greed and distraction, Stalin's inability to pick up on the political changes in London was driven by an abiding antipathy toward the Western powers.¹⁷ But Churchill, too, had trouble perceiving all his options. He reveled in little Finland's fight against the Soviets, publicly declaring that it proved how "Communism rots the soul of a nation."¹⁸ He had ceased his cultivation of Maisky. But the West's war against Germany was going poorly. Even after the first British evacuation of Dunkirk, the new PM had dispatched still more ground troops to France, to prevent that country's fall. In doing so, Churchill almost lost his land army—and the war—right then and there. The commander of British reinforcements in France was soon imploring the PM to evacuate these troops, too. Some 338,000 British as well as French and Belgian soldiers did manage to escape from Dunkirk back across the Channel, thanks only to a blunder by Hitler and his top commander, halting their ground attacks, as well as French sacrifices in a rearguard action. "We shall defend our island, whatever the cost may be," Churchill exhorted on June 4, 1940, as Britain's land army fled in boats. "We shall fight on the beaches, we shall fight on the landing grounds, we shall fight in the fields and in the streets, we shall fight in the hills; we shall never surrender." This ringing oratory elicited a lukewarm domestic reception, a further sign of British precariousness.¹⁹ It did not take a genius to grasp that the only formidable land army remaining on the continent, besides Hitler's, was Stalin's.

NEW REALITIES

On June 5 and 6, Pravda printed portraits of Soviet military brass, apparently to reassure the public in the face of the latest triumphal march of the Wehrmacht. By June 14, after a little more than four weeks, the Germans had already entered Paris.²⁰ The fathers and grandfathers of these troops had fought for more than four years and never seized that prize.²¹ On June 17, a new French government sued for peace. “Honor, common sense, and the interests of the country require that all free Frenchmen, wherever they be, should continue the fight as best they may,” a general named Charles de Gaulle quixotically broadcast from London to France over BBC radio on June 18.²² Three days later, the German victory was sealed in the same French forest, inside the very same railway carriage—a rickety old wagon-lit used by Marshal Foch—in which the Germans had surrendered in the First World War. Hitler sat in Foch’s former seat.²³ Nazi Germany decided to occupy more than half of France, including the Atlantic and English Channel coasts.²⁴ A collaborationist rump French state was allowed in the southern city of Vichy.

France’s fall came to seem inevitable, especially since it lacked the protection afforded by the Channel, but in the years leading up to 1940, French military industry had created an arsenal roughly equal to the Nazi one.²⁵ True, the French air force significantly lagged the Luftwaffe, but France fielded more ground soldiers and tanks than did the Wehrmacht. And the German tanks were often inferior.²⁶ French intelligence operated a remarkable agent network, signals intelligence, and photoreconnaissance, but after France’s famed Second Bureau had issued a dozen secret warnings of an imminent German attack—going back to November 1939 and including four in April 1940—and the predicted invasion had failed to materialize, the officers had lost their credibility.²⁷ French higher-ups, for their part, failed to make proper use of the plentiful information acquired of German plans.²⁸

An even deeper problem involved tactics: the French fought a war of position, the Nazis a war of movement.²⁹ France’s plan of battle had two aspects: fixed defensive fortifications, known as the Maginot Line, and a motorized northern army intended to thrust into Belgium and Holland and establish front lines there.³⁰ Between the two lay a soft spot, the Ardennes, which some French military experts considered traversable even by mechanized forces, despite its forested and mountainous terrain and a substantial river, but the French had done nothing to prepare for such an eventuality, laying no antitank obstacles and only scattered bunkers. This was exactly where the audacious Germans struck.³¹ The Wehrmacht could not conceal its massing of troops for an assault through the Ardennes, of course, but Germany conducted a feint, invading the Low Countries through the Gembloux Gap, drawing the bulk of French forces northward to interdict a presumed Wehrmacht advance to the Channel coast. By instead slicing with its main strike between the French and British land forces massed in Belgium, to the north, and the Maginot Line, to the south, the German army stormed into a vacuum and achieved the largest encirclement in military history.

This brilliant plan of battle had been serendipitous. The first three versions of the German battle plan had called for an attack via the north, into the teeth of the French deployments, but inclement weather had compelled a delay in Hitler's winter attack scheme, during which two careless German staff officers were shot down over France carrying a portfolio with staff maps. The battle plan could not remain the same. In the meantime, a German intelligence officer playing the part of the French and British commanders in war games had demonstrated to the German general staff that the enemy would position its top forces in Belgium, but only weakly defend the Ardennes, and would be slow to shift forces to counter a German attack there. The late-in-the-day fourth and final battle plan, under Erich von Manstein (b. 1887), a staff officer, hit upon the feint (by 29 divisions through northern Belgium and the Netherlands) and the massive "sickle cut" (by 46 crack divisions through the Ardennes).³² The plan was beyond audacious, and a nervous high command threw everything into the initial assault, without any reserve panzer divisions, on a very narrow front, in vulnerable columns 250 miles in length, with flammable fuel trucks in front. Yet the much-feared Western bombing raids and counterattacks against exposed German flanks did not materialize until it was too late.

Even then, decisive victory had come only after the German tank specialist Heinz Guderian ignored his orders and, exploiting his Ardennes breakthrough, suddenly raced for the Channel—a bold act of insubordination.³³ He had punched through to the Channel by May 20, a mere ten days into the war (admittedly, over high-quality French roads outside the Ardennes).³⁴ But neither he nor Hitler had expected this armored blitz to seal the fate of France (Guderian later called it “a miracle”). After all, once caught out by surprise, no foe remains passive. But even after being shown aerial photographs of German traffic jams in the Ardennes woods, the French brass did not manage to redeploy their formidable war machine to seize back the initiative, being, in effect, defeated psychologically.³⁵ Tactical military failures were compounded by administrative and political ones. Maxime Weygand, an ultrarightist, replaced the initial top French commander, Maurice Gamelin, and undercut the Third Republic’s civilian leadership; the lion of the Great War, the eighty-four-year-old Marshal Philippe Pétain, had been brought into government, and immediately plotted against it, too. France’s political class folded, opening the way for hard rightists to pursue their long-sought authoritarian regime in rump Vichy. Despite German air superiority, therefore, the defeat of France’s Third Republic was contingent—derived from egregious generalship, political treachery, and German audacity.³⁶

The myth of a planned blitzkrieg—annihilation of the enemy’s fighting capacity in a lightning strike—was born. The improvisation notwithstanding, armored warfare had succeeded spectacularly.³⁷ The French lost 124,000 killed and 200,000 wounded, while 1.5 million Western troops were taken prisoner; German casualties were fewer than 50,000 dead and wounded. (Mussolini had waited until Paris fell to attack southern France; Italy suffered some 4,000 casualties in direct fighting, the French 104.) The Wehrmacht became intoxicated by its swift victory, and bound ever more tightly to Hitler.³⁸ The Führer, unlike Stalin, had embraced integrated, independently operating armor and panzer divisions, overriding the conservatism of the majority of German generals and standing by Guderian, who had led a minority in the push for the novel formations.³⁹

More broadly, Hitler's foreign policy recklessness had once again resulted in exhilarating success. It had taken Stalin 105 days to subdue the Finnish nation; it had taken Hitler less than half that time to subdue a nation ten times the size. "Stalin was very quick-tempered and irritable at that time," recalled Khrushchev. "I had rarely seen him like that. At meetings he hardly ever sat down in his chair but constantly paced. Now he literally ran around the room and cursed like a longshoreman. He cursed the French and he cursed the British, asking how they could have let Hitler smash them like that."⁴⁰

The despot needed to find a mirror. Besides him, there had been a total of thirty-two members and candidate members of the politburo between inception (1919) and 1940. Three of them (Lenin, Dzierżyński, Kuibyshev) had died of natural causes; two (Kirov and one on Stalin's orders) would be assassinated; two (Tomsky, Orjonikidze) had killed themselves. Fourteen had been executed as enemies: Zinoviev, Kamenev, Rykov, Bukharin, Uglanov, Krestinsky, Kosior, Baumanis, Syrtsov, Chubar, Eihe, Postyshev, Rudzutaks, Yezhov. One (Petrovsky) had been expelled but spared. The remaining ten—Molotov, Voroshilov, Kaganovich, Mikoyan, Kalinin, Zhdanov, Andreyev, Shvernik, Khrushchev, Beria—were alive, at his forbearance. Such despotism smothered policy give-and-take. Stalin summoned them when he saw fit; they fed him the information he sought. The conduct of Soviet foreign policy, unlike that of most great powers, was significantly less subject to the usual vagaries of internal regime jockeying among interest groups, but it was utterly hostage to Stalin's misconceptions.⁴¹

Right after he made the deal with the Nazis, Stalin had privately observed that “the nonaggression pact is to a certain degree helping Germany. Next time we'll urge on the other side.”⁴² This looks like a blustery lie to soften the political damage of the Pact. Molotov, on June 17, 1940, offered German ambassador Schulenburg his “warmest congratulations . . . on the splendid successes of the German Wehrmacht” (according to the German notetaker), while adding (according to the Soviet notetaker) that “Hitler and the German government could scarcely have expected such rapid successes.”⁴³ It was, of course, Molotov's and Stalin's expectations that had been upended.⁴⁴

Stalin had staked Soviet security on France's fighting capabilities, then contributed mightily to France's defeat: the 1940 economic agreement between the Soviet Union and Germany was four times larger than the 1939 one. Altogether, in 1940, the Soviets would supply 34 percent of German oil, 40 percent of its nickel, 74 percent of phosphates, 55 percent of manganese ore, 65 percent of chromium ore, 67 percent of asbestos, and more than 1 million tons of timber and of grain.⁴⁵ True, big new Soviet shipments from the February 1940 agreement did not arrive in time for the offensive against France, but, knowing that Stalin's shipments were coming, German military planners were confidently depleting stocks. “Hitler conducts his military operations, and Stalin acts as his quartermaster,” Trotsky had quipped.⁴⁶ The Wehrmacht's actual quartermaster general remarked, “The conclusion of this treaty has saved us.”⁴⁷ Stalin's Pact also allowed Hitler to confidently retain a mere 10 divisions in the east. The Soviet contribution to German logistics was crucial as well. British sea power had once blockaded Napoleon's bid for continental empire, but now, thanks to Stalin, Nazi Germany managed to circumvent a British naval blockade with the transshipment of goods from the Near and Far East through Soviet territory. Thus could a Central European country take on a global empire.⁴⁸

To be sure, Stalin was also making out like a bandit. Berlin dragged its feet over shipments, but he got samples of artillery, tanks (along with the formulas for their armor), chemical warfare equipment, a naval cruiser, the plans to the battleship Bismarck, heavy naval guns, locomotives, turbines, generators, diesel engines, machine tools. Stalin evidently was not going to risk that German bounty—and Hitler’s wrath—by playing both sides of the conflict. But his overwhelming support of the Nazi war machine, when he was counting on the French land army, smacks of miscalculation and pettiness.

With France’s defeat, the strategic ground shifted radically.⁴⁹ In the very early morning of June 23, 1940, for the first and only time in his life, an exultant Hitler toured Paris, accompanied by two of his favorites, the architect Albert Speer and sculptor Arno Breker. The Führer was driven first to the neobaroque Opéra, which he examined in light of the architectural plans he had studied as a young man. Later he posed for photographers in front of the Eiffel Tower and took in Napoleon’s tomb. “It was the dream of my life to be permitted to see Paris,” he remarked. He had been expected to preside over a German victory parade, and in anticipation, some staff inside the British security establishment proposed bombing the reviewing stand, but their suggestion was rejected. In the event, Hitler opted not to stage a parade, evidently because of the danger of a British air raid, and already by 9:00 a.m. on June 23 he was back at the airfield for the return to Berlin. He would tell his entourage, “I am not in the mood for a victory parade. We aren’t at the end yet.”⁵⁰

As it happened, also on June 23, Semyon Kotko, an opera by Sergei Prokofyev, premiered at the Stanislavsky Opera Theater, in Moscow, following many postponements. It was based on a novella by Valentin Katayev, I Am the Son of the Working People, and marked Prokofyev's first foray on a quintessential Soviet theme.⁵¹ The score was infused with folk song intonations. "That evening, when I first heard Semyon Kotko, I understood that Prokofyev was a great composer," recalled the virtuoso pianist Svyatoslav Richter.⁵² When Prokofyev first composed the score, his friend Meyerhold, who also felt a need to demonstrate his allegiance to the regime, begged to be the one to stage it. After Meyerhold had vanished without trace and Sergei Eisenstein claimed to be otherwise occupied, the direction fell to an actress. In the story, Kotko (a tenor) returns, in 1918, from the Romanian front of the Great War to his village in Ukraine, where pillaging foreign interventionists are trying to restore the landlords; an embittered kulak, the father of Kotko's teenage fiancée, Sofia (a soprano), forbids her from marrying a poor peasant. Thanks to heroic partisan warfare and the resolve of this "son of the working people," Semyon and Sofia are reunited as anti-Soviet forces are driven away or executed. Stalin's Pact with Hitler precluded using the novella's portrayal of Germans as the villains, and so in the opera's staging the Germans (as well as Austrians) mostly became Ukrainian nationalists.⁵³

A NEW UNION

Molotov had not only congratulated Schulenburg, but also stated—and here the congratulations look like a spoonful of sugar to help the medicine go down—that from June 14, 1940, the Red Army had sent substantial additional forces to Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, where "changes of governments" were in process.⁵⁴ In the wee hours of June 15–16, Molotov summoned the envoys of Estonia (1:00 a.m.) and Latvia (1:10 a.m.) to inform them that, just as in Lithuania, the Red Army would soon be crossing their borders, and instructed them not to resist militarily but to await the formation of a new government.⁵⁵ In other words, the USSR was violating its recent pledges to respect the sovereignty of the three Baltic states. Of the three, Lithuania had the largest Communist party in early 1940—a mere 1,500 members, following Stalin’s mass terror.⁵⁶ “There are no Communists outside Russia,” he had told the Lithuanian foreign minister a few months before. “What you have in Latvia are Trotskyists: if they cause you trouble, shoot them.”⁵⁷ By summer 1940, Estonia had a mere 150 Communists, out of a country of 1.3 million. Latvia had a similar number.⁵⁸ But Stalin’s coercive, rapid-fire Sovietization did not rely on indigenous Communist movements. Rather, the operations followed the formula laid down by the Red Army’s thrust into eastern Poland in fall 1939.⁵⁹

In eastern Poland, the NKVD had deported more than 1 million of the 13.5 million residents to labor camps. (Interrogators called their truncheons “the Polish Constitution.”) Soviet operatives and local collaborators nationalized industry and redistributed some farmland, although an arduous collectivization was put off for the time being. To smoke out locals unreconciled to Soviet rule, the NKVD used provocateurs. The Polish officer in charge of the fledgling Polish underground turned Soviet informant.⁶⁰ But even with this formidable apparatus of coercion, the Soviet secret police had lacked the bureaucratic resources to themselves smash all existing institutions and associations. In a cunning type of revolution, however, the NKVD allowed free rein to criminal gangs and vigilante groups, which they glorified as citizen militias, and set up anonymous denunciation boxes and walk-in centers, leveraging the grievances built up in society. Who had been fired from a job and could now seek revenge? Who had lost a court case? Who had sold a cow for a price that in retrospect seemed too low? Who had been cuckolded? By bringing forth these denunciations and then acting upon them without verifying, the NKVD effectively allowed state power to be “privatized” by thousands of people looking for redress, survival, cover-up, or promotion. It was Poles themselves who undermined pre-Soviet social bonds, clearing the way for Communist monopoly.⁶¹ That was the essence of totalitarianism: people's agency was elicited to destroy their own agency.

Despite people's evasions and self-misrepresentations, the NKVD—full of half-educated people—amassed a stunning amount of operational information, seizing local archives and personnel files, and using censuses and tax registers, to enumerate the entire population politically. The NKVD locked factory gates with the workers inside until registrations were complete, and put the onus on urban landlords, who would answer with their heads, to march whole apartment buildings to prearranged sites for “registration.” In villages, volunteer or conscripted facilitators were promised rewards for meeting “quotas” of farmers delivered to in-person registrations.⁶²

Then, across nearly 80,000 square miles of territory littered with impassable marshes, served by sparse rail or paved roads fit for vehicles, with a mass influx of refugees and other wartime dislocation, functionaries managed to ensure that every adult in former eastern Poland took part in single-candidate “elections” to a “People’s Assembly.” Posters went up, film screenings were organized, marches staged. The elections provided a legal façade for the transfer of sovereignty, but, more profoundly, they entailed political conditioning in the new regime. The coerced voting took place in full view of others, some of whom were eager or reluctant stool pigeons. Many people nonetheless crossed off the name of the candidate, and some slipped manure into the ballot envelopes. But many of those who spoiled ballots or failed to show were arrested. After the vote, the public displays and slogans remained, and political speeches with mandatory attendance continued. State-sponsored associations were established. State schools replaced private ones, and a new political vocabulary reflecting Communist ideology took over the public sphere and people’s identities.⁶³ In less than two years, western Ukraine and western Belorussia recapitulated much of what had been carried through in the Soviet Union over two decades.

In summer 1940, a similar “revolution from abroad” was enacted in the Baltics. Stalin ordered forced Sovietization of Estonia, to be overseen by Zhdanov; of Latvia, overseen by show-trial prosecutor Vyshinsky; and of Lithuania, overseen by Dekanozov, the Beria protégé and Molotov deputy at foreign affairs. Each commanded gangs of functionaries newly promoted as a result of the terror. But here, too, local inhabitants were incited to orgies of denunciation, such that, in avenging wrongs, assuaging hunger, and satisfying greed, they helped level their societies and pave the way for Communist monopoly. Once again, the local archives were seized for operational purposes.⁶⁴ Scores of thousands of local inhabitants would be deported to Siberia, and those not removed were compelled to take part in single-candidate “elections” to People’s Assemblies; the installed deputies, in turn, “voted” to form Soviet socialist republics and join the USSR. The economies were confiscated (“nationalized”), including land, although collectivization was held off. Even as underground resistance units formed, substantial numbers of people on the political left in Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania—including the ethnic Russian and Jewish workers—supported this Sovietization.⁶⁵

All told, between March and June 1940, five new Soviet socialist republics were established (including Karelia, elevated to Union republic status), increasing their total to sixteen and the Soviet population to 200 million. On June 5, 1940, a “Ten-Day” culture festival celebrating the expanded Belorussian SSR, involving 1,200 participants, opened in Moscow.⁶⁶ The regime had long since shifted from award ceremonies for milkmaids and cotton pickers, with Stalin and entourage donning national costume, to showcases of the Union’s national cultures. The first Ten-Day, in 1936, had celebrated Soviet Ukraine, with some 500 participants, numerous awards bestowed on artistic organizations, and additional funds allocated for the arts in the republic.⁶⁷ Similarly extravagant Ten-Days had followed for Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan, Azerbaijan, and Armenia, whose troupes and ensembles performed in the top theaters and conservatories of the capital.⁶⁸ The USSR committee on artistic affairs took no chances, dispatching composers to republics and lavishing robust sums on them to compose a “national” opera or ballet.⁶⁹ Moscow-worthy performances required the addition of singers or musicians from the capital and a large crew comprising everything from choreographers to hairdressers.⁷⁰ Each “national” folk dance or “national” opera became recognizably Soviet.⁷¹

CLASH

Hitler took Stalin’s Baltic annexations badly. The secret protocols of the Pact delimited “spheres of influence” but did not specify the actions permitted—or forbidden—within the respective spheres. There was not a word in the Pact about Soviet occupation of any countries, let alone implanting clone regimes. Stalin was well aware that Hitler had not authorized him to annex former tsarist possessions. But for a long time the despot had cultivated the idea that a fratricide among the imperialist powers might afford unique opportunities to expand “the revolution” in the resulting chaos and destruction. At the Bolshoi back on January 21, 1940 (the sixteenth anniversary of Lenin’s passing), he had boasted, of eastern Poland’s Sovietization, that “Red Army activities are also a matter of world revolution.”⁷² Then, in the face of the lightning German conquest of France, he had decided to unleash his revolutionary opportunism again. In the seemingly endless rows about whether Stalin’s Kremlin was pursuing Soviet security, defensively, or revolutionary expansionism, the answer was: both, if someone else provided the opportunity.

On June 26, Molotov conveyed an ultimatum to Romania for former tsarist Bessarabia, which again surprised Germany. German officials pressured the Romanian government not to resist the landgrab and thereby afford Moscow a pretext for a full takeover of the country, whose oil fields thirty-five miles north of Bucharest were a life-or-death resource for the Wehrmacht. The Romanians hastily—and angrily—withdrawed as the Red Army occupied Bessarabia. Hitler refrained from public criticism but told his adjutants that this was “the first Russian attack on Western Europe.”⁷³ The Führer became angrier still at the Soviet seizure of northern Bukovina, which had never been tsarist, was not covered by the Pact, and was full of ethnic Germans. Molotov told Schulenburg that “Bukovina constitutes the last part that is still missing from a unified Ukraine.”⁷⁴ The mass-circulation magazine Ogonyok printed photographs of Romanians greeting the Red Army (“the Great Liberator”) with flowers and smiles.⁷⁵ The Nazi inner circle seethed. The Wehrmacht had smashed Poland on the battlefield while the Soviets had waltzed in and grabbed the Polish territory with the oil. This time, the Wehrmacht had smashed the French land army while the Soviets seized large pieces of Romania, as well as the defenseless Baltic states. “Grave robber!” Goebbels wrote of Stalin in his diary.⁷⁶

Berlin demanded transfer to Germany of the 125,000 Volksdeutsche in Bessarabia and Bukovina, receipt of the 100,000 tons of grain from Bessarabia specified in a German contract with Romania, and guarantees for all German property as well as the railroad tracks transporting Romanian oil to the Reich.⁷⁷ Stalin began stationing what would increase to 34 divisions on former Romanian soil, linking what was now Soviet Lvov (Lwów, Lemberg) with Soviet Chernovitsy (Cernăuți, Czernowitz), in the Ukrainian SSR, while improving the security of Odessa. The fundamental clash of interests between Moscow and Berlin and the Soviet need to counterbalance Germany’s continental aggrandizement could scarcely have been plainer. Just as the Winter War had definitively pushed Finland into the German camp, the seizure of Bessarabia and northern Bukovina consolidated Romania as a staunch German ally.⁷⁸

Stalin also needed to reckon with the circumstance that his own value to Hitler was declining in relative terms. German-annexed Silesia and the Czech lands of Bohemia and Moravia were major industrial centers.

(Austria had minimal industry, but it gifted Germany an underemployed labor force.) France, Belgium, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands all possessed significant industries as well, from steel and autos to aircraft and electronics, as well as railway locomotives and freight cars that exceeded the stock of the Reich. France and Norway produced chemicals and aluminum, too. The combined population of Greater Germany and the occupied lands, along with Italy, was now 290 million, and in terms of territory it was almost as large as the United States. This vast potential remained to be consolidated (Denmark refused a move toward a customs-and-currency union), but the direction was clear.⁷⁹ And the coup de grâce? Following his self-destructive bloodbath to extirpate phantom enemies, Stalin now acquired an actual fifth column on Soviet territory: resolute anti-Soviet saboteurs in the newly annexed territories of western Ukraine, western Belorussia, and the Baltic republics. In 1940, these regions, which contained a mere 10 percent of the Soviet population, would account for some 60 percent of the arrests by the NKVD. At the same time, thanks to the multiple German economic and trade delegations Stalin was allowing onto Soviet territory and into Soviet factories in 1940, direct German intelligence gathering, which had been almost nonexistent, became significant.⁸⁰

TOYING WITH THE BRITISH

Stalin was presented an opportunity for a strategic shift, thanks to Sir Stafford Cripps, a high-profile, wealthy vegetarian and leftist whose agitation for an anti-fascist united front against Germany had gotten him expelled from the Labour party. The day before the Soviet invasion of eastern Poland, Cripps had urged his friend Foreign Secretary Halifax to send a mission to Moscow to negotiate a nonaggression pact with Moscow, paralleling the Hitler-Stalin Pact. The idea had gone nowhere, but in February 1940, en route to the UK from war-torn China, Cripps had been received by Molotov in Moscow, where he drew the conclusion that the countries could work out a bilateral trade agreement, and possibly more than that. Maisky, in London, had also proposed reviving discussions on trade, but the foreign office had questioned Soviet motives and worried about Soviet reexport of British goods to Britain's enemy Germany. Then, in May 1940, with France about to fall, Churchill, now PM, had acceded to the suggestion by Halifax, perhaps initiated by Maisky, to send Cripps to Moscow as a special envoy to spur trade talks. Molotov refused to accept Cripps under special envoy status. On June 3, 1940, the Soviet spy Gerhard Kegel ("X"), now in the economics section of the German embassy in Moscow, reported to Soviet military intelligence that the Germans were concerned about the pending Cripps visit and a possible Anglo-Soviet trade agreement.⁸¹ At Soviet insistence, London appointed Cripps as a normal ambassador.⁸² He arrived in Moscow on June 12.

Britain's imposing embassy, the former residence of a sugar magnate, was located on the embankment directly across the Moscow River from the Kremlin, with a spectacular view. Inside, its condition was appalling: not merely tasteless—sickly looking silk brocade of hideous colors (as Cripps observed)—but dilapidated. The embassy tableware consisted of bits and pieces—no dishes, no glasses, no silver—and the facility lacked a butler or maid, making diplomatic receptions that much more of a challenge. The small staff was unable to keep up with the volume of cipher work, let alone the diplomatic rounds in the complex city. Most British embassy staff were Russians and Soviet ethnic Germans, making German the dominant language.⁸³ That was British grand strategy: everything on the cheap—you fight my war, you staff my embassy.

Two days after his arrival—the very day Paris fell to Hitler—Cripps saw Molotov in the Kremlin for an hour and expressed a desire to improve relations. That same day, Molotov and his deputies sent birthday cards for the king (George VI) for the first time. But Molotov was not forthcoming with Cripps: also on June 14, the Soviet government head signed off on the Soviet ultimatum to the Lithuanians, a prelude to the occupation of the Baltic states, Bessarabia, and northern Bukovina. These aggressive Soviet actions proved to be an indirect boon to Cripps, though: soon, more than a hundred crates of ill-matched furniture and furnishings were evacuated from shuttered British missions in the three Baltic states and sent to the embassy in Moscow. Still, the moves exacerbated anti-Soviet sentiment in London.

Not everyone in the British establishment was hostile. On June 16, 1940, old David Lloyd George, who had once been an ardent partisan of appeasement, calling Hitler “the George Washington of Germany,” told Maisky—during a discussion about a possible evacuation of the British government to Canada, if necessary—that “peace between England and Germany is impossible.” When Lloyd George inquired whether the Soviets might finally stand up to Hitler, Maisky demurred. Lloyd George raised his finger: “Watch out that it does not turn out to be too late!”⁸⁴

The British government, for its part, had both minimalist aims—induce the Soviet Union not to increase its largesse toward Nazi Germany—and maximalist ones: attain significant Soviet exports to Britain. Cripps believed it was possible to go beyond even the latter and get Britain and the Soviet Union to join forces against Germany, notwithstanding the Hitler-Stalin nonaggression and trade pacts, the dismemberment of Poland, the aggression against Finland, and now the Soviet annexation of the Baltic states.⁸⁵ A lawyer rather than a diplomat, Cripps was capable of criticizing Soviet realities, but he had defended Stalin’s arrests of British nationals as spies in fabricated trials, as well as the Soviet Union’s 1939 seizure of eastern Poland. Unlike Churchill (or Chamberlain), Cripps harbored no anxieties about Soviet penetration of Europe as a catalyst for spreading socialist revolution; he saw Stalin as security-minded and defensive. But Cripps met a wall of skepticism from the British foreign office, whose officials warned against enabling Stalin to exact better terms from Hitler by using “negotiations” with London. Surprisingly, at least to Cripps, the Soviet side was no more receptive.⁸⁶ He waited and waited to be received a second time after his first chilly audience with Molotov.

Finally, on July 1, bearing a message from Churchill (dated June 24) on “the prospect of Germany establishing hegemony over the Continent,” Cripps was received by none other than Stalin—and in the Little Corner, in the presence of Molotov, between 6:30 and 9:15 p.m.⁸⁷ Among the difficult matters aired during what Cripps described as a “severely frank discussion” was that of British sanctions on Soviet imports of nonferrous metals. (The British suspected they would be rerouted by Stalin to Hitler; in fact, Germany needed these raw materials to produce the goods it owed to the Soviet Union.) “I could of course give a promise that not a single pound of metal would go to Germany,” Stalin stated acidly, “but that would be dishonest. A promise is of no use which is not fulfilled.” He went on to categorize Churchill’s message about German expansionism as reactionary. “If the prime minister wants to restore the old equilibrium,” he told Cripps, “we cannot agree with him.” On the contrary, the despot remarked, “We must change the old balance of power in Europe, for it has acted to the USSR’s disadvantage.”⁸⁸

Stalin was still preoccupied with British “imperialism” even now. He could not fail to have noticed that Hitler had become uppity following the conquest of France, but seared into the despot’s mind was the debacle of the Western-Soviet military talks in summer 1939 and the enmity over the Soviet-Finnish War. Churchill’s private communication calling for “harmonious and mutually beneficial” bilateral relations had a concrete aspect—encouraging strong Soviet actions in the Balkans, beyond even Bessarabia, to deny their strategic exploitation by Nazi Germany—but to Stalin this looked like the usual scheming to embroil the USSR in the war, allowing the British to escape. After the session, Cripps soberly wrote, “If anything is to be accomplished here, there is a very difficult past to be got over, and it's going to be slow work at the best.”⁸⁹

Cripps's failure to create any momentum toward rapprochement might be blamed on a stubborn Churchill (as well as knaves in the foreign office).⁹⁰ Churchill, however, had provided the basis for bilateral cooperation in his resolve. On July 3, 1940, to prevent French warships from falling into German hands, he had scuttled the main part of the French navy, stationed near Algeria, killing 1,297 of his ally's sailors. A French battleship and five destroyers escaped, but Churchill's ruthless action made an impression on Hitler, as well as on Roosevelt. That same day, Churchill received Maisky at 10 Downing Street and told him Britain would never come to terms with Hitler. The next day, when Churchill reported on the naval destruction, the British Parliament rose in ovation; Maisky was present.⁹¹ Stalin kept insisting that Churchill refused to accept how the Versailles order had been shattered, but in truth, the British PM did admit Versailles was kaput.⁹² What the Bulldog did not want to admit was that a replacement international order would require a significant place for the Communist Soviet Union, in its now expanded borders, including Poland and the Baltics, the same tiny former tsarist possessions causing Stalin trouble with Hitler. The arch-imperialist Churchill, while holding one quarter of the world, took offense at these Soviet annexations of white peoples.⁹³ He wanted to prevail in the war without empowering the Soviets in Europe in the bargain. Neither he (nor most subsequent scholars) would admit as much, but this was the same sticking point that had inhibited Chamberlain from signing any alliance with Stalin.⁹⁴

The dilemma was stark. “We cannot defeat Germany fully without allies,” The Economist would editorialize in late July 1940. “Patiently, if need be, but with great persistence, we must work for a Russian alliance.”⁹⁵ Churchill, however, held to the minimalist British aim of stopping an escalation in Soviet material support of Germany, and he was already fixated on salvation from Roosevelt and the United States, which had the eighteenth-largest land army in the world, with fewer troops than Bulgaria, and no air force to speak of, but had immeasurable potential.⁹⁶ Such considerations amounted to formidable obstacles for Stalin to overcome. Perhaps they could not have been overcome. But the despot did not try.

Rumors were swirling in Berlin of a change in the USSR's foreign policy orientation.⁹⁷ Back on the eve of Cripps's arrival in Moscow, Soviet military intelligence had warned Stalin that German delays in military deliveries to the USSR stemmed from Berlin's concern that Cripps would be bearing "some gifts."⁹⁸ On July 13, Stalin had Molotov send a Soviet record of his conversation with Cripps to the Soviet envoys in London, Berlin, and Rome—and to the German ambassador in Moscow. Stalin aimed not to intimidate Hitler but to demonstrate his continuing loyalty. Stalin, as if speaking not to Cripps but directly to Hitler, was recorded as having replied to the ambassador's suggestion that Britain and the USSR "ought to agree on a common policy of self-protection against Germany and on the re-establishment of the balance of power" by saying that "he did not see any danger of the hegemony of any one country in Europe and still less any danger that Europe might be engulfed by Germany." He added that he "knew several leading German statesmen well" and "had not discovered any desire on their part to engulf European countries. Stalin was not of the opinion that German military successes menaced the Soviet Union and her friendly relations with Germany."⁹⁹

German intelligence was closely following Cripps's activities, thanks to intercepted telegrams sent to Belgrade by the Yugoslav envoy in Moscow, Milan Gavrilović, a Cripps confidant. Hitler was in a position to know the talks were fruitless. But to the Führer, Britain and the USSR were talking. The Wehrmacht, for its part, was monitoring Stalin's troop buildup on the Soviet side of the border throughout southeastern Europe. German military aircraft were violating Soviet airspace but then claiming that these were errors committed by pilots in training.¹⁰⁰ On July 3, 1940, the German army chief of staff, Halder, in a conversation with the head of his operations section, had noted that a “military intervention . . . will compel Russia to recognize Germany’s dominant position in Europe.”¹⁰¹

INCOHERENCE

Other Soviet actions belied this pro-German bluster. That same July of 1940, Shaposhnikov, in his last days as chief of the general staff, signed off on a detailed assessment of what a German attack on the USSR would look like.¹⁰² He never acted without Stalin’s approval.¹⁰³ Red Army force dislocation also spoke volumes: of its 188 divisions, just 18 were in the Soviet Far East, and 10 in Eastern Siberia. The main concentrations were on the western frontier: the Kiev special military district (27), Western special military district (25), Odessa military district (11), Baltic special military district (18), and Leningrad military district (15).¹⁰⁴ After August 1940, by which time Meretskov had replaced Shaposhnikov, Germany (supported by Italy, Hungary, Romania, and Finland) was being explicitly named as the likely enemy in the Soviet strategic deployment plan; Britain was no longer mentioned. What is more, the Soviet military districts on the frontier had fleshed out detailed contingencies for war against Germany.¹⁰⁵

At the same time, the economic benefits of the relationship with Germany were still flowing to Moscow. In the second quarter of 1940, the Škoda Works in German-annexed Bohemia would ship orders to the USSR for 393 devices to manufacture machine tools worth billions of rubles.¹⁰⁶ Equally crucial, Ogonyok printed dramatic photographs of European war devastation, including the urban bombing, vivid reminders of how the Soviets had remained outside the conflict.¹⁰⁷ Maisky, according to the British foreign office, said that whereas, according to conventional accounting, in the air war between Britain and Germany, Royal Air Force losses were placed on one side and Luftwaffe losses on another, “he was in the habit of adding them together in one column.”¹⁰⁸ Stalin, furthermore, was absolutely convinced that Churchill wanted not to fight Hitler together with him but to deflect the Wehrmacht eastward and conclude a separate peace with Germany.¹⁰⁹

But Stalin’s views on Britain and geopolitics bordered on incoherence. Steeped in Marxism-Leninism, he was given to dismissing the British—the world’s number-one arms exporters—as a supposed “nation of shopkeepers” (among the ultimate Marxist insults), yet he was also inclined to regard Britain as the arch-imperialist manipulating all world affairs.¹¹⁰ Germany, dominating nearly the entire continent, somehow still remained the victim of the Versailles order.

Soviet propaganda banged on about how the British empire constituted the world’s principal bloodsucker and threat.¹¹¹ The regime called on the full force of its astonishing ideological arsenal: nearly 9,000 newspapers, with a combined daily circulation of 38.4 million, and almost 6 million “radio points” delivering radio by wire (as well as 1 million radio receivers with dials), not to mention countless cinemas showing newsreels, live theater, posters, and publicly displayed slogans. Even if the Soviet masses remained skeptical about this or that regime pronouncement, the population was marinated day and night in Stalin’s worldview.

Inside the Little Corner, in the narrow circle that had regular access to the despot, there were no Anglophiles—like Göring, the counterweight to Ribbentrop in the Nazi regime—who could counter Stalin’s Germanophilia or the Germanophile influence of Molotov, whose signature was on the Pact and who combined the functions of a Göring (overseeing the economy) and a Ribbentrop (foreign affairs).¹¹² As for Voroshilov, even had he admired Britain—he did not—he lacked Molotov’s strength of character to stand up for any view that contravened Stalin’s. Mikoyan, a skilled operative, was too clever to advocate for or against specific policies, knowing Stalin's personality as well as anyone (and having had some clashes with him in the 1920s). The policy views of Beria could best be described as "Yes, comrade Stalin. It shall be done, comrade Stalin." Anyway, it is not even clear whether Stalin informed his minions, besides Molotov, about the details of the new British ambassador's approaches.

In summer 1940, Eugene Lyons published Stalin: Czar of All the Russians, reusing the interview he had obtained a decade earlier, only now it was not to humanize the despot but to dehumanize him. He alluded inaccurately to Stalin's "modest apartment of three rooms," a space the journalist never saw, but he wielded the credibility of his rare face-to-face encounter and long service as the Moscow correspondent of the United Press. Disabused dupes had a lot to make up for. Having previously called Stalin a "thoroughly likable person," Lyons (prodigiously borrowing from Souvarine's biography) now cast him as a duplicitous tyrant.¹¹³ According to Lyons, Stalin nursed a youthful humiliation all his life over his lack of any distinction, "the ugly-duckling of Gori, the sulking professional revolutionist of Tiflis and Baku, the shadowy figure among the giants of the overturn of 1917." The author tore into the despot's foreign machinations, from the Spanish civil war to the attack on Finland. "It is not beyond possibility that Stalin may double-cross Hitler at some point, particularly if an Allied victory seems inevitable," Lyons speculated. "There is even more chance that Hitler may double-cross Stalin."¹¹⁴

A DESPOT MEETS HIS LIMITS

The Red Army was expanding toward 4 million men (as compared with just 1 million in 1934). Some 11,000 of the 33,000 officers discharged during the terror had been reinstated. Industrial production (in constant prices) had tripled since 1928.¹¹⁵ That said, 1940 GDP per capita in the Soviet Union was not very different from projected trends based on economic performance during the tsarist era. The regime had industrialized in no small part by severely repressing consumption. Consumer shortages had been worsening since 1938.¹¹⁶ At the same time, alcohol production reached 250 million gallons, up from 96.5 million gallons in 1932. By 1940, the Soviet Union had more shops selling alcohol than selling meat, vegetables, and fruit combined.¹¹⁷

None of the wildly ambitious industrial targets in the Five-Year Plans (1928–32, 1933–37, 1938–) had been or would be reached. Output continued to be dogged by input shortages, which managerial black marketeering struggled to overcome through hoarding (which exacerbated the shortages) and bartering. Some enterprising factory officials reopened closed mines and sold the coal on the side, which fetched more than four times the state price; others established commercial exchanges for goods that had vanished from factory books and were in high demand throughout the Union, thereby making markets. But extra-plan entrepreneurialism was illegal.¹¹⁸ In 1940, a Leningrad military-industrial research institute fulfilled just 14 percent of its plan, and yet the director and the chief engineer, possessing scarce know-how that factories craved, managed to contract with state companies to obtain not just gramophone records and a piano but also vital engineering tools, pneumatic devices, and plastics. Criminal charges resulted, however.¹¹⁹

More than one third of all industrial workers were classified as “Stakhanovites,” but worker go-slows, also known as Italian strikes, and the constant queuing for food and basic goods continued to depress productivity. So did quitting in search of lower norms and better pay.¹²⁰ Back on June 26, 1940, Stalin had had the criminal penalties for absenteeism and unauthorized job changing augmented; additionally, lateness of just twenty minutes was now criminalized. Violations were punishable with “corrective labor,” mostly in the form of reduced pay at one’s place of employment, but sometimes with several months in a camp.¹²¹ Some 30 million people were now in the Soviet state workforce, and over the next year more than 3 million of them would be investigated for absenteeism and job changing. Of these, nearly half a million would be sentenced to prison for four months; the rest would be sentenced to “forced labor” at their regular place of employment, meaning pay reductions, for six months.¹²² And yet the number of such infractions was likely higher. Some people stole goods from work or otherwise violated discipline deliberately to get fired, so that they could leave undesirable jobs.¹²³ But managers did not investigate many instances of lateness or refrained from sending cases to the procuracy, instead imposing “fines” that were not collected.¹²⁴ Stalin’s orders to mete out punishments for even minor infractions clashed with his directives to meet production targets at all cost.¹²⁵

STUMPED, WRATHFUL, RESTLESS

Hitler stood at a new zenith of power in July 1940. And yet, despite all his conquests and Britain’s manifest inability to dislodge him from the continent, the British government vowed to keep on fighting. He had repaired to his alpine retreat, to confer with his military on the feasibility of a cross-Channel invasion. Germany would need control of the Channel by sea and air, which was not remotely in prospect.¹²⁶ Under Chamberlain, the British had built several ships and radar stations and greatly expanded production capacity for fighter airplanes without actually making many of them, thereby controlling peacetime expenses and limiting stockpiles of obsolete weapons. In 1940, when fighting broke out, Britain quickly managed to outproduce Germany in single-engine fighters, which contributed significantly to the British ability to beat back the Luftwaffe air assault. The British Home Fleet alone—only a part of the Royal Navy—possessed 5 battleships, 11 cruisers, and 30 destroyers.¹²⁷ The Norwegian campaign had weakened the German navy, which at this point was down to one heavy cruiser, two light cruisers, and four destroyers. Grand Admiral

Raeder, the German naval commander in chief, and others harbored grave doubts about landing on the British Isles without a huge prior buildup. All seemed to depend on the Luftwaffe.^{128}

Churchill, under German bombardment, dreamed of escape. “If Hitler fails to beat us here he will probably recoil eastwards,” he had written to the prime minister of the Union of South Africa (June 27, 1940). “Indeed, he may do this even without trying invasion [of the UK], to find employment for his Army, and take the edge off the winter strain upon him.”^{129}

Hitler understood the transcendent value that Britain attached to its global empire and, in his own way, was sincere in his offers to allow that empire to remain intact, certainly in the medium term, in exchange for a free hand on the continent, where raw materials and racial Lebensraum awaited him. Churchill, however, genuinely cared about the balance of power on the continent, on which the empire’s existence ultimately depended.^{130} But Hitler could not fathom Britain’s “futile” resistance to an accommodation, except by imagining some hidden encouragement—from the United States, from the USSR.^{131} On July 16, he issued Directive No. 16: “Since England, despite her hopeless military situation, still shows no sign of willingness to come to terms, I have decided to prepare, and if necessary to carry out, a landing operation against her. . . . The preparation for the entire operation must be completed by mid-August.” The lack of confidence (“if necessary”) was evident. On July 19, he gave a much-delayed address to the Reichstag, reviewing German military conquests, current strength, and future strategy, while offering vague “final” peace terms to Britain.^{132} The British press and radio were immediately dismissive. Churchill initially greeted the “offer” with cold silence.^{133}

At a “Führer conference” with only the highest military men, on July 21, 1940, Hitler stated that “even though Moscow is unenthusiastic about Germany’s great success, she will nevertheless make no effort to enter the war against Germany of her own accord.” Rumors—duly conveyed to Stalin—were rife that Germany was getting ready to attack the USSR even before France had fallen.¹³⁴ The Wehrmacht was transferring back eastern units that had been called to France and Belgium, and Soviet military intelligence was reporting German troop concentrations on the eastern frontier (railroads were under covert surveillance).¹³⁵ German officers were said to be studying Russian language at courses given in occupied Prague. Ethnic Russians and Ukrainians living in Poland had been organized. Everyone was talking, everywhere: troop exercises, planned diplomatic evacuations, imminent war. Was it real? Disinformation? German fortifications in the east were being greatly expanded; then again, the German state had expanded, so this was to be expected. Germany's military attaché in Moscow, Köstring, told his Soviet interlocutors (July 9) that German forces were being "demobilized" from the west and stationed in East Prussia and former Poland, where new garrisons were being formed, "since retaining many troops in the West is no longer necessary."¹³⁶

The "parking" of German troops in the east was accelerating, but bombing raids by the Luftwaffe over Britain continued, as Soviet intelligence also reported.¹³⁷ Could Hitler really intend to initiate a two-front war? At the secret July 21 Führer conference, Hitler called an attack on Britain "not just a river crossing, but the crossing of a sea which is dominated by the enemy."¹³⁸ Nonetheless, Raeder was given ten days to work out the parameters of a cross-Channel invasion. At the same time, the Wehrmacht was to make a preliminary study of invading the USSR that very fall of 1940.¹³⁹

Germany endeavored to goad Japan into attacking Singapore, so as to provoke Britain into war in the Far East and perhaps also drag the United States in (and away from European affairs), but Tokyo's ability to commit remained stymied by interest group infighting.¹⁴⁰ At the same time, Major General Alfred Jodl, chief of the operations staff, had raised the possibility of bringing Britain to its knees indirectly, by hitting vulnerable spots in the eastern Mediterranean and the Near East, reasoning that as the screws were tightened on Britain's global position, it would surrender, to stem its losses. The Italians, he thought, could occupy the Suez Canal. Spain or another country could grab Gibraltar. The oil terminus in Haifa could just be blown up.¹⁴¹ This had sparked the notion of a broad anti-British front of Italy, Spain, and maybe the Soviet Union, even as Hitler was contemplating smashing the latter to bits, as a way to get Britain to capitulate. "Crossing of Channel appears very hazardous to the Führer," army chief of staff Halder recorded in his diary (July 22). "Invasion is to be undertaken only if no other way is left to bring terms with England."¹⁴² That same day, Halifax broadcast a definitive British rejection of the German terms for "peace." On July 23, Hitler went on his annual pilgrimage to Bayreuth for the Wagner Festival, taking in Götterdämmerung.¹⁴³

Jodl and Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel, de facto war minister, managed to convince Hitler that a fall 1940 date for an invasion of the USSR was "hopelessly impractical" (according to a memo written by the former and signed by the latter).¹⁴⁴ On July 29, at another Führer conference at the Berghof, Hitler shifted a Soviet invasion target date out to May 1941, which was both the earliest feasible date and the latest date from the point of view of safe concentration of forces in the east.¹⁴⁵ Jodl informed only a tiny group of war planners, headed by Walter Warlimont, in the strictest secrecy, for Halder and other top Wehrmacht generals saw no basis for a war against the Soviet Union, and plenty of opportunity for rapprochement with Stalin.¹⁴⁶

On July 31, Hitler convened yet another narrow-circle Führer conference at the Berghof.¹⁴⁷ Raeder and Halder reported. Those present argued that a cross-Channel invasion of Britain could not be carried out until September 1940 (if then). Hitler signed Directive No. 17, on stepping up the air war (which would be called the Battle of Britain) "to prepare the ground for the final crushing of England.”¹⁴⁸ He rejected Raeder’s postponement of the Channel invasion, Operation Sea Lion, until spring 1941, but postponement is effectively what happened, for Hitler stated that if the results of the air attacks on Britain proved unfavorable, Sea Lion preparations would be stopped.¹⁴⁹ As for the Wehrmacht, despite a plan to reduce its size to lessen the strain on the economy, Hitler ordered a ramp-up from 120 to 180 divisions (a number that would grow) and the launching of a massive logistics program in the east.¹⁵⁰ Göring, when told, would be thrilled.¹⁵¹ This represented a policy victory for both the peripheral strategy against Britain and the full-scale invasion of the USSR. “Our action must be directed to eliminate all factors that let England hope for a change in the situation,” Hitler told the attendees. “Russia is the factor on which Britain is relying the most. . . . With Russia smashed, Britain’s last hope will be shattered.”¹⁵²

Hitler had effectively conceded that he lacked the resources to defeat the world’s leading navy and air force, but he felt he could summon the resources to defeat world’s largest land army. This was, in a way, logical, reflecting his own force structure. But several top Wehrmacht officers viewed an unprovoked invasion of the east before securing victory in the west as unsound.

It was, in any case, passing strange. For decades, the Führer had been hammering the necessity of annihilating Bolshevism and following the siren call of Lebensraum in the east, in an existential war, but now he was asserting that the way to defeat Britain was to attack the Soviets.¹⁵³ Stalin felt secure, because Britain was the one stuck doing the fighting against Nazi Germany, but the more Britain resisted Hitler, the more Hitler entertained an attack on the Soviet Union. And the more Soviet intelligence warned Stalin about Hitler’s aggressive attitudes toward the USSR, the more Stalin suspected British efforts to embroil him in war with Germany.

MISPLACED JOY

On August 10, 1940, Stalin hosted a banquet in the Grand Kremlin Palace to celebrate his newest and expanded Union republics: Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, and Moldavia (which included Bessarabia and northern Bukovina). He seated their Soviet-installed leaders at his own table, alongside marshals Timoshenko and Voroshilov.¹⁵⁴ Hitler's directives and the accompanying feasibility studies for an attack on the USSR remained supersecret. Soviet military intelligence, on the basis of agent information, reported that, at a conference in Salzburg on August 9, Hitler had proposed to Romania joint regulation of all disputed issues with Hungary and Bulgaria; stated that all territorial changes in Eastern Europe up to that point were temporary; and "declared that current actions were the first stage in preparation for a war against the USSR, which would begin immediately after the end of the war with England."¹⁵⁵ Five days later, Hitler handed out diamond-studded batons to his field marshals in the Reich Chancellery. "Russia has once shown an inclination to overstep the agreements made with us," he remarked privately. "But she remains loyal at present. But should she reveal the intention of conquering Finland or attacking Romania, we shall be forced to strike. Russia should not be allowed to be the sole master of the eastern Baltic. Furthermore, we need Romania's oil."¹⁵⁶

Mikoyan reported on August 11 that for the first six months of 1940, the Soviets had received goods worth 80 million reichsmarks, while shipping goods worth 190 million.¹⁵⁷ (In the fourth quarter of 1940, Stalin would again shut off the export valves.) Molotov, on August 15, wrote a revealing letter to his wife, Polina, who was away on holiday in Crimea. This was his second letter to her in three days, divulging, in passing, that political negotiations had been launched with Japan ("I hope something serious will result"). He also complained that, "unfortunately, I cannot stay current in economic matters, but I do try not to lose sight of the most important of them, and it seems there is a turn for the better.” He broached the idea of holidaying together the next year in Sochi. “I wait impatiently for you in order to hug you tightly-tightly and kiss you all over, my dear, sweet love.”¹⁵⁸

Stalin had not written a letter like that in a decade. He could, at least, rejoice in the fact that Beria’s agents, finally, had proved better than Yezhov’s: Ramón Mercader managed to smash an alpine pick into the head of Trotsky on August 20, 1940. The exile survived in a coma for twenty-six hours before succumbing.¹⁵⁹ He was sixty years old. “The murder of Leon Trotsky at Mexico City,” The Times of London editorialized (August 23), “will relieve the Kremlin of not a few anxieties and will draw few tears from the majority of mankind.” When the celebrity’s open casket was driven through the streets of the Mexican capital, nearly a quarter million people turned out. Stalin edited the Pravda report on the “inglorious death of Trotsky” (August 24) and, among many insertions and cross-outs, he altered the conclusion to say, “Trotsky became a victim of his own intrigues, treacheries, and treason. Thus, he ingloriously ended his life, this despicable person, entering the grave with the stamp of an international spy on his skeleton.”¹⁶⁰

The draft was dated August 16, indicating Stalin’s sense of anticipation over the operation. The omnipotent despot had maintained a collection of everything written by and about Trotsky in a special cupboard in his study at the Near Dacha: Stalin School of Falsification, An Open Letter to Members of the Bolshevik Party, The Revolution Betrayed, The Stalinist Thermidor. These texts, published in dozens of countries, helped shape Stalin’s image in world opinion.¹⁶¹ Trotsky had taken to predicting that war between Hitler and Stalin would sweep away both, in social revolution, and that he (Trotsky) and his Fourth International would replace them. “Under cover of darkness, revolutionary elements in Berlin are putting up posters in the working-class districts saying ‘Down with Hitler and Stalin!’ and ‘Long Live Trotsky!’” he imagined in 1940. “It’s lucky Stalin does not have to black out Moscow at night, otherwise the streets of the Soviet capital would also be covered with equally meaningful posters.”¹⁶² When the spectral Fourth International, its meager archive pilfered and delivered to Stalin, had finally managed its founding congress, it was attended by a mere twenty-one delegates, who had met in secrecy in a village outside Paris for just a single day, the stateless Trotsky himself had not been able to attend.¹⁶³ Hitler’s troop movements and the high tensions in Nazi-Soviet relations were playing out in Eastern Europe.¹⁶⁴ Stalin had begun inciting Hungarian irredentism over their conationals in Romanian-controlled Transylvania; Hitler unilaterally handed northern Transylvania over to Hungary in late August 1940. Stalin had a protest lodged with the German ambassador regarding what he considered to be a violation of their Pact’s clause on prior consultation.¹⁶⁵ Romania would also be forced to cede southern Dobruja to Bulgaria, losing the last of the territories it had gained as a result of the Great War and sinking the popularity of the Bucharest government and the monarch. “I was not an enemy of Your Majesty,” General Ion Antonescu (b. 1882), the former war minister and the leader of the pro-Nazi Iron Guard, wrote in protest to King Carol II. “I was a fanatic servant of this nation. I was removed through intrigue and calumny by those who have led this country to where it is now.”¹⁶⁶ Carol promptly had him arrested. Mass public demonstrations and Iron Guard shock troops known as Legionnaires got Antonescu released. In a quick coup, he would force the beleaguered king to step down in favor of his nineteen-year-old son, Mihai I (a great-great-grandson of Queen Victoria). But most of the monarchy’s dictatorial powers would be transferred on September 5 to Antonescu, newly designated as “Conducător” (Führer).¹⁶⁷ He deepened Romania’s relationship with Nazi Germany.

ENEMIES RECAST

The writer Vishnevsky had managed to take over the executed Isaac Babel's dacha in Peredelkino, then, in his diary, decried a lack of material incentives ("The stimulation by pay is lacking; we are well cared for, many of us writers fully so, for years to come").¹⁶⁸ He was right only in respect to elite writers. In 1939, when the deputy boss of Central Committee agitprop, Georgy Alexandrov, earned an enormous salary of 27,000 rubles, Nikolai Pogodin, the playwright, had taken in 732,000 in royalties and payments.¹⁶⁹ Vishnevsky went on to lament the lack of attention from Stalin and other top political figures. "After the death of A. M. Gorky we have had fewer possibilities and places where we could speak with big people on big questions of life and our work," he was recorded as stating by the writers' union duty officer in discussion with a colleague. "The last big conversation in the Central Committee was spring 1938. It gave us a lot, but already two years have passed, and writers as a collective, as an 'active,' have not spoken with the Leaders."¹⁷⁰

As it happened, on the evening of September 9, 1940, party leaders and cultural functionaries assembled to discuss a film, The Law of Life, by Alexander Stolper and Boris Ivanov, which had been released in early August. It portrayed a student Communist youth leader as corrupt, yet it had somehow managed to pass all the censorship authorities, from the studio (Mosfilm) through the state committee for cinema affairs (headed by Ivan Bolshakov) right to the Central Committee propaganda department. Pravda's unsigned review, edited by Zhdanov, condemned the film as "insincere," and after ten days, despite being the lead draw of the day, it was withdrawn.¹⁷¹ Stalin, in the course of extended remarks, reminded those present that workers were not ipso facto trustworthy; Tomsky had been a worker yet fell into conspiracy with Trotsky. Some workers were scum, he added. "It's a law of life."¹⁷²

When Fadeyev, head of the writers' union, praised the ethnic Polish writer Wanda Wasilewska as "a genuine artist," Stalin responded, "I do not know if she's a genuine artist or not, but I do know that she writes truthfully, honestly. I read three of her works: The Face of the Day, which depicts the life of a worker correctly, honestly; then Motherland, which takes up the life of a farmhand working in bondage for a landlord—wonderfully, nicely, simply conveyed; Land Under the Yoke, which depicts the life of an individual poor peasant, middle peasant, and farmhand. Wonderfully well conveyed. But about her, for some reason, there is silence."

At this point, Nikolai Aseyev, the poet and screenwriter, who was attending such a gathering for the first time, committed a remarkable act. "I will speak openly," he stated. "Comrade Stalin said that he likes the writings of Wanda Wasilewska. Very well, I should say, that you liked the works of Wanda Wasilewska. Personally, I read them and they did not touch me deeply. Why am I saying this? Because tomorrow and the day after tomorrow, Wanda Wasilewska will suddenly become the single standard of writerly achievement." Aseyev continued, "I am not afraid of anything; I believe that here everything will be properly taken into account and weighed, but sometimes it happens thusly: 'But comrade Stalin said it!' Of course we must take this into account, but if comrade Stalin likes this or that written work, this or that painting, it does not signify that such works should be repeated, three hundred thousand times repeat the same written work, the same painting." Stalin interjected: "It does not mean that."

Aseyev was dead right: Stalin's tastes were dispositive. The despot offered closing instructions. "I would prefer that we portrayed enemies not as beasts, but as people, harmful to our society, yet not devoid of some human qualities," he advised. "The worst scoundrel has human qualities; he loves someone, he respects someone, he is prepared to sacrifice himself for someone.” Then this: “Why not depict Bukharin, no matter what kind of monster he was—he had certain human qualities. Trotsky was an enemy, but he was an able person, indisputably. Portray him as an enemy with negative qualities, but also with positive qualities, because he had them, indisputably.”¹⁷³

Who in their right mind might take up Stalin’s suggestion to depict Bukharin and Trotsky as having had positive qualities?

Stalin declared that evening that he disliked The Law of Life’s depiction of those who unmasked enemies, such as the protagonist Communist Youth League student, as not properly Soviet people. “We had, for example, 25 to 30 million people who starved—there was not enough grain—but now they have started to live well,” Stalin suddenly acknowledged. “Our enemies inside the party think as follows: ‘We’ll give this piece [of land] to the Germans, that to the Japanese; we have plenty of land.’ But it has turned out the opposite: we give nothing to anyone. On the contrary, we are expanding the front of socialism. . . . This is beneficial for humanity; indeed, the Lithuanians, western Belorussians, Bessarabians, those we freed from the yoke of the landowners, capitalists, police, and every other kind of scum, consider themselves lucky. From the point of view of the world struggle of forces between socialism and capitalism, this is a big plus, for we are expanding the front of socialism and shrinking the front of capitalism.”¹⁷⁴ After midnight, he repaired to the Little Corner with Zhdanov, Molotov, and Beria.¹⁷⁵

AMBIGUITIES

Thanks to Hitler’s secret July 1940 order to expand Germany’s already sizable military, shipments to the Soviet Union fell far behind contractual obligations. Beginning in August 1940, in a show of strength, Stalin had his trade representatives convey that the Soviets would be cutting back on all deliveries, including oil.¹⁷⁶ Germany had more options than ever, following the occupation of France, the Low Countries, Denmark, and Norway, to go with strong commercial ties to neutral Sweden and its ally Romania. Continued reliance on the Soviet Union, moreover, was becoming a sore point. Even if Stalin might be ready to resume and perhaps deliver even more, it was better, in the words of the Nazi economics minister, not to be “dependent upon forces and powers over whom we have no influence.”¹⁷⁷ By September 1, German divisions in East Prussia, former Poland, Bohemia, Moravia, and Austria climbed to 94 from 27 (as of June 15), according to a report from the new head of Soviet military intelligence, Lieutenant General Filipp Golikov, to Stalin, Molotov, Beria, and the military high command.¹⁷⁸

On August 31, 1940, Molotov had received Schulenburg and complained that Germany had violated the Pact by failing to consult the USSR regarding German moves in Hungary and Romania. On September 2, the Soviet envoy in Berlin, Shkvartsev, had an audience with Ribbentrop, who stated of the Pact, “I share your satisfaction and think that the year has brought great benefits to both Germany and Russia. Germany has achieved great victories and will achieve them.” That same day, Shkvartsev requested Moscow not to send wives and children to Berlin, “in light of the almost daily systematic bombing” by Britain.¹⁷⁹ On September 3, TASS announced the signing of a clarification agreement in Berlin on regulating the Germany-USSR border, “negotiations for which had proceeded in a benevolent atmosphere.”¹⁸⁰

Ambassador Ott, in Tokyo, had been instructed to inform Germany’s ally, as Sorge reported to Moscow, “that the German troops being sent to the eastern borders have no relation whatsoever to the USSR. They were sent there because there is no longer a need for them in France and the time for their dispersal has not arrived.”¹⁸¹ On September 6, Jodl issued a secret order explaining that the concentration of forces in the east would accelerate even more over the following weeks.¹⁸² In parallel, on September

6 and 18, Admiral Raeder submitted detailed plans on the peripheral strategy against Britain.¹⁸³ Hitler's Directive No. 18, concerning war in the eastern Mediterranean and the Near East, was drafted that month. Perhaps that was the reason for the massive troop concentrations not only in Nazi-occupied Poland but also in southeastern Europe?

Stalin was sitting on an analysis written in the aftermath of France's fall by Jenő Varga, the director of the Institute of World Economy and International Relations, in Moscow, and a long-standing foreign policy adviser, who argued that the "contradictions" had disappeared between Britain and the United States, such that the latter would enter the war against the Axis. "Comrade Varga!" Stalin answered on September 12. "Your interpretation is completely correct. . . . Matters changed radically after Germany destroyed France and got its hands on all the resources of the European continent, and England lost France. Now the bloc of Germany, Italy, and Japan threatens not only England but also the U.S. In that light, a bloc between England and the U.S. is a natural result of such a turnabout in international affairs. With Communist greetings."¹⁸⁴

On September 23, 1940, Stalin held a meeting in the Little Corner, summoning, among others, the historian Arkady Yeruslimsky, who had been tasked by the foreign affairs commissariat with preparing the Russian-language reissue, in three volumes, of Otto von Bismarck's Thoughts and Recollections (Moscow, 1940–41). Stalin hand-corrected Yeruslimsky's introductory essay, softening its tone where it pointed out the potential consequences of Germany ignoring Bismarck's solicitousness toward Russia.¹⁸⁵ Bismarck had been the lodestar of Stalin's conservative imperial Russian predecessors, Sergei Witte and Pyotr Stolypin. What, if anything, the Soviet despot absorbed from the German's thinking remains unknown. But he seems to have presumed, based on the way things worked inside the Soviet Union, that the Germans would read the introduction to a history book as a statement or signal of Soviet policy.

Stalin gave indications of the economic strain. After the thirty minutes devoted to Bismarck, he received Mikoyan and Khrushchev, followed by the aviation industry commissar (Shakhurin) and a deputy commissar (Vasily Balandin); the heavy machine building commissar (Vyacheslav Malyshev); and the first deputy chairman of the Council of People's Commissars (Nikolai Voznesensky). "When one gives a new task to our people's commissars, they make obligatory the construction of new factories to fulfill it," Stalin complained to them. "But the main thing is that one needs to look at what can be done at the old factories. This is the most reliable and shortest way. One can expand production at old factories more quickly than build new factories."¹⁸⁶

The tension in the Little Corner was heightened by the arrival at this time of Wehrmacht troops in Finland. Germany had provided no advance warning, in contravention of the consultation clause of the Pact, which, of course, had put Finland in the Soviet sphere.¹⁸⁷ Stalin's war there had brought about the very eventuality it had sought to forestall. His spies passed on details about 1.5 billion reichsmarks in secret military aid from Germany to Finland, deliveries that were supposed to go to the Soviet Union. Stalin suspended all long-term projects for export to Germany, diminishing further any German economic dependency on him.¹⁸⁸ Nothing more starkly demonstrated the deterioration of the Soviet position than Finland, where the Soviet Union had expended so much blood, treasure, and reputation.

TRIPARTITE RELIEF

Japan, Germany, and Italy, on September 27, 1940, signed a Tripartite Pact in the Reich Chancellery. The three Axis signatories delineated spheres of influence and pledged for the next ten years "to assist one another with all political, economic and military means when one of the three contracting powers is attacked." This represented a turnabout for Japan.

Pro-German circles in Tokyo had been systematically removed from influential posts, thanks to Hitler's Pact with Stalin, but with the defeat of France, the Japanese hoped to use German victories in the west to expand southward in French Indochina, which would require deterrence of the United States.¹⁸⁹ "The basic aim of the pact is to avoid war with the United States," Prime Minister Konoe told the cabinet. "However, I think it is necessary for us to display firmness, because if we act humbly, it will only make the United States presumptuous."¹⁹⁰ Perhaps there was also anticipation of some spoils from a British surrender to Germany. Hitler saw Japan's enthusiasm as an attempt "to cash in" on Germany's victories by offering to serve as "harvest helpers."¹⁹¹ But following the debacle of the air campaign against Britain, the Führer had come around to seeking to deter U.S. support for Britain by wielding the Japanese cudgel.¹⁹²

The agreement still fell short of a binding military alliance. It also specifically excluded the Soviet Union as a target. "Its exclusive purpose," Ribbentrop informed Molotov, two days before the scheduled signing, "is to bring the elements pressing for America's entry into the war to their senses."¹⁹³ When Weizsäcker briefed the Soviet ambassador in Berlin on September 28, he underlined the desire on the part of the three signatories for better relations with the USSR.¹⁹⁴ "Exceptional significance," noted Comintern chief Dimitrov in his diary for September 28. "Further expansion of the war to world-war dimensions."¹⁹⁵ An unsigned front-page analysis in Pravda (September 30)—written by Molotov—maintained that the new three-country pact signed in Berlin signified formation of two blocs: Germany, Italy, and Japan versus Britain and the United States, the fantasy Stalin had divulged to Varga, with the Soviet Union as happy bystander. Molotov, anonymously, further reassured readers that the Tripartite Pact had been "no surprise" and reemphasized Soviet neutrality and the continuing validity of the bilateral nonaggression pacts with Germany and Italy.^{196}

Japanese ruling circles now hoped for improved relations with the USSR, to secure the country's northern flank and increase the pressure on Chiang Kai-shek to capitulate. Secretly, on October 3, 1940, Japanese and Soviet negotiators were working on a draft nonaggression pact and preliminarily agreed that "the USSR will abandon its support for Chiang and will repress the Chinese Communist party's anti-Japanese activities; in exchange, Japan recognizes and accepts that the Chinese Communist party will retain as a base the three northwest provinces (Shaanxi, Gansu, Ningxia)." Negotiators further agreed that the Soviets would acquiesce in any Japanese moves in Indochina, and Japan would not oppose any future Soviet moves in Afghanistan.^{197}

The fly in the ointment remained German troops in the east. Golikov had reported (October 2) that the Germans were moving many of the troops from within East Prussia and the General Gouvernement closer to the Soviet border. Stalin's NKVD station chief in Bulgaria secretly reported the shipment of German heavy armaments on barges along the Danube to the Black Sea, right on the Soviet doorstep. But Soviet intelligence adhered to the line that the sharp troop buildup reflected only the unavoidable necessity of moving troops out of France, given the anti-German attitudes prevalent in conquered France. Still, analysts also mentioned Germany's desire to strengthen its influence in Eastern Europe, especially the Balkans.^{198}

HITLER'S LATIN FRUSTRATIONS AND BALKAN AMBITIONS

Schulenburg was in Berlin in late September, trying to put relations with Moscow back on track by encouraging a German invitation for a state visit.^{199} Ribbentrop had never abandoned his efforts to restore friendly bilateral relations by inviting Molotov, or even Stalin, to Berlin. The Germans, like the British, mistakenly believed that Molotov had never been out of the country (he had visited fascist Italy in 1922), but they nonetheless believed he would reciprocate the German foreign minister's two visits to Moscow.²⁰⁰ Ribbentrop let the count know that a new invitation to Molotov was in the works. This hoped-for meeting was predicated on a vast European-Asian bloc directed against the British, Ribbentrop's dream castle.²⁰¹

Hitler's failure to subdue Britain was eating at him. Britain's Royal Air Force not only had prevented the Luftwaffe from attaining the air superiority required for a cross-Channel invasion, but was bombing Berlin and other German cities.²⁰² Between July 10 and October 31, 1940, in the so-called Battle of Britain, Hurricanes and Spitfires shot down 1,733 Luftwaffe aircraft. The British lost 915 planes. ("Never had so many owed so much to so few," Churchill would remark of the air war.) Both Sea Lion and the vague preliminary plans for an invasion of the Soviet Union had been postponed, from fall 1940 to spring 1941. The Wehrmacht was the largest unemployed land army in the world. The Führer, losing the initiative, went into seclusion at the Berghof from October 5 to 8 to contemplate his options.

NKVD intelligence under Beria was reporting that at least 85 infantry divisions—two thirds of the German land army—were deployed in the east, and airfields and other military installations were going up one after another.²⁰³ In October 1940, Beria suddenly became solicitous toward the few hundred Polish officers whom he had not murdered at Katyn and other sites back in spring 1940. He even had the interned Polish lieutenant colonel Zygmunt Berling retrieved from a Soviet labor camp to Moscow in first class. When Merkulov told Berling that there were plans to form a Polish army on Soviet territory, the latter assumed that the more than 20,000 captured Polish officers were in the Soviet Gulag somewhere. "We have no such people now in the Soviet Union,” Beria responded, laconically. Merkulov added: “We committed a big mistake with them.”²⁰⁴

Soon Beria informed Stalin that the NKVD had assembled some two dozen Polish officers as the basis for an anti-German army, just in case. It was a new era. Not a single one of the thirty-five Soviet films produced in 1940 would feature a principal “enemy” of domestic origin.²⁰⁵ No foreign films would be allowed onto the Soviet screen the entire year. Still, a new breakthrough musical comedy emerged: on October 8, 1940, The Radiant Path premiered in Moscow, another smash hit by Grigory Alexandrov, with music by Isaac Dunayevsky, including his “March of the Enthusiasts.” The Radiant Path would seize honors as the year’s top film. It depicted a Cinderella-like illiterate rural housemaid named Tanya (played by the blond-braided, ever radiant Lyubov Orlova), who, thanks to a party organizer, attends literacy classes, becomes a textile factory Stakhanovite weaver, earns the Order of Lenin, flies through the air in an open-top car alongside the Grand Kremlin Palace, and wins love. Tanya easily unmasks the villain, a kulak arsonist, early in the action. “A good film and . . . without a portrait of Comrade Stalin,” the despot told Alexandrov, while smiling with his eyes.²⁰⁶

Also in October, Marshal Kulik married his third wife (Olga Mikhailovskaya), a friend of his daughter’s who was in her final year of high school—he was thirty-two years her senior. Stalin, now in the eighth year of his (second) widowhood, took no such indulgences. He was adjudicating between rival screenplays for a film about a seventeenth-century Georgian military figure, Giorgi Saakadze, who had led an uprising against the Persian shah to liberate and unify Georgia. “The princes and feudalism proved stronger than the [Georgian] tsar and nobles,” Stalin explained to film boss Bolshakov in a letter on October 11, 1940, adding that Saakadze’s efforts to compensate for domestic weakness with foreign alliances had failed, for objective reasons.²⁰⁷

Hitler emerged from his alpine hideaway with a renewed push to subdue Britain, indirectly. But first, on October 12, Wehrmacht troops occupied Romania to secure the Ploiești oil fields. “The Germans have raised a barrier,” remarked the Italian ambassador to Moscow to his confidant, Schulenburg. “The [Russian] march to the south has been stopped, the oil is at the disposal of the Germans, through Constanza the Germans have reached the Black Sea, the Danube is a German river. This is the first diplomatic defeat of comrade Stalin.”²⁰⁸ In fact, even though TASS issued a denial, Berlin had afforded Moscow forty-eight hours’ advance notice of “training troops” to be stationed on the Danube to “instruct” the Romanian army.²⁰⁹

Charlie Chaplin’s The Great Dictator premiered in the United States on October 15, 1940, parodying Hitler (called Adenoid Hynkel) as a megalomaniacal buffoon whose dictatorship threatens a Jewish barber; Chaplin, who was neither German nor Jewish, played both roles. The reviewer in the New York Times enthused about “the feeble, affected hand salute, the inclination for striking ludicrous attitudes, the fabulous fits of rage and violent facial contortions,” adding of Chaplin’s pantomime: “He is at his best in a wild senseless burst of guttural oratory—a compound of German, Yiddish, and Katzenjammer double-talk, and he reaches positively exalted heights in a plaintive dance which he does with a large balloon representing the globe, bouncing it into the air, pirouetting beneath it—and then bursting into tears when the balloon finally pops.”²¹⁰ In one scene, Hynkel, the dictator of Tomania, meets and bargains with Benzino Napaloni, dictator of Bacteria.²¹¹

On October 17, Molotov’s deputy Vyshinsky received Cripps, who hinted at British movement in its position opposing Soviet incorporation of the Baltic states and claimed to have confidential government information for Molotov personally; when Vyshinsky insisted on a foretaste, according to the Soviet account, Cripps stated, “in connection with events over recent weeks in the Balkans, Near East, and Far East, that British relations with these parts of the world had changed, and accordingly, the relations between Britain and the Soviet Union should also change.” Cripps had convinced himself somehow that the USSR did not want Germany to win the war, and he urged de facto British recognition, until the end of the war, of the territories that the USSR had received to entice it to treat Britain and Germany with equal favor.²¹² That same day, Molotov bade farewell to the Japanese ambassador, who was returning home after two years in Moscow. Each expressed a desire for continued improved bilateral relations, although they had failed to agree to a neutrality pact. When the Japanese envoy inquired of German-Soviet relations, Molotov called them “solid” and predicted that “they would develop further.”²¹³

Ribbentrop had dispatched a nineteen-page letter to Stalin inviting Molotov to Berlin, and, also on October 17, Schulenburg managed to hand it to Molotov.²¹⁴ The text reviewed German-Soviet bilateral relations, justified German military moves in Eastern Europe, and proposed that four powers—Germany, Italy, and Japan, plus the Soviet Union—divide up the world, at British expense. Ribbentrop ingratiatingly pointed out that both the Soviet Union and Germany “were animated in the same degree by the same desire for a New Order in the world against the congealed plutocratic democracies.” What the Nazi foreign minister omitted to mention was that each power had its own “new order,” which clashed not just ideologically but physically over the same Eastern European territories. Stalin, angered over the unilateral German move into Romania, nonetheless agreed to send his top deputy to Berlin in the near future and to thank Ribbentrop for “the instructive analysis.”²¹⁵

Ribbentrop now felt confident enough to draft a German-Italian-Japanese-Soviet pact, and he mused with Hitler about confronting Britain with the most geographically expansive military coalition in history.²¹⁶ At the same time, Hitler was exploring other anti-British chess moves. Heinrich Himmler, the SS chief, was sent on a three-day visit to Spain, beginning on October 20, 1940. He was paraded through Madrid streets bedecked in Nazi swastikas, received by Franco at the Pardo Palace, and shown a special bullfight. Julio Martínez Santa-Olalla, a Spanish ethnoarchaeologist who had studied in Germany, regaled Himmler with tales of Spanish-German racial connections through the Visigoths.²¹⁷ But Himmler frowned upon Franco's gratuitous post-civil-war massacres. To the SS chief, it made more sense to incorporate the workers into the new order, not annihilate them. (The German occupation of France had led to many Spanish political refugees being turned over to Franco.) Be that as it may, Himmler's visit was mere preparation. Hitler himself, also on October 20, set out on what would be a journey of nearly 4,000 miles on his special train, Amerika, to persuade the French, Spaniards, and Italians to put aside their squabbles in the establishment of a continental bloc against Britain.²¹⁸

On October 23, Hitler met Franco for a one-day summit in France, at Hendaye, a railway station near the Spanish border. The caudillo arrived late, in an aged train once used by King Alfonso XIII, with his foreign minister and brother-in-law Ramón Serrano Súñer in tow. Franco and Hitler went into the parlor coach of the Führer's train. Admiral Canaris, head of the Abwehr (military intelligence), had warned Hitler that Franco would resemble "not a hero but a little sausage." During the talks and dinner, which lasted some nine hours, Franco made breathtaking territorial claims, mostly at French expense, as his price for entering the war on the Nazis' side. In Hitler's mind, Franco's regime would never have survived had it not been for German military aid back in 1936—and yet the caudillo now saw fit to point out that even if Germany were to defeat Britain on the home isles, the British government would sail with its navy to Canada or the United States and continue the war from there. This cheek provoked a riled Hitler to his feet. “Rather than go through that again,” Hitler would tell Mussolini of the meeting, “I would prefer to have three or four teeth taken out.”^{219}

The next day, Hitler held a one-day summit with Marshal Pétain of Vichy France, also to explore a potential new ally for the anti-British fight. The French leader put forth a relatively more modest territorial wish list as his price to turn against France’s erstwhile ally Britain, but Pétain did not appear overly enthusiastic. The elderly marshal kept pretending not to hear Hitler very well. The conversation was vague enough that Hitler could imagine France was going to support his proposal, but nothing concrete was achieved. Only in Romania did the Führer come upon a kindred spirit: General Ion Antonescu. At the general’s insistent requests, Hitler had moved German troops into Romania, nominally to help “reorganize” its army.^{220} But Mussolini, Hitler’s formal ally, bristled at Germany’s “fait accompli” in Romania, and viewed inclusion of the Spanish or the French in a bloc as a threat to his own fantastic wish list of spoils. Hitler felt constrained to try to mollify the duce, redirecting his train to Florence for a summit meeting on October 28.^{221} That very morning, Mussolini launched an invasion of Greece. “He will learn from the newspapers that I have occupied Greece,” the duce privately boasted. “This way, things will be even once again.”^{222}

Franco, Pétain, and now Mussolini. Greece was already ruled by a pro-Nazi dictator who had studied in Germany, and the gratuitous Italian invasion was launched in the fall rains, on the eve of the winter snows in the Balkan uplands.^{223} Moreover, the Balkans were Germany’s jumping-off point for attacking British positions in the Near East, in the so-called peripheral strategy. Already on November 4, 1940, the Wehrmacht had been directed to plan its own invasion of Greece, via either Hungary and Romania or Yugoslavia and then Bulgaria.^{224} Hitler did not abandon some sort of cooperation with France and Spain against Britain.^{225} But Molotov committed to visiting Berlin after the USSR's November 7 holiday.^{226} Ribbentrop reminded Molotov of his promise to bring along a portrait of Stalin, and Molotov eagerly agreed to do so.^{227} Perhaps the lunatic scheme pushed by the Nazi foreign minister of adding Stalin to the Axis, in a four-power pact, to force Britain into submission, seemed no worse than any of the other (non) options on Hitler's table? If so, it was clear that Hitler would require German dominance of the entire Balkans.^{228}

MESSAGE FROM BERLIN

The mass of Soviet inhabitants remained very distant from these machinations, but that was also true of almost all party and state functionaries. They, too, knew little to nothing. Valentin Berezhkov, who was working at the Soviet embassy in Germany, helping to oversee procurement related to the Nazi-Soviet trade agreement, was summoned to Moscow. Previously, he had worked in the tourist bureau in Kiev, where he held the belief that all the foreigners whom he hosted were rich, while “in the Soviet Union we were building a system that would be fair for all.” But upon arriving in capitalist Riga in 1940, on his way to Berlin, he had been shocked at the abundance and affordability of food. Berezhkov's father had been arrested in the terror but released, so Berezhkov “came to believe that if a person was truly innocent, no one was going to harm him.” Still, having now been recalled to Moscow, he fretted about his own possible arrest. Upon reaching the Soviet Union's side of the border, he experienced a rush of patriotic feeling, but he was subjected to a humiliating search, as if he were a foreign agent. Berezhkov was promoted, becoming one of Molotov's two German interpreters, and instructed to prepare for a state visit to Berlin. Thus, a mere two years after having graduated with a degree in engineering, Berezhkov was set to meet Hitler. “The young people of my generation did not know about Stalin's atrocities,” Berezhkov would recall.

“We thought he was like a wise, just, and caring, if strict father of the peoples of our country.”²²⁹

Molotov, in response to Ribbentrop’s long written tutorial and invitation, had bombarded Schulenburg with accusations that Germany had violated the terms of the 1939 Pact, and with Soviet demands: immediate withdrawal of German forces from Finland; long-term Soviet military bases on the Turkish Straits (the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles, promised to tsarist Russia in the Great War by Britain and France); a Soviet security treaty with Bulgaria, another key to controlling the Straits; Japan’s revocation of concession rights on Sakhalin; and recognition of a Soviet sphere south of Batum and Baku, in the direction of the Persian Gulf.²³⁰ In other words, relations with Hitler had gravely deteriorated, and Stalin’s ambitions from the relationship had soared.

The Soviet despot was following the same script as he had in August 1939: seeking an advantageous deal. But before Molotov’s arrival in Berlin, Hitler did not bother to respond to the soaring demands. NKVD intelligence reported that “in Germany preparations for improved relations with Russia were proceeding apace” and were aimed at showing the whole world, especially Britain, that nothing could come between Berlin and Moscow. The Germans were saying that Britain stood on the verge of total defeat. NKVD intelligence further reported that Germany was ready to propose a Polish-style partition of Turkey with the Soviets, awarding Stalin the Straits, and possibly a partition of the entire Near East, Britain’s colonial realm. At the same time, there were warnings of consequences if the Soviets failed to support the “Nazi New Order in Europe.” The chatter from the Germans seemed to be directed at feeding the Soviets information to the effect that Berlin was going to rewrite the rules, and from a position of strength.²³¹ Whether Stalin caught this deflating message is unclear.²³²

There were many signals of trouble: Stalin learned from NKVD counterintelligence that Germany was trying to stop Denmark and Sweden from selling machines and equipment to the USSR.²³³ Stalin even sent Gorsky back to London, with a handful of young, inexperienced operatives, to restore the USSR's intelligence station. Gorsky arrived in November 1940, and his team set about reestablishing contact with the expansive network of agents who had been abandoned, such as Kim Philby in MI6, Anthony Blunt, nominally an officer of the British general staff but actually in British counterintelligence, and others in the foreign office. They were tasked with digging into British efforts to cut a deal with Germany.

The strain on the despot was hard to miss for the inner circle. In impromptu remarks at the end of the annual intimate banquet for the November 7 holiday, in Voroshilov's Grand Kremlin Palace apartment, Stalin complained that during the major border war with Japan in 1939, he had discovered that "our aircraft can stay aloft for only thirty-five minutes, while German and English aircraft can stay up for several hours!" But when he summoned the aviation specialists for an account, they told him that no one had specifically tasked them with designing Soviet planes that would stay aloft longer. "I am busy at this every day now, meeting with designers and other specialists," Stalin lashed out. "But I am the only one dealing with all these problems. None of you could be bothered with them. I am out there by myself. . . ."

On what was normally a festive occasion, the despot delivered an aggravated-assault speech. Against the background of recent publications reprising the mythology of his defense of Tsaritsyn (Stalingrad) back in 1918, he saw fit to bring up the civil-war-era conflict with Trotsky over tsarist military officers, whom he contrasted with the "people loyal to the revolution, people connected to the masses, by and large noncommissioned officers from the lower ranks." He also asserted that Lenin had supported him in those clashes with the now assassinated Trotsky. It went far beyond defensiveness, however. "You do not like to learn; you are happy just going along the way you are, complacent,” Stalin berated the men of his regime. “You are squandering Lenin’s legacy.” When Kalinin dared interject something, Stalin became especially menacing: “People are thoughtless, do not want to learn and relearn. They will hear me out and then go on just as before. But I will show you, if I ever lose my patience. You know very well how I can do that.” The group stood silently. Voroshilov’s eyes welled with tears, according to Dimitrov, who observed, “Have never seen and never heard J. V. [Stalin] the way he was that night—a memorable one.”²³⁴

The next night, at the grand banquet in the St. George’s Hall of the Grand Kremlin Palace, Stalin—unusually—was absent, provoking rumors among Western diplomats that a struggle for power might be under way.²³⁵ It was nothing of the sort, of course: he was working, likely at the Near Dacha, on his detailed instructions for Molotov’s meeting with Hitler. Point 1 would begin as follows: “To find out the true intentions of Germany and all the participants of the pact of three (Germany, Italy, and Japan) in the execution of the plan to form the ‘New Europe’ and similarly the ‘Great East-Asian Sphere.’”²³⁶

SOVIET-BRITISH FEELERS

Litvinov was living under a form of house arrest at a state dacha in the suburbs, making occasional trips to the Lenin Library, in the city center, to research a dictionary of Russian synonyms.²³⁷ Those in the know speculated that Stalin was keeping him as “insurance” against Hitler, for a possible reorientation to the West.²³⁸ But the intuitive, always prepared Beria had his most trusted minions, including the assassin Sudoplatov, prepare scenarios to make Litvinov disappear, in the event of an order to do so.²³⁹ When it came to the West, Stalin seemed unable to forgive and forget. He had observed (back in November 1939) that “in Germany, the petit-bourgeois nationalists are capable of a sharp turn—they are flexible—not tied to capitalist traditions, unlike bourgeois leaders like Chamberlain and his ilk.”²⁴⁰ By 1940 Hitler was at the height of his power, and Chamberlain and his ilk had been sacked. (On the eve of Molotov’s Berlin visit, Chamberlain died of bowel cancer.) A new, nontrivial gesture had come from Churchill that seemed to play into Stalin’s wheelhouse, but the despot had used an audience with Stafford Cripps to kowtow to Hitler. Not long after Hitler began stationing troops in Romania and making moves to station troops in Turkey, further threatening the British position in the Near East, the foreign office permitted Cripps to submit more formal proposals to Moscow for a British-Soviet pact.²⁴¹

Churchill was not a blind anti-Communist. “I cannot forecast to you the action of Russia,” he had remarked in a radio broadcast not long after the Hitler-Stalin Pact and the Treaty of Friendship and the Border. “It is a riddle wrapped in a mystery inside an enigma. But perhaps there is a key. That key is Russian national interest.”²⁴² He did not spell out how Britain, rather than just Germany, could appeal to those interests. Cripps remained deeply convinced that Nazi and Soviet interests were fundamentally inimical, in a way that British and Soviet interests were not. On October 22, 1940, after having been denied a meeting with Molotov, Cripps had handed the latter’s deputy Vyshinsky a revised offer from the British government. It vowed to treat the USSR on a par with the United States by consulting with Moscow about a postwar order, and in the meantime not to enter into an alliance against the Soviet Union, provided Moscow also refrained from hostile action (even indirectly through agitation). Cripps further communicated—exceeding his authority—that, pending a final postwar settlement, the British government could recognize de facto Soviet sovereignty in the Baltic states, Bessarabia, northern Bukovina, and “those parts of the former Polish State now under Soviet control.”²⁴³

Cripps relayed that Britain would sign a trade agreement as well, supplying the USSR with goods necessary for its defense. In return, Moscow had to promise to observe the same benevolent neutrality vis-à-vis

Britain as the Soviets had adopted toward Germany. Britain was further prepared, if no complications arose with the Axis powers, to proceed to a pact of nonaggression, while asking that if Iran and Turkey became embroiled in war with Germany or its allies, the USSR would assist them in such defense measures as it had adopted toward China (against Japanese aggression) in the past.²⁴⁴ A few days later, on October 26, Cripps again saw Vyshinsky, who indicated that the Soviet government regarded the proposals as being of the greatest importance.²⁴⁵

Then, silence.

Stalin would appear at a reception on October 30, 1940, to culminate the Ten-Day cultural festival of the Buryat-Mongol autonomous republic, the ninth in the kitschy extravaganzas. “The Ten-Days cemented the friendship of peoples and gave it a deep and concrete concept,” enthused Alexander Solodovnikov (b. 1904), a former leather factory worker who had risen to overseeing all theaters for the USSR committee on artistic affairs. “The preparation for the Ten-Days facilitated the development of countless talents, hitherto hidden among the people. Members of Russian theaters actively assisted the establishment of the theaters of brotherly republics. . . . At the same time, they received the richest palette of colors and variety in artistic forms, devices, examples, and cultural traditions lavishly revealed by the peoples of Central Asia, the Caucasus, Ukraine, Belorussia.” Solodovnikov had led brigades to Minsk and to Ulan Ude, where he discovered that the local wooden theater had no heat, and that the Ukrainian-born party boss of the Buryat-Mongol republic, Semyon Ignatyev, who had survived the terror, kept a collection of bronze Buddha statues in his office cabinet.²⁴⁶

The reason for Soviet silence vis-à-vis Cripps had taken time to emerge: on November 10, Soviet newspapers suddenly announced that Molotov had accepted an invitation from Ribbentrop to visit Berlin. Cripps demanded to see the Soviet foreign affairs commissar but was again fobbed off onto Vyshinsky, with whom he exchanged heated words. When Cripps insisted that Britain's offer could not wait indefinitely and asked whether the Soviet government had a decision to communicate, Vyshinsky told him the answer was still forthcoming.²⁴⁷

SPIES AND FOOLS

Because of Stalin's terror rampages and Beria's ascent, the Germans acquired a double agent with ready access to the Soviet embassy in Berlin. Whereas in 1935 the NKVD intelligence station in Berlin had sixteen operatives besides the station chief, by 1939 that number had dropped to two. For nine months after the station chief had died on the operating table with an ulcer in December 1938, he had no replacement, until finally the Beria minion Amayak Kobulov ("Zakhar") arrived, posing as an embassy counselor. Kobulov (b. 1906) was a Tbilisi-born Armenian like his older brother, Bogdan. He had completed five years at the Tiflis Trading School, spoke no German, had no intelligence experience, and had never even been abroad. During the terror, in Gagra, he beat those he arrested himself with a pole, after having them placed on the floor. Most recently he had served as NKVD regional boss for Abkhazia (1938) and then Ukraine (1938–39).²⁴⁸ In Berlin, Kobulov fooled no one, as confirmed by the Soviet agent in Gestapo counterintelligence, Willy Lehmann ("Breitenbach"), who had fallen completely out of contact but in late June 1940 had taken the risk of throwing a letter into the Soviet embassy mailbox with rendezvous coordinates and password, thereby reestablishing contact.²⁴⁹ Kobulov was forbidden by Moscow Center to have any contact with the Soviet civilian intelligence spy networks in Germany, which were being reconstituted (see chapter 14). He needed his own.

Kobulov violated basic spycraft, visiting agents at their apartments and bringing them together in a single place. He had been recalled to Moscow HQ to defend his work; Beria complained in writing to Fitin, his underling for foreign intelligence, about the corridor whispers concerning Kobulov's dangerous amateurism.²⁵⁰ Beria ordered Kobulov to step up the agent recruitment and, in traceable ways, the minion sought spies among the Berlin population who had past Soviet connections. He met Orests Berlings, a twenty-seven-year-old Latvian, the former Berlin correspondent for the Latvian newspaper Brīvā Zeme, who claimed to be well disposed to the USSR, well connected to the German foreign ministry press department, and penniless. By August 15, ten days after their initial acquaintance, Kobulov was already reporting directly to Stalin and Beria that Berlings had been "recruited" and put on retainer, calling him "most reliable." Berlings told the Germans, who promptly enrolled him as their agent (code-named "Peter").²⁵¹ Kobulov's superiors at the NKVD, belatedly alerted, quickly established that Berlings had opposed the Soviet annexation of Latvia and disseminated pro-Nazi propaganda. But Kobulov bragged in Berlings's presence that his information, bypassing channels, went straight to Stalin.²⁵²

MOLOTOV-HITLER

While Stalin fantasized about a new pact with Hitler, events on the far eastern flank of the USSR continued to be alarming.²⁵³ In the third Five-Year Plan's investment allocation, the Soviet Far East received fully 10 percent, allowing for construction of strategic railroads to buttress frontiers, a secret tunnel under the Amur River at Khabarovsk, a pipeline under the sea to transport Sakhalin oil to refineries at Komsomolsk, a second port (in addition to Vladivostok) on the Tatar Strait, and roads. Despite mass deportations from the region, a combination of incentives and coercion had boosted the local population to 3.15 million by 1940, up from 2.27 million in 1937.²⁵⁴ Japan, in a dream come true for Stalin, had become stalemated in its war to conquer all of China. But, contrary to his further wishes, a domestic showdown loomed there, desired by both the Nationalists and the Chinese Communists. Mao had dispatched a coded telegram (November 7, 1940) warning of an imminent Chinese Nationalist attack on the Chinese Communists and seeking Stalin's permission for "a preventive counteroffensive." Mao's telegram was received in Moscow on November 12. Dimitrov convened the Comintern executive committee, then tried to stall, instructing Mao to prepare his forces but not to act. That same day, at around 11:00 a.m., Molotov arrived at Berlin's Anhalter train station, near Potsdamer Platz.²⁵⁵

As Molotov stepped off the train in Berlin, there were puddles everywhere. The greeting party included Ribbentrop, Keitel, Robert Ley (German Labor Front), and Himmler, but not the staunch ideologues Goebbels and Rosenberg. Molotov would be in the Nazi capital for forty-eight hours, accompanied by a sixty-five-person entourage, including Dekanozov (foreign affairs), Tevosyan (ferrous metallurgy), Yakovlev (aviation), and Alexei Krutikov (foreign trade), who would remain in-country for industrial and trade matters. Merkulov (NKVD) supervised sixteen "security" guards tasked with maintaining surveillance of the Soviet delegation (and, the Gestapo suspected, leaving agents behind).²⁵⁶ After an inspection of the honor guard, the Soviets departed the station in a sixty-vehicle convoy. "There was almost no one . . . along the streets," according to an American correspondent.²⁵⁷ They arrived at the refurbished Schloss Bellevue, a former neoclassical Hohenzollern palace of more than 130 rooms set amid the exotic plants of the Tiergarten. Scented roses filled the opulent rooms and, as at the train station, the hammer-and-sickle flag flew alongside the swastika banner.²⁵⁸ After breakfast, cigars, and cognac, the Soviets were taken to the foreign ministry. Only Molotov and Dekanozov, with interpreters and notetakers, were received. "A luxurious study, perhaps somewhat smaller than Hitler's own," the Soviet interpreter Berezhkov recalled of Ribbentrop's office, some of whose furnishings might have been trophies looted from the Low Countries and France. "Antique gilded furniture. Tapestry covers the walls from floor to ceiling, pictures hanging in heavy frames, porcelain and bronze statues on high stands placed in the corners.”²⁵⁹

A genial Ribbentrop pontificated at length about a division of the world, but he refrained from making concrete proposals. “Germany has already won the war,” he crowed. “No state in the world could alter the situation created as a result of Germany’s victories.”²⁶⁰ Molotov, demanding specifics, managed to get a few words in. Following a white-gloved lunch back at the Bellevue, the foreign affairs commissar was brought to Hitler’s grandiose new Chancellery, in an elaborately choreographed entrance designed to awe. The Führer, in a “study” the size of a congress hall, greeted the Soviet representative with the Nazi upturned palm. Invited to sit on a sofa, Molotov, who wore a rimless pince-nez and generally favored gray suits and stiff-necked white collars, was deemed by the Germans to resemble a mathematics professor. Hitler, described by an aide as “surprisingly gracious and friendly,” delivered a long monologue from his armchair. He expounded on how Germany had been compelled to “penetrate into territories remote from her,” to secure vital raw materials or prevent Britain from establishing a toehold, and acknowledged that “possibly M. Molotov was of the opinion that in one case or another there had been a departure from the conception of spheres of influence which had been agreed.” He also asserted that “as soon as atmospheric conditions improved, Germany would be poised for a great and final blow against England.” Molotov was not awed. No sooner had the monologue finished, recalled the German interpreter, than “the questions hailed down upon Hitler.”²⁶¹

The Hammer made no effort to be ingratiating (not part of his skill set anyway). His top aide had told another member of the delegation, General Alexander Vasilevsky, first deputy chief of the general staff operations directorate (responsible for battle plans), that the aims of the Berlin visit were “to determine the further intentions of Hitler, and as much as possible to delay a German aggression.”²⁶² Whereas Hitler spoke of Soviet interests in British imperial lands (which Britain still controlled), Molotov spoke of Soviet security interests up and down Eastern Europe (which Hitler eyed). Molotov stated that Stalin had given him exact instructions, enumerated the mutual benefits of the Pact, and demanded to know “What was the meaning of the New Order in Europe and in Asia, and what role would the USSR be given in it?”²⁶³ He insisted that “precision is necessary in a delimitation of spheres of influence,” and “particular vigilance is needed in the delimitation of spheres of influence between Germany and Russia.”²⁶⁴

The session lasted two and a half hours before Hitler broke it off. Ribbentrop hosted a lobster dinner, sans Führer, at the Kaiserhof Hotel, near the foreign ministry. The German state secretary, Weizsäcker, thought the Soviets, in their standard-issue dark suits and felt fedoras, resembled extras in a gangster movie. But then again, Göring sported medals across his corpulent frame, from shoulder to waist, and multiple rings of precious stones on his fat fingers. Based on a report by Berlings, the Gestapo conveyed to Hitler and Ribbentrop that “last night, after the reception in the Kaiserhof, Molotov returned to the Bellevue and gathered a narrow circle of his entourage and embassy personnel. According to our agent, he was in a brilliant mood. The length of the talks he had with the Führer and the Reich foreign minister made a major impression on him. Then he said that he had a wonderful personal impression and that everything was going as he had envisioned and hoped.”²⁶⁵

Molotov (perhaps suspecting listening devices) understood that his ingratiating words would reach his Nazi hosts.²⁶⁶ Around midnight at the Bellevue, he wrote a coded telegram for Stalin, his second such cable of the day. “Their answers in conversation are not always clear and require further clarification,” he observed of the meetings. “Hitler’s great interest in reaching agreement to fortify the friendship with the USSR and spheres of influence is evident.” Molotov’s statement to Stalin indicates, of course, that this was Stalin’s great interest. Notwithstanding the nine-page detailed charge (dated November 9, 1940) that Molotov was following to the letter, he took nothing for granted, concluding, “I ask for directives.”²⁶⁷ Molotov was the sole person in the regime to whom Stalin was willing to entrust a one-on-one with Hitler, yet Stalin was micromanaging the talks from Moscow.

Molotov’s second day (November 13) included visits to Göring at the air ministry to discuss German military goods, and to Deputy Führer Rudolf Hess at Nazi party HQ, after which Molotov cabled Stalin that “they received me well and it is evident that they want to strengthen relations with the USSR.”²⁶⁸ In the afternoon, Hitler, this time in the company of Goebbels and Ribbentrop, again received Molotov, along with Dekanozov and Merkulov, for breakfast at 2:00 p.m. The menu, spartan as far as the Soviets were concerned, consisted of beef tea, pheasant, and fruit salad. Formal discussions resumed in Hitler’s vast ceremonial study, ninety feet long and fifty feet wide, with paneling of rare woods, a massive portrait of Bismarck over the colored marble fireplace, and a white marble statue of Frederick the Great on horseback sitting atop a marble table.²⁶⁹ The discussion lasted three and a half hours. Hitler was famous as a gifted orator and actor who intuited his audience’s moods and aspirations, and adapted accordingly. In the Reichstag he was a wise statesman; at party rallies, a fanatical leader; among industrialists, a reasonable nationalist; to women, a child-friendly father figure; to foreign interlocutors, a theatrical performer, alternating between lordly and warmly intimate.²⁷⁰ With the impassive Molotov, neither the poses nor the melodrama worked.

Adhering to Stalin’s cabled corrections of him, Molotov underscored that the 1939 Pact remained in force, adding that “not without the assistance of the Pact with the USSR had Germany been able to complete its operations in Norway, Denmark, Belgium, Holland, and France so quickly and with such glory.”²⁷¹ Hitler raised concerns about Bukovina. Molotov accused Hitler of trying to alter the terms of the secret protocol regarding Finland and Romania; Hitler claimed otherwise. Molotov noted that the Soviets merely wanted to protect themselves against an attack through the Gulf of Finland, the Straits, or the Black Sea. The exchange “never became violent,” recalled Hitler’s interpreter, “but the debate on both sides was conducted with singular tenacity.”²⁷² Goebbels judged that Molotov “made an intelligent, astute impression, very reserved. One gets almost nothing out of him. He listens attentively, but nothing more. Even with the Führer.”²⁷³

Hitler rose. As he escorted Molotov and his entourage to the door, he said he “regretted that he had not yet been able to meet such an immense historical personage as Stalin, especially since he believed he himself might possibly enter history,” according to the notetakers. “Molotov agreed with Hitler’s statement on the desirability of such a meeting and expressed the hope that such a meeting would take place.”²⁷⁴

The two sides could not even agree on a follow-up visit by Ribbentrop to Moscow. Amid the inconclusiveness, scores of top Nazis—but not the Führer—attended a farewell banquet given by the Soviet ambassador (the former textile plant manager) at the Unter den Linden Soviet embassy, whose fading tsarist-era splendor was now overseen by a bust of Lenin. The vodka and caviar were prodigious. “No capitalist or plutocratic . . . table could have been more richly spread,” recalled the German interpreter. “It was a very good party.”²⁷⁵

Churchill cut the festivities short: a British bombing squadron appeared over central Berlin at around 8:30 p.m. Ribbentrop conveyed Molotov the short distance to the safety of his bunker beneath the foreign ministry (the Soviet embassy had none). As a result, additional, unplanned talks ensued, from 9:45 p.m. until nearly midnight. The Nazi foreign minister removed from his pocket and read aloud a draft text, three paragraphs in length, on converting the Tripartite Pact into a four-power pact, with secret protocols to be appended later. A four-power pact would have confronted Britain, as well as the United States, with formidable challenges: the likely fall of not just the European continent but the Mediterranean, the Near East, and the Far East into the clutches of authoritarian Germany, Italy, Japan, and the Soviet Union.²⁷⁶ At the same time, it was doubtful whether the tripartite alliance could counter the combined might of the Anglo-American bloc without the Soviet Union.

Molotov, according to the German record, again insisted that a new understanding of Soviet-German relations was a prerequisite to discussions about the USSR joining a pact of four; the Soviet record indicates that Molotov demanded an explanation of the alliance between Germany, Japan, and Italy and insisted on the importance to the USSR of Bulgaria, Romania, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Swedish neutrality, Finland, and more.²⁷⁷ Ribbentrop resumed expounding on the pending liquidation of the British empire. "If England is defeated, why are we sitting in this shelter?" Molotov interjected, in a retort Stalin would cherish and retell. "And whose bombs are dropping so close that we can hear the explosions even here?"²⁷⁸

THE NONPIVOT

The British press descended into a frenzy over Molotov's visit to Berlin, warning that the Soviet Union was about to join the Axis. Prior to Molotov's return, Stalin had sent suggestions on what the despot assumed would be a joint communiqué issued in Berlin. "The exchange of views took place in an atmosphere of mutual trust," Stalin had written, "and they established mutual understanding on all the most important questions of interest to the USSR and Germany." He had also instructed Molotov that "it would be better if the Germans proposed their draft first." In fact, the Germans proposed nothing, and no joint communiqué was issued. After midnight on November 13–14, Molotov had cabled Stalin and admitted that the Berlin meetings “had not delivered the desired results.” The USSR’s interests in Eastern Europe were not being acknowledged. “Nothing to boast about, but at a minimum I ascertained the current mood of Hitler, which is something we will have to come to grips with.”²⁷⁹ Molotov departed Berlin later that morning. Pravda (November 15) published the proposed joint communiqué unilaterally.²⁸⁰ But the Soviet press proved unable to name a single concrete achievement of Molotov’s visit.²⁸¹

The Germans recorded Amayak Kobulov as having stated that Molotov’s visit was a “powerful demonstration,” but that “not everything that shines is gold.”²⁸² Some members of the Soviet delegation, while still in Berlin, had voiced suspicions that with the Tripartite Pact, Germany was actually working to “encircle” the Soviet Union, while also embroiling it in conflict with Britain over imperial possessions. Soviet military intelligence would inform Moscow that Scheliha (“Aryan”) had heard high officials in the German foreign ministry conclude that, during Molotov’s November 1940 visit, “consensus was not reached on a single important question—not on the question of Finland, not on the question of Bulgaria.”²⁸³ On the German side, Dr. Otto Meissner, the head of the (ceremonial) presidential chancellery, considered an old-school adherent of the Bismarckian policy of ties with Russia, was given the impression—which, as expected, he repeated so that it reached Soviet ears—that Hitler was “very satisfied with the visit and that Molotov’s personality impressed him.”²⁸⁴ This was disinformation that the Nazi regime rightly expected would now spread. Most German insiders judged Molotov’s visit a failure. “Two things became clear in the discussions,” one of Hitler’s interpreters later noted. “Hitler’s intention to push the Soviet Union in the direction of the Persian Gulf, and his unwillingness to acknowledge any Soviet interest in Europe.”²⁸⁵

Molotov reached Moscow on November 15. There is no reliable account of the report he delivered that evening to Stalin and anyone else the despot summoned to the Near Dacha.²⁸⁶ On orders, Molotov's interpreter (Pavlov) told a pro-Soviet American that Molotov had "thawed" in Berlin and that Hitler had made a big impression. A cable from Molotov to Maisky in London (November 17) soberly noted that the Germans were trying to push the Soviets toward India and wanted Turkey for themselves.²⁸⁷ But at a reception given by the Italian ambassador, Augusto Rosso, for representatives of "friendly countries," the Bulgarian envoy to Moscow perceived Molotov as "swollen-headed and puffed up."²⁸⁸ Molotov, just as Stalin instructed, had stood up to Hitler.

Back in 1939, when Stalin had understood, correctly, the emptiness of the British and French negotiating positions vis-à-vis Moscow, he had not hesitated to humiliate them. Of course, at that time, he was assiduously cultivating an alternative: Nazi Germany. In 1940, he had not pursued a genuine alternative to Germany should its negotiating position prove empty. Stalin had not gone to the British of his own accord to create leverage for his demands vis-à-vis a newly triumphant Germany; the British, in the person of Sir Stafford Cripps, had come to him. Stalin only belatedly responded to the sincere British offers of a trade-and-nonaggression pact, and not even through the diplomatic channels in which they had been conveyed. Cripps, to accommodate Stalin's requests, had urged the British government that any talks with Moscow had to be carried out in the utmost secrecy—no small feat for an open society and leak-prone political system like Britain's. But then, on November 16, the confidential British proposals appeared in the English-language press, as Cripps heard over BBC radio in Moscow.irate, he suspected the British foreign office, but the source was the Soviet embassy in London.²⁸⁹ In the event, Vyshinsky's initial reaction to the Cripps proposal—deeming it of the greatest importance—had been shamelessly disingenuous. Stalin had used Cripps, again, then hung him out to dry, in a clumsy warning-cum-ingratiation directed at Hitler.

Other British actions unintentionally worked against rapprochement: Molotov's unplanned refuge in the Berlin bomb shelter, a result of British bombing raids, had evidently helped solidify his view that Germany was still deeply mired in a war in the west, a circumstance that he interpreted in light of his conviction that no German leader would willingly launch a two-front war by attacking in the east. "Even after his visit to Berlin in November 1940, Molotov continued to assert that Hitler would not attack," recalled Zhukov, who added that "one must take into account that in Stalin's eyes, in this case, Molotov had the added authority of someone who had personally visited Berlin."²⁹⁰

BULGARIAN GAMBIT

The Japanese government, for its part, was disappointed that nothing had emerged from the Hitler-Molotov summit; the Tripartite Pact had been expected to facilitate Japanese-Soviet rapprochement at U.S. and British expense in East Asia (especially the base at Singapore), but these hopes appeared unfulfilled. On November 18, 1940, Molotov received Japan's ambassador, Yoshitsugu Tatekawa, and, referring to his conversation with Ribbentrop, declared that he welcomed Japan's desire to normalize relations with the USSR, but he added that Soviet public opinion could not accept a bilateral nonaggression pact unless Soviet territorial losses in the Far East were "restored." Molotov named Southern Sakhalin and the Kuril Islands, adding that if Japan was not prepared to discuss these claims, then he could recommend only a lesser "neutrality pact," as well as a special protocol stipulating the liquidation of Japanese economic concessions on Soviet-controlled Northern Sakhalin.²⁹¹

That same day, Hitler received Bulgaria's tsar Boris III and his foreign minister at the Berghof, aiming to trump any Soviet entreaties to them.

The king, fearing a Soviet backlash, “appeared less inclined than ever” to join the Tripartite Pact, even as he assured Hitler that “down here you have a true small friend, whom you do not have to disown.”²⁹² On November 20, Hungary joined the Tripartite Pact, followed by Romania (November 23), then Slovakia (November 24), all of them in the Soviet backyard and all agreeing, in effect, to become junior partners in a German-dominated Europe. True, also on November 24, Italy was routed in Albania by Greece. And Soviet intelligence sources passed on word that Bulgaria’s king was resisting German pressure. But upon his return to Sofia, Boris did reject Soviet entreaties.

Eisenstein, the Jewish-born convert to Orthodoxy, revived his career with, of all things, a monumental Wagner opera production, which premiered in Moscow on November 21, 1940. The filmmaker’s masterpiece, Alexander Nevsky (November 1938), which depicted the medieval destruction by invading Teutonic knights, remained on ice, but in spring 1940 he had been commissioned to produce Wagner’s Die Walküre. The last staging at the Bolshoi had been in 1925, and it had been a revival of the prerevolutionary (1902) production. Eisenstein had not worked in theater since the heady “Proletarian Culture” movement (also 1925). He plunged into the task, reading up on Wagner and mythology, writing in Ogonyok that Wagner attracted him by his use of legend and folklore, vital ingredients of art.²⁹³ Eisenstein had found a kindred spirit.²⁹⁴ His staging, with an ample budget and the Soviet Union’s best singers, proved to be original, seeking a Wagnerian synthesis of the spatial, aural, and visual. “People, music, light, landscape . . . color and movement,” he explained, “all brought together by a single piercing emotion, a single theme and idea—this is what the filmmaker strives to achieve, and the producer finds the same when he becomes familiar with Wagner’s works.”²⁹⁵

Stalin sent a special envoy, Arkady Sobolev (b. 1903), foreign affairs commissariat secretary general, to Sofia, uninvited, ostensibly on a transit flight to Bucharest. The Bulgarians were informed only a few hours in advance of his arrival. “My impression,” the misled Bulgarian envoy to Moscow surmised, “is that they are prepared to do anything if only they could sign a pact with us.” On November 25, Sobolev was received by, first, the Bulgarian prime minister, Bogdan Filov—a professor of ancient art and president of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences—then King Boris, telling them, in elliptical language, that he sought an agreement for transfer of Red Army troops, via Bulgaria, toward the Turkish Straits in case of need, while pledging noninterference in Bulgarian domestic affairs. Sobolev noted that such a bilateral deal did not preclude Bulgaria’s also joining the Axis, because a Bulgarian-Soviet pact “might very probably, almost certainly” result in the USSR’s own entry into the Axis. Filov was stunned. He obfuscated about “Bulgaria’s complicated situation” but shrank from mentioning Nazi Germany by name.^{296}

That same day, Dimitrov was summoned to the Little Corner, in the presence of Molotov and first deputy foreign affairs commissar Dekanozov. It was the Comintern head’s only audience in the Little Corner in all of 1940, and lasted a half hour.^{297} After confirming China policy with Stalin, Dimitrov dispatched an order to Mao not to attack the Nationalists.^{298} The main discussion concerned Bulgaria, Dimitrov’s homeland. “Historically, this is where the threat has always originated,” Stalin told him. “The Crimean War—the taking of Sevastopol, Wrangel’s intervention in 1919, and so forth.” Stalin added that Sobolev had already been received in Sofia by Filov and that, “in concluding a mutual assistance pact, we not only have no objections to Bulgaria’s joining the Tripartite Pact, but we ourselves in that event will also join the pact.” Stalin further indicated that he would seek to secure the Straits directly, by pressuring Turkey. “What is Turkey?” he continued. “There are two million Georgians there, one and a half million Armenians, one million Kurds, and so forth. The Turks amount to only six or seven million.” Amid the bluster, however, Stalin noted to Dimitrov, “Our relations with Germany are polite on the surface, but there is serious friction between us.”²⁹⁹

Fifteen minutes after Dimitrov’s visit ended, Molotov departed the Little Corner to hand Schulenburg the Soviet Union’s formal assent to join a pact of four—by now much expanded in members—but with major conditions: (1) German troops would have to leave Finland; (2) a pact would be signed between the USSR and Bulgaria for Soviet security on the Black Sea; (3) the Soviets would obtain a privileged position on the Turkish Straits and a “center of gravity” south from Batumi and Baku to the Persian Gulf; and (4) Japan would renounce its oil and coal concessions on Northern Sakhalin, with reasonable economic compensation.³⁰⁰ In other words, facing the threat of ever more German troops arriving on his borders, Stalin sought everything: not just Persia, which Hitler was offering, but Finland, the Baltics, the Balkans, and the Straits. (“As I was accompanying Schulenburg out, I was overcome with emotions,” recalled the Soviet interpreter. “Soviet bases in the Bosphorus and Dardanelles!”)³⁰¹ Molotov told Schulenburg he hoped for “an early answer” to the Soviet conditions.³⁰²

Stalin had expressed his readiness to deepen Soviet involvement in German aggression, and to join the aggression of Italy and Japan, which would have been a fateful step for the British empire and the United States. But the despot offered Soviet services to Berlin as if Moscow were, or would be, an equal partner. The depth of his global miscalculation was unintentionally laid bare in little Bulgaria. Evidently Dimitrov was instructed or under the impression that Sobolev’s confidential oral proposal to the Bulgarian prime minister and tsar should become known, to increase the pressure, and the next day he wired a written summary to the Bulgarian Communist party, informing Stalin that he had done so. The Bulgarian

Communists printed up and distributed the summary as leaflets. The clumsy tactic failed to intimidate the Bulgarian government. Sobolev, the special envoy, had found the government “already committed to Germany to the hilt.”³⁰³ Meanwhile, copies of the Soviet demands were whisked to Hitler. “Our people in Sofia have been disseminating leaflets about the Soviet proposal to Bulgaria,” Molotov exploded at Dimitrov over the phone on November 28, 1940. “Idiots!”³⁰⁴

READING HITLER'S INTENTIONS

Bismarck liked to say that pacts must be observed so long as conditions remain the same (“Pacta sunt servanda rebus sic stantibus”), meaning they could be abrogated. His worldview had been predicated upon a sense of limits and international balance. He had refrained from conquering even all German speakers, despite the wherewithal to do so. Hitler possessed the ambition for a total continental conquest, but, unlike Bismarck, he had initially lacked the wherewithal. Over time, Hitler’s ambition had delivered the wherewithal, from the Rhineland remilitarization (1936) through the Anschluss (1938), the Munich Pact (1938), and, especially, the brazen violation of Munich with his unpunished seizure of all of Czechoslovakia (1939), followed by lightning conquests of Poland (1939) and the Low Countries and France (1940). None of this had been foreordained. Strength deters aggression, as Mussolini had shown with Austria in 1934, while weakness encourages it. By 1940, however, it was not clear that Hitler, given his strength and successes, remained susceptible to conventional deterrence. Britain posed no threat to Germany’s continental domination, but the crushing of France had failed to compel Britain’s surrender, a snub that the “invincible” Führer could not abide. Equally important, he feared dissipation of Nazism’s élan.³⁰⁵ In other words, Hitler had become both more capable of and more impatient for still greater conquest.

Hitler's calculations are difficult to read even now. "The Führer hopes he can bring Russia into the anti-British front," army chief of staff Halder, after a meeting with the Führer, recorded in his diary (November 1, 1940).³⁰⁶ Ribbentrop had explained to Mussolini on the eve of Molotov's Berlin visit that the acid test would be Stalin's position vis-à-vis the "dangerous overlapping of interests" in the Balkans: if the Soviets backed down, the Germans could have their way without war. Hitler himself told Mussolini that there would be no accommodation with Stalin beyond Turkey, certainly not regarding Bulgaria or Romania—indicating that some accommodation was possible.³⁰⁷ Of course, Hitler's sincerity even with his own army, foreign ministry, and principal ally could never be accepted at face value. The Führer's internally stated aim for meeting Molotov—"to entice Russia into participating in a grand coalition against England"—might have been disingenuous. The big play Molotov's visit got in the Nazi press smacks of a transparent effort to drive the wedge still deeper between Britain and the Soviet Union. Hitler had already ordered internal explorations for an invasion of the USSR in fall 1940, a secret idea that remained operative for spring 1941. But then, on the very eve of Molotov's visit to Berlin, Hitler's army adjutant, Major Gerhard Engel, observed that a "visibly depressed" Führer gave the "impression that at the moment he does not know how things should proceed."³⁰⁸

On the very day of Molotov's arrival in Berlin, the Führer had signed the secret Directive No. 18, which read like a warning to himself not to fall into temptation to strike a bargain with Moscow again. "Political discussions have been initiated with the aim of clarifying Russia's attitude for the time being," the November 12, 1940, directive explained. "Irrespective of the results of these discussions, all preparations for the East [war] which have already been verbally ordered will be continued."³⁰⁹ Molotov's ostentatious lack of deference in the Nazi capital afforded the Führer a sense of release. "He is vastly relieved; this won't even have to remain a marriage of convenience,” Engel wrote of the Führer’s daily noontime military conference on the day of Molotov’s departure. “Letting the Russians into Europe would mean the end of central Europe. The Balkans and Finland are also dangerous flanks.”³¹⁰

But the question had not been settled. Lingering doubts and possible reversibility in Hitler’s momentous decisions, paradoxically, were raised precisely because subsequent directives were issued to reaffirm them. Consider, further, that after the invitation to Molotov had been sent, Hitler had had his utterly fruitless meetings with Franco and Pétain. Could Stalin fill the breach left by the failures of Spain and Vichy France to join Hitler in undercutting Britain’s Mediterranean positions? Also on November 12, Hitler signed the order for Germany’s “peripheral strategy” to fight Britain, undergirding the quest for allies in an anti-British front. Even after Molotov’s abrasive visit, moreover, Jodl, Hitler’s closest military adviser, was of the opinion that the Soviets continued to offer important value to Germany, above all in the war against Britain, which had not yet been won.³¹¹ Similar views were expressed by Admiral Raeder and even by Göring.³¹² Halder expected the Soviets to join the Axis and, apropos of Molotov’s visit, recorded the following in his diary (November 16): “Result: Constructive note; Russia has no intention of breaking with us. . . . As regards the Tripartite Pact it is clear that Russia wants to be a partner, not its object. Pact must be reframed!” Halder judged Hitler inclined to avoid a war with the Soviet Union, provided that Stalin did not demonstrate expansionist tendencies into Europe.³¹³ On November 18, Halder wrote in his diary that the “Russian operation” had been “pushed into the background.”³¹⁴

That same day, Hitler told Italian foreign minister Ciano that “it is necessary to apply strong measures in order to divert Russia from the Balkans and push her southward.” Two days later, the Führer made almost the identical statement in a letter to Mussolini.³¹⁵ On November 19, when the commander of the Luftwaffe mission in Romania expressly asked for instructions in the event of a German-Soviet war, Hitler had Jodl delay a reply until the arrival of the formal Soviet response to the invitation to join the Tripartite Pact.³¹⁶ On November 26, Hitler told the Hungarian prime minister, Count Pál Teleki, that “Russia’s conduct is either Bolshevik or Russian nationalist, depending on the situation. . . . Nonetheless we could try to bring her into the great worldwide coalition that stretched from Yokohama to Spain,” but “divert them to the south Asiatic continent.”³¹⁷ Also on November 26, however, Hitler received the Soviet reply to the invitation to join a pact of four, with its over-the-top demands.³¹⁸

SUPREME CUNNING?

In 1940, the USSR had only one third as many tractors as the United States, but twice as many as the whole of Europe. The United States had twenty-eight continuous strip mills for steel, while the Soviet Union possessed five, and all of Europe just three.³¹⁹ Stalin had discontinued most new civilian construction and imposed higher assessments on collective farmers (from a calculation based on actual sown acreage to one based on the farm’s potentially cultivatable land), while delivering less machinery to farms. Soviet per capita grain production still had not reached pre-1914 levels.³²⁰ At the same time, urbanites were now awarded garden plots en masse to grow their own food. In this tight context, Stalin was nonetheless prepared, in exchange for his demands in joining the Axis, to sweeten his economic contributions, including the delivery (by May 1941) of 2.5 million tons of grain, 1 million above existing Soviet obligations.³²¹ Stalin feared any interruption in the imports of German military technology, even though he suspected the Germans were deceiving him, and made deputy aviation commissar Yakovlev travel three times to Berlin to verify that the Soviets were getting the best Germany had. (“See to it that our people study the German planes,” Stalin told him. “Learn how to smash them.”)³²²

Stalin’s larger objective remained to keep Hitler focused on the West and avoid entanglement in war himself. But the despot’s secret instructions to Molotov regarding a four-power pact indicate more than merely probing Hitler’s intentions. If Hitler had been willing to meet the despot’s key conditions in 1940—conceding Finland, southeastern Europe (the Balkans), and the Straits, so that Stalin could protect his entire western flank—the despot likely would have signed on to the Axis.³²³ Territorial annexations and spheres of interest, in Stalin’s mind, provided for security. At best, however, the Führer was offering Stalin only a junior partnership in this new world order dominated by a Germanocentric Axis.³²⁴ Ribbentrop had done his best to make the “continental bloc” against Britain attractive to the Soviets, but the Nazi foreign minister felt undercut by Molotov’s dogged insistence on expansive Soviet interests in Eastern Europe. Ribbentrop “could only repeat again and again that the decisive question was whether the Soviet Union was prepared and in a position to cooperate with us in the great liquidation of the British empire. On all other questions we would easily reach an understanding.”³²⁵ That statement, however, looks delusional. The 1939 Pact had promised a joint division of Eastern Europe, but the November 1940 summit made manifest that Hitler was going to take all of it for himself.³²⁶

Stalin was game to a new permanent division of Europe that excluded Britain and a vanquished France, provided it made Germany and the Soviet Union equals. He laid out his conditions to Hitler as if from a position of strength—but this was a different Germany now. The despot’s unilateral territorial seizures and his further demands had done nothing for those inside the Wehrmacht, the navy, the foreign ministry, or even some top Nazi officials who doubted the wisdom and necessity of war against the Soviet Union. On the contrary, his greed had played right into Hitler’s own long-standing anti-Bolshevik, anti-Slav worldview. Stalin's air force, Hitler noted, could turn Romania's Ploiești oil fields, by far Germany's biggest supplier, into "an expanse of smoking ruins," choking the Axis war machine.³²⁷ Stalin had also held up Soviet compensation payments for Baltic property, contracts for oil deliveries (ostensibly over pricing), shipments of rubber from the Far East via the Trans-Siberian, and Afghan cotton. On top of all this came Molotov's refusal inside the Chancellery to be hypnotized or bullied by Hitler. In the event, Stalin's insistence on forceful tactics in the talks not only clarified Hitler's aggressive intentions but seem to have helped solidify them.³²⁸ Ribbentrop later recalled that, in Hitler's mind, Molotov was "pressuring" Germany, and Hitler "was not willing to be taken by surprise once he had recognized a danger."³²⁹

After Stalin's conditions for joining a four-power pact were conveyed through Molotov, Hitler did not respond. The Soviets would repeat their proposals; again, nothing from Berlin.³³⁰ The silence should have been all Stalin needed to hear. At the same time, the deafening whistles of the British bombs over Berlin during Molotov's visit had offered their own resounding message: namely, that the Kremlin had a possible partner against Nazi aggression. But the bottom line, for Stalin as for Molotov, was that those bombs raining down on Berlin meant that Britain, not the Soviet Union, was at war with Germany.

In the Pact with Hitler, Stalin had been lucky but also shrewd. Now he remained adamant not to let the conniving imperialist Churchill drag him into war with Hitler. Any dramatic chess moves with Britain might provoke Nazi Germany to attack the USSR, while a nonaggression pact and trade agreement with Britain would not have done much for Stalin's principal problem: the massing of scores of German army divisions on the Soviet border. And yet, what if Hitler proved ready to attack the USSR in response to the very idea of a British-Soviet rapprochement, even when that option appeared to have been rejected by both parties? This might be the worst possible circumstance: no actual Soviet deal with Britain to deter Hitler, but Hitler acting upon the fact that his enemies were in contact. Stalin had less to lose by giving London a try than he thought. A balancing relationship with Britain might have given pause to the German high command, the wider Nazi elite, and even Hitler.

Stalin erred in not testing the real limits of a possible geopolitical pivot toward Britain. At the same time, that was not the only move that he might have tried but did not. He could have instructed Molotov, in Berlin, to say yes to a new deal with Germany, this time entirely on Hitler's terms, conceding most of Eastern Europe, in exchange for a division of the spoils of a dismembered British empire. Acceding to German vassal status would have been an admission of weakness. But Hitler had acceded to Stalin's terms in 1939, when he needed the Pact. What if Stalin had lived up to his reputation for supreme cunning and just accepted the offer of a junior partnership under Nazi Germany (the way Mussolini had done)? Of course, such a surprise embrace would not have removed the German land army from Finland, occupied Poland, or Romania. But might it not have thrown Hitler, his military men, and Nazi propaganda for a loop and, as Stalin wished, refocused them all on Britain?

We shall never know. Stalin confided to Dimitrov that at the end of the day, Hitler would have no choice but to recognize that the Soviets required a strong position on the Black Sea to make sure the Turkish Straits were not used against Germany.³³¹ Hitler, however, was not Bismarck; he did not recognize other states' interests as a factor for stability. The combination of German power and Hitler's person was something that neither Stalin nor the rest of the world had faced before. It was, however, most immediately the Soviet despot's problem, given the contiguous geography. His room for maneuver had become ever more circumscribed as the outside world closed in on the Little Corner.

• • •

FROM THE START, the Soviet-German rapprochement had been fraught—burdened with tensions and uncertainties. The path from the Munich Pact (September 1938) through the Hitler-Stalin Pact (August 1939), the joint partition of Poland and clashes over the oil fields, with Western declarations of war against Germany (September 1939), the Soviet-German Treaty of Friendship and the Border (September 1939), the Soviet Winter War against Finland (November 1939–February 1940), the German victory over France (June 1940), Soviet annexations of the Baltic states and parts of Romania (June 1940), and Molotov’s visit to Berlin (November 1940), had been a roller-coaster ride. Stalin’s apprenticeship in high-stakes diplomacy showed him to be cunning, but also opportunistic, avaricious, obdurate. His deal making with Hitler had played out one way in 1939 and altogether differently in 1940. Stalin’s strategy remained the same.

Soviet insiders continued to exhibit confidence bordering on arrogance. “The policy of a socialist government consists of using the contradictions between imperialists, in this case the military contradictions, in order to expand the position of socialism whenever the opportunity arises,” Zhdanov had crowed at a closed party meeting in Leningrad on November 30, 1940. “Ours is an unusual neutrality: without fighting, we are gaining territory. (Laughter in the hall.)”³³² Stalin’s bold seizure and Sovietization of Romanian territory, including Bukovina, as well as the Baltic states, including the strip in southwestern Lithuania that he had promised to Hitler, had ensured that these territories would not fall into Hitler’s hands, but the actions had also removed buffers between the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany and risked a clash, right when Berlin’s dependence on good relations with Moscow had been reduced. Most fundamentally, Stalin had failed to follow his own advice: even with France kaput, he had not taken the initiative to balance ever-growing German power. Instead, he had allowed the long-standing mistrust in British-Soviet relations to overshadow the escalating imbalance and tensions in German-Soviet relations. Once again, the initiative for a bilateral deal had come from Ribbentrop, and, in response, Stalin had once again revealed his exorbitant appetites, but this time the context was radically different.

One might surmise that Stalin's extravagant demands vis-à-vis Hitler in November 1940 had been diabolically clever, for they managed to expose the irreconcilability of German-Soviet interests and, therefore, the de facto end of his mutually beneficial Pact with Hitler. But Stalin's November 1940 pie-in-the-sky wish list was not a cynical ploy to flush out Hitler. Rather, the despot had instructed Molotov to negotiate a new pact. In doing so, Stalin egregiously overestimated his leverage. His exorbitant demands for joining the Axis turned out to be his most momentous decision to date. Soviet military intelligence estimated at this time that between 76 and 79 German divisions were in former Poland, and 15 to 17 in Romania. Germany was thought to have 229 to 242 divisions in total (the real number was closer to 185).³³³ Even journalists were reporting that Germany was stationing its most mechanized divisions on the Soviet border, and that German construction of roads and infrastructure in the east had become furious. German military exercises for a possible war against the USSR, based on recently completed operational studies by General Friedrich von Paulus, took place in the latter part of November and early December.³³⁴

Stalin knew he had bungled the Finnish campaign, and he was meeting often with the new top commanders he had promoted in its aftermath, Timoshenko and Zhukov.³³⁵ The USSR now had an army of 4.2 million, triple its size just three years earlier, and the world's largest. The transformation of the country's economic base had been far reaching. Soviet steel production in 1927–28 had been around 4 million tons, and the 1932 plan target had been set at 10.4 million; the actual amount in 1932 was reported as 5.9 million, but by 1940 the regime reported steel production at 18.3 million tons—a huge leap, even allowing for exaggeration.³³⁶ In 1940, industry would produce 243 heavy, 833 medium, and 1,620 light tanks and more than 10,000 aircraft, including 4,657 fighter planes and 3,674 bombers.³³⁷ But the massive military reorganization still had a long way to go.³³⁸ On December 7, 1940, Timoshenko completed his evaluation, which proved to be a brutal indictment of Voroshilov's leadership and a candid enumeration of the weaknesses of the massive war machine, which suffered from a severe lack of experienced commanders, low levels of training for masses of new conscripts, and a glut of now obsolete weaponry. Training was supposed to be year-round, but much army time was lost to working at collective farms during planting and harvesting, and on construction sites.³³⁹

Nor was it easy for a peasant country to continue supporting such a military. Even officially, the Soviet economic growth rate would drop precipitously, from 10–12 percent per annum in 1928–37 to a mere 2–3 percent per annum in 1937–40, and the key shortfalls occurred in strategic areas: steel, coal, chemical products, crude oil. The terror had exacerbated skilled labor turnover and managerial dearth, while often paralyzing survivors.³⁴⁰ Mass arrests for “wrecking” struck the highest-priority military factories, too.³⁴¹ Military budgets were bloated. Whereas, in 1938, the military had consumed 23.2 billion rubles, or 18.7 percent of the 124 billion in state outlays, in 1940, from a total budget of 174.4 billion rubles, the military would get 56.8 billion, or 32.6 percent.³⁴² Against GDP, Soviet military spending would rise in 1940 to probably 17 percent (as compared with 2 percent in 1928 and 5 percent in 1913).³⁴³ The Soviet regime's ability to spend that quantity of money efficiently, or indeed to spend it all, was another matter.³⁴⁴ Moreover, Nazi Germany had been spending 15 percent of a larger national income on its military already since 1937, and that number had grown.³⁴⁵ Khrushchev, who was in Moscow when Molotov returned from Berlin, would remark, “In Stalin’s face and in his manner, one could sense agitation and, I would add, fear.”^{346}

FEAR

It would be incorrect to say that [Stalin] underestimated him. He saw that Hitler had organized Germany in a short period of time. There had been a huge [German] Communist party and it had disappeared, wiped out!

VYACHESLAV MOLOTOV¹

Stalin is one of the most extraordinary figures in world history. He began as a small clerk, and he has never stopped being a clerk. Stalin owes nothing to rhetoric. He governs from his office, thanks to a bureaucracy that obeys his every nod and gesture.

ADOLF HITLER, Table Talk, 1947²

MOLOTOV, BACK FROM BERLIN, sacked the former textile manager serving as Soviet ambassador there in favor of his own deputy, Vladimir Dekanozov, the Beria minion who had briefly headed NKVD intelligence. Even Molotov did not know him well, thinking him an Armenian who pretended to be a Georgian.³ He seems to have been of mixed Russian (father) and German Jewish (mother) heritage, and had been born Ivan Protopopov in Estonia. Blond and blue-eyed, barely five feet tall, imperious and foul-mouthed with underlings, the forty-one-year-old was the youngest ambassador in the Nazi capital.⁴ He retained his status as a deputy foreign affairs commissar but could not manage to present his credentials to Hitler. On December 5, 1940, still awaiting an audience, Dekanozov received an anonymous German-language letter in the mail. “Hitler intends to attack the USSR next spring,” it read. “The Red Army will be destroyed by numerous powerful encirclements.” The details of pending bellicose actions impressed the thirty-four-year-old Soviet military intelligence station chief, Nikolai Skornyakov, and Dekanozov sent the letter to Molotov, who forwarded it: “Comrade Stalin—for your information.”⁵

Everyone was talking. They had “heard” that Hitler would attack. It would happen this way. It would happen that way. It would occur on this date. It would occur on that date. The encrypted reports flowed over the wires from Belgrade, Sofia, Prague, Bucharest, Budapest, and Warsaw; London, Paris, Geneva, Stockholm, Helsinki, and Rome; Tokyo, Washington, and Berlin. The noise was shattering. Observers reported rail lines, aerodromes, and weapons depots being laid, troops being massed on the frontier, Russian-language courses being taken. Hitler would seize Ukraine.⁶ Or he would demand that Stalin just hand Ukraine over. The Führer was going to invade. Unless he wasn’t. Amayak Kobulov, relying on his personal spy, the ethnic Latvian Berlings—code-named “Lycée-ist” by the Soviets, but a plant for the Nazis—reported through NKVD channels (December 14) that Hitler had declared Britain to be Germany’s “sole enemy,” and that Germany would do everything possible “to avoid a war on two fronts.”⁷

The Führer himself had become nearly inaccessible. On the afternoon of December 19, Dekanozov was finally able to present his credentials, in the same Chancellery room where Molotov had been received, but Hitler politely deflected the envoy’s effort to discuss Soviet conditions for joining the four-power pact. After a curt half an hour, two giant Nazi protocol officers bundled the diminutive Dekanozov out.⁸ Unbeknownst to the Soviet envoy, the previous day Hitler had signed the supersecret Directive No. 21, which ordered that “even before the end of the war with England, the German Armed Forces must be prepared to annihilate Soviet Russia in a swift campaign (Operation Barbarossa).” The target date was provisionally set for May 15, 1941.⁹

Nazi Germany was master of the European continent, stalemated with island Britain and economically enmeshed with the Soviet Union. Nazi ideologues railed at the “military buildup” of “Judeo-Bolshevism” on Germany’s new borders in the east. Most top Nazis, however, scorned the Red Army's performance against Finland and, more broadly, the inferior Slavic race. SS Chief Heinrich Himmler had told Nazi party functionaries in fall 1940 that the USSR "cannot pose any danger to us at all." Hitler himself had stated that the Soviet Union "will nevertheless make no effort to enter the war against Germany of her own accord" and took its expansive territorial appetites from the Baltic to the Black Sea as indicative of weakness.¹⁰ But in the aftermath of his November 1940 confrontation with Molotov, the Führer had taken to calling the Soviet Union a gathering threat that had to be preempted. That view had been Germany's motivation for the Great War in 1914: its giant eastern neighbor had to be attacked before it got strong.¹¹ Hitler added the proposition that now Britain was not capitulating because it was counting on eventual help from the USSR. Thus did it transpire for the second time in the twentieth century that the road to German triumph over the world's greatest power, Britain, was deemed to go through the east.

Hitler's Operation Barbarossa—meaning "Red Beard," the nickname of the Holy Roman emperor Frederick I—consisted of an eight-page typescript dated December 18, 1940, and initialed by Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel (head of the Wehrmacht high command), General Alfred Jodl (head of the high command's operations staff), Major General Walter Warlimont (Jodl's top aide, who had prepared the document's first draft), and one other person (illegible).¹² Hitler had a mere eight copies prepared, of which four, along with the original, went into the safe. One copy each went to the army commander and the air force commander, and two to the general staff. A mere ten days later, Soviet military intelligence in Berlin delivered word of the existence of the supersecret signed directive.¹³

IDÉES FIXES

On December 23, 1940, Stalin had one of the largest groups ever in his office, more than thirty military-industrial functionaries. "We were all captivated at how simply, amiably, and with such deep knowledge Stalin conducted the meeting,” recalled Akaki Mgeladze (b. 1910), who at age twenty-eight, after being released from house arrest, had been named head of Georgia’s oil trust. “We were elated and felt such a rush of creative power and energy that we were ready to move mountains.”¹⁴ Besides ramping up oil supplies, discussion ensued about the M-105 airplane engine, which had 1,000 horsepower. “If we had a plethora of engines like the M-105,” Stalin instructed those gathered in his Little Corner, “we could talk to that scumbag differently.”¹⁵

That same day, the upper ranks of the Soviet army, air force, and navy gathered for a large-scale conference that lasted until December 31. For a modern army, doctrine was as important as size and technological base. A “defense in depth” assumed that the invader would inexorably breach the front lines, so it sacrificed territory, erecting defenses back from the front, aiming to contain the blow by wearing the enemy down. A further option, “mobile defense,” involved counterattacks from depth before the enemy’s advance had been fully contained, in order to cut off the enemy’s frontline tank divisions from its second- and third-line infantry. Such operations required tremendous skill and speed, real-time battlefield intelligence, and sophisticated use of armored divisions to pierce the enemy assault.¹⁶ “Forward defense” meant massing units on the frontier in fortified regions, absorbing and halting the initial blow, then taking the fight to enemy territory.

Soviet military doctrine had long been predicated on forward defense, and assumed that there would be about two weeks between an outbreak of hostilities, characterized by limited skirmishes, and any German ability to engage with the massive force of a full mobilization. During this interval, the Red Army would absorb the charge, then seize the initiative in a quick counteroffensive, inflicting several rapid defeats and thereby disrupting the enemy’s mobilization.¹⁷ But the USSR had some 2,500 miles of borders to defend against Germany and its Axis partners from the White Sea to the Black. The Red Army had forward-deployed some of its very best forces—20 of its 29 mechanized corps, almost 80 percent of its newest tanks, and more than half of its most advanced aircraft. This could leave them dangerously exposed if, as had happened to France, the Germans punched through in numbers and carried out an encirclement behind the penetrated lines.¹⁸ The Soviets had ample reserves in the rear that could be brought into battle quickly, but the Germans were preconcentrating truly massive forces on the frontier.

Some sharp critiques of the Soviet military doctrine had been buried in the terror.¹⁹ Stalin forbade consideration of anything other than an attack. Soviet theorists who had warned of the superiority of defense in depth—such as Alexander Verkhovsky, the former war minister in the Provisional Government who had joined the Reds—had exposed themselves to charges of treason for advocating the sacrifice of territory (even Minsk and Kiev).²⁰ Tukhachevsky had leveled precisely these charges against his intellectual nemesis, the strategist Alexander Svechin, in 1930–31, when Svechin was eventually arrested in the so-called Springtime Operation.²¹ The survivor Shaposhnikov, too, firmly, albeit less stridently than Tukhachevsky, advocated for the offensive posture of forward defense.

The December 1940 military conference took place at the defense commissariat's new building, completed two years earlier, which jumbled modernist, neoclassical, and kitsch motifs, including stylized tank bas-reliefs and a central tower topped by a red star. Stalin did not attend. Voroshilov was absent as well. Timoshenko, presiding over his first such meeting as defense commissar, opened with a greeting to the 270 attendees. Next came chief of staff Meretskov's report, which gently took up Red Army shortcomings but reveled in how the imperialists were fighting a war among themselves, and how the USSR had managed to steer clear even as it had been able to "march westward" into new territories. Zhukov, commander of the Kiev military district, got the spotlight for a report accentuating the USSR's commitment to offense. He argued for combining mechanized forces, close air support, and tactical surprise and flanking maneuvers to smash through an enemy's frontline defenses and create havoc in its rear—the old concept of deep operations, a stirring of Tukhachevsky's ashes.²²

Zhukov's hymn to spirited offense glossed over the critical period right after the launch of the enemy attack. Precisely the period of the onset of hostilities had been analyzed in a penetrating book by the Soviet theorist Georgy Isserson about Spain's civil war and Germany's Polish campaign, New Forms of Combat (1940), which argued that enemy forces mobilized and deployed secretly would conduct operations far exceeding mere frontier skirmishes or spoiling attacks, and that these troops would not be vulnerable to a counteroffensive.²³ At the conference, General Pyotr Klenov, commander of the Baltic military district, mentioned having read Isserson's book. "It offers hasty conclusions based upon the war between the Germans and Poland to the effect that there will be no start period for a war, that war today is decided simply—an invasion by readied forces, as was done by the Germans in Poland, deploying a million and a half men," Klenov stated. He dismissed Poland as not analogous to the USSR, calling it a weak country that, moreover, had lost its vigilance, so that it had "absolutely no foreign intelligence as the Germans were undertaking a many-month concentration of forces."

Klenov omitted mention of the German campaign in France. Zhukov did acknowledge Germany's blitz in the west, but he characterized France as a weak state as well, whose experience was therefore supposedly inapplicable to the USSR.²⁴ Isserson excepted, the Soviets spent less time studying Germany's new style of warfare than they did Anglo-American theories about wars of attrition, in which the USSR feared becoming bogged down.²⁵

The deputy general inspector of the air force, Major General Timofei Khryunkin, offered cautionary remarks from his experiences in the trenches of the Soviet-Polish campaign. He noted that air support had arrived too late, when the ground forces had already finished their task (or failed to do so). “We have the experience of the German command in coordinating with armored units,” he explained. “I studied it, and it is as follows: After armored units break through to the rear, 70–80 km, and perhaps 100 km, aviation gets its orders not from an aerodrome, but in the air; that is, the commander who directs the tank units that broke through and the aviation commander specify the target to air power by radio. Aviation the whole time is above its troops, and, through radio communication, it destroys pockets of resistance in front of the tanks.” Khryunkin added that radio “is the most important thing.” Barely thirty years old, not even supposed to have been present (his invited superior could not, or chose not to, attend), Khryunkin, in his incisive remarks—among the briefest of anyone—also managed to underscore the importance of having limited types of planes for efficiency (spare parts, training), which was what the Germans did, as opposed to the French, and the need for higher-caliber guns on Soviet aircraft in order to take out enemy tanks.²⁶

Timoshenko closed with a summation. “In terms of the strategic art, the experience of the war in Europe has perhaps brought nothing new,” he asserted. “But in the sphere of the operational arts, in the sphere of frontline and army operations, there have been immense changes.” He singled out the value of tank armies and motorized divisions coordinated with aviation, noting that whereas offensives in the First World War had been stymied by defense in depth and the employment of reserves, “German tank divisions in 1939–1940 forestalled calling up these reserves.” The Germans just “pushed forward,” having “rightly taken into account that the force and success of the contemporary offensive consists in its great speed and uninterruptedness.” He contrasted the German experience in just bypassing the Maginot Line with the Soviet Winter War, wherein a bypass proved impossible, and accentuated being expert at both wars of maneuver and of heavy concentration, in order to achieve that early breakthrough. He also noted that German success had depended upon preparation, laying railroads, building roads, readying aerodromes, and using agents on enemy territory to sow panic. In conclusion, he said that “the decisive effect of air power is achieved not via long-range raids in an enemy’s rear but coordination with infantry in the field of battle, in the location of divisions, the army.”²⁷

As Timoshenko knew well, however, the Red Army’s existing organization, officer skill set, and rank-and-file training did not correspond to this incisive blueprint. How much, if anything, the absent Stalin absorbed of the revelatory discussions of the new German way of war and its implications for Soviet military doctrine remains uncertain. Timoshenko had submitted a draft of his summation to the despot, who inserted several lines: “One organizes defense in order to prepare an offensive.” “Defense is especially advantageous only when it is understood as a means to organize an offensive.”²⁸

SEEKING CLARIFICATION

Also on December 28, Sorge in Tokyo drafted a radio message, the first of many he would send warning of possible war. He had developed a close relationship with the German military attaché Colonel Alfred Kretschmer and was able to meet the many high-level military visitors from Berlin on assignment to Japan. “Every new person arriving in Japan from Germany talks about how the Germans have around 80 divisions on the eastern border, including Romania, with the aim of exerting pressure on the policy of the USSR,” his message stated. “In the event that the USSR starts to actively oppose the interests of Germany, as happened in the Baltics, the Germans could occupy territory on a line Kharkov, Moscow, Leningrad.

The Germans do not want to do this, but are assembling the means, should they be compelled to do so by the behavior of the USSR.” But Sorge added that “the Germans know well that the USSR cannot risk this, because, after the Finnish war debacle, Moscow needs at least twenty years to become a modern army on a par with Germany’s.”²⁹

Sorge’s dispatch was characteristic of the mountains of chatter that Stalin would receive. But the December 29 intelligence out of Berlin on the existence of Operation Barbarossa was different. It had been written by Skornyakov (“Meteor”), who worked under the cover of the aviation aide to the Soviet military attaché. “Meteor,” in turn, had gotten the information from Captain Nikolai Zaitsev (“Bine”), the intelligence operative in the Soviet trade mission. “Bine,” in freezing weather, drove around and took public transportation for up to five hours (to ensure he was not being followed by German counterintelligence) to meet with the German journalist Ilse Stöbe (“Alta”), who ran the field agents in Soviet military intelligence’s network in Berlin, including her source for this revelation, Rudolf von Scheliha (“Aryan”). The latter, returning from Warsaw, now worked in the German foreign ministry. Filipp Golikov, the head of Soviet military intelligence, forwarded the information to Stalin, as well as to Molotov, defense commissar Timoshenko, and chief of staff Meretskov (collectively known as List No. 1), writing that “from highly informed military circles, it has become known that Hitler issued an order to prepare a war against the USSR and that the war will be declared in March of the coming year.”

From time immemorial, the month of March in the eastern Slavic lands brought the spring thaw, deep mud, and impassable roads, an improbable moment for a military invasion. Still, HQ took the report seriously. On the document, Major General Mikhail Panfilov, deputy head of military intelligence, wrote, “It is necessary to clarify who are the highly informed military circles. To whom, concretely, was the directive issued.”

On January 4, 1941, “Meteor” reported from Berlin that “Aryan” confirmed that he obtained this information from a military man known to him, and that this was based not on rumor, but on a special directive of Hitler, which is deeply secret and about which very few people know.” “Aryan” had further stipulated that the head of the eastern department of the German foreign ministry had told him that Molotov’s visit to Berlin could be compared with Polish foreign minister Beck’s—which had been followed by a German invasion. “Aryan” added that “preparations for an offensive against the USSR had begun much earlier, but they had been halted because the Germans had miscalculated the resistance of England. The Germans had reckoned on bringing England to its knees in spring and freeing their hands in the East.” He concluded that “Hitler thinks the condition of the Red Army precisely now is so low that in spring he shall have undoubted success.”³⁰

“Aryan”’s report constituted a stunning achievement—the German officer corps did not yet know of Barbarossa.³¹ On the evening of January 7, 1941, Golikov summoned Major General Vasily Tupikov to Znamenka, 19, the three-story Chocolate House that served as military intelligence HQ. An offspring of deep Russia (Kursk province) and a graduate of the Frunze Military Academy, Tupikov (b. 1901) was the chief of staff in the Kharkov military district, though he had served abroad as a military attaché (Estonia, 1935–37). He was now appointed military attaché in Berlin, code-named “Arnold,” and tasked with ascertaining the precise location of German forces across multiple theaters. He quickly apprehended that “the sources we have in Germany for the most part do not have serious opportunities to get hold of documentary evidence regarding the armed forces of Germany.”³² Neither “Aryan” nor other Soviet spies secured a physical copy of Barbarossa. No foreign intelligence service did.³³

WAR GAMES

Following its military conference, the Red Army conducted two war games on charts at general staff headquarters. The Pact had scrambled Soviet war planning. Germany still possessed the greatest destructive potential, and remained the focus of attention, but Poland's disappearance had rendered the entire GP series of plans moot.³⁴ Annexation of the Baltic states altered the calculation for the northwest as well. Romania remained a likely partner of Germany, to which had been added Finland, Hungary, and Slovakia. There was, however, very considerable internal dispute about whether the principal enemy thrust would come north of the impassable Pripet Marshes, toward Minsk, Smolensk, and Moscow on the central axis and Leningrad on the northernmost axis, or south of the Pripet, toward Kiev and the Caucasus. The January 1941 exercises incorporated both possibilities.³⁵

Both iterations of the games glossed over the initial period of war. (Against neither Japan at the Halha River nor Finland had the initial phase been decisive.) The games assumed, in line with Soviet military doctrine, that the enemy ("blues") would initiate hostilities and would not be able to penetrate more than a few score miles before being driven back to prewar frontiers by the Soviet side ("reds"), setting the stage for the onset of the games, which notionally began on the fifteenth day of hostilities. No battles in the games took place on Soviet soil. Almost all the toponyms in the war games documents were Polish and Prussian settlements, rivers, hills. In the first game (January 2–6), Zhukov commanded the blues, attacking north of the Pripet. The reds, led by Pavlov, launched a counterattack into East Prussia, reaching the Neman and Narew rivers, but Zhukov's blues in East Prussia outmaneuvered Pavlov's attempted encirclement and won. The second game (January 8–11) shifted the fighting south of the Pripet into former southern Poland and Silesia, and this time Zhukov commanded the reds and Pavlov the blues. This version pivoted on initial blue penetration in the direction of Lvov and Ternopol and a red reversal, followed by Zhukov's deep operation to punch through and advance beyond the Carpathian passes toward Kraków and Budapest. Pavlov failed to block Zhukov's thrust, but the game was ended before the outcome had been fully decided.³⁶

Immediately after being apprised of Zhukov's success in effectively winning from both sides, Stalin would make him the third chief of staff in the past six months.³⁷ "I have never worked in staffs," Zhukov recalled protesting to the despot. "I have always been a line officer. I cannot be chief of the general staff."³⁸

Continuing in his transformation of the military, Stalin also held fast to the view that the economic relationship with Germany served as a deterrent. Many foreign observers, too, surmised that Germany had far more to gain from trade than from a costly attempt at conquest.³⁹ In December 1940 and January 1941, after the despot had applied pressure (shutting down Soviet exports to Germany in the fourth quarter), German exports to the USSR suddenly ballooned.⁴⁰ In Moscow on January 10, the parties signed a new German-Soviet Border and Commercial Agreement, which the trade official Schnurre lauded as "the greatest Germany had ever concluded." The USSR, upping its deliveries, promised to ship 2.5 million tons of grain, some from strategic reserves, and 1 million tons of oil by August 1941, in return for machine tools and arms-manufacturing equipment, whose delivery would begin in August.⁴¹ Hitler, however, saw menace. "Stalin is intelligent, clever, and cunning," he stated at a Führer conference of military brass during the two days before the signing of the new trade agreement. "He demands more and more. He's a cold-blooded blackmailer. A German victory has become unbearable for Russia. Therefore: she must be brought to her knees as soon as possible."⁴²

Also in January 1941, Wehrmacht troops entered Bulgaria, where the Germans would soon install anti-aircraft weapons and shore batteries on the Black Sea.⁴³ Molotov told Dimitrov that “the Soviet government has declared to the German government that Bulgaria and the Straits belong to the security sphere of the USSR.”⁴⁴ Major General Alexander Samokhin (“Sophocles”), the Soviet military attaché and military intelligence station chief in Belgrade, reported conversations to the effect that “the Balkans are becoming the decisive center of political events, more so because here is where the direct clash of the interests of Germany and the USSR begins.”⁴⁵ As late as January 17, Molotov was still pressing Schulenburg about Germany’s silence regarding Soviet conditions for joining the Tripartite Pact: “neither an answer nor a hello.”⁴⁶

ANXIETIES

In the evening of January 17, Stalin convoked a rare formal meeting of the politburo in the Little Corner to discuss the economic plan for 1941.⁴⁷ “For four to five months we have not assembled the politburo,” he stated. “All questions are prepared by Zhdanov, Malenkov, and others in the form of smaller gatherings with comrades who have the necessary expertise, and the practice of leadership has gotten not worse but better.” He continued, “In the economic sense, our state is not a single entity but consists of a series of pieces. In order to unite these pieces into one whole, we need railroads.” Just as France or Britain had connected their empires via ships, the USSR had to expand its railroads, which “would consume a lot of metal.” He went on to criticize the economic council inside the Council of People’s Commissars. “You are busy with parliamentarism,” he charged. “You pronounce big speeches. Issues are often resolved by the principle of who convinces whom, who gives a prettier speech.”

After the admonishments, at around 1:00 a.m., they went outside to inspect a new limited-edition automobile, which Stalin deemed “successful.” Then the group of about ten repaired to his apartment, one floor below the Little Corner, for supper. They sat until 7:00 a.m. “We sang songs, talked,” Malyshev, the commissar of medium machine building and a deputy chairman of the Council of People’s Commissars, recorded in his diary. “Comrade Stalin told us at length about his life and proposed a toast ‘to the old guys, who are eagerly passing power to the youth, who are eagerly taking this power!’” Stalin was promoting a new team of younger cadres into the government, Molotov’s bailiwick, such as Malyshev, who carried responsibility for the automobile industry. When the despot observed Malyshev drinking wine “in limited edition,” he grabbed two goblets, hurried over, and poured them both full. The pair drank to the bottom. Stalin then went around the room to pour everyone a full glass, laughing and commenting of Malyshev, with evident zest, “He’s a sly type, sly!”⁴⁸

Another interlude of relaxation mixed with menace occurred on February 4: a Kremlin banquet for Voroshilov’s sixtieth jubilee. The marshals, some generals, people’s commissars, Central Committee apparatchiks, Comintern officials, and others, a few with their wives, toasted one another until 4:00 a.m. “Stalin pronounced a number of toasts,” Malyshev noted. “He, in part, again returned to the idea of the old and the young. He said that ‘the old should understand that unless the young are admitted to leadership positions, then we will perish. We Bolsheviks are strong in that we boldly promote youth. The old should eagerly yield power to the young.’”⁴⁹

Stalin went on to attribute Soviet successes in foreign affairs to “two means: diplomacy and the army.” Dimitrov recorded the despot as stating that “with our foreign policy we have managed to take advantage of the goods of this world and to use those goods (we buy cheap and sell dear!). But the might of our army and navy have helped us conduct a policy of neutrality and keep the country out of war.” One of the reasons France fell, Stalin explained, was a failure to promote young cadres. “We have another approach: we promote our young cadres, sometimes even too eagerly. We promote them with pleasure, with joy. Old men cling to the old ways. The young go forward. Replacing the old with the young at the proper time is very essential. The country that fails to do that is doomed to failure.” Stalin also toasted Lenin (“We owe him everything”) and Soviet might. “We have been lucky. ‘God’ has helped us. Lots of easy victories. . . . Must not get cocky. . . . We now have an army of 4 million men on their feet and ready for anything. The tsar used to dream of a standing army of 1.2 million men.”⁵⁰

HITLER’S GRAND STRATEGY

Hitler’s radicalism confounded most contemporaries.⁵¹ Ever since his Second Book, written in 1928 but unpublished, he had exhibited envy for the unique vastness of the British empire and, ultimately, for American power. Germany under him had emerged as the world’s third-largest economy, but its overall productivity and living standards trailed those of the United States and even Britain. His acute awareness of Germany’s limitations relative to Britain’s global empire and America’s transcontinentality, not just his deeply held racist conceptions, spurred his aggressiveness. The Nazi regime proved to have an astonishing capability to marshal resources and a tremendous depth of domestic political unity, and into 1940 it was overseeing further surges of output and popular acclaim. But shortages of nearly everything, from steel to fodder, held Germany back, undermining the quality of the Wehrmacht’s armor and the Luftwaffe’s planes. Desperately seeking to break through to world-power status, in his inimical way, Hitler lacked the requisite economic and resource scaffolding.⁵² Japan suffered the same predicament: vaulting ambitions and limited raw materials or financial means to import them.⁵³ For Hitler, this was a matter of the survival of the German race. He held fast to a zero-sum calculus, believing that only one nation could dominate the world.

Hitler could be less impulsive than he seemed. He and his crude propagandists had slandered the United States at every turn for supposedly trying to interfere in European affairs, but once Hitler had precipitated the pan-European war over Poland, he had worked diligently to keep the world's potentially most powerful country out of the hostilities. This was not rocket science: in 1918, on top of the British sea blockade that inhibited vital German imports of food and raw materials, America's 2 million fresh troops and plentiful resources had brought the Germans to defeat. Germany's unrestricted submarine warfare, in turn, had gratuitously provoked America's decision to take up arms, and Hitler ordered the navy not to repeat the mistake this time. Roosevelt, for his part, seemed to want just that: a Nazi-instigated confrontation. Meanwhile, many of Hitler's efforts to bring Japan into the war centered not on opening a two-front war against the USSR but embroiling the United States in a Pacific war such that it would hesitate to get involved on a second front in Europe.⁵⁴ But Roosevelt's reelection, by a substantial majority, to a third term on November 5, 1940, and the increasing scale of U.S. aid to Britain gave Hitler grave cause for concern. Even while still fighting Britain, he ordered continued preparations for an anticipated eventual clash with the United States.⁵⁵

In a fireside chat broadcast over the radio on December 29, 1940, Roosevelt had called upon the American people to serve as "the great arsenal of democracy. For us this is an emergency as serious as war itself. We must apply ourselves to our task with the same resolution, the same sense of urgency, the same spirit of patriotism and sacrifice as we would show were we at war." The president explained that "if Great Britain goes down, the Axis powers will control the continents of Europe, Asia, Africa, Australasia, and the high seas—and they will be in a position to bring enormous military and naval resources against this hemisphere." Roosevelt vowed to supply Britain ("the spearhead of resistance to world conquest")

with weaponry against Nazi Germany while keeping America out of the fighting.⁵⁶ Even at peace, the American colossus was now manufacturing as much weaponry as either Germany or Britain, while also seeing its living standard rise. Germany's many occupied territories could never match the United States or Britain in productivity. In 1941, America would manufacture nearly 20,000 military aircraft, of which more than 5,000 would go to Britain. Germany took deliveries of 78 aircraft from occupied France and the Netherlands.⁵⁷

Hitler was wont to expiate on American degeneracy and contamination by Jewry, but he was well aware of America's productive power and resources, and how the United States, together with Britain, was rich in transport, too. Herein lay the strategic component of his quest for Lebensraum. For Hitler, annihilation of the Soviet Union and international Jewry was an end in itself. But he had a further aim, forced upon him, in his view, by necessity: to establish the equivalent of a British empire or U.S. transcontinentality by conquering and racializing Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. It was his awe and fear of U.S. power, ultimately, that propelled him to take on what he long said needed to be done: eradicate "Judeo-Bolshevism."⁵⁸ Hitler was caught in something of a vicious circle: all of his spectacular battlefield victories had only accelerated Anglo-American cooperation, the very phenomenon helping to drive his pursuit of these victories in the first place. To be sure, he could continue to secure crucial resources from Stalin via trade. But whenever Germany ran into difficulty meeting its contractual obligations, Stalin had shown he could turn off the spigot of grain, timber, oil, and alloys. Hitler might end up succumbing to the contemptible fate he foresaw for Britain, running the risk of abject dependency on the United States, but in his case the dependency involved the USSR. How could Germany even supply its own military if the Soviets kept demanding so many advanced machine tools?

How long would it be before the USSR became too strong even to take on? How long before Stalin might launch his own war against Germany?

To Hitler, a consolidation of his gains and a defensive stance looked like a losing proposition, for time, he felt, was not on his side. American involvement with Britain would grow; the USSR would just get stronger. Thus, given the military infeasibility of a cross-Channel invasion, his options seemed to be (1) air strikes against peripheral targets of the British empire in the Near East, to raise Britain's costs for refusing his offers of accommodation on his terms, an option that meant continued tolerance of his relationship with "Judeo-Bolshevism" and Stalin's "blackmail"; (2) the continental bloc idea advanced by Ribbentrop, which would confront the Anglo-Americans with equivalent productive and military force but would potentially increase Hitler's dependence on Stalin's good graces; or (3) an unprovoked attack on a country with a massive army of 4 million men and modern weaponry, some of it German supplied. The latter was in many ways the riskiest choice but, given Hitler's worldview, aspirations, and calculations, the one that seemed to make the most sense.⁵⁹ Understanding that from the outside required a level of insight no foreign power commanded.

On January 30, 1941, Hitler showed that he understood that the Soviet Union would not launch a preemptive strike, telling his high command behind closed doors, "As long as Stalin lives, the Russians will not attack, for Stalin is cautious and reasonable." Nonetheless, German officialdom and propaganda emphasized the presence of Soviet troops on the common border as a direct threat to Germany. In his speech, the Führer moved the start date of Barbarossa from May 15 to June 2, evidently acknowledging the scale of the operation, and repeated his prophecy, made two years earlier, of a coming annihilation of the Jews.⁶⁰

JUDO

Reconstituted Soviet espionage networks overseas counted some 3,000 different sources, of whom perhaps 70 percent were new since 1938 (such as agents of former Czechoslovak intelligence who agreed to work against Germany).⁶¹ The NKVD also intercepted hundreds of thousands of coded telegrams, but only a small percentage (usually less than 15 percent) could be deciphered and read. Soviet intelligence lacked translators, let alone genuine cryptographers.⁶² Still, Stalin could read intercepts of deciphered communications between Japanese military attachés in Moscow and Tokyo as well as U.S. diplomatic communications with the state department from the Soviet Union, France, and Japan.⁶³ The Soviets did not, however, break British or German codes.⁶⁴

The despot had spies high up in the British establishment. These included the ideologically committed Cambridge Five: Anthony Blunt (“Tony”), in British counterintelligence (MI5); Guy Burgess (“Mädchen”), in the British secret services (MI6); Donald Maclean (“Homer”), for the foreign office in London; Kim Philby (“Söhnchen”), in the saboteur training unit known as the Special Operations Executive; and John Cairncross (“Liszt”), the personal secretary to Sir Maurice Hankey, the former cabinet secretary and now nominally Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, but really minister without portfolio. “Liszt,” for example, had evidently provided Moscow the UK’s secret September 1940 “Estimate of the Possibilities of War,” which had concluded that Hitler could not mount a successful invasion of the British Isles.⁶⁵ In 1941, Liszt would pass on 3,349 classified documents, including the telegrams out of Moscow from Ambassador Cripps to Eden at the foreign office, as well as British intelligence reports.⁶⁶ “Tony” passed British counterintelligence documents to the restored London station chief Anatoly Gorsky beginning in January 1941. “Söhnchen” informed his handlers that the British were not training any undercover agents for work in the USSR, information that in Moscow was double-underlined in red, reinforcing the suspicions that Philby was a double agent working for the British.⁶⁷ Even after he allowed Gorsky to reestablish the London station, Stalin never trusted the Cambridge Five.⁶⁸

In Germany, besides the network of Soviet military intelligence centered on Rudolf von Scheliha, who had delivered word of the existence of Barbarossa (without the name), another network of Soviet civilian intelligence centered on Arvid Harnack (b. 1901), who had studied in the United States, married an American, obtained his Ph.D. in his native Germany, traveled to the USSR on a German-government-sponsored research trip prior to the Nazi regime, passed information to the Americans, become an antifascist spy for the Soviets, and joined the Nazi party and now worked in Nazi Germany's economics ministry. Contact with Harnack ("Corsican") had been reestablished in 1940 by Alexander Korotkov (b. 1909), who had started at Lubyanka as an electrician and elevator operator but, unlike most post-terror recruits, was fluent in German.⁶⁹ Korotkov had been appointed deputy head of station under Amayak Kobulov, who initially was kept away from these networks.⁷⁰

Korotkov was one of the many new people posted abroad by the now thirty-three-year-old second-year head of NKVD foreign intelligence, Pavel Fitin, whose directorate had managed to reestablish about forty Soviet intelligence stations abroad.⁷¹ "Corsican" introduced Korotkov to his friend Harro Schulze-Boysen ("Elder"). The Nordic-looking Schulze-Boysen (b. 1909) had campaigned as a youth against the Versailles Treaty imposed on Germany but also against the larger capitalist order; in 1933, SA Brownshirts had smashed his offices and scratched swastikas on his skin. His father was a decorated naval officer (the family was related to Grand Admiral Alfred von Tirpitz) and his mother was friends with Göring; she got him a position in the air ministry (communications).^{72, 73} "Corsican" and "Elder," as well as "Aryan" in parallel, cultivated some threescore strategically placed contacts across a variety of ministries, German industry, the Wehrmacht, and German intelligence—a penetration beyond belief in a totalitarian regime.

German counterintelligence had little sense of the true depth and breadth of Soviet intelligence penetration. But a buildup of the scope necessary to launch a monumental war against the USSR—construction of rail lines, roads, aerodromes, barracks; movement and storage of armaments, gasoline, troops—could never be concealed in any case. The tanks and building materials had to be carried on flat cars. The key, however, was not Germany's war preparations—which, as British intelligence noted (January 31), were almost open—but Hitler's intentions.⁷⁴ Here, the high command and the SS's intelligence arm, the SD, engaged in a brilliant game of judo, using the power of Communism's nonpareil spy networks against the USSR by pumping them with disinformation.⁷⁵ Stalin did not have an agent in Hitler's innermost circle or personal staff who could have exposed the campaign of plausible falsehoods.

The forces being stationed along the Soviet frontier could be used against not just the USSR but also British possessions and clients. Back in July 1940, Hitler had told top generals that the buildup in the east would be passed off as training for a cross-Channel invasion of Britain, a story fed to lower-level German military commanders as well as foreign embassy staff. Plans were drawn up for the rapid movement of these troops westward, with false orders to prepare plans for travel. Detailed maps of Britain were supplied to the eastern units' commanders and intelligence officers. English interpreters were assigned to the German units on the Soviet border. The falsehoods confused Germany's own military at various levels. Once Hitler had postponed Sea Lion, in September 1940, a second rationale was put into play: preparation for an attack on British interests in the Balkans (Greece), the Mediterranean (Cyprus, Malta, Gibraltar), and the Near East (Egypt, Iraq, Palestine). Some top British intelligence officers had interpreted Germany's entry into Romania (October 1940) precisely along these lines. The Germans demonstrably increased their intelligence gathering in the Near East, activity that was duly picked up by the British and made its way to Moscow.⁷⁶

Just such a “peripheral” strategy against Britain, originally invented by Jodl, was actually favored by some members of the Nazi hierarchy, such as Admiral Raeder and Ribbentrop, and by Mussolini, and throughout the spring of 1941 it retained its plausibility.⁷⁷ At the same time, a third, even more plausible rationale for the massive German troop concentrations in Eastern Europe was disseminated: that Hitler was going to use the buildup to intimidate Stalin into yielding territory. Stories of German supply shortages—which were real—encouraged the view that the Führer would demand “concessions.” Stalin began to get reports that the German troop buildup was prelude to an “ultimatum.” The ruse, which appears to have entered the Soviet intelligence bloodstream from Kobulov via “Lycée-ist,” soon reached the despot from so many sources, so far and wide, that it came to seem an article of faith. After all, it comported with Hitler's modus operandi. It did seem to explain the buildup on the Soviet border (whose exact dimensions remained a matter of guesswork and dispute).⁷⁸ And the idea of an unprovoked war against the colossal Red Army was so preposterous that a giant bluff seemed more likely.⁷⁹

To believe—as Barbarossa secretly stipulated—that the troops were being positioned to launch a surprise attack against the USSR even before Britain had been defeated meant believing that Hitler would voluntarily open a second front. But as we saw, beginning with the December 14 message from “Lycée-ist,” Germany's disinformation operation circulated statements attributed to the high command or Hitler himself that a two-front war against Britain and the USSR was impossible, suicidal.⁸⁰ In fact, Hitler reasoned that the only way to escape a two-front war was to knock out the Soviet Union before the United States joined Britain in a genuine war in the west.^{81}

WARNINGS INTENSIFY

In February 1941, Pavlov, commander of the frontline Western military district (Belorussia), asked Stalin for nearly 1 billion rubles for radio work, and another 650 million for rails and for mobilization of high school and college students to replace the republic's dirt roads. Timoshenko answered that Stalin said, "We are not in a position to meet his fantastic proposals." Zhukov, the new chief of staff, had been summoned to Stalin's dacha on a Saturday evening to deliver a brief report, arranged by Timoshenko. In the company of the cronies, Zhukov and Timoshenko dined on thick borscht, stewed meats with buckwheat kasha, fruit, and compote, the kind of simple meal Stalin liked. As the conversation ranged over military needs, the despot relaxed, drinking Khvanchkara, a Georgian wine, joking, and exhibiting the cheerful mood that company often brought him. "Stalin said that we should think and work on the priority issues and bring them to the government for decisions," Zhukov recalled. "But in this connection we need to work from our real possibilities and not fantasize about what we cannot produce in material terms."^{82}

Even while constraining the military's limitless demands, Stalin had his secretariat on the special Kremlin phone system, driving factories beyond their limit. Where were the chassis, the motors, the trucks, the tires for the Soviet Union's mechanized divisions? The despot, meanwhile, also summoned aviation industry bosses to the Imperial Senate's Sverdlov Hall, the venue for Central Committee plenums, to hash out the issues with the newest aircraft. He paced, gripping his pipe, listening, waiting for the experts to finish before taking the floor to note that the old planes were easier to fly but easier to knock out. "Then Stalin went through the main military aircraft of the air forces of Germany, England, France, and the United States,” aviation commissar Shakhurin recalled. “He spoke about their weaponry, carrying capacities, rate of climb, maximum altitude. He did all this from memory, without any notes, which surprised the specialists and aviators present.” Stalin instructed them to “study the new planes. Learn to perfection how to fly them, to use in war their advantages over the old planes in speed and weaponry. That’s the only way.”⁸³

From February 15 to 20, 1941, Stalin convoked the 18th party conference, where he got behind a further force-march of production, especially of MiG-3 aircraft, as well as the T-34 and KV tanks. A party conference involved less rigmarole than a party congress, but it afforded him a semblance of legitimacy to make changes to the Central Committee that only a congress could authorize. He also inserted several army officers into that body, characterizing them as “modern military personnel, with an understanding of the nature of modern warfare, not old-fashioned,” a reference to Timoshenko and Zhukov, in words recorded by the Comintern’s Dimitrov. “Stalin: ‘It is a shame we failed to single out such people before. We did not know our cadres well.’” The despot also “said of Golikov that as an intelligence agent, he is inexperienced, naïve. An intelligence officer ought to be like the devil: believing no one, not even himself.”⁸⁴

Stalin added three new candidate members to the politburo: Malenkov and two Zhdanov protégés, Nikolai Voznesensky, deputy head of state planning, who had a doctorate in economics, and Alexander Shcherbakov, who, while remaining party boss of Moscow province and city, was promoted to a Central Committee secretary and handed Zhdanov’s portfolio as chief of the agitation-and-propaganda directorate.⁸⁵ Stalin also removed the state security directorate from the NKVD and made it a self-standing commissariat (NKGB). Beria’s literate minion Merkulov remained in charge, now as a full-fledged commissar, and among Merkulov’s subordinates were mostly other Beria minions, starting with NKGB deputy commissar Bogdan “Bakhcho” Kobulov, whose brother Amayak remained in Berlin as the NKGB’s intelligence chief there.⁸⁶

The intelligence kept pouring in.⁸⁷ On February 28, 1941, the Berlin military intelligence station reported that “Alta” had learned from “Aryan,” who had spoken to a person in Reich marshal Göring’s inner circle, that German military officials were cocksure a war against the USSR would be launched in 1941. “Aryan” had been the one to deliver early word of Barbarossa’s existence, and the details he now supplied were as accurate as any that would emerge about the German plan: three army groups for attacks on the axes of Leningrad (under the command of Field Marshal Wilhelm Ritter von Leeb), Minsk-Smolensk-Moscow (Field Marshal Fedor von Bock), and Kiev (Field Marshal Gerd von Rundstedt). Russian-speaking officers had been deployed to the general staff of each group. Armored trains of special gauge, capable of using Soviet rail lines, were under construction. “Hitler intends to export from Russia about 3 million slaves, in order to bring his productivity capacities to full tilt,” “Alta” further relayed from “Aryan” and “he supposedly intends to divide the Russian colossus into 20–30 different states, without concern for the retention of all the economic links within the country.” The likely invasion date was given as May 20.⁸⁸

That was not the only kind of report Stalin was receiving, however. On March 1, 1941, Nikolai Lyakhterov (“Mars”), in Budapest, reported to Moscow that “everyone considers an attack by the Germans against the USSR at the present time unimaginable before the destruction of England. The military attachés of America, Turkey, and Yugoslavia emphasize that the German army in Romania is in the first instance directed against an English invasion of the Balkans and as a countermeasure, if Turkey or the USSR moves.” He added, “After the destruction of England the Germans will attack the USSR.”⁸⁹ That same evening, Colonel Grigory Yeremin (“Yeshenko”), the peasant-born (1904) military intelligence station chief in

Bucharest under cover of embassy third secretary, reported to Moscow about a recent trip to Berlin by the Soviet agent Kurt Welkisch (“ABC”), now serving as press attaché of the German legation in Romania.⁹⁰ “In foreign ministry circles and the headquarters of the German command, where he had the opportunity to speak to some people, uncertainty prevails in the political and military position of Germany, just as lack of information does in Germany’s future intentions in the political and military spheres,” “Yeshenko” noted. “Everyone with whom [ABC] spoke expressed a different view on the plans and future course of developments in the present war.”⁹¹

All serious intelligence work involves sifting through an overwhelming flood of noise; almost never is anything “clean.” Rumormongering aims to amplify the cacophony; disinformation, to establish a false certainty. Stalin had no filter to wring out the hearsay and scrutinize the patterns of disinformation. Nor were the voluminous Soviet intelligence reports systematized anywhere. The NKGB did not even have an analytical department; military intelligence had had its department for analysis restored, but Stalin insisted on receiving the intelligence more or less directly, leaving the analytical work to himself.⁹² He obviously suspected that his adversaries were engaged in disinformation, but that suspicion, too, failed him. One of the core planks of the German whispering campaign was that Britain was trying to escape the war by provoking an armed German-Soviet clash. Stalin had assumed that for years, but now it colored his perception of all the intelligence suggesting that Hitler would attack.⁹³

To be sure, Stalin’s intelligence service was playing its own games, exaggerating American preparations for war against Germany and British strength in the Balkans.⁹⁴ But whereas Soviet deception efforts reflected Stalin’s thinking, not his adversary’s, Hitler’s disinformation caught Stalin’s thinking to a tee. Mostly, however, Soviet intelligence was spreading genuine arguments for Germany to abide by the 1939 bilateral nonaggression pact. Indeed, Stalin had little need for his own disinformation campaign. Just as in the case of Finland, only with infinitely more at stake, he was not trying to deceive. He was not seeking to cut a deal behind Hitler's back with Churchill. He was trying to avoid war and attain a new deal with Hitler. In that context, Germany's instigated chatter stressed that Germany's top leadership was divided over whether to attack the USSR, and that any provocative acts by the Soviets could play into the hands of the "militarists."

On March 6, 1941, the NKGB in Berlin reported that German economic functionaries were calculating the mother lode of raw materials and foodstuffs that could be expected from an occupation of the European part of the USSR, while the Wehrmacht was optimistic about seizing Ukraine in two to three weeks, thanks to the rail network there, and seizing Baku oil quickly as well. "Chief of staff Halder thinks that the Red Army is in no condition to mount the requisite opposition to the German forces' lightning attack."⁹⁵ On March 9, Samokhin, of military intelligence, reported out of Belgrade that, based on conversations with the minister of the court and the owner of Yugoslavia's most widely read newspaper, Politika, "the German general staff has abandoned an attack on the British Isles, and been given as its next immediate task the seizure of Ukraine and Baku, which it is supposed to carry out in April or May," and that "Hungary, Romania, and Bulgaria are now preparing for this."⁹⁶ On March 13, "Yeshenko" reported out of Bucharest that Germany intended to attack the USSR before defeating Britain. An SS officer who had arrived in Romania was heard to have boasted, "We'll continue the battle against England with airplanes and submarines. But we have 10 million lads who are itching to fight and are bored. They are thirsting for a serious foe. Our military machine cannot be unoccupied."⁹⁷ But on March 14, "Mars" reported, also out of Budapest, that a Hungarian official had summoned him to remonstrate that the rumors of pending war between Germany, Hungary, and Romania against the USSR were lies. “This is English propaganda. . . . Hungary wants to live in peace with the USSR. Germany has enough with the war with England, and is economically interested in peace with the USSR.”⁹⁸

Who had it right—before or after defeating Britain?

Hitler, through March 1941, had told only a few hundred people of Barbarossa. Germany’s formula for talks with Romania, Hungary, and Finland was not pending invasion but how the “protection of the East” was essential in order to “provide against surprises.”⁹⁹ Personnel in Göring’s air ministry were among the closest to the circles in the know, while Ribbentrop and the foreign ministry had not been directly apprised. But in early March 1941, Scheliha, the foreign ministry official with excellent military contacts, provided further information to “Alta,” who reported to Moscow that “there is a basis that speaks to an attack against Russia taking place in the nearest term (dates are named of May 15 to June 15). People are talking about a concentration of 120 divisions in Poland, about the placing of bombers at previously unoccupied aerodromes in East Prussia, intensive establishment of anti-aircraft defenses in the eastern cities of Germany, all of which testifies to the preparation of some sort of extraordinary events.” She wrote that “Aryan” insisted that “exceptionally well-informed circles of the leading political and military officialdom report unanimously that an attack on the USSR will happen this year, namely before June.”

“Aryan” had added the most crucial detail: “the concentration of Soviet forces at the frontiers arouses here a certain disquiet. People are asking, are the Russians not noticing that something is getting ready against them, and do they not plan to preempt the German strike? Some express satisfaction at this concentration, since they think that the Russian army will not be in a condition to retreat quickly.”¹⁰⁰

RESPONDING TO THE GERMAN BUILDUP

On March 10, amid all the contradictory warnings, Stalin created a new body, the “bureau” of the Council of People’s Commissars. It consisted of the chairman, Molotov, and his deputies and could make decisions in the name of the full council (a prerogative Stalin himself had inserted in the decree).^{101} The despot also assigned Molotov a new first deputy chairman, Voznesensky, a member of the next generation whom Stalin advanced above Mikoyan and Kaganovich. “What shocked us about the composition of the bureau leadership was that Voznesensky became first deputy,” Mikoyan would recall later in life. “Stalin’s motives in this leapfrogging were incomprehensible. But Voznesensky in his naïveté was very pleased about his appointment.”^{102}

The next day, Roosevelt’s latest brainstorm to help Britain was signed into American law. Unlike Nazi Germany, the UK was not de facto bankrupt and had been buying American supplies and war matériel under a program known as cash and carry (paying up front and assuming responsibility for transportation). But Britain had begun to run low on cash, and Roosevelt introduced the idea of Lend-Lease (“An Act to Promote the Defense of the United States”), which allowed him to “sell, transfer title to, exchange, lease, lend, or otherwise dispose of, to any such government [whose defense the President deems vital to the defense of the United States] any defense article.” The law soon would be applied to China, too. Hitler ordered stronger efforts “to bring Japan into active operations in the Far East as soon as possible,” so that “the focal point of the interests of the United States will be diverted to the Pacific.”^{103}

Also on March 11, 1941, a long-gestating refinement of the Soviet war plan was submitted. A month before, Zhukov, following his replacement of Meretskov as chief of staff, had ordered the chief of the operations directorate, Major General Alexander Vasilevsky, to revise the main mobilization orders (which dated to November 1937) that accompanied the war plan. Known as the Mobilization Plan for 1941 (MP-41), it was based upon a wartime strength of 300 fully equipped divisions, including 60 tank divisions, and 8.7 million troops—a doubling of the already recently doubled Red Army—which were to come into existence by January 1942.¹⁰⁴ Tactically, this mobilization plan for an army that did not yet exist in this size was based upon extreme forward defense and a quick Soviet counteroffensive (approximately two thirds of the divisions were to be stationed in the western military districts). MP-41 reflected Stalin's vision of a possible war: all offense and all in, with wishful-thinking production targets for tanks and aircraft, little allotment for second- and third-echelon strategic reserves for a protracted battle, and the war not commencing this year.

Now, the new war plan itself, occupying some fifteen pages on defense commissariat stationery, in exquisite penmanship, was marked, as per custom, "Top Secret. Very Urgent. Exclusively Personal. The Only Copy." Following the experience of the January war games, it reconfirmed Kiev as the main axis of hostilities, making explicit, unlike previous war plans, that "Germany will most likely deploy its main forces in the southeast, from Siedlce [in eastern Poland] to Hungary, in order to seize the Ukraine by means of a blow to Berdichev and Kiev." This conclusion reflected the accumulating Soviet intelligence reports. But the southern axis was definitively assumed to be the main thrust of the German attack because the anticipated quick Soviet counteroffensive would have a far easier time navigating enemy territory below the Pripet Marshes. It traced the Soviets' long-standing favored strike line, the so-called Lvov protrusion, on the Kraków-Katowice salient, where German defense lines were not as formidable as in East Prussia and where the terrain was conducive to tank armies.¹⁰⁵ Massed in Ukraine, Red Army forces, after blasting through, were to encircle, from behind, the German armies concentrated farther north, while severing links with Germany's Balkan allies, oil, and foodstuffs farther south. The text, however, admitted that “the general staff of the Red Army does not possess documentary data on the plans of likely adversaries either in the West or in the East.”¹⁰⁶

Timoshenko and Zhukov discussed the draft at length in the Little Corner on March 17, with a large number of military and industrial officials, and again on the 18th in a narrower group. They had already beseeched Stalin for authorization to summon Soviet reservists immediately, to fill out the existing divisions in frontier districts. A decree approved the call-up of 975,870 reservists during the course of 1941, in phases, through the fall, but the despot insisted it be done quietly, under the pretext of training exercises. Troops were shipped in trains boarded up with plywood, and even the commanders did not know their points of disembarkation.¹⁰⁷ Beyond wanting to deny warmongers on the German side any excuse to attack, Stalin continued to adhere to the widespread belief that even though, in summer 1914, imperial Russia’s mobilization had been defensive and precautionary, it had inexorably led the country to war.¹⁰⁸

INHIBITIONS

Stalin was the only one in the Soviet regime to receive the full gamut of intelligence reports, but even he did not see everything. In the first half of 1941, Soviet military intelligence would receive 267 reports from its agents abroad and convey 129 of these to the military and political leadership.¹⁰⁹ (Beria at civilian intelligence might have been an even more consequential filter.) Functionaries in despotic systems often shrink from supplying the despot with information they know he will not welcome.¹¹⁰ After the terror, it took special courage or naïveté to bring Stalin news he did not want to hear.¹¹¹ On March 20, 1941, Golikov sent him one of the first systematic summaries by Soviet intelligence, this one concerning German forces and their dislocation. Tupikov, in Berlin, had produced a 100-page overview of Germany's military.¹¹² Golikov's summary conveyed Tupikov's analysis of a large concentration of German forces near the frontier and concluded that, "according to the report of our military attaché in Berlin, we can expect the onset of military action against the USSR between May 15 and June 15."

Knowing the despot's beliefs firsthand, Golikov walked a fine line, writing that an attack would likely come "after victory over England or after the conclusion with her of an honorable peace for Germany." He also wrote that "the majority of the espionage material concerning the possibilities of war with the USSR in the spring of 1941 emanates from Anglo-American sources whose aim today is doubtless to endeavor to worsen relations between the USSR and Germany." Nonetheless, Golikov added, "considering the origins and development of fascism, and its aims—implementing the plans of Hitler that were laid out in full and flowery [exposition] in his book Mein Kampf—a short outline of all agent material in hand for the period July 1940–March 1941 to a degree deserves serious attention." He sketched a simultaneous assault by three German army groups along three axes: north (Leningrad), center (Moscow), and south (Kiev). Here was the accurate picture of Barbarossa that had been reported by "Aryan."¹¹³

While Pavel Fitin, of NKGB civilian intelligence, had no access to Stalin, reporting instead to Beria and Merkulov, Golikov did have to face the despot occasionally.¹¹⁴ All five of Golikov's immediate predecessors had been executed. His March 20, 1941, summary, mangled with caveats, nonetheless constituted a bold step. But then, in his conclusion, Golikov repudiated his report's vital content: "The rumors and documents attesting to the inevitability of war against the USSR this spring need to be assessed as disinformation coming from English and even perhaps German intelligence."¹¹⁵

German planes were crossing Soviet frontiers at altitudes of seven miles, out of artillery range but perfect for photographing Soviet military installations and deployments. When confronted about their violations of Soviet airspace, the Germans would point to their military schools near the border and assert that trainee pilots were losing their way. “Elder,” in Göring’s air ministry, provided unique information, however, which the Berlin NKGB (March 24) reported to Moscow, about intensive compilations of Soviet targets, including bridges to cut the movement of reserves. “Photographs of Soviet cities and other objects are regularly coming into aviation HQ,” the report stated, and the German military attaché in Moscow was traveling around by car to verify the locations of Soviet electrical stations for bombing. “Officers at HQ have formed the opinion that military action against the USSR has been set for the end of April or early May. These dates are connected to a German intention to secure the harvest for themselves, calculating that Soviet forces under retreat will not be able to burn the green wheat.”¹¹⁶

Around this time, a German printer evidently provided the Soviet embassy in Berlin with a book, scheduled for a massive print run, with Latin transliterations of Russian phrases: “Where is the chairman of the collective farm?” “Are you a Communist?” “Hands up!”¹¹⁷

On March 28, at 5:00 p.m. Berlin time, Dekanozov’s secretary at the embassy received an anonymous tip: “Around May a war will begin against Russia,” the caller, speaking in German, stated, then hung up.¹¹⁸ In Moscow that same day, Stalin sought to squeeze ever more blood from a stone, convening the chemical industry bosses—the commissar, his deputies, factory directors—in the Little Corner. The Soviet Union had still not fully mastered production of tires from synthetic rubber, even though it had invented the latter.¹¹⁹ Stalin laced into Nikolai Patolichev, a peasant’s son (b. 1908) who had been orphaned at twelve, then started working at a factory and, following the terror, in 1939, became party boss of Yaroslavl province, site of the rubber industry. Patolichev, one of Stalin's "new people," had just become a full member of the Central Committee. "Stalin used sharp expressions and I honestly did not know how this conversation was going to end for me," Patolichev would recall. "Stalin paced in silence, thinking. The minutes seemed incredibly long." Finally the despot, smiling, announced the formation of a commission of Patolichev, Khrushchev, and Nikolai Bulganin to get the chemical commissariat to ramp up production.^{120}

BALKAN TREACHERY

Under very intense German pressure, Bulgaria had joined the Axis, alongside Hungary, Slovakia, and Romania. This left just two nonaligned states in southeastern Europe: Greece, which was under military assault by Italy, and Yugoslavia. The Yugoslav regent, the Oxford-educated Prince Paul, who ruled for the seventeen-year-old King Petar II, was pressured into signing on to the Axis on March 25. Almost immediately thereafter, at 2:15 a.m. on March 27, 1941, Serbian air force officers overthrew him. Eden telegraphed "provisional authority" to the British envoy in Belgrade "to do what he thought fit to further a change of Government, even at the risk of precipitating a German attack."^{121} But although Britain intelligence supported the coup, it was a Yugoslav initiative.^{122} A delighted Churchill, content to see the Serbs do the fighting, wrote that "Hitler had been stung to the quick."^{123} Golikov sent Stalin, Molotov, Beria, and Timoshenko a detailed report on March 28, 1940, claiming that "German circles were dumbfounded."^{124}

Hitler fulminated against the British for pulling the strings, and in his fury, on that very day (March 27), he issued Directive No. 25, "to destroy Yugoslavia militarily and as a state."^{125} On March 30, some 250 field marshals, generals, admirals, and staff officers, seated by rank and seniority, secretly gathered for breakfast in the Great Hall of the New Reich

Chancellery, where Hitler delivered a two-hour harangue laying out his case for an invasion of the USSR. “The Russian is inferior,” he stated. “The army is without leadership,” while “armament capacities [are] not very good.” Stalin, Hitler allowed, was “clever,” but the Soviet leader “had gambled on Germany’s bleeding to death in the autumn of 1939.” He emphasized that “this is a war of annihilation. If we do not grasp this, we shall still beat the enemy, but thirty years later we shall again have to fight the Communist enemy.” Captured commissars were to be “eliminated immediately by the troops.” Indeed, “one of the sacrifices which commanders have to make is to overcome any scruples they might have.”¹²⁶

German embassy staff in Belgrade were ordered to leave on April 2 (the ambassador had been recalled for consultations) and to warn “friendly” embassies to do likewise.¹²⁷ The Yugoslav minister in Moscow, Milan Gavrilović, effectively a Soviet agent, was instructed by Molotov to have a delegation come to Moscow immediately to conduct secret negotiations for a “military and political pact.”¹²⁸ Schulenburg, summoned to the Kremlin on April 4, warned Molotov that “the moment chosen by the Soviet Union for negotiation of such a treaty had been very unfortunate.” Molotov replied that Yugoslav accession to the Tripartite Pact with Germany could remain in force.¹²⁹ On April 4, “Sophocles” reported out of Belgrade on German troops massing on the border with Yugoslavia, and conversations to the effect of “Keep in mind that in May we’ll start a war against the USSR, and within seven days we’ll be in Moscow; while it is not too late, join us.”¹³⁰ Stalin knew what was coming: on April 5, “Alta” learned from “Aryan” of Germany’s imminent invasion of Yugoslavia and summoned her handler, Zaitsev (“Bine”), to a Berlin cinema; “Bine” hurried to the Soviet embassy to inform Tupikov (“Arnold”), who reported to Moscow that a German invasion of Yugoslavia would take place the next morning, April 6, and that Berlin was reckoning on the destruction of Yugoslavia in fourteen days.^{131}

Molotov, Gavrilović, and two other members of the Yugoslav delegation, with Stalin present, signed a “treaty of friendship and non-aggression” (though not an alliance) in Molotov’s Kremlin office at around 3:00 a.m. on April 6.^{132} At the improvised banquet, which lasted until 7:00 a.m., Molotov promised armaments, munitions, and planes. When Gavrilović asked Stalin if he had heard the rumors of a pending invasion of the USSR, the despot put on a show of confidence. “Let them come,” he said. “We have strong nerves.”^{133}

Soviet radio announced the treaty that morning, and Izvestiya published it later that day, with oversized photographs. But before dawn, the Luftwaffe had already begun bombing Yugoslavia (between 3,000 and 4,000 civilians would be incinerated), and Wehrmacht ground forces—retrieved from the border with the Soviet Union—had burst across the Yugoslav frontier. At 4:00 p.m. Moscow time on the 6th, a Sunday, Schulenburg finally was able to read out to Molotov an official note regarding the German military action. “It was extremely deplorable that an expansion of the war turned out to be inevitable after all,” Molotov repeated several times, according to the German account.^{134} When, a bit later that night, Gavrilović called on the foreign affairs commissar to discuss the promised war matériel—including antitank guns and aircraft—Molotov observed that there “would be a considerable delay in such deliveries as the Soviet Union might agree to make, and that there were serious transport problems.”^{135}

Stalin had evidently expected that a Balkan war in the rough mountainous terrain, against valiant Serbs, would last several months, bogging the Germans down long enough to render impossible a spring–summer invasion of the USSR and gifting him another year to prepare Soviet defenses.^{136} By April 13, however, Wehrmacht troops had already seized Belgrade.¹³⁷ The Wehrmacht, while losing fewer than 200 dead, took more than 300,000 Yugoslav soldiers and officers prisoner. The Soviets effectively abandoned Yugoslavia's Communists, the most powerful pro-Soviet movement remaining in Europe, to their own devices.

On April 12, the dramatist Vishnevsky was at the Kremlin in a small group to see Voroshilov for a discussion of a film based on one of his plays. Voroshilov observed that "Stalin said of the war, 'The Germans are seizing the Balkans. They act boldly. The English send forces to the Balkans as if teasing the Yugoslavs and Greeks.'" Vishnevsky recounted, "We moved on to the Hitler theme: the guy turned out to be far smarter and more serious than we supposed. A great mind, strength. Let them fault him: a maniac, a ruffian, expansionist, and so on, but in fact, a genius, strength. We listened attentively. A sober assessment of the potential enemy." Voroshilov continued: "There are rumors, indirect so far, that Hitler will move in the direction of Ukraine and the Caucasus. Either they are trying to intimidate or, perhaps"—here Vishnevsky noted that Voroshilov took a moment to reflect—"it is a fact. But the Red Army will present difficulties for him." Vishnevsky concluded: "Voroshilov does not doubt our strength. But once more he underscored the complete unreliability of the English."¹³⁸ needed to secure his right flank, adding to the impression that the German campaigns could be construed as part of a still operative “peripheral strategy” against Britain in the Mediterranean. The British position was certainly further imperiled by the Balkan conquests.¹⁴⁰ But the Soviet Union’s was even more so.

Germany had also declared war on Greece on April 6, to rescue Mussolini's failed invasion (launched back on October 28, 1940). German troops, pouring in via Bulgaria, halted a Greek offensive, and by April 27 the swastika rose over the Acropolis. Mussolini's army had suffered 154,172 dead, wounded, and sick, and the Greek army about 90,000 casualties. German losses for Yugoslavia and Greece combined were 2,559 killed, 5,820 wounded, and 3,169 missing. While Italy occupied the Greek mainland and the Bulgarians hastily went into Thrace, German forces occupied Athens, Thessaloniki, central Macedonia, Crete, and other Aegean islands, taking 218,000 Greek and 9,000 British prisoners.¹³⁹ In both Greece and Yugoslavia, Hitler significantly overcommitted the forces

CHURCHILL TO STALIN

High frequencies had been introduced for wireless in the mid-1930s, and one result was that more and more ciphered diplomatic and military traffic was intercepted, albeit not always decoded. Remarkably, British intelligence, with valuable assistance from the Poles, had broken the German code machine, an upgrade in complexity to the commercially available Enigma system.¹⁴¹ Without letting on to his unique source, Churchill, on April 3, 1941, had seen fit to send a telegram to the British embassy in Moscow, instructing the ambassador, Cripps, to deliver it to Stalin personally. The context was the German pressure to force Yugoslavia to join the Axis. “I have sure information from a trusted agent,” Churchill wrote, “that when the Germans thought they had got Yugoslavia in the net, that is to say after March 20, they began to move three out of five panzer divisions from Romania to southern Poland. The moment they heard of the Serbian revolution this movement was countermanded. Your excellency will appreciate the significance of these facts.”¹⁴² Churchill, using terseness to maximize impact, meant to imply that Germany was much weaker than it seemed, as shown by its having to shift troops around, and that Stalin should take advantage of an opportunity to take on Germany while it was occupied in Yugoslavia and Greece (conveniently aiding the British position).¹⁴³

Cripps had long been convinced that the Germans would attack the Soviet Union, and that a British-Soviet alliance was necessary and possible. At a press conference for British and American journalists back on March 11, he had warned, off the record, that “Soviet-German relations are decidedly worsening. . . . A Soviet-German war is unavoidable.”¹⁴⁴ The NKGB, five days later, had reported his words.¹⁴⁵ Stalin also read the special “Red TASS” translations of the foreign press—available for the highest echelons of the party-state—and he could see how the British press openly mused about Ukraine serving as a “training ground” for German tanks, and the “inevitability” of a German-Soviet war.¹⁴⁶ For Stalin, Cripps’s statements, too, were yet another “British provocation” to instigate war. Cripps—despite his own stumbling—understood that Stalin would also see Churchill’s telegram in the same light, so he had not passed it on, advising London that Stalin was inundated with warnings and that Churchill’s too brief message, for a host of reasons, would be “not only ineffectual but a serious tactical mistake.” Churchill insisted he proceed.¹⁴⁷ Cripps had not been able to see Stalin since his first audience after being appointed ambassador; he could not even get to Molotov, so he handed the cryptic message to Vyshinsky, deputy foreign affairs commissar, on April 19, after Germany had effectively decided the fate of Yugoslavia and Greece.¹⁴⁸

Neither in the original cryptic text nor in the clumsy way it was communicated did Churchill “warn” Stalin of an impending German attack. On the contrary, the result proved worse than Cripps had feared, and he was the well-intentioned culprit. The day before, on April 18, Cripps, on his own initiative, had handed Vyshinsky a long memorandum addressed to Molotov (the only way he could communicate with him), which outlined the dilemmas facing the USSR, then issued a threat meant as an inducement toward rapprochement, to the effect that it was “not outside the bounds of possibility, if the war were protracted for a long period, that there might be a temptation for Great Britain (and especially for certain circles in Great Britain) to come to some arrangement to end the war.”¹⁴⁹

COUP DE MAIN

Yōsuke Matsuoka had embarked on the first trip outside the empire by a Japanese foreign minister since 1907, a six-week sojourn that brought him to Moscow (twice), Berlin (twice), Rome, and Vichy. Sorge, based on a conversation between Ozaki, Sorge's informant, and Prime Minister Konoe, had delivered the inside story: Matsuoka was to determine whether Hitler intended to invade Britain or not—Konoe feared a German-British deal—and was given wide latitude to conclude a bilateral pact with the USSR.¹⁵⁰ Stalin found Japan's authoritarianism difficult to fathom, with its myriad centers of power, ostensibly rogue military commanders, and a mystifying emperor system (a “god” who reigned but did not exactly rule). What he did know was that the Japanese foreign ministry was now the one offering the USSR a nonaggression pact, hoping to exact a Soviet promise to cease aiding Chiang Kai-shek. But the Soviets would agree to sign only if Japan returned Southern Sakhalin and the Kuril Islands; otherwise, they suggested a neutrality pact, provided Japan would relinquish its oil and coal leases on Soviet-controlled Northern Sakhalin. The Japanese had asked the Soviets to sell them Northern Sakhalin. “Is that a joke?” Molotov responded.

Having ascertained the Soviet bottom line, Matsuoka departed Moscow. In Berlin, Ribbentrop tried to dissuade him from signing any conclusive agreement with the USSR. Matsuoka, for his part, learned definitively that the Nazis would not be invading Britain—Japan would be on its own in taking on the Anglo-Americans—but that an invasion of the USSR was in the cards. He played a double game with the Germans regarding Japan's intentions, payback for the 1939 surprise Hitler-Stalin Pact.¹⁵¹

On his way home, Matsuoka returned to Moscow on the day Nazi Germany invaded Yugoslavia and Greece. Soviet negotiators were still demanding territorial concessions. Stalin intervened, receiving the Japanese on April 12 at the Near Dacha—unprecedented for a foreigner. The two evidently shared a rant against Britain and the United States. In the Kremlin the next day, Molotov and Matsuoka signed a neutrality pact vowing “to maintain peaceful and friendly relations” and remain neutral should either of them “become the object of hostilities on the part of one or several third powers.”¹⁵² It had taken eighteen months of talks about fishing rights and territories. In a separate declaration, the USSR recognized the territorial integrity of Manchukuo; Japan, of Mongolia.¹⁵³ Stalin would continue to aid China militarily.¹⁵⁴ A lubricated feast was laid on. With the Japanese foreign minister scheduled to depart that same day (April 13), the 4:55 p.m. Trans-Siberian was held up.

After Matsuoka had arrived at Moscow’s Yaroslavl Station, Stalin, in full view of the diplomatic corps, appeared, striding down the platform in his long military-style overcoat to see him off. An evidently tipsy despot placed his arms around the German ambassador, Schulenburg, telling him, “We should remain friends, and now you need to do everything for that!” When Stalin spotted a six-foot-tall German in full dress uniform (acting military attaché Colonel Hans Krebs), he tapped him on the chest. “German?” he asked. After an affirmative reply, Stalin slapped him on the back, took Krebs’s hand in both of his, and said, “We’ll remain friends, no matter what.” Krebs answered loudly: “I am convinced of that.” The schoolmarmish Molotov, staggering a few paces behind Stalin, “kept saluting all the time, shouting the motto of the Soviet scouts: “I am a Pioneer, I am [always] ready.” Stalin, escorting Matsuoka to his carriage, was heard to say, “We shall organize Europe and Asia.”¹⁵⁵

MASTER OF CEREMONIES

On April 18, Fitin sent Merkulov a report from “Lycée-ist” out of Berlin, conveying that an inside source had told him that Göring’s inner circle “was very worried about the problem of grain reserves in Germany,” especially after supplying 2 million tons to Spain and 1.5 million to France. “On its territory Germany cannot gather the quantity of wheat necessary to meet its minimal needs in 1941–1942. . . . It must seek new sources for wheat. According to German calculations, ‘an independent Ukrainian state,’ governed by Germans, with German organization and technology, can in the next two years not only meet the needs of Germany but satisfy the needs of the European continent.”¹⁵⁶ Did this mean outright seizure of Ukraine, or a demand for a “lease”? On April 20, “Yeshenko” reported from Bucharest on the movement of German troops from Yugoslavia back toward the Soviet frontier in Romania, and Antonescu’s increasing war preparations to retrieve Bessarabia.¹⁵⁷

The next day saw the annual commemoration of Lenin’s death at the Bolshoi and the culmination of a Ten-Day festival of Tajik art (April 12–21, 1941) in Moscow, involving some 750 participants.¹⁵⁸ Stalin attended the Tajik ballet Du Gul (“Two Roses”) and the concert finale at the Bolshoi, lingering after the performance until 2:00 a.m. He hosted the Tajik delegation on April 22 at the Kremlin, regaling attendees with stories about Matsuoka and Lenin. “We are . . . the students of the great Lenin,” the despot told the Tajiks. “I, as a Bolshevik, must say it is necessary to remember this man, who trained us, forged us, led us, made us into people, taught us not to know fear in struggle.” Stalin continued: “He created a new ideology of humanity, an ideology of friendship and love among peoples, equality among races. An ideology that holds one race above others and calls for other races to be subordinated to that race is a moribund ideology; it cannot last long.” After this reference to Nazism, Stalin concluded that “the Tajik people is a distinctive one, with an old, rich culture. It stands higher than the Uzbeks and Kazakhs.”¹⁵⁹

Stalin finished with the Tajiks around midnight and proceeded to host a banquet for the winners of the new Stalin Prize. There were some seventy-five in industrial processes and design, including Alexander

Yakovlev and Sergei Ilyushin (aircraft design) and Alexei Favorsky (synthetic rubber), more than forty in science, including Nikolai Burdenko (surgery), Ivan Vinogradov (mathematics), Pyotr Kapitsa (physics), and Trofim Lysenko (agricultural sciences), and more than one hundred in the arts: Grigory Alexandrov, Isaac Dunayevsky, and Lyubov Orlova (for the musicals Circus and Volga-Volga); Sergei Eisenstein (for Alexander Nevsky, which was still not being shown on screens); Mikhail Romm and his collaborators (Lenin in October); the composer Aram Khachaturyan (a violin concerto); Mark Reizen, the opera singer; Shostakovich (a piano quintet); novelist Mikhail Sholokhov; Aleksei Tolstoy for Peter the Great; Olga Lepeshinskaya, for ballet; Vera Mukhina, the hammer-and-sickle sculptor; Uzeyir Hajibeyov, for the opera Koroglu; Alla Tarasova, the theater actress; the crooner Ivan Kozlovsky (“On a Moonlit Night”); Alexander Gerasimov, for the painting Stalin and Voroshilov in the Kremlin; and Mikheil Gelovani, the actor who played Stalin. The cash components were enormous (up to 100,000 rubles for Stalin Prize “first class,” 50,000 for “second”).^{160}

The celebration lasted until 7:00 a.m. “The whole time Stalin was unusually animated, cheerful, hospitable,” according to the court dramaturge Nikolai Virtá (Karelsky), who won a Stalin Prize for his novel Solitude. “No one escaped his attention; he spoke with this one and that, laughing and joking, sharing his cigarettes with the smokers, praising one of the guests who declared he does not smoke.” Films were shown, including Volga-Volga, which Stalin knew by heart; he sat next to a Tajik actress. Alexandrov, the director, in answer to Stalin’s query, revealed that Orlova, his actress wife, had had her voice dubbed for the singing. “She has a remarkable voice; we need to think about how to afford her wide possibilities for the realization of her talent,” Stalin said. Virtá wrote that the leader “proposed that everyone dance; he listened to a famous singer and applauded his rumbling bass.” Stalin “spoke about Hamlet with the actors of the Moscow Art Theater, about politics and literature, about the construction of one factory, about films and songs, about international affairs.”¹⁶¹

AMERICA'S WARNINGS

The Americans, too, had learned the world's most important secret. A high German economic official from Weimar days, Erwin Respondek, who had been tasked with preparing the currency for the occupied Soviet Union, arranged meetings with the U.S. commercial attaché in a darkened cinema and passed him word of the invasion planning. In early 1941, Respondek had prepared the first of several detailed memoranda for the United States outlining the steps being taken for the destruction of the Soviet Union and “a rigorous liquidation of Bolshevism, all its political and other institutions, and, in particular, the ‘extermination’ of its leaders by the SS.” Respondek, whose key contact was General Halder, had proved a reliable source till now, but officials in Washington were beginning to suspect that he was a plant. After internal debate, Roosevelt had undersecretary of state Sumner Welles tell Konstantin Umansky, the Soviet envoy in Washington, that the United States “has come into possession of information which it regards as authentic, clearly indicating that it is the intention of Germany to attack the Soviet Union.” Umansky blanched. He promised to convey the information to Moscow—and promptly informed the German ambassador to Washington (whether under Moscow's instructions or in order to score points by anticipating Kremlin wishes). On March 1, 1941, after further secret reports prepared by Respondek, Welles tried once more to warn Umansky about the coming invasion. His last effort took place on March 20.¹⁶²

U.S. intelligence had been able to confirm Respondek's tips, for they had broken Japanese codes in September 1940 and, after Major General Hiroshi Ōshima, Japan's onetime ambassador to Berlin, had been returned to the Nazi capital, thanks to Matsuoka, the Americans gleaned a mother lode of intelligence: the staunchly pro-German Ōshima, who spoke the language nearly perfectly, was taken into the confidences of Ribbentrop and Hitler. (Ōshima had been able, in February, to present his credentials at the Berghof.) In April 1941, U.S. cryptographers finished decoding long messages sent from Matsuoka's late-March visit with Hitler. "Göring was outlining to Ōshima Germany's plans to attack Russia . . . , giving the number of planes and numbers and types of divisions to be used for this drive and that," recalled one of the cryptographers. "I was too excited for sleep that night." The United States passed additional warnings to Umansky. But he would tell the press that "information presented to the Soviet Union in London and Washington is aimed at provoking a conflict between Germany and the USSR."¹⁶³

ATTEMPTED DETERRENCE

Dekanozov, from Berlin, sent the foreign ministry a special report in April 1941 noting that rumors and information about a pending war between the USSR and Germany "are coming to us every day from various channels" and calling the pressure a deliberate "war of nerves." Listing a dozen or so examples, he stated that the goal of Germany was "an attack on the USSR already during the course of the current war against England."¹⁶⁴ On April 15, in the area of Rovno, in western Ukraine, after one German reconnaissance plane performed a forced landing, the crew was found to possess "a camera, some rolls of used film, and a torn topographical map . . . of the USSR, all of which gives evidence of the crew's aim." The NKGB detained four officers in leather coats lacking insignias; supposedly, they had been unable to destroy their film in time. Once developed, it showed bridges and rail lines along the Kiev axis, while the map turned out to be of Ukraine's Chernigov province. It was as if the Germans wanted the Soviets to believe that Ukraine was their main target.^{165}

On April 21, the Soviet foreign affairs commissariat protested German violations of its airspace—some eighty incidents over the preceding three weeks alone. The German chargé d'affaires, Werner von Tippelskirch, who received the diplomatic note, warned Berlin “to expect likely serious incidents if German airplanes continue to violate Soviet borders.”^{166} He was dead wrong. Stalin had begun to unblock shipments to Germany in mid-April—Soviet oil deliveries doubled from the previous month—signaling that the Germans could get what they needed without war (or, conversely, that if Hitler attacked, he would lose the valued goods the Soviets were supplying).^{167} Stalin also abruptly ended Soviet objections to the German position demanding small changes to their common border.^{168} To be sure, the despot understood that too many concessions would be perceived as weakness. And so, by not interdicting German overflights, he was effectively allowing the Germans to see what they would face.^{169}

“We must hope for the best and prepare for the worst,” Chamberlain had said of appeasement, which would have been a good idea, especially if he had done what he said and pursued both rearmament and diplomacy, but the former remained very partial.^{170} Stalin pursued rearmament vigorously. As a result, the Soviet people stood in queues for hours upon hours to obtain necessities, and often they could still not meet their minimum needs.^{171} Germany had shown the Soviets their military production facilities, where the Soviets shopped as part of their bilateral trade agreement. Stalin, under no obligation to reciprocate, since the Germans were buying raw materials, nonetheless showed them Soviet military factories. He allowed a tour of the chief aviation factories, including the one building the Petlyakov Pe-8 bombers, which caused a sensation: it had a longer range than the German Junkers.¹⁷² In April 1941, during a visit to one such factory, the aircraft designer Artyom Mikoyan told Schulenburg—who, as expected, passed the words on to Berlin that same month—“You saw the awesome technology of the Soviet country. We will bravely repel any strike no matter where it might emanate from.”¹⁷³

Stalin was demonstrating not just his willingness to bargain, but also his possession of a mighty arsenal and weapons-manufacturing capacity.¹⁷⁴ “They let us see everything,” Krebs, the Russian-speaking German deputy military attaché in Moscow, wrote to Berlin in the middle of a tour of the five biggest Soviet aviation factories. “Clearly Russia wants to frighten possible aggressors.”¹⁷⁵ Schulze-Boysen (“Elder”), the spy in the Nazi air ministry, reported that “the Germans did not expect to encounter such well-organized and functioning industry. A number of the objects shown to them proved to be a big surprise. For example, the Germans did not know about the existence of a 1,200-horsepower plane engine. . . . A big impression was made by the mass of more than 300 I-18 planes. . . . The Germans did not suppose that in the USSR the serial production of such planes in such high numbers had been established.” Krebs concluded that the German general staff “was depressed.”¹⁷⁶ Stalin’s spies also told him that German war games had revealed to the German general staff the logistical problems of waging a prolonged war against the Soviets, and, in parallel, he ordered that Hitler’s military attaché be taken deep into the Soviet rear to be shown the mass production of T-34 tanks.¹⁷⁷

But Hitler, once apprised, was reinforced in his view that the USSR was arming on a massive scale and needed to be attacked before it was too late.¹⁷⁸ At the same time, whereas Germany’s military intelligence had had next to no useful information about the Red Army’s armaments or troop locations before it ramped up high-altitude reconnaissance flights, in January 1941, now they had it in abundance.¹⁷⁹

CACOPHONY

In Berlin, fewer and fewer German businessmen were appearing at the Soviet trade mission. The NKVD reported that over the past year and a quarter, it had captured 66 German spy handlers and 1,596 German agents, including 1,338 in western Ukraine, Belarus, and the Baltics, with hundreds of incidents of live fire at the border. Over the first four months of 1941, at least 17,000 trains were reported to have ferried German troops and heavy weapons to Soviet frontiers.¹⁸⁰ Was it certain war? Internally, the British had dismissed the intelligence regarding Hitler's preparations for a war against the Soviet Union, but now, thanks to the Enigma decoding, they had discovered that Hitler was ordering more and more of the Luftwaffe transferred eastward, away from bombing sites for the UK. Still, the British attributed the eastern buildup to a "war of nerves" being waged to force concessions from Stalin.

Stalin knew that the Germans had ceased using the Trans-Siberian to transport their diplomatic pouches to and from Tokyo, and Sorge reported (April 17) that the Germans would also cease to use the Trans-Siberian for the import of critical rubber from Japan. But Sorge undercut this message, noting that "the tension in relations between Germany and the USSR was decreasing," which meant the Germans might not follow through on their intention to cease using the Trans-Siberian. He also wrote of supposed factionalism within Nazi ruling circles and suggested that the "pro-war faction" had not gained ascendancy. Sorge added: "The German embassy [in Tokyo] received a telegram from Ribbentrop stating that Germany would not launch a war against the USSR if the latter did not provoke it. But if the war turned out to be provoked, then it would be short and end with the severe defeat of the USSR. The German general staff has completed all preparations.”^{181}

On April 22, Sándor Radó (“Dora”), a Hungarian Communist and Soviet military intelligence operative, reported from Geneva a date of June 15 for an attack on Ukraine. On April 23, Stalin and Molotov decreed the formation of large numbers of new artillery and parachute units with forced production of equipment.^{182} The next day, Stalin phoned Ilya Ehrenburg to tell him that the second and third parts of his anti-German novel, The Fall of Paris, would now be published. Only four days earlier, Ehrenburg had been informed that the censor had rejected it.^{183} Rumors spread that the despot had personally approved the antifascist book.^{184} On April 25, Golikov estimated the presence of 100 German divisions on the USSR’s western frontiers, an increase from the previous month. On April 25–26, some three and a half months into his work, Tupikov sent a long message to Golikov on Germany’s buildup in the east, stating plainly that the Soviets were the “next enemy” in German war planning, and that “the timing for the beginning of a conflict could possibly be near and, for sure, during the course of this year.”^{185}

A worried Schulenburg, in mid-April, had engaged his staff to draft a long memorandum arguing against a titanic war and, with the facilitation of Ribbentrop and Weizsäcker, who also thought the war a mistake, had traveled to Berlin, but Hitler put off seeing him for two weeks. Finally, on April 28, the Führer granted an audience. Schulenburg’s memo was sitting on Hitler’s desk (he made no mention of it). Schulenburg evidently stated that “Stalin was prepared to make even further concessions to us,” including ramping up to 5 million tons of grain the next year. In fact, Mikoyan could barely find, let alone transport, 2.5 million tons of grain, and it was not clear how the Germans could pay for more grain without yielding vital armaments. Hitler, noncommittal and discourteous, said at parting, “Oh, one more thing: I do not intend a war against Russia!”^{186}

In London, Maisky was effectively paralyzed by Stalin's position vis-à-vis Britain. On April 30, Churchill's private secretary told the Soviet envoy, "In Conservative circles, one hears the following argument. If Germany attacks the Soviet Union (as many now believe will happen), the USSR will come to us of its own accord. If Germany does not attack the USSR, it will do nothing for us anyway. So is it worth courting the USSR?" Maisky burst out laughing.¹⁸⁷

That same day, "Elder" reported to Moscow, based on conversations in Göring's air ministry with the liaison to the foreign ministry, that "the question of the German attack against the USSR has been definitively decided and its onset can be expected any day. Ribbentrop, who until now had not been a supporter of an offensive against the USSR, knowing Hitler's firm resolve on this question, has taken the position of support for an attack on the USSR."¹⁸⁸ "Elder" was spot-on: that very day, Hitler settled on a date fifty-three days hence—June 22.

Neither the German invasion of Greece ("Marita") to compensate for Mussolini's failures nor of Yugoslavia (Operation "25") had a material effect on Barbarossa. Many of the divisions earmarked to take part in the Balkans never saw fighting; some were never even sent. Before May was over, all German units that had taken part in the Balkan campaign were back at their positions on the Soviet border.¹⁸⁹ The delay by about five weeks from the original target stemmed mostly from deficits of key equipment in what, after all, was a colossal undertaking. Indeed, "Corsican" had reported (April 28) that Germany was experiencing severe shortages—and therefore would need to expand economic relations with Japan and the Soviet Union, in the latter case "by force." He had heard one top German official state that "the Russians must supply Germany with more raw materials and foodstuffs, without demanding that Germany had to fulfill Soviet orders exactly or by short deadlines."¹⁹⁰ "Elder," too, reported the possibility of Germany engaging in blackmail. The ultimatum canard—which never formed part of Hitler’s plans—had contaminated even the best-placed, most reliable Soviet spies.^{191}

NO ARMY IS INVINCIBLE

On May 4, Hitler delivered a peroration to the Reichstag detailing how he had smashed Poland, Norway, Belgium, Holland, France, Yugoslavia, and Greece. “The German armed forces have truly surpassed even themselves,” he bragged. “Infantry, armored, and mountain divisions, as well as SS formations, battled without rest, in bravery, endurance, and tenacity to achieve their goals. The work of the general staff has been outstanding. The air force has added new heroic deeds to its historic glory. . . . Nothing is impossible for the German soldier!” He concluded: “The German Reich and its allies constitute a power that no coalition in the world can surpass. German armed forces will unremittingly intervene in the course of events whenever and wherever it will be required.”^{192}

The signals were getting even more confounding.^{193} In Tokyo, the day after Hitler spoke, Japanese foreign minister Matsuoka reassured German ambassador Ott that “no Japanese prime minister or foreign minister could ever be able to maintain Japan neutrality in the event of a conflict between Germany and the Soviet Union. In such an event, Japan, naturally, would be compelled to attack Russia right behind Germany.”^{194} That would have violated the Soviet-Japanese Neutrality Pact, and it did not comport with Japan’s internal deliberations. That same day, a dispatch from “Corsican” in Berlin went to Moscow indicating that a press person from the German economics ministry had told the staff that Germany wanted peace on its eastern frontiers, for it would soon attack the British-controlled Suez Canal. Germany would demand that the USSR attack Britain on the side of the Axis, and, as a guarantee that Moscow would follow through, Germany was going to occupy Ukraine and possibly the Baltics.^{195}

Stalin decided to send some signals of his own. Also on May 5, 1941, at 6:00 p.m., Timoshenko opened the graduation ceremony in the Grand Kremlin Palace's combined Andreyev-Alexander hall (the venue for party congresses) for sixteen military academies and nine military departments in civil institutions, with some 1,500 attendees, including professors as well as defense commissariat, government, and Comintern personnel. The graduates had entered the academies in 1937 or 1938. When Timoshenko announced that Stalin would take the dais, the eruption would not die down until the despot glanced at Timoshenko, who quieted the hall. "Comrades, permit me in the name of the Soviet government and the Communist party to congratulate you on the completion of your studies and wish you success in your work," Stalin began, going on to underscore, over the course of forty minutes, the enormous strides in the Red Army's material base. But he criticized the academies' curriculum. "I have an acquaintance who studied at the Artillery Academy," Stalin noted. "I looked over his notes and discovered that a great deal of time is being spent studying cannons that were decommissioned in 1916." This acquaintance was his elder son, Yakov, who was in the audience. "Is it like that, comrade artillerymen?" Shockingly, Lieutenant General Arkady Sivkov, head of the Artillery Academy, shouted from one of the front rows that the school's curriculum was based on modern weaponry. "I ask that you do not interrupt me," Stalin answered. "I know what I am saying. I read the notes of a student of your academy."¹⁹⁶

Stalin devoted most of his remarks to the Red Army's technological transformation. "Now we have 300 divisions in the army," he asserted. "Of the total number of divisions, a third are mechanized. That is not general knowledge, but you need to know it. Of the 100 [mechanized] divisions, two thirds are tank [divisions]." Someone in the hall shouted, "This is for the removal of Hitler."¹⁹⁷ Stalin's numbers corresponded to the wishful thinking in MP-41 (all supposed to be in place somehow by January 1942).¹⁹⁸ The despot went on to boast that the newest aircraft were faster than ever and that frontline tanks had armor three to four times thicker and could “break through the front.” He also addressed the questions on everyone’s mind. “Why was France defeated, and Germany victorious?” he asked. “Is Germany really invincible? . . . Why did Germany turn out to have a better army? This is a fact. . . . What explains it?” Germany, he answered, had rearmed with the latest technology, and studied the new methods of war and the lessons of history. “The German army, having been soundly defeated in 1918, studied up,” he explained. “The German army’s military doctrine advanced. The army rearmed with the newest technology. It studied the newest methods of conducting war.” By contrast, he said, the previously victorious French got complacent. Stalin added one revealing observation: “In 1870, the Germans smashed the French. Why? Because they fought on one front. The Germans suffered defeat in 1916–1917. Why? Because they fought on two fronts.”¹⁹⁹

Stalin insisted that the current German army was not invincible. “There are no invincible armies in the world. . . . Germany started the war and initially did so under slogans of liberation from the Versailles peace. These slogans were popular, elicited support and sympathy from all those humiliated by Versailles. . . . Now the German army has . . . altered the slogan of liberation from Versailles to conquest. The German army will not be successful under a slogan of a war of conquest and annexation. . . . While Napoleon conducted a war under slogans of liberation from serfdom, he elicited support, sympathy, had allies, success. When Napoleon switched to wars of conquest, he accumulated many enemies and suffered defeat.” Stalin added: “In military terms, there is nothing special about the German army, neither in tanks, artillery, nor aviation.” Still, he concluded, “any politician, any political figure, who allows a feeling of self-satisfaction can succumb to surprise, like the catastrophe that befell France.”²⁰⁰

“It was a fantastic speech,” the government notetaker, an attendee, wrote in his diary. “The speech radiated confidence in our military people, in our strength, and dispersed the ‘aura’ of glory that enveloped the German army.”²⁰¹

A banquet followed in the St. George’s Hall, with overflow in the Palace of Facets, the St. Vladimir Octagon, and other spaces (where the toasts, broadcast over loudspeakers, were barely audible).²⁰² Timoshenko triumphantly entered the white-columned St. George’s; then, a bit later, came Stalin, followed by his entourage, provoking thunderous hurrahs. Vodka, champagne, fish, game, and myriad delicacies were laid out. The despot assumed his customary place at the Presidium table. Timoshenko proposed a toast to him; everyone downed their glasses standing.²⁰³ Stalin, Dimitrov noted, “was in an exceptionally good mood.”²⁰⁴ The despot offered an extended toast to the graduates and their teachers, again enjoining them to teach the new technology. Those in the St. George’s Hall stepped forward to clink glasses with the inner circle and marshals at the Presidium table.²⁰⁵ Some fifteen minutes later, Timoshenko announced that Stalin would make a second toast. This one turned out to be for those in artillery, which he called “the main force in war. That’s how it was earlier, that’s how it is today. . . . Artillery is the god of war.”²⁰⁶ Stalin continued, toasting tank drivers, aviators, cavalry, communications specialists, and infantry, whom he called “the lord of the battlefield.”

The evening’s concert commenced. Some twenty minutes later, Sivkov, evidently hoping to make amends, proposed a toast “to the Stalinist foreign policy of peace.” The despot waved his arms; the guard detail blocked Sivkin from moving forward. Then Stalin rose. As recently as the reception for the May Day parade (May 2), Timoshenko, in Stalin’s presence, had referred to the Soviet “peace policy,” a reference included in the newspaper account.²⁰⁷ But now, in his third comment of the evening, an agitated Stalin, his Georgian accent more pronounced, interjected, “Allow me to introduce a correction. A peace policy secured peace for our country. A peace policy is a good thing. For a while we conducted a defensive approach—until we rearmed our army, gave it modern means of fighting. But now that we have restructured the army, saturated it with the equipment for modern combat, now that we have become strong, now it is time to go from defense to offense. . . . We need to reconstruct our education, our propaganda, agitation, our press in an offensive spirit. The Red Army is a modern army, and a modern army is an army of offense.”²⁰⁸ Having that night accused Germany (rather than Britain and France) of starting the war, and having declared that Germany’s war of conquest would fail, Stalin, according to some witnesses, also stated—in a phrase excised from the informal transcript—that “there’s going to be war, and the enemy will be Germany.”²⁰⁹

EXCHANGE OF LETTERS?

Stalin’s last major speech on foreign policy, at the 18th Party Congress (March 1939), had been published in an enormous print run, but this time Pravda reported only that he had stressed “the profound changes in the Red Army in the past few years,” especially its rearming and reorganization “on the basis of modern war.” The brief account fanned rumors. (The German embassy failed to obtain the contents, until fed them by Soviet counterintelligence.)²¹⁰ Immediately after the evening, Zhdanov, Malenkov, and Shcherbakov oversaw meetings to introduce slogans of “offensive war” in propaganda. Red Star, the army newspaper, was to undermine the myth of German invincibility by publishing articles about German tactical and strategic shortcomings, and French weakness and mistakes.²¹¹ Stalin complemented these continued efforts to deter Nazi Germany, while also boosting Red Army morale, with an even bigger gesture: Soviet newspapers also announced his appointment as head of government.

The despot had recently sent the inner circle an angry note, complaining about a decision that Molotov had signed off on in relation to an oil pipeline for Sakhalin. Suddenly, the long-standing method of approving decisions by polling became “chancellery red tape and bungling.” Stalin complained about the absence of meetings in economic decision making, Molotov’s bailiwick (previously the despot had complained about an excess of meetings). “I think it is no longer possible to carry on ‘running things’ like this,” he wrote. “I suggest we discuss the matter at the politburo.”²¹² At the next politburo session, on May 4, Stalin had been unanimously voted to replace Molotov as head of the Council of People’s Commissars. He also remained general secretary of the party, with Zhdanov as his formal party deputy, and Molotov remained foreign affairs commissar.²¹³ But Voznesensky, the Zhdanov protégé, continued as first deputy of the government and, as a result, outranked Molotov (a mere deputy).²¹⁴ Beyond his frustrations, Stalin had signaled, in the words of Sudoplatov, that he was “ready for negotiations and that this time he would lead them directly.”²¹⁵

But how? The German press (on Goebbels’s instruction) carried no mention of the sensational news of Stalin’s assumption of the premiership.²¹⁶ Dekanozov, who had been unable to engage Hitler, was called back from Berlin to Moscow “for consultations.” During the May Day parade, Stalin had placed him front and center on the Lenin Mausoleum, a message to the Germans that Schulenburg picked up.²¹⁷ But the despot had been waiting upon Schulenburg’s return from his meeting with Hitler, expecting him to bring proposals, and although the count had conspicuously arrived (April 30) on Ribbentrop’s personal plane, he did not even call on the Kremlin. In a May 2 coded telegram from Moscow, Schulenburg complained to the German foreign ministry that he could not fulfill his assignment to tamp down the rumors about a pending war between Germany and the Soviet Union. “Everyone coming to Moscow or traveling through Moscow not only is bringing these rumors, but can confirm them by citing facts.”²¹⁸ More important was the information brought back from Moscow by acting military attaché Hans Krebs (substituting for Köstring, who had contracted severe pneumonia). Krebs, in Berlin on May 5, told chief of staff Halder that “Russia will do anything to avoid war and yield on every issue short of making territorial concessions.”²¹⁹

That same day, however, an ostensible breakthrough occurred: Schulenburg hosted Dekanozov at his single-story villa on Clean Lane for breakfast. The deputy foreign affairs commissar was accompanied by Vladimir Pavlov, the interpreter (who was now director of the German desk at the foreign affairs commissariat); also present was the Russian-speaking Hilger. The count told his Soviet interlocutors that relations needed to be improved; too many rumors were circulating about war. He discussed the May 4 speech by Hitler, mentioning that the Führer had found the Soviet-Yugoslav Pact “strange,” and noted that Hitler had pointed out that Balkan developments had compelled him to “undertake some precautionary measures on the eastern border of Germany,” because his “life experience had taught him to be extremely cautious, and the events of the past few years had made him even more cautious.” Schulenburg returned several times to the need to quell the rumors of war, but he offered no ideas about how to stop them; Hilger interceded to suggest they meet again.²²⁰

On May 7, the Soviet military intelligence agent Gerhard Kegel (“X”), deputy head of the economics section at the German embassy in Moscow, met twice with his handler, Konstantin Leontyev (“Petrov”), reporting that Germany’s “high command has given the order to complete readiness of the war theater and concentrate all forces in the East by June 2, 1941.” In one of his more than 100 communications about German war preparations, “X” gave the number of German and allied troops as 2 million in East Prussia, 3 million in former Poland, and 2 million in Hungary and the Balkans—7 million total—and insisted that the decision for war had been taken, irreversibly.^{221}

On May 9, “Elder” reported that “in the headquarters of German aviation, preparations for an operation against the USSR are being conducted at a reinforced pace. All data testify to the fact that an attack is set for the near future. In conversations among officers of the headquarters, May 20 is often mentioned as a date for the onset of war against the USSR. In these same circles they declare that initially Germany will present the USSR with an ultimatum for more expansive exports to Germany and abandonment of Communist propaganda.” To ensure fulfillment, he added, the Germans would station commissars at Ukrainian industrial and agricultural centers, and the German army would occupy some Ukrainian provinces. “The presentation of an ultimatum will be preceded by a ‘war of nerves’ aiming to demoralize the USSR.”^{222, 223}

Stalin offered another gesture toward Germany, formally breaking off diplomatic relations and ordering the embassies of the countries that had fallen under Nazi occupation—Belgium, the Netherlands, Greece, Norway, Yugoslavia—shuttered, and their envoys expelled. Dekanozov, meanwhile, reciprocated the breakfast at the Spiridonovka on May 9. Schulenburg urged the Soviets to take the initiative, advising Dekanozov to have Stalin send a personal letter to the Führer. Dekanozov suspected some sort of ploy, and badgered the count about whether Hitler had authorized such an exchange. Schulenburg, having placed himself, his family, and Hilger in danger with his unauthorized suggestion, backed off. Dekanozov brought the discussion back to a possible joint communiqué. Schulenburg said they needed to act with great alacrity and that if they forwarded a draft text for approval, Ribbentrop or Hitler might not be in Berlin, causing delays.^{224} The courtly, well-intentioned Prussian nobleman was trying to induce Stalin to launch a bold diplomatic initiative—precisely what Hitler most feared.

Also on May 9, the Council of People's Commissars had its first meeting under the new configuration. "Stalin did not conceal his disapproval of Molotov," according to the notetaker. "He very impatiently listened to Molotov's rather prolix responses to critical remarks from members of the bureau. . . . It seemed as if Stalin was attacking Molotov as an adversary and that he was doing so from a position of strength. . . . Molotov's breathing began to quicken, and at times he would let out a deep sigh. He fidgeted in his chair and murmured something to himself. By the end he could take it no longer. 'Easier said than done,' Molotov stated, sharply but quietly. Stalin heard him. 'It has long been known who fears criticism,' Stalin answered menacingly. Molotov winced but kept quiet. The others silently buried their noses in their papers. . . . At this meeting I once again saw the majesty and strength of Stalin," the notetaker wrote. "Stalin's companions feared him like the devil. They would agree with him on practically anything."²²⁵

SENSATIONAL MISSION

In May 1941, Germans were hearing rumors that Stalin and Molotov had murdered each other.²²⁶ On May 10, "Alta" relayed to Moscow that the German war ministry had instructed all military attachés abroad to repudiate the rumors of imminent war with the USSR and to explain the troop concentrations in the east by a desire "to be ready to counter actions from the Russian side and exert pressure on Russia."²²⁷ Here, finally, was an insight into the disinformation campaign.²²⁸

On May 12, a third breakfast took place, again at Schulenburg's residence. Dekanozov immediately told him that Stalin was ready to exchange letters with Hitler and sign a joint German-Soviet communiqué. Schulenburg had tried to give himself some diplomatic cover for his initiative by telegraphing Berlin with a suggestion that the German government offer congratulations to Stalin on his appointment to head the government, and a warning that the Soviet regime had likely prepared an evacuation capital farther east that would be difficult to seize (hints of Napoleon, who had captured Moscow yet still failed to win the war). But a reply from Weizsäcker, received just before Dekanozov's arrival, indicated that Schulenburg's proposal had not even been presented to Ribbentrop ("because this would not have been a rewarded matter"). A parallel letter from a contact in the Berlin foreign ministry warned Schulenburg that he was being closely watched. Dekanozov noted that Schulenburg was now "quite emotionless." The count emphasized that he had acted "on his own initiative only and without authority" and implored them "several times not to reveal that he had made these proposals."²²⁹

Schulenburg nonetheless again tried to impress upon the Soviets the gravity of the situation and the need for them to take proactive measures, urging, according to the Soviet notetaker, that "it would be good if Stalin himself on his own initiative and spontaneously were to approach Hitler with a letter." Then, in a discussion of British bombing of Germany, he made a highly enigmatic observation: "In his opinion, the time is not far off when they (the two warring sides) must reach an agreement and then the calamity and destruction raining down on each of their cities will end."

Stalin received Dekanozov in his office at night on both May 8 and 12, 1941, so he was apprised of the frustrating "talks."²³⁰ Soon the despot came to see why. On May 13, although details were scarce, he learned of a sensation reported out of Berlin the previous night: Rudolf Hess, deputy to the Führer within the Nazi party, had flown to Britain.

Hess had once won an air race around Germany's highest peak, but recently he had been forbidden to fly. Late on May 10, a date chosen on astrological grounds, in a daring, skillful maneuver, he piloted a Messerschmitt Bf-110 bomber across the North Sea toward Britain, some 900 miles, and, in the dark, parachuted into Scotland.²³¹ His pockets were filled with abundant pills and potions, including opium alkaloids, aspirin, atropine, methamphetamines, barbiturates, caffeine tablets, laxatives, and an elixir from a Tibetan lamasery (passed to him by the explorer Sven Hedin).²³² He was also said to be carrying a flight map, photos of himself with his son, and the business cards of two German acquaintances, but no identification. Initially, he gave a false name to the Scottish plowman on whose territory he had landed; soon, members of the local Home Guard appeared (with whisky on their breath). The British were not expecting Hess; no secure corridor had been set up. Those on the scene, breaching secrecy, brought in a member of the Polish consulate in nearby Glasgow to serve as interpreter; it was he who noticed that the captive was the spitting image of Hess. British air intelligence ignored the first reports of the captive's evident importance.²³³

No one in the Nazi entourage outdid Hess for devotion. He had been in the forefront of the Beer Hall Putsch and had recorded Hitler's prison dictations that became Mein Kampf, volunteering his own thoughts, too.²³⁴ Hess was among the small circle in the know about the firmness of Hitler's intentions to invade the USSR.²³⁵ At the Berghof on May 11, Hitler received one of Hess's adjutants, who delivered a sealed letter left by his boss. The Führer raged that he hoped the missing Hess had "crashed into the sea."²³⁶ Germany disclosed his absence over the radio at 8:00 p.m. on May 12, mentioning a letter that exhibited "traces of mental derangement" and speculating that Hess had "crashed en route."²³⁷ Finally, several hours later, the British issued a statement, with precious few details and no photographs but confirmation that Hess had landed in Scotland. The next day, Hitler summoned the sixty or so top Nazi officials to the Obersalzberg. "The Führer," observed Hans Frank, head of the General Gouvernement (Poland), "was more completely shattered than I have ever experienced him to be." Hitler stated that Hess had acted without his knowledge, and called him a “victim of delusions.”²³⁸ Ribbentrop was sent to assure Mussolini that there were no Anglo-German peace talks.²³⁹ “What a spectacle for the world,” Goebbels confided in his diary of the defection.²⁴⁰

Hess jokes proliferated. (“So you’re the madman,” Churchill says to Hess. “Oh, no,” Hess replies, “only his deputy.”)²⁴¹ He had lost his role in the Nazi regime to his private secretary, Martin Bormann, and seems to have wanted to reingratiate himself with the Führer, intending to land at the hunting lodge owned by the Duke of Hamilton, a commander in the Royal Air Force whom Hess had met at the 1936 Berlin Olympics. (He missed his property by around twelve miles.) Hess imagined that negotiations could take place with pro-German members of the British establishment, who might even overthrow Churchill. The British moved Hess to a military hospital as a POW and maintained public silence about his motivations or any secret revelations (of which there were none). “He had come without the knowledge of Hitler,” the report of Hess’s first interrogation established (May 13), “in order to convince responsible persons that since England could not win the war, the wisest course was to make peace now.” Hess proffered the old deal, publicly announced by Hitler, of a free hand on the continent in exchange for preservation of the British empire, and denied that Hitler planned to attack the USSR.²⁴²

Soviet intelligence tasked its entire network with sussing out the real story of Hess’s flight, and they duly reported that Hitler had expressly sent his deputy on a peace mission.²⁴³ Stalin needed no confirmation. That a second in command could undertake such a flight without permission was, for him, implausible. Hess had to have been sent to negotiate a separate peace with Britain and a joint attack on the Soviet Union, and in a way that cleverly allowed Hitler to deny it.²⁴⁴ Molotov had met Hess in Berlin in November 1940: he was not a madman. It all seemed to add up: Schulenburg tells Dekanozov that Stalin should exchange letters with Hitler, then suddenly backs off; Hess flies to the UK. Now, the most sinister interpretation crystallized of Churchill's cryptic message to Stalin and Cripps's written suggestion to Molotov that the British might come to terms with Germany.^{245}

On May 13, behind the scenes, Cripps pursued the same tack, writing from Moscow to the foreign office proposing that the Hess windfall be used to disrupt suspected German-Soviet alliance talks and, more ambitiously, to induce Stalin to abandon Germany altogether. The foreign office thought this would drive Stalin deeper into Hitler's arms.^{246} But then Eden and Alexander Cadogan, the foreign office permanent undersecretary, who was charged with coordinating the Hess problem across agencies, took up Cripps's prompt. At a press briefing and in conversations with Soviet envoy Maisky, Eden hinted that Hess was bearing peace proposals, and that his flight proved the existence of a split in the Nazi leadership over the course of the war. The whispering campaign achieved the opposite effect of its aim, however, encouraging Stalin's view that, given the divisions in the Nazi leadership, his own negotiations with Hitler to avert war remained possible.^{247}

Even Schulenburg's utter failure ended up contributing to that unshakable belief. Foreign couriers transporting diplomatic pouches overnights at the Metropole Hotel, awaiting their transit out the next day, and the NKGB resorted to trapping couriers in the bathroom or jamming the lift, seizing their pouches, and photographing their contents while those trapped waited to be rescued. Thus was Stalin able to see that Schulenburg, in his secret correspondence with the German foreign ministry, continued to stress Soviet conciliatory moves and readiness to bargain.^{248} Soviet ingenuity combined with Schulenburg's good intentions amplified German intelligence's disinformation campaign about an ultimatum.^{249}

PREEMPTION DENIED

May 15, 1941—much mentioned in Stalin's intelligence—passed without a Nazi invasion. That same day, a Junkers 52 transport, either unobserved or unobstructed by Soviet air defenses, traveled more than 650 miles over Białystok/Belostok, Minsk, and Smolensk, landing at Moscow's central aerodrome, Tushino, a few miles from Red Square. The pilot had been able to reconnoiter the entire German path to the Soviet capital. Whispers about the incredible incident spread. The Soviets allowed the German plane to depart, even refueling it.²⁵⁰ In Berlin that same day, in an internal memorandum, the German trade official Schnurre observed that the Soviets had made concessions to resolve difficult matters in bilateral trade and that, while Germany would have trouble meeting its obligations to the USSR with regard to new armaments, the Soviets were fulfilling the existing agreement punctually, even though it was causing them great difficulties. He pointed out that Germany could advance additional economic demands beyond the existing trade agreement.²⁵¹ (A record number of goods would cross the border in both directions that month.) Also on May 15, coincidentally, the Soviet general staff completed a new aggressive offensive war plan, with Stalin's evident involvement.²⁵²

This was the fifteenth iteration of the main war plan since 1924, although far from all were formally approved. Like its immediate predecessor, it was drafted by Vasilevsky, with cross-outs and additions in the hand of Nikolai Vatutin (b. 1901), a peasant lad (like Timoshenko and Zhukov) who had graduated from the General Staff Academy in 1937 and been vaulted to a top position in the staff. Just as in the 1940 plan, this one envisioned a massive left hook using the full strength of the Red Army to cut off German forces from Romanian oil, then wheeling north, crossing all of German-occupied Poland and capturing East Prussia (a 450-mile thrust), in a colossal encirclement. But now the southwestern strike was to occur before a German attack. "Considering that at the present time the German army is mobilized, with its rear deployed, it has the capability to beat us to the punch and deliver a surprise attack,” the war plan explained, recommending that the Soviets “not leave the initiative to the German command, but forestall the enemy in deployment and attack the German army while it is still in the deployment stage and has not yet had the time to organize the front and the coordination among the service branches.” Timoshenko and Zhukov asked Stalin for authorization for hidden general mobilization and concentration of forces close to the frontier, both under the guise of training, accelerated railway construction and weapons production, and forced erection of new frontier fortifications.²⁵³

Preemption constituted a logical extension of Soviet military doctrine: if the Red Army was going to launch a counteroffensive immediately after absorbing the enemy’s initial attack, why not prevent that attack in the first place with “a sudden blow”?

The volatile Zhukov had formed a tight duo with the ponderous Timoshenko, another veteran of the civil-war-era First Cavalry Army, in whom he could cautiously confide, provided they could get out of earshot of their bodyguards, drivers, cooks, and maids, who closely observed them, on Beria’s orders. “The idea to preempt the German attack,” Zhukov would tell an interviewer, “came to Timoshenko and me in connection with Stalin’s speech of May 5, 1941 . . . in which he spoke of the possibility of an offensive mode of action.”²⁵⁴ Zhukov would also recall that he and Timoshenko did not sign the preemptive strike plan above their printed names, preferring to report on it preliminarily to Stalin. At an hour-long meeting on May 19, as Zhukov reported, Stalin apparently knocked his pipe nervously on the felt-covered table. “When he heard about a preemptive strike against the German troops he just boiled over,” Zhukov wrote, adding that Stalin blurted out, “What, have you lost your mind? You want to provoke the Germans?”²⁵⁵ Molotov, who was present, would recall that Stalin likely feared that a Soviet attack would induce Britain and even the United States to join Germany in a war against the USSR; at a minimum, the despot anticipated that a Soviet attack on Germany would drive London to make peace with Berlin, particularly in light of the Hess mission, clearing the way for attack in the east.^{256}

In the meeting, Stalin explained away his May 5 (pre-Hess) speech as an attempt “to encourage the people there, so that they would think about victory and not about the invincibility of the German army, which is what the world’s press is blaring on about,” Zhukov recalled. “So that’s how our idea about a preemptive strike was buried.”^{257} In fact, the plan did not specify a date for launching a war, and did not motivate an immediate preemption: it estimated total German strength at 284 divisions, but only 120 were said to be concentrated near the frontier, a number not appreciably different from prior estimates.^{258} The feasibility of the plan, moreover, remained highly dubious. Alexander Zaporozhets, head of the army administration of political propaganda, wrote to Stalin after an inspection tour that “the majority of troops deployed in the fortified districts on our western frontiers are not battle ready.”^{259} Timoshenko, Zhukov, Vatutin (now Zhukov’s top deputy), and Vasilevsky (operations directorate) appear to have believed they could pull off the absurdly ambitious preemptive strike after further intensive preparations, despite their own inexperience with operations of this scale and the Red Army’s low level of organizational cohesion and training and its jumble of obsolete and modern (but untested) equipment. And yet massive logistical problems and railway incapacity bedeviled even the Red Army’s more gradual deployments.^{260}

To achieve anything like the attack posture in the preemptive plan, the Red Army would have needed many months of very intensive preparation from that point forward.^{261} In any case, Stalin did not approve the general mobilization or force concentrations necessary for preemption. There was no aerial reconnaissance of German positions to be struck.^{262} The despot held fast to the idea of forward defense and counterattack, but in his mind general mobilization made war unavoidable, foreclosing his diplomatic and stalling options. If Hitler was not so mad as to voluntarily open a two-front war—as Stalin said often—then the Führer would have to negotiate a separate peace with Britain to attack the USSR. That was why Stalin desperately wanted to know the details of Hess’s “peace proposals.” After all, the despot might be able to offer his own terms to Germany, and Hitler, being smart, would want to see what he could obtain from each side before making a choice. Even if the Nazis made the mistake of voluntarily opening a two-front war, Stalin assumed that any German attack would be preceded by demands for far-reaching concessions, negotiations that Stalin could drag out.

Strikingly, though, almost everything in the May 15 war plan except the preemptive strike was being implemented. Stalin had summoned Timoshenko and Zhukov to the Little Corner on May 10 and 12, and on May 13 the general staff had been able to order deployment to the western frontier of interior reserves—four armies (28 rifle divisions) from the Urals, Volga, North Caucasus, and Baikal military districts—by July 10, with more readied for future transfer.²⁶³ Stalin had also allowed Timoshenko and Zhukov to introduce “covering plans” in frontier military districts, which would enable hidden troop concentration.²⁶⁴ Stalin was enabling implementation of the approved 1940 war plan, the massive left hook below the Pripet Marshes, should the Wehrmacht attack. As a result, the Soviet Union was as vulnerable to a deep German penetration as it was incapable of launching a preemptive attack.

DISINFORMATION, CONFIRMED

On May 14, “Zeus,” out of Sofia, reported further on the concentration of German divisions. On May 17, two weeks prior to the onset of Soviet military maneuvers—which were publicly advertised—Stalin terminated the German tours of his weapons factories, and the very next day an exhibit at Moscow's State Historical Museum cataloging Napoleon's defeat, 1812 Fatherland War, had its grand opening. On May 19, "Dora" reported from Zurich that Nazi attack plans had been finalized. The next day, "Extern" reported from Helsinki on a pending attack. Out of Bucharest, on May 23, "Mars" reported that "the American military attaché in Romania said to the Slovak ambassador that the Germans will attack the USSR no later than June 15."²⁶⁵

Talk of secret negotiations was rife. Dekanozov, following his third breakfast with Schulenburg, departed for Berlin (he arrived May 14), but he could not obtain an audience with Ribbentrop to follow up. The envoy appealed to the good graces of Otto Meissner, who had run the office of the president throughout the Weimar Republic, remained in that post when Hitler became head of state, and was viewed as especially close to the Führer, attending to the ceremonial side of the chancellery.²⁶⁶ The old-school Meissner happened to speak Russian, having spent considerable time in the country, and beginning in mid-May Dekanozov met with him about once a week—four times altogether. They discussed Iraq, Iran, and Turkey, as if the Wehrmacht troops deployed in Eastern Europe would be attacking the British positions in the Near East. "Otto Meissner quickly became his best friend," recalled Berezhkov, who worked under Dekanozov at the Soviet embassy. "Meissner, also short and stocky, regularly joined the ambassador for lunch a few times a month and, slouching in a chair over cognac and coffee, would tell his host 'in confidence' that the chancellery was working on important proposals for the upcoming meeting between Hitler and Stalin."²⁶⁷

Rumors spread beginning around May 25 that Germany was manufacturing Soviet flags for a state visit to Berlin. "The rumors we spread about an invasion of England are working," Goebbels wrote in his diary that day. "Extreme nervousness reigns in England. As for Russia, we were able to organize a vast flow of false information. The newspaper ‘plants’ make it such that those abroad cannot figure out where is the truth, and where is the lie. This is the atmosphere that we need.”²⁶⁸ German intelligence reported to Ribbentrop that many in the diplomatic corps in Berlin were convinced Germany and the USSR had already reached a secret agreement, putting off the war.²⁶⁹ Pravda (May 25) published a satirical essay on the wild rumors among foreign diplomats.

Also on May 25, Stalin had in his possession an extraordinary report out of Berlin, where Berlings (“Lycée-ist”) had told Amayak Kobulov that, although there were 160 to 200 German divisions on the Soviet frontier, “war between the Soviet Union and Germany is unlikely, although it would be very popular in Germany at a time when the present war with England is not approved by the populace. Hitler cannot take such a risk as a war with the USSR, fearing a breach in the unity of the Nazi party.” “Lycée-ist” uttered the canard that “Hitler expects Stalin in connection with this to become more accommodating and end all the intrigues against Germany, and above all, to grant him more goods, especially oil.” Most remarkable of all, in connection with supposed Soviet plans to relocate the government to the interior, “Lycée-ist” issued a bizarre olive branch inside a threat: “The German war plan has been worked out in the greatest detail. The maximum duration of the war is 6 weeks. During that time Germany would conquer almost the entire European part of the USSR, but the government in Sverdlovsk would not be touched. If after that Stalin would desire to save the socialist system, Hitler would not interfere.”²⁷⁰

Even the most spectacular feats of Soviet espionage boomeranged. NKGB counterintelligence was headed by Pyotr Fedotov (b. 1900), the son of an orchestra conductor, who had acquired long experience in counterinsurgency in the North Caucasus against Chechen fighters, before transferring to Moscow in late 1937 when terror vacancies had to be filled. He targeted the German embassy, which had perhaps 200 employees, including 20 under military attaché General Ernst Köstring, who spoke nearly perfect Russian and traveled far and wide, proving to be a talented observer of the combat potential of the Red Army, Soviet military industry, and Soviet mobilization status.²⁷¹ Köstring resided in a single-story detached house at Bread Lane, 28, and appears to have assumed that it was secure (the NKGB could not employ microphones placed in adjacent apartments, as it usually did). During one of his absences, Fedotov's team managed to tunnel a very considerable distance from a neighboring building, on the pretext of pipe reconstruction, and into the mansion's basement, then entered Köstring's office, opened his safe, photographed its contents, and installed listening devices, while managing to erase all traces of their penetration.²⁷² Thus could the NKGB eavesdrop on discussions among the Germans and their allies (Italians, Hungarians, Finns, Japanese, Slovaks), which went straight to Merkulov, and from him to Stalin's desk.²⁷³ On May 31, 1941, Fedotov evidently played a recording for Stalin of Köstring's conversation with the Slovakia ambassador: "Here what we need is to create some kind of provocation. We must arrange for some German or other to be killed and by that means bring on war."²⁷⁴

Such chatter offered yet more substantiation for the felt imperative to avoid handing the Germans a casus belli, but despite the military attaché's desire to ingratiate himself, Hitler needed no such provocation to invade. "The transfer of troops according to the mobilization plan is proceeding successfully," General Halder recorded in his diary (May 30). "The Führer decided that the date for starting the operation 'Barbarossa' remains as set—June 22."²⁷⁵

STREAM OF VISITORS

Richard Sorge ("Ramsay") passed on to the Germans as well information he picked up from Japanese government circles, in line with long-ago-issued Soviet permission.²⁷⁶ He so impressed the German ambassador with his knowledge of Japan (based on his secret cabinet source, Ozaki) that Ott gave him the cipher codes for communication with Berlin, allowing Sorge to learn everything known to the embassy about Hitler's plans.²⁷⁷ But the embassy was receiving information from Berlin late (the pouch was no longer being sent via the Trans-Siberian Railway across Soviet territory) and, even more important, it was not given firsthand information about Barbarossa. On the contrary, Ribbentrop's foreign ministry knowingly disinformed Ott. Sorge's dispatches, meanwhile, were transmitted via smuggled microfilms or, far faster, via wireless to Khabarovsk by the skilled shortwave operator Max Clausen, a German Communist residing in Japan, who built his transmitter from scratch. Clausen did the coding himself, using onetime pads (which worked via a secret, random key), making them effectively unbreakable but requiring a prodigious amount of time. Unbeknownst to Sorge, Clausen appears to have passed on only about half of the dispatches. On top of being busy running his own blueprint machinery and reproduction business, which Clausen made profitable, he had begun to suffer from heart trouble, doubt Marxism-Leninism, and resent Sorge's condescension and personal cluelessness.²⁷⁸

Unlike Sorge's reports on Japan, which were based on direct knowledge of government decisions, those on Germany were mostly gossip and speculation.²⁷⁹ In early May 1941, Clausen had sent a radiogram (coded bursts of data) with three of Sorge's messages. They noted that "Ott declared that Hitler is full of determination to destroy the USSR and take the European part of the Soviet Union in his hands as a grain and natural resource base for German control over all of Europe." Sorge also wrote, citing the opinions of Ott and the naval attaché, that, "after the conclusion of the sowing campaign, the war against the USSR could begin at any moment, and all the Germans will have to do will be to gather up the harvest." The messages continued: "The possibility of an outbreak of war at any moment is very high because Hitler and his generals are sure that a war with the USSR will not in the least interfere with the conduct of war against England. German generals assess the Red Army's fighting capacity as so low that the Red Army will be destroyed in the course of a few weeks. They consider that the defense system on the German-Soviet border is extraordinarily weak." Much of this information came from Colonel Oskar Ritter von Niedermayer, of the high command, who had been sent to Tokyo to brief Ott, and with whom Sorge also spoke at length. Sorge further wrote that "the decision on the start of the war against the USSR will be taken only by Hitler either already in May or after the war with England."²⁸⁰

On May 21, Clausen transmitted another Sorge message from two days earlier, stating that "new German representatives arriving here from Berlin declare that war between Germany and the USSR could begin at the end of May, since they received an order to return to Berlin by that time," and that "Germany has 9 army corps consisting of 150 divisions against the USSR." That was far beyond estimates at HQ, and betokened an invasion. But these visitors also said that "this year the danger might pass." Sorge's report added that "the strategic plan for an attack on the Soviet Union was taken from the experience of the war against Poland."²⁸¹

Stalin continued to view Sorge as a double agent working for Germany.²⁸² Golikov forwarded the spy's reports to the despot (who showed familiarity with them), while withholding them from his own immediate superiors, Timoshenko and Zhukov.²⁸³ There was considerable bad blood between Golikov and Zhukov, dating from the terror, when Golikov had been sent to destroy Zhukov.²⁸⁴ But Stalin's skepticism was the key factor.

Two messages from Sorge on May 30 stated flatly that "Berlin has informed Ott that the German offensive against the USSR will begin in the second half of June. Ott 95 percent sure war will start."²⁸⁵ The next day, a new German military visitor said that 170 to 190 German divisions were massed on the Soviet border and that war was imminent. “The expectation of the start of a German-Soviet war around June 15 is based exclusively on information which Lieutenant Colonel [Erwin] Scholl brought from Berlin,” Sorge wrote in a new message, adding, “Ott told me that he could not obtain information on this score directly from Berlin, and that he only has the information of Scholl.” Clausen transmitted both sets of dispatches on June 1, without reconciling the different dates. In the second, Sorge noted that he, too, had spoken with Scholl, an old friend, who in early May had departed Berlin to take up the post of German military attaché in Bangkok, and that Scholl told him the Soviets had committed “a great tactical mistake. . . . According to the German point of view, the fact that the USSR defense line is located, fundamentally, against the German line, without major offshoots, constitutes the greatest mistake. This will enable the smashing of the Red Army in the first big engagement.”^{286}

Golikov requested clarifications, but he wrote on the document, “Add to the list of Ramsay’s dubious and disinformational communications.”^{287}

PRESSURE

German intelligence picked up word that on June 1, 1941, Stalin received British and American ambassadors, returned Litvinov to the foreign affairs commissariat, reached an agreement with the United States, and was being pressured by his top brass to oppose Germany militarily. But this was disinformation spread by the Soviets. The Germans had Berlings (“Peter” to the Germans) check on rumors of Soviet-British negotiations, which he verified did not exist.^{288}

As German war preparations grew ever more intense, so did the warnings from Soviet intelligence networks. Beria reported to Stalin and Molotov (June 2) that Hitler, accompanied by Göring and Grand Admiral Raeder, had observed maneuvers of the German Fleet in the Baltic Sea, near Gdynia, and traveled to Warsaw and East Prussia.^{289} That same day,

Goglidze reported from Soviet Moldavia that the commander of Romanian border units had, two full weeks prior, “received an order from General Antonescu immediately to clear mines from bridges, roads, and sectors close to the border with the USSR—mines that had been laid in 1940–41. At present all the bridges have been cleared of mines and they have begun to clear them in the sector along the River Prut.” The Romanians, Goglidze concluded, were eagerly expecting to be sent into battle shortly.²⁹⁰ The next day, Golikov asked frontline NKGB stations for assistance in verifying numbers of German troops, tanks, armored vehicles, combat aircraft, transport aircraft, and explosives, and the locations of German field headquarters in East Prussia, occupied Poland, and Romania. “Try to obtain data on the plans for military operations against the USSR (in any form, documentary or oral etc.),” he wrote to the NKGB station in Berlin, as if they had not been straining every nerve to do this.²⁹¹

Germans were observed taking “samples of [Soviet] oil, motor vehicle and aviation petrol and lubricants,” presumably to determine whether they could be used with German equipment.²⁹² Military intelligence in the Western military district, in an internal memo to commander Dmitry Pavlov (June 4, 1941), noted that reliable sources on the other side of the border had observed immense increases in German artillery, tank, and armored troops, influxes of weaponry through the Warsaw train system and aerodrome, upgrading of railroad stations for nighttime unloading, the takeover by the military of all civilian medical installations, the guarding of bridges by military personnel, and mobilization of bureaucrats to govern occupied territories, and concluded that it was “not excluded” that war would commence in June.²⁹³ On June 5, Golikov reported to Stalin, the entire politburo, Timoshenko, and Zhukov that “the Romanian army is being brought to full combat readiness.” Among the details: “In May officers of the Romanian army were given topographical maps of the southern part of the USSR,” and schools had their exams early “so that their buildings could be used for military barracks and hospitals.”²⁹⁴ That same day, the NKVD established an affiliate of its central archive in the Siberian city of Omsk to prepare for a possible evacuation of files.²⁹⁵

Goebbels, in one of his regular conferences for the Nazi press on June 5, stated, “The Führer has decided that the war cannot be brought to an end without an invasion of Britain. Operations planned in the East have therefore been canceled. He cannot give any detailed dates, but one thing is certain: the invasion of Britain will start in three, or perhaps five weeks.”²⁹⁶ The next day, the British foreign office recalled Cripps to London for “consultations.”²⁹⁷ Berlin was worried that something was up; London, for its part, was still fearing a last-minute new Hitler-Stalin pact against the UK. That day, Stalin signed decrees “on measures for industry’s preparedness to switch to the mobilization plan for [producing] ammunition” and for possible wartime mobilization of all industry from July 1.²⁹⁸ Between June 6 and 10, the Wehrmacht sent its tank and motorized divisions right to the border (until then, the advanced troops were mostly infantry), kicking up prodigious earth and dust and making exceptional noise, a massive, unmistakable change in border concentrations. “Alta,” on June 7, 1941, reported, “It is a fact that the date for the start of a campaign against Russia has been moved to after June 20, which is explained by the large material losses in Yugoslavia. No one doubts from informed circles that military action against Russia will be conducted.”²⁹⁹

Also on June 7, Colonel General Grigory Stern, chief of air defenses, was arrested, one of more than 300 officers incarcerated that month, 22 of whom had earned the highest military decoration, Hero of the Soviet Union.³⁰⁰ Under torture, Stern admitted to being a German spy since 1931.³⁰¹ Stalin had been angry for some time about the loss of two to three planes daily from crashes in training.³⁰² He also scapegoated air defenses for the border violations by Germany, precipitating a frenzy of mutual denunciation. Others arrested included a deputy chief of the general staff to Zhukov, Lieutenant General Yakov Smushkevich, who was taken into custody (June 8) while in the hospital for a major operation (he was conducted to prison on crutches), and armaments commissar Boris Vannikov (his nemesis, Marshal Kulik, was soon forced to step down but not incarcerated).³⁰³ The former head of the air force, the thirty-year-old Lieutenant General Pavel Rychagov, who had been sacked at Zhukov and Timoshenko's insistence, was also arrested (June 8). Although a flying ace who had won the Hero of the Soviet Union, the Order of Lenin, and three Orders of the Red Banner, Rychagov was not fit for such a top post, but Stalin had murdered all the others. He was beaten with rubber truncheons but refused to confess to treason.³⁰⁴

Amid the arrests, Golikov (June 7) advised Stalin that, besides mobilization in Romania and the German right flank, "special attention should be given to the continuing reinforcement of German troops on the territory of Poland."³⁰⁵ On June 8, the German foreign ministry received word that the Soviet envoy to Romania had said that there would likely be no war but instead negotiations, which could fail if the Germans put forth excessive demands.³⁰⁶

Soldiers in full combat kit and completely full fuel tanks saturated the German side of the border, as the NKGB knew.³⁰⁷ On June 9, Bogdan Kobulov forwarded to Stalin, Molotov, and Beria a memo from Fitin based on communications from "Elder" and "Corsican," noting that the rumors about negotiations and an ultimatum "were being spread systematically by the German ministry of propaganda and the German army high command. The goal is to mask the preparations for an attack on the Soviet Union and maximize the surprise of such an attack." This was correct. But the report also quoted the Soviet section head of the German air force staff that Hitler would present the Soviet Union "with a demand to turn over to Germany economic management of Ukraine, to increase the supplies of grain and oil, and to use the Soviet navy—above all, its submarines—against England.”³⁰⁸

That same day, Japan’s ambassador in Moscow, Lieutenant General Tatekawa, warned Tokyo in a telegram, which the Soviets intercepted and decoded, that Germany “could not conquer or crush the Soviets in 2 to 3 months,” and that “the possibility cannot be excluded that Germany would find itself stuck in a prolonged war.”³⁰⁹ In the Little Corner, also on June 9, Timoshenko and Zhukov unfolded maps of German troop concentrations and a packet of military intelligence reports predicting war, which Stalin leafed through, having already seen them and more. Trying to be droll, the despot, according to recollections by Timoshenko, alluded to a Soviet agent in Japan who was predicting a German attack—“a shit who has set himself up with some small workshops and brothels.”³¹⁰ This was Sorge, of course, who had indeed cuckolded nearly the entire German community in Tokyo (while finding comfort most often in the bosom of his Japanese consort, Hanako Ishii). But neither Timoshenko nor Zhukov knew of Sorge’s existence, let alone his hearsay reports predicting war.

From Berlin on June 9, Ribbentrop telegraphed an order to the embassy in Moscow to secure its archives and organize the “inconspicuous departure of women and children.” Two days later, Bogdan Kobulov reported to Stalin, Molotov, and Beria on the evacuation directive and verified that documents were being burned.³¹¹ Also on June 11, Kobulov wrote that, based on information from “Elder,” in the air ministry, the decision to invade “has been definitively taken. Whether there will there be any prior demands to the Soviet Union is unknown, and therefore it is necessary to take into account the possibility of a surprise strike.” He further noted that “Göring’s HQ is moving from Berlin likely to Romania.” Germany’s battle plan was said to be an invasion from East Prussia in the north and Romania in the south, to create pincers to envelop the Red Army in the center.³¹² In fact, Germany's main strike force was in the center.

DESPERATION

On June 10, Germany's high command issued a supersecret order confirming the invasion for June 22, at 3:30 a.m. It stipulated that "June 18 is the latest for a possible delay," and that a signal would be issued on June 21 at 13:00 hours—either "Dortmund" (attack on) or "Alton" (attack delayed).³¹³ On June 11, NKGB intelligence chief Fitin reported from a source in Helsinki to Merkulov that, at a meeting of the Finnish government two days earlier, Finnish president Risto Ryti had said that Germany was forcing him to order a partial mobilization, but that "the question of whether or not there will be a war between Germany and the USSR would be answered June 24. Maybe there will be no war, since Hitler and Ribbentrop are against a war with the USSR, but the German generals and general staff desire it."³¹⁴ On June 12, Tupikov ("Arnold"), in Berlin, based on information from Scheliha ("Aryan"), told Moscow military intelligence that the invasion would occur "June 15–20."³¹⁵

German mapping for the bombing campaign intensified. "Violations of Soviet borders by German planes are not accidental, as confirmed by the direction and depth of the flights above our territory," Beria wrote to Stalin on June 12. "In a few instances they had penetrated 60 miles or more and in the direction of military installations and large troop concentrations."³¹⁶ In parallel, the Luftwaffe began moving its attack planes to frontier aerodromes in occupied Poland, a massive concentration of fighters that could not be missed—they were jammed into a very narrow space, right up against the Soviet frontier, which would make them highly vulnerable unless they were about to go into combat.³¹⁷ That same day, Berlings ("Peter") reported to the Ribbentrop bureau that Ivan Filippov—nominally the TASS correspondent in Berlin, and the go-between who had introduced Berlings to Amayak Kobulov—had been ordered “to clarify whether or not Germany is actively pursuing peace negotiations with England and whether or not to expect an attempt in the longer term to secure a compromise with the United States.” Filippov was also now directed to convey the impression that “we are convinced it is indeed possible to maintain our peace policy. There is still time.”^{318, 319}

Stalin tried to seize the initiative, composing a TASS bulletin, read out over Moscow radio at 6:00 p.m. on June 13 and published in Soviet newspapers the next morning. The impetus appears to have been the intensified speculation of a German-Soviet war that accompanied Cripps’s recall to London. In issuing the bulletin, Stalin was effectively following the suggestion Schulenburg had made to Dekanozov that the Soviet leader write to Hitler, but the despot decided on the form of an open letter. “Germany is also, just as consistently as the USSR, observing the terms of the Soviet-German Non-Aggression Pact,” it stated. “In view of this, according to Soviet circles, rumors of Germany’s intent to break the Pact and to attack the USSR are utterly groundless.” Stalin aimed not only to refute the rumors of war, again blaming them on British provocations to cause that very war, but also to elicit a German denial of any intentions to attack—or, failing that, a German presentation of its anticipated demands, which the rumors said the USSR had already received and rejected, bringing the countries to imminent military confrontation. “Germany,” the bulletin noted, “has not presented any demands to the USSR and did not propose any new, even closer agreement, in view of which negotiations on this subject cannot be taking place.”^{320}

Nazi foreign ministry officials had already instructed the management of the Schloss Bellevue, where Molotov had stayed during his Berlin visit, to prepare for Soviet dignitaries in the near future, while the Anhalter Station had been closed to the public at the beginning of June so it could be outfitted with a large electric red star and Soviet banners. Staff were told not to mention anything, prompting gossip. Rumors absolutely engulfed Berlin that Stalin would arrive at any moment by armored train, or that he and Hitler would meet at the border, or that Hitler was secretly discussing the scope of Germany's imminent demands. One German woman recorded in her diary that her milkman had assured her that hundreds of women were sewing Soviet flags.³²¹ Some people assumed that the TASS announcement had been published with German agreement.³²²

The foreign affairs commissariat had handed the text to Schulenburg, who relayed it to Berlin.³²³ But the German press did not publish it. The press secretary of the German foreign ministry, on June 14, refused to comment on it, despite insistent questioning by foreign journalists.³²⁴

At the very moment of Stalin's gambit, Hitler was holding a massive war conference (June 14) in the Parliament Chamber of the Old Reich Chancellery, with reports by all commanders of army, naval, and air force groups on their Barbarossa preparations. The number of invited attendees was so large that they were directed to arrive at different times and use different entrances. "After luncheon," General Halder wrote in his diary, "the Führer delivers a lengthy political address, in which he explains the reasons for his intention to attack Russia and evolves his calculation that Russia's collapse would induce England to give in."³²⁵

The Germans knew, of course, that the Soviets had been calling up reserves, moving forces to the frontier, furiously building border defenses, and stepping up patriotic propaganda.³²⁶ The Wehrmacht's main worry was that, given its absurdly dense concentration of forces and weaponry smack up against the Soviet frontier, the Red Army could inflict great damage by striking preemptively—or, what might be worse, adjust their forward defense posture and move their own extremely vulnerable troops back away from the frontier, removing the danger of being wiped out in a lightning strike and preserving themselves for the counterstrike. Back on June 13, Timoshenko, in Zhukov's presence, had phoned Stalin to request authorization to have frontline Red Army troops brought to a war footing. The despot refused, citing the forthcoming TASS bulletin, but the text baffled many Soviet military men, especially those in the field.³²⁷ Stalin did allow the general staff to order the western military districts to begin moving divisions of the second echelon, under the pretext of military exercises, up to within twelve to fifty miles of the frontier by July 1. This was suicidal.³²⁸

“The Führer estimates that the operation will take four months. I reckon on fewer,” Goebbels wrote in his diary (June 16), after yet another audience. “Bolshevism will collapse like a house of cards. We face victories unequalled in human history. We must act. Moscow intends to keep out of the war until Europe is exhausted and bled white. Then Stalin will move in and Bolshevize Europe and impose his own rule. We shall upset his calculations with one stroke. . . . The alliance with Bolshevism was always a blemish on our honor. Now it will be washed away. . . . The TASS denial, in the Führer’s opinion, is little more than a product of Stalin’s fear. Stalin is trembling at what is to come.”³²⁹

DOOM CLOSES IN

Golikov, of Soviet military intelligence, reported the accelerated German buildup in April, May, and June, from 70 to an estimated 110-plus divisions.³³⁰ Japanese intelligence refused to believe that Hitler had the temerity to attempt to conquer the Soviet Union, an attempt that the Japanese shrank from after being defeated at the Halha River by superior Soviet weaponry and tactics.³³¹ British officials had unique, unimpeachable intelligence, yet they were exceedingly slow to understand that Hitler was planning not a campaign of intimidation and blackmail but an all-out invasion.³³² Back on May 31, 1941, the British Code and Cipher School had reviewed the data gleaned from the Enigma intercepts and—finally—concluded that the rail movements eastward involved more than a bluff.

But the war office and the foreign office did not rule out a last-second, one-sided deal between Germany and the USSR (the apparent lack of German-Soviet negotiations in Moscow, they speculated, must have meant they were taking place in Berlin, so that Stalin could conceal them from his own officials). On June 7, Enigma delivered the Luftwaffe's order of battle for the USSR: this meant war was certain, and the experts judged that Poland and East Prussia were the principal staging grounds.³³³ "From every source at my disposal, including some most trustworthy, it looks as if a vast German onslaught on Russia was imminent," Churchill wrote to Roosevelt (June 14).³³⁴ The NKGB obtained a copy.³³⁵

British officials, however, did not relinquish the idea of an ultimatum that would allow Hitler to win without fighting, though there was debate about whether Stalin would make the necessary concessions, whatever they might be.³³⁶ The British could afford to be wrong; Stalin could not. June 15, a date for the onset of war mentioned by Scheliha ("Aryan") from Berlin, and Sorge ("Ramsay") from Tokyo, among others, passed without hostilities. That day, Ribbentrop instructed his ambassadors in the capitals of Germany's allies—Rome, Budapest, Tokyo—to inform the governments there that Germany intended "to introduce complete clarity in German-Russian relations at the latest at the beginning of July and in this regard to put forth certain demands." The directive went straight to Stalin.³³⁷ Also that day, Sorge composed a message (transmitted two days later) that "a German courier told the military attaché that he is convinced that the war against the USSR is delayed, probably, until the end of June. The military attaché does not know whether there will be war or not."³³⁸

From Berlin on June 16, Tupikov ("Arnold"), of military intelligence, transmitted the latest message from the Soviet Union's best spy, "Aryan," reporting that in Germany's high command, people were now talking of "June 22–25."^{339, 340} Also on June 16, the NKGB's Amayak Kobulov ("Zakhar"), in Berlin, again reported that "Elder" had relayed that "all military measures by Germany in preparation for an invasion of the USSR have been utterly completed, and that the strike can be expected at any moment.” “Elder” did not mention an ultimatum (his report five days earlier had still suggested it as a possibility).

Details on the imminent attack specified that German planes would in the first instance bomb Moscow factories producing parts for airplanes—but these, as Stalin knew, were beyond the range of German aircraft. The report added that “in air ministry circles the TASS communiqué of June 6 [sic] was being treated very ironically. They stress that the declaration can have no significance whatsoever.” And it stated that “in the economics ministry they say that at a meeting of managers designated for ‘occupied territories of the USSR,’ [Alfred] Rosenberg also spoke, and declared that ‘the concept of the “Soviet Union” should be wiped from the geographical map.’” Fitin sent a summary to Merkulov. “Late on the night of June 16–17 the commissar called me at my office,” Fitin would recall, “and said that at 1:00 p.m. he and I had been summoned to see I. V. Stalin.”

In the Little Corner, Stalin did not invite them to sit. Fitin noticed a pile of intelligence reports on the felt table, with his latest on top. As he reported, the despot paced the office. Then, complaining intemperately of disinformation in the reports of imminence of war, Stalin ordered that they go back and recheck all the messages from “Corsican” and “Elder.”³⁴¹ “Despite our deep knowledge and firm intention to defend our point of view on the material received by the intelligence directorate, we were in an agitated state,” Fitin would later recall. “This was the Leader of the party and country with unimpeachable authority. And it could happen that something did not please Stalin or he saw an oversight on our part and any one of us could end up in a very unenviable situation.”³⁴² Stalin’s displeasure was indeed severe. “To Comrade Merkulov,” he wrote in bright green pencil across the commissar’s cover note accompanying Fitin’s report,

“you can send your ‘source’ from German aviation HQ to his fucking mother. This is not a ‘source’ but a disinformationist.”³⁴³

• • •

WHEN CRIPPS HAD LEFT MOSCOW FOR LONDON, Nazi officials feared the worst: a trip to finalize details of a British-Soviet agreement.³⁴⁴ Germany’s anxieties testify to the potential of this option, which Stalin never pursued. Cripps, for his part, at a June 16 British cabinet meeting, was still expecting the German ultimatum to the USSR, which had never been part of Hitler’s intent.³⁴⁵ Once apprised of the secret Enigma intelligence, however, Cripps changed his mind and lunched with the Soviet envoy. “Hitler cannot embark on the final and decisive attack against Britain before the potential threat to Germany from the East is eliminated,” Maisky wrote of their conversation in his diary (June 18). “The Red Army is a powerful force, and by 1942, when all the shortcomings revealed by the Finnish campaign have been eradicated, it will be too late for the Germans to attack the Soviet Union. . . . Cripps is certain that [Hitler] will strike. Moreover, Cripps is in possession of absolutely reliable information that these are Hitler’s plans. . . . The members of the British Government with whom Cripps has spoken think that before an attack against the USSR, Hitler would present us with an ultimatum. Cripps does not share these views. Hitler will simply fall on us without warning, because he is not interested in this or that amount of food or raw materials which he can receive from the USSR, but in the complete destruction of the country and the annihilation of the Red Army.”³⁴⁶

On June 18, General Köstring, knowing Hitler’s eagerness to learn of any Soviet general mobilization (which could serve as a convenient pretext), nonetheless reaffirmed to Berlin the truth: the Soviet Union remained calm.³⁴⁷ Stalin saw the world in the darkest hues, as shaped by unseen sinister forces, with enemies lurking everywhere and no one’s motives to be trusted. But in what was by far the grandest challenge of his life, his pathological suspiciousness undermined him. In the machinations during 1941, he perceived two games: a British effort to entangle him in a war with Hitler and a German effort to intimidate and blackmail him. Neither was the game that was actually on. Ironically, the extensive penetration of Germany by dedicated antifascist agents became another weapon in Nazi hands, thanks to astute German disinformation and Stalin's credulousness. Of course, the despot was far from alone in his misperceptions. But here was the greatest irony of all: even if he had been able to find the signal in the noise, it might not have done him much good. Stalin had allowed the Germans to see firsthand that he had forced into existence an army of colossal size, loaded with modern weaponry. But the Red Army's forward defense posture, the core of Soviet military doctrine, which both Stalin and the high command fully shared, meant that deep German penetration was a foregone conclusion. That deadly vulnerability would have held even in the event of a preemptive Soviet strike.³⁴⁸ For all that, however, into the third week of June, Stalin had one option left—and it worried Hitler.

CODA: LITTLE CORNER, SATURDAY,

JUNE 21, 1941

The only certain thing is that we face either a battle of global proportions between the Third Reich and the Soviet Empire or the most gigantic case of blackmail in world history.

VILHELM ASSARASSON, *Swedish envoy in Moscow, telegram to Stockholm, June 21, 1941*¹

Suddenly addressing me with “thou,” he said, “Thou must always keep touch with the Russian emperor; there, no conflict is necessary.”

OTTO VON BISMARCK, *recalling the words of a dying Kaiser Wilhelm I*²

STALIN PACED AND PACED IN HIS KREMLIN OFFICE, with his usual short steps, gripping a pipe in the hand of his good arm. It was Saturday, June 21, 1941. The night before, he had repaired after midnight to his Near Dacha, in the woods at Kuntsevo, returning to the Kremlin in the afternoon.³ From his office suite on the bel étage of the tsarist-era Imperial Senate, a person could see the whole world—or, at least, Stalin’s world. Over the years, many of the party bosses and industrial managers, military men and secret police, scientists and artists who were granted an audience surmised that he paced to control his explosive emotions or, alternately, to unnerve those in his company. Invariably, he alone was up, trundling back and forth, sidling up to people while they were speaking or just after they had finished, looking them in the eye or the back. Only a few intimates knew that Stalin suffered nearly constant pain in the joints of his legs, which may have been a genetic condition and which the movement partly alleviated.⁴ He also strolled the Kremlin grounds, between the Senate and the Arsenal, usually alone, touching the leaves on the trees and shooing away the black ravens. (Afterward, the guards came and massacred the birds.)⁵ Stalin’s nearly constant motion mimicked his cascading thoughts. For a full year now, essentially since the stunning fall of France to the Germans in June 1940, he had lived in a state of unbearable tension.⁶

Pravda (June 21) reported that Turkmenistan's Central Committee had just concluded a two-day plenum devoted to cotton. The newspaper also rebuked the Stalingrad Tractor Factory for not producing a single ax or frying pan, of the tens of thousands ordered; exhorted a loss-free gathering of the grain harvest; and remained silent about how the German embassy personnel were being evacuated, along with oil paintings, antique rugs, and silver.⁷ The NKGB, for its part, reported the mass German exodus and that the Italian embassy, too, had received instructions to evacuate.⁸ Intelligence warnings of imminent titanic war were coming from everywhere. The Soviet agent Pavel Shatev ("Costa"), an ethnic Macedonian separatist, reported from Sofia (June 21) that a German emissary had told an official of allied Bulgaria that "a military confrontation is expected on June 21 or 22."⁹ Zhou Enlai passed on, through Comintern channels, that Chiang Kai-shek "is declaring insistently that Germany will attack the USSR, and is even giving a date: June 21, 1941!" which prompted Dimitrov to phone Molotov that morning. "The situation is unclear," Molotov told him. "There is a major game under way. Not everything depends on us."¹⁰

Stalin had eliminated private property and made himself responsible for the Soviet equivalents of Washington, Wall Street, and Hollywood all rolled into one, and all rolled into one person, an extreme despotism. He complained of fatigue, especially toward the end of his long workdays, and suffered from insomnia, a condition never acknowledged publicly, but manifest in the now fully nocturnal rhythm of the vast functionary kingdom under him. A tiny group of insiders knew of his infections and multiday fevers. Rumors of various health problems had circulated abroad, and the use of foreign doctors had long ago been discontinued, but a narrow circle of Russian physicians had acquired detailed knowledge of his illnesses and of his bodily deformities, including his barely usable left arm, the thick, discolored toenails on his right foot, and the two webbed toes on his left foot (an omen, in traditional Russia, of Satanic influence). For long periods, Stalin resisted being seen by any doctor, and he had ceased using medicines from the Kremlin apothecary that were issued in his name.¹¹ The household staff had stopped bringing his meals from the Kremlin canteen, cooking them in his apartment and, in his presence, tasting from the plates. All the same, Stalin's stomach was a wreck. He suffered from regular bouts of diarrhea.¹²

For the fifth consecutive year, since his holiday decision to intervene in Spain, he had no plans to travel to his Sochi getaway. Young Pioneers were departing for summer camps, and a new aquatic center was set to open at Khimki, just outside the capital. Posters advertised the upcoming appearance at Moscow's Hermitage summer theater of Leonid Utyosov and his jazz band, whose magical tunes the entire country could whistle, from the Baltic to the Pacific.¹³ Stalin paced and paced in his office inside the Imperial Senate, which had been built by the Teutonic empress of Russia, Catherine the Great, for "the glorification of Russian statehood." A few decades after its opening, in early fall 1812, Napoleon had arrived with his invading forces. The French Grande Armée—full of Western Christian Poles, Italians, and Germans, too—had defecated in the Kremlin's Orthodox churches and taken potshots at the holy icons. After cunning Russian resistance starved the occupiers, a retreating Napoleon had ordered the Kremlin blown to pieces. Heavy rains doused the fuses, limiting the damage, but explosives destroyed parts of the walls and several towers. The Imperial Senate suffered a fire.

Stalin's Kremlin, too, had been violated, albeit not in the way that he long feared. Inside, the long, red-carpeted corridors to and from his Little Corner were attended by an army of sentries. "See how many of them there are?" he once remarked to a military commander. "Each time I take this corridor, I think, which one? If this one, he will shoot me in the back, and if it is the one around the corner, he will shoot me in the front." The commander, Admiral Ivan Isakov, had been born Hovhannes Ter-

Isahakyan, an Armenian who shared Caucasus heritage with Stalin but, like everyone else, was dumbfounded by such hypersuspicion.¹⁴ In fact, there had never been a single genuine assassination attempt against Stalin. But the “Man of Steel”—“deeper than the ocean, higher than the Himalayas, brighter than the sun, teacher of the universe,” in the words of the Kazakh national poet—was being stalked from afar by a onetime Austrian corporal and former house painter. The pair offered a study in contrasts: Hitler the undisciplined “artist,” Stalin the trained seminarian; Hitler the anti-Semite German nationalist, Stalin the Marxist-Leninist imperial Russian nationalist. Not just their different personalities, however, but their countries’ very different histories and geographies, and their different systems of rule, had produced clashing geopolitical aims.¹⁵

Hitler had won the Second World War. He had annexed his native Austria, the Czech lands, much of Poland, and a strip of Lithuania, creating the Greater Germany that in 1871 Otto von Bismarck had deliberately avoided forging during the wars of German unification (deeming Austria-Hungary’s existence vital for the balance of power). Hitler’s troops had occupied Norway, Denmark, the Low Countries, the Balkans, and northern France. The Führer received obeisance from France’s World War I lion, Marshal Philippe Pétain (now the chief of state of rump Vichy), and other vassals, such as the Conducător of Romania (Ion Antonescu), “His Serene Highness” of landlocked Hungary (Admiral Miklós Horthy), the Catholic-priest ruler of Slovakia (Jozef Tiso), the fascist puppet of Croatia (Ante Pavelić), Bulgaria’s tsar (Boris III), the president of Finland, and the Italian duke, not to mention the generalissimo of Spain. The Führer essentially controlled all of Europe from the English Channel to the Soviet border, for only Sweden and Switzerland remained neutral, and both cooperated with Nazi Germany economically. True, the defiant Brits still refused to come to terms, but London could never overturn Berlin’s continental dominance. And Hitler had the nonaggression pact with Stalin. Would he really gamble and risk all his winnings by attacking? Had not Napoleon tried and failed? In 1812, facing the window before Russian winter, Napoleon had invaded on June 24.

• • •

JUNE 21 COULD scarcely have been more stifling, and Stalin's top aide, Alexander Poskryobyshev, was sweating profusely, his window open but the leaves on the trees outside utterly still.¹⁶ The son of a cobbler, like the despot whom he served, he occupied the immediate outer office through which all visitors had to pass, and invariably they would spray him with questions—"Why did the Master have me summoned?" "What's his mood?"—to which Poskryobyshev would laconically answer, "You'll find out." He was indispensable, handling all the phone calls and document piles in just the way the despot preferred. But Stalin had allowed Beria to imprison Poskryobyshev's beloved wife as a "Trotskyite" in 1939. (Beria had sent a large basket of fruit to their two baby girls; he then executed their mother.)¹⁷ Now, Poskryobyshev sat at his desk trying to cool down with a bottle of Narzan mineral water, under a photograph of a youthful Stalin wearing a pointy, red-starred civil war cap. On Stalin's instructions, at around 2:00 p.m., he phoned General Ivan Tyulenev, head of the Moscow military district. Soon the general heard Stalin's "muffled voice" asking, "Comrade Tyulenev, what is the situation concerning Moscow's antiaircraft defenses?" After a brief report, Stalin said, "Listen, the situation is unsettled and therefore you should bring the antiaircraft defenses of Moscow up to 75 percent of their readiness state."¹⁸

Poskryobyshev thumped the latest intelligence, delivered by field courier, onto Stalin's desk. Rather than purloined documents, almost all of it was hearsay. From London, Ambassador Maisky, despite having been given British intelligence about German force concentrations (gleaned, unbeknownst to him, from Enigma codebreaking), wrote to Moscow (June 21) that he had told Cripps, "As before, I consider a German attack on the USSR unlikely.”¹⁹ But from Berlin, Ambassador Dekanozov—who also knew the view in the Kremlin and the consequences of contradicting it—was finally reporting, under the influence of the best spies in the Soviet network, that Germany’s actions signaled an imminent invasion.²⁰ Stalin evidently concluded that his Berlin envoy had been fed disinformation by British agents and stated, “Dekanozov is not such a smart fellow to be able to see that.”²¹

From Tokyo, Max Clausen (June 21) radioed yet another message from Sorge, this one composed the day before: “The German ambassador in Tokyo, Ott, told me a war between Germany and the USSR is inevitable.”²² The dispatch gave no start date. For Stalin, the question was not whether war with the Nazi regime was inescapable, but whether it was inescapable this year.²³ Scores and scores of invasion warnings had accumulated on his desk, but just about every reported date—including at least fourteen specific ones—had passed. These ranged from the earliest, such as “March 1941” (transmitted on December 29, 1940), “May 20,” “April or May,” “April 6,” “April 20,” or “May 15 to June 15,” to the more recent: “either in May or after defeating Britain,” “not today or tomorrow,” “May 18,” “May 25,” “in late May,” “summer 1941 before the harvest gathering,” “at the beginning of June,” “no later than June 15,” “around June 15,” “June 15,” and “June 15–20.” The only remaining possibilities were “June 22–25” (reported on June 16) and “June 21 or 22.”²⁴ The invasion window would soon shut; Stalin was virtually home free for another year.

Never mind the secret intelligence: warnings were splashed across the front pages of the global press. But knowing how he himself used newspapers, Stalin took the screaming headlines to be planted provocations. He reasoned that Britain (and the United States) wanted nothing more than for the USSR and Nazi Germany to become embroiled in war—which was true—but as a result, he dismissed all warnings of a German attack. He knew that Germany was experiencing severe shortages—again true—so he reasoned that it needed even more supplies from him, and that a German invasion would be self-defeating because it would put those supplies at risk. He knew that Germany had lost the First World War because it had fought on two fronts—also true—and so he reasoned that the Germans understood that it would be suicidal for them to attack the USSR before defeating Britain in the west.²⁵ This logical reasoning had become Stalin's trap, enabling the Germans to spread a seemingly all-encompassing explanation for what they could not conceal: their colossal troop buildup. It was supposedly not for war but for extorting Soviet concessions.²⁶ When Stalin intemperately damned his intelligence as contaminated by disinformation, he was spot-on.²⁷ But the despot had no idea which parts were disinformation, and which might be accurate intelligence. He labeled as "disinformation" whatever he chose not to believe.

The Nazis' brilliant disinformation campaign generated reams of Soviet intelligence reports saying both that war was coming and that there would be blackmail—and if the latter was true, the former need not be. The fake ultimatum became for Stalin the ultimate truth, something that, given his lack of confidence in the Red Army's prospects against the Wehrmacht, he desperately needed to be true.

Blackmail certainly fit Hitler's profile. Early on, the British had dismissed the German buildup in the east and the accompanying rumors of a military showdown there as "wishful thinking." Then they latched on to the Hitler-ultimatum theory, which many British officials did not relinquish even after decrypted Enigma intercepts exposed real-time German war orders. While Göring told his high-placed, notoriously indiscreet British contacts that he had personally drawn up a list of demands to be presented to the Soviets so that Germany could continue the fight against Britain, Goebbels's men launched rumors that the Führer would soon demand a ninety-nine-year lease on Ukraine.²⁸ Stalin found himself in the reverse of the role in which he had placed Finland in 1939. The crucial difference was that, whereas he had issued his demands to the Finns and sought to negotiate, he was still waiting upon Hitler's, and Hitler had no intention to negotiate. In the meantime, Germany had attained the buildup necessary for an invasion.

• • •

COLONEL GEORGY ZAKHAROV, a decorated fighter pilot, had been ordered to conduct a full daylight reconnaissance of the border region on the German side, and he reported that the Wehrmacht was poised to invade.²⁹ The NKGB had discovered that German saboteurs brazenly crossing into the USSR had been instructed that “in the event German troops cross the frontier before they return to Germany, they must report to any German troop unit located on Soviet territory.”³⁰ Soviet counterintelligence noted vigorous German recruitment of disaffected Belorussians, Balts, and Ukrainians, who were forming underground groups and engaging in terrorism long after Stalin's supposed annihilation of the fifth column in the terror. Overburdened Soviet rail lines that were needed to transport troops westward were swamped with tens of thousands of “anti-Soviet elements” being deported eastward from the annexed territories.³¹ On June 21, Merkulov issued an order to Ukraine for a new wave of preemptive arrests to interdict sabotage: “Immediately telegraph by what deadline the indicated operation could be readied by you, and provide an overall orientation about the number of people who could be removed, with a breakdown by categories.”³²

Stalin paced and paced. Actually, it was more like a waddle as he swung his hips around awkwardly, the result of that childhood collision with a horse-drawn carriage. He wore, as ever, his signature baggy breeches, which he tucked into his well-worn black leather boots, as well as matching khaki tunic, buttoned at the top, simple and functional, and different from the bourgeois suits favored by Lenin. The despot's clothes were martial in look without being an actual military uniform, a style first popularized in Russia by Alexander Kerensky as well as, yes, Trotsky. His former nemesis had survived sixteen years beyond Lenin's death—an eternity, burning its way into the Little Corner with his acid pen. But what had Trotsky marshaled—a few thousand dispersed followers?—before Stalin's assassins managed to drive that ice pick through his skull in the run-down Mexican villa?³³ German tanks, warplanes, and pontoon bridges had been advanced into the barbed-wire-protected inner zone of the border, and the barbed wire itself was being removed. The click and whir of German motors resounded across to the Soviet side.

At the centerpiece of the Little Corner, the felt-covered conference table, the despot had held countless sessions devoted to war preparations. “Stalin had an enormous capacity for work,” observed Molotov, who, despite his demotion from head of government, had kept his reserved seat at the table. “If the subject was cannons—then cannons; if tanks—then tanks.”³⁴ He had forced into being upward of 9,000 new industrial enterprises during the three Five-Year Plans, and Soviet military production grew even faster than GDP for a decade.³⁵ He had overseen the formation of 125 new divisions just since 1939, and the Red Army now stood at 5.37 million troops, the largest in the world.³⁶ It had 25,000 tanks and 18,000 fighter planes, three to four times Germany's stocks. Stalin knew that Germany was underestimating this massive force out of prejudice as well as ignorance, so he had arranged German visits to Soviet aviation and tank factories, and even allowed Göring's planes nearly unimpeded reconnaissance of Soviet troop concentrations, airfields, naval bases, and fuel and ammunition depots.³⁷ Stalin also had his spies spread rumors that, if attacked, Soviet aircraft would assault Berlin with chemical and biological agents. In Hitler's shoes, Stalin would have been deterred.

Of course, if your own country really was so well armed, why not let the foolish enemy underestimate you? Because the Winter War with Finland had exposed Soviet military weaknesses not just to Hitler, but also to Stalin.³⁸ The Red Army was still in the middle of its gigantic, protracted, contradictory post-Finland rearmament and reorganization.

Stalin's early commitment to mass armament production, amid rapid technological change, meant that more than 10,000 Soviet tanks (T-26s and BT-7s) were now too light, while the more advanced, heavier T-34 (45-millimeter-thick armor) and KV (75-millimeter armor) numbered only around 1,800 units. Similarly, the most advanced warplanes (Yak-1, MiG-3, Pe-2) made up just one quarter of the air force.³⁹ Stalin's war preparations also bore the mark of his executions of thousands of loyal officers, especially top commanders like Vasily Blyukher, whose eye had been deposited in his hand before he died under torture, and the gifted Mikhail Tukhachevsky, whose blood had been splattered all over his "confession" to being a German agent just before Stalin signed the Pact.⁴⁰ Now, 85 percent of the officer corps was thirty-five or under, while those older than forty-five constituted around 1 percent. Fully 620 generals were under forty-five, 393 under fifty-five, and only 63 older than fifty-five. Many had been majors a short time earlier. The Red Army had one officer for every nine soldiers, versus one for every nineteen in Japan and one for twenty-nine in Germany, but Soviet officer ranks were swelled by those in the army's political apparatus. Of the 659,000 Soviet officers, only around half had completed a military school, while one in four had the bare minimum (a few courses), and one in eight had no military education whatsoever.⁴¹

Lately, the despot's morose side had gotten the upper hand. "Stalin was unnerved and irritated by persistent reports (oral and written) about the deterioration of relations with Germany," Admiral Kuznetsov would recall.⁴² Stalin's face gave away stress—even fear—to the point that he sometimes failed to fill his pipe with the Herzegovina Flor cigarette tobacco that had stained his teeth and mustache yellow. “He felt that danger was imminent,” recalled Khrushchev, the party boss of Ukraine, who was in Moscow until June 20. “Would our country be able to deal with it? Would our army deal with it?”⁴³

• • •

SINCE MAY 1941, nighttime use of electric lighting in the Kremlin had been forbidden. But June 21 was the summer solstice, the longest day of the year. At around 5:00 p.m., Stalin ordered Alexander Shcherbakov, party boss of Moscow province and city, and Vasily Pronin, chairman of the Moscow soviet executive committee, to keep all ward party secretaries at their posts.⁴⁴ At 6:27 p.m., Molotov entered the Little Corner, the first visitor, as usual. At 7:05, in walked Voroshilov, Beria, Voznesensky, Malenkov, Timoshenko, Admiral Kuznetsov, and Grigory Safonov, the young deputy procurator general, who was responsible for the military courts on railroads and in the fleets. The discussion apparently revolved around recent developments pointing toward war, versus Stalin’s dread of provocations that might incite it.⁴⁵ Germany had achieved the buildup necessary to attack. Filipp Golikov, of Soviet military intelligence, estimated Germany’s concentration of forces against the USSR at only 120 to 122 of around 285 total divisions, versus 122 to 126 against Britain (the other 44 to 48 were said to be reserves).⁴⁶ In fact, there were around 200 divisions arrayed against the USSR, including 154 German ones—a total of at least 3 million Wehrmacht soldiers and half a million troops from its Axis partners, as well as 3,600 tanks, 2,700 aircraft, and 700,000 field guns and other artillery, 600,000 motor vehicles, and 650,000 horses. The Soviets had massed around 170 divisions, perhaps 2.7 million men in the west, along with 10,400 tanks and 9,500 aircraft.⁴⁷ The two largest armies in world history stood cheek by jowl on a border some 2,000 miles long.

Such immense Soviet troop concentrations testify to both Stalin's understanding that Germany represented a monumental danger and his misunderstanding of blitzkrieg. But only one of the two vast armies on the frontier had occupied its firing positions.⁴⁸ Stalin had allowed covert strategic redeployments westward and lately had finally yielded to Timoshenko and Zhukov's insistence that the Red Army commence camouflaging of aerodromes, tank parks, warehouses, and military installations (which in many cases would require repainting).⁴⁹ But he would not permit assumption of combat positions, which he feared would only play into the hands of German militarist-adventurers, who craved war and schemed to force Hitler's hand, the way they had pushed the Wehrmacht beyond the agreed-upon German-Soviet line in Poland in 1939. Soviet planes were forbidden from flying within six miles of the border. Timoshenko and Zhukov, subject to the despot's admonitions and the watchful eye of Beria and his minions, made sure that frontline commanders did not cause or yield to "provocation."⁵⁰ Beria also tasked the assassin Sudoplatov with organizing "an experienced strike force to counter any frontier incident that might be used as an excuse to start a war."⁵¹

Soviet intelligence was reporting that not just Germany but also Romania, Hungary, Slovakia, and Finland were at full war readiness.⁵² But Stalin, having long ago ceded the initiative, was effectively paralyzed. Just about anything he did could be used by Hitler to justify an invasion. On June 20, the head of the Soviet Union's Riga port had telephoned Mikoyan to report that all 25 German ships docked there were preparing to leave en masse on June 21, without having finished loading or unloading, and had asked whether to detain them. When Mikoyan hastened over to the Little Corner with the news, Stalin had ordered him to let the German vessels go, because if the Soviets detained them, Hitler could regard that as a justification for war.⁵³ While all German vessels departed safely on June

21, a Soviet freighter, the Magnitogorsk, hastily sent a panicked radiogram, not even using ciphers, informing the Baltic Commercial Fleet in Leningrad that it was being prevented from departing the German port of Danzig, without explanation. More than forty Soviet merchant ships were immobilized at German ports.⁵⁴

At 7:00 p.m., Gerhard Kegel (“X”), the Soviet spy in the German embassy, had slipped out for the second time that day to tell his Soviet handler, Leontyev (“Petrov”), that German personnel living outside the facility had been ordered to relocate into it immediately, and that “all think that this very night there will be war.”⁵⁵ At 8:00 p.m., Golikov had a courier dispatched to Stalin, Molotov, and Timoshenko, with this new piece of intelligence in sealed envelopes.⁵⁶ In the Little Corner, Timoshenko, Kuznetsov, Safonov, and Voznesensky were dismissed at 8:15. Malenkov was dismissed five minutes later. Nothing significant was decided.⁵⁷

Zhukov phoned in to report that yet another German soldier had defected across the frontier, warning of an invasion within a few hours.⁵⁸ This was precisely the kind of “provocation” Stalin feared. He ordered Zhukov to the Kremlin, along with the just-departed Timoshenko. They entered Stalin’s office at 8:50, accompanied by the old Stalin crony Marshal Budyonny, a deputy defense commissar.⁵⁹ Whereas the two pince-nez minions Molotov and Beria provided an echo chamber for Stalin’s denials that Hitler was going to attack, the two peasant commanders could see that Germany was coiled to invade.⁶⁰ Still, when Stalin insisted otherwise, they presumed that he possessed superior information and insight. In any case, they knew the costs of losing his trust. “Everyone had in their memory the events of recent years,” Zhukov would recall. “And to say out loud that Stalin was wrong, that he is mistaken, to say it plainly, could have meant that without leaving the building, you would be taken to have coffee with Beria.”⁶¹

Nonetheless, the pair evidently used the latest defector to urge a general mobilization—tantamount, in Stalin’s mind, to war. “Didn’t German generals send that defector across the border in order to provoke a conflict?” Stalin asked. “No,” answered Timoshenko. “We think the defector is telling the truth.” Stalin: “What do we do now?” Timoshenko allowed the silence to persist. Finally, the defense commissar suggested, “Put the troops on the western border on high alert.” He and Zhukov had come prepared with a draft directive.⁶²

Where was the ultimatum? Stalin had continued to try to engage Hitler after the TASS bulletin gambit fell flat. “Molotov has asked for permission to visit Berlin, but has been fobbed off,” Goebbels wrote in his diary (June 18). “A naïve request.”⁶³ Dekanozov had appeared at the German foreign ministry that same day without an appointment, mentioning nothing of a Molotov visit but inducing terror all the same.⁶⁴ “The main political worry here is not to afford Stalin the opportunity for some kind of generous gesture to upend all our cards at the last minute,” state secretary Weizsäcker, Ribbentrop’s deputy, had written in his diary, but then he noted that the inept Soviet envoy had “merely brought up a few current matters of lesser importance.” Weizsäcker had cleverly laid out a map of the Near East, as if Germany’s attention was on British positions. “The ambassador took leave of me without anything whatever having been said about German-Soviet relations.”⁶⁵ On the morning of June 21, Molotov had sent a telegram instructing Dekanozov to hand-deliver an attached diplomatic protest of German border violations to Ribbentrop, and to use it to elicit clarifications.⁶⁶ “Several times that day Moscow telephoned, pressing us to carry out our instructions,” an embassy duty officer recalled. But Ribbentrop had deliberately vanished from the capital and sent instructions to inform Dekanozov that he would be contacted as soon as the Nazi foreign minister returned, whenever that might be. The Soviet duty officer, remaining behind after other employees had departed at around 7:00 p.m., kept calling the German foreign ministry every thirty minutes.

• • •

INSTEAD OF WAITING to see Hitler's ultimatum, Stalin could have peremptorily declared his response to it. This was the last option he had left, and a potentially powerful one. Hitler feared that the wily Soviet despot would somehow seize the initiative and unilaterally, publicly declare dramatic, far-reaching concessions. Stalin appears to have discussed possible Soviet concessions with Molotov, but if he did, no record survives. Evidently he expected Germany to demand Ukraine, the Caucasus oil fields, and unimpeded transit for the Wehrmacht through Soviet territory to engage the British in the Near East and India. In June, In the Steppes of Ukraine, the procollectivization farce by the Stalin Prize winner Oleksandr Korniychuk, opened in Moscow, as if to signal that those steppes would not be handed over.⁶⁷ The despot used Prague in the Greater Reich and other points to disseminate his own disinformation, which made its way to Berlin, about a supposed split in Soviet ruling circles—Stalin for concessions, military brass for war—and how even if Germany did not attack but proceeded to demand Ukraine, Stalin would be overthrown in a putsch by a “Russian patriotic-imperialist movement” eager to fight, forcing Germany into a two-front war.⁶⁸

Stalin's disinformation campaign, too, was captive to German disinformation. Unlike Germany's, it was not based upon genuine insight into his adversary's thinking.

A cunning despot could have publicly declared his willingness to join the hostilities against Britain, exacting revenge against the great power he most reviled and, crucially, robbing Hitler of his argument that Britain was holding out in anticipation of eventual Soviet assistance. Instead, or in parallel to that, Stalin could have demonstrably begun the withdrawal of Soviet forces back from the entire frontier, which would have struck at the heart of the Nazi leader's public war rationale: a supposed "preventive attack" against the "Soviet buildup."⁶⁹

Instead of acting cunningly, Stalin fooled himself. He clung to the belief that Germany could not attack before defeating the UK, even though Britain did not have an army on the continent and was neither defending territory there nor in a position to invade from there.⁷⁰ He assumed that when Hitler finally issued the ultimatum, he could buy time by negotiating: possibly giving in, if the demands were tolerable, thereby averting war, or, more likely, dragging out any talks beyond the date when Hitler could have launched an invasion, gaining one more critical year. Failing that, Stalin further assumed that even if hostilities broke out, the Germans would need at least two more weeks to fully mobilize their main invasion force, allowing him time to mobilize, too. When his spies out of Berlin and elsewhere reported that the Wehrmacht had "completed all war preparations," he did not grasp that this meant that day one would bring full main-force engagement.

• • •

WORD FROM THE SOVIET embassy in Berlin was that Ribbentrop was still "out of town." In the Little Corner, while the relatively heated discussion with Timoshenko and Zhukov continued, Molotov stepped out. Stalin had had him summon Schulenburg to the Imperial Senate for 9:30 p.m.⁷¹ The German ambassador arrived promptly, direct from overseeing secret document bonfires at the embassy, on nearby Leontyev Lane. The count had been deeply disappointed that the Hitler-Stalin Pact, in which he had played an important role, had turned out to be an instrument not for a Munich-style territorial deal over Poland to avoid war, but for the onset of the Second World War.⁷² Now he feared the much-rumored German-Soviet clash, and he had gone to Berlin to see Hitler himself and come back empty-handed. In desperation, he had recently sent his embassy counselor, Gebhardt von Walther, to Berlin to try one last time to elucidate the suspected war plans and obtain instructions, but this had failed as well.⁷³ Molotov demanded to know why Germany was evacuating personnel, thereby fanning rumors of war. Why had Germany not responded to the TASS bulletin?

Molotov handed the count the protest detailing systematic German violations of Soviet airspace that had been intended for Ribbentrop, and plaintively told him that “the Soviet government is unable to understand the cause of Germany’s dissatisfaction in relation to the USSR, if such dissatisfaction exists.” He complained that “there was no reason for the German government to be dissatisfied with Russia.” Schulenburg responded that “posing those issues was justified,” but he shrugged that “he was not able to answer them, because Berlin utterly refrains from informing him.” Molotov had gone toe to toe with Hitler in the gargantuan Nazi Chancellery, inducing the Führer’s interpreter to observe, “No foreign visitor had ever spoken to [Hitler] in this way in my presence.”⁷⁴ But now the foreign affairs commissar could merely express, several times, “his regrets that [Hitler’s envoy] was unable to answer the questions raised.”⁷⁵

Molotov shuffled back to Stalin’s Little Corner, a two- or three-minute walk, descending one floor.⁷⁶ Voroshilov, Timoshenko, Zhukov, and Budyonny were still there; Mekhlis arrived. Suddenly, around 10:00 p.m., amid the still suffocating heat, the winds gushed, billowing the curtains at open windows and blowing summer dust on the streets. Then came the thunderclaps. Moscow was struck by a torrential downpour.⁷⁷

Finally, Stalin yielded to his insistent soldiers. Timoshenko and Zhukov rushed out of the Little Corner at 10:20 p.m., armed, at long last, with full-scale war mobilization, Directive No. 1. “A surprise attack by the Germans is possible during 22–23 June 1941,” it stated. “The task of our forces is to refrain from any kind of provocative action that might result in serious complications.” It ordered that “during the night of June [21–] 22, 1941, the firing positions of the fortified regions on the state border are to be secretly occupied,” that “before dawn on June 22, 1941, all aircraft stationed in the field aerodromes are to be dispersed and carefully camouflaged,” that “all units are to be put in a state of military preparedness,” and that “no further measures are to be carried out without specific instructions.” It carried the signatures of Timoshenko and Zhukov. The military men had managed to delete an insertion by the despot that if the Germans attacked, Soviet commanders were to attempt to meet them, to settle any conflict. Still, in Stalin’s redaction, the high alert ordered the military to prepare for war but to avoid it.^{78}

Molotov, Voroshilov, and Beria remained in Stalin’s office, departing at 11:00 p.m.^{79} Whether they went together to the Near Dacha for supper, as usual, remains unclear. At some point, Stalin was left alone, and he retired. Timoshenko and Zhukov, meanwhile, had been chauffeured the short distance to the defense commissariat, on the Moscow River embankment. At around 11:00 p.m., Timoshenko summoned Admiral Kuznetsov from the naval commissariat, next door, to hear “very important information.” Kuznetsov arrived to find Timoshenko dictating while pacing, and Zhukov at a desk writing, his tunic unbuttoned. They related that they had been to the Kremlin a second time that night and obtained Stalin’s permission to raise Soviet armed forces to “readiness No. 1.” Timoshenko ordered Kuznetsov’s deputy, another admiral, to run back to naval HQ to radiogram the order to the fleet commands.^{80}

In Berlin, Ribbentrop’s deputy, Weizsäcker, finally agreed to receive Dekanozov. It was 9:30 p.m. in Berlin, 11:30 in Moscow. But this time, too, the Soviet envoy had brought no concrete proposals in the form of last-minute concessions. Dekanozov handed the baron the protest of the border violations that Schulenburg had already received from Molotov.

“When Herr Dekanozov tried to prolong the conversation somewhat, I told him that since I had an entirely different opinion from his and had to await the opinion of my government, it would be better not to go into the matter just now,” Germany’s state secretary noted of the exchange, which he terminated with the comment that “the reply will be forthcoming later.”⁸¹

• • •

IT BEING SATURDAY NIGHT, Soviet commanders up and down the frontier were hosting ensemble performances (with the exception of the Baltic military district, where the commander ignored admonitions to adopt a stance of nonchalance).⁸² In Minsk, 150 miles east of the border, the Officers’ Club put on The Wedding at Malinovka, a comic Soviet operetta about a village in the Ukrainian steppes during the civil war. The venue was packed. Attendees included the commander of the critical Western military district, Pavlov, his chief of staff, and his deputies. Six German aircraft had crossed the frontier in Pavlov’s region on a recent night. “Never mind. More self-control. I know, it has already been reported! More self-control!” Pavlov was overheard saying on the phone about the reports. As soon as Pavlov put the receiver down and prepared to greet a visitor, the apparatus rang again. “I know; it has been reported,” Pavlov was heard to say. “I know. Those at the top know better than us. That’s all.” He slammed down the phone.⁸³ During the operetta, Pavlov was interrupted in his box by a new report of unusual activity: the Germans had removed the barbed wire from their side of the border, and the sound of motors had grown louder, even at a distance. As he already knew but could do nothing about, an uninterrupted flow of German mechanized columns was moving forward in East Prussia along the Suwałki protrusion. Pavlov remained at the show.

Around midnight, Mikhail Kirponos, commander of the Kiev military district, called the defense commissariat on the high-frequency phone from his field HQ at Ternopol to report that another German had forded a river and crossed the border near Sokal (Ukraine) and said that Wehrmacht soldiers had taken up their firing positions, with tanks at their start lines. Zhukov called the Near Dacha to inform Stalin.⁸⁴ A little after midnight, a train carrying Soviet oil, manganese, and grain crossed the frontier into Greater Germany, its passage observed by waiting German divisions.⁸⁵ At around 1:00 a.m., Timoshenko called Pavlov on the high-frequency phone, evidently with word of Directive No. 1 to assume full combat readiness, and a caution not to succumb to provocation.⁸⁶

Some twelve hours earlier, precisely at 13:00 hours, Germany's high command had transmitted the password for war, "Dortmund." That afternoon, Hitler had received Admiral Raeder, Generals Keitel and Jodl, and Albert Speer, then, having already written a few days before to Romania's Antonescu, who was responsible for Germany's critical southern flank in the invasion, he composed explanatory letters for Italy's Mussolini, Finland's Ryti, and Hungary's Horthy.⁸⁷ Hitler's adjutant, Nicolaus von Below, noticed that he was "increasingly nervous and restless. The Führer talked a lot, walked up and down; he seemed impatient, waiting for something." In his residence in the Old Reich Chancellery, Hitler did not sleep for the second straight night. He took a meal in the dining room. He listened to Les Préludes, the symphonic poem by Franz Liszt. He phoned to summon Goebbels, who had just finished rewatching Gone with the Wind. The two walked up and down Hitler's drawing room for quite a while, finalizing the timing and content of the Führer's war proclamation for the next day, about the "salvation of Europe" and the intolerable danger of waiting any longer. Goebbels left at 2:30 a.m., returning to the propaganda ministry, where staff had been told to await him. "Everyone was absolutely astonished," he wrote, "even though most had guessed half of what was going on, and some all of it."⁸⁸

Timoshenko's ciphered radiograms of Directive No. 1 to military districts about advancing to full combat readiness while still avoiding provocations began to go out in the early hours of June 22. Most intended recipients in frontline positions failed to get word. One of Pavlov's subordinates, Major General A. A. Korobkov, of the Fourth Army, who that evening had watched a performance of Johann Strauss II's operetta The Gypsy Baron at Korbin, site of his field HQ, was left in the dark: his power and communications lines had been cut. Wehrmacht advance units, many in Red Army uniforms, had already crossed the border and sabotaged Soviet communications.⁸⁹ "The beginning of every war is like opening the door into a dark room," Hitler had told one of his private secretaries. "One never knows what is hidden in the darkness."⁹⁰

• • •

STALIN'S REGIME HAD REPRODUCED a deep-set pattern in Russian history—a country that considered itself a providential power with a special mission in the world, but that substantially lagged the other great powers to the west, a circumstance that time and again induced Russian rulers to turn to the state for a forced modernization to overcome or at least manage the power asymmetry. This urgent quest for a strong state had culminated, once more, in personal rule. Under Stalin's regime, both the apocalyptic bloodshed and the state's capacity to summon resources and popular involvement intensified, a consequence of the violent mass era that slightly predated but was blown open by the First World War, the heady promises of Marxism-Leninism, and Stalin's personal qualities. His despotic power derived not just from his control over the formidable levers of Leninist dictatorship, which he built, but from the ideology, which he shaped. His regime proved able to define the terms of public thought and individual identity, and he proved able to personify passions and dreams, to realize and represent a socialist modernity and Soviet might. With single-sentence telegrams or brief phone calls, he could spur the clunky Soviet party-state machinery into action, invoking discipline and intimidation, to be sure, but also emotionally galvanizing young functionaries who felt close personal ties to him, and millions more who would never come close to meeting him in person. Stalin was a student of historical forces, and of people, and his rule enabled those who came from nothing to feel world historically significant.

Stalin's regime was not merely a statist modernization, but a purported transcendence of private property and markets, of class antagonisms and existential alienation, a renewal of the social whole rent by the bourgeoisie, a quest for social justice on a global scale. In worldview and practice it was a conspiracy that perceived conspiracy everywhere and in everything, gaslighting itself. In administration it constituted a crusade for planning and control that generated a proliferation of improvised illegalities, a drive for order, and a system in which propaganda and myths about the "system" were the most systematized part. Amid the cultivated opacity and patent falsehoods, even most high officials were reduced to Kremlinology (rumors, parsing of "signals"). The fanatical hypercentralization was often self-defeating as well, but the cult of the party's and especially Stalin's infallibility proved to be the most dangerous flaw of his fallible rule. The superhuman resolve that he had demonstrated in launching and carrying through collectivization was, it turned out, accompanied by a surprising brittleness, which was exposed in his reaction to the criticism that the violent upheaval and famine sparked. Stalin became haunted not by the peasants' horrors under collectivization but by the party criticism of him regarding those horrors, which would become the dark spur of his mass murders in the wanton terror, made possible by Bolshevism but driven by him. The pandemonium of widespread accusations of treason that he fomented reflected not reality or even potential threats, but his own demons. The flip side—his fantasies of a cleansing cadre renewal via promotion of new people—did little to quell his anxieties, partly because of their glaring difficulty assimilating the Short Course he produced expressly for them.

By inclination, Stalin was a Russian nationalist in the imperial sense, and anti-Western, the core impulse of long-standing Russian-Eurasian political culture. Initially, the ambitious Soviet version of the quest to match the West in order to preserve Russia's anti-Western identity had increased the country's dependency on the superior West. But after wholesale technology transfer, Stalin's regime went on, at high cost and low efficiency, to develop sophisticated military and related industry to a degree unprecedented for even a military-first country. Geopolitically, however, whereas tsarist Russia had concluded foreign alliances for its security, the Soviet Union sought or could manage only nonaggression pacts. The country's self-isolation became ever more extreme. One flanking power, Japan, had spurred Stalin's no-holds-barred militarization, and after years of timid responses, he had finally decided to rebuff the challenge of this island power by flaunting the USSR's better-armed and better-commanded land forces in a border war. The other flanking power, Germany, presented an incalculably greater challenge, given the geography, Germany's military strength on land, and the special qualities of its ruler. Stalin insisted on calling fascism "reactionary," a supposed way for the bourgeoisie to preserve the old world.²¹ But Hitler turned out to be someone neither Marx nor Lenin had prepared Stalin for.

A lifelong Germanophile, Stalin appears to have been mesmerized by the might and daring of Germany's parallel totalitarian regime. For a time, he recovered his personal and political equilibrium in his miraculous Pact with Hitler, which deflected the German war machine, delivered a bounty of German machine tools, enabled the reconquest and Sovietization of tsarist borderlands, and reinserted the USSR into the role of arbitrating world affairs. Hitler had whetted and, reluctantly, abetted Stalin's own appetites. But far earlier than the despot imagined, his ability to extract profit from the immense danger posed by Hitler to Europe and beyond had run its course. This generated unbearable tension in Stalin's life and rule, yet he stubbornly refused to come to grips with the new realities, and not solely out of greed for German technology. Despite his insight into the human psyche, and demonic shrewdness, Stalin was blinkered by ideology and idées fixes. Churchill controlled not a single division on the Soviet frontier, yet Stalin remained absolutely obsessed with British imperialism, railing against the Versailles order long after Hitler had shredded it. He also obsessed over supposed secret British negotiations behind his back with Hitler.⁹²

For Hitler, the 1939 Pact with the USSR was nothing more than what the 1918 Brest-Litovsk Treaty with Germany had been for Lenin: a distasteful necessity, which, with luck, would not endure very long. Lenin's luck had been delivered by imperial Germany's idiotic precipitation of American entry into the First World War; Hitler's came from his own audacity and the mistakes of his slow-to-react, divided foreign adversaries. The alliance system had not caused the First World War, but the absence of alliances helped cause the Second. A debate continues over the possibility of a genuine Western-Soviet military alliance to deter and, if necessary, defeat Germany in the 1930s, including the logistical difficulties for any combined military action posed by recalcitrant Poland and Romania. But logistics can always be managed when the will is there. Sir Stafford Cripps, the maladroitness, well-intentioned British ambassador, grasped that German-Soviet relations were precarious, but he could bring neither his own government nor the Soviet Union anywhere near a British-Soviet rapprochement. Given the profundity of mutual distrust between London and Moscow, only an unequivocal perception by both of the urgency of state survival could have made a bilateral alliance possible, and even then, only for a time. Of course, survival was precisely what was at stake.

Hitler's racial, Social Darwinist, zero-sum understanding of geopolitics meant that both the USSR and Great Britain would have to be annihilated in order for Germany to realize its master race destiny. To be sure, in the immediate term, he thought in terms of domination of the European continent (Grossmacht), which required Lebensraum in the east. But in the longer term, he foresaw domination of the world (Weltmacht), which would require a blue-water fleet, bases rimming the Atlantic, and a colonial empire in the tropics for raw materials. That was incompatible with the continued existence of the British empire, at least in its present form. Hitler thus put himself in front of a stark choice of either agreeing to deepen the Pact with Stalin, to take on Britain now, which meant conceding at least a partial Soviet sphere in the Balkans and on the Black Sea—on top of the Soviet sphere in the Baltics—or, alternately, freeing himself from the infuriating dependency on Moscow to take on Britain later. In the end, military circumstances helped determine the sequencing: Hitler did not possess the air or naval capabilities or the depth of resources to prevail militarily over island Britain; he did command the land-based wherewithal to attempt to smash the USSR.

A commitment to a prolonged contest for supremacy with Britain, which Hitler expected to be aided more and more by the vast resources of the United States, made quick annihilation of the Soviet Union an absolutely necessary prelude.²³ Moreover, even though Hitler and the German high command knew the Soviet Union was not poised to attack, the invasion amounted to a preventive war all the same in his logic, for the Soviet Union was only getting stronger, and might itself attack at a time it deemed more advantageous. And so, while pushing Japan to attack British positions in East Asia, he had offered the British government a version of the pact he had concluded with Stalin, in order to violate the latter, and he seemed dumbfounded that the British government did not accept.²⁴ The Nazi leader had grasped his foe's imperial mind-set, and he was sincere when promising that, in exchange for a free hand on the continent, he would keep Britain's empire intact for now (its destruction, in any case, would redound to others besides Germany in the short term). He continued to hold out hope that Britain, patently weak militarily on land and therefore unable to defeat him, would see "reason." But Hitler had failed to grasp Britain's long-standing preference for a balance of power on the continent.⁹⁵ He did, however, perceive far more common interest between London and Moscow than either of them saw themselves.

During the all-out preparations for blitzkrieg against the USSR, Hitler continued to order that resources be devoted to preparing for a long naval and air war against the UK and the United States. May–June 1941 was the blackest period yet for Britain: its ships were being sunk and its cities bombed, while its position in the Balkans had been lost to Nazi domination. After German paratroopers had captured Crete, in late May 1941, the British position seemed grievously imperiled. Eleven days before the scheduled launch of the Soviet invasion, Hitler had dictated a draft of Directive No. 32, "Preparations for the Time After Barbarossa." It envisioned subdivision and exploitation of Soviet territories, as well as a pincer movement against the Suez Canal and British Near East positions via Bulgaria-Turkey, the Caucasus, and Iran-Iraq-Syria; the conquest of Gibraltar, northwest Africa, and the Spanish and Portuguese Atlantic islands, to eliminate the British in the Mediterranean; the building of coastal bases in West and possibly East Africa; and the creation of a German base in Afghanistan for seizing British India.⁹⁶ Had Hitler thrown all his might into this "peripheral strategy" rather than invading the USSR, Britain might not have survived.⁹⁷ The war with the Soviet Union would have gone ahead at some point, but with Britain knocked out of the picture. There would have been no British beachhead to assist an eventual U.S.-led Allied landing in Western Europe.⁹⁸

• • •

HITLER, ONE SCHOLAR HAS REMINDED US, cannot be explained in terms of his social origins or his early life and influences, a point that is no less applicable to Stalin.⁹⁹ The greatest shaper of Stalin's being was the building and running of a dictatorship, whereby he assumed responsibility for Russia's power in the world. In the name of socialism, Stalin, pacing in his Kremlin office, had grown accustomed to moving millions of peasants, workers—whole nations—across a sixth of the earth, on his own initiative, often consulting no one. But his world had become intensely constricted. Hitler had cornered the Soviet despot in his own Little Corner.

Stalin's dealings with Hitler differed from British appeasement in that he tried significant deterrence as well as accommodation, and he took as much as he gave. But Stalin's policy resembled British appeasement in that he was driven by a blinding desire to avoid war at all costs. He displayed strength of capabilities but not of will. Neither his fearsome resolve nor his supreme cunning—which had enabled him to vanquish his rivals and spiritually crush his inner circle—were in evidence in 1941. He shrank from trying to preempt Hitler militarily and failed to preempt him diplomatically.¹⁰⁰ In the end, however, the question of who most miscalculated is not a simple one. "Of all the men who can lay claim to having paved the way to the new Reich," meaning his Reich, Hitler liked to say, "one figure stands in awe-inspiring solitude: Bismarck."¹⁰¹ Bismarck, of course, had built his chancellorship on avoiding conflict with Russia. When the bust of Bismarck was transferred from the old German Chancellery to Hitler's new Nazi Chancellery, it had broken off at the neck. A replica was hastily made, aged by soaking in cold tea. The omen of Bismarck's broken neck was kept from the Führer.¹⁰²

SOVIET ADMINISTRATIVE STRUCTURE

ONCE PRIVATE PROPERTY WAS ELIMINATED, in 1929–30, all institutions in the Soviet Union effectively became statized. At the same time, Communist party organizations expanded inside every institution. The result was an intensification of the party-state dualism, structurally akin to a theocracy, that had been born with the revolution and the civil war. The state, in turn, was variegated, such that one part essentially had no power but another had a great deal.

Party rule comprised periodic gatherings of delegates to a Party Congress (technically the highest body), a party conference (which possessed none of the powers of a congress), the Central Committee (the ruling body between congresses), the politburo (which usurped the Central Committee's policy-making function), the orgburo (which handled personnel decisions), and the secretariat (in which sat the secret department, Stalin's dictatorship within the dictatorship). The secretariat and the orgburo, along with their local equivalents, constituted the "apparatus," which had innumerable departments and whose functionaries were full-time party workers or apparatchiks. All party members, the vast majority of whom did not work in the apparatus, were duty bound to follow party dictates. To investigate party members, the regime had a Central Control Commission (with local affiliates), which until 1934 was joined with a state body known as the workers' and peasants' inspectorate.

Stalin was the general secretary of the Communist party from the inception of the office, in 1922, until 1934, when he became just a "secretary" (but continued to be listed first). He had held a state post (commissar of nationalities) before 1922 but would not hold another until spring 1941.

The weighty component of the state was the executive branch, or Council of People's Commissars, a cabinet-style government. The council's chairman was the equivalent of prime minister (Lenin, then Rykov, then Molotov, and finally Stalin). The various commissariats that made up the council multiplied over time, and included heavy industry, foreign affairs, land, grain collection, finance. The state planning commission worked in parallel with the economic commissariats. The army and eventually the navy (when separated in 1937) were commissariats, too. The commissariat of internal affairs, or NKVD—its infamous Russian acronym—encompassed the regular and the secret police. The latter had originated as the Cheka (secret policemen were often still called Chekists) and then became the OGPU (sometimes rendered as GPU); in 1941 it would split into NKVD and NKGB ("GB" signifying state security). Together, the economic and security commissariats conducted the day-to-day operational management, under the supervision of the party apparatus and Stalin's personal regime.

The lesser part of the state was, ironically, the one that gave the political-administrative structure its name: the Soviet. There were myriad local soviets and a countrywide body, which originally took the form of a periodic Congress of Soviets and in 1938 became a permanent sitting Supreme Soviet, whose members were "elected" in single-candidate elections. This part of the state might be considered the legislative branch, except that it did not have the powers of even a quasi parliament. It also contained its own executive arm between congresses: a central executive committee, which, under the Supreme Soviet, became a presidium. The Soviet's executive powers, in any case, were appropriated by the Council of People's Commissars. Still, the chairman of the central executive committee and then of the presidium was the head of state—Mikhail Kalinin. It was Kalinin, not Stalin, who handed out state medals (which were awarded by the executive arm of the nominal legislature) and who received foreign ambassadors when they presented their credentials. Technically, the Council of People's Commissars served the Soviet, but in reality it served the party. The state also had a judicial component, a procuracy, and courts, also subordinated to the party apparatus, affording a dictatorial rule by law (rather than rule of law).

Workers were enrolled in trade unions, which were part of the state and played a key role in their lives—not by defending their interests but by being the conduits for social welfare. Cultural figures, too, were organized into unions, beginning with writers; Stalin eventually introduced a committee for artistic affairs in the Council of People's Commissars. Peasants belonged mostly to “collective farms,” which were nominally member constituted and self-governing but run by the party-state. “State farms,” formed where no villages had existed that could be collectivized, did not bother with even the pretense of being peasant collectives.

The state was constituted as a federation, established in 1922, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, whose composition changed over time. Some Union republics were themselves federations. Inside the Union republics, there were autonomous republics and autonomous provinces, also formed on an ethnoterritorial basis. All such units had national Communist parties (the Russian republic excepted), councils of people's commissars (Russia included), and congresses of soviets/supreme soviets, plus procuracies and courts (indeed, there was no USSR legal code, only republic ones). While the state was federal, the party was only nominally so. The council of people's commissars of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, for example, had many prerogatives, but the Communist party of Ukraine had only the same standing vis-à-vis Moscow as the Communist party of a province in the Russian republic. The party's pyramidal quality undercut the state's federal nature.

Coordination of the Soviet leviathan, to the extent it took place, was driven by the party apparatus, the invocation of party discipline, and Stalin's personal rule. Stalin also directed the operations of the Communist International (Comintern) for Communist parties around the world, although nominally the body was governed by its infrequent congresses and, in between, by an executive committee (which also held occasional enlarged plenums that resembled minicongresses), and staffed by its own secretariat.

By design, the Soviet regime lacked a central clearinghouse for assembling and analyzing the voluminous espionage reports that its agents generated. The defense commissariat had a directorate for intelligence, known in Russian as the RU but here spelled out as "military intelligence," and the NKVD (and then the NKGB) had its own foreign intelligence directorate, while most foreign correspondents of TASS, the Soviet press agency, engaged in espionage, and the Comintern, too, ran a spy network. Only Stalin knew what was produced by all the parallel intelligence networks.

Stalin's entrance to Catherine the Great's triangular Imperial Senate.

Inner sanctum: Stalin's Kremlin office (the "Little Corner"), a photo taken by James Abbé, April 13, 1932, to counteract rumors of the dictator's ill health spread by foreign intelligence services.

Happy times (left to right): Kirov, Kaganovich, Orjonikidze, Stalin, and Mikoyan on the Kremlin grounds in 1932 at the height of the Soviet famine.

In search of food: starvation in the Kazakh autonomous republic (Pavlodar province).

Н. С. Аллилуева-Сталина в гробу.

Nadya Alliluyeva, Stalin's second wife, November 1932. From the photo album of her father, Sergei (which would be confiscated after his arrest and placed in Stalin's archive).

Stalin and Co.: Lavrenti Beria holds Svetlana; Nestor Lakoba wears a bulky hearing aid. This is the first southern holiday without Nadya. Sochi, 1933.

Vasily and his widowed father with Nikolai Vlasik, bodyguard and photographer. Evidently Svetlana took this photo. Sochi, summer 1933.

Svetlana, Sergei Kirov, and Stalin. Sochi, summer 1934.

The 17th Party Congress—"Congress of Victors"—in the newly combined Andreyev-Alexandrov hall. Grand Kremlin Palace, January–February 1934.

Boris Pasternak (left) and the painter Pavel Malkov, First Congress of the Union of Soviet Writers, August 29, 1934.

The Writers' Congress keynote speech was given by Maxim Gorky, whom Stalin had coaxed back from exile and pampered. Gorky helped the dictator conscript the artistic intelligentsia into state service.

Seducing the European cultural set: Nobel Laureate Romain Rolland (to Stalin's right) and Maria Kudryashova, Rolland's wife-translator; Stalin; and Soviet cultural minder Alexander Arosyev. Little Corner, June 28, 1935.

Stalin's cultural dilemmas: Demyan Bedny, a celebrated but mediocre proletarian poet loyal to the cause.

Mikhail Bulgakov, a suspected White Guardist, but supremely talented.

Mass entertainment: Grigory Alexandrov (center), acclaimed director of the hit musicals Jolly Fellows (1934), Circus (1936), and Volga-Volga (1938). Stalin supported musicals against ideological attack.

Leonid Utyosov (left) and his phenomenally popular jazz band.

Dmitri Shostakovich, composer. Stalin's tastes in classical music ran to the traditional, which caught out Shostakovich, but more so-called former people (of the old regime) survived in music than in any other artistic pursuit, partly because of Stalin's indulgence.

Ivan Kozlovsky, lyric tenor, one of Stalin's favorites, 1933.

Fallen friend: Kirov's bier, flanked by Stalin and Kaganovich. Moscow, December 4, 1934.

Leonid Nikolayev, terrorist.

Filipp Medved, helping to supervise construction of the White Sea–Baltic canal, a Gulag project, after which he was posted to the Leningrad NKVD, making him responsible for Kirov's security.

Candid images were not permitted for public reproduction: including Stalin in profile, his Georgian features manifest, Second all-Union Congress of Collective Farm Shock Workers, February, 1935.

Three marshals (left to right): Yegorov, Voroshilov, and Tukhachevsky, with Stalin and Lakoba (far right) on holiday. Abkhazia, mid-1930s.

Vasily, Yakov, and Svetlana, with Stalin's mother, an ill Keke Geladze, on her metal bed. Tiflis, June 1935.

The first meeting with a high Western official: Anthony Eden (left foreground), accompanied by British ambassador Viscount Chilston (right), all looking toward the British photographer. (Background) Ivan Maisky, Soviet ambassador to the Court of St. James's, is to the left of Molotov. Molotov's office, March 29, 1935.

A new Stalin favorite: Moscow party boss Nikita Khrushchev (in front of Stalin and in summer whites with a white worker's cap), flanked by Yagoda (left) and Andrei Andreyev (center, with black cap), on the Lenin Mausoleum, July 10, 1935.

Stalin and his indispensable servitors: Molotov and Alexander Poskryobyshev (center), head of the secret department, January 1936.

Molotov presiding over the Council of People's Commissars, the cabinet-style government, on the third floor of the Imperial Senate, in front of the door to the deceased Lenin's preserved office.

Man of the imperial borderlands, with Lazar Kaganovich (tucking his ear). Stalin celebrated the Russian nation's civilizing mission, ending Lenin's warnings about great Russian chauvinism. Kremlin reception for collective farmers from Tajikistan and Turkmenistan. Imperial Senate, December 4, 1935.

Matinee idol: Stalin at a gathering of wives of officials. Grand Kremlin Palace, May 1936.
Stalin kept few mistresses.

Long March: Chinese Communists find refuge from Chiang Kai-shek's encirclement campaigns in remote Shaanxi province, 1935. Right to left: Mao Zedong, Zhu De, Zhou Enlai, and Qin Bangxian (known as Bo Gu).

Putsch in Spain: General Francisco Franco trailed by General Emilio Mola (in glasses), August 19, 1936. Neither in China nor in Spain would Stalin instigate or countenance a Communist takeover.

Stalin and Voroshilov (dancing), Kalinin (behind Stalin, with goatee and glasses), and Molotov (behind Voroshilov), Orjonikidze (behind Molotov) at an awards ceremony for the fifteenth anniversary of the Sovietization of Georgia, Kremlin Imperial Senate, March 1936. Ceremonial gatherings in the Imperial Senate and especially in the Grand Kremlin Palace became ever more central to Stalin's rule.

Heavy industry commissar shoots himself: Sergo Orjonikidze's bier, February 18, 1937. (Left to right) Molotov, Kaganovich, Jan Gamarnik (bearded), Voroshilov, and Stalin.

Kalinin and Stalin emerging from the Lenin Mausoleum, trailed by the diminutive Nikolai Yezhov (in NKVD uniform), May Day 1937. Stalin relentlessly goaded an already eager-to-please Yezhov to mass arrests.

Physical culture parade, Red Square, July 12, 1937, height of the terror.

Munich Pact fiasco (left to right): Chamberlain, Daladier, Hitler, Mussolini, and the latter's son-in-law and foreign minister, Ciano. The Soviet Union was not invited. Führer House, September 29–30, 1938.

Children and swastikas line the streets to welcome Adolf Hitler in the Sudetenland after the Western powers handed this region of Czechoslovakia to him. Stalin ended his mass terror almost immediately thereafter.

Chiang Kai-shek (right), head of China's ruling Nationalist government, and Zhang Xueliang, a warlord from Manchuria known as the Young Marshal, who later had Chiang kidnapped in collusion with China's Communists. Stalin would intervene to save Chiang.

Choibalsan, Moscow's ruler in the puppet state of Mongolia, during the Soviet-Japanese border war, summer 1939.

The 18th Party Congress. Each delegation was afforded a photograph with Stalin and the leadership (front row). Shown here is the turn of military party members. St. George's Hall of the Grand Kremlin Palace, March 1939.

Revolution Day parade. Red Square, November 7, 1939.

German foreign minister Joachim von Ribbentrop deplaning from Hitler's personal Condor is greeted by German ambassador Werner von der Schulenburg. Soviet anti-aircraft battalions at the border—in the dark about Stalin's conspiratorial diplomacy—had attempted to shoot down the plane, but missed. Moscow, August 23, 1939.

Nazi flag on one of Stalin's armored sedans, which he sent to transport Ribbentrop (center, back to the camera).

A study in contrasts, Ribbentrop and Stalin: lightning conclusion of a Hitler-Stalin Pact. Little Corner, August 24, 1939.

Polish foreign minister Józef Beck (in great coat) ascending the steps to meet Hitler at the Nazi leader's mountain retreat. Beck had physically bowed to Hitler as the two shook hands, but refused his territorial demands. To the right is the head of the German protocol department, Alexander "Sandro" von Dörnberg. Berghof, January 5, 1939.

Hitler greets Ribbentrop after the signing of the Pact. Berlin, Reich Chancellery, August 25, 1939.

German engineering: a new bridge over the Vistula erected in two days for the Wehrmacht in Poland, September 1939. The wrecked Fordon Bridge is in the background.

Molotov signing a state treaty with Otto Kuusinen (far right, standing), whom Stalin appointed to head a "People's Government" for Finland, December 1, 1939. Zhdanov and Voroshilov are to Stalin's right. This proved to be one of Stalin's numerous blunders.

Finnish tank traps augmented the concrete emplacements and pillboxes of their Mannerheim Line of defense, Soviet-Finnish Winter War, 1939–40.

This is a rare photograph showing both Stalin and Trotsky (both in white) at Felix Dzierżyński's funeral, 1926. Molotov, at the front, is holding the casket (behind him); Bukharin is between him and Stalin. The bespectacled Trotsky is a ways across from Stalin to the left and next to Genrikh Yagoda (turned toward Trotsky). To Molotov's right is Alexei Rykov (looking up), to whose right is Lev Kamenev (hand on chin). Grigory Zinoviev (bushy, dark hair) is behind the person at the rear of the casket. Stalin executed or imprisoned almost everyone in the photo.

Trotsky's skull.

Molotov's personal photo album from his visit to Berlin, arrival at the Anthalter train station, November 10, 1940. From left (front): Field Marshall Wilhelm Keitel, Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop, and Molotov. Behind and between Ribbentrop and Molotov is Soviet ambassador Alexei Shkvartsev, a former textile factory manager.

Winston Churchill, trailed by his wife and personal secretary, survey the damage in London from Luftwaffe bombing, 1940. Churchill interrupted the Molotov-Hitler summit with stepped-up Royal Air Force bombing raids.

Confrontation: Molotov-Hitler, with Gustav Hilger interpreting, Reich Chancellery, November 12, 1940.

Molotov and Rudolf Hess (right), deputy führer of the Nazi party. Hilger (left) and Vladimir Pavlov (back to camera) interpreting. Berlin, November 13, 1940.

The arrival of a new Soviet ambassador to Berlin, Vladimir Dekanozov, flanked by Ernst Woermann (German foreign ministry), Gustav Adolph von Halem (deputy chief of protocol), Friedrichstrasse train station, November 28, 1940. Behind Dekanozov is Amayak Kobulov, the head of Soviet intelligence in Berlin.

Stalin seeing off Japanese foreign minister Yōsuke Matsuoka (wearing glasses) at Moscow's Yaroslavl train station, following the signing of a bilateral neutrality pact, April 13, 1941.

Semyon Timoshenko (left) and Georgy Zhukov, the new Red Army leadership, on fall maneuvers, September 1940.

Filipp Golikov, yet another head of Soviet military intelligence.

Pavel Fitin, a very young head of NKVD (then NKGB) intelligence.

THE TOP SOVIET SPIES

Rudolf von Scheliha ("Aryan"), German Foreign Ministry.

Ilse Stöbe ("Alta"), the contact for "Aryan."

Richard Sorge ("Ramsay"), German embassy in Tokyo.

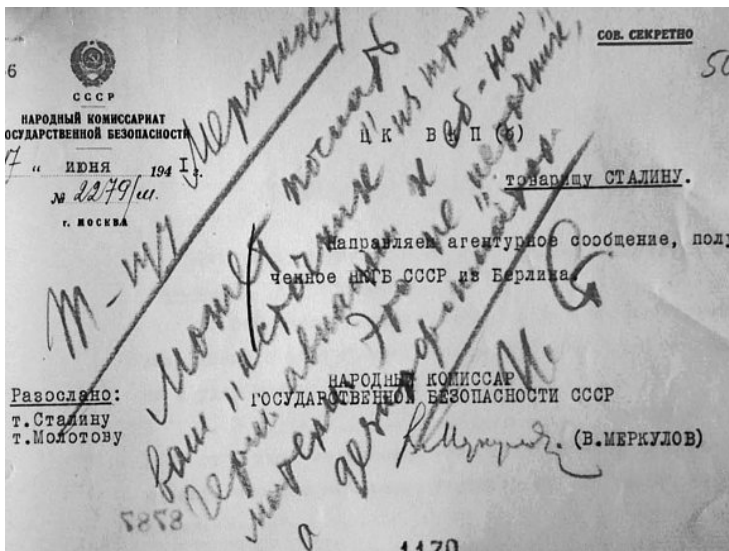

Harro Schulze-Boysen ("Elder"), German aviation ministry.

Arvid Harnack (“Corsican”), German economics ministry.

Stalin's markings (in green pencil) on the cover letter accompanying an NKVD intelligence report, June 17, 1941, about the pending German invasion: "To com. Merkulov: You can send your 'source' from German aviation HQ to his fucking mother. This is not a 'source' but a disinformationist. I.S."

NOTES

Full citations can be found in the bibliography.

PART I. EQUAL TO THE MYTH

1. Pravda, Nov. 7, 1935: 2. This quote would be reprinted later: Stalin: k shestidesiatiletiu dnia rozhdeniia (Moscow: Pravda, 1940), 75.

2. Kumanev, Riadam so Staliny, 387–9 (Yakov Chadayev).

3. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 4, d. 665, l. 361.

4. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 158 (Svanidze diary: Nov. 4, 1934).

5. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 47.

6. Svechin's conception entailed a war of attrition; Tukhachevsky, among others, would favor attack and preemption. Stone, "Misreading Svechin." About 5,000 of Stalin's books would be kept together (in the Marx-Engels-Lenin Institute). There would be all told 397 books, pamphlets, and articles with his markings, 72 of which are writings by Lenin, another 13 by Marx and Engels in Russian translation, while 25 are works he wrote.

7. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 23–4.

8. Vaiskopf, Pisatel' Stalin, 17–22.

9. The drawing was by Valērijs Mežlauks. Vatlin and Malashenko, Istoriia VKP (b) v portretakh i karikaturakh ee vzhdei, 110.

10. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 551.

11. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 48.

12. Kurlandskii, Stalin, vlast', religii, 67–8.

13. In a 1931 interview with the German writer Emil Ludwig, Stalin would without irony denounce the seminary "fathers" for their "humiliating regime" and "Jesuitical methods" of "surveillance, espionage, penetration of one's soul." Sochineniia, XIII: 113–4. The picture of the seminary during Stalin's youth would become more severe in 1930s memoirs. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 4, d. 665, l. 184 (Nikolai Makhatadze, 1936).

14. Iremashvili, Stalin und die Tragödie Georgiens, 23. One Gori classmate would imagine in 1932 that Stalin had rejected God because he had decided to be a god himself.

15. Ilizarov, Tainaia zhizn' Stalina. In his copy of Lev Kamenev's biography of the iconic Russian writer Chernyshevsky (1933), Stalin underlined a passage about the discipline instilled by observance of religious rites. (Chernyshevsky had also studied in a seminary.) RGASPI, f. 558, op. 3, d. 84, l. 11; Kamenev, Chernyshevskii.

16. Vaiskopf, Pisatel' Stalin, 163; Ilizarov, Tainaia zhizn' Stalina, 63, 66.

17. Segrè, Italo Balbo.

18. Elisabedashvili recalled that Stalin "was given this nickname [Geza] by Ambilarashvili, once a good friend of his, who died in 1911 and was buried in Gori. Apart from us no one knew this name, since otherwise he was called 'Koba.'" RGASPI, f. 558, op. 4, d. 665; the "Geza" reference was cut when these reminiscences were published in Molodaya Gvardiya, 1939, no. 12: 86–7.

19. Loginov, Teni Stalina, 116. Stalin had contracted smallpox at age seven.

20. Bliskovskii, M. I. Ul'ianova, 199–200.

21. Ostrovskii, Kto stoial, 191–2 (citing GIAG, f. 153, op. 1, d. 3432, l. 116); Ilizarov, Taina zhizn' Stalina, 102; D. Volkogonov, Stalin, I/i: 65.

22. Berezkhov, At Stalin's Side, 201; Kuznetsov, Nakanune, 232.

23. Schmitt, Die Diktatur. Lenin had given dictatorship a favorable cast ("bourgeois democracy or proletarian dictatorship!").

24. Maksimovskii, "Ideia diktatury u Makiavelli," 55–94. See also Rees, Political Thought from Machiavelli to Stalin, chapter 8. Maksimovsky had signed the 1923 Trotskyite "Platform of the 46," became a dean at the Agricultural Academy, and would be arrested on July 27, 1937. He is said to have died in internal exile in Nov. 1941.

25. What emerges from the childhood memoirs, such as they are, is evidence not of warmth but of will. Some evidence indicates that he ridiculed weaker classmates, none of which would be noteworthy except for his role as dictator. For example: "Arriving at the first-year students of Section One at the sound of a loud scream, I saw Lakerov, who in a state of intense agitation was screaming at Iremashvili and Jughashvili," the seminary deputy inspector recorded in his notebook in 1895. "It turned out that the latter two had been systematically laughing at Lakerov, mercilessly teasing him and ridiculing him, bringing him to distress. They engage in this often, according to the testimony of Lakerov." RGASPI, f. 558, op. 4, d. 13, l. 91.

26. Not long after the scrotum joke, Stalin had Bryukhanov sacked as finance commissar (Oct. 1930), scapegoating him, along with state bank head Pyatakov, for inflation. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 193–6. See also Kuromiya, Stalin's Industrial Revolution, 267.

27. The rest of the quote: "Great men are almost always bad men." Lord Acton, letter to Bishop Mandell Creighton, April 5, 1887, in Figgis and Laurence, Historical Essays and Studies, 504.

28. "We cannot give a characterization of socialism," Lenin had admitted (March 8, 1918) in reply to Bukharin's demand for a sketch of the future. "What socialism will be like when it reaches its completed form we do not know, we cannot say." PSS, XXXVI: 65–6 (8th Party Congress, March 8, 1918). See also Striedter, "Journeys through Utopia," at 36.

29. Already in 1926, Stalin stated, "It would be wrong to think that it is possible to build socialism in white gloves, without getting dirty." RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1107, l. 15. See also Von Laue, "Stalin in Focus," and Marwick, "Problems and Consequences of Organizing Society for Total War," 1–22.

30. "Only . . . a revolutionary regime, because it accepts the permanent use of violence, seems capable of attaining perfection," Raymond Aron would write, adding that "violence itself attracts more than it repels." Aron, Opium of the Intellectuals, 65.

31. Kolakowski, "Communism as a Cultural Formation."

32. Kenez, Birth of the Propaganda State, 186.

33. Zhiromskaia, Naselenie Rossii v XX veke, 11–3, 15; Poliakov, Sovetskaia strana posle okonchaniia grazhdanskoi voyny, 237. At the first all-Union congress of "shock workers," more than 30 percent of the participants were below the age of twenty-two. Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd udarnykh brigad, 179.

34. Stalin had written to Mikhail Frunze about a document that labeled Trotsky "the Leader [vozhd]" of the Red Army, advising, "I think that it would be better if we spoke about a vozhd only in terms of the party." Kvasnonkin, Bol'shevistskoe rukovodstvo, 298–9 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 5254, l. 1: Dec. 10, 1924).

35. Stalin, during a discussion of the coal industry in 1931, criticized the effusive declarations "for the Leaders," "for the Central Committee," "for the general line" as "nonsense, playing games." Similarly, when delegates to an assembly of state farm bosses offered the customary applause, Stalin thundered, "why are you applauding—you should be ashamed." Davies and Harris, Stalin's World, 162–3 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1115, l. 9; d. 1116, l. 34–42); RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1116, l. 42 (Oct. 1932); RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1118, l. 1–2 (June 1934). See also Davies, "Stalin and the Making of the Leader Cult in the 1930s," 29–46 (at 35). Tucker called Stalin the "master builder" of the cult, but this is too simple. Tucker, "The Rise of Stalin's Personality Cult." Photographs of Stalin in Pravda were not frequent into 1933, and usually showed him in the company of other party leaders.

36. Kovaleva et al., Molotov, Malenkov, Kaganovich, 1957, 490 (Voroshilov). The following dialogue was recorded on May 13, 1933, between Colonel Robins and Stalin:

"ROBINS: I consider it a great honor to have an opportunity of paying you a visit.

STALIN: There is nothing particular in that. You are exaggerating.

ROBINS (laughs): What is most interesting to me is that throughout Russia I have found the names Lenin-Stalin, Lenin-Stalin, Lenin-Stalin, linked together.

STALIN: That, too, is an exaggeration. How can I be compared to Lenin?" Sochineniia, XIII: 260–73 (at 260).

37. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1187, l. 49–50.

38. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 318; Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 181; van Ree, Political Thought, 161–8.

³⁹. On Stalin's "immodest modesty," see Plamper, Stalin Cult, 123–4.

⁴⁰. Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 166.

⁴¹. When asked, "To what tribe or clan do you belong?," many Central Asians were said not to understand the question. Zhdanko, "Natsional'no-gosudarstvennoye razmezhvaniye," 23.

⁴². Stalin publicly affirmed multiple times that ethnic identities would be a part of the Soviet phenomenon for a long time, perhaps disappearing only when a socialist economy encompassed the entire globe. He envisioned the formation of "socialist nations" (also called Soviet nations) free of class contradictions. See his March 1929 long letter on the national question, which would not be published until 1946: Sochineniia, XI: 336, 347–9. The basic thrust of the letter had appeared in his discussion with Ukrainian writers on Feb. 12, 1929. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 4490. Pipes, Formation, 40; d'Encausse, Great Challenge, 38; Martin, Affirmative Action Empire, 238–48; van Ree, "Stalin and the National Question," at 230.

⁴³. Stalin had never been among those Bolsheviks, such as Lenin, who warned of the dangers of Russian nationalism. What would turn out to be final party congress resolution calling for an end to Great Russian chauvinism would pass in 1930. Pravda, June 29, 1930, reprinted in Sochineniia, XII: 369.

⁴⁴. In an incisive portrait published in 1927, Mark Landau, a popular émigré historical novelist known by his pen name of Aldanov, called Stalin "a standout person, inarguably, the most standout in the entire Leninist guard. Stalin spills blood more freely than any living being, with the exception of Trotsky and Zinoviev. But I cannot deny him, in clear conscience, properties of rare strength of will and courage." He added: "I wait with 'captivating interest' what Stalin will do in this difficult exam in this difficult historical role." "Stalin," Poslednie novosti, Dec. 18 and 20, 1927, reprinted in Aldanov, Sovremenniki, 111–40 (at 118–9, 137), and in Aldanov, Bol'shaia Lubianka, 203–21 (at 207–8, 219–20).

CHAPTER 1. TRIUMPH OF THE WILL

¹. "O tak nazyvaemom 'vsesoiuzom trotskistskom tsentre,'" 84.

². Dubinskaia-Dzhalilova and Chernev, "'Zhmu vashu ruku, dorogoi tovarishch,'" 183 (APRE F. 45, op. 1, d. 31, l. 10–101ob.).

³. Hindus, Humanity Uprooted, 166–7. Hindus, an émigré, had returned as a magazine writer to his native village (Bolshoye Bykovo) in Kherson province. His father had been a better-off peasant. Mugleston, "Hindus."

⁴. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 3, d. 211, s. 64. See also Sochineniia, X: 241. Originally published in 1895, the year of Engels's death, the essay in question had seemed to soften his earlier insistence on revolutionary class struggle, but this was partly the work of an editor. Engels, "The Tactics of Social Democracy"; Tucker, Marx-Engels Reader, xxxvi–xxxvii, 556–73. Marx, in a speech (Sept. 8, 1872) in Amsterdam, had allowed for a peaceful road to socialism in the United States and Britain. Tucker, Marx-Engels Reader, 522–4.

⁵. Kingston-Mann, In Search of the True West.

⁶. The Soviet regime was located on four squares and one embankment: Red Square with the triangular Kremlin, inside of which stood the triangular Catherine the Great Imperial Senate, where the government or Council of People's Commissars had its main offices; Old Square, north of the Kremlin, where the central party apparatus had its offices in an old merchant emporium; Dzierżyński Square, where the secret police were located in an old insurance building and, not far away, sat the foreign affairs commissariat; Nogin Square (essentially an extension of Old Square), where the heavy industry commissariat stood; and the Frunze embankment, where the defense commissariat and general staff were housed.

⁷. Stalin's radicalism of 1929 followed partly from the failures of the Communist regime, whose inability to properly regulate the quasi-market of NEP had created a seeming imperative for even greater anti-market measures—which exacerbated the problems, requiring still greater emergency measures. Anticapitalism, the root cause of the problems, was imagined to be the solution. Carr accentuated the "haphazard and impulsive character of the final decision" in late 1929, but failed to elucidate the worldview and governing ideas behind the regime's improvisation. Carr, "Revolution from Above," 327. For an alternative development vision, see Antisferov et al., Russian Agriculture, 384. On the scholarly debate, see Harrison, "Why Was NEP Abandoned?"

⁸. Lenin had written: "Either we must bring the small bourgeoisie under our control (which can be done by organizing the poor), or they will overthrow . . . the workers' government just as inevitably and unavoidably as the Napoleons . . . , figures who are bound to develop in a soil permeated with petit-bourgeois mentality.” Sochineniia, XXII: 515 (pre-1934). See also Valentinov, “Sut’ bolshevizma v izobrazhenii Iu. Piatakova”; and Tucker, Stalin as Revolutionary, 415–6.

9. Volkogonov, Stalin: politicheskii portret, I: 307.

10. Tucker, Stalin as Revolutionary, 407–20.

11. Word of the Kamenev-Bukharin meeting had already appeared in the Menshevik Sotsialisticheskii vestnik [Berlin], Jan. 20, 1929. Three days later, the leaflet “The Party with Closed Eyes Is Leading the Way to a New Catastrophe” appeared; it was signed “Bolsheviks-Leninists” (the Trotskyite self-designation) and quoted Kamenev’s “notes.” Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP, IV: 558–63 (RGASPI, f. 84, op. 2, d. 40, l. 2–11: Kamenev’s “notes”), 564–5 (l. 12–3: Kamenev to Orjonikidze, Jan. 27), 566–7 (l. 14–5: Sokolnikov to Orjonikidze, Jan. 28), 568–71 (l. 17–24: Tomskey to Orjonikidze, Jan. 14), 572–6 (l. 25–31: Bukharin to Orjonikidze, Jan. 30), 607, 613–5. See also Vaganov, Pravyy uklon, 199–202; Tucker, Stalin as Revolutionary, 417; and Fel’shtinskii, Razgovory s Bukharinym, 30–7. A copy of the “notes” is in the Trotsky Papers at Harvard (T1897); it is presumed to have fallen into Trotsky’s hands from F. P. Schwalbe, Kamenev’s secretary. The Russian original, from leaflets, was published in Sotsialisticheskii vestnik (May 4, 1929). Fel’shtinskii, “Dva epizoda iz istorii vnutripartiinnoi bor’by.”

12. Stalin, “Gruppa Bukharina i pravyy uklon v nashei partii,” Sochineniia, XI: 318–25; Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP, IV: 577–601. Stalin, ever magnanimous, proposed including Bukharin on the commission to prepare his apology; Bukharin declined, then agreed, but the commission met without him. Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP, IV: 597. See also Daniels, Conscience of the Revolution, 352.

13. Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP, 540–8 (resolutions of the joint session Feb. 9, 1929, approved at the April 23, 1929, plenum); VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1933), II: 515; KPSS v rezoliutsiakh (7th ed.), II: 566–7. Bukharin had instigated at least two further meetings with Kamenev, one together with Pyatakov, and a second with Tomskey, and published a pointed reminder of Lenin’s Testament in Pravda (Jan. 24, 1929). Jules Humbert-Droz, the Swiss Communist who met Bukharin in early 1929, later claimed that Bukharin mentioned getting rid of Stalin. Humbert-Droz, Mémoires, 356, 379–80. “Bukharin,” Carr and Davies wrote, “lacked altogether the astuteness and organizing skill of the politician.” Carr and Davies, Foundations of a Planned Economy, II: 76.

14. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 180 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 7, l. 26: Jan. 10, 1929).

15. Cristian Rakovski, too, managed to carry trunks of official documents with him into internal exile. Fischer, Men and Politics, 129.

16. After the Ilich had docked at Istanbul, Trotsky was handed $1,500, and put up temporarily in two rooms inside the consulate. Stalin, Trotsky concluded, “was created by the epoch, by the bureaucracy, by the revolution’s fall from grace, in order to effect and embody that fall, that degeneration.” Trotsky attributed his own defeat to a conspiracy against him. Trotskii, “Kak moglo eto sluchit’sia?” in Chto i kak proizoshlo, 25–36.

17. Trotskii, Dnevnik i pisma, 46–8. On the politeness of the consul staff toward Trotsky, see Serge and Sedova, Life and Death of Trotsky, 163.

18. Eastman, Great Companions, 117; Deutscher, Prophet Outcast, 14 (citing Manchester Guardian, March 17, 1931), 16–8. In Jan. 1929, Herbert von Dirksen, the new German ambassador, when asked whether his government could take in Trotsky, was incredulous: Stresemann had no desire to have him explaining to a fellow German politician: “I don’t place too high a value on our relations with Soviet Russia. But they are always a trump in our game” of diplomacy with the West. ADAP, series b, XI: 74–6 (Dirksen memo, Jan. 29, 1929), 101–2 (Schubert to Dirksen, Feb. 6, 1929), 199 (Stresemann to Paul Loebe, Reichstag president, March 19, 1929).

19. Stalin had the OGPU blackmail or entice Trotsky supporters internally exiled in the USSR to denounce him in the Soviet press. Radek signed a denunciation of Trotsky that was published in Pravda (July 13, 1929). See also Broué, “Bolshevik-Leninist Faction,” 140; Deutscher, Prophet Armed, 390; Volkogonov, Trotsky, 281; Yaroslavskii, “Etot son knochen.” 2; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 782, l. 9. Even Beloborodov and Ivan Smirnov would publicly break with Trotsky. Pravda, Nov. 3, 1929. Rakovski, in Astrakhan, nearly alone remained loyal; Trotsky kept a photograph of him on his desk.

20. Trotskii, Writings (1929), 177. See also Kassow, “Trotsky.”

21. Volkogonov, Trotsky, 325–8.
22. Deutscher, Prophet Outcast, 67. At Stalin's behest, the propagandist Miney Gubelman, who went by the name Yemelyan Yaroslavsky, answered with an essay, "Mr. Trotsky at the Service of the Bourgeoisie, or L. Trotsky's First Steps Abroad"—published in Russian in the Soviet press, essentially a salve for Stalin's ego. Bol'shevik, 1929, no. 5 and 9.
23. G. G., "Piśma iz SSSR." Bukharin was sometimes perceived as a Jew ("Trotsky, Zinoviev, Kamenev, Bukharin . . ."). Borodin, One Man in His Time, 59.
24. "O gruppirovokakh v kommunisticheskoi oppozitsii."
25. On March 5, 1929, Mężyński informed the dictator of a supposed thwarted "assassination" plan against him by two Moscow University students and one worker who had tickets to two evening events in the university club in Feb., one of which, it was rumored, Stalin would attend. Under interrogation, one of the students stated he was unsure if he had the fortitude to carry out a terrorist act. In any event, there was no such attempt. Mozokhin and Gladkov, Menzhinskii, 325–6 (no citation).
26. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 68 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 39, l. 43, 43ob.).
27. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 73 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 38, l. 42; note, without addressee, in Voroshilov's file, but obviously addressed to Bukharin). Back in Sept. 1926, Stalin had written: "Bukharin is a swine and perhaps worse than a swine because he considers it beneath his dignity to write even two lines about his impressions of Germany. I'll get my revenge for that." This playfulness would look different in retrospect. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotov, 88–93 (Sept. 16, 1926); Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 126–9.
28. This was the first plenum of 1929. Stalin invented "joint" plenums with the Central Control Commission as a device to obtain the two-thirds voting majority required by party rules for expulsions from the Central Committee.
29. Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP IV: 644–84 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1043, l. 1–131: uncorrected transcript), quote 644; "O pravom uklone v VKP (b)," Sochineniia, XII: 1–107 (at 1).
30. Sochineniia, XII: 43. See also Abramov, O pravoii oppozitsii v partii, 43. Andreyev, North Caucasus party boss, told the plenum: "The GPU was formed to find and expose the very worst and most unfavorable in our country, and if we build our policy only on the basis of the GPU reports, we will always be in a state of panic, it is perfectly clear, our hair will always stand on end." Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP IV: 403. Stalin made his own admission of sorts: "Name a single political measure of the party that was not accompanied by these or those excesses?" Sochineniia, XII: 92.
31. Stalin even contrasted Bukharin, Tomsy, and Rykov unfavorably to the smashed Trotskyites, asserting that the latter had not used the 1921 Kronstadt or 1926 Georgian rebellions but closed ranks in the face of danger. Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP IV: 656, 659, 668, 676; Sochineniia, XII: 39–40, 69–70.
32. Stalin replaced Bukharin at Pravda with an editorial collective of Yaroslavsky, Nikolai Popov, and Harald Krumin.
33. Sochineniia, XII: 92–3. Bukharin: "Extraordinary measures is the repeal of NEP, although temporarily, of course. Extraordinary measures as a system exclude the NEP." Orjonikidze interrupted: "You [try to] solve the difficulties this year with grain imports, and next year you do the same?" Bukharin, Problemy, 289. A brief mention of the April 29 plenum was published in Pravda, April 30, 1930. The plenum's resolutions were first published in 1933: VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1933), II: 515–30.
34. Davies, Economic Transformation, 286.
35. Pravda, July 20, 1929. The official exchange rate for the ruble—which was not a convertible currency—was set at 1.9415 to the U.S. dollar. Therefore, one gold ruble in foreign trade equaled 51.7 U.S. cents (until early 1933, when the dollar left the gold standard, and the ruble exchange rate was set on the basis of a cross-exchange rate of the currency in question to the French franc, with one ruble equal to 13.1 francs). Gold or foreign trade rubles had no relation to domestic rubles. Dohan, "Soviet Foreign Trade," 701–8. Kaganovich would cite "local demands" for new coercive measures; obviously, he instigated them. Rees, Iron Lazar, 94–5 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 3188, l. 95; op. 2, d. 417, l. 57–8, 291–3); Taniuchi, Village Gathering.
36. Mikhail Sholokhov wrote in letters to an acquaintance (E. G. Lebitskaya) in July 1929 of one peasant, "He told me with a bitter smile, 'They [the Whites] at least took only grain and horses, but our own [Soviet] power takes down to the thread.” Znamia, 1987, no. 10: 181, 183. “See also Chernopitskii, Na velikom perelome, 40–1 (citing PARO, f. 7, op. 1, d. 844, l. 202).

³⁷ Mikoyan added, “Of course we would have inevitably come to grips with this task sometime, but it is a question of timing.” Mikoian, Problema snabzheniia strany, 60.

³⁸ Pavlov, Anastas Mikoian, 52 (citing RGASPI, f. 84, op. 3, d. 62, l. 73: Aug. 1929). See also RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 73, l. 50; and Ivinskii, Repressivnaia politika soverskoi vlasti, 59–60. Between 1928 and 1935, Mikoyan would undertake more than twenty regional trips in connection with coercive grain collections. Pavlov, Anastas Mikoian, 49 (citing RGASPI, f. 84, op. 3, d. 167, l. 411–2).

³⁹ VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1933), II: 531–73. The “plan” was actually in effect as of Oct. 1, 1928. Zaleski, Planning for Economic Growth, 70n205, 74; Zaleski, Stalinist Planning, 54; Carr and Davies, Foundations of a Planned Economy, I/i: 248–52, I/ii: 890–7.

⁴⁰ Brovkin, Russia after Lenin, 122–5 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 69, d. 126, l. 5, 107, 117; f. 1, op. 23, d. 821, l. 22). See also Fischer, Men and Politics, 187. Oral exams of university students in 1927 had returned answers that (the Russian anarchist) Bakunin was a French revolutionary who had led the (British) Chartist movement, and that imperialism was the best path to socialism. One student thought the Communist Youth League was “an international organization of the homeless.” Holmes, Kremlin and the Schoolhouse, 60–1. Such surveys revealed more than the anxieties of the ambitious revolutionary regime. Gorsuch, Youth.

⁴¹ KPSS v rezoliutsiakh (7th ed.), II: 450.

⁴² “People often forget,” Izvestiya explained (May 23, 1929), “that the Five-Year Plan defines our foreign policy,” making it necessary “to delay the war threat and make use of . . . world markets.”

⁴³ Haslam, Russia's Cold War, 3–5.

⁴⁴ Jacobson, When the Soviet Union Entered World Politics, 86–7.

⁴⁵ The Bolsheviks had been awarding foreigners concessions (or leases) on Soviet territory to spur technology transfer and revive export industries, but this policy had been deeply fraught with difficulties. (Lenin, as usual, on Dec. 21, 1920, had captured the essence, paraphrasing Clausewitz: “Concessions [leases] do not mean peace with capitalism, but war in a new sphere.”) In Feb. 1930, a politburo commission would decide that foreign concessions contradicted socialist industrialization. By 1933, no manufacturing concessions remained. Carr and Davies, Foundations of a Planned Economy, III/I (1976): 90–1; Sutton, Western Technology, I: 86–91; Fitch, “Harriman Manganese Concession”; Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 109–10 (citing Za industrializatsiu, May 10, 1930; P. N. Pospelov et al. [eds.], Leninskii plan sotsialisticheskoi industrializatsii i ego osushchestvenenie [Moscow: Partizdat, 1969], 186–7; and DVP SSSR, XIII: 112 [Litvinov-Dirksen: Feb. 26, 1930]; and Sutton, Western Technology, I: 349, II: 17).

⁴⁶ Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 125–6.

⁴⁷ Rogachevskaia, Iz istorii nabohego klassa SSSR; Oprischenko, Istoriografiia sotsialisticheskogo srovnaniia; Rogachevskaia, Sotsialisticheskoe srovnaniie v SSSR; Kuromiya, Stalin's Industrial Revolution, 128–35.

⁴⁸ Pravda, Jan. 20, 1929; PSS, XXVI: 367. See also Sotsialisticheskii vestnik, Sept. 27, 1929: 16; and Kravchenko, I Chose Freedom, 50.

⁴⁹ Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 146–53 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1493, l. 4–13), 153 (d. 1047, l. 48–9); Na prieme, 30. On May 4, 1929, Stalin received a delegation of 170 Donbas miners, who promised (in the text he edited) to “fulfill completely the tasks assigned them by Soviet power in the First Five-Year Plan.” Pravda, May 8, 1929; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1159, l. 93.

⁵⁰ Sochineniia, XII: 108–11; Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 157 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1047, l. 19).

⁵¹ Sochineniia, XII: 115–6. Mikulina, who died in 1998, would be asked to recount her audience with Stalin: Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 153n3.

⁵² Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 162–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1047, l. 51–5; Aleksei Milrud, Sept. 19, 1929).

⁵³ Sochineniia, XII: 112–5 (July 9, 1929). See also Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 160 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1047, l. 62).

54. In Comintern documents, Stalin personally wrote in the epithet “social fascism” for Social Democrats. Communism and the International Situation, 6, 16–20; Firsov, “Stalin i Komintern,” 7. “Social fascism” became official in 1929, but Stalin’s conception was long-standing. “Fascism is the fighting organization of the bourgeoisie, leaning on the active support of social democracy,” he had written in 1924. “Social Democracy is objectively the moderate wing of fascism They are not antipodes but twins. Fascism is an informal political bloc of these two basic political organizations, which arose in the situation of the postwar crisis of imperialism and is intended for the struggle against proletarian revolution.” Sochinennia, VI: 282; Degras, Communist International, 44. See also Degras, Communist International, II: 566.

55. Rosenhaft, Beating the Fascists, 35–9. The German Social Democrats, who had joined the Weimar Republic government, sought rapprochement with France against the Soviets in a pro-Western orientation.

56. McDermott and Agnew blame SPD policies (“more than any single factor”) for “the vitriolic ‘social fascist’ rhetoric employed by the Comintern in the years 1929–33.” McDermott and Agnew, Comintern, 100–2.

57. La correspondance internationale, Aug. 17, 1929: 971. This was the first such plenum since Feb. 1928.

58. Politischeskoe obrazovanie, 1989, no. 1: 81. World Situation, 3–21.

59. Gorelov, Nikolai Bukharin, 100–45. Angelo Tasca, after getting out of Moscow in early 1929, had ripped into Stalin in a letter to the Italian Community party, concluding, “The Russian party and all of us will pay dearly for ignoring Lenin’s instructions about him.” Firsov, “Stalin i Komintern,” 5 (citing Annali Feltrinelli, VIII, 1968, 670). Before the year was out, Tasca was expelled on Stalin’s orders from the Italian Community party, which he had helped establish after having quit the Italian Socialist Party. In exile in France, he would rejoin the Italian Socialists. De Grand, In Stalin’s Shadow. See also Carr and Davies, Foundations of a Planned Economy, III: 554.

60. Bahne et al., Les Partis communistes, 165 (March 1929); McDermott and Agnew, Comintern, 86. After Hitler would come to power and ban the German Community party, Zetkin would seek asylum in Moscow, where she would die in June 1933.

61. McDermott and Agnew, Comintern, 102, citing K. Gottwald, Spisy (Prague, 1951), I: 322 (Dec. 1929).

62. Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 148–50 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 1/s., d. 110, l. 1–2ob.). Stalin proposed naming Bukharin commissar of enlightenment, perhaps to tie him down in enervating ideological battles. “Bukharin begged everyone not to name him enlightenment commissar, but proposed, and then insisted on, the Scientific-Technical Administration” of the Supreme Council of the Economy; Voroshilov wrote to Orjonikidze (June 8, 1929). “I supported him in that, a few other comrades supported him and as a majority in one voice (against Koba) we got him so named.” Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 123; Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 30.

63. Vague resolutions to strengthen the military at the 15th Party Congress (Dec. 1927) and the 16th party conference (April 1929) had produced nothing concrete. Voronetskaia, Industrializatsiia SSSR, 42; XVI konferentsiia VKP (b), april’ 1929 goda, 240–7, 625. See also Erickson, Soviet High Command, 295, 301–7, 322.

64. Kudriashov, Krasnaia armia, 234–40 (APRF, f. 3, op. 50, d. 259, l. 168–80). One of the two classified July 15, 1929, decrees was finally revealed in KPSS o vooruzhennykh silakh Sovetskogo Soiuza, 318–21. Contrary to some speculation, the decrees were not related to the launching of military action on the Chinese Eastern Railway. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 72–3 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 7, l. 12).

65. Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 124–9 (citing GARF, f. 5446, op. 55, d. 1966, l. 20–32, 35–43; and RGVA, f. 4, op. 18, d. 15, l. 190: Revvoensovet).

66. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 74 (RGVA, f. 74, op. 2, d. 101, 105ob.: Litunovskiy, July 30, 1929).

67. Gorlov, Sovershennko sekretno, Moskva-Berlin; Müller, Das Tor zur Weltmacht; Zeidler, Reichswehr und Rote Armee (2nd ed.); Erickson, Soviet High Command, 247–82.

68. Stalin had received Uborevichius on Nov. 4, 1927. Na prieme, 770.

69. In a comprehensive report in 1929, Uborevichius had judged the 4,000-strong German officer corps to be “to the right, far to the right of the Social Democrats. The bulk of them stand for a firm bourgeois dictatorship, for fascism.” D’iakov and Bushueva, Fashistskii mekh kovalsia v SSSR, 255 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 295, l. 141–83).

70. Zdanovich, Organy, 423–4 (citing TSA FSB, f. 2, op. 7, d. 61, l. 6). See also Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 131 (citing RGVA, f. 33991, op. 1, d. 20, l. 80–92; RGASPI, f. 85, op. 27, d. 93, l. 1; f. 17, op. 162, d. 8, l. 40); and Z.,

“Sovremennaia artilleria i modernizatsiia.” Stalin had written to Voroshilov (Dec. 31, 1928), who was then livid over budget cuts, that “the point now is our artillery is insufficient, scandalously insufficient.” Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 102 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 39, l. 19).

71. Tinchenko, Golgofo, 106–7; Tichanova, Rasstrel'nye spiski, no. 2, 99–101; Smirnov, Krovaryi marshal, 337 (I. P. Grave). Grigory Kulik, a Stalin civil-war crony dating to 1918 Tsaritsyn days and the head of the artillery directorate, escaped.

72. Mežyriski also appended his name to the explanation as the top responsible official. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 336–7 (TsA FSB, f. 2, d. 9, l. 249; Feb. 9, 1929). See the speculations regarding Boris Nicolaevsky's role in Fel'shtinskii, VChK-GPU, 271.

73. Yagoda would later testify under pressure that he gave both Rykov and Bukharin, at their requests, “secret OGPU material on the situation in the village.” This 1937 testimony, despite the circumstances under which it would be taken, is plausible. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 112–7 (interrogation April 26, 1937; TsA FSB, f. N-13614, tom 2, l. 57–8). On Trilisser's Comintern intelligence (“communications service”)—65 people in Moscow as well as a worldwide system of radio operators, couriers, and safe houses—see Lebedeva and Narinskii, Komintern i vtoroi mirovaia voina, 52, 54–5.

74. Dmitrievskii, Sovetskie portrety, 218–20.

75. The politburo (Sept. 12, 1929) again ordered him to follow his doctor's regimen. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 190 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 757, l. 9, 15).

76. Kokurin and Petrov, “OGPU, 1929–1934 gg.”; Gladkov, Nagrada, 345–6. Trilisser maintained that his party meeting report had been approved at the “Central Committee.”

77. Kokurin and Petrov, “OGPU, 1929–1934 gg.” 95 (June 27, 1929).

78. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 191 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 170, l. 42).

79. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 219–20 (APRF, f. 3, op. 50, d. 32, l. 115). Trilisser got kicked over to the workers' and peasants' inspectorate.

80. Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol'shaia chistka, 202.

81. Papchinskii and Tumshis, Shchit, naskolotii mechom, 208–9.

82. Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol'shaia chistka, 202 (citing TsA FSB, arkhivnoe sledvestvennoe delo No. 13144 on Kaul A. I., II: no pagination, words of I. Ia. Ilin; arkhivnoe sledvestvennoe delo N. 14963 on Papashenko I. P., l. 184; M. A. Listengrunt), 203 (l. 240–1). Mikhail Frinovsky was gone by then, out of Yevdokimov's shadow; in Rostov, Frinovsky had had his own gatherings at his house, attended by Yevdokimov.

83. For Stalin's patronage of Yevdokimov in fall 1929, see Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 191 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 170, l. 42). The full membership of the OGPU collegium became: Redens, Prokofyev, Blagonravov, Boki, Balytsky, Messing, and Yevdokimov. Petters and Pavlunovsky were taken off.

84. On Oct. 2, 1929, Yagoda wrote apologetically to the dictator that he had spoken to Mežyriski and there were no differences between them (contrary to what Yagoda had earlier told Stalin). Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 344–5 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 9, l. 248).

85. Kokurin and Petrov, Lubianka, 42–3. Deribas was pushed out to the Soviet Far East.

86. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 135–8; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 162–3. Stalin included Beso Lominadze among the wayward young functionaries. In early Aug. 1929, Lominadze, demoted to a provincial post, wrote an inflammatory letter about Stalin and party policy to his patron Orjonikidze, who wrote in a protective draft response: “although I keep no party secrets from Stalin, I did not show him your letter.” It seems that Orjonikidze did not send the draft and later read Lominadze's letter to Stalin, perhaps when Orjonikidze pushed to promote Lominadze to head the South Caucasus party committee (the appointment took effect May 8, 1930). Khlevniuk, Stalin i Ordzhonikidze, 23–5 (citing RGASPI, f. 85, op. 1/s, d. 115, l. 6–10, 1–5); Kommunist, 1991, no. 13: 56–7 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 607, l. 267–9; Stalin at the Feb.–March 1937 plenum). Lominadze became a full member of the Central Committee in summer 1930.

87. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 154–8; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 174–6. The main anti-Bukharin essay appeared in Pravda on Aug. 24, 1929; Cohen, Bukharin, 332.

88. Stalin insisted that re-recognition of the USSR precede any settlement on debts, and that he was not going to rein in Comintern propaganda. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 160–3 (Sept. 9, 1929); Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 177–9.

89. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 22 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1550, l. 5).

90. Gorky had boarded the steamer Karl Liebknecht on Aug. 20, and visited Astrakhan and Stalingrad then Rostov and Tiflis. Troyat, Gorky, 173. Stalin's doctor Ivan Valedinsky recalled Gorky visiting Stalin in Sochi in 1930. In fact, Gorky visited the USSR in 1928 (May 27–Oct. 12); 1929 (May 31–Oct. 12); and 1931 (May 14–Oct. 18), but not in 1930. Gorky's one and only post-1917 visit to Sochi was in 1929, but Valedinsky wrote that he himself did not see Stalin in 1929. Either Valedinsky "recalled" the Gorky-Stalin encounter based upon stories he was told the next year, or he confused the years he treated Stalin. Valedinskii, "Organizm Stalina vpolne zdorovyi," 69.

91. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 22 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1550, l. 6–7), 22–3 (l. 8), 23 (l. 9). Rumor had it that that Avel Yenukidze, her godfather, had enlisted Orjonikidze, and together they persuaded Stalin to allow Nadya to go back to school.

92. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 23–4 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1550, l. 10–4).

93. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 25–7 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1550, l. 16–24: between Sept. 16 and 22, 1929), 27 (l. 25; Sept. 23), 41n14 (d. 74, l. 18), 41n15 (d. 778, l. 18–9), 41n16 (d. 778, l. 20–1; Sept. 27). Stalin would thrice receive Kovalev: Dec. 18 (with Popov and Krumin) and Dec. 30 (alone), 1929, and March 11, 1930 (alone). Na prieme, 31–2.

94. Khromov, Po stranitsam, 34 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 73, l. 98–9, 103–11).

95. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 166–7 (Sept. 30, 1929); Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 181–2; Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP V: 10–1 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 768, l. 91, 92). Rykov, as head of the government, chaired the sessions, just as Lenin had.

96. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 27–8 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1550, l. 27).

97. DBFP, 2nd series, VII: 20–38. After the British had effectively agreed on terms, Stalin noted that politburo members Kalinin and Tomsy were not in Sochi to consult, and that he could not speak in the name of the politburo. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 73, l. 37; d. 74, l. 25 (Tovstukha, Oct. 3). See also Khromov, Po stranitsam, 220 (RGASPI, f. 669, op. 1, d. 8, l. 1a); and RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 73, l. 12, l. 85.

98. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 166–7, 167–8; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 181, 182.

99. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 34–5 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1550, l. 50–1).

100. Sokolov, "Neizvestnyi G. V. Chicherin," 14 (citing AVP RF, f. 08, op. 12, pap. 74, d. 55, l. 92–3; June 20, 1929).

101. This would be formalized in a politburo directive (Feb. 5, 1930): Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 219–20.

102. The reports of a supposed anti-Soviet bloc recorded frustration by the notional members over refusals to share intelligence. Khaustov et al., Glazami razvedki, 297 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 184, l. 45–45ob.), 298–9 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 9, d. 875, l. 92–4).

103. "We live in very difficult times," the Soviet writer Leonid Leonov, whom Gorky admired, wrote from Moscow to him (Oct. 21, 1929). "All around us everything crumbles . . . There is no way back now . . . The times are dangerous. About many things one cannot write." Semashkina and Evstigneeva, Perepiska Gor'kogo, II: 302–3.

104. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, I: 736 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 113, d. 789, l. 14; Oct. 22, 1929), 737 (f. 84, op. 2, d. 12, l. 54; Oct. 26).

105. Davies, Soviet Collective Farm, 81–2 (citing Sel'sko-khoziaistvennaia gazeta, Nov. 28, 1929; Sergei Syrtsov).

106. Theses of the 6th Comintern Congress in 1928 had predicted "the most severe intensification of the capitalist crisis," which, like earthquake forecasts, had suddenly turned correct. At the congress, the Comintern had also welcomed Latin American delegates for the first time, eliciting a boast about its "discovery of America." Manuel, Latin America and the Comintern, 65.

107. Coates and Coates, History of Anglo-Soviet Relations, II: 332; Izvestiia, Nov. 6, 1929; DBFP, 2nd series, VII: doc. 24; DVP SSSR, XII: 537–8, 541; Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 182–201 (RGASPI, f.

17, op. 162, d. 7, l. 55, 51, 87, 94, 123, 136, 143, 158–9, 160–3, 178); Izvestiia, July 5, 1929. In the May 30, 1929, general election, Labour had won 287 seats, not enough for a majority (308), while the Tories won 260; Labour was dependent on the votes of Lloyd George's Liberal Party (59 seats) to pass legislation. Three Tories voted for restoration of diplomatic relations with the USSR. Redvaldsen, “Today Is the Dawn.”

108. Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 21–2. Stalin approved the appointment of Grigory Sokolnikov, the former NEP-era finance commissar and party oppositionist and current skillful head of the state oil trust, as Soviet envoy. Sir Esmond Ovey became British ambassador in Moscow. Lammers, “Second Labour Government.” Ovey would claim that at a banquet given by the foreign affairs commissariat in 1931, the silverware bore the British coat of arms and the motto of the British chivalric Order of the Garter (Honi soit qui mal y pense—“May he be shamed who thinks badly of it”). Evidently, the silver had been stolen from the British embassy either during the 1917 revolution or after 1927, when relations had been severed. Time, May 11, 1931.

109. Blyumkin had served as Trotsky's adjutant, then was invited to rejoin the secret police, rising to pro-consul in the Soviet satellite of Mongolia and then to undercover OGPU station chief in Istanbul. Yakov Agranov recorded Blyumkin's revealing deposition (Oct. 20, 1929), which Yagoda forwarded to Stalin, and Stalin forwarded to Central Committee members. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 192–212 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 24, d. 126, l. 94–124), 213 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 8, l. 2). See also Savchenko, Avanttiurist grzhzdanskoi voiny, 305–36; Mandelstam, Hope against Hope, 101ff; Gusterin, Sovetskaia razvedka; Agabekov, G.P.U., 221–6; Agabekov, OGPU, 214–23; Agabekov, ChK za rabotoi, 293–9. Agabekov (Aryutunov), an Armenian OGPU operative sent to Turkey to replace Blyumkin, became the first senior secret police official to defect to the West (1930); he betrayed the Soviet spy network in the Near East. OGPU agents went around whispering that Radek had betrayed Blyumkin, a story that, as intended, reached Trotsky, damaging relations between him and Radek, conveniently for Stalin. Radek would not deny he had informed on Blyumkin. Trotsky is said to have received a letter detailing Radek's betrayal. “Kak i za chto Stalin rastrelial Bliumkina” Biulleten' oppositsii, no. 9 (Feb.–March 1930): 9–11; Deutscher, Prophet Outcast, 85–8; Medvedev, Let History Judge, 292–3; Volkogonov, Trotsky, 329–30; Orlov, Secret History, 194.

110. Sel'sko-khoziaistvennaia gazeta, Oct. 15, 1929 (Sergei Syrtsov); Pravda, Nov. 10 and Dec. 8, 1929. The slogan became widespread beginning in Feb. 1930: Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 191. A patent-equivalent for a tractor had been issued in tsarist Russia and a tractor prototype had been produced, but it never came into production. Artobolevskii and Blagonravov, Ocherki, 215.

111. Pravda, Nov. 7, 1929, reprinted with alterations in Sochineniia, XII: 118–35; Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 329–45. One of Stalin's post-facto editorial changes was shrinking the anticipated size of Soviet farms to 40,000–50,000 hectares. Sochineniia, XII: 129; Davies, “Stalin as Economic Policy-Maker,” 123. State farms were being modeled after industry, and, Molotov exhorted the plenum, collective farms should model themselves after state farms. Bol'shevik, 1929, no. 22: 20. Pravda (Sep. 5, 1929) had declared that all “technically more developed capitalist countries” were organizing agriculture like industry. Davies, Soviet Collective Farm, 3.

112. Mikoyan told the plenum (Nov. 11) that in the next year “we will have a significant export of grain,” even though key ports lacked large mechanized elevators and the United States, Argentina, and Canada had displaced Russia in European grain markets. Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP: 83 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 441, l. 19–20ob.).

113. Sdvigi v sel'skom khoziaistve SSSR, 22–3. See also Ivinskii, Kollektivizatsiia i naskulachivanie, 15; and Davies, Socialist Offensive, 116–37, 442.

114. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 740, l. 5.

115. Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP: V: 141 (Syrtsov). Officially, 19.1 percent of households had been collectivized in the North Caucasus by Oct. 1929. Davies, Socialist Offensive, 442.

116. Pravda, Nov. 26, 1929; Cohen, Bukharin, 334–5; Davies, Socialist Offensive, 174; Lewin, Russian Peasants and Soviet Power, 369.

117. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 778, l. 23. Hryhory Petrovsky, a Stalin loyalist, stated at the plenum that “[I] did not belong to the ‘rightist baiters’ in the way, for example, I fought with the Trotskyites or the new opposition—Kamenev and Zinoviev—when we went wall to wall.”

118. VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1933), II; KPSS v rezoliutsiakh (7th ed.), II: 631. During the plenum, Stalin angrily challenged a published account by Volodymyr Zatonsky concerning Lenin's dealings with the Left SRs. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 735, l. 11–3, 15–7; Zatonskii, "Otryvki vospominanii," 128–41. See also Zelenov, "Partiinyi kontrol' za izdaniem sochinenii Lenina."

119. Danilov and Ivinskii, Dokumenty svydetel'stviuiut, 23. See also Avtorkhanov, Stalin and the Soviet Communist Party, 159–60.

120. Davies, Socialist Offensive, 157–74; KPSS v rezoliutsiakh (7th ed.), II: 643.

121. The CER linked the Soviet cities of Chita and Vladivostok as well as the Chinese cities of Manzhouli, Harbin, Tsitsihar, and Suifenho. Tang, Russian Policy, 193–241. In the Soviet consulate the Chinese found high-quality imitations of American and Japanese seals, evidently used to reseal letters that had been perflustrated and to mail secret Soviet correspondence under the guise of American or Japanese packages. Lensen, Damned Inheritance, 34 (citing FRUS, 1929, II: 196–7; FO, 317/13931–F2692, F-2960).

122. Carr and Davies, Foundations of a Planned Economy, III/iii: 895–910. Relations were severed on Aug. 16, 1929. K  rlis Baumanis boasted to the Moscow province party conference (Sept. 1929) that the "Chinese aggression had woken up [Soviet] workers," who pledged their readiness to take up arms rather than "surrender to the imperialists." Pervai  a moskovskaia konferentsiia VKP (b): stenpograficheskii otchet, 39, 42.

123. Soversko-kitaitskii konflikt 1929, 37, translated in Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, II: 391; Krasnoznamenyi Dal'nevostochnyi, 91; Slavinskii, Sovetskii Soizuz i Kitai, 176.

124. Stalin had asked Molotov to think about staging a revolutionary uprising to invade and occupy Harbin "and establish a revolutionary power (massacre the landlords, bring in the peasants, create soviets in the cities and towns)." Kosheleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 167–8 (Oct. 7, 1929); Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 182.

125. Litvinov, Notes for a Journal, 113; Stephan, Russian Far East, 182. Soviet military intelligence had surmised in spring 1929 in an internal memorandum that "despite the strengthening activeness of anti-Soviet and fascist elements in Japan, Japanese policy regarding the USSR has had a more or less steady character." Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, VII/i: 29–31.

126. Krivosheev, Grif sekretnosti sniat, 66.

127. Slavinskii, Sovetskii Soizuz i Kitai, 178–81; Erickson, Soviet High Command, 240–4; Dushen'kin, Proletarskii marshal, 98–100; Krasnoznamenyi Dal'nevostochnyi, 115–24. Blyukher was awarded a Buick automobile and use of the former Chinese consulate in Khabarovsk as his residence. Kondrat'ev, Marshal Bliukher, 271–3; Kartunova, Bliukher v Kitae, 12; Blyukher, "Vospominania o lichnom," 81, 85.

128. Walker, War Nobody Knew, 328 (citing North China Daily News, Nov. 28, 1929), 334–5.

129. Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, II: 434–6; Antonov, "Nekotorye itogi konflikta"; Tang, Russian Policy, 242–67; Chuikov, "Konflikt na KVZhD." See also Elleman, Emergence of Communist Power, 192–205; and Patrikeef, Russian Politics, 85.

130. The Japanese also noted the apparent indifference of the League of Nations to questions of Chinese sovereignty. Lensen, Damned Inheritance.

131. Kosheleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 169–71; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 183–4.

132. Pravda, Dec. 11, 1929. See also Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 131, citing Kuibyshev, Brigady sotsializma: doklad na I Vsesoiuznom s'ezde udarnykh brigad (1930), 13–4, 17; Rezoliutsii i postanovlenii; and Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd udarnykh brigad.

133. Sutton, Western Technology, I: 347–8; Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 192, citing Na agarnom fronte, 1930, no. 1: 62–3, and RGAE, f. 7620, op. 1, d. 22, l. 65–1.

134. There would be 124 technical assistance contracts by 1931, compared with 17 contracts in 1927–28. Payments to foreign specialists perhaps consumed one-quarter of Soviet grain export revenues. By 1933, in an effort to save on scarce foreign currency, and with experience and (illegally) replicable blueprints now in hand, just 46 such contracts remained in force. Lewis, "Foreign Economic Relations," 209–10. Foreign technical assistance was codified as the strategy for military industry on Dec. 5, 1929. Simonov, Voenno-promyshlennnyi kompleks SSSR, 78.

^{135.} Tsarist gold reserves had been lost in war and revolution, and though the OGPU confiscated precious metals and foreign banknotes in private hands, this amounted to only 10 million rubles in a year. But the gold extraction industry would be revived, using prison labor. Aizenberg, Valiutnaia Sistema SSSR, 8, 63; Budnitskii, Den'gi russkoi emigratsii; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 260 (APRF, f. 4.5 op. 1, d. 170, l. 62: Yagoda, Jan. 7, 1931).

^{136.} Kennan, Russia and the West, 195.

^{137.} RGASPI, f. 17, op. 85, d. 531–5; Stalin: Sbornik statei; Heizer, “Cult of Stalin,” 61, 80.

^{138.} RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 768, l. 131.

^{139.} Stalin: sbornik statei; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 85, d. 531–5 (assembled congratulations). Stalin: sbornik statei, 2nd ed. (1930), 10, 44.

^{140.} At this time the censor (Glavlit) laid down strict guidelines for the publication of Stalin photographs. Blum, Za kulisami, 128 (RGALI St. Petersburg, f. 31, op. 2, d. 40, l. 3).

^{141.} Stalin, “Vsem organizatsiiam i tovarishcham, prislavshim privetstviia,” Pravda, Dec. 22, 1929. Sochineniia, XII: 140. See also Davies, Socialist Offensive, 118–9, 174–5.

^{142.} RGAKFD, ed. khr. 6633, 6 parts. Some of the footage is raw (multiple takes being shot).

^{143.} Volkogonov, Trotsky, 125 (citing arkhiv INO OGPU, f. 17548, d. 0292, t. 1, l. 106–7). The letter was among those later stolen with Trotsky's archives by the NKVD. Following not one but two fires, Trotsky would return to his original rented villa on Prinkipo only in Oct. 1932. Cherniavskii, Lev Trotsky, 488–9.

^{144.} Voroshilov, “Stalin i krasnaia armia,” Izvestiia, Dec. 21, 1929, reprinted in Stalin: sbornik statei, and in Voroshilov, Lenin, Stalin, i krasnaia armia, 41–61. Stalin himself crossed out the words that had offended him with red pencil: Voennye arkhivy Rosii, 77 (Voroshilov's adjutant Khmel'nitsky). Stalin had not been prominent in the press materials on the 9th anniversary of the Red Army's founding (Feb. 23, 1927), but in the three-volume Civil War of 1918–1921, published in 1928–30, A. S. Bubnov wrote a forty-page introduction without mentioning Trotsky's name while celebrating Stalin. Bubnov et al., Grazhdanskaia voina 1918–1921, III: 10. Avel Yenukidze, in a private birthday letter to Stalin (Dec. 30, 1929), shrewdly captured Stalin's self-image while managing to quote Pushkin: Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 108–10 (RGASPI, f. 667, op. 1, d. 16, l. 4–6).

^{145.} Émigré sources produced a blunter version. “Stalin is the only man we must obey, for fear of getting worse,” Pyatakov was said to have remarked privately. “Bukharin and Rykov deceive themselves in thinking that they would govern in Stalin's place; Kaganovich and such would succeed him, and I cannot and will not obey Kaganovich.” Whether Pyatakov actually said that, or Trotsky's supporters reported it so, to please their master, the statement reflected a widespread sense that Stalin stood far above the members of his faction. Souvarine, Staline, 450 (no citation); Souvarine, Stalin, 489.

^{146.} Popov further distinguished Stalin's leadership by the claim that in difficult situations, he did not succumb to panic. Popov, “Partiia i vzhod'.” For a broader discussion, see Aron, Sociologie des sociétés industrielles.

^{147.} Graziosi, “Stalin's Anti-Worker ‘Workerism’ 1924–1931,” 253–4; “Iz perepiski A. M. Gor'kogo,” 183–8 (Nov. 27, 1929), translated in Political Archives of the Soviet Union, 1/2 (1990): 177–80.

^{148.} As Syrtsov had put it, echoing Stalin, “in those places where we broke kulak resistance, a strong flow of grain immediately commenced, as if a cork had been removed.” XVI konferentsiia VKP (b), april' 1929 goda, 322–3.

^{149.} Rationing had emerged haphazardly and varied by locale. By Feb.–March 1930, towns were prioritized based upon size and significance. Local trading agencies welcomed rationing as a better way to obtain supplies they were tasked with getting into workers' hands; factories welcomed rationing, too, lobbying to raise the status of their enterprises for better rations. Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 289–300; Carr and Davies, Foundations of a Planned Economy, I: 700–4.

^{150.} Back at a July 4, 1929, politburo meeting, Molotov had proposed the formation of a USSR land commissariat, and Mykola Skyrnyk, the enlightenment commissar of Ukraine, immediately understood that this would put the country's land under Union (not republic) ownership and objected, pointing out that such a move would violate the USSR constitution (in terms of republic prerogatives). Stalin, maneuvering, suggested the matter be postponed until a Central Committee plenum, and in the meantime, he prepared a fait accompli. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 11.

151. Pravda, Jan. 27, 1930; KPSS v rezoliutsiakh (9th ed.), V: 39–42, 72–5; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 771, l. 3; Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, II: 35–84 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1876, l. 8; f. 558, op. 11, d. 38, l. 1, 4, 7; RGAE, f. 7486, op. 37, d. 40, l. 5–5ob., 58–53, 174–69, 73–72, 41, 197–87, 211–06, 205, 218, 217–12, 220–220ob.; d. 50, l. 40–39; d. 49, l. 27–24), 85–6; Spravochnik partiinogo rabotnika, VII/ii: 114.

152. Sochineniia, XII: 141–72. To those who reasoned that given collectivization's universal nature, kulak exclusion would be unnecessary, he replied, “dekulakization represents a component part of the establishment and development of collective farms,” adding that “when a head has been cut off, no one cries over the hairs” (170). See also Lewin, Russian Peasants and Soviet Power, 487; Izvestiia, Feb. 2, 1930; and Pravda, April 3, 1930.

153. Solomon, “Rural Scholars,” 148 (quoting S. M. Dubrovsky). Hearsay has Bukharin, Tomsy, and Rykov showing up uninvited on New Year's Eve 1929–30 at Stalin's Kremlin apartment, carrying Georgian wine, with Stalin letting them in. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 206 (no citation); Medvedev, Nikolai Bukharin, 25 (no citation).

154. This was Nov. 20, 1929. On Nov. 28, Stalin received Kamenev; on Dec. 11, Zinoviev. Na prieme, 31. Trotsky soon warned in an article dated Feb. 13, 1930, of the danger of kulaks infiltrating collective farms, which might become “a new form of social and political disguise for the kulaks.” But his proposed solution was a vague “industrial and cultural revolution,” not mass deportation. Biulleten' oppositsii, 1930, no. 9: 4–5. Tucker, who lacked access to these sources, nonetheless understood that “Stalin placed his own regime before a fait accompli.” Tucker, Stalin in Power, 145.

155. Pravda, Jan. 6, 1930; Kommunisticheskaiia partiia sovetskogo soiuza, III: 667; Ivnitskii, “Istoriia podgotovki postanovleniia TsK VKP (b),” 265–88; RGASPI, f. 85, op. 27, d. 385, l. 1–5 (letter to Orjonikidze: Jan. 3, 1930); Vyltsan et al., “Nekotorye voprosy,” 13. Davies, Socialist Offensive, 177–80, 237. For a chronology, see Viola, “Collectivization in the Soviet Union,” 71.

156. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, II: 103–4 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 9, d. 21, l. 393–4).

157. Ivnitskii, Kollektivizatsiia i raskulachivanie, 108–9.

158. Sochineniia, XII: 173–4. Stalin was deferential to Gorky, explaining in a letter in Feb. 1930 to an editor about the republication in Gorky's Collected Works of his essay about Lenin from 1925 that “if comrade Gorky expresses doubts or—more than that—does not agree to introduce the changes, . . . then it will be necessary to publish the articles without any changes.” Gorky refused to make the changes. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tseznura, 173–4 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 822, l. 7, 8–9), 183 (l. 10: Feb. 28, 1930), 183–4 (f. 4, op. 2, d. 474, l. 29–30: A. A. Strunov, 1957).

159. On Feb. 2, 1930, an OGPU secret instruction to the special departments watching over the Red Army instituted a registry of soldiers found to have connections to “kulak elements.” Soldiers observed in anti-Soviet activities were to be arrested. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKa, 61; GARF, f. 9414, op. 1, d. 1944, l. 17–25. Stalin also, yet again, dispatched grain plenipotentiaries. Davies, Socialist Offensive, 267.

160. He added of the brave new world of anti-market statization: “If we do not put an end to the flood of paperwork, it will drown us. We conquered Denikin and Yudenich, Wrangel and various counterrevolutionary scoundrels, but paper will asphyxiate us.” Ikonnikov, Sozdanie i deiatel'nost', 212 (citing RGASPI, f. 85, op. 27, d. 27, l. 9).

161. A politburo decree of Jan. 30, 1930, divided the “kulaks” into three categories: “active counterrevolutionaries,” estimated at 60,000 people, were to be “sentenced” extrajudicially either to execution or internment in camps by “troikas” consisting of the local OGPU chief, provincial party boss, and local procurator; those in the second category, around 1.5 million people, were to be dispossessed and deported to uninhabited or sparsely inhabited places; and those in the third, some 2 million, were to be left in place, for now, but expropriated and not allowed to join collective farms. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, II: 126–30 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 8, l. 64–9). See also Viola, Best Sons, 216. Messing had asked Molotov to explain the party's policy to the OGPU collegium on Jan. 30–31, 1930, but Stalin rejected the request: a Central Committee directive to the OGPU was not a matter of discussion. Mozokhin and Gladkov, Menzhinskii, 259–61 (no citation); Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, II: 151–5 (TsA FSB, f. 2os., op. 8, d. 35, l. 2–8).

162. KPSS v rezoliutsiakh (7th ed.), II: 528. A volunteer's employer was supposed to pay for transportation, top off the lower collective-farm wages, and accept the worker back in the future. Many factories resisted releasing their workers. Pravda, Dec. 30, 1929; Viola, Best Sons, 35, 41, 56–7.

¹⁶³. In Ukraine, the Caucasus, and Siberia, the regime deployed OGPU border guards as well (both groups inflicted and took casualties). Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, II: 405–9 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 329, l. 59–65; May 3, 1930). Officials had propagated the notion that collectivization would produce a “sharp improvement in the qualities of the human material available for the army.” But soon the army political directorate warned (Sept. 8, 1930) of “sharpening kulak moods in the army” and a flood of peasant letters “asking the soldiers to defend the peasantry, to turn their guns against Soviet power.” Gaevskii, “Kolkhoznoe stroitel'stvo”; Romano and Tarchova, L'Armata Rossa, 354–8 (RGVA, f. 9, op. 28, d. 161, l. 80–4). See also Tarkhova, “Krasnaia armia,” 114. The families of soldiers would eventually be exempted from dekulakization. But the Red Army political administration would not pronounce the political atmosphere among the soldiery stable until the end of 1932 (a time of famine). By the end of 1933, discharges would rise to at least 37,000. Tarkhova, Krasnaia armia, 131, 204; Zdanovich, Organy, 313–4 (citing TsA FSB, f. 66, op. 1 d. 208, l. 111), 314n134.

¹⁶⁴. Fitzpatrick, Stalin's Peasants, 52 (citing GASO, f. 1148, op. 148 r/2, d. 65, l. 39).

¹⁶⁵. The 23–29 age cohort accounted for just 28.6 percent of the industrial work force. Kuromiya, “Crisis of Proletarian Identity,” at 296n101, citing Politicheskii i trudovoi pod'em rabocheho klassa SSSR, 1928–1929 gg. (Moscow, 1956), 545; Meyer, Sozialstruktur sowjetischer Industriearbeiter, 139.

¹⁶⁶. Dubbed 25,000ers and “the best sons of the fatherland,” they were celebrated in the Vladimir Mayakovsky march “Onward 25! Onward 25!” and Mikhail Sholokhov's novel, Virgin Soil Upturned. Rabochaia gazeta, Jan. 28, 1930; Litsm k derevne, 1930, no. 4: 3; Viola, Best Sons, 65. A regime official would boast that more than 100,000 factory workers had taken part in forcing through regime policy in the countryside as of June 1930. XVI s'ezd VKP (b), 66; Ivnitskii and Ezerskii, “Dvadsatipiatitsiachniki i ikh rol,” 462, 489; Selunskaiia, Rabochie-dvadsatipiatitsiachniki, 67, 76–7; Davies, Socialist Offensive, 168, 208, 210–11; Viola, Best Sons, 43. The mobilization officially ended on March 25, 1931: Savel'ev and Poskrebyshv, Direktivy VKP (b), 844.

¹⁶⁷. Viola, Best Sons, 2 (citing Trud, Feb. 2, 1930).

¹⁶⁸. Viola, Best Sons, 63 (citing GARF, f. 5470, op. 14, d. 204, l. 47).

¹⁶⁹. Carr wrote that “policy determined class.” Carr, Socialism in One Country, I: 99.

¹⁷⁰. “O meropriiatiakh po ukrepleniiu sotsialisticheskogo perestroistva sel'skogo khoziaistva v raionakh sploshnoi kollektivizatsii i po bor'be s kulachestvom: postanovlenie TsIK i SNK ot 1 fevralia 1930 g.”: <http://www.defree.ru/publications/p01/p40.htm#0724>.

¹⁷¹. Fainsod, Smolensk under Soviet Rule, 245. “All properties were seized, including women's cut hair, children's shirts, bowls for syringing, tea cups, spoons, and bed linen,” one report in Perm noted. “Confiscated kulak belongings were used as a dowry during some marriages.” Suslov, “Revolution from Above,” citing PermGANI, f. 2, op. 7, d. 124, l. 112–5: not before March 2, 1930.

¹⁷². Hughes, “Capturing the Russian Peasantry,” 99, citing GANO corpus 2, f. 2, op. 2–1, d. 3506, l. 2; op. 2, d. 366, l. 189–98.

¹⁷³. Sevost'ianov et al., “Sovershenno sekretno,” VIII/i: 746–63 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 53, l. 31–79; April 29, 1930), 764–71 (d. 655, l. 500–9; May 14, 1930).

¹⁷⁴. Viola, Peasant Rebels, 117 (citing GARF, f. 5469, op. 9, d. 398, l. 23). In Smolensk province, as elsewhere, party members were warned “to stay away from the windows” at work, and not to walk village streets at night. Fainsod, Smolensk under Soviet Rule, 241.

¹⁷⁵. One published account has only fifty 25,000ers being killed or seriously wounded, an improbably small number. Selunskaiia, Rabochie-dvadsatipiatitsiachniki, 145 (no citation).

¹⁷⁶. Fainsod, Smolensk under Soviet Rule, 245.

¹⁷⁷. Reports also were going to Stalin tracing speculation among European diplomats about a possible Soviet attack against a weak Romania. He wrote on the reports: “to my archive.” RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 184, l. 53–93; Khaustov et al., Glazami razvedki, 312–3 (l. 77–8; Feb. 11, 1930), 315–6 (l. 86–7; March 3, 1930).

¹⁷⁸. For 1930, the OGPU would register 13,754 “group anti-Soviet protests” and 13,794 “terrorist acts,” about half against property. But a mere 176 actions were qualified as full-fledged “uprisings” and another 44 as involving arms. The police recorded around 5,000 cases of leaflets or anonymous declarations. These numbers are likely not comprehensive,

but they indicate something less than civil war. Danilov, Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, II: 787–808 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 679, l. 36–72 March 15, 1931). See also Viola, Peasant Rebels, 100–31. For the civil war argument, see Graziosi, Stalinism, 5–64. The secret police had recorded sixty-three riots and spontaneous localized rebellions over the two years 1926–27. Berelowitch and Danilov, Sovetskaia derevnia glazami VChK-OGPU-NKVD, I: 18 (TsA FSB, sekretno-politicheskii ordel OGPU, dokladnaia zapiska 1930: 32).

179. Vasil'ev, "Krest'iane vosstaniia" (quoting declassified local archives without citation); Vasil'ev and Viola, Kollektivizatsiia i krest'ianskoe soprotivlenie, 213–5 (TsGAOO Ukrainy, f. 1, op. 20, d. 3154, l. 39–40), 215–6 (l. 42–3), 21620 (l. 48–53); Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, II: 279, 324.

180. Sochinenii, XII: 188 (Feb. 9, 1930). On Soviet war fears, see also the telegram from Litvinov to Alexander Arosyev, Feb. 28, 1930: DVP SSSR, XIII: 118. Stalin had been cognizant not to aggravate tense relations with Poland (which had once ruled Ukraine), anxious that the Poles might take advantage of Soviet troubles. German-Soviet relations were on a knife's edge as well. Ken and Rusapov, Zapadnoe prigranich'e, 173–5 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 8, l. 53: Jan. 25, 1930), 538–43 (op. 162, d. 8, l. 114: March 11, 1930).

181. The article also took to task local officials who had lagged behind in implementing collectivization. Pravda, March 2, 1930; Izvestiia, March 2, 1930; Sochineniia, XII: 191–9. The politburo had voted to have Stalin "publish an article in the newspapers," but it remains unclear whether he had discussed beforehand the specific content of his article and its self-exculpatory character. The politburo protocol was approved by telephone polling: Stalin's signature on it is from a stamp. A secret report to Orjonikidze from Balytsky, OGPU chief in Ukraine, on Feb. 25, and another the next day from party officials in Kharkov to Molotov, detailed both massive peasant resistance and the idea that local officials provoked dangerous peasant rebellion in key border regions by improperly implementing collectivization, the very language Stalin would use in his article. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b): povestki dnia zasedanii, II: 25; Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, II: 270 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 778, l. 5), 832–33n101 (APRE, f. 3, op. 30, d. 145, l. 138–44, 146–7). Syrtsov, who served on the key politburo commission on collective farms, in a speech to the Institute for Red Professors on Feb. 20, 1930, which was only published (March 15) after Stalin's article, foreshadowed many of his themes: Bolshevik, 1930, no. 5: 47, 51.

182. Sevost'ianov et al., "Sovershenno sekretno," VIII/ii: 1253–4 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 257, l. 18), 1257–8 (l. 15–7), 1258–1344 (d. 679, l. 181–319). Yagoda, a mere five days after Stalin's "Dizzy" article, reported to him that many regions were engaged in "conciliatory approaches to the kulak . . . defense of the kulak." Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, II: 292–302 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 40, l. 6–17). Stalin met with Yagoda that same day. Na prieme, 32 (March 7, 1930).

183. In fact, Balytsky was in the field commanding the crackdown; Stalin on the phone had reached Balytsky's deputy, Israel Leplyovsky. Vasil'ev and Viola, Kollektivizatsiia i krest'ianskoe soprotivlenie, 221–2 (TsGAOO Ukrainy, f. 1, op. 20, d. 3154, l. 11: March 19, 1930), 233 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 1/s, d. 125, l. 2–2ob.: no later than March 25, 1930).

184. Biulleten' oppozitsii, 10 (April 1930): 2–7.

185. Hindus, Red Bread, 147.

186. Davydenko et al., Pu' trudovykh pobed, 270–5; Viola, Peasant Rebels, 171–2 (citing RGAE, f. 7486, op. 37, d. 122, l. 104).

187. Storella and Sokolov, Voice of the People, 352 (RGAE, f. 7486s, op. 37, d. 102, l. 77–8). Bukharin, too, was undercut: he had just published yet another essay acknowledging the party was always right, while citing "kulak sabotage," Pravda, Feb. 19, 1930. See also Sevost'ianov et al., "Sovershenno sekretno," VIII/i: 725, 730 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 92, l. 1–49).

188. Sevost'ianov et al., "Sovershenno sekretno," VIII/i: 722 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 92, l. 1–49: April 24, 1930). Stalin sent a secret circular (April 2, 1930) to party organizations asserting that had it not been for the tactical retreat—portrayed as fixing the incorrect implementation of the party line—"we would now have had a wave of peasant insurrections, a good half of our 'lower' functionaries would have been killed by the peasants, the spring sowing would have failed, the collective farm construction would have been beaten down, and our internal and external position would have been put under threat." He also depicted his "Dizzy with Success" article as assigned to him by the Central Committee. On April 3, he felt compelled to publish a second article denying that he had written the first on his own initiative, calling it a directive of the Central Committee. Danilov and Ivnitskii, Dokumenty svдетельstvuiut, 387–94. See also Zelenin, “Osushchestvlenie politiki,” 47n4.

189. The functionary added: “Our public was so stunned by the unexpectedness of it that they did not know to react.” “Nachalo razgroma profdzviasheniia: dnevnik B. G. Kozoleva, 1927–1930 gg.,” 136–7. The diarist Boris Kozolev was accused of right deviationism and expelled from the party for two years when his diary was found. In Oct. 1930, he was mobilized to Magnitogorsk.

190. On April 21, the Siberian procuracy reported that 328 officials, mostly of rural soviets, had been sentenced to imprisonment or, in eleven cases, execution. One, in a drunken state, had murdered a peasant and raped his wife. Hughes, Stalinism in a Russian Province, 187–8 (citing GANO corpus 2, f. 2, op. 2, d. 465, l. 104–9; d. 459, l. 19–20, 32, 40), 190 (d. 460, l. 10, l. 31). In March 1930, the GPU district plenipotentiary in Western Siberia, F. G. Dobygin, had arrested eighty members of the soviet and party active and shot nine of them; he released kulaks from the county jail—they grabbed rifles and led an uprising of four hundred people. Danilov and Krasil’nikov, Spetspereseleny v Zapadnoi Sibiri, 59 (GANO, f. p-1204, op. 1, d. 8, l. 68).

191. Kin’s original letter was dated April 2, 1930; Stalin’s response to him was returned as undeliverable, and on May 29, Tovstukha inquired of the Kherson party boss whether a Nikolai Kin existed—evidently Kin (whatever his real name) had given a false address. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 184–6 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 753, l. 114–7), 186 (l. 123), 188 (l. 121).

192. The idea of a rail link between Siberia and Russian Turkestan had first been bruited back in 1886; work had commenced in 1927. Carr and Davies, Foundations of a Planned Economy, I: 904–7; Payne, Stalin’s Railroad.

193. Izvestiia, April 27, 1930; Lyons, Assignment in Utopia, 304–12 (quote at 304).

194. Another of the main arguments of Magnetic Mountain is that authoritarian state power is most effective when it is reproduced in people’s everyday lives and identities.

195. Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 249–50.

196. Rassweiler, Generation of Power. The local factories slated to use the power supply made less progress. Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 215.

197. The earliest reports of hunger seem to have emerged from the Russian republic in Jan. 1930, in the Volga Valley, Stalingrad county, where half the harvest failed, according to secret police reports. Peasants there formed groups to demand food from the authorities, who took no special actions, as people consumed food surrogates and children stopped going to school. Kondrashin, Golod v SSSR, I/i: 146 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 778, l. 394–8), 177–80 (d. 852, l. 296–302; July 26, 1930), 189–90 (d. 787, l. 992–3), 197–8 (op. 9, d. 546, l. 302–3; June 6, 1930), 198–9 (RGAE, op. 11, d. 17, l. 139–41; July 8, 1930).

198. Kondrashin et al., Golod v SSSR, I/i: 228–30 (TsA FSB, f. 2m, op. 8, d. 834, l. 985–6), 230 (RGAE, f. 8043, op. 11, d. 17, l. 208–208ob.), 230–9 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 834, l. 1072–6).

199. Schoolteachers in Akmolinsk province of Kazakhstan deserted their schools en masse and signed on for work at the railroad, which had some food to distribute. Kondrashin et al., Golod v SSSR, I/i: 207–8 (GA Kustanaiskoi obl. Respubliki Kazakhstan, f. 54–p, op. 1, d. 784, l. 14), 220–7 (TsA FSB, f. 2m, op. 8, d. 744, l. 570–6), 227–8 (l. 612). Kazakhstan went from 2 percent collectivization of households as of 1928 to 50 percent as of April 1, 1930, by official statistics. Kozybaev et al., Kollektivizatsiia v Kazakhstane, 4.

200. As trade negotiations with Britain continued over Soviet obligations for tsarist and Provisional Government debt, the Soviet envoy to London, Sokolnikov, was receiving wide praise in the British press as one Communist who kept his word. A Russian émigré periodical edited by Paul Miliukov, the former leader of the Constitutional Democrats, praised Sokolnikov as “the sole Soviet administrator who has demonstrated with deeds that he is capable of learning state affairs.” Mischievously, the article posed the question, “Stalin or Sokolnikov?” Miliukov, Poslednie novosti, May 16, 1930; see also Vozrozhdenie, May 17, 1930; Genis, “Upriamyi narkom s il’inki,” 235. Sokolnikov is said to have fretted to his wife, “Stalin will never forgive me this and will necessarily exact revenge.” Serebriakova, “Iz vospominanii,” at 242. On Sept. 17, 1930, Yaroslavsky wrote a denunciation to Orjonikidze (party Control Commission) of Sokolnikov’s alleged expenditure in London of 4,000 gold rubles on sleeping quarters for his mistress. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 134–5 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 27, d. 267, l. 1–2). Sokolnikov would serve as envoy to Britain through Sept. 14, 1932. He was replaced by Jan Lachowiecki, from a Russified Polish family, who had taken the name Ivan Maisky, a confidant of Litvinov.

201. Ivnitskii, Kollektivizatsiia i raskulachivanie, 115 (no citation). “We are facing a combat situation here,” one soldier in Bashkiria noted, according to a spring 1930 police report with many such examples. “I see how they are driving the peasants, and my heart is broken. Nothing can be done, I’ll have to keep silent.” Sevost’ianov et al., “Sovershenno sekretno,” VIII/ii: 1219–24 (Tsa FSB, f. 2, op. 8, por. 653, l. 305–7).

202. Ivnitskii, Sud’ba raskulachennykh, 24. See also Jasny, Socialized Agriculture, 308.

203. Davies, Soviet Collective Farm, 153.

204. Viola, Best Sons, 157–8. Peasants, too, were getting promoted by the hundreds of thousands into positions of rural authority, taking ad hoc study courses. Aruntunian, Mekhanizatory sel’skogo khoziaistva SSSR.

205. Rozenfel’d, Dvadsatipiatyitsiiachniki, 31, 158–9.

206. Davies, Soviet Collective Farm, 292, citing Sotsialisticheskoe zemleutstroisvo, 1930, no. 3–4: 56–9. Individual peasants received the new land allocations last in line and in smaller allotments, which were less conveniently located and often marshy or infested, but they persevered.

207. Davies, Soviet Collective Farm, 160, citing Resheniia partii i pravitel’stva po khoziaistvennym voprosam (1967), II: 196 (March 14, 1930). No single decree had introduced the NEP, and no single decree would abolish it—in fact, technically, NEP would be “transcended” in the Hegelian, dialectical sense.

208. Decisions on how to distribute income from the 1930 harvest would be made locally. There would be wide variation, but also a basic calculation such that collective farmers would receive compensation out of what remained after expenses and tax payments on a “per eater” basis, meaning farmers would get a portion of the harvest irrespective of how much work they had done, a disincentive to work harder. Davies noted that “perhaps the most remarkable feature of the spring of 1930 is that the sowing took place quite successfully in the kolkhozy even though the collective farmers were working on credit for an unknown amount of payment, often not knowing by which system they would be paid.” The original compensation idea—that collective farmers would be paid factory-style wages based on a piece rate system (in line with a vision of gigantic farms)—failed, and not only because cash was in short supply: a guaranteed wage promised to shift the financial burden of any crop failures to the state. Davies also shows that only in June 1930, by which time sowing had been completed, did the regime decide upon remuneration on the basis of “labor days,” a system that treated work accomplished as a dividend to be paid from what was left over from the collective farm’s income (in kind and money) after state deliveries and taxes. Record keeping remained sporadic, however. Davies, Soviet Collective Farm, 140, 140–67; S’ezdy sovetov Soiuza Sovetskikh SSR, III: 189.

209. Partiinoe khoziaistvo, 1930, no. 7–8: 8 (Wolf).

210. Davies, Soviet Collective Farm, 310, citing Sotsialisticheskoe zemledelie, June 3, 1930.

211. Murin, Stalin v ob’iatiakh, 29 (APRE f. 45, op. 1, d. 1550, l. 30), 41n17.

212. Trapeznikov, Kommunisticheskaia partiia, 38–9; Rigby, Communist Party Membership, 178–9; Fainsod, Smolensk under Soviet Rule, 211–2, 218. Because some were later rehabilitated, or because incomplete figures were initially reported, sometimes the figure is reported as 130,000, including 14,000 who quit voluntarily: Partiinoe stroitel’svo, 1930, no. 10 (12): 14–9; Schapiro, Communist Party of the Soviet Union, 435. Cf. Pravda, April 23, 1931. A comprehensive study of rural Communists in the RSFSR in 1929 had shown that one in four owned property worth more than 800 rubles, compared with one in six of the overall peasant population. Communist peasants were also more likely to employ hired labor. Gaister and Levin, “O sostave sel’partorganiztsii.”

213. Gill, Origins, 137; Rigby, Communist Party Membership, 420; Kuromiya, Stalin’s Industrial Revolution, 48; Carr and Davies, Foundations of a Planned Economy, 132. Tsarist-era officials comprised 10 percent of the staff in commissariats, albeit a mere 2 percent had been ministers or high officials. This was after sweeping purges of the state apparatus. Izvestiia, Aug. 10, 1930.

214. Stalin also told the congress, “we are in favor of the state dying out, and at the same time we stand for the strengthening of the dictatorship of the proletariat.” He acknowledged the contradiction, but called it Marxist dialectics. In 1933, he would reiterate the point. Sochineniia, XIII: 211, 350. Engels had written in Anti-Dühring (1878) that “the interference of the state power in social relations becomes superfluous in one sphere after another, and then ceases of itself . . . The state is not 'abolished,' it withers away [es stirbt ab]." Engels, Unwülzung der Wissenschaft, 291–2.

215. XVI s'ezd VKP (b), 17–57; Sochineniia, XII: 235–373. See also Davies, Socialist Offensive, 330–6. Stalin ridiculed "the complete absurdity of chatter about NEP being incompatible with an attack" on capitalist elements. Sochineniia, XII: 306–7. Select workers had been invited to deliver personal narratives to the congress, which became the first with no speeches against the leadership. Szamuely, "Elimination of Opposition." Even after the opening of the archives, Szamuely's article remains the most incisive on the problem of opposition to Stalin.

216. Shitts, Dnevnik, 195; Pavlova, Stalinizm, 68–9 (citing GARF, f. 1235, op. 133, d. 11, l. 28, 30). Shitts, born (1874) in Tambov, studied history with the medievalist P. Vinogradov at Moscow University, where he eventually got a position teaching Latin. In 1928 he became the editor of the Great Soviet Encyclopedia. He would be arrested in 1933.

217. These words were omitted from Sochineniia, XII: 233, 234.

218. Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 250–1, 372–5; Za industrializatsiui, June 19, July 5, Oct. 8, 1930. On June 16, 1930, in his recognition of the newly opened Rostov Agricultural Engineering Works, Stalin also thanked "all those foreign specialists—engineers and technicians—who have helped." Stikh, Zavod griadushchikh urozhav, 22; Pravda, June 17, 1930.

219. Glan, Iakov Il'in, 235. See also Il'in, Bol'sheviki dolzhny ovladet' tekhniki; Il'in, Liudi stalingradskogo traktornogo; and his incomplete posthumous novel Bol'shoi konveier (Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1934). Il'in (b. 1905) died in Dec. 1932. Margaret Bourke-White, the photographer, observed at the Stalingrad Tractor Factory how "one Russian is screwing in a tiny bolt and twenty other Russians are standing around watching him, talking it over, smoking cigarettes, arguing . . . They are like children marveling over new toys. More than that, they are religious fanatics worshipping before a new shrine." Bourke-White, Eyes on Russia, 118–9.

220. Boris Sheboldayev remarked at the congress (June 29): "In many party organizations we have witnessed demonstrations, both of the most straightforward right-wing opportunist and of the 'leftist' Trotskyite type, that for sheer boldness and effrontery surpass anything seen even at the height of our struggle with the rights." XVI s'ezd VKP (b), 135–6.

221. While Mikoyan ripped into the "right deviation," Rudzutaks told the delegates the rightists had engaged in "direct slander of the party, direct slander of comrade Stalin." XVI s'ezd VKP (b), 39–44. The exiled Trotsky wrote that "the plebiscite regime has been established conclusively," without acknowledging the root cause. Trotsky, "Preliminary Comments on the Sixteenth Congress" [July 25, 1930], II: 335–6.

222. Bukharin had known Larina since she was four. She had grown up in her stepfather Yuri Larin's apartment in the Metropole, which was visited by top party officials, including Stalin. Bukharin lived one floor below. On the Black Sea he was still involved with Alexandra Travina—a lover planted on him (it seems she had miraculously appeared in the same coupé on the overnight train from Moscow to Leningrad). Larina and Bukharin would marry in 1934. "No ia to znaiu, chto ty prav": pis'mo N. I. Bukharina I. V. Stalinu iz vnutrennei tsiur'my NKVD," 49 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 301, l. 129–33); Gregory, Politics, Murder, and Love, 57–60, 67–9, 72–4; Larina, This I Cannot Forget, 107–12.

223. XVI s'ezd VKP (b), 142–8. Rykov was no coward: when criticized in person at a Urals party gathering in June 1930, he had responded forcefully and received an ovation.

224. Murin, Stalin v ob'iatyakh, 29–30 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1550, l. 31–2).

225. XVI s'ezd VKP (b), 63; XVI s'ezd VKP (b), 26 iiumia–13 iulia 1930 g., I: 122. Tomsy was eventually replaced by the Stalin favorite Nikolai Shvern timer (b. 1888), whom the dictator had promoted from Leningrad in 1926 to the central apparatus, then assigned to the Urals. When Shvern timer had reported in 1929 that his Urals party organization had failed to fulfill assigned targets, Stalin wrote back, "There are no grounds to complain, you did all you could." Davies and Harris, Stalin's World, 42 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 36, l. 103); Kosheleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 141–44.

226. Kirov, Izbrannye stat'i rechi, 539.

227. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 117–29 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 27, d. 397, l. 2–7). Pyatakov had been inspired to set out his thoughts in writing by a conversation with Orjonikidze, as noted in a letter to the latter (129n4: l. 1, July 20). See also Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 187–9.

228. Vechernyi klub, Dec. 22, 1992 (interview with Poskryobyshev from 1964). The secretariat had a “bureau, which in March 1926 was replaced by a ‘secret department.’” RGASPI, f. 17, op. 84, 85, 86. See also Rosenfeldt, “Special” World. Stalin had posted his former top aide, the Marxist scholar Ivan Tovstukha (b. 1889), who had only one lung and tuberculosis, to the Lenin Institute; another long-standing top aide, the high-strung Lev Mekhlis, who hankered after Tovstukha’s intellectual authority, browbeat Stalin into allowing him, finally, to take leave to bootstrap a Marxist education at the Institute of Red Professors. This opened the way for Poskryobyshev, who eventually became Stalin’s top aide. His wife was the sister of the wife of Trotsky’s son Lev Sedov. See also Bazhanov, Damnation of Stalin, 34–40.

229. Already by the next day he was said to be feeling fine. The drivers of the two vehicles went unpunished. Gosudarstvennaia okhrana Rossii, 47 (citing TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 107).

230. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 700, l. 4. OR l. 47.

231. Chigirin, Stalin, 79–83 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1482, l. 44–51).

232. Valedinskii, “Organizm Stalina vpolne zdorovyi,” 69. Kaganovich, too, got a new apartment, and was said to be “very satisfied” and “touched by Stalin’s attention.” Murin, Stalin v ob’iatiakh, 33 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1550, l. 46–7). Kaganovich’s apartment was in the so-called children’s wing of the Grand Kremlin Palace, also known as the tsarevich’s quarters.

233. Kosheleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 196–7; Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 207–8.

234. The regime had rechristened the peasant commune, whose origins went back deep into the mists of ancient Russia, a “land society.” But in the RSFSR, a decree of July 30, 1930, stipulated that land societies were to be liquidated wherever 75 percent of households belonged to the new collective farms. (Unlike collective farms, the commune entailed working land individually while holding it in common.) Davies, Soviet Collective Farm, 34–5; Davies, Socialist Offensive, 227–8; Atkinson, End of the Russian Land Commune, 369–70. In Ukraine, where communes did not predominate, they had been abolished by decree already in Jan. 1930.

235. Khaustov et al., Lubyanka: Stalin i VChK, 250 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, l. 16, 20). As of Oct. 1, 1930, the OGPU apparatus consisted of 22,180 employees. That included around 2,000 in the central apparatus, 5,067 on transport, 1,425 at the OGPU central school, 612 at the transport school, 97 at the Lubyanka inner prison, and 270 at the Butyrka prison; more than 10,000 were deployed in localities. Yagoda complained in a directive, however, that operatives preferred to remain in provincial towns and administrative centers, refusing to be deployed in counties or villages. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 34–5 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 9, d. 183), 36n1 (Nov. 12, 1930).

236. Most other crops also did well. Davies, Socialist Offensive, 337–8, 419 (table 1).

237. Procurements were 6 million more than in 1929–30 (and double the total of 1928–29). The MTS were entrusted with scarce heavy equipment, which they leased to collective farms in exchange for part of the crop. Miller, One Hundred Thousand Tractors. At the end of 1930, the 158 machine tractor stations controlled more than 31,000 tractors but only about 200 trucks and 17 cars. Davies, Soviet Collective Farm, 31, citing Sotsialisticheskoe zemledelie, Dec. 20, 1930.

238. Rakovski gave a similar incisive analysis from exile that was also published abroad. Braginskaia, “Pobeda plana i rekord besplannosti”; Rakovski, “Na s’ezde i v strane”; Filtzer, Soviet Workers, 39–41. See also Lewin, “Disappearance of Planning.”

239. Filtzer, Soviet Workers, 37, citing Severnyi rabochii, April 15, 1930, and Za industrializatsiiu, July 20, 1930.

240. Filtzer, Soviet Workers, 38, 43.

241. He instructed Molotov (Aug. 6, 1930) to “pay attention to the Stalingrad and Leningrad [Putilov] tractor factories. Things are bad there.” Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 200–1, 201n8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 793, l. 3).

242. Stalin singled out by name Ivan Klimenko. Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 202, 203n2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 793, l. 21–3, 7).

243. In Stalin’s absence the politburo had twice examined the South Caucasus party infighting; he demanded that a damning politburo decree be published in full. Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 202, 203n3 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 790, l. 1, 8; d. 791, l. 23, 24; July 20, Aug. 3, 1930).

244. In 1929 and the first half of 1930, Kalinin’s central executive committee had received an astonishing 172,500 petitions of wrongful dekulakization (337,563 households would be dekulakized in 1930); Kalinin’s secretariat managed to adjudicate just 785 of them (ruling in the plaintiffs favor 519 times). “Rol’ OGPU v raskulachivanii krest’ianskikh khoziaistv”: <http://helion-ltd.ru/ogpu-role>.

245. Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 7 (RGASPI, f. 85, recent acquisitions, d. 2, l. 1–11, 28–30); Khlevniuk, Khoziaia, 31.

246. In a follow-up letter of Sept. 2, Stalin put Kalinin on the same plane as Rykov. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 198–202, 211–3; Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 203–4, 210–1.

247. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 198–202; Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 203–4. The next day, on the basis of Mikoyan’s reports on successful procurements, Stalin demanded still more exports, writing to Molotov, “Otherwise we risk being left without our new iron and steel and machine-building factories (Nizhny Novgorod auto factory, Chelyabinsk Tractor Plant, etc.).” Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 200–1, 201n8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 793, l. 3; Aug. 6, 1930).

248. Dohan, “Economic Origins of Soviet Autarky,” 615–6; Tracy, Agriculture in Western Europe, 127; Davies, Socialist Offensive, 107. See also Course and Phases of the World Economic Depression, 167ff.

249. Stalin also felt that Mikoyan was not coping as trade commissar (“a job that is difficult, if not impossible, for one person to handle”), and proposed he be removed or given an outstanding deputy, suggesting Arkady Rozenholz, a member of the Central Control Commission. The politburo formally appointed Rozenholz deputy trade commissar for foreign trade on Sept. 10. On Nov. 15, 1930, trade was redivided into two commissariats, and Rozenholz became commissar for foreign trade. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 202–6; Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 204–6, 206n7 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 796, l. 9; d. 804, l. 6). Prices for other Soviet exports fell by 20 percent.

250. Vneshniaia torgovlia SSSR, 1918–1966, 20.

251. Timber exports, which had only resumed in 1927, would attain 18 percent of the world market in 1931; imperial Russia had had 15 percent of the world timber market in 1913. The USSR targeted the United States, Italy, Germany, and Britain; the British market for Soviet raw materials opened in April 1930.

252. Potocki, Polityka państwa polskiego, 262–72; Snyder, Sketches from a Secret War, 102 (citing CAW I/303/4/6982).

253. To pay for this new expense, he instructed Molotov to “raise the money through an increase in the production of vodka.” Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 209–10; Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 208–10; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, l. 31. In short order, the politburo enacted his will. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 796, l. 7 (Sept. 25, 1930).

254. An estimated 3,000 engineers had been arrested in the Donbass in 1928–29. “Over the last several years we liquidated counterrevolutionary organizations almost in every sphere of the economy,” the OGPU reported in May 1930. Sevost’ianov et al., “Sovershenno sekretno,” VIII/ii: 1140 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, por. 435, l. 169–241).

255. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 178–9 (Aug. 2, 1930); Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 199–200; Kommunist, no. 11 (1990): 96 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 5275, l. 1). In Oct., after Stalin returned from holiday, he sacked Pyatakov from the state bank.

256. Stalin singled out the tsarist-era economists Vladimir Groman and Nikolai Kondratiev (of “long wave” fame), insisted they were linked to Bukharin, Tomsky, and Rykov, and wrote that “Kondratiev, Groman and a few other scoundrels must definitely be shot.” Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 193–6; Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 200–1 (Aug. 6), 201n8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 793, l. 3).

257. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 211–3 (Sept. 2, 1930); Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 210–1. Stalin worried whether the trial would come off as scripted (“Are we ready for this? Do we consider it necessary to take the ‘case’ to trial?”). Finally, in March 1931, fourteen members of a supposed Menshevik party were publicly tried and convicted of attempting to restore their party and overthrow the Soviet regime. Litvin, Menshevistskii protsess 1931 goda: Menshevik Trial. See also Evdoshenko, “Delo nefianikov-‘vreditel’ 1929–1931 gg.,” 331–89.

258. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 216–8 (Sept. 13, 1930), 218, n2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 798, l. 12); Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 213–5.

259. Pravda, Sept. 25, 1930; Sevost’ianov et al., “Sovershenno sekretno,” VIII/ii: 1184–5 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 658, l. 106–12; Sept. 28, 1930).

260. RGANI, f. 89, op. 48, d. 1, Hoover Institution Archives; Prystaiko and Shapoval, Sprava "Spilky Vzvolennia Ukrainy," 236; Sevost'ianov et al., "Sovershenno sekretno," VIII/iii: 1148 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, por. 435, l. 169–241: late May 1930).

261. 'voeno-fashistskii zagovor,' 103–4; Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i voenno-fashistskii zagovor," at 247–8.

262. Minakov, Voennaia elita, 114–5.

263. Isserson, "Sud'ba polkovodtsa," 189 (Todorovsky, head of Red Army training). The book in question was Triandafilov, Kharakter operatsii sovremennoi armii. Triandafilov, an ethnic Greek who had been born (1894) in tsarist Kars province (later ceded to Turkey), would die in a military plane crash in a fog on July 12, 1931. The politburo forbade the regime's highest officials from flying. Stalin would not get on an airplane until 1943.

264. Aptekar' and Uspenskii, Marshal M.N. Tukhachevskii (RGVA, f. 7, op. 10, d. 1047, l. 2–8ob., Jan. 11, 1930); Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 91–3 (l. 10ob.–140b, 22–3: Shaposhnikov analysis, Feb. 15). See also Biriuzov, "Predislovie," 12; Erickson, Soviet High Command (3rd ed.), 326–30, 349–57; and Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 83.

265. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 97 n7, 8 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 19, d. 10, l. 125; Voroshilov to Stalin, March 5, 1930).

266. Samuelson, Soviet Defence Industry Planning, 126 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 155: March 5, 1930). Voroshilov was angling for greater military expenditures. Pravda, Feb. 23, 1930.

267. Ken, "'Moia otsenka byla slyshkom rezkoi,'" 150–1 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 38, l. 58: March 23, 1930); Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 113. See also Stone, "Tukhachevskii in Leningrad," 1379; Samuelson, Plans for Stalin's War Machine, 99–112. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 446, l. 13–18.

268. On Aug. 14, the OGPU arrested a former tsarist colonel, Ivan Troitsky, who taught at the Frunze Military Academy and called himself "the agitator for Tukhachevsky's achievements," and, on Aug. 19, Nikolai Kakurin, a former tsarist staff officer who had served in various White armies but gone over to the Reds, taught at the military academy, too, and fought under Tukhachevsky's command. Olga Zajonczkowska-Popova—the daughter of the former tsarist general and nobleman Andrzej Zajonchowski, who had died in 1926 and had served as a secret-police informant—was herself a secret police informant, making use of her famous father's name to mix in the highest military circles, and she had denounced Kakurin, who was her first cousin. Tinchenko, Golgofta, 114–5 (citing GA SBU, fl. D. 67093, t. 54, delo Kakurina N. E.: 40).

269. Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 103–4. By Oct. 5, OGPU interrogators had Kakurin imagining that Tukhachevsky had indirectly revealed he was contemplating Stalin's assassination. Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 104; Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 248.

270. Zdanovich, Organy, 395–6 (citing TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 258, l. 248).

271. Chuev, Tak govoril Kaganovich, 60.

272. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 216–8, 220–2, 222–3; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 213–5, 216–7, 217–9. This frustration extended well beyond Stalin. Gregory and Markevich, "Creating Soviet Industry," 802, citing RGAE, f. 7297, op. 38, d. 104, l. 2; Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 42; Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 439.

273. Syrtsov made some critical remarks at the 16th Party Congress in July 1930, but Stalin had permitted him to be reelected a candidate member of the politburo. Still, the dictator continued to grumble. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 214–6; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 212. On Sept. 25, the politburo dispatched Syrtsov to the Mid-Volga territory to expedite grain procurements. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 798, l. 4.

274. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 769, l. 37–8; Khlevniuk, "Stalin, Syrtsov, Lominadze," 90–1 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 797, l. 1–2). Mężyński and Olsky, for their part, kept sounding alarms about planned "terrorist acts," including against Stalin. Sevost'ianov et al., "Sovershenno sekretno," VIII/ii: 1451–2 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 258, l. 236: Sept. 19, 1930).

275. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 40–52; Watson, Molotov, 99–104. On Rykov, see Aleksei Ivanovich Rykov; Oppenheim, Practical Bolshevik; Shelestov, Vremia Alekseia Rykova; and Senin, A. I. Rykov.

276. Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 103–4.

277. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 256–7 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 9, d. 388, l. 270–1; Oct. 1930); Kommunist, 1990, no. 11: 99–100 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 5276); Kosheleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 187–8; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 195–6.

278. Murin, Stalin v ob'iatiakh, 30 (l. 34–5; Sept. 5), 31 (36–7; Sept. 8). Fifteen and sixteen years earlier, Stalin had written to fellow revolutionaries asking for something to read in English or French while he was in remote Siberian exile. Ostrovskii, Kto stoial, 399–401, 409, 413.

279. Murin, Stalin v ob'iatiakh, 31 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1550, l. 36, 37), 32 (l. 41–2), 32–3 (l. 43–5), 33 (l. 38–40), 34 (l. 48–9). Stalin responded on Oct. 8: “You hint at some kind of excursions by me. I inform you that I have not traveled anywhere (anywhere at all!) and I have no intention of traveling.” Murin, Stalin v ob'iatiakh, 34–5 (l. 50–1).

280. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 738, l. 110.

281. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 144–6 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 765, l. 68a); Enker, “Struggling for Stalin's Soul,” 172–5.

282. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 42–3.

283. Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 30–3 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 769, l. 68a; d. 765, l. 55–58; d. 738, l. 110–1; d. 778, l. 43); Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 42–3. Kaganovich later in life recalled that he had supported Molotov, in the event Stalin declined to head the government. Chuev, Tak govoroil Kaganovich, 60.

284. Stalin is listed as meeting (with Nikolai Popov of Pravda) on Oct. 13, his first meeting since July 22. Na prieme, 34–5.

285. Stalin to Bukharin, Oct. 14, and Bukharin's second letter of Oct. 14: Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 146–7 (RGASPI, f. 329, op. 2, d. 6, l. 78); 147–8 (l. 77).

286. Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 242, 244. The politburo meeting also censured a pamphlet Syrtsov had published based on a presentation he had made on control figures for output in physical units for 1930–31, supposedly “among those series of questions that are not to be made public and disseminated.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 95 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 446, l. 2–4), 106n4 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 800, l. 7); Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 44. Syrtsov's pamphlet is reprinted in Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, 323–46 (RGASPI, f. 82, op. 2, d. 53, l. 92–108).

287. The Soviets decided to reduce trade with the United States: it would fall during the period from Oct. 1930 to March 1931 by nearly half, compared with the same period the year before. This reflected a surmise that increased trade had diminished the argument for diplomatic recognition. Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 38, 53–4; Ekonomicheskia zhizni, Oct. 12, 1930.

288. Also present was Pavel Postyshev, a Central Committee secretary. Na prieme, 35. Lominadze, in Stalin's mind, enjoyed the inexplicable protection of Orjonikidze, a source of friction between them. Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 162–3 (July 29, 1929); Khromov, Po stranitsam, 201–3 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 23, l. 81–8); Khlevniuk, In Stalin's Shadow, 32.

289. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 801, l. 9. Complaining officials in Western Siberia were dismissed. Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 202n2 RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 793, l. 7). Lih gives the date of the politburo session as Oct. 19.

290. Lebedev, “fraviashchaia portia,” 94; Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, 353n93 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, l. 54); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 255–6. The politburo resolutions were approved by telephone poll (dated Oct. 25). At the session, Stalin evidently had ordered the windows closed, even though they were high up on the top floor of Old Square. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 98n2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 800, l. 7; d. 801, l. 12); Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 242, 244.

291. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 39 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 801, l. 12; f. 589, op. 3, d. 9333, t. 2, l. 135).

292. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 205–9. Stalin passed it to Orjonikidze (party Control Commission) and Postyshev (CC secretary); Molotov and Kaganovich were away on holiday. Reznikov would soon be hired by Mekhlis.

293. Reznikov asserted that Syrtsov had called the Oct. 22 meeting. Other attendees were Vladimir Kavraysky, in whose apartment the meeting took place, I. Nusinov, and A. Halperin. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 209 (Reznikov), 272 (Kavraysky, according to the OGPU), 280 (Nusinov), 285 (Halperin).

- 294. Stalin received Syrtsov on Old Square on Oct. 22 at 2:40 p.m. Postyshev was present. Na prieme, 35.
- 295. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 121, 347n4 (RGASPI, f. 613, op. 1, d. 142, l. 105, 109).
- 296. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 96–7 (RGASPI, f. 589, op. 3, d. 9333, t. 2, l. 134–5); Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 209–13, 25. See also Khlevniuk, “Stalin, Syrtsov, Lominadze,” 78–96; and Davies, “The Syrtsov-Lominadze Affair.”
- 297. Kosheleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 231–2; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 223–4. Around this time, Stalin heard Mark Reizen (b. 1895), a lush, voluminous basso cantante, sing the role of Mephistopheles in a production of Charles Gounod's Faust at the Bolshoi, and had the Leningrad-based artist relocated to Moscow. Reizen, Mark Reizen, Avtobiograficheskie zapiski, 135–53; Marshkova, Bol'shoi teatr, 824–38.
- 298. The episode would be revealed only in 1937: Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 104–5; Lebedev, “M. N. Tukhachevskii i ‘voenno-fashistskii zagovor,’” 248–9. Not everyone vouched for Tukhachevsky: Shchadenko supported his arrest. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 131n25 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 165, d. 59, l. 102–3: uncorrected stenogram of the June 2, 1937, Main Military Council). Troitsky was sentenced to three years and became an OGPU secret informant; Kakurin, who had been released, would be rearrested in 1932 and given a death sentence, which was commuted to ten years.
- 299. Kosheleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 231–2; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 223. Voroshilov did not desist, however: in Jan. 1931 he sent “Dear Koba” a letter with two compromising documents on Tukhachevsky (letters from Verkhovsky and Bergavinov). Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 131–2 n27 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 37, l. 24).
- 300. Khlevniuk, Stalin i Ordzhonikidze, 27–8 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 607, l. 270–1). Syrtsov was replaced on Nov. 3, 1930, as head of the RSFSR Council of People's Commissars by D. E. Sulimov: RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 803, l. 13.
- 301. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 119–93 (at 119: RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, l. 1–218: corrected transcript). See also Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 99–100 (RGASPI, f. 589, op. 3, d. 9333, t. 2, l. 121).
- 302. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 123–4, 163–4.
- 303. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 178, 316 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1001, l. 182–208: the uncorrected transcript, which has Kalinin, Mikoyan, Molotov, and Orjonikidze interjecting some of the statements that would be incorporated as Stalin's words).
- 304. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 125.
- 305. Kuromiya, “Stalin in the Politburo Transcripts,” 48.
- 306. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 193–4 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1003, l. 22–5). At one point, when Postyshev had admonished Syrtsov that he should have talked to Orjonikidze, Stalin interjected, “That's all he does, talk to people.” Stalin removed this sneer from the transcript. But his frustration with Orjonikidze in the role of party disciplinarian was manifest. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 176.
- 307. He added that the mass violence in the Soviet Union was “the brutality of the self-defense of the people, surrounded by secret and open traitors, uncompromising enemies. This brutality is provoked and—by that—justified.” Of course, the brutality was being directed against the people by the Soviet state.
- 308. Pravda, Nov. 26, 1930; Za industrializatsiui, Nov. 27, 1930; Shitts, Dnevnik, 250–1. When the marching workers reached the trial venue, their chants were said to be audible inside—“Death! Death! Death!” Lyons, Assignment in Utopia, 370–80.
- 309. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 258–9 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, l. 81–2: Nov. 25, 1930).
- 310. Copies were sent to Poskryobyshev for Stalin, as well as to Molotov, Kaganovich, Postyshev, and Orjonikidze, but to no one else in the politburo or political leadership. Sevost'ianov et al., “Sovershenno sekretno,” VIII/i: 591–6 (TsA FSb, f. 2, op. 8, d. 658, l. 268–73).
- 311. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 804.
- 312. This was Pyotr Palchinsky: Ramzin et al., Protsess “Prompartii,” 9, 13–4. See also Rothstein, Wreckers on Trial.
- 313. Sergei Kirov's credulous notes on the supposed specific plans of the foreign intervention have survived: Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 154 (citing RGASPI, f. 80, op. 14, d. 16, l. 4).

- 314. Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, II: 444–5 (June 26, 1930). France hosted a large anti-Soviet émigré community that got under Stalin's skin.
- 315. Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 43–5 (Oct. 3). Litvinov telegraphed Valerian Dvoglevsky in Paris to make an oral protest, which he did: DVP SSSR, XIII: 821 (Oct. 11), 566–9 (Oct. 14); Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 231 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, l. 48), 232–3 (l. 54, 56).
- 316. Ramzin et al., Protess "Prompartii," 531–7. "Among the ordinary public, especially among workers and the Communist herd, there prevails a conviction that there was a plot, there was a 'party,' others 'believe' even in the participation of Poincaré himself," Shits recorded in his diary. He deemed workers ready to "tear to shreds the entire intelligentsia," in a kind of "dekulakization." Shits, Dnevnik, 254.
- 317. Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 3–4; DBFP, 2nd series, VII: 153–5 (Strang to Henderson, referring to briefing by Arens, Aug. 30, 1930). "World imperialism is carrying on a policy of never-ending provocation for war," Pravda had succinctly editorialized (Aug. 28, 1930).
- 318. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 184, l. 117 (Oct. 20, 1930).
- 319. DVP SSSR, XIII: 484–6 (Arosyev to Moscow: Sept. 4, 1930), 497 (Stomonyakov's response to Arosyev: Sept. 6). Stalin refrained from public comment on the Industrial Trial until the summer of 1931. Sochinienia, XIII: 70–2.
- 320. Ramzin et al., Protess "Prompartii," 517–26 (Dec. 7, 1930), 527 (Dec. 8).
- 321. Samygin, "Prompartiiia."
- 322. In a prison institute, Ramzin conducted research on construction of boilers. Five years after the trial, he would be freed and awarded the Order of Lenin. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 263–72.
- 323. Sevost'ianov et al., "Sovershenno sekretno," VIII/ii: 1210 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 658, l. 398–408: Dec. 20, 1930).
- 324. An anonymous letter from the USSR printed in Trotsky's Bulletin of the Opposition quoted workers' dissatisfaction with the light sentences: "now for small infractions they punish all of us severely; but here, for a gigantic crime, their sentences are lightened." Bulleten' oppositsii, no. 19 (March 1931): 18. Ciliga, who was in prison at the time the verdicts were announced, recalled that "this unexpected clemency did . . . strike a very suspicious note," given that people were being shot for lesser crimes. Ciliga, Russian Enigma, 222.
- 325. Sotsialisticheski vestnik [Paris], Dec. 20, 1930: 14. "The anger and indignation of the workers condemning the traitors' acts have remained in my memory for life," one worker at Moscow's Red Proletarian factory recalled. Ermilov, Schast'e trudnykh dorog, 133.
- 326. Yaroslavsky, despite his proximity to Stalin, revealed his own naïveté during Syrtsov's interrogation, dismissively stating that "Trotsky is a dead cat." Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 224 (Oct. 23, 1930).
- 327. Yezhov was received during a meeting on foreign trade, and in the company of Postyshev. He was back again on Nov. 29, one-on-one. Na prieme, 37. Yezhov's early biography can be found in Pavliukov, Ezhov, 6–100; and in Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 10–33.
- 328. Lyons, "Stalin Urges U.S. Trade"; Lyons, "Stalin Laughs!"; Na prieme, 37. Lyons had worked at TASS offices in New York and might have been picked for the exclusive because of Stanisław Czacki, a former OGPU undercover intelligence operative in the United States and now head of the Anglo-American desk of OGPU foreign intelligence, who arrived in Stalin's office twenty minutes beforehand and remained during the interview. Stalin's office logbook does not specify which office Lyons fixes it as Old Square (not the Kremlin). Lyons claimed that in media res Voroshilov entered; Voroshilov is quoted in the reportage, but his name does not appear in Stalin's office logbook that day, showing that it can be incomplete.
- 329. Lyons, Assignment in Utopia, 384–5, 387, 390; "Eugene Lyon Papers, 1929–1964," Knight Library, Special Collections, University of Oregon, box 2, typescript; Lyons, Stalin, 197. Compare the leftist journalist Paul Sheffer's dismissive characterization from around the same time (Sheffer never met Stalin, and relied on the writings of Trotsky). Sheffer, "Stalin's Power."
- 330. Duranty, "Stalin Sees Capitalists." See also Taylor, Stalin's Apologist, 169 (citing interview with Henry Shapiro, March 15, 1979). Duranty became one of the prime sources for the view that Stalin had become a revolutionary because of the "Jesuitic repression" at the Orthodox seminary. Duranty, "Stalin."

331. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 726, l. 161–5; Na prieme, 37 (in the company of Yakov Podolsky, head of the foreign affairs commissariat press department).

332. Keke was quoted as saying that Stalin had visited her in 1921 and “three years ago” (1926), and that she had stayed with him once in the Kremlin in Moscow (“I didn’t like it”). Knickerbocker, “Stalin Mystery Man,” in Hoover Institution Archives, Edward Ellis Smith papers, box 2. See also Smith, Young Stalin, 54.

333. “According to news from the West (which is conveyed secondhand from people who have been there or ‘from above’), over there they laugh at the nervousness of the Bolsheviks, and are not planning to fight,” Shits, the encyclopedia editor, recorded in his diary in Nov. 1930. “But here people are sure of war.” Shits, Dnevnik, 248–9. See also Anon., An Impression of Russia, 10.

334. Stalin struck this revealing outburst when editing the transcript. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1011.

335. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 36–7, 39; van Ree, Political Thought, 118–9.

336. Pravda, Dec. 2, 1930. The poll was recorded as a one-day “meeting” of the plenum.

337. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 735, l. 9–10, 12–3, 14–5. Stalin tasked Andreyev with reporting to the politburo—not to a Central Committee plenum—on Nov. 25 on collectivization in the North Caucasus and had the session, which emphasized success, transcribed to circulate it to party functionaries. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 357–82 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1004, l. 1–64: uncorrected, l. 67–127; corrected, l. 128–45; printed; op. 3, d. 805, l. 3; d. 809, l. 40–5).

338. Dubinskaia-Dzhalilova and Chernev, “Zhmu vashu ruku, dorogoi tovarishch,” 183 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 32, l. 100–10b.).

339. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 729, l. 36. On Nov. 20, 1930, Pravda had published a statement by Bukharin, edited by Kaganovich, again admitting his mistakes, condemning the Syrtsov-Lomoindeze “right-left bloc,” and calling for unity. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 147n1 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 805, l. 6).

340. The repeated delays of the plenum sparked rumors: the Menshevik Socialist Herald speculated about a rift between Stalin and other members of the politburo over the right deviation; Trotsky’s Bulletin of the Opposition imagined a break between Stalin and Molotov, with Stalin blaming Molotov for the failures in industry. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 21–2 (citing Biulleten’ oppositsii, 1930, no. 17–18: 3, and Sotsialisticheskii vestnik, 1930, no. 24: 15); Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 134–7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 2939, l. 1–6); Sochineniia, XIII: 23–7 (excerpts). The last such joint plenum had been April 1929, for the assault on Bukharin. Rykov’s fate, formally, was not included on the agenda.

341. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 735, l. 81–3, 87. See also Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 28–37. Molotov’s appointment took effect that day. His two deputies were Kuibyshev and Nikolai Voznesensky. Platon Kerzhentsev (Lebedev) became business manager of the Council of People’s Commissars, moving over from agitprop in the party apparatus and succeeding Nikolai Gorbunov.

342. Molotov, V bor’be za sotsializm, 76.

343. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 45–50 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 453, l. 53–61, 70–4, 77–8, 87–92).

344. Shepilov, Kremlin’s Scholar, 9.

345. Besedovskii, Na putiakh k terimodru, 294. The memoir of Besedovsky, a Soviet diplomat who defected, contained fanciful nonsense (for example, that Stalin used Lenin’s old dacha at Gorki and Lenin’s Rolls-Royce), but also correctly explained the crucial roles of Molotov and Kaganovich. Besedovskii, Im Dienste der Sowjets, 219. Besedovsky had defected in Paris on Oct. 2, 1929. The next month, Kaganovich told a Central Committee plenum, “Besedovskys are not few, unfortunately.” In fact, by then seventy-two Soviet officials had refused to return from abroad since late 1928. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 441, l. 110, 113.

346. At the time of Lenin’s fatal illness, the politburo had had seven members and six candidates, but now only four of those remained: Stalin, Molotov, Kalinin, and Rudzutaks (now a full member). The new full members besides Orjonikidze were Kaganovich, Voroshilov, Kuibyshev, Kirov, and Kosior; the new candidate members were Mikoyan, Vlas Chubar, and Petrovsky. All were Stalin loyalists. VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1933), II: 669–73.

347. “Blizhaishche okruzhenie diktatora,” Sotsialisticheskii vestnik, Nov. 10, 1933: 3–10. “If we have used the word ruthless for Kaganovich,” Robert Conquest wrote, “it must be taken quite literally—there was no ruth, no pity, at all in his make-up.” Conquest, Reassessment, 13. “There was no question about his devotion to the party and to the cause,” Kaganovich's protégé Khrushchev would recall. "He never flagged in strength or energy. He was as stubborn as he was devoted." Khrushchev, Khrushchev Remembers, 65.

348. Rees, "Stalin as Leader, 1924–1937." Rees, Iron Lazar, 123–43.

349. Chuev, Tak govoril Kaganovich, 53.

350. Stalin entrusted the party's Central Control Commission and the workers' and peasants' inspectorate to his young protégé Andreyev. By party rules, the chairman of the Central Control Commission could no longer be a member of the politburo. On Oct. 2, 1931, however, Stalin would name Andreyev transport commissar; Rudzutaks got the Central Control Commission. On Feb. 4, 1932, Andreyev became a full member of the politburo, replacing Rudzutaks.

351. Fitzpatrick, "Ordzhonikidze's Takeover." Trotsky misjudged Orjonikidze, too. Trotsky, Stalin, 348.

352. Orjonikidze added that the Magnitogorsk Iron and Steel Works, Nizhny Novgorod Auto Plant, and other well-under-way highest-priority constructions projects still "lacked blueprints." RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 145, l. 43–54.

353. Another example: In Dec. 1931, Amayak Nazaretyan, Stalin's first top aide in the party secretariat, proposed publishing the impressions of the foreign workers who had participated in the socialist construction. "Correct. To the politburo," Stalin wrote on the memo. On the fifteenth anniversary in Nov. 1932, a 700-plus-page book, Through the Eyes of Foreigners, with testimonies of more than 100 people, would be published. Glazami inostrantsev; Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 210 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 920, l. 126).

354. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 144–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 765, l. 68a); Enker, "Struggling for Stalin's Soul," 172–5.

355. Stalin's personal secretariat appears to have moved from party HQ on Old Square to Government HQ in the Kremlin at the beginning of the 1930s. Rosenfeldt, "The Consistory of the Communist Church," 318n31, citing Robert Tucker, personal communication. The move displaced some offices of the central executive committee from the Kremlin to the GUM department store across Red Square. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 136–7 (RGASPI, f. 667, op. 1, d. 17, l. 25–6), 141 (f. 78, op. 1, d. 376, l. 107). See also Balashov and Markhashov, "Staraja ploshchad", 4 (20-e gody), 183.

356. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 851, l. 15.

357. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 4, d. 667. See also Kolesnik, Khronika zhizni sem'i Stalina, 58–62.

358. Ilizarov, Tainaia zhizn' Stalina, 310. Stalin departed Kureika in late 1916 (when summoned to the draft board), more than nine months before the boy's birth was officially registered (Nov. 6, 1917); the registration could have been delayed by remoteness or falsely reported. Pereprygina (b. 1900/1) went on to marry Yakov Davydov and become a hairdresser in Igarka (100 miles north of Kureika); she would die around 1964. In 1956, Ivan Serov of the KGB would send a report to Khrushchev based on an interview with Pereprygina-Davydova, attributing paternity to Stalin; it contains obvious errors and reflects lazy police work. Izvestia, Dec. 8, 2000; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1288; Gelii Kleimenov, O lichnoi zhizni Iosifa Stalina, chast' 2, glava 9 (2013): <http://www.proza.ru/2013/05/11/894>. The boy, Alexander, later fought in WWII, lived in Siberia, and died in 1987. In 1934 the log cabin in Kureika became a Stalin museum.

359. "Chto dal'she," Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 17–18 (Nov.–Dec. 1930): 22.

360. In another private letter of March 1930, Bakhmeteff foresaw the consequences as well ("agricultural catastrophe . . . famine on a great scale"). Bakhmeteff also understood that Stalin would succeed in asserting state control over the countryside, whatever the human and economic costs ("that is second order from the point of view of Communist political goals"). He concluded: "A regime that forms in such conditions can only be compared with a military occupation by an armed external enemy." Budnitskii, "Sovershenno lichno i doveritel'no," III: 420–1 (Feb. 12, 1929), 433 (April 19, 1929), 466 (Feb. 1930), 468–73 (March 4, 1930).

361. Trotsky would later write in his diary that back in 1926, Kamenev had warned him that his life was in danger, and that Zinoviev had told him, "Do you think that Stalin has not discussed the question of your physical removal?" Trotsky did not record these alleged conversations at the time, and neither Kamenev nor Zinoviev ever stated as much publicly. Trotskii, Dnevnik i pis'ma, 72–74 (Feb. 18, 1935).

³⁶² Khlevniuk rightly pointed out that Stalin's victory over Rykov, Bukharin, and Tomsky required significant effort, but he did not specify whether another outcome was possible.

³⁶³ Mikoian, Tak bylo, 289. "The Right Opposition was more a state of mind than an organization," observed Victor Serge. Serge, Memoirs of a Revolutionary, 253.

³⁶⁴ Tomsky conceded to the 16th Party Congress: "Any opposition, any struggle against the party line under the dictatorship of the proletariat . . . will inevitably find a response outside the party. And whatever the opposition's platform may be . . . it will become the organizational nucleus for a third force, for the enemies of the proletarian dictatorship." Rykov told the delegates: "Any utilization of our difficulties for criticism of the party general line must automatically include an appeal for the support of the petit bourgeois elements against the socialist elements of the countryside." XVI s"ezd VKP (b), 145 (Tomsky), 152 (Rykov). The Russian-speaking American journalist William Reswick, who met with Rykov in his Kremlin apartment, has him stating: "Only a year back, we still had the situation in hand. Even six months ago we still could have forced a showdown and won. But there was always a haunting fear of an interparty fight turning into a civil war and now it is too late." The conversation is undated, but from the context it seems this was Nov. 1929. Reswick, I Dreamt Revolution, 253–4.

³⁶⁵ Cohen, Bukharin, 315, 60–106; von Hagen, Soldiers in the Proletarian Dictatorship, 335. Bukharin, according to his biographer, perceived that Voroshilov wavered, at least in 1930. But if so, that passed. Cohen, Bukharin, 287, 289. Voroshilov, at the 16th Party Congress, on July 2, 1930, found it necessary to deny that any wavering had taken place inside the Red Army ("not one, not one case"). XVI s"ezd VKP (b), 504–16, reprinted in Voroshilov, Stal'i i rechi, 434–50 (at 444). According to Reese, many lower-level Red Army party cells sympathized with the right's program of voluntary collectivization and higher state prices for grain, though it is unclear whether they also supported individual household farming. Reese, "Red Army Opposition," esp. 37. On rumors about the army, see Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 121–2.

CHAPTER 2. APOCALYPSE

¹ Starkov, Martem'ian Ryutin, 259. "O dele tak nazывaemogo 'Soiuza Marksistov-Lenintsev,'" 103–15; "Platforma 'Soiuza Marksistov-Lenintsev' ('Gruppa Riutina'): 'Stalin i krizis proletarskoi diktatury.'" There are some hints that the texts underwent changes as they were circulated from hand to hand (105). The party archives contain no originals of either document. The version that is extant is purported to be a copy of the original "certified" and signed by "First Operational Commissar of the Special Political Department (SPO) of the OGPU, Bogan." Whether the police made insertions cannot be established.

² Bix, Hirohito, 209–10 (citing Bonner F. Fellers Collection, Hoover Institution Archives: Answer to Japan, Southwest Pacific Area, July 1, 1944: 9).

³ On July 25, 1930, the politburo had decreed that by late Sept. 1931, collectivization would reach 65–70 percent in the chief grain growing areas, and 35–40 percent elsewhere, but just 15–20 percent in the grain deficit territories. The regime significantly raised taxes on individual family farms and curtailed the land available to them. Officials also engaged in arbitrary confiscations of seed grain, implements, and other property "for the good of the collectives." Many peasants just gave up and headed for the factory construction sites. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 1 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 790, l. 13), 14 (RGAE, f. 7486, op. 37, d. 193, l. 99).

⁴ Pravda, Dec. 22, 1930; VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1933), II: 675–92; Davies, Socialist Offensive, 380–1. On the plenum's eve, Kaganovich had exhorted the Moscow party organization to "struggle against excesses, but in that lies the whole trick, the whole art of the Bolshevik leadership's Marxism-Leninism, to be able, without excesses, to double and triple collectivization." Kir'ianov, "Kollektivizatsiia tsentra Rossii," 79 (citing RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 139, l. 74: Dec. 1930).

⁵ Ivnitskii, Kollektivizatsiia i naskulachivanie, 167 (citing former politburo archive, without details).

⁶ VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1933), II: 677–8; Kuromiya, Stalin's Industrial Revolution, 263. The 1931 plan itself was printed in just 1,200 copies, for internal circulation only: Narodno-khoziaistvennyi plan na 1931 god: kontrol'nye tsifry (Moscow: 1931).

⁷ Kuromiya, Stalin's Industrial Revolution, 109–13. Benito Mussolini, in 1912, then a member of the Italian Socialist Party, had written: "We want to believe in [socialism], we must believe in it, humanity needs a credo. It is faith which moves mountains because it gives the illusion that mountains move. Illusion is perhaps the only reality in life.” Falasca-Zamponi, Fascist Spectacle, 43 (citing Avanti! June 18, 1912, reprinted in Mussolini, Opera Omnia, IV: 173–4).

8. Lyons was most impressed with the pithy slogans, such as “Five-in-Four,” which he noted was instantly understood to refer to the Five-Year Plan and its early attainment, and judged “as effective as our 4-out-of-5 for toothpaste.” Lyons, Moscow Carrousel, 209. See also Mikhutina, “SSSR glazami pol’skikh diplomatov,” 46; and Sukhanov, Zapiski, III: 214.

9. Following Mekhlis’s graduation in May 1930 from the Institute of Red Professors, Stalin had appointed him head of the Central Committee press department and, concurrently, to Pravda’s editorial collective; he took over as editor-in-chief in 1931, and would help boost Pravda’s circulation to 1.8 million, but Stalin worried about his ability to handle the load. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovic, 37 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 115–8: earlier than Aug. 6, 1931). See also Avtorkhanov, Tekhnologiia vlasti, 109–10, 116; and Rubtsov, Teni vozhdia, 81–2.

10. Stalin had stopped bothering to attend formal meetings of the party secretariat or orgburo. The latter functioned as a kind of permanently empowered commission of the politburo, while the former, from 1931, did not even refer questions to the politburo. Detached from even nominal politburo oversight, the central apparatchiks all reported to Stalin. Rosenfeldt, “Special” World. By 1933, secret department salaries were 30–40 percent higher than in the rest of apparatus. Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 53. At the government (Council of People’s Commissars), procedures stipulated “only in matters of special importance to refer them to the politburo,” but Molotov sought approval for all “sensitive” issues at the politburo. Rees, “Stalin as Leader, 1924–1937,” 33–5; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 823, l. 9.

11. The melding of zeal (“You will be masters of the whole world”) and opportunism was often intense. But some speakers at the Communist Youth League Congress in Jan. 1931 mentioned a “desertion rate” of nearly half among Communist Youth assigned to the Donbass coal mines. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 10 (citing Ekonomicheskaiia zhizni, Jan. 22, 1931); Fisher, Pattern for Soviet Youth, 162, 257; IX Vsesoiuznyi “ezd VLKSM.

12. Viola, “Peasant Nightmare,” 762; Davydenko et al., Put’ trudovykh pobed, 270–5.

13. Globally, learning how to mechanize production in concrete cases was easier said than done, and mass production was not readily achieved in some industries, or even in some countries. Kinch, “Road from Dreams,” 107–36. Soviet mass production, even more than in Germany, would be associated with producer (or capital) goods. There were fierce internal debates in the USSR about proper industrial organization, with references to American and German production experiences. Shearer, Industry, State, and Society.

14. Istoriia industrializatsii SSSR, 1926–1941. Stalin had offered a threefold justification for the crash Five-Year Plan the month after it launched: to catch and overtake capitalist countries; to ensure the Soviet Union’s ability to remain independent in the international system; and to furnish agriculture with machines because industry could not move forward without agriculture being modernized. Stalin, “Ob industrializatsii strany i o pravom uklone v VKP,” Sochineniia, XI: 245–90 (at 247–53).

15. Sutton, Western Technology. II. On Feb. 14, 1931, Mężyński reported to Stalin that at the Chelyabinsk Tractor Plant “extensive housing construction is being done completely unconnected to when the factory goes into production,” and that “not a single factory shop will be completed during the year.” Such a state of affairs was typical. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 261 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 9, d. 18, l. 162–3).

16. Lewis, “Technology and the Transformation of the Soviet Economy,” 196.

17. Davies et al., Years of Progress, xiv.

18. During the first Five-Year Plan, the urban labor force would rise from around 11.9 million to 22.9 million. Heavy industry would count more than 6 million employees in 1932, as against perhaps 3 million in 1928. Most newcomers came from villages. By 1932–33, between 45 and 60 percent of industrial workers had begun factory work in 1926 or later. Drobizhev, Industrializatsiia i izmeneniia, 4–5.

19. The first decree forbidding free movement of labor (Oct. 1930) was followed by one forbidding factory directors from hiring workers who had quit their previous employ without authorization. Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 419–30; Davies, Crisis and Progress, 26–7; Rees, Stalinism and Soviet Rail Transport, 44; Friedman, Russia in Transition, 218; Izvestiia, Jan. 14, 1931; Za industrializatsiiu, Feb. 14 and 16, 1931.

20. The number of peasant households would plunge from 25–26 million to 19 million by 1937. Many of those who left the village were young males, those most in favor of the regime's social transformation, including early stalwarts of the collective farms. Fitzpatrick, Stalin's Peasants, 81; Wheatcroft and Davies, "Population," 69.

21. Kotkin, Magnetic Mountain, 72–105.

22. The regime used "taxation" against private traders. NEPmen were also being systematically evicted from their apartments. Davies, Development of the Soviet Budgetary System, 112; Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 97–101, citing Kontrol'nye tsifry narodnogo khoziaistva SSSR 1929/30 (1930), 188; Pravda, Oct. 12, 1929; and Ekonomicheskaiia zhizn', Feb. 14, 1930; Ball, Russia's Last Capitalists, 78. On Feb. 9, 1930 Stalin would criticize those "trying to 'supplement' the slogan of the liquidation of the kulaks as a class with the slogan of the liquidation of the urban bourgeoisie," a mistake given that the latter, unlike the kulaks, had no control over the means of production. But the "dekulakization" of the NEP-era "bourgeoisie"—the majority of whom were petty traders—proceeded apace, and would further unhinge the supply of food and other goods in cities. Sochineniia, XII: 186; Ianvarskii ob' edinennyi plenium MK i MKK, 31 (Bauman); Rukeyser, Working for the Soviets, 217.

23. Tikhomirov, Promyslovaia kooperatsiia, 15–7. On June 28, 1931, the Council of People's Commissars issued a directive to shore up enforced artisan "cooperatives." Kiselev and Shchagin, Khrestomatia po otechestvennoi istorii, 401–5 (RGAE, f. 3429, op. 1, d. 5249–6, l. 42–6).

24. Fitzpatrick, "After NEP" NEPmen and other "non-laboring elements" were denied access to state-owned housing and to rationing—but not if they reinvented themselves.

25. Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 207–8; Rubinstein, Razvitie vnutrennei torgovli, 290; Randall, Soviet Dream World, 19–21, 24–6; Hessler, Social History of Soviet Trade, 177–82.

26. Kotkin, Magnetic Mountain, 225.

27. Of perhaps 2 million functionaries, around 160,000 were subjected to investigation as of mid-1931 and at least 5,000 in the central economic administration and 4,500 on the railways were arrested, mostly for "sabotage." Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 117–8, 134–5, 533; XVI s'ezd VKP (b) (2nd ed.), 316; Chistka sovetskogo apparata, 22.

28. Werth, "Stalin's System," 50 n25 (no citation).

29. Sotsialisticheskoe stroitel'stvo SSSR, 344–5; Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 126–7. As a side effect, the number of students in secondary schools plummeted from around 1 million in 1928–30 to a mere 4,234 in 1931–32. Before the end of 1932, secondary students would shoot up again, to 1.2 million, although their preparation left much to be desired. Nove, Economic History of the USSR (1992), 199. On March 15, 1931, the politburo decreed an end to worker advancement into administration and ordered those recently advanced to be returned to where they were actually needed: as skilled workers in factories. Spravochnik partiinogo rabotnika, VIII: 386.

30. In 1929–30, only 3,166 people graduated from engineering and technical schools, but that was compared with just 1,282 in 1928–29; the education of the graduates was not comprehensive. Soviet engineers-in-training learned mostly on the job, including while working alongside European and American specialists employed in the USSR. Davies, Socialist Offensive, 123 (citing Pravda, May 11, 1930), 124–5; Hoover Institution, AER, box 4, R. W. Stuck ms., 29.

31. Ordzhonikidze, Stat'i i rechi, II: 284–301. There were 728 attendees. Pervaiia vsesoiuznaia konferentsiia rabotnikov sotsialisticheskoi promyshlennosti. Stalin crossed out or softened barbed references to bourgeois specialists from the original draft of his speech to the conference of industrialists on Feb. 4, 1931; a politburo resolution of Feb. 20 would indicate concern about the number of engineers arrested and their disposition. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 22960, l. 7, 9, 23; f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, l. 139. On April 10, the politburo would allow industrial specialists convicted of wrecking to work in prison institutes, which would play a significant part in Soviet industrial design. Viktorov, Bez grifa "sekretno", 169; Westwood, Soviet Locomotive Technology, 88–9, 163. On June 23, 1931, in a speech to industrialists ("New Conditions, New Tasks"), Stalin would belatedly absolve bourgeois specialists as a class, though not specific individuals, a turnabout echoed by Pravda (June 25). Sochineniia, XIII: 51–7; Kuromiya, Stalin's Industrial Revolution, 263–86; Sochineniia, XIII: 72–3. A note to Stalin (Nov. 26, 1931) would list 1,087 imprisoned specialists who had been handed over to economic agencies; industry had placed requests for another 700. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 287–8 (APRF, f. 3, op.

58, d. 143, l. 15–6: Akulov). By fall 1931, many “bourgeois” specialists were amnestied, and the police began to restore specialists who had not been executed to work. Dzanovich, Organy, 438.

32. “O zadachakh khoziaistvennikov,” Pravda, Feb. 5, 1931, reprinted, with changes, in Sochineniia, XIII: 38–9. “The country ought to know its heroes,” Pravda wrote (March 6, 1931). “The outstanding shock worker, the inventor, the rationalizer who has mastered production technology—this is the hero of the land of socialism under construction.”

33. Il’in, Bolsnoi konveier, 143–50; 1933 god, 104–9.

34. In Sochineniia, XIII: 41. In Sept. 1929, culminating a year-long campaign, unified management (edinonachalie) had been formally introduced for industrial enterprises: the manager was supreme, not the party cell or the technical director, who was usually a “bourgeois” specialist. Kuromiya, “Edinonachalie and the Soviet Industrial Manager, 1928–1937”; Gregory, Restructuring the Soviet Economic Bureaucracy, 57–9. On Aug. 23, 1931, the regime would award sole decision-making powers for both military and political issues to the military commanders over the political commissars. “Letopis’ stroitel’stva sovetsskikh vooruzhennykh sil 1931 god (mai-iul’),” 122–3.

35. Directives from above tasked local communists and Communist Youth League organizers with drawing up lists, usually in a few frantic days, and the police placed special boxes in rural soviets, schools, or streets to solicit denunciations. Fainsod, Smolensk under Soviet Rule, 241.

36. Peasant letter writers called for establishing collective farms without haste on a voluntary basis, and respecting churches. Zelenin, *Stalinskaia ‘revoliutsiia sverkh*u,” 17 (RGAE, f. 7486, op. 37, d. 194, l. 252); Fainsod, Smolensk under Soviet Rule, 252. Officials more often took notice of the village solidarity: “in many villages the kulaks were seen off by the whole population, in tears of sympathy,” the party boss of the Tatar autonomous province reported to Stalin. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 822, l. 43.

37. Although category I “kulaks”—those subject to exile to remote regions or execution—had been envisioned at around 60,000, the actual number turned out to be 283,717 for the period from Jan. 1 to Oct. 1, 1930, half of them following the tactical retreat of “Dizzy with Success.” Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, II: 704 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 329, l. 198–212; Nov. 17, 1930); Viola, “Role of the OGPU,” 21, 43n82. In the Urals, the typical dekulakized household had one cow, one horse, three sheep, a modest family residence and stable, a bath-house, a storehouse, and between six and eight acres of sown land. Bedel’ and Slavko, “Iz istorii raskulachennykh spetspereselentsev,” 12. See also Scott, Behind the Urals, 17–8.

38. Yagoda ordered this situation corrected, informing operatives that it was “not obligatory to seize by the quota.” But there was no state medal for trailing the overachievers. Berelowitch and Danilov, Sovetskaia derevnia glazami VChK-OGPU-NKVD, III/i: 107–9 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 41, l. 38–41).

39. Suslov, “Revolution from Above.” Better-off peasants rushed to sell their implements, kill off their livestock, and flee, prompting the regime to issue strongly worded orders to prevent self-dekulakization.

40. Popov, “Gosudarstvennyi terror,” 28–9; Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 492; Davies et al., Economic Transformation, 68, Unknown Gulag, 2, 6, 29–32 (GARF, f. 9479, op. 1, d. 89, l. 205; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 56, l. 59). Timing varied: Uzbekistan’s dekulakization took place mostly in Aug. and Sept. Pokrovskii, Polisbiuro i krest’ianstvo, I: 439–41 (APRF, f. 3, op. 30, d. 195, l. 157–8; Oct. 10, 1931). The state “planned” losses of 5 percent of the special settlers, but mortality was far higher thanks to the state’s unpreparedness for its own policy. Danilov and Krasil’nikov, Spetspereselentsy v Zapadnoi Sibiri, III: 10.

41. Between 1928 and 1931, on the territory of the former Moscow gymnasium no. 3, behind Lubyanka, 2, a new Constructivist edifice was built for the OGPU (Lubyanka, 12), with a distinctive façade and round windows on the top (seventh) floor. It contained 65,000 square feet of office space, a three-story department store, 120 residential apartments, a club, cafeteria, and 1,500-seat cinema. Pogonii, Lubianka, 68. As of July 1934, the OGPU would count 200,125 border guards and internal troops, another 18,000 convoy troops, nearly 200,000 in the regular police or militia, 18,951 in Gulag administration, and 20,125 field couriers, and others, for a total of 514,838—not even including state security (GUGB). Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 477–8 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 32, d. 8, l. 346–7). “Comrades, leave us in peace and don’t interfere with our work,” one exasperated professor at Tomsk University pleaded. Another professor at a technical school in Kiev remarked, “I do not intend ever to drive across a bridge built by an engineer from the workers.” Sevost'ianov et al., “Sovershenno sekretno,” VIII/ii: 1136–75 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, por. 435, l. 169–241: late May 1930).

42. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, l. 138. On Feb. 25, 1931, the politburo resolved by telephone poll to recommend that during the course of six months the OGPU “prepare” kulak settlements for 200,000–300,000 families near Karaganda in northern Kazakhstan. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 263 (APRE, f. 3, op. 30, d. 149, l. 51). For a time, urgent requests for cheap “kulak” laborers skyrocketed, but sites that had large numbers of the deported often begged not to be sent any more: the ones they had were just dying. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 26, l. 37 (Kuznetskroi); Viola, Unknown Gulag, 4.

43. Solzhenitsyn, Gulag Archipelago, I: 56. See also Khlevniuk, History of the Gulag, 10–12, 16–7.

44. Of the 2 million slated for exile within their own region, a large number of these also fled to the construction sites after their property was confiscated for the collective farms. Zemskov, “Kulaktskaia ssylka,” 3; Danilov and Ivinskii, Dokumenty svidelet'stviut, 46–7. Actual criminals flourished in the tumult, a public order challenge. Shearer, Policing Stalin's Socialism, 289.

45. Zelenin, Stalinskaia 'revoliutsiia sverkhu,” 52–3 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, f. d. 26, l. 77–85: June 26, 1931). On Oct. 12, 1931, Yagoda would report to Stalin on the completion of kulak operations in regions of wholesale collectivization. As of Jan. 1, 1932, the OGPU reported that 1.3 million people were in special settlements. Berelowitch and Danilov, Sovetskaia derevnia glazami VChK-OGPU-NKVD, III/i: 774 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 10, d. 379, l. 93); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 267 (APRE, f. 3, op. 30, d. 195, l. 163); Pokrovskii, Politbiuro i krest'ianstvo, I: 442; Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 47 (GARF, f. 9479, op. 1, d. 89, l. 206); Viola, Unknown Gulag, 6 (GARF, f. 9479, op. 1, d. 89, l. 205; d. 949, l. 75–9).

46. A Central Committee circular of Jan. 20, 1931, had directed local party organizations to conduct mass agitation to prepare for the spring sowing campaign, expedite the flow of households into collective farms via creation of initiative groups, dispatch workers who could repair tools and equipment, and prevent distribution of the harvest according to the number of souls, as in the previous year, but instead according to the amount of work accomplished. Partiinoe stroitel'stvo, 1931, no. 2: 61–2; Kollektivizatsiia sel'skogo khoziaistva, 354–6.

47. Piatilennyi plan, II/i: 328–9, 330–1; Kollektivizatsiia sel'skogo khoziaistva, 350. These harvest numbers reflected multiplication of planned sown area by planned yields, neither of which was based on actual data. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 65–6. Yields had been declining since the mid-1920s, a trend whose causes were not well understood. Nove, Economic History of the USSR (1992), 176.

48. Drought, in different ways, affected other world regions around this time. In the United States the “great southern drought” of 1930–31, which coincided with a price collapse and banking failures, inflicted hardship across twenty-three states from West Virginia to Texas; President Herbert Hoover sought to have the Red Cross, a private agency, be wholly responsible for relief, opposing federal drought relief (seeing it as opening the door to general federal relief). French West Africa suffered drought, locusts, and its worst famine ever; the French authorities did not relent on tax demands. Mortality in French West Africa was disproportionately higher (in an immensely smaller area and overall population) than in the Soviet Union. China in 1931–32 suffered the opposite problem: large snowmelt and tremendous rainfall that inundated an area equivalent in size to England and half of Scotland, flooding some 52 million people, and killing as many as 2 million from drowning and especially starvation. Tauger, “Natural Disaster,” 8, citing Woodruff, Rare as Rain: Report of the National Flood Relief Commission, 1931–32 (Shanghai, 1933); Fuglestad, “La grande famine.” See also Buck, 1931 Flood.

49. A secret OGPU report addressed to Stalin in early June 1931 complained that that machinery and buildings were unready for the harvest. On June 5, the politburo belatedly approved purchase of 2,500–3,000 additional trucks in the United States and Europe, beyond the 4,000 already ordered. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 68–9 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 883, l. 3: June 30, 1931; op. 162, d. 10, l. 66; RGAE, f. 7486, op. 37, d. 194, l. 273–253: June 10, 1931). On June 8, 1931, the regime felt constrained to redirect 30,000 tons of wheat and rye from export to consumption in Moscow and Leningrad. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 85–6 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 10, l. 80).

50. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 153 (RGASPI, f. 667, op. 1, d. 17, l. 28–9).

51. Wheatcroft and Davies, "Agriculture," 125.
52. "Settlement is the liquidation of the bai semi-feudals, . . . the destruction of tribal attitudes," intoned Isay Goloshchokin, known as Filipp, the Jewish-born party boss of the autonomous republic. Zveriaikov, Ot kochev'ia k sotsializmu, 53; Iz istorii Kazakhskoi SSR, II: 255; Aldazhumanov et al., Nasil'stvennaia kollektivizatsiia, 28, 34–9 (APRK, f. 141, op. 1, d. 2968, l. 141–8); Tursunbaev, "Torzhestvo kolkhoznogo stroia," 259–308 (at 266, citing APRK, f. 141, op. 1, d. 2404, l. 23).
53. While the overall share of grain procurement from grain surplus regions declined between 1928 and 1932 from 67.5 to 50 percent, the share from grain-deficient regions grew from 9.4 to 16.9 percent. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 329 (citing RGAE, f. 4372, op. 30, d. 881, l. 82: Aug. 4, 1932).
54. Pianciola, "Famine in the Steppe." In the Kazakh autonomous republic, significant numbers of deaths from starvation began in spring and summer 1930. That year an estimated 35,000 Kazakh households, more than 150,000 people with 900,000 head of livestock, fled for China, Iran, and Afghanistan. The USSR land commissariat resolved that even southern Kazakhstan—an area of nomads and semi-nomads—should see "reinforced state farm and collective farm construction," partly in order to "narrow the basis for nomadic and semi-nomadic land utilization." Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 3–4 (RGAE, f. 7486, op. 19, d. 130, l. 6–7: on Feb. 1, 1931); Kondrashin et al., Golod v SSSR, I/1: 207–8 (GA Kustanaiskoi obl. Respubliki Kazakhstan, f. 54–p, op. 1, d. 784, l. 14), 220–7 (TsA FSB, f. 2m, op. 8, d. 744, l. 570–6), 227–8 (l. 612); Aldazhumanov et al., Nasil'stvennaia kollektivizatsiia, 72–3 (APRK, f. 141, op. 1, d. 3336, l. 97). Turar Ryskulov reported to Stalin that between Feb. 1931 and Feb. 1932, private Kazakh herds had shrunk by more than 4 million head, but only 1.5 million livestock had been delivered to the state. Ryskulov blamed "excesses in collectivization," "alongside the evil murder of livestock by kulak-herders [baŭ]." Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 503–9 (RGASPI, f. 82, op. 2, d. 670, l. 11–14ob.); Partiinaiia zhizn' Kazakhstana, 1990, no. 10: 76–84; Ryskulov, Sobranie sochinenii, III: 304–16 (APRK, f. 141, op. 1, d. 6403, l. 13–6).
55. Aldazhumanov, "Krest'ianskoe dvizhenie soprotivleniia," 66–93. One district of Dagestan reported 10,000 people on the verge of starvation already in Dec. 1930: Kondrashin et al., Golod v SSSR, I/1: 321 (RGAE, f. 8043, op. 1, d. 20, l. 128). A Central Committee plenum (June 11–15, 1931) discussed the completed sowing campaign and upcoming harvest, but was largely preoccupied with Moscow city reconstruction and Union-wide rail transport bottlenecks, which Stalin addressed in his usual way: forcing personnel changes, including an influx of OGPU personnel into the railroad commissariat. Pravda, June 17, 1931; VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1933), II: 693–720; Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 109–10 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 35–6: Sept. 19, 1931), 123–4 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 85–85ob.: Oct. 1), 127–8 (l. 88ob.: Oct. 5); Rees, Stalinism and Soviet Rail Transport, 51–2; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 854, l. 7.
56. Discussion ensued of some heretical ideas, such as allowing state companies independence and disposal of their own profits, to create incentives, but the transcript was not published. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 11, l. 119 (July 15, 1931).
57. RGASPI, f. 85, op. 28, d. 7, l. 176–82. This text, as delivered, differs from the text published two weeks later and reprinted in Sochineniia, XIII: 51–80.
58. When hostile governments fed the Soviets information aimed at compromising Red Army officers, much of it had actually originated with the OGPU's schemes. The defector Bazhanov colorfully told French intelligence that "I often heard politburo members and major OGPU functionaries say that émigré organizations were so saturated with agents that at times it was difficult to make out where émigré activities began and provocational work ended." Gutinov, "Unichtozhit' vragov, predvaritel'no ikh obmanuv," 38. See also Dzanovich, Organizy, 92 (citing TsA FSB, f. PF, d. 6159, t. 1, l. 228ob.).
59. "At the beginning of Soviet power I was neither sympathetic nor certain it would endure," Colonel Nikolai Svechin testified, according to his interrogation protocols. "Although I participated in the civil war, it was not in my heart. I fought eagerly when the war took on the character of an external war (the Caucasus front). I fought for the territorial integrity and preservation of Russia, although it was called the RSFSR" (i.e., Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic). Tynchenko, Golgofa, 146 (citing GA SBU, fp., d. 67093, t. 189 [251], delo Afanas'eva A. V.: 56). See also

Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 46–47 (citing AVKVS RF, op. 55, d. 8651, l. 52; RGVA, f. 9, op. 29, d. 10, l. 214; Gamarnik report, May 1931; AVKVS RF, op. 66, d. 2552, l. 1–13).

^{60.} Snesev had voiced the latter fear after his arrest in late 1930. Zdanovich, Organy, 376 (citing TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 4, d. 774, l. 4).

^{61.} Voroshilov had boasted to a Central Committee plenum in April 1928 that “the commanders we received from the tsarist army at the present time have become completely reliable, ours, if not 100 percent, then 99 percent, we assimilated them and melded them in with the young red cadres.” Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP: I: 280. The defense commissar kept a vigilant eye on rivals, and had once denounced Budyonny to Stalin as “too much a peasant, excessively popular and very cunning,” adding that “in the imagination of our enemies, Budyonny will play the role of some sort of savior [a peasant Leader], heading a ‘people’s’ movement.” “Cherkni . . . desiatio slovo,” 408 (Feb. 1, 1923). Voroshilov also complained about negative reports generated by the Red Army’s political administration. Khlevniuk, Politburo, 37; Zdanovich, Organy, 158 (citing TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 1, d. 5, l. 21ob–22), 114 (op. 5, d. 478, l. 168). Voroshilov’s aide-de-camp was Rafail Khmel’nitsky (b. 1898).

^{62.} According to the Lesser Soviet Encyclopedia (1931): “Officers constituted a closed caste, access to which was open predominantly to those of the ruling class . . . they were a true bulwark of the autocracy in the struggle against the revolutionary movement.” Mal’ia Sovetskaiia entsiklopediia (Moscow, 1931), VI: 208. Much the same would be stated, even more colorfully, eight years later: Bo’shaia Sovetskaiia entsiklopediia (Moscow, 1939), XLIII: 674. See also Denikin, Ocherki russkoi smuti, III: 144–5.

^{63.} “According to OGPU data,” Męzyński reported to Stalin, “all counterrevolutionary organizations and groups are striving to penetrate the Red Army . . . Recently we have uncovered numerous such rebel groups tied to the Red Army, about which we will offer a special report. I consider it necessary to convey to you a communication about one such organization discovered by the Ukraine GPU that presents the greatest interest.” Stalin had received Męzyński on Oct. 14 and 26, 1930. Ukraine GPU chief Balytsky was summoned to Moscow. Zdanovich, Organy, 388–9 (citing TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 247, l. 292; d. 15, l. 451–2).

^{64.} Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 122; Zdanovich, Organy, 390 (citing TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 237, l. 144, 136). Evidently, when the central OGPU in Moscow sent a brigade to the Ukrainian capital of Kharkov, it found anti-Soviet moods among former tsarist officers but no organization. Zdanovich, Organy, 391–2 (citing TsA FSB, delo R-4807, t. 1, l. 39, 44; May 8, 1938), 433. A Russian All-Military Union (ROVS) had been founded in Belgrade in 1924 by General Wrangel, Lieutenant General Alexander Kutepov, and the Romanov pretender, Grand Duke Nikolai Niloaevich, and was run out of Paris by Kutepov. His deputy, Major General Nikolai Skoblin, was an OGPU agent. The general staffs of Poland and Finland allowed their diplomatic pouches to carry ROVS materials to and from Moscow. Kutepov had concluded that only terrorist acts could shake the entrenched Soviet regime (or as Kutepov is said to have remarked, “detonate” the country), precisely the reasoning of the underground leftist terrorists during the tsarist days. On Jan. 26, 1930, Kutepov was kidnapped by an OGPU team coordinated by Yakov Serebryansky (the “Yasha team” for special tasks). Voitsekhovskii, Trest, 10–11; Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 58; Barmine, One Who Survived, 186; Pipes, Struve, 379–87; Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 23; Krasnaia zvezda, Sept. 22, 1965.

^{65.} Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 262 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 171, l. 4–5); Zdanovich, Organy, 390 (citing TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 63, l. 50; Feb. 16, 1931). The Moscow “center” was said to consist of Mikhail Bonch-Bruievich, Alexander Verkhovskiy, Sergei Kamenev, Alexander Svechin, Kakurin, and Snesev—several with ties to Tukhachevsky.

^{66.} Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 671–788; Z arkhiviv VUCHK, GPU, NKVD, KGB, no. 1, issue 18 (2002): 209; Khaustov, Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 212–3 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 7, l. 188, 192); Zdanovich, Organy, 423–31. The main scholarly authority, who provides a list of names while admitting the impossibility of establishing exact figures, writes that as many as 10,000 officers might have been arrested and sentenced. Tynchenko, Golgofa, 242, 248–311. See also Berkhin, Voennaiia reforma, 261.

^{67.} “Letopis’ stroitel’sтва sovetskikh vooruzhennykh sil 1931 goda (ianvar’-aprel’),” 114–5 (March 13, 1931). The accuser, Sergei Bezhanov (Sakvoredidze), would be executed (Balytsky had recommended a ten-year sentence, based upon his cooperation). Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 106; Tynchenko, Golgofa, 209–12 (GA SBU, fp., d. 67093, t. 21, delo Bzhanova S. G.: 102–3; t. 23: 578; t. 2, protokoly troika NKVD USSR: 89). Shaposhnikov had been placed at the head of non-party senior military men who approved industrialization and condemned the right deviation at the 16th Party Congress in 1930, when Stalin had allowed him to join the party expeditiously. In June 1931, Alexander Yegorov, whom Stalin knew from the civil war, was named chief of the staff.

68. Tynchenko, Golgofa, 124 (citing TsA FSB, f. R-40164, d. 4–b, delo Sneseva A. E.: 250); Snesev, Filosofia voyny, 33 (no citation). Mikhail Bonch-Bruевич, a former chief of staff, was arrested (Feb. 1931) but then released (May); Sergei Kamenev, the former supreme commander of the Red Army, was untouched despite compromising material gathered on him. Alexander Svechin was re-arrested in Feb. 1931 and got five years but would be released early in Feb. 1932; Verkhovsky was also arrested in Feb. 1931 and, in July, sentenced to execution, but this was commuted to ten years; Kakurin was sentenced in Feb. 1932 extrajudicially to execution, which was commuted immediately to ten years of solitary confinement (he would die in prison in summer 1936). Snesev ended up at Solovki. In Sept. 1934 he would be granted early release because of ill health; he would die in a Moscow hospital on Dec. 4, 1937, and be buried at the Vaganskoye cemetery. Dudnik and Smirnov, “Vsia zhizn’-nauke,” (no. 2), (no. 8); Bol’shaia Sovetskaia entsiklopediia (1976), XXIII: 635; Medvedev, Let History Judge, 287; Khrushchev, Memoirs, II: 141–3, 143n2.

69. Rölling and Rüter, Tokyo Judgment, I: chap. 6; Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 73, 86–9; Andrew and Gordievsky, KGB, 178–80.

70. Tukhachevsky took part in the May 13, 24, and 25, 1931, sessions of the Revolutionary Military Council in Moscow. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 816, 818, 824, d. 829, l. 4 (June 10, 1931); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, l. 162; d. 10, l. 2, 7, 33; Nikulin, Tukhachevskii, 169. Orjonikidze might have played a role in Tukhachevsky’s promotion. Dubinskii-Mukhadze, Ordzhonikidze, 277. Tukhachevsky had been working hard to demonstrate his loyalty to Voroshilov, sending an especially sycophantic fiftieth birthday greeting (Feb. 4, 1931). Voroshilov, Stat’i i materialy k 50-letiiu, 250–1.

71. Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 100–13. The same key informant, Olga Zajoncowska-Popova, continued her work.

72. Next up was the R-5, and Stalin was told it had a transmitter and receiver, which he could test. “And you are not deceiving us? Show me the radio station . . .” Turzhanskii, “Vo glave Sovetskoi aviatcii,” 183–9. Turzhansky would be arrested on July 23, 1938, accused of taking part in a military-fascist plot against the USSR and tortured; he would refuse to confess and be deported to the Kolyma camps; he would be released on Feb. 29, 1940, and, on June 4, named a major general of the air force.

73. Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol’shaia chistka, 213 (citing ORAF UFSB po Stavorpol’skomu kraiu, arkhivnoe sledstvennoe delo no. 13144 on Kaul A. I. t. 2).

74. Kokurin and Petrov, “OGPU, 1929–1934 gg.,” 104; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 226–9 (APRE, f. 3, op. 20, d. 193, l. 129–31: March 7, 1930); Zdanovich, Organy, 415 (Sept. 1930); Whitewood, Red Army, 130 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 293, l. 220). Yevdokimov had used his authority to send commissions to Sverdlovsk and Alma-Ata to gather compromising material on forced confessions and other abuses to use against Yagoda. Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol’shaia chistka, 213, (citing ORAF UFSB po Stavorpol’skomu kraiu, arkhivnoe sledstvennoe delo no. 13144 on Kaul A. I. t. 2: 37).

75. He had taken a long holiday in 1930, and spent the entire winter 1930–31 at his dacha outside Moscow, but his health worsened again in Feb.–March 1931. Meditsinskaia gazeta, June 29, 1988.

76. See Seyed-Gohrab, Great Umar Khayyam.

77. He would suffer severe flu in Sept. and Oct. 1931.

78. Akulov had a storied past as the organizer before the 1917 revolution of a 60,000-strong worker demonstration in St. Petersburg, and had assisted Stalin’s machinations in the removal of Rykov as head of the government several months before. Blinov, Ivan Akulov.

79. Belsky was kicked over to the lowly supply commissariat, Messing to the foreign trade commissariat, and Olsky to the trust overseeing Moscow cafeterias. Stalin took the opportunity to insert Lavrentii Beria into the OGPU collegium as well. Artuzov, after a phone conversation with Mężyński, wrote him a letter (Dec. 3, 1931), upset that his loyalty had come under question, professed never to have collected material against Yagoda, and asked to be assigned different work.

Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 354–8 (TsA FSB, d. R-4489, t. 3, l. 12–4). See also Kokurin and Petrov, “OGPU, 1929–1934 gg.,” 104; Gladkov, Nagrada, 375–7.

80. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 275 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 10, l. 127), 276 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 840, l. 1, 2), 805–6n87 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 842, l. 5, 14); Il'inskii, Narkom Iagoda, 172. In the 1960s, Medved's brother-in-law (D. B. Sorokin) would claim that Kirov had blocked Medved's transfer out of Leningrad. RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 67, l. 7–14 (Sorokin to Khrushchev, March 5, 1962). There is a garbled version in Orlov, Secret History, 14–15.

81. Yevdokimov would take with a vengefulness to his new assignment to bring rebels, known as “Basmachi,” to heel in the Tajikistan mountains bordering Afghanistan and the Turkmenistan desert bordering Iran. Tumshin and Papchinskii, 1937, bol'shaia chistka, 221 (citing TsA FSB, arkhivnoe sledstvennoe delo no. 14963 on Papashenko I. P., l. 120, quoting Iu. K. Ivanov-Borodin).

82. Naumov, Bor'ba v rukovodstve NKVD, 31–2. Balytsky, for example, brought a substantial number of Chekists to Moscow from Ukraine, while also leaving many loyalists behind to watch over Ukraine for him. Sever, Volkodav Stalina, 69–70. Molchanov, of Ivanovo province, would be moved to Moscow as head of the secret-political department on Nov. 20, 1931; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 287 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 861, l. 9).

83. Parker, Chamberlain and Appeasement, 16 (citing Bodleian Library, Simon MS70, fols 86, 132). “France—at the head of our enemies,” was the title of a section of a 1931 Soviet pamphlet. Mezhdunarodnoe polozhenie, 12. On July 18, 1931, for the first time since the war, a German chancellor, Brüning, went to Paris. Soon, Brüning, backed by Britain, would announce that Germany would seek the cancellation of all reparations.

84. The incident, involving Artashes Khalatyants, known as Artyom Khalatov, a Baku-born (1894) ethnic Armenian and the director of the state publishing house (since 1927), is related by Ivan Gronsky, then the editor of Izvestiya. Gronskii, Iz proshlogo, 153. Stalin wrote a note to Khalatov, along with Kaganovich and Kalinin, on Sept. 12, 1931, indicating he had not been excommunicated, but he would be sacked from the state publishing house on April 15, 1932; the disgraced Tomsky was named in his stead. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TSK RKP (b)—VKP (b): povestki dnia zasedanii, II: 201, 205, 296 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 840, 842, 880); Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 100 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 61), 110 (l. 73), 112 (l. 73–73ob.). Khalatov would be arrested on Sept. 26, 1937, and executed in Oct. 1938.

85. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 275–6 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 10, l. 127; op. 3, d. 840, l. 1–2), 280 (d. 841, l. 5, 9; Aug. 10 circular), 280 (d. 841, l. 5, 9; Aug. 6, 1931); Na prieme, 48. After Stalin had departed the capital, Kaganovich asked who ought to announce the personnel changes to the OGPU itself; Stalin insisted it had to be a party secretary, so that “the report is not assessed as revenge by one part of the OGPU against another.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 48 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 9–9ob.: Aug. 15, 1931), 48n1 (f. 17, op. 162, d. 10, l. 127), 49 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 10–10ob.: Aug. 15). On July 10, the politburo had decreed that “no Communists, working in the organs of the GPU or outside the organs, either in the center or in locales, should be arrested without the consent of the Central Committee,” and that “no specialists (engineering technical personnel, military, agronomists, physicians, and so on) should be arrested without the consent of the corresponding people's commissar.” Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 107; Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 60 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 840, l. 9). Later, this need to obtain a higher-up's permission for arrests of subordinates would have the effect of making complicit people's commissars and others in the annihilation of loyal cadres.

86. Shreider has a version of the internal OGPU struggle: Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 10, 13, 14–15.

87. Yagoda concluded: “There is not a single blot on the glorious banner of the OGPU. Ahead are still many years of struggle and glorious victories. We shall close Chekist ranks still more tightly!” Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 277–9 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 171, l. 6–9); Istoriia sovetskikh organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti (Moscow: Vysshaia krasnoznamennaia shkola KGB, 1977), 234–5. Slyly, Yagoda gave the Yevdokimov protégé Yakov Weinstok the assignment of evicting Yevdokimov's family from their Moscow apartment, ensuring everlasting bad blood between patron and protégé. Zhukovskii, Lubianskaia imperiia NKVD, 211.

88. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 161 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 38, l. 46; Sept. 24, 1931).

⁸⁹ RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 728, l. 29. See also Valedinskii, "Organizm Stalina vpolne zdorovi," 69. Stalin wrote a similar letter (undated) to Molotov. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 255; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 239. Stalin was traveling through Mingrelia and Abkhazia in mid-Aug. 1931, on his way to Sochi.

⁹⁰ Khromov, Po stranitsam, 12–5.

⁹¹ Davies, "Stalin as Economic Policy-Maker," 126–9.

⁹² The letters to Stalin brought to his attention were enumerated in lists in late 1930 and for Jan.–July 1931; no other such lists survive until 1945. Khlevniuk, "Letters to Stalin," citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 849–82.

⁹³ Functionaries left Stalin to decide whether the people really knew him, or whether the proposed inventions should be considered. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 861, l. 100.

⁹⁴ RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 856, l. 138. Stalin occasionally replied to letters in the press, when he perceived an issue of general interest. Stalin, "Reply to Comrade Kolkhozniks," Pravda (April 3, 1930), reprinted in Sobcheniia, XII: 202.

⁹⁵ Khlevniuk, "Letters to Stalin," 331 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 850, l. 34–55).

⁹⁶ Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 50–1 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 101–2).

⁹⁷ Two days later he told Kaganovich to circulate to politburo members a telegram accusing Mikoyan of lying about the silos there for tea and tobacco, based on other reports the dictator received ("Who is right and who is deceiving the Central Committee?"). Mikoyan replied that he had reported the truth, not conflated grain silos with other kinds; Stalin went back at him, prompting an irate Mikoyan to tender his resignation ("Dear Stalin!"). Stalin resolved the incident by denigrating supply personnel for their red tape, and instructing Kaganovich to have the workers' and peasants' inspectorate, as well as Caucasus OGPU boss Beria, oversee the silos in western Georgia. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 51–2 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 14–8); Khromov, Po stranitsam, 35–6 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 8–8ob, 14–5); Pavlov, Anastas Mikoian, 83–4 (citing RGASPI, f. 84, op. 1, d. 134, l. 2, 5; Sept. 12, 1931); RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 72–3.

⁹⁸ Andrei F. Andreyev, a Red Army veteran in Zdorovets village of the Central Black Earth province, somehow got a letter through to Stalin on Feb. 2, 1931, in which he claimed that he had fought the Whites in the civil war and been wounded, returned to his poor family in his native village, and become a rural correspondent, continuing the struggle, but had been hindered by local officials, who evicted him from the collective farm. "Now all these criminals, whose work I exposed in the press, have managed to have me arrested without even presenting a cause for my arrest," he wrote of fruitless petitions to the county procurator and OGPU. "I led companies, regiments, and battalions into battle against the Whites not in order that I would now sit under arrest by these same White Guards." Stalin wrote on the letter: "To comrade Yagoda. Request: immediately assign one of your people (someone completely reliable) to sort this out in Bolshevik fashion—honestly, quickly, and impartially and 'no matter who.'" Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 351–3 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 9, d. 11, l. 138–40); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 260–1 (APRE f. 45, op. 1, d. 171, l. 2–3). Andreyev (b. 1894) was vindicated and readmitted to a collective farm. (He would be arrested in 1942 and sentenced to ten years in a labor camp.)

⁹⁹ See the case of the head of the Artyom Coal Trust in the Donbass, Konstantin Rumyantsev, in which Stalin expressed distrust of the motives of his brother-in-law Redens (Ukraine OGPU boss): RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 42, l. 104. Rumyantsev (b. 1891), who won an Order of Lenin in 1931, died in a plane crash the next year.

¹⁰⁰ Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 284 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 70; Sept. 19, 1931).

¹⁰¹ Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 84 (citing RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 101). Besides Orjonikidze, Stalin was concerned about Kuibyshev, who, he knew, was an alcoholic and clashed with Molotov as well.

¹⁰² Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 73–4 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 779, l. 21–3; Sept. 11, 1931; l. 32–33; Oct. 4, 1931). "Sergo did not love Molotov very much," Mikoyan recalled. But disputes were generally not over first principles but bureaucratic interests. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 324, 520; Rees, Decision-making in the Stalinist Command Economy, 262–74.

¹⁰³ Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 35 (APRE f. 45, op. 1, d. 1550, l. 52), 35–6 (l. 53–8), 37 (l. 59), 44 (APRE f. 45, op. 1, d. 1552, l. 1), 37 (l. 60), 39 (l. 65–6; Sept. 26). The openly pro-fascist Dmitrievsky expressed a positive view of Stalin, imagining him to represent "the national-socialist imperialism that aspires to destroy the West in its strongholds."

Stalin (Stockholm: Bonnier, 1931), in Swedish and in Russian (Stockholm: Strela, 1931). See also the review by Kuskova: Sovremennye zapiski, 1931, no. 47: 518. See also the gossip about Stalin and Alliluyeva that circulated in the secret police: Orlov, Secret History, 318–9.

104. The tracks would be fully repaired before 6:00 a.m. the next morning. Yoshihashi, Conspiracy at Mukden; Ogata, Defiance in Manchuria; Crowley, Japan's Quest for Autonomy; Istoriia voiny na Tikhom okeane, I: 187. See also Iriye, After Imperialism.

105. Crowley, Japan's Quest for Autonomy, 114–21.

106. Patrikeef, Russian Politics, 101–3. The early 1920s Soviet thrust into Manchuria, as in the case of Mongolia, had been defensive, to secure Siberia's flanks against anti-Soviet White armies abroad, but then Manchuria became a largely commercial venture, subject to material cost-benefit rather than revolutionary calculations.

107. The League, founded in 1920 following the Versailles treaty negotiations with forty-two members, was the first international organization dedicated to world peace, aiming to prevent wars with what it called “collective security,” disarmament, and arbitration. Headquartered in Geneva it had a general assembly of all members and a secretariat, but lacked its own military and depended on the great powers comprising its executive council to enforce its resolutions. Japan was one of five permanent members of the League's executive council (along with Great Britain, France, Italy, and Germany, which had been added later). The United States, one of the originators, had failed to join. American economic power could be converted into military power—such as in the decision to build a two-ocean navy in 1916—but American geopolitical power remained constrained by limits set by Congress and public opinion. The Soviet Union was not a member of the League either. Kennedy, “Move to Institutions.” Membership would peak at fifty-eight in late 1934 and early 1935.

108. Lensen, Japanese Recognition; Lensen, Damned Inheritance, 223–6; Dallin, Rise of Russia in Asia, 244–8; Beloff, Foreign Policy of Soviet Russia, I: 76–7.

109. Under Nicholas II, the Pacific had come to seem the theater of gravest threat, but in Soviet military thinking the Vistula commanded center stage. Contradictions stemming from strategic anxiety and pessimism were endemic to imperial Russian strategy. Fuller, Strategy and Power, 430.

110. Menning, “Soviet Strategy,” I: 215–6; Daines, “Voennaia strategiiia,” 247–8.

111. Between 1932 and 1936, the Soviet Far Eastern Army would increase from six to fourteen divisions. Coox, Nomonhan, 76–8.

112. The USSR's sparsely populated, exposed Far Eastern territory was not even administered by the local party machine, but by the army (Vasily Blyukher) and secret police (Terenty Deribas), in vicious rivalry. Rumors of Blyukher's pending arrest, in connection with Operation “Springtime,” had circulated in late 1930 and resurfaced in May and June 1931, although on Aug. 6, the second anniversary of the Far Eastern Army, Voroshilov, on an extended inspection tour, locally announced Blyukher's award of the Order of Lenin. Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 72 (citing Times, Nov. 20, 22, 25, 1930); Izvestiia, Aug. 18, 1931; Dushen'kin, Proletarskii marshal, 111.

113. Toshihio, “Extension of Hostilities,” 241–33; Slavinskii, Sovetskii Soiuz i Kitai, 219–20 (citing AVP RF, fond Litvinova, op. 12, pap. 85, d. 45, 8–9); Coox, Nomonhan, 23; Stephan, Russian Far East, 183–5; Steiner, Lights that Failed, 719–20. On Oct. 28, 1931, the Japanese ambassador conveyed an ultimatum warning against a military response; TASS published it and the Soviet reply (a policy of “strict noninterference”) two days later. The Japanese suspected the Soviets were supplying the Chinese resistance. DVP SSSR, XIV: 820.

114. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 116–7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 76–76ob.). Stalin called for toning down the boasts in the press about ongoing Red Army military maneuvers in the Western military district. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 121–2 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 81: Sept. 27, 1931).

115. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 113 (citing RGAE, f. 4372, op. 91, d. 871, l. 98–9), 115 (GARE, f. 4372, op. 57, d. 16, l. 30: art. 212ss).

116. Kondrashin and Penner, Golod, 114. Later, Kondrashin republished this book excising Penner's co-authorship (Moscow: Rosspen, 2008).

117. The official 1931 harvest estimate had been lowered several times, to 69.5 million tons, which still ended up to be a massive overestimate. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 76, 446; Davies et al., Economic Transformation, 286–8 (table 19).

118. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, 14–5 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 732, l. 18; d. 484, l. 42, 48). For different figures (38 million as of early 1932), see Carr and Davies, Foundations of a Planned Economy, I: 700–4; Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 289–300; Davies, Crisis and Progress, 177. A newly established grain reserve fund had stood at 2 million tons, but it soon vanished through export and a massive increase in internal consumption.

119. “There are few Englishmen who do not rejoice at the breaking of our golden fetters,” John Maynard Keynes wrote. Eichengreen, Golden Fetters, 21.

120. France by itself was too weak to stabilize the global monetary system, and the United States, which had its own economic and financial challenges, refused to do so. Steiner, Lights that Failed, 698–9; more broadly, see Toozé, Deluge.

121. “The End of an Epoch,” Economist, Sept. 26, 1931: 547; Steiner, Lights that Failed, 663–8; Eichengreen, Golden Fetters, 298–9.

122. Eichengreen, Golden Fetters. Politicians, with the post–Great War widening of the suffrage and the spread of trade unions and leftist parties, proved skittish about imposing economic adjustment on their electorates for the sake of the stability of financial markets, a lack of credible commitment that undid global finance and trade. Simmons, Who Adjusts? Of course, “international cooperation” might not have been an issue at all if the United States had undertaken expansionary policies, generating the capital outflow that could have supplied much-needed liquidity and therefore the security sought by the governments in Europe that lacked confidence. (Given that the consumers’ expenditure average value index dropped close to 30 percent between 1929 and 1933, moderately expansionary policies would not have threatened inflation.) Britain would launch monetary expansion in 1932, and endure a relatively milder crisis; Japan would emulate the British and enjoy a robust recovery. Franklin Roosevelt would rescue the banks with public money, in 1933. Many people at the time, and subsequently, viewed his actions as opening a path to recovery. But that recovery would be halting, at best, and full of policy mistakes. Kindleberger, World in Depression; Friedman and Schwartz, Monetary History; Eichengreen, Golden Fetters.

123. Steiner, Lights that Failed, 668–70.

124. Soviet foreign trade, despite the dislocation in the capitalist world from 1929, had initially expanded more rapidly than envisioned in the Five-Year Plan, but even though the USSR had exported more than twice as much grain in 1930 as in 1927–28, it had earned only about the same revenues because of lower prices. Revenues in 1931 were worse. Catastrophic livestock losses, moreover, destroyed the animal-products export plan, and even mechanization of agriculture brought costs (tractors consumed fuel, reducing petroleum-product exports). Sel’skoe khoziaistvo SSSR, 222; Vneshniaia torgovlia SSSR za 20 let, 1918–1937 gg., 35. Grain exports officially rose to about 4.8 million tons in 1930 and 5.06 million tons in 1931, accounting for just under one-fifth of total exports (others included timber, oil, flax, animal products, even medicinal herbs). Dohan, “Economic Origins of Soviet Autarky,” 612–3. One gold ruble in foreign trade equaled $0.52 until early 1933.

125. Dmytro Manuilsky, at a Comintern enlarged plenum in March 1931, stated: “Can the perspective of the people’s revolution in Germany be viewed outside of the whole complicated international tangle and especially outside the question of the USSR?” A German revolution might provoke British and French intervention, forcing the Soviet Union to send in the Red Army, or allow “the imperialists” to annihilate the German Communists. Manuilsky, Communist Parties, 99; Carr, Twilight of the Comintern, 32–3, 37. The German trade delegation was in Moscow from Feb. 26 to March 11, 1931. Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 239–42; von Dirksen, Moscow, Tokyo, London, 89–96. Stalin had received an analysis of the credit disposition toward the USSR of German banks on Nov. 19, 1930. The OGPU worried about the opposition inside the newly created Bank of International Settlements (1930) in Basel to German bank cooperation with the USSR. Khaustov et al., Glazami razvedki, 322–3 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 9, d. 861, l. 14–5), 328–9 (l. 7–8; May 7, 1931).

126. The agreement had been signed on April 14, 1931. Dyck, Weimar Germany, 223–4; Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 55; Izvestiia, March 10, April 21 and 24, 1931; DVP SSSR, XIV: 116–9 (Krestinsky to Khinchuk in Berlin: March 10, 1931), 172 (Tass communiqué, March 10), 246–8 (Russian text of the agreement). On June 24, the two sides agreed on a protocol extending the April 1926 Treaty of Berlin, a treaty of neutrality and nonaggression, with a two-year moratorium for either side to denounce it, but the German side did not ratify it. It had been set to expire on June 29. DVP SSSR, XIV: 395–6. Dyck, Weimar Germany, 229–36.

127. By 1932, Germany would account for nearly half of Soviet imports. Dyck, Weimar Germany, 216; Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 14. The USSR had already gone from eleventh to fourth place in German exports between 1930 and 1931. DVP SSSR, XIV: 118, 247, 749–50.

128. The pound was devalued by some 30 percent after Britain withdrew from the gold standard, and because much of Soviet debt was payable in sterling Moscow might have gotten debt relief, but just about all Soviet gold payments in the years 1931–34 went to Germany, and the Soviets had to purchase marks (with gold) at the official parity rate of the reichsmark (the German government refused to devalue the mark). The Soviets covered their debt to Britain with commodity exports, whose prices were falling, so that the Soviets failed to achieve the full windfall in paying off debt that was denominated in devalued sterling. In 1933, when the United States would leave the gold standard and the dollar would be devalued, the Soviets would reap about 300 million gold rubles' worth of debt relief. Dohan, "Soviet Foreign Trade," 607–10. The exchange rate for sterling, which had been 9.46 rubles to £1, fell to 6.58–6.42 rubles by late 1931. Aizenberg, Valiutnaia Sistema SSSR, 104.

129. Germany, Greece, and Hungary would default in 1932. Reinhart and Rogoff, This Time Is Different, 96 (table 6.4). The real value of the ruble would drop by perhaps 60 percent during the Five-Year Plan. Mozokhin, VChK-OGPU, 213.

130. Dohan, "Economic Origins of Soviet Autarky," 606–7; DBFP, 2nd series, VII: 222 (Strang to Marquess of Reading); Davies, Crisis and Progress, 121n80. Strang surmised that a stable capitalism was a sine qua non for the success of socialism in the USSR. See also New York Times, Dec. 6, 1931, and Jan. 10, 1932. Some foreigners knew better: Le Temps, Nov. 23, 1931 (L. Vitin). The British came to understand that the Germans would not let the Soviets default: British Documents on Foreign Affairs, part II, series A, X: 377, XVI: 4–5.

131. The year 1931 would mark a peak for Soviet industrial imports, when the USSR accounted for 27.5 percent of U.S. industrial exports and 80 percent of German engineering exports. Dohan, "Economic Origins of Soviet Autarky." Cloth imports fell from more than 10 million meters to under 1 million. Lewis, "Foreign Economic Relations," 208. The year 1932 would turn out to be the worst in the history of Soviet foreign trade because of higher tariffs abroad and decreased credit availability.

132. Dohan, "Economic Origins of Soviet Autarky," 626–7. See also Tauger, "1932 Harvest," 88n52.

133. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 86 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 10, l. 119). On Sept. 4, Stalin complained to Kaganovich that "you are putting every kind of pressure for the export of grain when they pay pennies for grain," suggesting instead they export butter; Kaganovich recommended no changes for now. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 80–1 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 16–9), 83–6 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 739, l. 76–87; Sept. 6).

134. Kurliandskii, Stalin, vlast', religiia, 233–463, 610–28.

135. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 54–7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 739, l. 28–39), 60 (d. 76, l. 30–1); Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 85 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 10, l. 128, 153), 88–91 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 479, l. 267; d. 484, l. 43, 47ob., 45, 53, 53ob., 54, 55, 55ob., 61; d. 481, l. 123); Kondrashin and Penner, Golod, 116 (RGAE, f. 7496, op. 37 d. 159, l. 98).

136. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 69 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 484, l. 60).

137. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 75 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 484, l. 53–5: Stalin mocking V. V. Ptukha). Pravda's coverage of the plenum did not mention the discussion of grain procurement, in which regional party bosses condemned incompetence in harvest gathering and mass theft of the grain. Mikoyan interjected that collective farmers needed to be told: "first, satisfy the state plan, then satisfy your own plan." Oskolkov, Golod 1932/1933, 17–9 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 484, l. 119).

138. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 88, 90–1 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 481, l. 123, 55ob., 61), 96–7.

139. In 1926–27 the average market price per centner for rye had been 7.53 rubles while the state price had been 4.31. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 93 (citing Tovaroorobot, 1932: 140–45).

140. Kondrashin and Penner, Golod, 121 (citing RGAE, osobaia papka Kolkhoztsentra). No date is given.

¹⁴¹. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 255–6 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, l. 54). Stalin received twenty people that day, an unusually large number; the last departed at 5:10 p.m. He was back in the office the next day. Naprime, 79–80.

¹⁴². The incident occurred near Ilinka 5/2 across from the Old Gostinny Dvor. Ogarev's real name was said to be Platonov-Petin, and he was identified as an aide to the British intelligence station chief responsible for the border states that used to be part of imperial Russia. On the OGPU report, Molotov wrote: "To the members of the politburo: comrade Stalin needs to cease walking on foot in Moscow." Kaganovich, Kalinin, Kuibyshev, and Rykov affixed their signatures. This might have helped accelerate Stalin's own move permanently into the Kremlin. "Agent angliiskoi razvedki sluchayno vstretil Vas . . .," 161–2 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 226, l. 18, 19: Nov. 18, 1931); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 286. APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 200, l. 147.

¹⁴³. Japanese patriots extolled their country as a liberating conqueror, while the army leadership and many civilian supporters cast Manchuria's takeover as a matter of national survival. Duara, Sovereignty and Authenticity. It took "more than ministers and generals to make an empire." Young, Total Empire, 8. Japanese casualties occurred mostly in a diversionary action over Shanghai.

¹⁴⁴. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 161–3 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 38, l. 48–51). See also Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 185 (citing l. 52–3). Japan's military was effectively dictating the country's foreign policy with an aggressive strategy that asserted a need to "protect" investments in China from China's protracted civil war and from perceived Soviet encroachment, while actually forcing into being a self-sufficient empire in Asia. Paine, Wars for Asia.

¹⁴⁵. Soviet anxiety about appearing either belligerent or too weak was evident in a speech by Molotov on Dec. 22, 1931, at the central executive committee (repeating Stalin's words of June 1930): "We need no one else's land, but not one inch of our land will we cede to anyone else." Molotov, "O vypolnenie pervoi pitaitel'ki: doklad na vtoroi sessii IsK SSSR o narodno-khoziaistvennom plane na 1932 god," Pravda, Dec. 25, 1931, reprinted in DVP SSSR, XIV: 725–8, and in Molotov, V bor'be za sotsializm (1935), 236–76 (at 262–3); Sochineniia, XII: 269. Molotov's speech might have been the regime's first public statement on Japan's action in Manchuria. Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 79, 81; Thorne, Limits of Foreign Policy, 133.

¹⁴⁶. Ken, Moskva i pakt. The Soviets interpreted France's diplomatic efforts to manage its predicament vis-à-vis Germany as directed against the USSR. Kun, Kommunisticheskie internatsional v dokumentakh, 966–72; Eudin and Slusser, Soviet Foreign Policy, I: 324–31. In the eyes of Paris, a nonaggression pact with Moscow promised to loosen Soviet-German ties and secure genuine Soviet neutrality in the event of any Franco-German conflict, but after initiating a draft agreement the French had backed off signing it, preferring instead to try to get Germany to freeze frontiers and forswear rearmament in exchange for aid. (The Weimar Republic chancellor would decline.) After the Nazi party electoral success in Sept. 1930 and a German government announcement (March 1931) of a pending customs union with Austria, Paris conveyed to Moscow a willingness for exploratory talks on both a nonaggression pact and credits for trade, but mutual suspicion continued to undermine efforts. DVP SSSR, XIV: 452–6 (Dovgalevsky to Moscow, Aug. 8, 1931), 573–581 (V. L. Mezhlauk to Moscow: Oct. 16, 1931); Coulondre, De Staline à Hitler, 12; Herriot, Jadis, II: 312–3; Scott, Alliance against Hitler, 24–5; Wheeler-Bennett, Documents on International Affairs, 1931, 3–6; Scott, Alliance against Hitler, 8–9; Steiner, Lights that Failed, 553; Carley, "Five Kopecks," at 36. France would turn out to be the only country in the world that increased its imports from the USSR in 1931–32. Williams, Trading with the Bolsheviks, 142. In 1932, the Nazis would win 230 seats, the most by any party during the entire Weimar period. That same year, 90 percent of German reparation payments would be canceled.

¹⁴⁷. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 163n6 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 11, l. 64); Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetskikh-pol'skikh otnoshenii, V: 502–5 (AVP RF, f. 05, op. 11, d. 5, l. 157–62: Nov. 14, 1931); Izvestiia, Nov. 22, 1931; Lechik, "Vo frantsuzsko-pol'sko-rossiiskom treugol'nike," 120–3; Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 98.

¹⁴⁸. Izvestiia, July 26, 1930 (Litvinov interview). Stalin had hesitated to promote the rightist-leaning Litvinov, telling Chicherin, "You should be the commissar, even if you work only two hours a day," but Litvinov had filled the vacuum anyway. Cherniavskii, "Fenomenon Litvinova"; "Diktatura iazykocheshchikh nad rabotaiushchimi": posledniaia sluzhebnaia zapiska Chicherina," 112n7; Farnsworth, "Conversing with Stalin," 958 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 749, l. 80–3); Carley, Silent Conflict, 410–1 (citing AVP RF, f. 05, op. 9, pap. 43, d. 1, l. 130–2: Sept. 7, 1929); Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, (Dec. 3, 1929); Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 100; Besedovskii, Na putiakh, 385–6. See also Kennan on Chicherin, Russia and the West, 205–6. Mikoyan would recall that “the arguments between Chicherin and Litvinov at politburo meetings . . . helped us figure out the most difficult issues of world politics.” Those who worked with both judged them equivalent in quality of mind and breadth of horizons. Sheinis, Maksim Maksimovich Litvinov, 4; Sheinis, “Polpred B. E. Shtein,” 108. Rumors in Moscow on Chicherin’s likely replacement had run the gamut (Chicherin’s farewell memo seems to have had Kuibyshev in mind). See also Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 14–5; Ken and Rupasov, Zapadnoe iogranich’ie, 562–3; and O’Connor, Diplomacy and Revolution, 157–64.

149. Chicherin added: “The OGPU leaders have blind faith in the words of every idiot and cretin they make their agent.” “Diktatura iazykocheshyshchikh nad rabotaiushchimi”: posledniaia sluzhebnaia zapiska G.V. Chicherina,” 108–10. Chicherin had effectively failed in his Stalin-supported quest to forge a genuine alliance with Germany, but had prevented an anti-Soviet coalition, a version of Soviet strategy he had enunciated in a note to Stalin in 1929: “Any sharpening of the antagonisms between Germany and the Entente, France and Italy, Italy and Yugoslavia, England and America means a strengthening of our position, a lessening of the various threats to us.” V. V. Sokolov, “Neizvestnyi G. V. Chicherin: iz rassekrechennykh arkhivov MID RF,” 12 (citing AVP RF, f. 08, op. 12, pap. 74, d. 55, l. 86). The Germans suspected that because of his British wife, Litvinov was secretly pro-British-French. Von Dirksen, Moscow, Tokyo, London, 81.

150. Stalin both criticized and praised Litvinov. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina-Molotovu, 167–8 (Oct. 7, 1929), 169–71 (Dec. 5, 1929); Ken and Rupasov, Zapadnoe prigranich’ie, 568 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 10, l. 62; March 1931). Litvinov, according to his daughter, had preferred Stalin to Trotsky. Phillips, Between the Revolution and the West, 109 (citing Tatyana Litvinova).

151. Stalin expanded the number of the commissariat’s departments responsible for the West and promoted strong officials to lead them, to curb Litvinov’s powers. The foreign affairs collegium now consisted of Litvinov and his three deputies: Krestinsky (first deputy), Boris Stomonyakov (an ethnic Bulgarian), and Lev Karakhan (a Chicherin protégé). Eventually, however, Stalin would grant abolition of the collegium and a reduction in deputy commissars, strengthening Litvinov’s grip over that body. Dullin, Men of Influence, 58–9; Sokolov, “Zamestitel’ narkoma inostrannykh del B. Stomoniakov,” 120.

152. Officials who had joined the foreign affairs commissariat in the early NEP years occupied about one-third of the senior posts dealing with Europe, but an influx during the Great Break, under Litvinov, brought people with fewer than five years of service, some filling entirely new posts, many replacing defectors or those purged. Of diplomats who joined before 1925, around 48 percent were Russian; 33 percent were Jewish; another 4.5 percent were Balts. Of those who joined after 1929, 56 percent were Russian, nearly 30 percent were Jewish, and 6 percent were Ukrainian. At the very top, few were ethnic Russians. Litvinov, Sokolnikov, Surits, Khinchuk, Dovgalevsky were all Jewish. Some of the Russians were the wrong class (of noble descent): Kollontai, Alexandrovsky. Old-line diplomats, with foreign-language and -country expertise, were hostile to the “neophytes” mobilized into the corps by the Central Committee. The arrivistes looked askance at the “bourgeois” habits and mentality of the old guard. Dullin, Men of Influence, 52–3 (comparing the diplomatic yearbooks of 1925 and 1933–6); Sostav rukovodiashchikh rabotnikov i spetsialistov Sotzu SSR, 296–303.

153. Ken, Moskva i pakt, 44–6; Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 71–3 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 12–4; Aug. 30, 1931), 88–9 (l. 21–3; Sept. 7). To ensure timely exchange of information and control over decision making, Stalin created a standing politburo commission for foreign affairs (Nov. 22, 1931) consisting of himself, Molotov, and Kaganovich (Orjonikidze would be added a month later). Litvinov helped initiate the establishment (Nov. 26) of a lesser, separate commission just for Poland. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 84–5; Watson, “The Politburo and Foreign Policy,” 134–67 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 11, l. 68, 98, 99, 111); Ken and Rupasov, Zapadnoe prigranich’ie, 589–90 (l. 73; AVP RF, f. 010, op. 4, pap. 21, d. 63, l. 635–6).

154. It was not just Stalin who voiced this view. Chicherin, speaking to the Afghan king Amanullah Khan in May 1928, had noted “whether England is preparing a war for us, we shall see later. England is always striving to push others instead of itself into military actions against us. She could push Poland against us.” DVP SSSR, XI: 301–7 (at 303).

Stalin also knew that Piłsudski had offered his services to the Japanese as early as 1905, promising to lead an uprising in Russian Poland.

¹⁵⁵ Kaganovich exploded at the foreign affairs commissariat to Stalin, writing that “they have no serious materials” in support of their opposition. To Kaganovich’s mind, Litvinov showed himself given to Germanophilia, seeking to build Soviet security one-sidedly on the relationship with Germany while dismissing Poland; Kaganovich also complained of Litvinov’s self-satisfied smugness. But the entire foreign affairs commissariat was united in opposition to a Soviet pact with Poland, even Litvinov’s enemy Karakhan, suspecting that Warsaw’s probes with Moscow were mere ploys to frighten Berlin into deals with Poland and France. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 76–7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 739, l. 65–7; Sept. 3, 1931), 105–8 (l. 14–22; Sept. 16), 114n1 (f. 17, op. 162, d. 10, l. 177–8; op. 162, d. 11, l. 1, 9); Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-pol’skikh otnoshenii, V: 490–2 (Karakhan, Aug. 4, 1931); DVP SSSR, XIV: 488–9 (Aug. 6, 1931); Izvestiia, Aug. 30, 1931, Jan. 26, 1932; Tsiminets, Vneshniaia politika SSSR, III: 517–9, III: 519–20, 556–8; Dyck, Weimar Germany, 240; Adibekov et al., Politbiuro Tsk RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 259 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 11, l. 9; Sept. 20, 1931), 261–2 (l. 17; Sept. 30, 1931); Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 69. On Nov. 22, 1931, TASS published a communiqué on the resumption of Polish-Soviet negotiations. DVP SSSR, XIV: 647–50, 675; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 11, l. 64. See also Budurowycz, Polish-Soviet Relations, 8–9.

¹⁵⁶ Dyck, Weimar Germany, 242–9 (citing 9187/H249372–8: Dirksen memo, Nov. 10, 1931); RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 75–75ob. German ambassador Herbert von Dirksen wrote in a report on a meeting with Voroshilov (Dec. 12, 1931)—which was intercepted by Soviet intelligence and passed to Voroshilov (Dec. 21)—that “Voroshilov said that, of course, under no circumstances can one speak about any guarantees of the Polish western border; the Soviet government is a principled opponent of the Versailles Treaty; it will never undertake anything that would somehow contribute to strengthening the Danzig corridor or Memel border.” Duraczynski and Sakharov, Sovetsko-Pol’skie otnosheniia, 64 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 70, l. 264–5); Zeidler, Reichswehr und Rote Armee, 262; D’iakov and Bushueva, Fashistskii mekh kovalsia v SSSR, 128–9 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 70, l. 253–8).

¹⁵⁷ A declaration by Litvinov, after he had met with Kōki Hirota, was published in the Soviet press: the USSR “affords great significance to the maintenance and strengthening of existing relations with Japan. The Soviet government observes a policy of strict noninterference in the conflicts among various countries.” DVP SSSR, XIV: 668–72; Izvestiia, Nov. 21, 1931. On Nov. 23 the two countries signed a long-completed convention on postal exchange. DVP SSSR, XIV: 675–6. On Nov. 26, Karakhan in Tokyo began negotiations with Hirota on a fisheries agreement. DVP SSSR, XIV: 680–3.

¹⁵⁸ Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 291–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 185, l. 1–9). Soviet military intelligence also obtained a copy of a secret Japanese brochure for their officer corps, The Red Army and the Methods of Struggle With It, whose sixteen points included: “at the outset of a war it is necessary to inflict a decisive strike,” because the Red Army was weak in the face of strength; “the goal should be not to seize territory but to destroy the functioning field army”; “the most advantageous area of the front is where there are units of different nationalities”; “it is necessary to use anti-Soviet Russians.” Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, VIII/i: 47–9 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1233, l. 339–45).

¹⁵⁹ Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 291–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 185, l. 1–9; Dec. 19, 1931). In a second intercepted memo sent to Stalin on Feb. 28, 1932, Kasahara again emphasized that “the military might of the Soviet Union” would reach great heights “in ten years.” Stalin underlined this passage, too. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 298–308 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 185, l. 15–36).

¹⁶⁰ Stalin added: “Those comrades who remained in Russia, who did not go abroad, of course, are far more numerous in our party and its leadership than former émigrés, and they, of course, had greater opportunities to contribute to the revolution than those who were located in the foreign emigration.” Leushin, “Schitaiv nizhe svoego dostoinstva”: fragment zapisi besedy U. V. Stalina c E. Liudvigom,” 216–17 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 2989, l. 17–8).

¹⁶¹ Stalin added: “Fate” is something that is not part of the laws of history, something mystical. I do not believe in mysticism.” On Feb. 8, 1932, he had a transcript circulated to members and candidate members of the politburo and Central Committee (“for your information”). In April 1932 the party journal Bolshevik published a version he edited. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 2989, l. 1. Stalin would authorize its publication as a standalone pamphlet in 1938, and allowed it to be included in Collected Works in 1951. “Beseda s nemetskim pisatelem Emilen Liudvigom,” Bol'shevik, 1932, no. 8: 33–42 (at 41); Sochineniia, XIII: 104–23 (at 114–5, 120–1); Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, II: 517–8.

162. Kenkichi Yoshizawa, Japan's newly named foreign minister, returning home from his ambassadorial post in Paris via the Trans-Siberian, received a “princely welcome” in Moscow on Dec. 30–31, 1931, according to British observers. Two days after Yoshizawa reached Tokyo, Moscow forced the issue by having Izvestiya (Jan. 16, 1932) publish news that a nonaggression pact had again been proffered. Both Yoshizawa and Ambassador Hirota claimed to be surprised. DVP SSSR, XIV: 746–8 (Litvinov-Yoshizawa conversation); Lensen, Damned Inheritance, 337–41; Sokolov, Na boevykh postakh, 157; Grechko et al., Istoriia vtoroi mirovoi voiny, I: 277.

163. Voroshilov was especially skeptical of rumors about the ranks of White Guard émigrés ready to enlist for Japan. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 167–8 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 44, l. 53–5). Japanese officials continued to engage in open talk about annexing Northern Sakhalin, the Soviet Far Eastern coastline and Kamchatka. Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 79–80.

164. Artuzov judged the French general staff to be against a Franco-Soviet nonaggression pact, but noted that French military intelligence “is of the opinion that the USSR at the present time will avoid a conflict with Europe and Japan and not react to provocations.” Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 296–8 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 185, l. 11–4). The French general staff was focused on Germany, not the USSR. Vidal, Une alliance improbable.

165. Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 98. The OGPU were also reporting delight among peasants, angry at collectivization, at rumors Japan would seize Siberia, and Poland or Germany would take advantage in the West. Golubev, “Edi mir obrushitsia na nashu Respubliku,” 141–5; Vernadskii, Dnevnik, 1926–1934, 240, 256, 271, 275; Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 15–16 (citing RGAE, f. 7486, op. 37, d. 235, l. 12–10; Jan. 19, 1932).

166. Johnston, New Mecca, 122, citing Vozrozhdenie, March 5, 1932. See also Besedovskii, Na putiakh k termidoru, 286.

167. XVII konferentsiia VKP (b), 156.

168. According to the same hostile witness, when Stalin appeared at the Bolshoi on Feb. 23, 1932, at a celebration of the Red Army's fourteenth anniversary, he was met with “cold silence.” Biulleten' oppositsii, 28 (July 1932): 3–5. Davies surmises that the letter writer was Ivan Smirnov: Davies, Crisis and Progress, 133 n1, 136, 145. On the conference resolutions, see: VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1933), II: 728–46.

169. The regime also mandated mobilization plans for each major factory. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 175. Still, even now, Tukhachevsky failed once more to force the creation of a separate army industrial research and development empire. Samuelson, Plans for Stalin's War Machine, 42–7, 55–9, 162 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 2, d. 280, l. 7–8); Harrison and Simonov, “Voenpriemka,” 230.

170. Drobizhev, Glavnyi shab, 171–2; Davies, Crisis and Progress, 204–9; GARE f. 5446, op. 15, d. 15, l. 13; Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 192 (RGAE, f. 7297, op. 41: intro); Davies, Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 241, 243; Seiranian, Nadezhneishii voennii rabotnik, 138. On Jan. 12, 1932, the politburo appointed party organizers in military factories who were responsible to the Central Committee. Poltaev, Industrializatsiia SSSR, 608.

171. The wildly ambitious 10,000 number included 2,000 BTs (Christie chassis), 3,000 T-26s (Vickers six-ton), and 5,000 machine-gun carrier T-27s (Carden Loyd tankette). Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 193 (citing RGVA, f. 4, op. 17, d. 76, l. 10). Voroshilov, at a Jan. 1933 party plenum, would claim that Stalin had ordered to “take all measures, spend the money, even large amounts of money, run people to all corners of Europe and America, but get models, plans, bring in people, do everything possible and impossible in order to set up tank production here.” RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 514, part 1, l. 125; Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 193 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 8, l. 13, 18–9; Dec. 5, 1929); RGVA, f. 31811, op. 1, d. 1, l. 52–3 (Pavlovunsky).

172. The Soviet delegation chose the Vickers medium tank prototype from a commercial catalogue. Vickers refused to sell its heavy tanks, but a clever member of the Soviet delegation managed to outsmart the British and obtain specifications (which would eventually go into the T-28). Svirin, Bronia krepka, 136–7, 253. The French firm Citroën refused to sell the Soviets tanks with blueprints. Vereshchak, “Rol' inostrannogo tekhnicheskoi pomoshchi,” 234, 236 (citing RGASPI, f. 85, op. 27, d. 65; Jan. 11, 1930).

173. Milson, Russian Tanks; Cooper, "Defence Production," 13; Tupper, "Red Army and the Defence Industry," 13–5, 359–60; Hofman, "United States' Contribution"; Mukhin, "Amorg," no. 3: 34–41, no. 4: 37–53. See also Sutton, Western Technology, 240–2. In Nov. 1931, the Kharkov Locomotive Factory was designated a "super shock" plant, granting access to raw materials, transport, and daily life necessities. Christie reasoned that tanks should be light and move quickly to penetrate enemy lines, and his suspension system, a sprung bogie instead of a rigid system, afforded tanks a low center of gravity and a low silhouette, as well as an ability to move at high speeds. His original model-1928 or M-1928 had little firepower; it was the improved M-1931 that interested the Soviets. The M-1931 weighed 12 tons, had a 338-horsepower engine, room for a crew of three and a 37mm gun as well as a machine gun, and a speed of 50 mph without tracks (which were removable for travel on paved roads). (Later, the Soviets would thicken the armor and enlarge the guns without losing the mobility.) The Soviets bought the rights to the production, sale, and use of tanks inside the borders of the Soviet Union for ten years. Pavlov et al., Tanki BT chast' 1. The Christie contract (signed on April 28, 1930) cost $164,000. Kolomiets, Legkie tanki BT, 10. In 1931, the Poles also agreed to buy the M-1931, but then Christie renegotiated (the deal was illegal without U.S. government permission); he returned the Polish government's money. Christie's advanced tank designs never went into mass production in the United States; he would die nearly penniless in 1944. The Soviets also worked on a tank from the experimental designs of German engineer Edward Grotte, of Rheinmetall, who was employed on a technical assistance contract at the Bolshevik Factory in Leningrad. "Do not by any means allow Grotte to go back to Germany," Stalin told Poskryobyshev to inform Kirov (Aug. 25, 1931). "Take all measures up to arrest and compel him to prepare the tank for serial mass production. Do not allow him go to Germany after the tank enters serial production, because he might give away secrets. Establish thorough surveillance on him making [Filipp] Medved responsible. Do not let him out of sight for even an hour." RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 76, l. 42–3. Grotte's tank design never entered mass production, and in 1933 he was allowed to leave, but his work fed into other Soviet tank design efforts.

174. Stalin, in a letter to Voroshilov, singled out armor-plating as the most difficult aspect. Some 60 percent of armor plates that would be produced at the Red October factory in 1933 for the T-26 were unusable. Vereshchak, "Rol' inostrannogo tekhnicheskoi pomoshchi," 241 (citing RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 37, l. 49; RGAE, f. 7719, op. 4, d. 76, l. 228).

175. The final tank tally in 1932 would be 2,585 instead of 10,000; 800 of them had no turrets, 290 lacked treads, and even the "finished" T-26s had no turrets for mounting a 45mm gun (they carried only machine guns). By 1933 the number of tanks would leap to 4,700. Similar exponential growth would occur in military aircraft and artillery. And the BT—soon the fastest moving tank in the world—was world class. Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 192–202 (citing RGVA, f. 4, op. 14, d. 717, l. 11–2; Pavlunovsky to Voroshilov, Jan. 2, 1933; d. 896, l. 7; Yegorov, Jan. 26; d. 717, l. 9–10; Voroshilov to Molotov); Maiolo, Cry Havoc, 18–9.

176. Davies, "Soviet Military Expenditures," 580–1, 594 (table 3); Davies, Crisis and Progress, 165. Already between Oct. and Dec. 1931, Soviet armaments production shot up by 75 percent, to claim more than one of four workers in machine building. Then, in the first weeks of 1932, the military procurement budget nearly doubled. The capacity to absorb that funding influx efficiently was another matter. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 111–8; Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 190–1 (citing RGVA, f. 4, op. 417, l. 29, 31ff; op. 14, d. 603, l. 31). The Soviet Far Eastern Army had doubled in size between May and Feb. 1932, and would reach 152,000 by the end of that year, with more than 300 tanks, 300 armored vehicles, and 250 planes. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 207 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 18, d. 39, l. 63ob.: Blyukher, Oct. 25, 1932; op. 14, d. 754, l. 26: Dec. 1932–Jan. 1933).

177. Soviet propagandists huffed that Tokyo presented itself as "the apostle of peace" and asserted that China had "insulted" Japan and threatened it with "chaos." Conversely, an Osaka newspaper fumed (March 3, 1932), "Why is the American annexation of the Philippines justified, while the Japanese seizure of Formosa [Taiwan] is not?" Tanin and Kogan, Voenno-fashistskoe dvizhenie v Iaponii, 251–62; Paine, Wars for Asia, 24.

178. Kasahara and his Polish contacts were clearly trying to spur Tokyo. Stalin underlined passages in the text suggesting a need to study the technical development of the Red Army, and wrote on the document: "From hand to hand. To the members of the politburo (to each individually). With the obligation to return to the politburo." Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 298–308 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 185, l. 15–36), 807.

179. Blyukher had given orders to fire at the overflights, and Stalin vented his anger when he found out. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 43, l. 116. Voroshilov had instructed Blyukher in a secret order (Feb. 28, 1932) to annihilate anyone who violated the Soviet border. Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 187 (citing RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 88, l. 9–10).

180. The regime also created a special collective farm corps “to reinforce Soviet Far Eastern frontiers,” and directed seven tank battalions with infantry escorts, armored trains, anti-aircraft machine guns, and anti-tank weapons to the Soviet Far East. Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 187–8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 11, l. 196–7); Grechko et al., Istoriia vtoroi mirovoi voyny, I: 110 (March 16, 1932); Dmitriev, Sovetskoe podvodnoe korablestroenie, 71, 240–55; Isaev, “Meropriiatiie KPSS po ukrepleniiu dal’nevostochnykh rubezhei”; Zakharov, “Krasnoznamennomu Tikhookeanskomu flotu”; Dmitriev, “Stroitel’stvo sovetskogo podvodnogo flota.”

181. For monitoring and subverting the USSR, the Kwantung Army had already deployed a vast intelligence apparatus through Manchuria (Harbin, Manchouli, Mukden, Jilin), which they expanded (to Qiqihar, Hailar, Heihe) after the formation of Manchukuo. Japanese intelligence personnel were also deployed at their consulates in Vladivostok, Khabarovsk, and Novosibirsk, and at the Manchukuo consulate in Chita (and soon, a Manchukuo consulate in Blagoveshchensk). The Japanese legation in Tehran was also used against the Soviet Union. Kuromiya and Peplonski, “The Great Terror,” citing, among other works, Tsutao Ariga, Nihon riku kai gun no jōbōkikō to sono katsudō (Tokyo: Kindai Bungeisha, 1994), 84–100. Japanese police in Manchuria enlisted local bandits for assassinations and kidnappings, set up rings for prostitution and drug trafficking, and concocted subterfuges to fool a League of Nations fact-finding mission. Vespa, Secret Agent of Japan.

182. The original plan dated to 1927, and had been reworked (to Stalin’s approval) in summer 1930: RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 490, l. 19–23.

183. Puyi was converted to “emperor” in 1934. Most of Japan’s conquests, beginning with Taiwan (1895) and followed by Korea (1905), had not been driven primarily by economic concerns—trade between China and Japan, for example, dwarfed that between Korea and Japan—but Manchukuo was seen as a vast settler colony, a solution to Japan’s rural poverty.

184. Lensen, Damned Inheritance, 210–1; Izvestiia, March 22, 1932.

185. Lensen, Damned Inheritance, 225–6; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 36, 68 (March 26, 1932), 94 (April 6), 107–8 (April 17). Into summer 1932, international observers noted Moscow’s “extreme forbearance” toward Japan bordering on “pusillanimity” (in the words of the British consul in Harbin). Lensen, Damned Inheritance, 373 (citing FO 371/16173–665: Garstin to Ingram, Harbin, June 11, 1932); Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 81.

186. It was Romania, not the Soviet Union, that refused to sign the bilateral pact. Lungu, “Nicolae Titulescu.” The Soviets refused to recognize Bessarabia’s annexation by Romania. According to Louis Fischer, however, Litvinov was long ready to relinquish Soviet claims to Bessarabia to normalize relations with Romania. Elleman, “Secret Soviet-Japanese Agreement”; Fischer, Men and Politics, 135. When Tukhachevsky had reported on the 1932 Poland war plan to Voroshilov, he had noted that “a similar operation would be very easy to prepare against Bessarabia.” D’iakov and Bushueva, Fashistskii mekh kovalsia v SSSR, 131–2 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 342, l. 179–80), 132n2 (d. 400, l. 14–29). See also Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 127–8.

187. Le Temps, Nov. 30, 1932; Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 98.

188. The OGPU’s Balytsky and Artuzov reported to Stalin (March 19, 1932) on new intelligence from an informant in Warsaw regarding the French general staff’s preparation for a military intervention against the USSR that relied on Poland and Japan while attempting to draw in Britain. The report was filled with misspellings of the principal actors (Polish general staff chief Janusz Gąsiorowski listed as Gonsiarowski, French Marshal Pétain as Lecien). Khaustov et al., Glazami razvedki, 329–32 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 185, l. 65–70).

189. Ken, Moskva i pakt, 113–4; Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-pol’skikh otnoshenii, V: 492–4 (AVP RF, f. 08, op. 14, d. 137, l. 31–3), 494–6 (l. 13–5), 496–7, 497–8, 498–500, 501; Budurowych, Polish-Soviet Relations, 16–7; Karski, Great Powers, 109. See also Izvestiia, Aug. 27, 28, 30, 1931; DVP SSSR, XIV: 562–4 (Dovgalevsky to Karakhan, Oct. 6, 1931), 566 (Dovgalevsky to Moscow, Oct. 9), 570–2 (Litvinov and Zelezynski: Oct. 14); and Biegariski et al., Documents on Polish-Soviet Relations, I: 14–6.

190. D'iakov and Bushueva, Fashistskii mekh kovalsia v SSSR, 131–2 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 342, l. 179–80 to Khinchuk). As late as Dec. 1932, the politburo approved the dispatch of four officers to German military academies. Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 198 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 14, l. 39; Dec. 16, 1932).

191. Kochan, Russia and the Weimar Republic, 159. German diplomats interpreted the Franco-Soviet and Polish-Soviet nonaggression pacts as “a complete change in the course of Soviet foreign policy.” Sluch, “Germano-sovetskie otnosheniia,” 103 (citing AVP RF, f. 082, op. 14, pap. 62, d. 2, l. 365).

192. On April 13, 1932, Piłsudski arrived in Romania, with plans to travel on to Japan, trips that the Soviets viewed as setting the stage for a long-anticipated military pact against USSR; in fact, the Polish president was trying (and failing) to induce his Romanian allies into ratcheting down tensions with Moscow and become part of the broad regional nonaggression commitments. Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 104–5. On April 22, 1932, with Piłsudski in Tokyo, deputy foreign affairs commissar Stomonyakov speculated in a letter to Antonov-Ovseyenko that “in all likelihood he is holding specific military negotiations related to Far Eastern complications for the event of a war between Poland and Romania against the USSR.” Revyakin, “Poland and the Soviet Union,” 79–101 84 (no citation).

193. Stalin might have felt dissatisfied with the information at his disposal, for he had recently received Radek one-on-one for an hour and a half and then ordered creation of an “information bureau” on international affairs inside his secretariat (formalized on April 1, 1932). Effectively an extension of the foreign bureaus of Izvestiya, Radek’s bureau, in theory, had the right to make use of “all existing institutions concerned with economic, political, and military matters in the capitalist countries.” Na prieme, 64 (March 27, 1932); Ken and Rupaov, Politbiuro TsK VKP (b) i otnosheniia SSSR, chast’ 1: 196, 553–4, 574–5; Rupaov, Zapadnoe zagranič'e, 590–2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 878, l. 5), 592–6 (op. 162, d. 11, l. 135, 143; May 16, 1932); Ken, “Karl Radek i Biuro.” On Radek’s value to Stalin, see Duda, Jenő Varga, 113–4. See also Gronsii, Iz prashlogo, 147. Radek managed to cast the Soviet Union as a champion of peace in Foreign Affairs, the journal of the American establishment, and in May 1932 he would work with Voroshilov on contacts with the American military over a possible common policy toward Japan—which, however, would prove fruitless. Radek, “War in the Far East”; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 113; 173–4; Safronov, SSSR, 369. Stalin counseled Voroshilov on the proper way to engage with the U.S. military. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 173–4 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 37, l. 46–8; Voroshilov to Stalin, June 6, 1932), 175–6 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 38, l. 66; June 12), 176n3 (f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 194–5; June 20).

194. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 277–82 (RGASPI, f. 631, op. 5, d. 52, l. 48–53; Feb. 10, 1932).

195. Some foods for those still on lists were derationed (no longer promised). Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 406–7 (March 23, 1932).

196. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 147–54.

197. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 312–5 (RGAE, f. 7486, op. 37, d. 236, l. 4–13); Zelenin, Stalinskaiia ‘revoliutsiia sverkh’, 22–4.

198. “Otkrytoe pis'mo Prezidiumu Ts.K'ka Soiuza SSR,” Biulleten' oppositsii, no. 27 (March 1932): 1–6 (at 5).

199. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 311 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 877, l. 9); Sovetskaiia iustitsiia, no. 12 (1932): 29; Zelenin, “Byl li ‘kolkhoznyii neopne?’” 108–9 (citing GARE, f. 7486, op. 3, d. 237, l. 225–6); Davies et al., Years of Progress, 14. Stalin had crossed out a section in the draft of the decree that would have guaranteed feed to collective farmers for their personal animals. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 3016, l. 1. Another decree, a fortnight later, publicized the decision. Davies stresses that although Stalin did not initiate the relaxation on livestock, he would grab credit. Davies, “Stalin as Economic Policy-Maker,” 136–7. One scholar argues that Yakovlev and “bourgeois” specialists working under him had initiated a shift from extensive to intensive growth already in late 1931–early 1932. Tauger, “People’s Commissariat of Agriculture,” 157–9.

200. Sochineniia, XIII: 134. Stalin permitted a foreigner, James Abbé, to photograph him in the Little Corner on April 13, 1932, resulting in a sensational portrait on the New York Times front page. Abbé, I Photograph Russia; von Dewitz and Johnson, Shooting Stalin. Stalin attended the politburo meetings throughout April and May 1932; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 874–885. The same day Abbé got twenty minutes in the Kremlin, an infirm Mężyński wrote to Stalin pleading to be relieved of his position. Stalin refused. Molotov concurred. Kuibyshev wrote on the resignation request,

- "read it and understand nothing." Mężyński had suffered a heart attack on Dec. 13, 1931, returning to work on Jan. 25, 1932.
201. Rudich, Holod 1932–33 roku, 148–50. Stalin received an OGPU report enumerating the mass flight out of villages region by region, and naming "food difficulties" as a prime motivator. Zelenin, Stalinskaia 'revoliutsiia sverkh, 25–6 (no citation).
202. Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 43 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 42, d. 26, l. 1–6).
203. The areas affected were better supplied than villages, but a low priority among industrial regions. Rossman, Worker Resistance under Stalin. On strikes, see also Gromtseva, Teni izchezaiut v smol'nom, 28–9.
204. Werth and Moullec, Rapports secrets soviétiques, 209–16 (at 214).
205. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 188–91 (citing APRE, f. 3, op. 22, d. 39, l. 6–7).
206. Rossman, Worker Resistance under Stalin, 231 (citing RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 213, l. 90); Danilov et al., Tragediia Sovetskoi derevni, III: 318–54 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 10, d. 53, l. 1–64; April 1932).
207. Korkin, Magnetic Mountain. In Ivanovo in 1937, there would be a mere three work stoppages involving a very small number of people protesting rising norms and food shortages. Rittersporn, Anguish, 233 (citing RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 230, l. 87).
208. Later, while reading back issues of Pravda, Stalin would erupt at the loyalist Yaroslavsky over an article (May 31, 1932) admitting the fact of strikes in Ivanovo—even though the article blamed the already sacked local party leadership—because he felt that any admission handed ammunition to enemies to speak of a "new Kronstadt." Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 120–2 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 77, l. 11, 12–12ob.; June 5, 1932), 139n1 (f. 17, op. 3, d. 887, l. 9); Khromov, Po stranisam, 34–5. The politburo condemned Yaroslavsky's article and removed him from the editorial position at Pravda.
209. Berson, Sowieckie zbrojenia moralne, 7. Berson, under the pseudonym Otmar, served as Moscow correspondent for the Polish Telegraph Agency and Gazeta Polska, until his expulsion in 1935.
210. Rassweiler, Generation of Power; Gorიაeva, "Velikaia kniga dnia," 256–7.
211. On May 3, Stalin received the International Herald Tribune correspondent to reiterate Soviet interest in expanded trade with the United States and told him that in the forthcoming second Five-Year Plan, "yes, light industry will develop to a much greater extent than before." Sochineniia, XIII: 258 (Ralph Barnes). More broadly, see Mahoney, Dispatches and Dictators. Stalin played little role in drawing up the second Five-Year Plan, which was overseen by Molotov, Kuibyshev, and Orjonikidze, yet it could not go forward until he approved.
212. The Soviets also planned to import 10,000 breeding cattle from South America, Germany, and Britain. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 138; Kondrashin et al., Golod v SSSR, II/ii: 290–1 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 114, 124). That same day, the politburo decreed the expulsion of 38,300 "kulak" households, but ten days later, this would be circumscribed to individual arrests of "evil elements in the village." Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 367 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 134). May 5, 1932, was the 30th birthday of Pravda, which was celebrated without mention of Bukharin, its editor for twelve years. Medvedev, Nikolai Bukharin, 49.
213. Soon, the regime clarified that such trade would be "carried out at prices formed on the market." Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 138 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 883, l. 9), 140; Sobranie zakonov, 1932, no. 1: article 190; Sobranie zakonov, 1932, no. 33: article 195; Partinoe stroitel'stvo, 1932, no. 11–2: 50; Kollektivizatsiia sel'skogo khoziaistva, 411–3, 416–7; Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 58–9 (no citation). An Oct. 1931 decree had legalized peasant trade of grain at "cooperative prices." Additional decrees after May 6, 1932, reduced procurement targets for other agricultural products. Gorelik and Malkis, Soverskaia torgovlia, 125; Whitman, "Kolkhoz Market," 387. From Jan. 15, 1933, the regime would concede free trade in meat, too.
214. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 484, l. 36–46. "We still have bazaars that are not Soviet but purely private, in almost every village, almost every town," North Caucasus party boss Sheboldayev complained at the 17th party conference. "Not only do these bazaars fail to make the individual peasant into a socialist, they sometimes prevent him from becoming a collective farmer." XVII konferentsiia VKP (b), 210.
215. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 187–90. Whereas (black) market prices for grain in 1929 had been double the state procurement prices, in 1932 the multiple reached 28 times. Ellman, "Did the Agricultural Surplus Provide the Resources for Increased Investment in the USSR during the First Five-Year Plan?" Economic Journal 85 (1975): 844–63 (table 6); James R. Millar, "Mass Collectivization and the Contribution of Soviet Agriculture to the First Five-Year Plan: A Review Article," Slavic Review 33/4 (1974): 750–66.

216. Davies, Crisis and Progress, xv.

217. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 51 (citing Za industrializatsiiu, March 15, 1931: Dukarevich). "You cry that you do not have this or that but you never say what is necessary to correct the situation," Orjonikidze complained at a heavy industry commissariat meeting on June 6, 1932. "You are placing the blame on others when you yourself are to blame." Gregory and Markevich, "Creating Soviet Industry," 798 (citing RGAE, f. 7297, op. 38, d. 10, l. 4).

218. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 171–2 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 38, l. 56–7). See also Samuelson, Plans for Stalin's War Machine, 108–12, 141–3; Ken, "Moia otsenka byla slishkom rezkoi": I. V. Stalin rekonstruktsiia RKKA," 150–2 (RGASPI, f. 74, d. 38, l. 58, 56–7); and Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 79–80. Tukhachevsky was in Stalin's office on April 7 and 14, 1932. In Aug. 1932, Stalin would even invite him over to his dacha in Sochi. Na prieme, 65–6; Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 198n90 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 105, l. 56–7: Tukhachevsky to Voroshilov, Aug. 27, 1932). During Voroshilov's summary speech at the June 1–4, 1937, meeting of the Main Military Council, a revealing exchange would occur when he labeled Tukhachevsky's Jan. 1930 proposals "idiocies." Stalin interjected: "It would have been good to have such a force, but it was necessary to rebuff it at that time." Voroshilov persisted: "This was a wrecking proposal." Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 319n43 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 165, d. 61, l. 130: uncorrected transcript).

219. On May 8, Stalin approved a commission, headed by Kaganovich, to check the production and distribution of consumer goods. Rees, Iron Lazar, 107 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 883, l. 1).

220. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 365 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 43, l. 60).

221. A decree of May 20, 1932, that lowered taxes on the legalized collective-farmers' trade urged local officials to disallow "the opening of shops and kiosks by private traders," adding that "middlemen and speculators trying to live off the workers and peasants must be extirpated everywhere." Ball, Russia's Last Capitalists, 81, citing Resheniia partii i pravitel'stva po khoziaistvennym voprosam, 16 vols. (Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1967–), II: 388–9.

222. Soviet officials had been discussing the market following the launch of "wholesale" collectivization, but the discussions could be deceiving. At the 17th party conference (Jan.–Feb. 1932), for example, the ideologue Alexei Stetsky had mentioned the imperative to "develop Soviet trade, the Soviet market," but he meant state-controlled trade and markets. XVII konferentsiia VKP (b), 193. At the Jan. 1933 plenum, when Stalin would underscore the place of trade in a socialist economy, he would insist that "this is not a return to NEP." Bordiugov and Kozlov, "Dialektika teorii i praktiki stsalisticheskogo stroitel'stva," 14 (citing unspecified party archives).

223. Davies, Stalin-Kaganovich Correspondence, 11–2.

224. Sandag and Kendall, Poisoned Arrows, 72–3. On Mongolia's collectivization, see Zelenin, Stalinskaia 'revoliutsiia sverkhui, 11 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, l. 73).

225. Bawden, Modern History of Mongolia, 290–327. A list of Mongol rebellions against Soviet domination can be found in Mishima and Goto, Japanese View of Outer Mongolia, 16–24. A purge would reduce the Mongol People's Party from around 40,000 to 11,000. Lkhamsuren, Ocherki istorii Mongol'skoi narodno-revoliutsionnoi partii, 147.

226. At the same time as ordering dispatch of the goods, on March 16, 1932, the regime established a standing politburo commission for Mongolia headed by Postyshev, with Voroshilov, Karakhan, and Eliava as members. Instructions for the Soviet proconsul Okhtin were approved on April 23. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 18–20, 31, 92, 111–2; Baabar, Twentieth-Century Mongolia, 282–325 (esp. 317).

227. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 113; Terayama, "Soviet Policies toward Mongolia," I: 37–66. Stalin emerges in the documents as trying to impose order amid conflicting reports, while venting his fury.

228. Kondrashin et al., Golod v SSSR, I/ii: 152–5 (GA Minskoi obl., f. 164p, op. 1, d. 132, l. 546–9).

229. Davies et al., "Stalin, Grain Stocks, and the Famine of 1932–33," 650–1 (citing RGASPI, f. 79, op. 1, d. 375, l. 1–3; f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 153–4; GARE, f. 5446, op. 27, d. 33, l. 127).

230. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 114–5 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 153; f. 82, op. 2, d. 138, l. 150–3; Redens to Molotov, May 28 and 29, 1932).

231. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 115–6.

232. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 243; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 231 (before June 1932). During his summer 1932 holiday, Stalin received 91 registered documents, many lengthy. He did not answer all of them. A politburo commission (Kaganovich, Postyshev, Yenukidze) on fixing resorts recommended forming an all-Union agency; Stalin abstained from weighing in. The body was approved on June 23, 1932. Khlevniuk, et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 201 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 77, l. 114), 201n (f. 17, op. 3, d. 881, l. 12, 29–31; d. 889, l. 9, 29; d. 895, l. 15).

233. Stalin added that only if the situation was truly beyond internal rescue, which he doubted, could Soviet troops be dispatched, and then only ethnic Buryats. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 173–4 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 37, l. 46–8; June 6, 1932), 174n3 (f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 133; f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 49–52), 174n5 (f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 175); Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 136 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 49–52; June 4, 1932), 143, 156–7, 182 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 77, l. 76; June 19, 1932).

234. In a June 10 telegram, Stalin reiterated his opposition to overt military intervention in Mongolia to Molotov, Voroshilov, and Kaganovich. “A hurried and insufficiently prepared decision could provoke a conflict with Japan and give a basis for a united front of Japan, China, Mongolia against the USSR,” he warned. “We will be portrayed as occupiers . . . and the Japanese and Chinese as liberators . . .” Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 157–8 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 77, l. 42–5).

235. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 779, l. 47. The policy shift (“New Turn”) was confirmed at a Mongolia People’s party extraordinary plenum June 29–30, 1932, with Soviet advisers present. Genden attacked the leftists and pronounced the noncapitalist path a failure in Mongol conditions. By Sept. 1, Stalin would add himself to the politburo’s Mongolian commission. (He had named Voroshilov to replace Karakhan as chairman.) On Nov. 10, the politburo would approve a telegram from Eliava to the Mongols (copy to Okhtin) instructing the Mongolian Central Committee to remove all “leftists,” amnesty rank and file rebels who turned in their weapons, and call out the leaders of the uprising as Chinese agents and Japanese imperialists seeking to end Mongolia’s independence. Soon the Soviets were asking about Mongolia’s mobilization possibilities in the event of war with Japan. RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9; Roshchin, Politicheskaia istoriia Mongolii, 254–65.

236. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 175 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 38, l. 60). Without irony Stalin advised Kaganovich (June 7, 1932) that “the bureaucrats at Pravda have replaced letters from workers and collective farmers with letters from professional correspondents and ‘plenipotentiaries’.” But the bureaucrats have to be reined in. Otherwise, Pravda risks falling utterly out of touch with live human beings at factories and collective farms.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 149 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 58–60). Kaganovich had the new rubric created, “Letters from workers and collective farmers” (164: f. 558, op. 11, d. 740, l. 37–43; f. 17, op. 114, d. 302, l. 13. 166: f. 558, op. 11, d. 740, l. 43–52).

237. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 180–1 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 152).

238. Pyrih et al., Holodomor, 33–6 (RGASPI, f. 82, op. 2, d. 139, l. 162–5). “Do you realize what is happening in the lands around Belaia Tserkov, Uman, and Kiev?” G. I. Tkachenko, a twenty-year-old Ukrainian student, wrote to Ukrainian party boss Kosior on June 18, 1932. “There are vast areas of land not sown . . . In collective farms in which there were 100–150 horses, there are now only 40–50, and these are dying off. The population is terribly hungry.” Rudich, Holod 1932–1933 rokiu, 183–5. In March 1932, Kosior had managed to procure a seed loan for Ukraine of 110,000 tons from storehouses in better-off regions outside Ukraine (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 30). On April 29, 1932, the politburo advanced a further seed loan to collective farms in Ukraine (l. 115–6).

239. Khaustov, “Deiatel'nost' organov,” 335.

240. The politburo (June 21) formally resolved to summon them, but in the meantime refused additional emergency aid to Ukraine. Khlevniuk, Stalin i Kaganovich, 163–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 740, l. 37–42; June 12, 1932), 169 (f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 62–3; June 15, 1932), 168–9n5. That day, a telegram in the names of Stalin and Molotov admonished the Ukrainian hierarchy that “no manner of deviation—regarding either amounts or deadlines set for grain deliveries—can be permitted from the plan established for your region for collecting grain from collective and private [family] farms or for delivering grain to state farms.” Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 242n3; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 230n3; Rudich, Holod 1932–1933 rokiu, 190.

241. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 187 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 77, l. 83–5).

242. The politburo (in July 1932) would formally approve slight reductions. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 197–8 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 81–7), 198n3 (f. 17 op. 162, d. 13, l. 11, 30, 133). Stalin was showing a bit of uncharacteristic flexibility, writing to Kaganovich and Molotov (June 26, 1932) that Sheboldayev might be right in suggesting that rural consumer cooperatives be freed from enacting state grain procurements, while their role as distributors of industrial goods to the countryside should be enhanced and their taxes reduced. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 197–8 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 81–7). On June 25, 1932, the decree “On Revolutionary Legality” stipulated criminal prosecution of officials who violated the law in dealings with peasants and protected judges from dismissal. Enforcement of the decree was another matter. Solomon, Reforming Justice, 193.

243. The Soviet Union was by no means alone in its emphasis on heavy over light bombers at this time. Bailes, “Technology and Legitimacy,” 381–406.

244. They agreed on better supervision of air force missions and more quality control in industry. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 203–4 (RGASPI, f. 84, op. 2, d. 37, l. 49–50; d. 38, l. 69, 70; f. 558, op. 11, d. 77, l. 121; d. 78, l. 8). Aircraft losses were a long-standing problem. Sevost'ianov et al., “Sovershenno sekretno,” VIII/iii: 1225–6 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 16, l. 492–4; July 18, 1930). After perusing a copy of the German-language book by Major Helders (Robert Knauss), Air War 1936: The Destruction of Paris (Berlin, 1932), which imagined a future war between Britain and France decided by the “flying fortress,” Stalin wrote to Voroshilov (June 12, 1932) that the “wonderful book” should be published in Russian translation to teach and inspire aviators. Kvashonkin, Soverskoe rukovodstvo, 175 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 38, l. 64–5). Robert Knauss, Luftkrieg 1936: die Zerstörung von Paris (Berlin: Wilhelm Rolf, 1932) was translated: Vozdushnaia voina 1936: razrushenie Parizha, 2nd ed. (Moscow: Voenizdat, 1934); RGASPI, f. 558, op. 3, d. 52.

245. “We made a lot of noise but did not blow up the bridge,” the OGPU’s Terenty Deribas would admit. The politburo (July 16, 1932) reprimanded the OGPU for “poor organization.” The captured Soviet agent confessed. Karakhan denied any involvement to the Japanese ambassador. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 208 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 147), 213n13 (f. 17, op. 162, d. 13, l. 12, 33), 227 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 78, l. 43–4, l. 73, 72); DVP SSSR, XVI: 814n44 (July 26, 1932); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 315 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 13, l. 33), 807n99. The operative transferred was Nikolai Zagvozdin (b. 1898), who would rise to head of the NKVD in Uzbekistan and then Tajikistan—until his arrest (Feb. 9, 1939) and execution (Jan. 19, 1940). In summer 1932, Heinz Neumann (b. 1902), the leader of the German Communist party’s paramilitary wing, which conducted assassinations, was evidently invited to Sochi. An elderly man of Caucasus extraction, according to the memoirs of Neumann’s lover, was among the many guests. “This is comrade X, my assassin,” Stalin supposedly remarked, before explaining, affably, that the old man’s plot to kill him had been foiled by the OGPU. Neumann’s lover recounted: “The assassin had been condemned to death. But he, Stalin, deemed it proper to pardon this old man, who had, after all, simply acted out of nationalist infatuation, and in order for him to feel like the hatchet had been buried once and for all, had invited him to Matsesta as his guest . . . During this lengthy exposition the old man stood before the gaggle of guests with a downcast gaze.” Such anecdotes about Stalin’s perverse sense of humor abound, usually with a single witness. Buber-Neumann, Von Potsdam nach Moskau, 274–5. Heinz Neumann would be executed in Moscow on Nov. 26, 1937.

246. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 179–80 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 740, l. 69–72; f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 65–8); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 890, l. 8; Molotov, O pod’eme sel’skogo khoziaistva.

247. Stalin had used the word “famine” when characterizing what enemies predicted would happen as a result of Soviet policies, for example, in reference to bourgeois specialists in the original version of his “six conditions” speech in June 1931: RGASPI, f. 85, op. 28, d. 7, II: l. 189–91. In summer 1932, Molotov told the politburo upon return from Ukraine, “We are indeed faced with the spectre of famine, and in rich grain districts to boot.” Ivinskii, Kollektivizatsiia i razkulachivanie, 203. See also Kuromiya, Freedom and Terror, 167.

248. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 90, 476.

249. He also reminded Kaganovich and Molotov that the conference was to have led to “obligatory 100 percent fulfillment of the grain procurements.” The next day Stalin instructed them to “concentrate the most serious attention on Ukraine,” and “take all the measures to break the current mood of officials, isolate the whiners and rotten diplomats

(no matter who!) and ensure genuinely Bolshevik decisions.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 205 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 77, l. 129–30), 210 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 45–7; f. 558, op. 11, d. 740, l. 1), 210–3 (l. 2–9).

250. Kostiuik, Stalinist Rule in Ukraine, 19 (citing Visti, July 17, 1932). Kaganovich wrote to Stalin that Kosior held a firm line on fulfilling the plan at the conference, thereby protecting him.

251. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 219 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 78, l. 16).

252. The politburo resolved “to accept the recommendation of comrade Stalin on a reduction of the planned grain procurement in Ukraine by 722,000 tons as an exception for those regions of Ukraine particularly suffering.” (That was from 5.8 million.) The politburo also resolved to summon Kosior to Moscow and to direct him, along with Kuibyshev and Kaganovich, to determine which regions in Ukraine to assign the reduced targets. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 183 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 13, l. 75, 76; signed by Kaganovich, in Stalin’s absence); Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 241–2 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 78, l. 79–81; July 24, 1932). Stalin denied the Sept. 10, 1932, request from Ivan Kabakov, party boss in the Urals, for lower grain procurement targets. Then, on Sept. 22, he approved the distribution of 39,000 tons of grain to the Urals, instead of the previous 37,000. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 184 (APRF, f. 3, op. 40, d. 81, l. 148), 185 (l. 149), 186 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 13, l. 131, 133, 134).

253. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 244–5 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 115–9); Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 182–3 (f. 17, op. 162, d. 13, l. 76; Aug. 17, 1932; l. 85; Sept. 1, 1932).

254. Peasants could not distinguish between rust and other diseases, a Soviet agronomist reported. But as Tauger has demonstrated, local officials, too, did not understand plant disease and, at harvest time, when they would discover that the crop had been rotted out, would wrongly blame social causes. Tauger, “Natural Disaster,” 15 (citing Na zaschitu urozhaiia, 1933, no. 10: 14–6; S. E. Grushevoi; and RGAE, f. 7486, op. 37, d. 237, l. 388), 40–5.

255. A major contributing factor to the famine was the extreme deterioration in party-village relations. Penner, “Stalin and the Ital’ianka.” Whereas in 1928 there had been 1 horsepower for every 3.63 hectares of land sown to grain, in 1932 the number was 1 for every 6.02 hectares. A. A. Barsov, Balans stoimostnykh obmenov, 85.

256. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 176–80 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 37, l. 49–51), 180–1 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 38, l. 68–71), 181–5 (d. 37, l. 54–9); f. 17, op. 162, d. 13, l. 6. According to Polish intelligence, between Oct. 1, 1932, and June 20, 1933, 20 Soviet soldiers sought asylum in Poland. Zdanovich, Organy, 507 (citing RGVA, f. 308, op. 3, d. 303, l. 2).

257. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 185–6 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 38, l. 76–7).

258. Zdanovich, Organy, 435–6 (citing TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 10, d. 94, l. 1, 3, 7; L. Ivanov). See also Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 162–3.

259. Rees, Decision-making in the Stalinist Command Economy, 43–4 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 894, l. 12; f. 79, op. 1, d. 376, l. 1–2; Kuibyshev’s memo; and RGASPI, f. 85, op. 29, d. 433, l. 1); Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politburo, 125–6.

260. Lensen, Damned Inheritance, 365; DVP SSSR, XV: 465–8 (Spilvanek and Japanese journalist Fuse: Aug. 12, 1932), 479–81 (Troianovskiy-Karakhan, Aug. 19), 614–8, 798. Between Dec. 4 and 6, 1932, more than 4,000 Chinese, including 2,400 soldiers (11 generals among them), were taken into Soviet custody. After Japanese demands for their surrender, the Soviets decided to send them to Xinjiang, announcing that they were being sent out of USSR territory. Sladkovskii, Znakomstvo s Kitaem i kitaisami, 186 (citing Tsentral’nyi arkhiv porgannichnykh voisk, f. 160, op. 2, d. 1, l. 7); Barmin, Sovetskii Soizuz i Sintsizian, 124 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 15, l. 117); DVP SSSR, XV: 677; Izvestiia, Dec. 21, 1932.

261. From Jan. 1 through July 1, 1932, 1.37 million households quit collective farms in the RSFSR; 200,000 households quit in Ukraine. Zelenin, “By li ‘kolkhoznyi Neonp?’” 106 (citing RGAE, f. 7446, op. 14, d. 108, l. 34; op. 3, d. 364, l. 2; d. 378, l. 2; op. 2, d. 338, l. 57). The number collectivized by the end of 1932 (completion of the Five-Year Plan) was officially 14.9 million households, or 61.5 percent, rather than the target of 17.9 million.

262. Cairns added that “what surprised me most in Kiev was not what the people said (although conditions there seemed to be worse than in any place I visited in the next five weeks), but that they should all—young, middleaged and old alike—be unanimous and that none of them seemed to care what they said or who heard them, even the police and GPU.” Carynnyk et al., Foreign Office, 13, 51, 42, 105, 111. See also Cairns, Soviet Famine. “There’s no bread, no meat, no fats—nothing,” a senior OGPU official in Leningrad is said to have told the British ambassador. Haslam, “Political Opposition,” 396 (citing FO 371/16322: Strang to Simon in London, Aug. 14, 1932).

263. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 235–6 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 106–13; July 20, 1932), 240–1 (d. 100, l. 137–40; before July 24, 1932). The methods of theft could be ingenious. Kondrashin and Penner, Golod, 135–7. Stalin was keen to institutionalize the importance of socialist property in social consciousness. Solomon, Soviet Criminal Justice, 119, 222–3. “State socialist property” was theorized as synonymous with “people’s patrimony.” Stuchka, Kurs Sovetskogo grazhdanskogo prava, III: 29.

264. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 895, l. 14 (politburo Aug. 2/8); Sobranie zakonov, 1932, article 360; Kollektivizatsiia sel'skogo khoziaistva, 423–4; Davies, Crisis and Progress, 242–56. See also Shearer, Policing Stalin's Socialism, 21.

265. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 273–5 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 144–51). A second decree, “On the struggle with speculation,” stipulating sentences of five to ten years, followed on Aug. 22: RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 896, l. 13; Sobranie zakonov, 1932, article 375. This, too, had come from Stalin’s instructions on holiday. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 243–4 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 740, l. 104–11); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 316 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 13, l. 52); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 896, l. 13.

266. Pravda, Aug. 9, 1932. See also Izvestiia TsIK SSSR i VTsIK, Aug. 8, 1932. Already, places of confinement were far over capacity.

267. Zelenin et al., Istoriia sovetskogo krest'iansva, II: 428–9n137 (citing RGAE, f. 1562, op. 152, d. 29, l. 58, 29). In the RSFSR alone, more than 160,000 people were convicted under the law in the first year alone. Werth and Mironenko, Istoriia stalinskogo gulaga, I: 135–8.

268. The names are crossed out from the record of the meeting. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 256–8 (personal archive of Kaganovich); Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 418–9 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 106–13, 117, 121–3, 144–5, 151; d. 100, l. 1–7).

269. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 273–5 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 144–51).

270. Polish intelligence was still sending ethnic Ukrainian agents across the border on espionage missions, but almost all were being caught, as Stalin knew from intercepted Japanese correspondence out of Warsaw. Mikulicz, Prometeizm w polityce II Rzeczypospolitej, 110–5; Kuromiya, The Voices of the Dead, 220–1. Japan cooperated with Poland to support Ukrainian anti-Communist nationalists, but Soviet intelligence knew this, too, having penetrated Ukrainian groups abroad. Sotskov, Neizvestnyi separatizm, 75–81. On Soviet-Polish prisoner exchanges, including spies, see Peplowski, Wywiad Polski na ZSSR, 122–3. See also Gronskii, Iz proshlogo, 147–8.

271. Stanisław Patek, the Polish envoy to the USSR, and Krestinsky had signed the pact in Moscow on July 25, 1932; it went into effect on Dec. 23, when ratifications were exchanged in Warsaw between Beck and Antonov-Ovseyenko. Ken and Rupasov, Politbiuro TsIK VKP (b) i otnosheniia SSSR, 514–9; Ken, Moskva i pakt, 104.

272. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 283–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 740, l. 153–60; Aug. 16). Balytsky would not arrive in Ukraine as a special plenipotentiary until Nov. 1932; he would be promoted to republic OGPU chief in Feb. 1933. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 340 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 907, l. 20; Nov. 25, 1932); Shapoval et al., ChK-GPU-NKVD, 47–8, 436. But Stalin directed Kaganovich to bring the Red Army into the harvest campaign in Ukraine. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 460 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 79, l. 21).

273. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 232 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 91–104), 285–6 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 3, d. 99, l. 157–60). This overturned the recent politburo decision on sown area expansion that Stalin had mandated (f. 17, op. 3, d. 895, l. 14; Aug. 7, 1932). Total sown area for the 1933 harvest would be 4.7 million hectares fewer than for 1932. Still, crop rotation would not be restored even by 1935, when it was practiced on just 50 percent of the sown area. Davies, “Stalin as Economic Policy-Maker,” 133–4.

274. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 180–1 (APRE, f. 3, op. 40, d. 81, l. 107–10), 182 (l. 105).

275. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 728, l. 38 (Aug. 16, 1932).

276. Also present were Dmitry Maretzky, editor-in-chief of Leningrad Pravda; Pyotr Petrovsky, first deputy editor of Pravda and a former editor of Red Star; and Alexander Slepstov, a founding editor of Communist Youth League Pravda. Petrovskii, “Poslednii rot front,” 179–98.

277. Merridale, “Reluctant Opposition,” at 392; Merridale, Moscow Politics, 231–3; Starkov, Martem'ian Ryutin, 15–6; Cohen, Bukharin, 234. Ryutin had been born in Eastern Siberia, joined the Menshevik wing of the Russian Social Democrats in 1914, and, after the seizure of power, managed to get elected a delegate to the 10th Party Congress, while participating in the regime crackdown against the Kronstadt sailors. He had once been admonished for alluding to Lenin's Testament at a ward party bureau session (“We know that Comrade Stalin has his faults, about which Comrade Lenin spoke”). “O dele tak nazывaemogo ‘Soiuza Marksistov-Lenintsev,’” 108; Zagoria, Power and the Soviet Elite, 11; Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 92–104. Around the time of the 16th Party Congress (June 1930), Stalin evidently offered him an opportunity to remain in the Central Committee in exchange for publicly denouncing the right; Ryutin demurred. “M. N. Riutin,” 156. Stalin wrote to Molotov of Ryutin (Sept. 13), “This counterrevolutionary scum must be completely disarmed.” Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 215. Eight days later, as if on cue, a denunciation came forward from a former official in the Krasnaya Presnya ward party committee who claimed that in Aug. 1930 Ryutin had called Stalin “a trickster and political intriguer who will lead the country to ruin.” Radzinsky, Stalin, 273 (quoting A. Nemov, without a reference). Hauled before the Central Control Commission, Ryutin denied the accusations (“99 percent of it is the most vile lie”) but did admit that back in 1928 “Comrade Stalin defamed me needlessly and had me thrown out of party work with a clever maneuver. I consider that dishonesty toward me on his part.” On Oct. 5, 1930, Ryutin was expelled from the party for “double-dealing” and right opportunism. On Nov. 13, the OGPU imprisoned Ryutin at Butyrka for counterrevolutionary agitation, but interrogators were unable to break him; Mężyński wrote to Stalin that Ryutin “poses as an innocent wronged.” Stalin, for reasons that remain obscure, ordered Ryutin's release, which took place on Jan. 17, 1931. “O tak nazывaemom ‘vesoiuzom trotskistskom tsentre,’” 110–1; Starkov, “Delo Riutina,” 166–7; Starkov, Martem'ian Ryutin, 22–25; Anfert'ev, “Osobennosti preodoleniia I. V. Stalinykh krizisnoi situatsii,” 2 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 5282, l. 1). Radzinsky speculates that Ryutin was meant to be used to entrap other oppositionists. Radzinsky, Stalin, 273. See also Tel'man, “Riutin protiv Stalina” (purporting to quote additional instructions from Stalin to Mężyński). Ryutin got hired as an economist at an electrical production unit.

278. “Platforma ‘Soiuza Marksistov-Lenintsev’ (‘Gruppa Riutina’): ‘Stalin i krizis proletarskoi diktatury’” (1990, no. 8), 201–6, (no. 9), 172.

279. Ryutin had said back at the 12th Party Congress in 1923, when Trotsky attacked the leadership, that “a party cannot exist without its leaders. . . . A party that discredits its leaders is unavoidably weakened, disorganized. Parties are always led by leaders.” XII s'ezd RKP (b), 165. See also Getty and Naumov, Yezhov, 74; Starkov, “Trotsky and Ryutin,” 71. See also Joffe, Back in Time, 45; Sotsialisticheskii vestnik, 1928, no. 1; Poslednie novosti, Dec. 4, 1927; Starkov, Martem'ian Ryutin, 13; Pavlov [pseudonym], 1920-e: revoliutsiia i biurokratiia, 86–7; a manuscript in the Hoover Institution archives (“Pavlov file”); the identity of the author, a student at Moscow University in the 1920s, remains unclear.

280. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 296. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 53. Besides Ryutin, Ivanov, and the two Kayurovs, the attendees were Natalia Kayurova (wife of Vasilii Kayurov), Vasily Demidov, Professor Pavel Fyodorov, Pavel Galkin, Viktor Gorelov, Nikolai Kolokolov, Boris Ptashny, Grigory Rokhkin, Semyon V. Tokarev, Nikolai Vasilev, Pyotr Zamyatin. The home was Pyotr Silchenko's. He was absent.

281. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 54–8. In 1932, Stalin learned from Anna Ulyanova, Lenin's sister, that their mother was the daughter of a baptized Jew, Alexander Blank, born Srul Moisevich Blank, who had become a landowner and physician. Ulyanova stressed how beneficial it would be to reveal Lenin's one-quarter Jewish ancestry. Stalin made it a state secret. Volkogonov, Lenin, 9. Lenin had Russian, Qalmyk, German, and Swedish along with Jewish ancestry.

282. “Platforma ‘Soiuza Marksistov-Lenintsev’ (‘Gruppa Riutina’): ‘Stalin i krizis proletarskoi diktatury’,” (1990, no. 12), 198–9.

283. “Platforma ‘Soiuza marksistov-lenintsev’ (‘Gruppa Riutina’): ‘Stalin i krizis proletarskoi diktatury’,” (1990, no. 11), 162–3, (no. 12), 190, (no. 8), 201.

284. “Platforma ‘Soiuza Marksistov-Lenintsev’ (‘Gruppa Riutina’): ‘Stalin i krizis proletarskoi diktatury’” (1990, no. 12), 193; Starkov, Martem'ian Riutin, 237–8.

285. Ryutin proposed no alternative leader (he had in mind a collective leadership). Starkov, “Trotsky and Ryutin,” 73. On Oct. 15, 1932, OGPU raided Silchenko’s home, where they found the original 167-page handwritten “Stalin and the Crisis of Proletarian Dictatorship,” which they then typed up, the only extant copy.

286. Notwithstanding Ryutin’s bravery, the only way out was not to seize the party but to dissolve it, deliberately or accidentally, by introducing democracy—competitive elections, secret ballot, alternative parties, private property, market relations. There was no salvation from tyranny in Bolshevism.

287. “O dele tak nazyvaemogo ‘Soiuzu Markсистov-Leninsev,’” 106 (N. K. Kuz’min and N. A. Storozhenko, who claimed to have received the appeal from Alexander Kayurov).

288. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 54. According to a Molotov speech that was published, Zinoviev in testimony had stated “as far as I can judge, recently a fairly significant section of party members have been seized by the idea of a retreat, that it is necessary to retreat somewhere. This conception comes from my impressions, what I read and hear.” Pravda, Jan. 12, 1933.

289. Biulleten’ oppositsii, 29–30 (Sept. 1932): 1–5. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 298–9.

290. Biulleten’ oppositsii, 31 (Nov. 1932): 18–20. Trotsky’s prescriptions, dated Oct. 22, 1932, presaged Soviet policy in 1933: lowering capital investment and concentrating resources on bringing existing construction to completion. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 298–9.

291. Trotsky received the letter on Oct. 4, 1932: Trotsky archive, Harvard, T 4782; Davies, Crisis and Progress, 246–7, citing conversations with Pierre Broué, editor of Trotsky’s notebooks in French. In late Sept. 1932, the well-informed Menshevik émigré paper Socialist Herald carried word from Moscow of a “letter of the eighteen Bolsheviks” who united “former right and left oppositionists” around the imperative “to remove Stalin.” Sotsialisticheskii vestnik, Sept. 26, 1932 (report dated Sept. 7). In the Bulletin, Trotsky elaborated: “If the bureaucratic equilibrium in the USSR were to be upset at present, this would almost certainly benefit the forces of counterrevolution.” Deutscher, Prophet Outcast, 175.

292. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 167–8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 900, l. 33–4; op. 162, d. 13, l. 99–100); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 319 (APRE, f. 3, op. 57, d. 60, l. 10), 321–4 (l. 13–9). See also Solomon, Soviet Criminal Justice, 463. Stalin’s first meeting back in Moscow was on Aug. 27, 1932. Na prieme, 70. Insider theft would remain an obsession for Stalin. On Nov. 15, 1932, he sent politburo members the interrogation record of a collective farm bookkeeper, with a cover letter deeming it “one of many documents demonstrating the organized embezzlement of collective farm property.” Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 336–7 (APRE, f. 3, op. 57, d. 60, l. 29–34).

293. Tauger, who stresses the natural causes of the famine, carefully showed that the annual reports from the collective farms for 1932 implied an extremely low harvest, and that not only the official figure for the 1932 harvest but revised figures given by Davies and Wheatcroft were likely too high. Ultimately, the size of the 1932 harvest remains uncertain, but the annual report data from 40 percent of the collective farms—which are the only actual harvest data so far discovered—imply a harvest on the order of 50 million tons. Tauger, “1932 Harvest.” Davies and Wheatcroft estimate the 1932 harvest at 58–60 million, but that is based on pre-harvest forecasts. It should be noted, however, that Wheatcroft, who has rejected Tauger’s views, often stridently, subsequently allowed 50 million as the lower band of the estimate without then citing Tauger. Davies, Economic Transformation, 286 (56 million tons plus or minus 10 percent). The Five-Year Plan had originally envisioned a harvest by 1932 of 100–106 million tons; as late as July 1932, the harvest had been estimated at 76–78 million tons, better than in 1931, but in Sept. 1932 the estimates were reduced to 67–71 million. Revised estimates conducted in early 1933 would put the figure between 60 and 65 million; the final official figure, from politburo decision in Sept. 1933, was 69.87 million. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 443–6; Piatilietnyi plan, II/i: 298; Kosheleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 248–9 (Sept. 12, 1933); Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 234–5.

294. Tauger, “Natural Disaster,” 40–5.

295. Molot, Jan. 23, 1934; VIII Vsekazakhstanskaia kraevaiia konferentsiia VKP (b), 159. “The Ukrainian village was leading a nomad life,” in one official’s description of starving refugees, while the Kazakh steppe nomads were being forced into a sedentary life—which also spurred mass flight. Swaniewicz, Forced Labor, 121 (citing a statement to the author in 1933 from an unnamed Central European Communist who had just escaped the USSR). In Aug. 1932, the head of the Kazakhstan Council of People's Commissars wrote that "the administrative transformation of semi-desert livestock districts into 'agricultural' districts has had a ruinous effect on livestock farming," Aldazhumanov et al., Nasil'stvennaia kollektivizatsiia, 155.

²⁹⁶ Uraz Isaev (b. 1899), an ethnic Kazakh and chair of the autonomous republic's Council of People's Commissars, estimated 10,000 to 15,000 human deaths in spring 1932. Ābdīraīfymūly et al., Golod v kazakhskoi stepi, 140–51 (APRK, f. 141, op. 17, d. 607, l. 1–14); Aldazhumanov et al., Nasil'stvennaia kollektivizatsiia, 153–162; Partiinaia zhizn' Kazakhstana, 1990, no. 6: 83–9.

²⁹⁷ Kuramysov, Na putiakh sotsialisticheskogo perestroistva kazakhskogo ayla, 3–4; Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 324 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 13, l. 113–7). Turar Ryskulov, a vice chairman of the Council of People's Commissars of the RSFSR, to protest courageously but vainly to Stalin (Sept. 29) that the settlement mania exhibited "ignorance of the interests of livestock in districts that were mainly livestock districts." Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 503–9 (RGASPI, f. 82, op. 2, d. 670, l. 11–14ob.); Partiinaia zhizn' Kazakhstana, no. 10 (1990): 76–84; Ryskulov, Sobranie sochinenii, III: 304–16 (APRK, f. 141, op. 1, d. 6403, l. 13–6). Kazakh nomads were driven into farming partly by impoverishment, not solely by the regime's organized sedentarization. Of course, coercive collective farming was not the only farming option those people would have wanted.

²⁹⁸ Pianciola, "Famine in the Steppe," 184 (citing GARF, f. 6985, op. 1, d. 9, l. 2). Livestock allowances would be increased on Dec. 19, 1934. Pianciola, "Collectivization Famine," at 244 (citing Kazakhstanskaia pravda, Dec. 20, 1934; GARF, f. 6985, op. 1, d. 9, l. 133); Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 183–4 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 13, l. 113–7, 118).

²⁹⁹ Khatayevich wrote on Sept. 22, 1932; he had been in Stalin's office on Sept. 1, 2, and 14. Na prieme, 70–1. On Oct. 23, Kosior wrote to Stalin that Khatayevich "acted incorrectly, doing all this without an agreement with me" (again, the letter is underlined through and through in red pencil), and assured the dictator that the grain still might be procured, and that "the weather right now in the south of Ukraine, even in the Right Bank, is exceptionally fine," and "the mood of the mass of collective farms is also not bad." Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 187–91 (APRF, f. 3, op. 40, d. 82, l. 136–40), 192–5 (l. 132–5). Khatayevich wrote to Stalin again, at length (Dec. 27, 1932), declaring how hard he was working for the cause, and requesting new party personnel for localities in Ukraine immediately. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 224 (APRF, f. 3, op. 40, d. 85, l. 88–94).

³⁰⁰ In normal times, Ukraine and the North Caucasus produced perhaps one-third of the country's harvest and half its marketable grain. Conquest, Harvest of Sorrow, 221 (no citation).

³⁰¹ Davies et al., Economic Transformation, 316 (table 48). See also Lewin, Making of the Soviet System (1985), 166–7. The 1932 grain procurement plan had been based upon an assumed harvest of 90 million tons, with planned collection of 29.5 million tons—5 million more than the previous year—and export of 6.235 million.

³⁰² VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1933), II: 747–61; VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1936), II: 669. Pravda (Oct. 11, 1932) published the expulsion resolution and a list of the Ryutin group. Twenty Communists were expelled without recourse, and four others for a year, after which they could appeal for reinstatement.

³⁰³ Anfert'ev, "Delo M. N. Riutina v sud'be G. E. Zinovieva i L. B. Kameneva, oktiabr' 1932 g.," Istoricheskiĭ arkhiv, 2006, no. 1: 73, 80; "O dele tak nazvaemogo 'Soiuza Marksistov-Leninistev,'" 107. All during the summer of 1932, the politburo had been mulling over proposals by the light industry commissar (I. E. Lyubimov) to allow state industrial enterprises to sell their above-plan output on the open market, but now, after Stalin's return to the capital from holiday, the idea was turned aside. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 188–90 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 740, l. 76–81), 190n6 (f. 17, op. 3, d. 887, l. 7; d. 891, l. 4; d. 895, l. 3; d. 903, l. 15; Oct. 16, 1932). Stalin did not seek Ryutin's execution. Rees, "Stalin as Leader, 1924–1937," 45. On Dec. 14, 1933, both Zinoviev and Kamenev would be reinstated in the party.

³⁰⁴ Serge, Portrait de Staline, 95; Basseches, Stalin, 188. See also Letter of an Old Bolshevik; Krivitsky, I Was Stalin's Agent, 203; and Serge, Memoirs of a Revolutionary, 259.

³⁰⁵ Pravda, Oct. 14, 1932. "Ryutin in prison!" recalled Ante Ciliga (b. 1898), a Yugoslav-born inmate and fervent Trotsky supporter. "The prison received Ryutin coldly but calmly," (Ryutin was soon transferred.) Ciliga noted that it had been arduous trying to follow political events in the Soviet Union while at liberty, "but to be among two hundred prisoners representing . . . all the shades of opinion that are to be found in the immense country that is Russia—that was a precious privilege which allowed me to acquire a full knowledge of Russian political life in all its aspects.” He called the prison groupings “truly an illegal parliament.” Ciliga, Russian Enigma, 228, 209–10. Ciliga would become an ardent supporter of the Croatian Ustaše fascist regime, criticizing Ante Pavlečić as too soft.

306. Radzinsky, Stalin, 274 (no citation). See also Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 361–3 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 11, d. 1264, l. 1–3).

307. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 223.

308. “My dear child Ioseb, first of all I greet you with great love and wish you a long life and good health together with your family. Child, I ask nature to give you complete victory and annihilation of the enemy. . . . Be victorious!” Rayfield, Stalin and His Hangmen, 7 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 721, l. 68). This letter is absent from Murin.

309. Murin, Stalin v ob’iatiakh, 1–19 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1549, l. 1–2, 13–4, 15–6, 19–20, 21–2, 23–4, 36–7, 38–9, 41–2, 43–4, 45–6, 51–2, 53–4, 55–6, 59–60, 72–3, 61–3, 64–5).

310. Murin, Stalin v ob’iatiakh sem’i, 16 (Dec. 22, 1931).

311. Alliluyeva, Dvadsat’ pisem, 71; MacNeal, “Stalin’s Family.” Nadya might have visited her sister Anna in Kharkov, in famine-stricken Ukraine, that fall.

312. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 41. Zubalovo consisted of different buildings, the largest was divided between Mikoyan’s large family and others; Stalin got the smaller (still ample) dacha. Also there were two servants’ buildings (Sergei Alliluyev built a machine shop in the servants’ block).

313. “Kirov and Molotov danced a Russian handkerchief dance with their partners,” Yekaterina Voroshilova would later recall. “Mikoyan hovered around Nadezhda Sergeyevna [Alliluyeva] and asked her to dance the lezginka with him. Mikoyan danced very quickly and with great energy. . . . Nadezhda Sergeyevna was timid and shy, just as she always was. She covered her face with her hand.” Voroshilova’s husband danced the Ukrainian hopak and then a polka (“he was particularly good at it”). Kun, Stalin, 226 (citing RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 42: diary written 1950s).

314. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 786, l. 123–4 (July 10, 1932). At the same time, Galina Serebryakova (the third and final wife of Sokolnikov) saw Nadya in 1932 waiting at a bus stop jammed with people at the corner of Vozdvizhenka and Mokhovaya. Serebriakova, “Smerch,” 253–4. According to Kamenev’s daughter-in-law Galina Kravchenko, Nadya went to church; no other source confirms this. Vasil’eva, Kremlevskie zheny, 156.

315. Deviatov et al., Blizhniaia, 48 (citing family archive of A. N. Shefov).

316. One fellow student recalled her as full of life and sparkle that Nov. 1932; his account portrays her marriage to Stalin as widely known. Tokaev, Betrayal of an Ideal, 160–1. Tokaev, an Ossetian born (1909) Gokhi Tokati, studied at a Moscow military academy and would seize a chance to defect on a trip to Germany in 1947.

317. “In Moscow I determinedly try not to have anything to do with anyone,” she had written to Maria Svanidze (“Auntie Marusya”), back in 1926. “Sometimes it is strange: so many years not to have acquaintances, close friends. But that obviously depends on character.” Nadya added that she felt closer to the non-party people. “The many new prejudices are terrible. If you don’t work, you’re a ‘hussy’ [‘baba’].” She insisted: “It’s absolutely necessary to have a profession, so that you don’t have to be a gopher for anybody, as normally happens in secretarial work.” RGASPI, f. 44, op. 1, d. 1, l. 417; Montefiore, Court of the Red Tsar, 7; Radzinskii, Stalin, 297–8. Maria Svanidze (née Korona) had been born in Tiflis in 1899 of Jewish extraction, divorced in 1918, and three years later married Nadya’s brother Alexander “Alyosha” Svanidze. She studied at the conservatory in Georgia and in the 1920s sang in the Tiflis opera. See also RGASPI, f. 558, op. 4, d. 666.

318. Cherviakova, “Pesochnye chasy,” no. 5: 83. “In Iosif’s presence,” Gogua would later claim, “Nadya resembled the pitiful type [fakir] who in the circus walks barefoot on broken glass smiling at the public. . . . She never knew what would happen next, the next explosion. He was an utter boor. The only creature that softened him was Svetlana. . . . Vaska always annoyed him.” Gogua, “Semeinye istorii.” “Nadya repeatedly told me with a sigh,” wrote the defector Boris Bazhanov, who knew her in the 1920s. “He’s been silent for three days now. He speaks to no one, he does not respond when someone addressed him. He is a particularly difficult person.” Bazhanov, Vospominaniia, 154.

319. Svetlana claimed she had received only one letter from her mother, and it was a scolding. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 96. See also Sullivan, Stalin’s Daughter, 21 (citing interview with Chrese Evans, formerly Olga Peters), 27

(interview with Svetlana, London, 1994, Meryle Secrest Collection, audio recording, group 2, tape 28, HIA).

320. Kun, Stalin, 201 (citing interviews from the 1960s–70s with László Pollacsek). See also the hearsay in the secret police: Orlov, Secret History, 315, 318; Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 303–4.

321. Vladimir Alliluyev (son of Anna Alliluyeva and Redens) wrote that she suffered “ossification of the cranial sutures. The disease began to progress, accompanied by bouts of depression and headaches . . . She traveled to Germany for consultations with the leading German neuropathologists . . . Nadezhda threatened to commit suicide more than once.” Alliluev, Khronika odnoi sem'i, 30. Svetlana thought it was schizophrenia. There is hearsay that Nadya had an abortion at one point, causing gynecological complications. Montefiore, Court of the Red Tsar, 12.

322. Alliluev, Khronika odnoi sem'i, 33. See also Shatunovskaia, Zhizn' v Kremle, 188.

323. Murin, Iosif Stalin v ob'iatyakh, 15–6 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1549, l. 40–40ob.: March 12, 1931).

324. Kun, Stalin, 204 (citing RGASPI, f. 668, op. 1, d. 15).

325. Khrushchev, Vremia, ljudi, vlast': vosponinaniia, 4 vols. (Moscow: Novosti, 1999), I: 291–3. The defector Alexander Barmine claimed he saw her on Red Square the day before her death: he recalled her as looking exhausted. But others said she looked in good spirits. Barmine, One Who Survived, 63; Vasil'eva, Kremlevskie zheny, 197.

326. Na prieme, 78; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 45, l. 23; Aldazhumanov et al., Nasil'stvennaia kollektivizatsiia, 193–4 (APRK, f. 141, op. 1, d. 5235, l. 139–40). On Oct. 22, Stalin had sent commissions headed by Molotov to Ukraine and by Kaganovich to the North Caucasus for ten days, to break “the kulak sabotage.” Oskolkov, Golod 1932/1933, 26–8 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 904, l. 11); Sheboldaev, Doklad, 11; Na prieme, 77.

327. Vladimir Alliluyev recalled that Stalin and Nadya had gone to the Bolshoi together and fought there, but Stalin's office logbook seems to preclude theater attendance that particular night before the banquet. Alliluev, Khronika odnoi sem'i, 25.

328. Radzinsky, Stalin, 287 (quoting an interview with Nadezhda Stalin, daughter of Vasily Stalin and Galina Burdonskaya).

329. Rybin, Stalin v Oktiabre, 20; Vasilieva, Kremlin Wives, 103–11. Druzbbha narodov, 1997, no. 5: 83 (Lyola Treshtsalina, of the protocol department). Vlasik later told Khrushchev (who was not present at the banquet) that Stalin left for a tryst with Feodosiya Drabkina-Guseva, a woman of Jewish extraction and the wife of the commander Yakov Drabkin (known as Sergei Gusev).

330. Orange peel as the item: Alliluev, Khronika odnoi sem'i, 25 (based on the hearsay of his grandmother Olga Evgenevna). A piece of bread as the item, according to Molotov: “Stalin made a tiny ball of bread and, in front of everyone, threw it at Yegorov's wife.” That act, Molotov claims, triggered Nadya's departure from the banquet. Chuev, Sto sorok, 250. Svetlana's version largely adheres to Molotov's, but also has Stalin proposing a toast to “the destruction of enemies of state,” and rudely reprimanding Nadya for not drinking. Polina observed that Nadya was “perfectly calm” at their parting back at her own apartment. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 108–10. Most scholars follow this account: Radzinskii, Stalin, 287–9; Montefiore, Court of the Red Tsar, 3–22; Service, Stalin, 292–3.

331. Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 173–4. Stalin supposedly said, “Let her go.” Shatunovskaia, Zhizn' v Kremle, 196–7.

332. Svetlana's account—that Til ran to fetch Bychkova and the two hoisted Nadya's body onto the bed—is an obvious impossibility because Svetlana, and hence Bychkova, were at the Sokolovka dacha that night. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 109 (citing much later discussions with Bychkova). Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 117; Vasilieva, Kremlin Wives, 67.

333. Secret report of Dr. Kushner: “There is a five millimeter hole over the heart—an open hole. Conclusion: Death was immediate from an open wound to the heart.” GARF, f. 7523, op. 149, d. 2, l. 1–6. Montefiore, Court of the Red Tsar, 16.

334. At her seventh birthday, following her mother's death, Svetlana was said to have asked what present her mother had sent from Germany. If so, this implies she had not seen the open coffin, as she later claimed. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 37; “Priemsh vozhdia,” Moskovskii komсомоlets, Aug. 3, 2004; Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 111–3. See also Sullivan, Stalin's Daughter, 54 (citing Artyom Sergeyev in Krem'l'-9 writers, Svetlana Stalina: Escape from the Family).

335. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 39.

336. Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 173–4.

337. For eight days running, Pravda published obituaries attributed to Voroshilov's wife, Molotov's wife, Orjonikidze's wife, Postyshev's wife, as well as Mikoyan, Kaganovich, and others. The obituary published in Pravda (Nov. 10, 1932) was signed by Yekaterina Voroshilova, Polina Zhemchuzhina, Zinaida Orjonikidze, Dora Khazan, Maria Kaganovich, Tatyana Postysheva, and Aikhen Mikoyan. Izvestiya (Nov. 11) published Demyan Bedny's poem "Death Has Its Severe Guile." On Nov. 16, Pravda published a letter of grief from Krupskaya to Stalin.

338. No suicide note has turned up. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 112–3. See also Sullivan, Stalin's Daughter, 50–1 (citing interview with Alexander Alliyuev). The funeral commission consisted of Yenukize (chairman), Pauker, Dora Khazan, Kaganovich, Peterson, and Ruben. GARE, f.7523c, op. 149a, d. 2, l. 10–1.

339. Pravda, Nov. 10, 1932; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 4, d. 666 (Alisa Radchenko). Radzinsky quotes Nadya's medical file, without citation, from Aug. 1932: "acute pains in the abdominal region—return for further examination in 2–3 weeks' time." Another entry, the last: "August 31, 1932. Examination to consider operation in 3–4 weeks." Radzinsky, Stalin, 292. The medical file is RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1551. Dr. Boris Zbarsky prepared the body for the lying in state (he had mummified Lenin in 1924) and, many years later, is said to have told a friend he covered over a temple wound (rather than a shot to the heart). Kanel, "Vstrecha na lubianke," 495. Khrushchev recalled that Kaganovich summoned the Moscow party apparatchiks the day after the parade and informed them that Nadya had died suddenly, offering no explanation. Kaganovich summoned the same officials a day or two later, according to Khrushchev, and said, "Stalin has ordered me to tell you that Alliluyeva did not just die; she shot herself." The implication: it was a traitorous act. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 52–3.

340. Kuusinen, Rings of Destiny, 91–3. The author, the wife of a Comintern official, worked in the organization from 1924 through 1933.

341. Kozlov, Neizvestnaia Rossiia, IV: 172 (Solovyov); Medvedev, "Smert' Nadezhdy Alliluevoi"; Alliluyeva, Tol'ko odin god, 127. By some accounts, Stalin had his trusted minion Mekhlis "investigate" the circumstances of Nadya's death to clear him of rumored responsibility for shooting her. Seleznev, Tainy rossiiskoi politiki XX veka.

342. Barmine, One Who Survived, 264. Kaganovich had a sister named Rachel; she died in 1926; he had a niece named Rosa (born 1919).

343. Mironenko, Moskovskii krem'l', 184, 210; Larina, This I Cannot Forget, 141; Medvedev, Nikolai Bukharin, 39. "An almost indistinguishable door in the wall separated the dining room from Stalin's bedroom," one functionary noted. "A bed; two small armoires for underwear, coats, and a jacket; a sink." Shepilov, Kremlin's Scholar, 2. Stalin first moved to a two-story building (no. 6) closer to the Trinity Gate, the so-called cornered extension of the Amusement Palace, his fourth Kremlin apartment; he moved into the Imperial Senate after its refurbishment.

344. Sochineniia, XIII: 411 ("November 11, 1932, Stalin accompanied the casket with the body of N. S. Alliluyeva-Stalina to the Novodevichy cemetery"). According to Orlov, Stalin followed for only a few minutes, as far as the Manège (right outside the Kremlin), then got into a car with Pauker. Orlov, Secret History, 319–21. Rumors circulated that Stalin's brother-in-law and fellow Georgian Alexander Svanidze, who was around his height and had a mustache, substituted for him. Kolsenik, Khronika zhizni sem'i Stalina, 21.

345. Pravda, Nov. 13, 1932. "Everyone knows that some beings are as tender and delicate as flowers—she was one of them," Alexandra Kollontai, the daughter of a tsarist general and the erstwhile wife of another (before she left him), who served as Soviet envoy to Sweden, wrote ingratiatingly to Stalin of Nadya. "Those who knew her will treasure the beauties of her soul in their memories . . . Please remember that the Cause has need of you. Take care of yourself!" Kun, Stalin, 210 (citing RGASPI, f. 134, op. 3, d. 35).

346. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 39.

347. Kaganovich would recall that Stalin "was terribly down." Chuev, Kaganovich, Shepilov, 94. Svetlana recalled: "He said that he did not want to go on living. . . . [Stalin] was in such a state that they were afraid to leave him alone. He had sporadic fits of rage." Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 112; Richardson, Long Shadow, 129–30. "The children forgot her in a few days, but me she crippled for life," Stalin was later to have complained, according to Maria Svanidze, who blamed her. Murin, Iosif Stalin v obitatel'kh, 177 (May 9, 1935).

348. One of his bodyguards recalled late in life that Stalin would sit for long periods at Nadya's grave at Moscow's Novodevichy Cemetery. Svetlana asserted that her father never visited the grave. Stalin (film by Thames Television, London, 1990); Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 113. Some writers have asserted that a copy of Ryutin's appeal denouncing her husband was found in Nadya's room. Radzinsky, Stalin, 296 (quoting a Vlasik interview with N. Antipenko); Rayfield, Stalin and his Hangmen, 239–40.

349. Fridberg, “Gosudarstvennyye zagotovki,” 350.

350. Ken, “Moia ostenka byla slishkom rezko!”, I. V. Stalin i rekonstruktsiia RKKA,” 152n3 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 14, d. 754, l. 43–5; Jan. 1933).

351. Kuibyshev, back on Aug. 2, 1932, in a speech not covered by the press but published in 200,000 copies, had told Moscow party officials that peasants lacked incentives—so he knew the score. Kuibyshev, Uboroka, khlebozagotovki, i ukreplenie kollektivov: rech' na sobranii dokladchikov Moskovskoi partiinoi organizatsii (Moscow, 1932), reprinted in Kuibyshev, Stati i rech'i, V: 294–322; Davies, Crisis and Progress, 242. Ivnitsky points out that Stalin had denied he was forcing collectivization to solve the procurement problem; rather, Stalin claimed he was building socialism in the countryside. Ivnitskii, Kollektivizatsiia i raskulachivanie, 205.

352. Rees, Iron Lazar, 110, citing O kolkhoznom stroitel'stve (Moscow, 1932), 218; Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 520–1 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 21, d. 3377, l. 83), 575–7 (op. 3, d. 2025, l. 42–42ob.; Dec. 14, 1932); Graziosi, Soviet Peasant War, 67–8. “If one were to sack them one would have to sack half,” Kaganovich wrote to Stalin (Nov. 5) about the state farm directors. “We will have to remove some, and work on others. . . . Judges passed sentences, but no one carried them out. Clearly, in such a situation, they are mocking us.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 298–9 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 740, l. 177–80). About 26,000 of the 120,000 rural Communists in the North Caucasus would be purged; another 30,000 would quit rather than submit to the procedure. Shimotomai, “Note on the Kuban Affair”; O kolkhoznom stroitel'stve (Rostov, 1932), 281–3, 286–90.

353. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 769, l. 108. In the wake of the North Caucasus purge, party organizations in Kazakhstan and Ukraine requested permission to purge their ranks. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 26, d. 54, l. 265; Tauger, “People's Commissariat of Agriculture,” 298n99 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 907, l. 73/49–74/50).

354. Stalin also sent a secret telegram to OGPU plenipotentiaries to forward interrogation protocols on sabotage of grain procurement and embezzlement of collective farm property to “the Central Committee.” Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 201 (APRF, f. 3, op. 40, d. 84, l. 84; Nov. 29, 1932). Goloshchiokin replied immediately that severe repression was already under way, apologizing for not having informed Stalin earlier. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 197 (APRF, f. 3, op. 40, d. 83, l. 137), 198–9 (l. 138–138ob.).

355. Fitzpatrick, Stalin's Peasants, 74 (citing Sotsialisticheskoe zemledelie, Nov. 12, 16, 28, and Dec. 17, 1932).

356. Maximilien Savelev wrote the letter to Stalin (Nov. 19), indicating he had heard of the meeting from someone else (I. V. Nikolsky), a colleague of Eismont's. Savelev and Nikolsky co-signed a second letter to Stalin (Nov. 22) with new details. They quoted the drunk Eismont as stating, “What is to be done! Either comrade Stalin, or peasant uprisings.” According to the informant, “Smirnov said that one speech by Stalin at the congress of Agrarians Marxists in a few days brought to nothing the results of his [Smirnov's] three-year work to restore the herds.” Kozlov, Neizvestnaia Rossiia, I: 56–128 (at 66); Vatlin, Stenogrammy zasedanii politburo, III: 551–676 (at 642; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1011).

357. Mikoyan as well as Kirov, among others, inserted more fervid condemnations into the transcript when offered a chance to edit their remarks. Wynn, “Right Opposition,” 97–117. Stalin removed his heckling of Smirnov. The crisis atmosphere was well summarized by the émigré press: Sotsialisticheski vestnik, Nov. 26, 1932.

358. Serge, Portrait de Staline, 94–5. Serge gives no date for the rumored resignation, vaguely referring to a time after Nadya's suicide and before the 17th Party Congress. Serge was in Moscow then. Deutscher has Stalin asking to resign in late 1932. Deutscher, Stalin, 333–4.

359. He underscored the many nonaggression pacts as evidence of his success, asserting that capitalists do not sign such pacts with the weak, and once again blamed food difficulties on kulak saboteurs, their silent middle-peasant supporters, and soft (or worse) rural party officials. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1116, l. 141–2. See also Davies and Harris, Stalin's World, 52. Stalin's gloss on the countryside was fed back to him in the secret police reports. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, 446–52 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 43, l. 75–95), 472–6 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 10, d. 520, l. 699–708), and 488–9 (d. 514, l. 145–7).

360. Stalin demanded a “knockout blow” to any internal opposition. Vatlin, Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, 581 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1010); Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 557–561 (d. 1011, l. 9ob.-15). See also Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 187–8.

361. A Central Committee plenum (Jan. 1933) rubber-stamped the expulsions, and the reprimands to Tomsky, Rykov, and V. V. Schmidt (a Rykov associate) for encouraging anti-party work. KPSS v rezoliutsiakh (9th ed.), VI: 32–3.

362. Koenker et al., Revelations, 405–6 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 85, d. 379, l. 1, 1ob, 2); Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 202 (APRF, f. 3, op. 40, d. 84, l. 139). On Dec. 15, 1932, Stalin set up a separate agricultural department in the Central Committee apparatus and named Kaganovich responsible.

363. Haslam, Threat from the East, 8; Bridges, “Yoshizawa Kenkichi.” Alexander Troyanovsky (b. 1882) was the scion of lesser gentry, educated at the Mikhailov artillery school, and originally a Menshevik; during the NEP, he worked in trade before being appointed envoy to Japan in late 1927.

364. Izvestiia, Jan. 17, 1933; Tisminefs, Vneshniaia politika SSSR, III: 574–5.

365. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 910, l. 2. At this time the regime also tightened the screws by introducing political departments into the machine tractor stations and state farms. These would be announced at the Jan. plenum, when Stalin would blame failures of county party committees for forcing his hand. Zelenin, “Politotdely MTS,” 45; Shimotomai, “Springtime for the Polkitotdel,” 1034; Thorniley, Rise and Fall, 124–40.

366. Stalin received the OGPU’s Yagoda and Prokofyev that day. Na prieme, 83. Kirov at the OGPU jubilee stated, “It is necessary to say openly that the Cheka-GPU is an organ called to punish, and to simplify the matter, not just to punish but to punish in real fashion, so that population growth in the ‘other world’ will be duly noticed.” Pogonii, Lubianka, 200 (no citation).

367. Campbell, Russia, 13–8; Stalin, “Gospodin Kembel priviraet,” Bolshevik, 1932, no. 22: 1–16 (dated Dec. 23, 1932; published in the Nov. 30 issue). “He was very erect and alert, dressed in Russian costume, consisting of boots, breeches, and a white Russian shirt worn outside the trousers with a black belt,” Campbell wrote of Stalin, while recalling the presence of American-made typewriters and filing cabinets. Campbell claimed the audience with Stalin (Jan. 28, 1929) had taken place in the Kremlin but then wrote about ascending to the sixth floor (i.e., at Old Square). Campbell appears in Stalin’s office logbook as “Kellbell.” Na prieme, 30. In response to the condemnation, Campbell told a reporter, “I have a very high regard for Mr. Stalin,” adding, “I consider him a real leader and perhaps the only man who can bring that country out of its duress and turmoil.” Spokesman Review, Dec. 31, 1932. Trotsky seized upon the Campbell book: Biulleten’ oppositsii, no. 32 (Dec. 1932).

368. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 339–40 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 175, l. 9: Nov. 25, 1932); Sobranie zakonov, 1932, no. 84: article 516; Hoffman, Peasant Metropolis Social Identities, 52; Kessler, “Passport System.” From Jan. through April 1933, the state issued 6.6 million passports while denying 265,000 applications. Violations were rampant; the passports had no photographs.

369. Collective farmers living within 60 miles (100 km) of Moscow and Leningrad would be given passports, as an exception.

370. Zelenin, “O nekotorykh ‘belykh piatnakh,’” 14 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 26, d. 68, l. 1–9, 32, 35).

371. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 270.

372. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 134–5 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 750, l. 52, 54–6; op. 3, d. 913, l. 9); KPSS v rezoliutsiakh (9th ed.), VI: 18; Pravda, Jan. 13, 1933; VKP (b) v rezoliutsiakh (1933), II: 762–83.

373. “Itogi pervoi piatiletki: doklad 7 ianvaria 1933 g.,” Sochineniia, XII: 161–215. See also Kontorovich, “Military Origins.” On class struggle, Stalin had remarked in July 1928 that “as we move forward, the resistance of capitalist elements will grow, the class struggle will become sharper, and Soviet power, whose forces will grow even more, will carry out . . . a policy of suppression of the exploiter’s resistance.” Sochineniia, XI: 170–1. Trotsky in April 1918 had observed, “The further and the more the revolutionary movement develops, here and abroad, the more tightly the bourgeoisie of all lands will close ranks.” Volkogonov, Trotsky, 121–2 (citing Sochineniia, XVII/i: 205).

374. He added: “They are for the procurements, but they insist on creating all sorts of unnecessary reserves for animal husbandry, insurance,” which enabled them to steal socialist property. Sochineniia, XIII: 216–33 (at 229–30, 207–8); Kaganovich, “Tseli i zadachi,” 17, citing Stalin, Materialy ob’edinennogo plenuma TsK i TsKK VKP (b), 144.

Nikolai Krylenko reported to the plenum that 54,645 people in the RSFSR had been convicted under the law on theft of socialist property, leading to 2,100 executions. He complained of resistance to implementing the law: "One people's judge straight-out said to me: 'My hand will not rise to punish a person with ten years for stealing wisps of grain.'" Zelenin, Stalinskaia 'revoliutsiia sverkhu', 73–4, 126–7 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 514, l. 15–21). A Jan. 30, 1933, decree would extend application of the law to accounting fraud as well as wrecking or sabotage. Volin, "Agrarian Collectivism," 622. In a series of decrees, including on Jan. 19, 1933, the regime attempted to incentivize sowing and attain larger yields by shifting from confiscatory "grain procurement" to "compulsory delivery" in the form of a tax, which was to be levied not on harvest estimates but "from the land actually under cultivation." All surpluses above the obligations were supposed to remain at the disposal of the collective farmers, but the legalized peasant markets were supposed to be shut down until state taxes had been met. Kollektivizatsiia sel'skogo khoziaistva, 441–5.

375. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 514, vyp. 1, l. 55. Stalin had had Trotsky stripped of his citizenship on Feb. 20, 1932.

376. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror; 91–4 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 511, l. 12–22: typescript with Rudzutak's corrections), 95–7 (l. 215–20: typescript with Bukharin's corrections), 76–7 (l. 17–9: typescript with Smirnov's corrections). The plenum confirmed Smirnov's expulsion from the Central Committee, the expulsions from the party of Eismont and Tolmachev, and the reprimands for Tomsy and Rykov.

377. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 200 (RGAE, f. 8040, op. 8, d. 20, l. 25–25ob.); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 913, l. 15. The Ukrainian hierarchs, mimicking Stalin from the spring, decided the latest reduction had to be kept secret, lest grain procurement officials get demoralized.

378. Stalin had Levon Mirzoyan, an ethnic Armenian serving as second secretary of the Urals province, replace Goloshchyokin, who was sacked Jan. 21, 1933. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 914, l. 9. At the Jan. 1933 Central Committee plenum, Goloshchyokin had trumpeted Kazakhstan's supposed successes in collectivization in the face of unmitigated catastrophe. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 625–31 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 514, vyp. I, l. 190b.–210b., 430b.–440b.); Aldazhmanov et al., Nasil'stvennaia kollektivizatsiia, 202–4; Ryskulov, Sobranie sochinenii, III: 316–8, (APRK, f. 141, op. 1, d. 6403, l. 17).

379. One "Trotskyite," during his arrest, was pointedly noted to have been on the phone with Radek. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 388–9 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 139, l. 173–6).

380. From Jan. 1933, even formal politburo meetings would decline. Detailed politburo protocols were still compiled, as if Stalin's decisions and the ad hoc gatherings in his office constituted an official meeting. Adibekov et al., Politburo TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b): povestki dnia zasedanii, II: 386 ff.

381. Khromov, Po stranitsam, 23–4.

382. Special settlements in Kazakhstan and Western Siberia were ordered to prepare to receive up to 500,000 each: In the event, 133,000 were deported to Siberia during 1933, and a similar number to other remote destinations, for a total of 270,000 by year's end. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChk, 418 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 14, l. 96; March 20, 1933); Ellman, "Role of Leadership Perceptions," 831; Krasil'nikov, Serp i molokh, 95, 106, 110–26; Khlevniuk, History of the Gulag, 55–6, 63.

383. "Information has reached the Central Committee and the Council of People's Commissars about a mass exodus of peasants from the Kuban and Ukraine 'for grain' into the Central Black-Earth province, Volga, Moscow province, the Western province, Belorussia," the decree stated. "The Central Committee and Council of People's Commissars do not doubt that this peasant exodus, just as in the previous year from Ukraine, is organized by the enemies of Soviet power, the SRs and agents of Poland, with the aim of agitating 'through the peasants' in the northern regions of the USSR against collective farms and generally against Soviet power." The decree was composed in Stalin's hand; Molotov's signature on the original was absent. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 634–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 45, l. 109–109ob.), 635–6 (f. 17, op. 42, d. 80, l. 9–11), 636–8 (d. 72, l. 109–11), 638 (l. 113); Oskolkov, Golod 1932/1933, 19 (citing PARO, f. 79, d. 74, l. 40). Yevdokimov, in his report on implementation, tied peasant flight to rebellion, and noted how the heavy security police pressure was curbing the exodus. Stalin underlined these passages. By contrast, Balytsky, who gave exact numbers (31,963 people), observed that "in the majority of cases exodus is motivated by a search for earnings," that "only part of those leaving villages are bringing their families," and that "the exodus of collective farmers is of significantly less scope than that of individual farmers." Stalin did not underline any of these revealing passages. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 392–4 (APRF, f. 3, op. 30, d. 189, l. 3–10). On Feb. 16, 1933, a politburo decree ordered the OGPU to apply the Jan. 22 interdiction decree to the Lower Volga. Ivinskii, Golod 1932–1933 godoi, 269–70 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 45, l. 109).

384. The regime proved better able to block emigration to Poland and Romania than into China, Iran, and Afghanistan. Conquest, Harvest of Sorrow, 237, 246–47. On March 1, the politburo granted extrajudicial troikas in Belorussia powers of execution in “cases of counterrevolutionary organizations and groupings consisting of kulaks and White Guard elements.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 63 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 212, l. 1–2).

385. On Feb. 17, Yagoda reported the interdiction of 150,391 people across eight republics or regions, of whom 114,579 had been returned. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 397–8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 914, l. 1; op. 162, d. 14, l. 48, 51), 398–9 (APRF, f. 3, op. 30, d. 189, l. 26–7), 399–406 (d. 196, l. 127–38), 406–7 (d. 189, l. 36–6).

386. Pravda, Jan. 24, 1933.

387. Kosheleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 245; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 232.

388. In July 1932, the Nazi party had received 13.7 million votes, 37 percent, and won 230 seats, vs. 133 seats for the Social Democrats. (The July 1932 turnout was Weimar's largest, 84.1 percent.) In Nov. 1932, the Nazis dropped to 196 seats.

389. Orlow, History of the Nazi Party, II: 18–9. Nazi party membership, 25,000 in 1925 and around 2 million in 1933 when Hitler was made chancellor, would grow to 4.4 million by 1936, when membership requirements would be tightened. Over time, the Nazi party would become more proletarian; the Soviet party, less so. At the same time, Nazism enjoyed far stronger appeal in rural locales than the Soviet Community party did.

390. Jones, “Establishment of the Third Reich”; Jones, “Hindenburg and the Conservative Dilemma.” See also Turner, Hitler's Thirty Days to Power, 83–4.

391. Winkler, Weimar, 509. “I solemnly prophesy to you that this damnable man will plunge our Reich into the abyss and bring inconceivable misery down upon our nation,” General Ludendorff wrote to Hindenburg. “Coming generations will curse you on your grave because of this action.” Fest, Hitler, 411. Ludendorff had collaborated with Hitler in the lunatic Beer Hall putsch of 1923.

392. Turner, Hitler's Thirty Days to Power. The cabinet led by Hitler lacked a majority in the Reichstag, a fact von Papen concealed from Hindenburg. This was the third “presidential” cabinet in a row. See also Bracher, Die Auflösung der Weimarer Republik, 443–80; and Kershaw, Hitler: 1889–1936, 374–5, 413–25.

393. Beckles, “Hitler, the Clown.”

394. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, II/iii: 120–1 (Jan. 31, 1933).

395. Hoffmann, Hitler Was My Friend, 69; DBFP 2nd series, IV: 402; Francois-Poncet, Souvenirs, 70.

396. Fritzsche, Germans into Nazis.

397. Bessel, Political Violence, 76–7; Broszat, Der Staat Hitlers, 44.

398. The Center Party and the Bavarian People's Party had entertained the possibility of coalition government with the Nazis, whereas the Social Democrats, the only consistently unequivocal defenders of Weimar democracy, remained fixated on the letter of the law even though they had been victims of extra-constitutional maneuvers. The SPD opposed as demagoguery popular job-creation measures such as public works, which the Nazis strongly supported. Gates, “German Socialism.”

399. Geyer, “Etudes in Political History,” 101–23; Deist, Wehrmacht and German Rearmament.

400. Winkler, Der Weg, 444–5, 754. Even after the Nazis had come to power and decimated the German labor movement, the Comintern executive committee would continue to single out Social Democrats as “the main prop of the bourgeoisie also in the countries of open dictatorship.” McDermott and Agnew, Comintern, 112. See also Fischer, Stalin and German Communism; and Bahne, Die K.P.D.

401. Thälmann wrote to the Comintern (Jan. 27, 1933) that the Nov. 1932 election showed a crisis had overtaken the Nazi party, and some “petit-bourgeoisie” were moving to the antifascist camp, joining the working masses. (Not long thereafter, Thälmann, who had consistently called Nazism and Social Democracy “twins,” was arrested by the Nazis. He would spend eleven years in solitary confinement before being executed at Buchenwald.) Shirinia, Komintern v 1933

godu, 119 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 19, d. 248, l. 17–8). By contrast, the Comintern's Georgii Dimitrov was urging unification of Communists with Social Democrats in "antifascist actions." Sobolev, Georgii Dimitrov, 102–3; Leibzon and Shirinia, Povorot v politike kominterna, 50–7. See also von Rauch, "Stalin und die Machtergreifung Hitlers," 117–40.

402. This is the surmise of Tucker, Stalin in Power, 232.

403. A Nov. 1933 document, advanced at the next Comintern enlarged plenum, which could not be put forward without Stalin's approval, defined "fascism as the open terrorist dictatorship of the more reactionary, more chauvinistic and more imperialist elements of finance capital." Shirinia, Komintern v 1933 godu, 469–70 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 171, d. 38, l. 212; d. 299, l. 103; d. 301, l. 4; op. 19, d. 248, l. 222); Ferrara and Ferrara, Conversando con Togliatti.

404. DGFP, series C, I: 464; G. Castellán, "Reichswehr et Armée Rouge," in La Relation Germano-Soviétiques de 1933 a 1939, 248; F. L. Carsten, The Reichswehr and Politics, 360; A. E. Ioffe, Vneshniaia politika Sovetskogo Soiuza, 1928–1932, 267.

405. Sluch, "Germano-sovetskie otnosheniia," 105 (citing AVP RF, f. 05, op. 13, pap. 91, d. 28, l. 189). On Jan. 23, 1933, days before Hitler's formal ascension, in his speech on foreign affairs, Molotov declared that "of all the countries that have diplomatic relations with us, with Germany we have had and have the strongest economic relations." The many Jewish diplomats in Soviet service distinguished between the fascist Mussolini—with whom the Soviets enjoyed amicable relations—and Nazism. DVP SSSR, XVI: 50–6; III sessiia TsIK SSSR 6–ogo sozyva: stenograficheskii otchet, 23–30 inavaria 1933 g., biulleten' no.1, 37–43; Dullin, Men of Influence, 93 (citing internal Soviet diplomatic correspondence referring to Mein Kampf).

406. Sluch, "Germano-sovetskie otnosheniia," 105 (citing AVP RF, f. 05, op. 13, pap. 91, d. 28, l. 90–1). Foreign Minister Neurath was not a Nazi. Neither was Germany's ambassador to Moscow, Dirksen, who assured the foreign affairs commissariat that Hitler's and Rosenberg's public statements "contain no real political significance" and that "real state policy will quickly compel the Nazis to forget about their previous plans." Sluch, "Germano-sovetskie otnosheniia," 105 (citing AVP RF, f. 05, op. 13, pap. 91, d. 28, l. 206).

407. Goebbels convinced Hitler to make May 1, 1933, a paid holiday ("Germany honors labor"). As workers marched from factories through the capital to the parade grounds at Tempelhof, airplanes flew in formation overhead, and radio loudspeakers broadcast songs about miners, farmers, and soldiers. In the evening, Hitler addressed workers as patriots responsible for Germany's industrial might. "The biggest demonstration of all times," noted the Berliner Morgenpost, a leftist newspaper. The grandiose Nazi initiative had elicited the support of the socialist Free Trade Unions, but on May 2 Nazi storm troopers assaulted them. Fritzsche, Life and Death, 46–7. A decade later Goebbels would reminisce that "only then was the National Socialist state on stable foundations." Fröhlich, Die Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, teil II, VIII: 197 (May 2, 1943).

408. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 207–9.

409. Pravda, Feb. 18, 1933; Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoï derevni, III: 21. Rees, Iron Lazar, 113. At the gathering land commissar Yakovlev painted a more truthful, grim picture of collective farm operation from observations in Odessa province. Pravda, Feb. 19, 1933. Kaganovich had returned to the North Caucasus in late Jan. 1933, and reported cases of cannibalism but also of feigned starvation and "vicious terror" against the regime. He would go to his grave without acknowledging the tragedy. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoï derevni, III: 639 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 215, l. 74); "Dve besedy s L. M. Kaganovichem."

410. Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd kolkhoznikov-udarnikov, 66–7.

411. Pravda, Feb. 23, 1933, Sochineniia, XIII: 236–56 (at 251–2).

412. Sochineniia, XIII: 246–7. Oja, "From Krestianka to Udarnitsa." Officially, only 15.25 million households were collectivized as late as mid-1933. Kolkhozy vo vtoroi, 1.

413. The arsonist confessed and claimed to have acted alone. German Communists alleged the Nazis had set him to the task to justify a premeditated anti-Communist repression. In fact, Nazi higher-ups appear to have been panicked the night of the fire. Mommsen, "Reichstag Fire," 129–222; Kershaw, Hitler: 1889–1936, 456–8, 731–2. There is one eyewitness account, by a journalist of the London Daily Express: Delmer, "Reichstag Fire."

414. Kershaw, “Hitler Myth,” 52–3. The Communists, despite the terror, still won 12.3 percent, but Hitler now banned the party by decree. The Social Democrats won 18.3 percent. Turnout was a record 88.8 percent.

415. Germany’s constitutional court accepted the validity of the Enabling Act. Bracher, German Dictatorship, 224. See also Broszat, Der Staat Hitlers, 117.

416. Mommsen, “Der Reichstagbrand.” See also Kershaw, “Hitler Myth,” 54–6.

417. The consul had just seen the body of a man flayed alive. Larson, In the Garden of Beasts, 5 (citing the Messersmith Papers).

418. “Germany,” he had warned in Mein Kampf; in his typical inversion, “is the next great objective of Bolshevism.” Hitler, Mein Kampf, 750–1. See also Thies, Architekt der Weltherrschaft.

419. Hitler had not tried to block a special bridge credit of 140 million reichsmarks by Dresdner and Deutsche banks (Feb. 23, 1933). The refinancing alleviated pressure on the Soviets, who owed Germany 1.2 billion marks, of which 700 million was due. (By Dec. 1934, the debt would amount to 250 million.) Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 283–7. Hitler also modified the 1931 protocol extending the 1926 Berlin Treaty to the Reichstag for ratification on May 5, 1933. DGFP series C, I: 91–3n7, 355–8 (April 28), 385–9 (May 5); von Dirksen, Moscow, Tokyo, London, 122; Niclauss, Die Sowjetunion, 87–8.

420. Between April 30 and May 4, 1933, the editor of the semiofficial Gazeta Polska, Bogusław Miedziński, visited Moscow as a back channel contact; Radek reciprocated to Warsaw, July 6–22, under the pretext of visiting his mother. Radek’s report: “Polish-Soviet Rapprochement” (July 26, 1933): AVP RF, f. 010, op. 7, d. 12, l. 71–81. The Nazi ideologue Alfred Rosenberg traveled to Britain in May 1933 to gin up support against the Communist menace, Kommunisticheskii International, 1933, no. 12: 14–20.

421. Shirinia, Komintern v 1933 godu, 141–2 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 25, d. 237, l. 69, 79–80; d. 233, l. 69–80). German Communist party turnover was high: Up to three-quarters of the members were unemployed and therefore unconnected to factories. Bahne, “Die Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands,” 662; Grebing, Geschichte der deutschen Arbeiterbewegung, 310.

422. Firsov, “Stalin i Komintern,” 10; Shirinia, Komintern v 1933 godu, 169–77 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 18, d. 963, l. 134–5, 182). By late 1933, the number of legal Communist parties would dwindle to sixteen, from a peak of seventy-two; another seven were semilegal.

423. Robert Tucker held Stalin “chiefly responsible” for the failure of the German Communists and Social Democrats to work together in a united front of the left against Hitler, but did not explain how the two leftist parties would have reconciled in Stalin’s absence. Winkler argued that “the gulf between the two workers’ parties became so deep . . . that a common unified front was no longer imaginable.” Tucker, Stalin in Power, 225–32; Winkler, Der Weg, 864.

424. Ivnitskii, “Golod 1932–1933 gg.: kto vinovat?,” 36. Davies and Wheatcroft estimate perhaps as many as 70 million lived in regions affected by famine, even excluding the Urals, Siberia, and the Far East. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 411.

425. Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 47.

426. Ivnitskii, “Golod 1932–1933 godov: kto vinovat?,” 61 (citing the politburo archive without details). Peasants from “surplus” population regions were being forcibly resettled to ghost villages of the North Caucasus and elsewhere as well. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 428 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 929, l. 133, op. 162 d. 15, l. 100–1; GARF, f. 5446, op. 1, d. 470, l. 179–80). On March 17, 1933, the regime sought to restrict seasonal labor migration, requiring collective farm permission for exit and threatening food denial to “flitters who leave before the sowing and return for the harvest.” Pravda, March 20, 1933.

427. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 254–65 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 11, d. 960, l. 1–12).

428. Maksudov, “Geografiia goloda 1933 goda”; Maksudov, “Ukraine’s Demographic Losses,” 27–43.

429. On March 15, Kosior sent a long report to Stalin from Ukraine begging for more tractors and food aid of not less than 36,000 tons. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 304–17 (APRF, f. 3, op. 61, d. 794, l. 73–86). Ryskulov noted, correctly, that “the situation that has taken shape right now in Kazakhstan . . . cannot be found in any other territory or republic.” He even wrote that because of the previous local party leadership group, “it was forbidden officially to say (even in Alma-Ata, where Kazakh corpses were collected from the streets), that there was famine and deaths therefrom. More than that, local functionaries were not bold enough to admit that livestock had declined.” Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 204–25 (GARF, f. R-5446, op. 27, d. 23, l. 245–53); Ryskulov, Sobranie sochinenii, III: 320–48 (APRK, f. 141, op. 1, d. 6403, l. 138–46). See also Aldazhumanov et al., Nasil'stvennaia kollektivizatsiia, 220–3 (APRK, f. 141, op. 1, d. 5287, l. 33–8); Āldiraıymūly et al., Golod v kazakhskoi stepi, 166–7 (APRK, f. 141, op. 1, d. 6403, l. 37), 196–200; Werth, “La famine au Kazakhstan”; and Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 687–91 (RGASPI, f. 112, op. 47, d. 7, l. 26, 269–83; Dec. 23, 1933).

430. Stragglers were congregating near factories, according to Molchanov, and knocking on the doors of workers begging (“‘Help me, I was fired without cause.’ ‘Help me, I am a starving unemployed”). Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 298–303 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 11, d. 56, l. 11–6). Khatayevich, in Dnepropetrovsk, reported (March 15, 1933) that “in reality there are no bazaars,” meaning no way to supplement rations. Golod 1932–33 rokiv na Ukraini, 465–7.

431. Rudich, Holod 1932–1933 rokiv na Ukraini, 409 (March 5, 1933), 433–7 (March 12), 480–1 (April 1); Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 240 (RGAE, f. 8040, op. 8, d. 25, l. 32–5; March 22, 1933). “Citizenness Gerasimenko ate the corpse of her dead sister,” noted a March 1933 report from the North Caucasus for the OGPU higher-ups. “Citizen Doroshenko, after the death of his father and mother, was left with infant sisters and brothers, ate the flesh of his brothers and sisters when they died of hunger.” OGPU operatives appended many names of hardworking farmers who had died of starvation. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 648–9 (TsA FSB, f. 4, op. 11, d. 42, l. 62–4; March 7, 1933), 662–5 (f. 2, op. 11, d. 42, l. 113–6; April 3, 1933).

432. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 363–64 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 11, d. 42, l. 149–50; North Caucasus, March 21, 1933), 422–4 (d. 551, l. 36–8; March 31, 1933).

433. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 527–8 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 10, d. 514, l. 234–6; Nov. 5, 1932), 661–2 (op. 11, d. 42, l. 101–3; April 1, 1933).

434. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 644–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 741, l. 3). That March of 1933, Trotsky, from Turkey, sought to reconcile himself with Stalin, pledging readiness to “enter into preliminary negotiations without any publicity.” Stalin might have played along, trying to lure him back to Moscow, but, whether from distraction or other causes, appears not to have tried. In summer 1933, Trotsky would accept an offer of asylum in France, although he would not be allowed to settle in Paris. Petrement, Simone Weil: A Life, 189–91.

435. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 206, 420 (RGAE, f. 8040, op. 8, d. 25, l. 32–5; March 22, 1933).

436. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 330–1 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 918, l. 1, 18–19, 23–4).

437. This was part of a re-registration of weapons Union-wide. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChk, 419 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 14, l. 96–7).

438. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 192–4 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 907, l. 58–60; Voroshilov to Gamarnik, from Sochi, Dec. 7, 1932), 196–7 (d. 38, l. 80; Dec. 17, 1932), 213 (d. 43, l. 60–3).

439. The year before, Kopelev had fallen in love with the daughter of a specialist accused of being a Polish spy in the Shakhly case (Iu. N. Matov), who was sentenced to death but received a reprieve. Kopelev, I sotvoril sebe kumira, 234.

440. Kopelev, “Last Grain Collections (1933),” 224–86. The official was Roman Terekhov. He would survive and, after Stalin’s death, recall the following rebuke in late 1932: “We’ve been told that you, Comrade Terekhov, are a good speaker. It seems that you are a good storyteller—you have made up quite a good fable about famine, thinking to frighten us, but it won’t work! Wouldn’t it be better for you to quit the post of provincial party secretary and the Ukrainian Central Committee and join the Writers’ Union? Then you can write your fables, and fools will read them.” Medvedev, Let History Judge, 241 (citing Pravda, May 26, 1964); Zelenin, “O nekotorykh ‘belykh piatnakh,’” 15–6.

441. Kotkin, Magnetic Mountain, 198–237.

442. One contemporary described Postyshev as “tall and thin as a lath, with a grating bass voice. No fool . . . but careless of others’ feelings.” Tokaev, Betrayal of an Ideal, 166. Conspicuously, Postyshev had told the Jan. 1933 Central Committee plenum that “it is not good hiding behind the back of the kulak, even more so when his back is not as wide as before,” warning “we will not change the situation like that” and urging plenum attendees to get better at administration of the large-scale, complex economy. Zelenin, “Politordely MTS,” 53. In March 1933, two months after Postyshev’s arrival and one month after the appointment of Balytsky as NKVD plenipotentiary in Ukraine, Mykola

Skrypnyk had been sacked as the republic's education commissar. On July 7, 1933, vilified at the Ukrainian politburo by Postyshev for "counterrevolutionary nationalism," Skrypnyk would go home to his apartment in Kharkov and take his own life rather than politically recant. Corbett, "Rehabilitation of Mykola Skrypnyk."

443. Kopelev managed to transfer to Moscow University, where he did German studies. He would be expelled from the Communist Youth League for ties to Trotskyites.

444. Kopelev, Education of a True Believer, 11–2. See also Crossman, God That Failed, 43, 53 (Koestler). Kopelev's father, an agronomist, raged at him, the "editor-philosopher," who had seized starving peasants' grain. Their argument dissolved in drunken tears. Kopelev regarded his father as "a conscientious specialist, but a limited, vacillating philistine, weighed down with old Socialist Revolutionary prejudices."

445. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 423 (citing TsDAGOU, f. 1, op. 20, d. 6275, l. 225: Kharkov, May 30, 1933).

446. Sholokhov largely blamed regional officialdom, but he also called what he saw "not individual instances of excesses," but "the 'method' of carrying out grain procurements." On July 4, 1933, the politburo would hear Shkiryatov's report on "excesses" in Veshensk county, after which the second secretary, the plenipotentiary for grain collections, and others were transferred elsewhere, but not arrested. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 717 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 2035, l. 4), 717–20 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 827, l. 1–22), 720–1 (f. 17, op. 3, d. 2040, l. 5–6); "Sholokhov i Stalin: perepiska nachala 30-x godov"; Pravda, March 10, 1964; Murin, Pisatel' i vozhd', 28–58, 68, 145–7.

447. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 429–35 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 171, l. 91–101). Whereas in 1932, 3,889 "socially alien elements" were removed from the ranks, the number jumped to 22,308 in 1933. There would be more than 20,000 arrests in 1933 in the army of spies and wreckers. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKK, 49–51. Stalin had told the Central Committee (May 2, 1933) that "the Russian nation is the most talented nation in the world," a long-standing theme of his, but also that "the peasant [muzhik]" had to be taught "not to oppose his interests to the state," not to live in the past, for "the old must die out." Stalin's approach to the village rested largely on his view of the Russian peasant (muzhik), rather than the Ukrainian peasant or Kazakh nomad. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1117, l. 10, 11, 14, 23.

448. On April 24, 1933, the Japanese ambassador to Moscow (Ota) inquired of Karakhan about purchasing the Chinese Eastern Railway, and on May 2 the Soviets agreed to negotiations quickly, but the Kwantung Army had no intention of buying what they could seize, the NKVD reported to Stalin. DVP SSSR, XVI: 831–2 n114; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 83, l. 39. Litvinov favored a sale, to take the wind out of the sails of the pro-war party in Tokyo, while Karakhan viewed such an act as an invitation to Japanese aggressors to increase their demands; Stalin backed Litvinov. Izvestiya, May 1 and 12, 1933; DVP SSSR, XIII: 736–42, XIV: 320 (May 7, 1931), 786–9n76, 533–5, 544–8; XV: 790–1n229, 794n245; XVI: 831–2n114, 115.

449. Japanese Interior Minister Goto Shinpei had characterized the United States as "a great hypocritical monster clothed in justice and humanity." Toozee, Deluge, 143. Japan formally quit the League on March 27, 1933. Burkman, Japan and the League of Nations. Eight days before Japan withdrew, Mussolini announced a desire to create a "four-power pact" between Britain, France, Italy, and Germany to arbitrate European and world affairs in place of the League. It was classic nineteenth-century balance of power, imagining Italy as one of the powers. A diluted version amounting to nothing was signed in Rome on July 15, 1933. Jaurusch, Four Power Pact.

450. International Military Tribunal for the Far East (Tokyo: 1946–48), exhibit 193; Crowley, Japan's Quest for Autonomy, 185.

451. Harris, "Encircled by Enemies," 534 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 39/5c, l. 2–21, 76–82, 109–116).

452. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 185, l. 97–102.

453. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 791, l. 33–8; Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 235–6 (RGASPI, f. 667, op. 1, d. 17, l. 38–9; Karakhan to Yenukidze, June 4, 1933); DVP SSSR, XVI: 837–8.

454. Kuznetskii [pseudonym], "Kakov smysl tokiiskikh peregovorov o prodazhe KVZhD," Bol'shevik, 1933, no. 14: 65–71.

455. The pair wrote disapprovingly that collective farm chairmen and county and district plenipotentiaries were being arrested “according to the rule: ‘first arrest, then figure it out.’” Their directive also set an upper limit of inmates for the Union, excluding labor camps and colonies, of 400,000—half the number then imprisoned. (Another 500,000 were in camps.) Afanas’ev et al., Istoria stalinskogo Gulaga, I: 609. Krylenko reported (July 19, 1933) the prison population to Stalin and Molotov as 397,284, so on paper the objective was met, in very short order. Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 87 (citing GARF, f. R-5446, op. 15a, d. 1073, l. 35).

456. Goliakov, Sbornik dokumentov po istorii ugovornogo zakonodatel’sтва SSSR, 335–6 (May 8, 1933); Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 746–50 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 981, l. 229–38); Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 63; Fainsod, Smolensk under Soviet Rule, 185–8; Krasil’nikov, Serp i molokh, 94–107; Khlevniuk, History of the Gulag, 54–82. In the military, too, arrests were being made by anyone. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 62. Stalin wrote in notes to himself (May 13, 1933): “(1) Who can arrest? (2) What to do about the former White military people in our economic organs? (3) decrease the prison population in a lawful way (by accelerating cassation) (what to do about quarantine) (accelerate the work of courts). (4) What to do about different groups of arrested people? (5) allow expulsion, deportation?” RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 27, l. 69. See also Béládi and Krausz, Stalin, 169–70.

457. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 46, 140. “It is a small thing to win power, it is no small thing to drive out the capitalists,” Kaganovich told Moscow party activists on May 22, 1933, contrasting 1917 with the Stalin revolution. “What is necessary is to destroy the root from which capitalism grows.” Rees, Iron Lazar, 115 (citing Partinoe stroitel’stvo, 1933, no. 11: 10).

458. Dolot, Execution by Hunger, 155.

459. A similar fate sometimes met adult interlopers: one man had his ear cut off, then his fingers put in a door and smashed; he was still alive when the farmers threw him down a well, into which they dumped dirt. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 774 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 11, d. 1047, l. 212–8: July 15, 1933).

460. The politburo discontinued grain exports in April 1933, after Mikoyan, among others, lobbied Stalin to reduce them. Pavlov, Anastas Mikoián, 68 (citing RGASPI, f. 84, op. 2, d. 8, l. 5). Forestry exports (logs, lumber, plywood, cellulite, paper) in 1933 brought in nearly four times as much (119 million gold rubles), oil and petroleum products almost twice as much (60.4 million), and furs nearly as much (30.2 million) as grain. Total export revenues in 1933 were 388.7 million, versus 812.7 million in 1930. Even the 1933 level represented a high-water mark compared with what would follow (239.7 million in 1940). Vneshniaia torgovlia SSSR, 1918–1966, 18–22.

461. Davies, “Soviet Military Expenditures,” 586–9, 593, 598.

462. Pravda, April 29, 1933; KPSS v rezoliutsiiakh (9th ed.), VI: 46–7; Fainsod, Smolensk under Soviet Rule, 221–2; Rigby, Communist Party Membership, 201–4; Thorniley, Rise and Fall, 141. Stalin had Kaganovich chair the all-Union purge commission. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 910, l. 2. Initially, the purge targeted the provinces of Moscow, Leningrad, Urals, Donetsk, Odessa, Kiev, and Vinnitsa, as well as Belorussia and Eastern Siberia and Far Eastern regions. From May 15, 1934, it would be extended to the provinces of Gorky, Western Siberia, Azov-Black Sea, the North Caucasus, Crimea, Kharkov, Dnepropetrovsk, Chernigov, and Uzbekistan. Partinoe stroitel’stvo, 1934, no. 14: 2. The seventeen remaining provinces or republics would undergo a purge during a Union-wide party card verification campaign in 1935. Iaroslavskii, “K chistke partii,” 18; and Iaroslavskii, “o chistke partii”; Rigby, Communist Party Membership, 52; Gill, Origins, 201–218; Getty, Origins of the Great Purges, 22, 38–48. Two previous “general” party purges had taken place (1921 and 1929).

463. Thorniley, Rise and Fall, 145–7; Armstrong, Politics of Totalitarianism, 9–10. As of Jan. 1934, the party would number 1.826 million members and 874,000 candidates, or 2.7 million total. Rigby, Communist Party Membership, 52.

464. Kolpakidi and Seriakov, Schbit i mech, 357–61 (Sept. 9, 1933). Back on Nov. 5, 1924, the politburo had formed a commission for political crimes; the commission forbade local organs from issuing sentences without Central Committee authorization. Mozokhin, VChK-OGPU, 130–31 (citing APRE, f. 3, op. 57, d. 73, l. 9, 23, 37, 112, 123–4, 128–9; d. 60, l. 11).

465. Katzenellenbaum, Russian Currency and Banking, 9.

466. Robbins, Famine in Russia; Simms, “Crop Failure of 1891”; Simms, “Economic Impact of the Russian Famine”; Miller, Economic Development, 49; Figes, A People’s Tragedy, 158.

467. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 412–5; Davies et al., Economic Transformation, 67–77.

468. At least half a million Kazakhs resettled permanently outside the republic, including 200,000 beyond Soviet frontiers. Ohayon, La sédentarisation des Kazakhs, 264–8; Maksudov, “Migratsii v SSSR”; Pinciola, Stalinismo di frontiera, 463–6; Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 408 (citing RGAE, f. 1562, op. 329, d. 143; Jan. 14, 1937); Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, III: 420–7 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 11, d. 1449, l. 106–18; July 20, 1932); Cameron, “Hungry Steppe.” See also Jasny, Socialized Agriculture, 323. The Soviet census of 1926 gave a Kazakh ASSR population of 6.2 million, of whom 3.6 million were ethnic Kazakh, some 2 million were Slavs, some 230,000 Uzbeks and 62,000 Uighurs. The 1939 census gave a figure of 1.321 million fewer ethnic Kazakhs. On this basis, one scholar estimated the catastrophe at 2 million lives lost. The local ethnic Ukrainian population in Kazakhstan declined from 859,000 to 658,000. Tatimov, Sotsialnaia obuslovlennost’ demograficheskikh protsessov, 122–4; Abylkhozhin et al., “Kazakhstanskaia tragediia,” 67. In the neighboring Kyrgyz autonomous republic, the catastrophe was less pronounced. Pinciola, Stalinismo di frontiera, 377–81.

469. Sel’skoe khoziaistvo SSSR, 517; Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 321–2; Davies et al., Economic Transformation, 289. Even the data supplied to Kazakh party bosses severely underestimated the losses of human and animal life, partly because of fear of reporting the truth, and partly from logistical difficulties of surveying such a vast and sparsely populated territory. Pinciola, Stalinismo di frontiera, 468.

470. The regime managed to begin to rebuild Kazakh herds by allowing (in Sept. 1932) artel collective farms to be replaced by so-called TOZ (“association for the joint cultivation of land”), in which only some land was worked in common, and most implements and all animals, including even draft animals, were held by households. Aitiev and Ishmukhamedov, Torzhestvo leninskogo kooperativnogo plana, 36–7. On March 29, 1933, Mirzoyan asked Stalin to purchase more livestock from western China and release more food aid (16,500 tons) for the region, to allow him to sell significant nationalized livestock back to the Kazakh herders, and to stop Uzbekistan, Siberia, and the Volga from returning Kazakhs who fled. Aldazhumanov et al., Nasil’stvennaia kollektivizatsiia, 220–3 (APRK, f. 141, op. 1, d. 5287, l. 33–8); Abdiraïymuly et al., Golod v kazakhskoi stepi, 196–200 (at 199). The livestock losses were still hurting agricultural productivity in 1940. In the USSR as a whole, the cattle and sheep population did not recover to the 1914 level until the late 1950s. Hunter, “Soviet Agriculture”; Millar and Nove, “Debate on Collectivization.”

471. Investigation of the Ukrainian Famine, 424; Chamberlain, Russia’s Iron Age, 88–9; Muggeridge, Chronicles of Wasted Time, 257. See also Bright-Holmes, Like It Was; Kravchenko, I Chose Freedom, 118. Thomas Walker, in a series of five articles in 1935, asserted that not crop failure but “a planned process of extermination by Moscow, is what caused the terrific loss of life in this district in the past year.” Walker, “Children Starve.” Walker offered no evidence; he purported to be an eyewitness, but visited in 1934, after the mass famine had subsided. Fischer, “Heart’s Russian ‘Famine’”; Tortle, Fraud, Famine, and Fascism, 9. See also Mace, “Man-made Famine,” 86–90.

472. Ellman, “Role of Leadership Perceptions,” 824. P. Blonskii, a doctor from Kiev province, wrote in a letter to the health commissar of Ukraine, which the police intercepted and excerpted, that “the politically harmful ‘theory’ that the starving people themselves are responsible for the famine is prevalent among leaders and rank-and-file workers; it is claimed that they did not want to work, so in that case, let them die—no pity there.” Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 384–6 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 11, d. 56, l. 203–5).

473. Fitzpatrick, Stalin’s Peasants, 75 (citing Molot, March 10, 1933); Zelenin, “Kolkhoznoe stroitel’stvo v SSSR,” 28–9 (citing GARP, f. 3316, d. 815, l. 4; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 21, d. 2415, l. 1181ob.); “Kollektivizatsiia: istoki, suchnost’, posledstviia,” 46–56.

474. Davies and Wheatcroft persuasively refute Ellman’s assertions that Stalin intentionally starved peasants, concluding: “We regard the policy of rapid industrialisation as an underlying cause of the agricultural troubles of the early 1930s, and we do not believe that the Chinese or NEP versions of industrialisation were viable in Soviet national and international circumstances.” Davies and Wheatcroft, “Reply to Ellman,” 626. Robert Conquest wrote the principal book on the supposedly intentional famine—Harvest of Sorrow (1986)—but in a letter to Davies (Sept. 7, 2003), he acknowledged that Stalin did not intentionally cause the famine. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 441n145. Kuromiya noted there was no evidence to support intentionality. “Stalin does not appear to have anticipated the deaths of millions of people,” he concluded. “The millions of deaths de-stabilised the country politically and generated political doubt about his leadership even within the party (most famously the Ryutin Platform)." Kuromiya, "The Soviet Famine of 1932–1933 Reconsidered," 667.

475. Merl, "Entfachte Stalin die Hungersnot?"

476. For Ukraine, the initial procurement target had been 5.83 million tons (May 6, 1932), which was lowered to 5.17 million (Aug. 17, 1932), then to 4.22 million (Oct. 30, 1932), and finally to 3.77 million tons (Jan. 12, 1933); actual collections amounted to 3.59 million. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger; 123, 137 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 11, l. 131–5), 478. For the North Caucasus, the quota was reduced overall from 2.52 to 1.59 million tons.

477. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 478; Davies et al., Economic Transformation, 290 (table 22). See also Lewin, Making of the Soviet System (1985), 151.

478. Tauger, "1932 Harvest," 74 (table 2).

479. Davies and Wheatcroft, "Reply to Ellman," 627–8; Gintsburg, "Massovy golod," 124, 126.

480. One Ukrainian scholar correctly conceded that in Ukraine, ethnic Russians and Jews died in lesser proportion than ethnic Ukrainians partly because the former lived in greater proportion in cities. Kul'chyts'kyi, "Skil'ky nas zahynulo pid holodomoru 1933 roku?," 15. A decree of Dec. 14, 1932, enjoined the authorities in Soviet Ukraine "to direct serious attention to the correct implementation of Ukrainianization, eliminate a mechanical implementation, chase out Petyura-ites and other bourgeois-nationalists elements from party and soviet organizations, thoroughly select and rear Ukrainian Bolshevik cadres, furnish systematic party leadership and control over the implementation of Ukrainianization." A follow-up decree of Dec. 26 ended Ukrainianization in the neighboring Kuban region of the RSFSR. Brian Boeck has demonstrated that Ukrainianization in the Kuban was opposed by the populace, who preferred a Cossack or Kuban identity, and by local officials. He also shows that Kaganovich seized upon, and twisted, a single report by a local official about a single Cossack settlement (Poltavskaya) that blamed supposedly successful Ukrainianization as a cause of resistance. "Thus," Boeck concludes, "there is no compelling evidence that the success of Ukrainianization, or the Central Committee's perceptions of the success of Ukrainianization, led to the decree of 14 December." Boeck, "Complicating the National Interpretation," 31–48; Pyrih et al., Holod, 291–4 (Tsentral'nyi gos. Arkhiv obshchestvennykh obedeinenii Ukrainy, f. 39, op. 4, d. 1, l. 8–10); Trapeznikov, Istoriicheskii opyt KPSS, 262. A related decree was issued for Belorussia: RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 917, l. 7 (Dec. 19, 1932).

481. "In the archives of Russia, in the archives of the republics of the former USSR, millions of documents have been preserved [of] the famine in the USSR at the beginning of the 1930s of the last century in various regions of the large country," wrote V. P. Kozlov, the head of the Russian archival service, in the preface to a collection of declassified materials. "Not a single document has been found confirming the conception of a 'Holodomor-genocide' in Ukraine or even a hint in the documents about ethnic motives of what occurred, including in Ukraine." Antipova, Golod v SSSR, 6–7 (the collection consists entirely of facsimiles of original documents). Klid and Motyl define the Holodomor (or Ukrainian Holocaust) as "the murder by hunger of millions in the 1932–33 famine in Soviet Ukraine and the Kuban region of the North Caucasus, where Ukrainians formed a large percentage of the population." This becomes "genocide" when the authors include the executions of Ukrainian intellectuals, writers, poets, musicians, artists, church officials. They offer no evidence of intentional starvation or of ethnic targeting. They do not dwell on the ethnic Ukrainian agency in the alleged genocide against Ukrainians (in regions where lots of Russians lived and died). They do not include the Volga Valley, Kazakhstan, the Urals, Western Siberia, and other famine-wracked regions where Ukrainians did not form a large percentage of the population. Klid and Motyl, Holodomor Reader, xxix–xxx.

482. Rudich, Holod 1932–1933 rokiu, 441–4 (at 443: March 15, 1933).

483. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 238 (GARF, f. 5446, op. 82, d. 19, l. 66–8; Feigin, April 12, 1933).

484. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 799, l. 24–5, 30–1; Kurliandskii, Stalin, vlast', religia, 88–9. Stalin did not refer to "enemies" or "wreckers" in his explanations to Robins. The conversation was severely edited when originally published: Sochineniia, XIII: 260–73. See also Salzman, Reform and Revolution, 355–6. See also Postyshev's public comments about "teaching" the peasants: Izvestiia, June 22, 1933.

485. Davies et al., "Stalin, Grain Stocks, and the Famine of 1932–33," 653.

486. The threat of attack by Japan, the need for grain stockpiling, and the fact that an overwhelmed transport network had had to carry military and industrial equipment, troops, and deported kulaks to Siberia and the Soviet Far East, would be another way the regime would explain the severe domestic hardships to the party. Duranty, USSR, 190–2; Dalrymple, “Soviet Famine of 1932–1934,” at 273; Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 206 (citing RGAE, f. 7297, op. 41, d. 33, l. 23–4; directive sent by Stalin and Molotov: March 31, 1932). RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 514, part 1, l. 9 (Stalin to CC plenum, Jan. 7, 1933); Sochineniia, XIII: 182–3. But Davies, rightly, discounts militarization and instead blames absurd plan targets. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 176ff; Davies, “Soviet Defence Industries,” 266.

487. Barmine, One Who Survived, 101–2.

488. Trotskii, “Nuzhno chestnoe vnitripartinnoe soglasenie.” See also Deutscher, Stalin, 352.

489. When Kaganovich demonstrated a bit of leniency toward procurements in Ukraine in Sept. 1933, Stalin rebuked him. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 479 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 85, l. 44–5), 479–80 (f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 76–82).

490. Additional arrests were carried out by the various grain procurement plenipotentiaries and the regular police. In Ukraine, OGPU arrests totaled 124,463 in 1933 (compared with 74,859 people in 1932); OGPU arrests in Ukraine would fall to 30,322 in 1934. Vasil’ev, “Tsena golodnogo khleba,” 144. When Kaganovich demonstrated a bit of leniency toward procurements in Ukraine in Sept. 1933, Stalin rebuked him. Khlevniuk, Stalin i Kaganovich: perepiska, 479 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 85, l. 44–45), 479–80 (f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 76–82).

491. Zelenin, “O nekotorykh ‘belykh piatnakh,’” 15. The regime issued numerous decrees to provide food aid to orphaned children in the tens of thousands in Ukraine, Kazakhstan, and elsewhere. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 428 (RGAE, f. 8043, op. 11, d. 74, l. 97; June 13, 1932), 487 (d. 75, l. 255; d. 61, l. 155; Aug. 20, 1933).

492. Penner, “Stalin and the Ital’ianka,” 45–7 (citing RGASPI, f. 166, op. 1, d. 12, l. 4 and “Golod 1932–1933 godov na Ukraine: svidetel’stvuiut arkhivnye dokumenty,” 79. See also Kondrashin and Penner, Golod, 214–5.

493. Stalin would later boast in a discussion of five historical turning points—1905, 1917, the Brest-Litovsk peace of 1918, the Russian civil war, “and especially collectivization”—that the latter entailed “a completely novel, historically unprecedented event.” Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 69 (Nov. 11, 1937).

494. The figure officially reported was 89.8 million tons (as of Oct. 1933), 20 million more than the wildly inflated 1932 official figure of 69.8 million. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 446. The degree to which the regime contributed to the bumper harvest, by the distribution of tractors, seed aid, and food relief, remains a matter of intense controversy. Some of it was improvisation by local officials. Kravchenko, I Chose Freedom, 117–30. Tauger, seeking to place the Soviet story in a broader one of agricultural modernization, emphasizes how the collective farm system facilitated Soviet relief efforts and the peasants’ ability to generate the harvest that saved them and the country. Tauger, “Soviet Peasants”; Tauger, “Stalin, Soviet Agriculture, and Collectivization,” 109–42.

495. Famine conditions persisted into late fall 1933 and, in some places, would last through summer 1934. Ammende, Human Life in Russia, 80–4. In fall 1933, the regime was pressing for workers to cultivate gardens to grow their own food, on the example of Ukraine’s Donetsk region. Pavlov, Anastas Mikoian, 71 (citing RGASPI, f. 84, op. 2, d. 19, l. 125–6). Kazakhstan would be given 18,000 tons of food aid by decree on Nov. 28, 1933. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 507 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 15, l. 142, 145, 148).

496. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 240–1 (RGASPI, f. 667, op. 1, d. 16, l. 7–9); Khromov, Po stranitsam, 158. Voroshilov, too, sent a letter to Yenukidze that month, doubtless aware the OGPU perused his correspondence and the contents could get to Stalin. “A remarkable man, our Koba,” he wrote. “It is simply incomprehensible how he can combine the great mind of the proletarian strategist, the will of a statesman and revolutionary activist, and the soul of a completely ordinary kind comrade who bears in mind every detail and cares for everything that concerns the people he knows, loves, and values.” Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 241–2 (RGASPI, f. 667, op. 1, d. 17, l. 5–7; Voroshilov to Yenukidze, June 29, 1933). See also Rayfield, Stalin and His Hangmen, 186.

CHAPTER 3. VICTORY

1. Lunacharskii, “Puti i zadachi sovetskoi ramaturgii,” Literaturnana gazeta, Feb. 28, 1933, retitled (and not abridged) as “Sotsialisticheskii realism,” Sovetskii teatr, 1933, no. 2–3; reprinted in Lunacharskii, Sobranie sochinenii, VIII: 491–523 (at 497). Lunacharskii, in a draft text from around the same time, explained: “The socialist realist . . . may resort to all manner of hyperbole, caricature and utterly improbable comparisons, not to conceal reality but, via stylization, to reveal it.” Or, as he put it, “A Communist who cannot dream is a bad Communist,” Lunacharskii, Sobranie sochinenii, VIII: 615–6; RGASPI, f. 142, op. 1, d. 318, l. 15–21, Feb. 10, 1933. See also Louis Fisher, in Crossman, God that Failed, 205–6.

2. Hunter, “Optimal Tautness in Development Planning”; Hunter, “First Soviet Five-Year Plan”; Cheremukhin et al., “Was Stalin Really Necessary?”

3. Instead of an anticipated 5.426 billion gold rubles of revenue from all exports (grain, timber, oil) over the course of the Five-Year Plan, the Soviets managed to bring in 3.283 billion. Industry was short 1.873 million rubles, including 832 million just in 1932. The Soviets ran out of convertible currency even for purchases of foreign military technology. Kondrashin et al., Golod v SSSR, I/i: 46 (citing RGAE, f. 1562, op. 329, d. 4, l. 2–4). A key source of foreign currency revenue were the shops designed for “trade with foreigners” (Torgsin), which in fact placed no restrictions on who could enter and buy and sell: around 80 percent of their trade involved Soviet inhabitants. In 1933, during the worst of the famine, Torgsin stores had their best year, expanding deeply across the countryside to sell flour, cooking oil, and sugar for the population’s valuables. That year, family-heirloom revenue exceeded foreign grain sale revenues. After 1933, with the population’s closets tapped out, Torgsin revenues declined. Still, sales from 1932 until the shops were closed in early 1936 totaled 287.2 million, which paid for imports for Magnitogorsk worth 44 million rubles; Gorky Auto Plant, 42.3 million; Stalingrad Tractor, 25 million rubles; Stalin Auto factory, 27.9 million rubles; Cheliabinsk Tractor, 23 million; Kharkov Tractor, 15.3 million; and Uralmash, 15 million. Aizenberg, Valutiunaia sistema SSSR, 65; Osokina, Zoloto dlia industrializatsii.

4. Robert Allen argues that per capita consumption, after falling in the early 1930s, increased significantly, being perhaps a fifth higher in 1937 than a decade earlier, but he has rightly been taken to task separately by Davies and Ellman. Allen, Farm to Factory, 147–50, 185–6; R. W. Davies (http://eh.net/book_reviews/farm-to-factory-a-reinterpretation-of-the-soviet-industrial-revolution); Ellman, “Soviet Industrialization.”

5. Millar, “Mass Collectivization”; Barsov, Baslans stoimostnykh obmenov; Ellman, “Agricultural Surplus”; Davies et al., Economic Transformation, 11–3. See also Barsov, “NEP i vyравниvanie ekonomicheskikh otnoshenii,” 93–102. Even a Stalinist publication, with exaggerated figures, admitted that industrial exports constituted the primary source of export revenues during the Five-Year Plan (2 billion of 3.5 billion gold rubles total). From 1932, all Soviet exports declined in physical terms, not just in revenue, but agricultural exports declined faster than industrial ones. Ginzburg, Vnesniaia torgovlia SSSR, 67, 72. Prices changed favorably toward agriculture, when one takes into consideration more than grain and the legalized markets for selling “surpluses.”

6. E. H. Carr, writing in the wake of the Soviet Union’s World War II victory, concluded that Stalin’s collectivization and industrialization “were imposed by the objective situation which Soviet Russia in the later 1920s had to face.” Well, yes, if Bolshevik monopoly and anticapitalism were to be retained. There are multiple ways to modernize, but not multiple ways to modernize without the rule of law, political pluralism, private property, and the market. Carr, “Stalin Victorious.” In later years, Carr’s position shifted slightly. Davies, Introduction to Russian Revolution, xxxiv–xxxv; Nove, “The Peasants,” at 389. See also Gnedin, Vykhod iz labirinta, 54.

7. As Alec Nove pointed out, something is a necessity, although not inevitable, if it follows logically from the objective circumstances and the values of the decision maker(s). Nove, “Was Stalin Really Necessary?” reprinted in Nove, Was Stalin Really Necessary?, 17–39; Grossman, Review. See also Millar and Nove, “Debate on Collectivization”; and Brown and Cairncross, “Alec Nove.” The otherwise trenchant Millar incorrectly averred that collectivization was “an unmitigated policy disaster,” failing to distinguish between economic and political outcome. See Swianiewicz, Forced Labor, 91.

8. Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 52. Another scholar has asserted that Stalin spent as much time on culture as foreign policy and military affairs. Gromov, Stalin, 6. On formalization of Stalin’s role in culture, see Khlevniuk, Stalinskie politbiuro, 112–3 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 113 d. 818, l. 10), 141, 143; Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 67, 112.

9. Trotsky, Literature and Revolution, 218.

10. Trotsky supported establishment of a non-party literary journal to focus and multiply their efforts in favorable directions, and proposed that the censorship organ, Glavlit, compile a register of artists, in order to track them. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 36–7 (APRE, f. 3, op. 34, d. 185, l. 8–10; June 30, 1922).

- ¹¹ Pravda, July 1, 1925; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 506, l. 4, 31–7; June 18, 125; Kemp-Welch, Stalin and the Literary Intelligentsia, 21–67 (esp. 34); Literaturnoe nasledstvo, vol. 74 (Moscow: Nauka, 1965): 29–37; Ermakov, 376–7.
- ¹² RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 633, l. 3–4; May 5, 1927; Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 84 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 697, l. 10). Non-party though it might have been, the weekly Literaturnaya gazeta was going to be overseen by the apparatus.
- ¹³ See also Fitzpatrick, Cultural Front, 145.
- ¹⁴ One scholar observed that “writers embroiled in controversy sought to use Stalin against their adversaries and were therefore themselves to some extent responsible for establishing the pattern of authoritarian control.” Brown, “Year of Acquiescence,” 57.
- ¹⁵ Krivenko, “Solovetskii ITL OGPU.” In April 1930, the OGPU system was organized under a “Main Administration of Camps”—in Russian “Gulag,” a bureaucratic moniker that soon changed but would stick in popular reference. Carr and Davies, Foundations of a Planned Economy, II: 359–60, 373; Wheatcroft, “Assessing the Size,” at 287; Ivanova, Gulag; Upadyshev, “Ot Solovkov k GULAGu,” 93; Kokurin and Petrov, “OGPU, 1929–1934 gg.,” 100. The Main Administration of the Construction of the Far North, centered in Magadan, lasted from 1931 to 1957; and the Karaganda Camp Complex, which at its height would reach 80 camps, lasted from 1931 to 1959. Kokurin and Petrov, Gulag; Krivenko, “Karagandinskii ITL”; Sigachev, “Glavnoe upravlenie stroitel'stva Dal'nego Severa”; Krivenko, “Belomoro-Baltiiskii ITL.”
- ¹⁶ Solzhenitsyn would dub Dalstroi “the greatest and most famous island, the pole of ferocity of that amazing country of Gulag.” Solzhenitsyn, Gulag Archipelago, I: ix. See also Kokurin and Petrov, Gulag, 72 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 11, l. 57, 63).
- ¹⁷ That year 9,928 of the approximately 16,000 prisoners reached Magadan alive; in 1933, 27,390 would survive the journey. Subsequently, 32,304 would survive the journey in 1934; 44,601 in 1935; and 62,703 in 1936—a labor force. About 20 percent of the workers were not prisoners. Stephan, Russian Far East, 225–32. Reported gold extraction rose from 511 kilograms of pure gold in 1932 to 5,515 kilograms in 1934; 14,458 kg in 1935; and 33,360 kg in 1936. Total gold mining across the entire Soviet Union had been 13,215 kg in 1928. Nordlander, “Economic History of Dalstroi,” 105–25.
- ¹⁸ Aizenberg, Valiutnaia sistema SSSR, 64; Davies, Crisis and Progress, 162–3 (citing GARE, f. 5446, op. 57, d. 18, l. 85–95; art. 234/45s, 138–9; art. 372/79ss). Roy Medvedev wrote that “there existed a system of examinations which allowed ten-year sentences to be reduced to two or three years, excellent food and clothing, a workday of four to six hours in winter and ten in summer, and good pay, which enabled prisoners to help their families and to return home with funds.” Medvedev, Let History Judge, 508. See also Shalamov, Kolyma Tales, 368–9.
- ¹⁹ Swianiewicz, Forced Labor. There were instances when Gulag labor was more productive than “free” labor.
- ²⁰ Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 363–4 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 11, d. 4, l. 58; Yagoda to Męzyński, June 27, 1933). See also Izvestiia, June 26, 1933; Pravda, June 29, 1933; and Leningradskaia pravda, June 23, 27, and 29, 1933. Stalin had rescued the canal from Rykov's cost-cutting. Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 212. The Suez Canal, 117 miles long, was built in 15 years, without locks; the Panama Canal, 48 miles long, was built in 33 years, with locks.
- ²¹ Pazi, Nash Mironch, 447. Kirov first took a test drive to Moscow, with a single guard, to see if the route was safe, then did the trip again, to pick up the passengers. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 406 (citing RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 73, l. 96–132; Sveshnikov, 1966).
- ²² Stalin and Kirov likely first met in Oct. 1917, at the 2nd Congress of Soviets that had proclaimed a seizure of power (Kirov was a delegate of the Vladikavkaz-Kabardinya soviet). Their relationship is documented from May 29, 1918, when Stalin recommended Kirov as worthy of “complete trust.” Plimak and Antonov, “1 dekabria 1934–go,” 35.
- ²³ RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 149, l. 70 (March 6, 1929).
- ²⁴ RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 4554; Sochineniia, VI: 422.
- ²⁵ In late 1929, during the party purge, several targeted Leningrad officials fought back, demanding Kirov be sacked for prerevolutionary work on behalf of what they called a “Cadet” (bourgeois-liberal) newspaper: Kirov's signed articles—which his attackers dug up in the public library—had welcomed the Provisional Government. Orjonikidze defended Kirov, divulging that Stalin himself, at Pravda, had not been anti-Provisional Government in early 1917.

Kirov's denouncers were removed, but Stalin had Kirov's prerevolutionary political "error" recorded in his party file. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 120 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 8, l. 24–5: Dec. 11, 1929); Khlevniuk, Stalin i Orzhonikidze, 19–20; Khlevniuk, In Stalin's Shadow, 26–9; Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 108–10; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 93–106. See also Ciliga, Russian Enigma, 120–1; and Tokaev, Betrayal of an Ideal, 109, 241.

26. Vladimir Loginov, Teni Stalina, 97. Artyom concurred: "Kirov after Nadezhda Sergeevna was the closest person to Stalin." Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 59–60.

27. Molotov also noted of Kirov: "He was a weak organizer. He was a good mass agitator." He dismissed the notions that Stalin could have killed Kirov ("odiousness") or that Kirov could have taken Stalin's place. ("Absurd! . . . look, pretty speeches of a secondary character. That was not enough.") Chuev, Molotov, 377.

28. Kirov won the Order of Lenin (March 31, 1931) for helping fulfill the oil industry five-year plan in 2.5 years.

29. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 71–3.

30. Chukhin, Kanaloarmeitsy, 18 (no citation).

31. The canal laborers gave their name ("zek" or zakliuchennyi kanaltstroia) to all Gulag prisoners. Chukhin, Kanaloarmeitsy, 189–209. Yagoda built a large number of critical objects, from the country's first-ever stadium (Dynamo) in Moscow to new administrative buildings for the NKVD itself.

32. Murin, Stalin v ob"tatiakh, 44 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1552, l. 19).

33. Aug. 27, 1933.

34. Chigirin, Stalin, 84–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1482, l. 53: Aug. 25 to Sept. 2, 1933).

35. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 249–52 (RGASPI, f. 667, op. 1, d. 16, l. 8–12: Aug. 27, 1933), 252–3 (f. 74, op. 2, d. 41, l. 63–71: Aug. 30), 253–4 (l. 72–3: Sept. 7). See also Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 255 n1 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 41, l. 74; GARF, f. R-3316, op. 1, 3d. 18, l. 168).

36. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 80, l. 68.

37. In summer 1931, the first high-frequency phone lines were installed between Moscow and Leningrad and Moscow and Kharkov. The scramblers and encrypters were purchased in Germany from Siemens and Halske AG and AEG, copied and adapted. Moscow would soon be connected to Smolensk and Minsk (1932), Gorky and Rostov (1933), Kiev (1934). Other systems grew in parallel: the Kremlin self-dialing ATC ("vertushka"); the NKVD state security first directorate (bodyguard) telephone station; etc.

38. Na prieme, 107–12.

39. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 330 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 80, l. 87).

40. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 315 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 741, l. 7–12: Aug. 26, 1933), 319 (f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 107–8: Aug. 29), 323 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 80, l. 66: Sept. 1), 325–7 (d. 741, l. 20–6: Sept. 2); Rees, Iron Lazar, 119 (citing RGASPI, f. 54, op. 1, d. 100, l. 107–8); Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 248–9 (Sept. 12, 1933), 247–8n2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 929, l. 21; d. 930, l. 13); Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 234–5, 233n2; Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 261–3 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 27, d. 214, l. 25–30: Sept. 30); Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 133; Davies et al., "The Politburo and Economic Decision Making," 110.

41. The dacha had been constructed in 1932–33 in a mad rush (the construction director, from the central executive committee of Abkhazia, begged for more labor power). Lakoba Papers, Hoover Institution Archives, 1–65. Lakoba, Yenukidze, his deputy N. I. Pakhomov, and Pauker conducted a final inspection in early July 1933.

42. Imperial Russia had annexed the Black Sea territory from Istanbul in 1864, which provoked a mass exodus to the Ottoman empire and a mass influx of settlers, especially Mingrelians from adjacent western Georgia, ethnic Georgians, Russians, and Armenians. The Abkhaz language belongs to a North Caucasus language group unrelated to Georgian or Russian, and the differences were strongly felt. Ethnic Abkhaz became concentrated in three districts: Gudauta, Kodor, and Samurzakan, while non-Abkhaz made up 90 percent of Abkhazia's other districts. Voronov, Abkhazia. See also Tardy, "Caucasus Peoples."

43. Dzidzariia et al., Revolutsionnye komitety Abkhazii, 253. See also Pritsker, Istoriia kurortov Abkhazskoi SSR; Orynianskii, Sovetskaia Abkhazia; Grigolia, Kurortnye bogatsva Abkhazii; Abkhazia had perhaps 150 available beds for patients and holiday-makers in 1922, which jumped to 3,680 by 1935, under Lakoba's construction. Around 300 people took advantage in 1922, and 16,755 by 1935.

44. Tulumdzian, S'ezdy Sovetov Abkhazii.

45. A party commission went after Lakoba, citing “the presence in the Abkhazia organization of elements of factionalism, degeneration, ‘private property-ism,’ nepotism and group cohesion reaching roadyism.” Stalin, vacationing on the Black Sea, got dragged into the intrigues and, in a letter co-signed by Orjonikidze (Oct. 19, 1929), faulted Lakoba for “sometimes not subordinating himself to the decisions of the provincial party committee.” The mild rebuke protected Lakoba from worse. Hoover Institution Archives, Lakoba Papers, box 1, folder 55, 56; Blauvelt, “Abkhazia Patronage,” 214 (citing Partarkhiv TsK KPG, f. 14, op. 7, d. 3516, l. 1–3).

46. Rikhter, Kavkaz nashikh dnei, 98; Blauvelt, “From Words to Action!,” 243–4 (citing sakartvelos shss arkivi [II], f. 14, op. 2, d. 485, 49–56).

47. “When Stalin and I were there,” Orjonikidze had noted, “Comrade Lakoba made the best impressions of all the comrades present.” Lakoba, “‘Ia Koba, a ty Lakoba,’” 58 (1925). See also Hoover Archives, Lakoba papers, 1–25, 1–26; and Kvashonkin, Bolshevistskoe rukovodstvo, 338–41.

48. Trotskii, “Yenukidze” [Jan. 8, 1938], in Portrety, 251–72 (at 264–6). “My ears hold me back, but so what,” Lakoba had written to Orjonikidze (March 12, 1922). Kvashonkin, Bolshevistskoe rukovodstvo, 237–8.

49. Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 188–9. Lakoba has only a single recorded listing in Stalin’s office logbook, Nov. 20, 1933, and for just twenty minutes. Na prieme, 114.

50. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 76–7. In 1929, a Lakoba confidant wrote to the Abkhaz leader that “being in Sochi I saw Stalin at the central executive committee rest house, and he asked the whole time, where are you, are you coming, Long Live Abkhazia and sang Abkhaz songs.” Lakoba, “‘Ia Koba, a ty Lakoba,’” 59–60 (Ladariya).

51. “Autobiography, December 12, 1936,” Hoover Archives, Lakoba papers, box 1, item 2; Bgazhba, Nestor Lakoba; Argun, Stalin i Lakoba; Lakoba, “History: 1917–1989,” 89–101.

52. Whereas Georgia was undergoing vigorous Georgification, the ratio of ethnic Abkhaz in the enclave’s population of 146,000 had fallen, to under 30 percent in 1926 (from 55 percent as late as 1897). By 1939, the Abkhaz share would shrink to 18 percent. By comparison, the Ajarians, a Muslim people in Georgia, accounted for around 70 percent in Ajarian, an autonomous republic in Georgia. The penurious Abkhaz administration issued circulars in three languages (Abkhaz, Georgian, Russian). Sagaria, Natsional’noe stroitel’svo v Abkhazii, 115; Agrba, Abkhazskaia oblastnaia organizatsiia kompartii Gruzii v tsifrakh; Partarkhiv Abkhazskogo obkoma KP Gruzii, f. 1, op. 1, d. 180, l. 95–6; Lakoba at 7th province party conference. Abkhaz were almost never accepted at Georgia’s institutions of higher learning (where the instruction was solely in Georgian). Hoover Archives, Lakoba papers, 2–42.

53. A few days after the letter to Lenin and Stalin (dated March 26, 1921), Lakoba was one of three people to sign a telegram addressed to Lenin, Stalin, Chicherin, Kirov, all Soviet republics, the whole world, proclaiming the new Abkhaz Soviet Socialist Republic, which Lenin approved, and on May 21, 1921, the Georgian SSR signed an agreement recognizing the separate Abkhaz SSR. But on Dec. 16, 1921, under pressure, the Abkhaz signed a treaty with Georgia providing for a confederal structure. Sagaria, “K istorii obrazovaniia Abkhazskoi avtonomnoi respubliki”; Bor’ba za uprochenie Sovetskoi vlasti v Gruzii, 58–9 (Gosarkhiv Abkhazskoi SSR, f. 38, d. 74, l. 176). Golos trudovoi Abkhazii, 1921, no. 134, reprinted in Bor’ba za uprochenie Sovetskoi vlasti v Gruzii, 80; Sagaria, Natsional’noe stroitel’svo v Abkhazii, 58.

54. A partial census in 1920 had listed 55 nations, but the 1926 census allowed for 190; in the 1930s, the number would fall to around three score, then climb to 106 (1937 census). Hirsch, Empire of Nations, 284, 327–30.

55. If a nation got a Union republic, members of that nation who lived outside it—Russians in Ukraine, Tajiks in Uzbekistan—did not receive an autonomous republic there. In an exception, there was a predominantly ethnic Armenian autonomous republic in Azerbaijan, Karabakh (“Black Mountain”). Armenians there had sought inclusion in Armenia. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 133, l. 28–31.

56. Haugen, Establishment, 195–7 (citing RGASPI, f. 82, op. 2, d. 87, l. 73–6; d. 101, 68–9, 76; d. 107, 29, 55, d. 104, l. 165; GARF, f. 1235, op. 26, d. 28, l. 4). See also Aworth, Modern Uzbeks; Haugen, Establishment, 206–10. Uzbekistan also got Tashkent, which the Kazakhs had wanted despite its population of 96,000 Uzbeks and 172 Kazakhs, because they insisted it was surrounded by Kazakh nomads who needed a city to rise out of backwardness. Fedtke, “How Bukharans Turned into Uzbeks and Tajiks,” 19–50; Slezkine, “USSR as a Communal Apartment,” 428; Fainsod, Smolensk under Soviet Rule, 452; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 776, l. 1.

57. Soviet Uzbekistan accounted for 60 percent of Central Asia's arable lands and perhaps 70 percent of its GDP. But in carving out Tajikistan, Stalin perhaps wanted to blunt a too strong Uzbek entity, stabilize the border with Afghanistan, and curry favor with Iran. Berge, Birth of Tajikistan; Hirsch, Empire of Nations, 174–86. The Tajiks were shunted into the Pamirs: some 90 percent of Tajikistan's landmass consisted of high mountains, and its “capital” was the village of Dushanbe, which was renamed Stalinabad. Perhaps 60 percent of Soviet Tajiks ended up outside the Tajik republic. Iurkevich, U vorot Indostana, 16. See also Teichman, “Red Man's Burden,” 177 (citing RGASPI, f. 62, op. 2, d. 2542, l. 155–7); and Teichman, “Canals, Cotton.” On the occasion of Tajikistan's inaugural party congress, in June 1930, the Tajik party boss, Mirza Davud Huseynov, an ethnic Azeri, proposed sending greetings to the toilers of India, but Stalin objected, evidently concerned not to raise outcries of interference in British India. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 63, l. 58. See also Baberowski, Der Feind, 230–5, 279–82, 620; Kangas, “Faizulla Khodzhaev”; and Norling, “Myth and Reality,” 114 (citing RGASPI, f. 82, op. 2, d. 154, l. 79–92; Jan. 25, 1931).

58. There had been more than 26,000 mosques in Turkestan in 1912 under the tsarist regime, but there would be a mere 1,300 by 1942. The remnants of the Islamic legal and educational systems would be closed down, as were most of the places where mullahs were trained. Between 1927 and 1930 local alphabets were changed from Arabic script to Latin (as was done in Turkey), which cut future generations from the past and the Quran. The pilgrimage to Mecca would be prohibited from 1935. Later the regime would shift the languages to Cyrillic. Gatagova et al., TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i natsional'nyi vopros, II: 128–9 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 588, l. 3, 4), 191–6 (d. 751, l. 38–47; d. 607, l. 4–5).

59. Wohlforth, “Russian-Soviet Empire,” 225. The success of the coercive Soviet project is all the more remarkable when one examines the depth of the challenges faced by national activists in mixed-language regions. Judson, Guardians of the Nation.

60. This was where the peasantry in Abkhazia had been most receptive to original Bolshevik revolutionary demands for radical land reform against local nobles. Dzidzaria, Ocherki istorii Abkhazii, 62–6, 108–9.

61. The status change was formally approved at the 6th Congress of Soviets of Abkhazia on Feb. 11, 1931, although it had not been included on the agenda. Dzhonua et al., Sovety Abkhazii, 227–8; Sagaria, Natsional'noe stroitel'stvo v Abkhazii, 142–6.

62. Blauvelt, “Abkhazia Patronage,” 227–8 (citing Arkhiv TsK KPG, f. 14, op. 6, d. 267: “Informsvodki Abkhaz. GPU: dokladnaia zapiska raikoma o rukovodstve obkoma o antosovetskikh vystupleniakh krest'ian v Gudautskom raione, 177–9).

63. Mamiya Orakhelashvili and Beria arrived, but peasant delegations insisted on speaking to Lakoba. They wanted permission to emigrate to Turkey, like many of their nineteenth-century forebears. Blauvelt, “Abkhazia Patronage,” 227 (citing secret police reports). Danilov, “Tragediia Abkhazskogo naroda.”

64. Ethnic Russians, who constituted just 10 percent of Abkhazia's population in the early 1930s, accounted for more than 40 percent of the local apparatus, versus around 9 percent ethnic Abkhaz. Lakoba also got the apparatus in Moscow to renew calls for indigenization of Abkhazia's apparatus. But the ongoing party purges pushed in the opposite direction. Sagaria, Natsional'noe stroitel'stvo v Abkhazii, 132 (citing TsGAA f. 1, op. 2, d. 300, l. 3–4).

65. Beria denounced the Feb. 1931 Abkhaz “demonstration” to Stalin, suggesting that Lakoba had encouraged the peasants to rebel and that Lakoba's mother had stood in the front, so the secret police troops could not shoot. Lakoba, “‘Ia Koba, a ty Lakoba,’” 58.

66. Beria's mother, Marta Jakeli, and her second husband, Pavel Beria, had two other children: Lavrenti's elder brother died at age two of smallpox; his sister Akesha, or Anna (b. 1905), was rendered a deaf mute by childhood measles. His father died when Lavrenti was school age and, like Stalin, Beria was raised by his mother, who, like Keke, had ambitions for her boy. (She would later marry a Georgian Jew, Levan Loladze.) At age sixteen, Beria left for the oil boomtown Baku and enrolled in its high school for mechanical-building studies, spending a summer working for Alfred Nobel's concern. Reliable material on Beria's biography is scant. See Danilov, “K biografii L. Beriia”; Popov and Oppokov, “Berievshchina” (1989, no. 5), 39n1 (citing Chekryzhev), (1990, no. 1), 70–2. See also Popov and Oppokov, “Berievshchina” (1990, no. 3): 81–2; (“Berievshchina” was reprinted in Nekrasov, Beria, 300–80); “O sud'be chlenov i kandidatov v chleny TsK VKP (b), izbrannogo XVII s"ezdom partii," 82–113: 88. See also Popov and Oppkov, "Berievshchina," no. 3 (1990): 81–2; RGASPI, f. 5, op. 15, d. 448, l. 246–8.

67. Beria's arrests, releases, and rearrests remain murky. Popov and Oppkov, "Berievshchina," no. 1 (1990): 77–8; Toptygin, Lavrentii Beria, 11; Kazemzadeh, Struggle for Transcaucasia, 307–9; Mlechin, KGB, 176; Sokolov, Beria, 31–2.

68. RGASPI, f. 85, op. 29, d. 414, l. 3 (Beria letter to Orjonikidze); "Ochen' vysoko tsenit t. Beria," 163–5 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 788, l. 114–50b; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 788, l. 114–160b, Pavlunovsky to Stalin, June 25, 1937); Zaria vostoka, Nov. 15, 1931. Ruhulla Akhundov, a former Left SR and a Baku Communist party official, attended the late-1920 discussion of Beria's Musavat past. "He has outstanding abilities, as demonstrated in various apparatuses of the state mechanism," Akhundov wrote of Beria in 1923, calling the results-oriented functionary "so necessary at this moment of Soviet construction." Zen'kovich, Marshaly i genseki, 161.

69. That same month, April 1921, Beria married the sixteen-year-old upper-class Georgian Nino Gegechkori, whose uncle had been a member of the tsarist State Duma and foreign minister in the overthrown Georgian Menshevik government. The pair may have met in prison, when Nino and her mother came to visit her Bolshevik father, Alexander Gegechkori, who had been arrested and held along with Beria in the Kutaisi prison. Nino went on to graduate university in economics. Sokolov, Beria, 40–2. See also Dumbadze, Na sluzhbe cheka i kominternu, 93. Beria's patron Bagirov was expelled from the party for torture, oppressing national minorities (Armenians, Russians), and bribe-taking. He was sacked from the secret police in May 1927 for "exceeding his authority, intrigues, and using the organs against the party." But Stalin, writing to Molotov in 1929, decided that "Bagirov (despite his past sins) will have to be confirmed as chairman of the Cheka in Azerbaijan: he is now the only person who can cope with the Musavatists and Itikhadists who have reared their heads in the Azerbaijan countryside. This is serious business, and there should be no fooling around." Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 168. See also "Iz otchetov komiteta partiinogo kontrolia pri TsK KPSS o partiinoi reabilitatsii kommunistov v 50-kh-nachale 60-kh gg.," 47; and RGASPI, f. 613, op. 1, d. 90, l. 47. In 1930, Bagirov would be brought to Moscow to study Marxism-Leninism for twenty-four months. Zaria vostoka, Dec. 15, 1933; Knight, Beria, 39. In Oct. 1932, Bagirov was returned to Azerbaijan as chairman of the republic's Council of People's Commissars, and in Dec. 1933 he became party boss of Azerbaijan. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 396n2; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 935, l. 2, 32–4. Bagirov occupied the mansion of the former Baku agent of the Rothschilds.

70. Iusif-Zade, Chekisty Azerbaidzhana, 26, 31–57. Mikhail Kedrov, head of a traveling commission on secret police abuses, relayed a damning report on Beria to Dzierżyński, who in Dec. 1921 issued an arrest order. Beria desperately appealed to the local top man, Orjonikidze, arguing that Kedrov did not understand Baku's rough conditions. Orjonikidze supposedly later told a secretary that upon learning of Beria's service in Musavat counterintelligence, Dzierżyński had wanted to execute him, but that Orjonikidze interceded to save Beria's life. In another version, the son of the arresting officer claimed Stalin telephoned Dzierżyński and vouched for Beria, citing the word of Mikoyan. Whatever the cause, Dzierżyński countermanded the warrant. Berezin, "Istoriia ordena na arrest Berii," 195–6 (recollections of the son of Yan Berezin); Agabekov, G.P.U., 170; Leggett, Cheka, 270–1. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 134 (citing TsA FSB, ASD P-771, l. 5, testimony of Orjonikidze's secretary). All the paperwork would later disappear from Dzierżyński's files except a document indicating that there had been paperwork. Plekhanov, VChK-OGPU, 168–9. On June 27, 1922, Kirov, then party boss in Azerbaijan, directed him to cease police surveillance on Bolshevik officials. (Beria wrote back denying any involvement.) Popov and Oppkov, "Berievshchina" (1990, no. 1): 68. A denunciation of Beria in the later 1920s accused him of surrounding himself with dubious types. Plekhanov, VChK-OGPU, 236 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 9, l. 78–85).

71. In Sept. 1929, after a torrent of complaints, Orjonikidze had sent in a Central Control Commission team. Beria once again begged to be relieved of his post and allowed to resume his studies. "Time passes, all around people are growing, developing, and those who yesterday were far behind me today moved ahead," Beria noted. "My backwardness is painful and humiliating, the more so when one knows that the country now needs people with expertise . . . Dear Sergo, I implore you to take me from the Caucasus and, if I cannot be sent to study, then transfer me to different work in one of the regions of the USSR . . . After all, I cannot argue with everyone for my lifetime, it will ruin my nerves." But Orjonikidze blocked the Georgian push for disciplinary action against Beria in spring 1930. Toptygin, Nezvestnyi Beriia, 27–8; Knight, Beria, 39–40 (citing RGASPI, f. 85, op. 27, d. 71, l. 1–6); Plekhanov, VChK-OGPU, 236 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, d. 9, l. 78–85).

72. In 1925, a Junkers airplane en route to Sukhum had caught fire and crashed near the Tiflis aerodrome, killing the chairman of the South Caucasus Council of People's Commissars and another high government official as well as Mogilevsky. Trudovaiia Abkhazia, March 25, 1925; Biulleten' oppositsii (Jan. 1939): 2–15. Beria transformed an obituary for Mogilevsky into a self-tribute. Antonov-Ovseenko, Beriia, 31.

73. Popov and Popokov, "Berievshchina," 1989, no. 5: 40. Orjonikidze had told Pavlunovsky that "he rated the work of Beria as a growing functionary very highly, and that Comrade Beria would develop into a big-time functionary." "Ochen' vysoko tsenit t. Beria," 163–5 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 788, l. 114–5ob; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 788, l. 114–16ob, June 25, 1937).

74. Rubin, Lavrentii Beriia, 57–8.

75. Whether Beria set Redens up remains unknown (Redens had a well-known weakness for the bottle and women). Tumshis, VChK: voina klanov, 207–8; Knight, Beria, 43–4 (citing Merkulov: RGANI, f. 5, op. 30, d. 4, l. 86). "In the GPU apparat whose legends circulated about [Beria]," the operative Agabekov wrote at the time. Traveling with Beria for three days in a train in 1928, he found Beria "more interested in Tiflis street happenings than events of all-Union significance." Agabekov, G.P.U., 169–70; Agabekov, OGPU, 155.

76. Popov and Oppokov, "Berievshchina," 1990, no. 5: 86–7; Nekrasov, Beria, 354; Rubin, Lavrentii Beriia, 63–4. Beria or someone on his behalf spread rumors he was destined for promotion to a big job in Moscow. Popov and Oppokov, "Berievshchina" (1989, no. 7), 85; Tumshis, VChK: voina klanov, 204–5. See also Smyr, Islam v Abkhazii, 148–51.

77. Beria had been cultivating Lakoba for some time, sending him gifts, but at the same time, filth spread about Lakoba—his half-brother Mikhail received a horse ("bribe") when he brokered peace between families after a murder; his mother got 7,000 bricks for a two-story house ("palace")—which bore the mark of Beria's minions. Hoover Archives, Lakoba papers, 1-392-35. Lakoba's compound in Sukhum—a two-story brick villa, with two balconies, built by an Armenian magnate—took up a full city block in the finest neighborhood. Everyone had a room, including the governess, like prerevolutionary nobility.

78. "A few days ago members of the South Caucasus regional committee, secretaries of the Georgian central committee, and several Azerbaijani functionaries . . . visited me," Stalin wrote to Kaganovich. "They are embroiled in unbelievable infighting, and it seems to me a long way from over." He directed Kaganovich to schedule an orgburo meeting. On Sept. 10, Kaganovich acceded to the Caucasus comrades who wanted Samson Mamuliya removed as Georgian party boss and replaced by Kartvelishvili (who would last only until Nov. 14). On Oct. 31, the politburo, following an orgburo meeting, passed a resolution on the "unprincipled struggle of certain individuals for influence (elements of 'ataman-ism')." Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 68–9 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 7–11; Aug. 26, 1931), 104–5n6; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 847, l. 4; Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 188n1 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 265, l. 75–137; op. 3, d. 857, l. 9, 12–19).

79. Lakoba wrote: "Koba: Will Beria do for South Caucasus? Me: The only person who works properly is Beria." Hoover Archives, Lakoba papers, notes (1931) of a conversation with Stalin and Orjonikidze. Stalin rejected Polonsky as inappropriate to run the South Caucasus party because "he does not speak any of the local languages." Khlevniuk, Stalin i Kaganovich, 276 (RGASPI, f. 82, op. 3, d. 99, l. 153–5).

80. Makarova, "Stalin i 'blizhnyi krug,'" 302. "Dear Comrade Nestor!" Beria wrote (Sept. 27, 1931). "I send my greetings and best wishes. Thank you for the letter. I'd very much like to meet with Koba before he leaves. It'd be good if you could remind him about this if the opportunity arises . . . Regards. Your Lavrenti Beria." Lakoba, "Ia Koba, a ty Lakoba," 60. Some believe Stalin first met Beria on Nov. 6, 1920, when Stalin addressed a crowd at the Baku Soviet and Beria, fresh out of a Georgian Menshevik prison, worked as business-manager of the Azerbaijan Central Committee. Some say it took place in summer 1923, in Moscow at Stalin's Zubalovo dacha, or in fall 1923 at a resort in Abkhazia. Whenever the pair first met, Beria got to know Stalin up close thanks to Lakoba. Iskenderov, Iz istorii bor'by kommunisticheskoi partii Azerbaïdzhana, 527–8; Knight, Beria, 33 (citing interview with Devi Sturua, son of Georgi Sturua).

81. Zaria vostoka, Nov. 15, 1931; Esaishvili, Ocherki istorii Kommunisticheskoi partii Gruzii, II: 115–6. “I will not work with that charlatan,” Kartvelishvili supposedly objected when Stalin had told him he was going to get Beria as his deputy (second secretary of South Caucasus regional party committee). Medvedev, Let History Judge, 462–3 (citing A. V. Snegov, former member of the South Caucasus party committee bureau); Khrushchev, “O kul’te lichnosti,” 155–6; Deviatiy v sesoiuznyi i “ezd professional’nykh soiuзов SSSR, 205, 253. Using the Russified name Lavrentyev, Kartvelishvili would serve as party boss of the Soviet Far East territory from 1933 through Dec. 1936.

82. Beria wrote to Kaganovich (July 13, 1932) in a familiar tone, outlining his work so far and requesting a reduction in grain delivery quotas—a touchy subject with Stalin. Beria mentioned grave difficulties arising from massive livestock destruction—under his predecessor—an absence of cash, different options for locating a coke-chemical plant, the critical need to improve rail transport, overseen by Papuliya Orjonikidze (Sergo Orjonikidze’s elder brother). Beria added pointedly: “I was twice at Koba’s and had the chance to inform him in detail about our affairs. The materials concerning the matters addressed in this letter were also conveyed to comrade Koba.” Sokolov, Beria, 83–4; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 75, l. 15.

83. On June 21, 1932, Orakhelashvili was disciplined for “groupism [gruppovshchina],” and his wife, Maria, was removed for supposedly inciting the Georgian Communist party against the South Caucasus regional party committee with “false rumors,” particularly against “comrade Beria.” Blauvelt, “Abkhazia Patronage” (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 82, l. 88). Stalin wrote to Kaganovich: “My opinion: for all the angularity of Beria’s actions,” it is Orakhelashvili who’s wrong in this. . . . Everyone says that the positive work is going very well in Georgia [under Beria], and the mood of the peasants has improved.” Kaganovich wrote to Stalin (June 23) supporting Beria. When Orakhelashvili asked for the grain quota to be lowered, Stalin lost all patience (July 24). Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 185, 189.

84. Orakhelashvili wrote to Orjonikidze of Beria (Aug. 1, 1932): “Our relations are worse and worse and unbearable. Comrade Beria does not come to see me, and we don’t even have telephone conversations . . . He behaves like some kind of League of Nations commissar appointed to a mandate country.” Orakhelashvili added that he had written to Stalin a month ago asking to be relieved of his duties as first secretary of the South Caucasus, but had received no response. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 186–9 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 92, d. 472, l. 1–2). See also Mlechin, KGB, 195; and Gazarian, “O Berii i sude nad Berietsami v Gruzii,” 113–4.

85. Stalin added: “Sergo insisted on the candidacy of Mamuliya for secretary of the Georgian party, but now it is obvious that Mamuliya is not worth even Beria’s left foot.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 276 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 153–5), 283–5 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 740, l. 153–60).

86. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 276n3 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 903, l. 8); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 75, l. 15: Oct. 9, 1932; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 903, l. 8. Konstantin “Tite” Lordkipanidze, not a close associate of Beria, was given the Georgian OGPU.

87. Thereafter, Beria would be recorded in Stalin’s office in 1933 (twice), 1935 (twice), 1936 (twice), 1937 (twice), and several times in 1938. Na prieme, 569.

88. In Dec. 1932, Lakoba wrote to Beria, with copies to Stalin and Kaganovich, protesting the reprimand given to himself and Ladariya for approaching the USSR Council of People’s Commissars without the authorization of the Georgian Central Committee on the question of again lowering the Abkhaz tobacco procurement target. Hoover Archives, Lakoba papers, 1–42. Bagirov, who had been in Moscow, had returned and told Beria that Lakoba had gossiped to Orjonikidze that Beria had been slandering Orjonikidze, supposedly saying that, back when the Menshevik uprising was crushed, “Sergo would have shot all Georgians if it hadn’t been for me.” Enraged, Beria wrote to Orjonikidze (Dec. 18, 1932), “I know there are many big-mouths among those who left the South Caucasus, and it is impossible to prohibit big-mouths from gossiping idiocies, I know that many rumors circulate about me and our work in the South Caucasus, but I cannot for the life of me understand what led comrade Lakoba, what goals he followed, when he informed you about false matters . . . Dear Sergo, you know me more than ten years. You know all my shortcomings, you know what I am capable of. . . . I admire you too much and value your relations too much. I ask you only one thing—don’t believe anyone.” Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 197–8 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 29, d. 413, 1–3). See also Knight, Beria, 50–1. In a March 2, 1933, letter to Orjonikidze, Beria complained that according to Lakoba, Levan Gogoberidze, on holiday in Sukhum, was spreading disinformation about Beria’s involvement in Musavat counterintelligence. Beria reviewed how the matter had been adjudicated in his favor in 1920 in the presence of Orjonikidze and others, and how Beria sent Orjonikidze an official decision of the Azerbaijan Central Committee in 1925. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 202–4 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 29, d. 414, 1–4). See also Mlechin, KGB, 193–4.

89. Artamonov, Spetsob"ekty Stalina, 137–8. A stone stairway of 870 steps to the beach below would be built.

90. Gosudarstvennaia okhrana Rossii, 47–9 (no citation). The regime had laid a road to Pitsunda in 1930. See also Sergei Deviatov et al., Garazh osobogo naznacheniia: 90 let na sluzhbe Otechestvu, 1921–2011 (Moscow: MediaPress), 157; and Rosenfeldt, "Special" World, 168–70.

91. Zhukov, "Tak, byl li 'zagovor' Tukhachevskogo?" (Gagra and Sochi incidents). After Stalin's death, Chechulin would testify (Oct. 14, 1953): "In order to avoid being shot at again, this time from closer range, I leapt from the glass cabin and told the drivers that the launch should take only a straight course, to the open sea. . . . Comrade Stalin initially attributed the shooting at the launch, after a three-hour stay on the shore in the Pitsunda area, to Abkhaz customs, saying that among the Abkhaz it was customary to greet guests by firing shots. But when the rifle shots rang out so severely, comrade Stalin, it seems, changed his mind about such firing, so that by the time we returned to Cold Spring in order to ascertain the cause of the shots, that very night, as soon as we disembarked, he sent Bogdanov to Pitsunda. . . . Five days after the shooting of the launch, a letter came to Cold Spring from one of the border guards, whose name I do not recall. In that letter he asked comrade Stalin to forgive him for firing at the launch, and explained that he had taken the launch to be not ours (foreign). That launch did in fact appear in the Pitsunda area for the first time. . . . I reported the content of this letter to comrade Stalin. He heard me out and took the letter."

92. Popov and Oppokov, "Berievshchina" (1991, no. 1), 47.

93. The fired OGPU chief was A. N. Mikeladze. In 1937, the incident was reclassified as a terrorist act; Lavrov as well as Mikeladze would be shot. Lakoba, "'Ia Koba, a ty Lakoba,'" 61–3.

94. Popov and Oppokov, "Berievshchina" (1991, no. 1), 46–7; Zen'kovich, Marshaly i genseki, 196–8. Vlasik late in life erroneously dated the incident to 1935, and perceived an interconnected conspiracy: this attempt on Stalin's life, the Kirov murder, the death of Kuibyshev, etc., all the work of a "fifth column." Loginov, Teni Stalina, 98–9.

95. Dimitrov's words and a broad counternarrative to Nazi propaganda were propagated in the global press by the Comintern and its media wizard Willi Münzenberg, who had created the Münzenberg Trust (encompassing newspapers, magazines, and film production companies), the fourth-largest media organization in the Weimar Republic. When Nazi newspaper accounts tied Münzenberg to the Reichstag fire, he fled into exile. Gross, Willi Münzenberg.

96. Kaganovich had opposed Koltsov's request to travel to Paris for the reportage, but Stalin had approved it. The trial would end on Dec. 23, 1933, and the Dutch Communist Marinus van der Lubbe would be guillotined in Jan. 1934. Litvinov wrote to Stalin, regarding Soviet personnel in Berlin, "In the opinion of the foreign affairs commissariat, given the current political situation in Germany, it would be inconvenient to have a single-race composition of the upper stratum of the embassy." In 1934, Khinchuk would be replaced by Jacob Surits, who, however, was also Jewish (he had a law degree from the University of Berlin and had been a member of the Jewish Bund). Sluch, "Germano-sovetskie otnosheniia," 106 (AVP RF, f. 05, op. 13, pap. 94, d. 78, l. 46).

97. DGFP, series C, I: 848–51 (Thomsen, Sept. 26, 1933), 851–3 (Bernhard von Bülow, Sept. 26). German government actions against Soviet citizens and property effectively provoked the Soviet cancellation. Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 81; Niclauss, Die Sowjetunion, 134–41. Going back to the nineteenth century, "the German and Russian economies were basically complementary so that there existed a broad basis for economic cooperation . . . in the absence of offsetting political factors." For the Germans, the goal has always been to increase foreign trade, while for the Russians, it was to advance domestic industrialization. Shoemaker, "Russo-German Economic Relations," 336.

98. In 1931, Hitler had proposed an Anglo-German partnership to British journalists invited to the Brown House in Munich, offering a free hand at sea in exchange for a free hand on the continent in the East. This was the beginning of a long bilateral courtship. Hildebrand, Foreign Policy, 25. See also Wagener, Memoirs of a Confidant, 173–4. (Wagener worked closely with Hitler 1929–32 and wrote these recollections in 1946 in British captivity.) Hitler turned to Joachim von Ribbentrop, who visited London in Nov. 1933 as a special envoy to forge an entente against the Bolshevik menace. Hoover Institution Archives, Louis P. Lorchner Collection, Ribbentrop to Hitler original files, 1933–38: Nov. 20 and 26, 1933; Bloch, Ribbentrop, 41–4; Waddington, Hitler's Crusade, 69 (citing House of Lords, Davidson papers, memo Nov. 20, 1933); Winterbotham, Nazi Connection, 53–4; Ernest William Dalrymple Tennant, True Account (London: M. Parish, 1957), 164–9; Davidson, Memoirs of a Conservative, 399–401; von Ribbentrop, Memoirs, 36–7.

99. Le Matin (Nov. 23, 1933).

100. Stalin's fixation on Polish spies in Ukraine revealed his and the wider regime's fears about Soviet vulnerabilities. See the tortured case of the head of the Polish section of the Chernigov province party committee, Boleslaw Skarbek, executed for leading a fictive clandestine "Polish military organization" on Soviet soil. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 460 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 240, l. 105–6), 467–8 (d. 243, l. 86–8), 525–6 (d. 245, l. 59–60), 530 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 16, l. 86); Snyder, Sketches from a Secret War, 116–7; Rubl'ov and Reprinstev, "Repressii protiv poliakov," 121; Mitzner, "Widmo POW," 22.

101. Negotiations had opened on June 26, 1933. Stalin, in the fall, instructed Kaganovich and Molotov to conduct a campaign against Japan in Pravda and to a lesser extent Izvestiya and to republish an internal-use anti-Japanese brochure for wide circulation. Lensen, Damned Inheritance, 237–334; Haslam, Threat from the East, 22–24; DVP SSSR, XVI: 573–5 (Sokolnikov to Yurenev in Tokyo: Oct. 17, 1933); Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 396–7 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 131–4; Oct. 21, 1933), 401 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 741, l. 112–5; Oct. 24); Na prieme, 111–2. Roosevelt had promised Litvinov "100 percent moral and diplomatic support" against Japan, and even ordered Bullitt to study the possibility of a nonaggression pact. The U.S. State Department had no interest. Stalin, meanwhile, had used Sokolnikov to undercut Karakhan, a hawk on Japan: on May 25, 1933, the politburo had named Sokolnikov deputy foreign affairs commissar for Far Eastern Affairs (Japan, China, Mongolia); Karakhan was reduced to oversight of just the Near East. Genis, "Upriamyi narkom s il'inki," 238. Ken and Rusapov, Zapadnoe zagranich'e, 596–7 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 923, l. 18). Sokolnikov was also placed on the politburo's Mongolia commission (soon becoming deputy to Voroshilov on that body).

102. Niclauss, Die Sowjetunion, 134–6. Yenukidze, who oversaw many sensitive government affairs, had gone on holiday to Germany in summer 1933; back in the Soviet Union, he invited German ambassador Dirksen and his aide Twardowski to his dacha in Aug. 1933; Krestinsky and Karakhan, deputy commissars, the former a former Soviet envoy to Berlin, also attended. Yenukidze, described by Dirksen as "a fair-haired, blue-eyed, kindly Georgian with definite pro-German leanings," ventured that the statists would triumph over the agitators in National Socialism; Dirksen and Twardowski agreed that a modus vivendi could be found with Moscow.

103. When Twardowski explained to Litvinov the reasons for German abandonment of the League, "Mr. Litvinov demonstrated such understanding of our position that I expressed regrets that such a stance of the leader of Soviet foreign policy did not find expression in the Soviet press." DGFP, series C, II: 14–9 (Oct. 17, 1933). See also Bennett, German Rearmament. On Nov. 12, 1933, 93 percent of German voters had approved the German government's decision to withdraw from the League and 92 percent voted for Nazi candidates (the only party allowed to stand).

104. Bloch, Ribbentrop, 40–1.

105. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 81, l. 141–144–144ob.

106. Krestinsky returned via Vienna. DGFP, series C, I: 862–4 (Bülow, Sept. 27), 901–4 (Twardowski with Stern, Oct. 10). Stalin opened a back channel through his foreign-policy fixer Radek, who helped arrange a meeting between Dirksen and Molotov. Dirksen, due to depart the Moscow posting (to be replaced by Rudolf Nadolny), returned to Moscow from Berlin on Oct. 28 and was afforded a lavish farewell dinner and gifts. Von Dirksen, Moscow, Tokyo, London, 116–8; Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 260–1; Gnedin, Iz istorii otnoshenii, 13, 22–3; Tucker, Stalin in Power, 235–6.

107. Back in Sept. 1930, Stalin, accompanied by Nadya, Svetlana, and Orjonikidze, had stayed for the first time at the Sinop villa in Sukhum's outskirts, where Trotsky used to stay. (In late 1931 Sinop was transferred from Abkhazia's agriculture commissariat to the USSR central executive committee.) Lakoba, Stalin's host in 1930, whisked the group the next day to reconnoiter Myussera, where Lakoba suggested creating a new dacha for Stalin. Stalin tweaked proposed secret passages between the buildings, three from his bedroom, including one directly to the hillside. Stalin asked for 50 mandarin trees; Lakoba had 100 planted of the Satsuma variety. Already in 1932, the main structure was pronounced usable, though far from finished, and in Sept. 1932 Stalin arrived to go hunting with Lakoba, Goglidze, Pauker, and Vlasik. Stalin demanded changes and Myussera, like Cold Spring, underwent much further construction. Lakoba Papers, Hoover Institution Archives, 2–28. Myussera ended up being used more by Molotov and Mikoyan (Stalin would stay a mere eight times through the end of his life).

108. The magnate was Stepan Lianosyan, known as Lianozov (whom John Reed had labeled “the Russian Rockefeller”). One more dacha was being built at Abkhazia’s stunning Lake Ritsa. By one account, in summer 1932, while visiting Cold Spring, in Abkhazia, with Nadya, Stalin was persuaded by Lakoba to travel by horseback up to Lake Ritsa, which formed part of the Bzyb River basin, and lay in a deep mountain hollow reached by a steep trail of sheer cliffs and landslides. The lake was cool in summers and warm in winters. Here, at the point where the Yupshara River flowed out of Ritsa, Lakoba oversaw construction on another dacha for Stalin. No mean feat: one of the trucks carrying construction materials collapsed a bridge and plunged. Dzhikhashvili, “Kavkaskie safari Stalina”; XX let Sovetskoi Abkhazii, 110. There were dachas for Stalin’s use on the Black Sea seashore in the area of Green Cape, about five miles north of Batum in Ajaria, at Borjomi (the former retreat of Georgian kings), in Crimea (Mukhalatka) and Valdai (between Moscow and Leningrad). The number would grow to eighteen total, including five in Abkhazia.

109. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 385–6 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 81, l. 134, 138), 386 (l. 134), 391–3 (d. 82, l. 6–7, 8, 9, 10; f. 17, op. 162, d. 15, l. 112, 124), 393 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 82, l. 5), 393–4 (l. 21–2), 394–5 (d. 741, l. 108–11); Cherniavskii, “Fenomenon Litvinova.”

110. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 408 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 741, l. 117–8); Na prieme, 112.

111. According to Molchanov, the “organization” aimed to overturn Soviet power and restore monarchism, and was led by Anna Abrikosova (b. 1882), the daughter of a former Moscow factory owner, and Anna Brilliantova (b. 1906), daughter of a former Menshevik, and financed with Catholic church money. They would be sentenced on Feb. 19, 1934, to either eight or ten years in Gulag. Abrikosova would die in the camp in 1936; the other would be rearrested while in confinement and executed in Oct. 1937. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 369–71 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 11, d. 1271, l. 1–3: Nov. 20, 1933).

112. In 1934, there would be at least four more. Hoffmann, Hitler’s Personal Security, 24.

113. Bilateral talks had been spurred by U.S. efforts to stabilize world wheat prices in summer 1933. Bowers, “American Diplomacy.” Recognition became official on Nov. 16, 1933. FRUS, 1933, II: 778–840; DVP SSSR, XVI: 609–10 (Litvinov telegrams, Nov. 8, 1933), 621–2 (Nov. 10), 639 (Nov. 15), 640 (joint communique, Nov. 15), 641–55 (exchange of notes and letters, Nov. 16), 655–8 (Litvinov press conference, Nov. 17), 658–60 (Litvinov telegram, Nov. 19), 662–3 (Litvinov telegram, Nov. 18), 655–6 (Kalinin radio address to America, Nov. 20), 666–7 (Litvinov telegrams, Nov. 20), 675 (Litvinov to Roosevelt, Nov. 22), 675–6 (Litvinov telegram, Nov. 22); Izvestiia, Nov. 20 and 23, 1933; http://nsar.chive.gwu.edu/coldwar/documents/epi_sode-1/fdr-ml.htm; <http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/?pid=14563>; <http://www.fdrlibrary.marist.edu/daybyday/daylog/november-17th-1933>. See also Bishop, Roosevelt-Litvinov Agreements; Maddux, Years of Estrangement, 1–26; and Browder, Origins of Soviet-American Diplomacy, 37, 45, 72, 85–6, 95, 99–152.

114. “This success for Soviet diplomacy,” Molotov stated at the central executive committee on Dec. 28, 1933, of the various Soviet bilateral agreements, “is inseparably linked with the name of Comrade Litvinov, whose services are widely recognized, but here we should especially underscore them.” Litvinov was given the floor the next day. DVP SSSR, XVI: 778–81 (at 779), 781–97. Litvinov would take to complaining about his “security” detail. “‘Ne chuvstvovat’ za soboiu topota,” 123–4 (APRF f. 57, op. 1, d. 18, l. 99–100; Litvinov to Yezhov, Sept. 9, 1935).

115. Lensen, Damned Inheritance, 361–445.

116. Crowley, Japan’s Quest for Autonomy, 190–6.

117. Stalin received considerable intelligence pointing to a Japanese desire for war against the USSR. In late Nov. 1933, after Hirota became Japan’s foreign minister, Stalin received an intercepted letter from the U.S. ambassador in Japan to Washington indicating Hirota’s promotion heralded a more aggressive Japanese posture. That same month, the OGPU sent Stalin intelligence obtained in Paris in the circles of the former prime minister Kokovtsov, who had a document from Japan concerning “the manifest threat to the main Japanese islands over which Soviet squadrons could appear in a few hours . . .” Stalin underscored this passage and wrote, “for Klim.” On Jan. 14, 1934, Artuzov and Agranov sent Stalin a Russian translation of an article published back in April 1933 in a closed journal of the Japanese general staff bruiting war with the Soviet Union. On Feb. 26, Yagoda sent Stalin materials from the Japanese military attaché (Kawabe) assessing the technical level of the Red Army, and stating, “in defense industry the USSR has freed itself of foreign dependence.” Stalin underlined the passage. On March 11, Yagoda sent Stalin materials dispatched by the Japanese military attaché in Turkey to Tokyo (dated Feb. 15) on mobilizing Muslim peoples against the USSR through propaganda, and asking for finances to set it up. The document asserted that “the interests of England and the USSR [are] in irreconcilable contradiction”—a passage Stalin underlined. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 185, l. 126–32; d. 186, l. 1, 37–53, 91–5, 118–26; Crowley, Japan's Quest for Autonomy, 206; Haslam, Threat from the East, 38–9. Germany learned that Litvinov had expressed fears of a Japanese attack as well as a German-Polish reconciliation, and thus of a triple alliance against the USSR, on a visit to Rome: DGFP series C, II: 183 (Hassell, Dec. 7, 1933).

118. Moscow Daily News, Dec. 30, 1933. Marx spent eight weeks on tour. Litvinov did the knives routine himself, to Harpo's surprise, at the final performance. Harpo evidently served as a secret courier, smuggling letters for Ambassador Bullitt by taping sealed envelopes to his leg under his pants. Marx, Harpo Speaks!, 299–337; Fromkin, In the Time of the Americans; Harlow, “Secrets in His Socks.”

119. FRUS, The Soviet Union, 1933–1939, 53–4 (Bullitt, Dec. 24, 1933), 60–1 (Jan. 4).

120. Costigliola, Roosevelt's Lost Alliances, 268.

121. Bullitt returned the kiss. Bullitt, For the President, 68–9 (Jan. 1, 1934); FRUS, The Soviet Union, 1933–1939, 59–61 (Bullitt to Phillips, Jan. 4, 1934); Farnsworth, Bullitt and the Soviet Union, 109–14; and Tucker, Stalin in Power, 224. Soviet counterintelligence used the ballerina Irena Charnodskaya, who made the rounds of Bullitt and his bachelor aides, Chip Bohlen and Charles Thayer. “We simply cannot keep our hands off her,” Thayer wrote. “She has become an acquisition of the Embassy and . . . sleep[s] in some vacant room which the three of us carefully lock together and then fight violently as to who will keep the key . . . What an embassy!” The exuberance would end quickly for all. Costigliola, Roosevelt's Lost Alliances, 263–70 (citing Thayer diary, April 14–May 20, 1934, box 6, Thayer papers; Bohlen to Mother, April 15–May 15, 1934, box 36, Bohlen papers); George F. Kennan, Memoirs, 1950–1963, 126; “Fair Day, Adieu!,” p. 18, box 240, Kennan papers; Kennan, Memoirs, 1925–1950, 190; Kennan, “Flashbacks,” in At a Century's Ending, 31.

122. The text also noted that the situation in the United States “is most favorable for the establishment of socialism.” Eudin and Slusser, Soviet Foreign Policy, II: 577–85; Theses and Decisions, 20–47.

123. “Stalin to Duranty,” Time, Jan. 8, 1934: 26. See also Sochineniia, XIII: 276–81, and the slightly longer Soviet transcript: RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 374, l. 1–6; Na prieme, 118. Duranty had been allowed to accompany Litvinov to Washington in Nov., and returned to Moscow with Bullitt in Dec. See also Duranty, I Write as I Please, 166–7; and Taylor, Stalin's Apologist, 190–2. Thayer, the U.S. embassy official, wrote of Duranty, “Always witty, always ready to take any side in an argument, he usually kept every party he was at in an uproar of argument and vituperation.” Thayer, Bears in the Caviar, 60.

124. DVP SSSR, XVI: 772–4 (Dovgalevsky, Dec. 29, 1933), 876–7n321. The politburo had resolved (Dec. 19, 1933) to join the League and enter a regional pact in the framework of the League, in the face of Nazi aggression, under certain conditions. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b) i Evropa, 305–6 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 15, l. 154–5; Dec. 19, 1933). A possible new “collective security” policy was also discussed by the Central Committee (Dec. 29, 1933), among the last prewar instances when the Central Committee was tasked with discussing Soviet foreign policy. On Dovgalevsky (who had become ambassador to France in Jan. 1928), see Barmine, One Who Survived, 178.

125. At a Dec. 9, 1933, Kremlin meeting Stalin gave the go-ahead for formal negotiations with France. “We have adopted a firm course of closer relations with France,” Litvinov overly enthused in a telegram to Dovgalevsky. Soviet proposals did go far beyond the original French idea, insisting that holdout League members had to extend diplomatic recognition to the USSR, colonial mandates had to be revised (a major plank of Soviet propaganda), and a regional pact had to include not only Poland but also the Baltic states, Finland, and Czechoslovakia, as well as security assistance if Japan attacked the USSR in Asia. Borisov, Sovetsko-frantsuzskie otnosheniia, 202 (AVP RF, f. 0136, op. 17, pap. 159, d. 778, l. 79), 204; DVP SSSR, XVI: 576–8 (Oct. 20, 1933), 773, 735–6 (Dec. 11, 1933); 876–7 n321; DDF 1e série, IV: 160–1, 165; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 15; Paul-Boncour, Entre deux guerres, I: 363–4; Dullin, “La rôle de l'Allemagne,” 245–62. Litvinov also urged the signing of a trade pact, however modest. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 752. Even if the Soviet Union represented an important market, the two countries could not get beyond the Soviets' repudiation of tsarist-era debt. French elite circles also remained embittered at the confiscation without compensation of some 13 billion gold rubles in investments from tsarist times. Some private French arms dealers refused to sell to the Communists for fear of reverse engineering or because the orders were too small for the bother. Dullin, Men of Influence, 100.

¹²⁶ The visit took place Aug. 26–Sept. 9, 1933. Pravda underscored that Herriot “categorically contradicted the lies of the bourgeois press in connection with a famine in the USSR.” Pravda, Sept. 13, 1934; Werth et al., Black Book of Communism, 159–60; Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 311 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 80, l. 24), 317 (l. 41). Laval’s fellow Radical Party member Pierre Cot, air minister in the government, followed Herriot, arriving in Moscow with an air squadron on Sept. 15, and becoming the first foreign delegation afforded Soviet military honors. Izvestiia, Sept. 15, 24, and 25, 1933. Cot was allowed to observe aviation maneuvers and the secret bomber factory in Fili outside Moscow—the Germans had just evacuated their secret air training station at Lipetsk three days before—and became the object of intense attention by Soviet intelligence. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 598–9 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 203, l. 19–21). Cot, based on the WWII intercepts, would later be tagged as a Soviet “agent.” Romerstein and Breindel, Venona Secrets, 56–7. Draitser, Stalin’s Romeo Spy, 191. See also Baker, Rezident; and Stavinskii, Zarubiny.

¹²⁷ Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 198–9 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 45, l. 70–70ob.).

¹²⁸ Eldev-Ochir, a leftist and scourge of the lamas, had been Mongolian People’s Party leader for a year in 1929–30, during the catastrophe that had compelled the new course correction. In July 1932, he served a second term (for one month), giving way to Lhumbe (b. 1902). On Oct. 8, 1933, the politburo Mongolia commission discussed “the matter of a spy organization,” and Eliava received instructions to root out pro-Japanese elements and prepare for possible war and evacuation. Between July 1933 and June 1934, there would be perhaps 2,000 arrests in a campaign against “left deviationists” and a so-called Lhumbe group accused of spying for the Japanese. At least fifty-six Mongols would be executed, including Lhumbe. On May 23, 1934, the politburo directed Artuzov to “make a complete list of Mongolians who had come to the Soviet Union at various times.” RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 15, l. 100, 125–7; d. 16, l. 63. M. Chibisov, a Soviet proconsul who helped fabricate the Lhumbe Affair, would remark upon departure from Mongolia for Moscow in July 1934: “Stalin has already said that all lamas are counterrevolutionaries. They must be convicted as traitors before the people.” Sandag and Kendall, Poisoned Arrows, 76. See also Baabar, Twentieth-Century Mongolia, 327–33. Karakhan would tell American ambassador Bullitt about the discovery of a Japanese plot to replace the Mongolian government with a pro-Japanese government, and, in a further fabrication, how the Mongols had again asked to be admitted into the USSR as a Union republic but the Soviets declined, demonstrating they were not imperialists. FRUS, 1934, III: 232–3.

¹²⁹ Stalin suggested cutting by half the 4,000 Soviet personnel in country. He asked the Mongols (in terms of language), “Can you understand Buryats (yes), Qalmyks (somewhat), Tuvin (no)?” The conversation between Dobchin (b. 1896), a deputy prime minister, and Eldev-Ochir (b. 1905), a Central Committee secretary and presidium member, and Sokolnikov/Voroshilov was written down from memory. RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 10, l. 1–7.

¹³⁰ RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 11, l. 1: Jan. 16, 1935. The politburo had allocated 100,000 rubles for Genden’s delegation: RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 953, l. 58 (Oct. 19, 1934).

¹³¹ “‘Zhmu vashemu ruku, dorogoi tovarishch’: perepiska Maksima Gorkogo i Iosifa Stalina” Novy Mir, 1997, no. 9: 169; Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 124–5 (IMLL, arkhiv Gor’kogo: Jan. 8, 1930); Sochineniia, XII: 177. “I am not an expert in literature and, of course, not a critic,” Stalin wrote, also in 1930, while intervening to support a leftist playwright and poet, Alexander Bezmyenskii (Stalin did fault Bezmyenskii for “some holdovers of Communist Youth League avant-gardism”). Sochineniia, XII: 200–1; Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 180–1. Back in 1925, Stalin had responded to an inquiry from enlightenment commissar Lunacharsky about the Bolshoi Theater’s centenary, “I am not strong in artistic matters, as you yourself know, and I do not dare say anything decisive in this area.” RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 760, 146–8.

¹³² Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 157–9 (RGALI, f. 2750, op. 1, d. 140, 141: Oct. 29 and Nov. 9, 1931); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 858, l. 6. Initially permitted as an experiment, the play was terminated during rehearsals in spring 1932.

¹³³ At a deeper level, the novel took up mythmaking, salvation through a woman, eternity versus the cut and thrust of the moment, an atheist turned into a believer, the urban environment as a character, and estrangement of the physical world—all hallmarks of Bulgakov’s work. Proffer, Bulgakov, 146. “I love this novel more than all my other writings,” Bulgakov observed in Oct. 1924 of White Guard. Brainina and Dmitrieva, Sovetskie pisateli, III: 86.

¹³⁴ Rossia, 1926, no. 4 and 5. A pirated Russian edition of the full novel appeared in Riga in 1927. A complete Russian version, corrected by Bulgakov, was published in Paris under the revised title: Dni Turbinykh (Belaia gvardiia), 2 vols. (Paris: Concorde, 1927). Proffer, Bulgakov, 137–9; Agursky, Third Rome, 305–17; Bulgakov, Early Plays, 86–8. The publisher of the journal Russia, Isai Altshtuler, known as Lezhnev, emigrated to Estonia in 1926 and soon declared himself the official representative to sell the rights abroad of Bulgakov's works, prompting the writer to issue a denial through TASS of any such right. Lyandres, "Russkii pisatel" (Jan. 9, 1928); "Teatral'nyi roman," in Bulgakov, Izbrannaia proza, 518–41; Chudakova, "Arkhiv Bulgakova."

¹³⁵ Boris Vershilov, head of the Moscow Art Theater's second studio, had sent Bulgakov a penciled note after reading White Guard asking him to render it into a play, which the writer did in four months. Curtis, Manuscripts Don't Burn, 62. It had premiered on Oct. 5, 1926. Gorchakov, Istoriia Sovetskogo teatra, 132–5; Gorchakov, Theater in Soviet Russia. How the play had gotten approved stumped Moscow cultural circles. Lunacharsky was ordered to open it in a private phone call from Stalin, a fact kept secret. Lunacharsky Moskovskie novosti, April 25, 1993; APRE, f. 3, op. 34, d. 240, l. 2; d. 239, l. 23; Sarnov, Stalin i pisateli, II: 421–2; Krylov, Puti razvitiia teatra, 232; "Pervye novinki sezona," Izvestiia, Oct. 1926, reprinted in Lunacharskii, Sobranie sochinenii, III: 325–31; Gorchakov, Istoriia Sovetskogo teatra, 133. Gorchakov, Theater in Soviet Russia, 185–7.

¹³⁶ Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 68, 82, 86–8, 742n2. See also Pravda, Feb. 9, 1930 (Kerzhentsev).

¹³⁷ "Polozhenie ego deistvitel'no bezyskhodnoe": 110–4 (APRE, f. 3, op. 1, d. 241, l. 69–80; Kerzhentsev, Jan. 6, 1929), 114 (l. 83; Voroshilov to Stalin, Jan. 29), 115 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 724, l. 5; Jan. 30); Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 91–6, 99, 100; Proffer, Bulgakov, 275–87.

¹³⁸ On Feb. 2, 1929, Stalin had written an open reply to the proletarian playwright Vladimir Belotserkovsky that Turbins "is not such a bad play, because it does more good than harm. Do not forget that the chief impression it leaves with the spectator is one that is favorable to the Bolsheviks: 'if even such people as the Turbins are compelled to lay down their arms and submit to the will of the people, admit their cause as definitely lost, then the Bolsheviks must be invincible, and there is nothing to be done about it.' Days of the Turbins is a demonstration of the all-conquering power of Bolshevism. Of course, the author is 'not guilty' of this demonstration, but what is that to us?" Sochineniia, XI: 326–9. See also Kemp-Welch, Stalin and the Literary Intelligentsia, 53–5. See also Lunacharsky's letter to Stalin on Turbins: Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 108–9 (RGASPI, f. 142, op. 1, d. 461, l. 8–80b.; Feb. 12, 1929); Smeliarsky, "Destroyers"; and L. M. Leonidov, in Sovetskoe iskusstvo, Dec. 21, 1939.

¹³⁹ Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 102–7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 4490, l. 3–17; Feb. 12, 1929). See also Shapoval, "Oni chuvstvuiut sebia, kak gosti . . .," 120–6. The "brotherly" visit of the Ukrainian writers' delegation was accompanied by exhibitions and performances as part of a Ukrainian week, punctuated by the audience with Stalin. Pravda, Feb. 9, 12, 13, 14, 1929.

¹⁴⁰ Curtis, Manuscripts Don't Burn, 92–4 (July 1929). Bulgakov had just had a chapter of a new novel rejected for publication. On July 30, 1929, A. Svidersky, a former agricultural commissar overseeing arts in the enlightenment commissariat, reported sympathetically to Alexander Smirnov, a Central Committee secretary, about a long conversation with Bulgakov, whom he characterized as "a person hounded and doomed. I am not even sure his nerves are healthy. His situation is genuinely hopeless." Svidersky supported Bulgakov's request to go abroad. Smirnov agreed in a note to Molotov (Aug. 3, 1929). "Polozhenie ego deistvitel'no bezyskhodnoe," 116 (APRE, f. 3, op. 34, d. 239, l. 6); Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 115. Bulgakov was not allowed to leave.

¹⁴¹ Stalin had the letter circulated to the upper party and state ranks. Oktiabr', 1987, no. 6: 176–80; Milne, Mikhail Bulgakov, 268–74.

¹⁴² Bulgakova, Dnevnik, 299–300; Bulgakov and Bulgakova, Dnevnik Mastera i Margarity, 497; Bulgakov, Vospominaniia, 394 (L. E. Belozerskaya); "Polozhenie ego deistvitel'no bezyskhodnoe": 116 (APRE, f. 3, op. 34, d. 239, l. 6); Fleishman, "O gibeli maiakovskovo kak 'literaturnom fakte,'" 128; Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 127 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 783, l. 11). See also Gromov, Stalin, 114–6.

¹⁴³ Woroszylski, Life of Mayakovsky, 514–30 (esp. 526); Sundaram, "Manufacturing Culture," 75–87. Trotsky wrote an obituary (Biulleten' oppozitsii, May 11, 1930), but Stalin stayed publicly silent. More than 100,000 mourners, with no prompting from the state, had turned out for Mayakovsky's burial in the Novodevichy Cemetery, a number surprised only at Lenin's Red Square funeral. Boyrn, "Death of the Revolutionary Poet," 158.

Mayakovsky was involved in a recent romance with a very young married woman, the actress Veronika Polonskaya, who refused to leave her husband. On April 14, when he shot himself in the heart, Polonskaya had just left his apartment to attend a rehearsal against his protestations. Rumors spread that the bullet removed from Mayakovsky did not match the revolver he owned (a prop in a play), and that neighbors had heard two shots. Ten days after the poet's death, the investigating police officer was killed. The handwritten suicide note, however, was unquestionably Mayakovsky's. "The idea of suicide was like a chronic disease inside him," his former lover and muse Lily Brik would write, "and like any chronic disease it worsened under circumstances that, for him, were undesirable." The official report of his death stated that "the suicide was caused by reasons of a purely personal order, having nothing in general to do with the public and literary activity of the poet, the suicide was preceded by an illness from which the poet still had not completely recovered." Pravda, April 15, 1930. The suicide spurred the removal of the poet's works from children and youth libraries. Literaturnaiia gazeta, July 10, 1930. See also Brown, Mayakovsky; and Terras, Vladimir Mayakovsky.

144. On May 30, 1931, Bulgakov wrote a long letter to Stalin, quoting Gogol, vainly requesting a long rest holiday in Europe, stating he had never been abroad, contrary to published accounts, and pledging his loyalty ("I do not know if the Soviet theater needs me, but I need the Soviet theater like oxygen"). Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 147–50 (otdel rukopisi GPB, f. 562, k. 19, d. 30). In 1931, Stalin allowed both Pilnyak and Zamyatin to travel to Western Europe, and in 1932 Babel would be permitted to travel to Paris, where his wife was undergoing an operation. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 180 (APRE, f. 3, op. 34, d. 206, l. 21).

145. Paustovsky, Story of a Life, 63–5. Bulgakov persisted in his supplications to be permitted to travel to France and Italy, writing to Stalin (June 11, 1934) that functionaries must be afraid he would defect. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 210–3 (APRE, f. 3, op. 34, d. 206, l. 37–380b.). Bulgakov would write one more letter to Stalin (Feb. 1938) about the fate of his friend Nikolai Erdman.

146. During the civil war, Red Army soldiers at the front recited Bedny's colloquial verses (they were also dropped by airplanes behind White lines). Bedny had received an Order of the Red Banner on the occasion of an infirm Lenin's last birthday, the first such award for literary efforts in Soviet history. Trotsky had pushed for the prize: Bedny had ridden his civil war train and helped him inspire the troops. But during the intraparty struggle Bedny slashed at Trotsky ("a spent politician"). Bedny suffered high sugar levels and was overweight, and Stalin allocated scarce foreign currency for his diabetes treatment in Germany. Bedny wrote a report for Stalin about his trip, jokingly noting that his wife had gone crazy over the cleanliness, order, and abundance of consumer goods in the dying capitalist world ("She stands in front of any store window and dies, dies. You drag her away, and she stares at the next window"). Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 129 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 739, l. 39–40: July 19, 1928), 129–33 (d. 701, l. 43–5: Sept. 20; Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 114 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 7, l. 96); Volkogonov papers, Hoover Archives, container 18; Trotskii, Literaturniia i revoliutsiia, 166–7. "Nobody ever worked so wholeheartedly for the Soviet regime," Nadezhda Mandelstam biting wrote about Bedny. Mandelstam, Hope Against Hope, 26.

147. "Receiving your assignment, I turned for advice to a very well-informed, authoritative comrade, to whom I usually approach in similar or delicate or, I would say, shock-work tasks," Bedny wrote to Blyukher, commander for the Soviet Far East who had asked for a poem. The poet alluded to how his unnamed "adviser," "grinning and removing his immutable pipe from his mouth," had suggested a folk rhyme. Bedny, in Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, XVII: 76 (1929).

148. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 131 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 718, l. 82–82ob.: Nov. 2, 1930), 131–2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 201, l. 13: Dec. 6).

149. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 132–3 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 939, l. 7–9), 134–7 (l. 1–6. Stalin would include the rebuke in his collected works: Sochineniia, XIII: 23–6. Bedny continued to step on the wrong toes. Kaganovich asked Stalin to read Bedny's poem ("What Next?"), which Izvestiia had published (Sept. 23, 1931), and which seemed potentially provocative to Japan. Kaganovich indicated Litvinov had approved and possibly commissioned the poem. "I did not read and have no intention of reading Demyan's verses, since I am sure they are not worth it," Stalin wrote back (Sept. 29). Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 119–20 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 739, l. 129–35), 122 (f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 40; f. 17, op. 114, d. 264, l. 11). See also Tucker, Stalin as Revolutionary, 470–1; Dubrovsky, “Chronicle of a Poet’s Downfall,” 188–90; and Chuev, Sto sorok, 269.

¹⁵⁰ Bedny’s apartment served as a salon of artistic life. It was here that Fyodor Chaliapin met Stalin. “Stalin spoke little, and when he did it was with a fairly strong Caucasus accent,” the singer would recall. “Yet everything he said had a weighty ring to it, perhaps because he spoke briefly. From his short sentences, which were not always clear in meaning but energetic in tone, I went away with the impression that this was a man who did not fool around. If necessary he could easily—as easily as his light lezginka step-in soft boots—do a dance or blow up the cathedral of Christ the Savior.” Medvedev, Let History Judge, 65 (citing Izvestiia 1962, no. 249).

¹⁵¹ Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 246–7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 702, l. 68), 248 (l. 68, 70), 269 (f. 667, op. 1, d. 18, l. 6: Nov. 19, 1932).

¹⁵² Stalin evidently showed the Izvestiia editor Gronskey a journal full of Bedny’s unflattering remarks about the denizens of the Kremlin, which, Stalin explained, had been written by a “journalist.” (Gronskey has the story slightly garbled, because Bedny got the Order of Lenin, and it was before the writers’ congress.) Gronskey, Iz proshlogo, 155. Bedny appears to have made the same complaint to Fyodor Raskolnikov, according to memoirs of Raskolnikov’s wife. Kanivez, “Moia zhizn’ s Raskol’nikovom,” 95. See also Gromov, Stalin, 166.

¹⁵³ Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b): povesti dnia zasedanii, II: 416 (April 13, 1933). Stalin did not have an Order of Lenin; he had two Orders of the Red Banner (Nov. 1919; Feb. 1930).

¹⁵⁴ Stalin had the letter circulated to the politburo for information. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 283–6 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 702, l. 79–84: April 5, 1933).

¹⁵⁵ Chukovskii, Dnevnik, 68 (Aug. 18, 1932).

¹⁵⁶ Stalin edited the draft decree, Partiinnoe stroitel’stvo, 1932, no. 9: 62; Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 168 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 875, l. 11: March 8, 1932), 172–3 (d. 881, l. 6, 22; op. 163, d. 938, l. 37–8: April 23, 1932). The theater director Vsevolod Meyerhold is said to have hung a framed copy of the decree on the wall in his expansive double apartment on Bryusov Lane, a few blocks up from Red Square. Kirpotin, Rovesnik zheleznoogo veka, 156–7.

¹⁵⁷ Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 176–7 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 941, l. 68–9). An architects’ union was also formed in 1932, but it would not hold its inaugural congress until 1937. The politburo formed a commission led by Stalin that concluded (June 7, 1932): “It is considered inexpedient to establish an organizational committee for musical organizations.” There were associations below the Union level, in Moscow and Leningrad, that did not have jurisdiction over each other. Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 29–32 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 300, l. 144). A decision to form a Composers’ Union would be made on May 3, 1939, but it would not be formed until 1948. Iakovlev, “Soiuz kompozitorov SSSR,” V: 232–3; Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 32 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1124, l. 81; d. 1509, l. 4–5).

¹⁵⁸ Na prieme, 68 (literary critic Leopold Averbakh, writer Vladimir Kirshon, Gronskey, and Stetsky), 70 (Gronskey, Stetsky, and Mekhlis).

¹⁵⁹ Gronskey, Iz proshlogo, 334–6 (letter to Aleksander Ovcharenko, Oct. 22, 1972). See also arkhiv A. M. Gor’kogo MoG-3–25–7 (Gronskey reminiscences with Gorky archive staff, Nov. 30, 1963); and Kemp-Welch, Stalin and the Literary Intelligentsia, 132.

¹⁶⁰ Gronskey was the proposed union’s working head, and leader of its party faction. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 175–6 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 14, d. 295, l. 1–3; APRE, f. 3, op. 35, d. 32, l. 24–24ob.: May 7, 1932); “Perepiska A. M. Gor’kogo s G. G. Iagodoi,” in Keldysh, Neizvestnyi Gor’kii, 168–206.

¹⁶¹ Gronskey, Iz proshlogo, 151–2. Gorky played a hand in getting Lev Kamenev appointed the first director of the Institute, but on Dec. 16, 1932, Kamenev was arrested. At that evening in the Bolshoi, Stalin had Henri Barbusse come to the stage from the audience and yielded him his seat. Izvestiia, Sept. 25 and 26, 1932. Andrei Bubnov, RSFSR commissar of enlightenment, on holiday in Gagra, had written to Stalin asking to be excused; Stalin ordered him to appear. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 44, l. 115.

¹⁶² In the play (1931), an old professor makes the accusation that Soviet society is built solely upon fear. Lyons, Six Soviet Plays, 585–9; Lih, “Melodrama and the Myth,” 178–207. On April 2, 1933, Afinogenov asked Stalin to read his new play called The Lie, which depicted how low-level party apparatchiks had to lie, and how their lies worked their way up the system, with consequences. Stalin made voluminous marginal comments, and wrote to Afinogenov that “the idea of the play is rich, the formulation of the idea came out not rich.” The Communists all seemed ugly, physically, morally, politically, Stalin noted, prohibiting its staging in that form. Afinogenov reworked his draft but, strangely, did not follow Stalin’s instructions. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 758n37 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 5088, l. 1), 758n38 (d. 4591, l. 4), 192 (d. 5088, l. 118–118ob.); Hindus, Crisis in the Kremlin, 249.

163. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 261–8 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1116, l. 20–7). Feoktist Berezovsky made notes of the Oct. 20 meeting (but would send the text to Stalin only on April 29, 1933). “It is easy to alienate a sympathizer,” Stalin pointed out, “and much harder to win him over.” He also stated: “Poems are good. Novels are even better. But at the moment more than anything we need plays.” RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1116, l. 29–31.

164. Zelinskii, “Odna vtrencha,” 156–7 (RGALI, f. 1604, op. 1, d. 21, l. 112–46). There would be no press coverage or official transcript of the meeting. Zelinskiy was observing Stalin up close for the first time. See also Maksimenkov, “Ocherki nomenklaturnoi istorii,” 221–4; Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 521; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1116, l. 28. The recollections in old age of Nikolai Nakoryakov (1881–1970), director in the 1930s of the state publishing for belles lettres, of another such meeting in 1933 are actually of the Oct. 1932 meeting. “Iz vospominanii: vstrecha Stalina s sovetскими pisateliami v 1933 godu” (arkhiv A. M. Gor’kogo, MoG-10–13–3: Feb. 3, 1966).

165. Kemp-Welch, Stalin and the Literary Intelligentsia, 131 (citing “vstrecha pisatelei s I. V. Stalinym,” arkhiv A. M. Gor’kogo, Oct. 26, 1932). The phrase resonated for some. “I immediately liked the permanently repeated aphorism: ‘writers are the engineers of human souls,’” Valentin Katayev noted, attributing it, however, to the writer Yuri Olyesha. Kataev, “Sobytie nebyvaloe,” 216.

166. Zelinskii, “Odna vtrencha,” 157, 160–1, 168.

167. “A Russian writer,” Gorky had written in a private letter back in 1902, “should never live in friendship with a Russian government.” Gorky, Letters of Gorky and Andreev, 41.

168. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 367 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 11, d. 510, l. 60); Antipina, Povednevnaia zhizn’, 107–10. At the entrance to one prisoner barrack, a “menu” had been hung, surrounded by flowers, with the saying “Eat, and build the way you eat.” The lunch was listed as cabbage soup, porridge with meat, fish cutlets with sauce, and pirozhki with cabbage. (“I with the pen, you with the shovel—together we built the canal,” wrote the prisoner Vladimir Kavshchyn.) Draskoczy, Belomor, 11 (citing RGALI, f. 1885, op. 3, d. 34, l. 100). “From the minute we became guests of the Chekists, complete Communism began for us,” recalled the then fledgling writer Alexander Avdeyenko, during this time of famine. “We ate and drank as we wanted, and paid for nothing. Smoked sausages. Cheeses. Caviar. Fruit. Chocolate. Wines. Brandy.” Avdeenko, “Otlučenje” (no. 3), 11, (no. 4), 80–133. A group of satirists wrote to Yagoda that “they were thrilled by the grandiose work of the OGPU!” Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 365 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 11, d. 510, l. 27; signed Kupriyanov, Krylov, Sokolov), 366 (l. 24, l. 68). The trip culminated in a copiously illustrated 400-page compilation published in early 1934 under Gorky’s name. Gor’kii et al., Belomorsko-Baltiiskii kanal imeni Stalina. Gorky et al., Belomor; Gorky et al., The White Sea Canal (London: National Centre for Marxist and ‘Left’ Literature, 1935). See also Solzhenitsyn, Gulag Archipelago, III: 78–101; and Ruder, Making History for Stalin, 47–52, 213–4.

169. XVII s’ezd, 620.

170. Back in 1929, in connection with Stalin’s official fiftieth birthday, Tovstukha’s Short Biography (1927), shorter than a newspaper article, had been slightly enlarged and reissued in Pravda (Dec. 21, 1929). Tovstukha promised more, but there the matter had stood.

171. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11 [4?], d. 1493, l. 50. Orjonikidze did not consider Koltsov’s draft a success, stating of Stalin “he will beat you and thrash me.” Koltsov nonetheless sent his text to the censor, which in turn forwarded it to Stalin, who supposedly read the manuscript, phoned Koltsov, told him “you praise me too much.” True or not, the book never saw the light of day. Chukovskii, Dnevnik, 38–9. Koltsov’s the “Riddle of Stalin,” published in connection with the official fiftieth birthday, had used the conceit that Stalin might be a riddle to the world bourgeoisie—“Stalin the enigma,” “the Communist sphinx,” “the incomprehensible personality”—but not to the Soviet worker. Pravda, Dec. 21, 1929.

172. Days, the émigré paper in Paris edited by Alexander Kerensky, had alleged in Oct. 1929 that members of the so-called right opposition had compromising documents on Stalin’s pre-1917 revolutionary past. They did not. The fabricated Yeremin “document” (a tsarist police official) appeared in the mid-1930s. (It would be published in Life on April 23, 1956.) Valdlen S. Izmozik, Zhendarmy Rossii (St. Petersburg: Neva, 2002), 466–8. The collection Batumskaia demonstratsiia 1902 goda (Moscow: Partizdat, 1937) contained recollections that Stalin had escaped from Eastern Siberian exile and traveled back to the Caucasus using a fabricated police I.D. in his name.

173. The memoirist Isosif “Soso” Iremashvili also claimed Stalin had emerged with “a grim and bitter hatred against the seminary administration, the bourgeoisie, and all that existed in the country and represented tsarism.” Iremashvili, Stalin und die Tragödie Georgiens, 6, 11–2, 24; Tucker, Stalin as Revolutionary, 73.

174. The Comintern operative (Münzenberg) also mentioned Boris Bazhanov, the defector from Stalin’s secretariat, who published a damning exposé in French (1930) and German (1931). Kun, Stalin, 69–70; RGASPI, f. 155, op. 1, d. 85, l. 1, 3.

175. Bey, Career of a Fanatic; and Bey, Stalin. A Russian translation of Stalin was published in Riga (Filin, 1932). Bey elaborated his stories of Stalin’s criminal expropriations, amid exotic pageantry, in parallel volumes: Blood and Oil in The Orient (1931) and Twelve Secrets of the Caucasus (1931). See also Rieber, “Fun with my Buddy.” When Lev was six years old, his mother, Berta Slutskina (née Ratner), from the Russian empire’s Pale of Settlement, had committed suicide (possibly by drinking acid); Nussimbaum’s father, Abraham, also an Ashkenazi Jew but born in Tiflis, profited from the fin-de-siècle Caspian oil boom, and cashed in his wells to the Nobels in 1913, with exquisite timing. In 1917, when revolution struck, father and son fled by ship to Kizil-Su (Red Water), in Turkestan, where they allegedly lived in a cinema. Then they fled to Persia by camel caravan, briefly returning to the Caucasus (by then under Ottoman occupation), and in 1921 they boarded a refugee ship (the Kleopatra) from Batum to Istanbul. In 1932, Bey married an heiress, Erika Loewendahl (who did not know his real origins), and resettled in Vienna. Following the Anschluss with Austria, Nussimbaum-Bey would relocate in March 1938 to Italy, but then went to Los Angeles. That same year, his wife publicly denounced him as a Jew and they divorced. “He told me he was of princely Arabian heritage,” she wrote. “I learned after our marriage . . . that he was just plain Leo Nussinbaum!” Erika was herself a Jew, the daughter of a shoe magnate from Leipzig who built up the successful Berlin franchise of the Czech company Bata. In Hollywood, while Lev was developing a script for Clark Gable, Erika started an affair with an older married man, a Viennese-born Hungarian visionary named René Fülöp-Miller, who wrote in German and was an acquaintance and rival of Nussimbaum-Bey. Nussimbaum would die in Sept. 1942 of Raynaud’s syndrome, having written some sixteen books in German, most of them translated into numerous languages, on Islam, desert escapades, the global oil industry, love in the Caucasus, Judaism’s “oriental” roots, Muhammad, Nicholas II, Lenin, and Stalin. Reiss, Orientalist.

176. Beria also had his party organization publish Stalin’s 1909 “Letter from the Caucasus,” and mandated its study in educational circles. Sukharev, “Litsedeistvo,” 105 (citing Partiinyi arkhiv Institutta istorii partii pri TsK KP gruzii, f. 13, op. 10, d. 11, l. 45–6); f. 14, op. 7, d. 34, l. 10; Sbornik materialov v sviazi.

177. Tovstukha and his assistants gathered an immense volume of materials: RGASPI, f. 71, op. 10, d. 192–218, 364–73.

178. Tucker, Stalin in Power, 335n.109; Brandenberger, “Stalin as Symbol,” 249–70 (at 256).

179. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 270 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 699, l. 61; Dec. 8, 1932), 271 (l. 62). Barbusse had written two books about his travels inside the Soviet Union, and both had flattered Stalin.

180. Van Ree, Political Thought, 164; Maksimenkov, “Kul’t”; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 3087. When Ukrainian Communists wanted to publish a pamphlet on his life in connection with the 1933 fifteenth anniversary of the founding of the Communist Youth League, Stalin balked. That same year, he crossed out references to his contributions from the theses of the Institute of Marxism-Leninism on the Bolshevik party’s thirtieth anniversary. The next year he deleted the second part of the phrases “Lenin-Stalin party” and “teachings of Lenin and Stalin” from a publication. Davies and Harris, Stalin’s World, 149–50 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 3087, l. 30; d. 3118). A 1934 Pravda essay on Turukhansk, including an image of Stalin’s exile hut, elicited his disdain (“rubbish”). RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1494, l. 6–10. When the Youth League journal Young Guard prepared a writer’s travelogue across the USSR for publication, Stalin expunged mentions of visits to his places of exile. Ef’-Registan, “Neobychnoe puteshestvie”; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, 1494, l. 121–5. Trotsky had underlined in the manuscript of one of his writings: “If personalities do not make history, then history makes itself by means of personalities.” Volkogonov, Trotsky, xxxii–xxxiii.

181. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 4572, l. 1 (July 1933); Sukharev, “Litsedeistvo,” 104; Gromov, Stalin, 143–4.

182. Radek's encomium was reissued as a pamphlet in 225,000 copies (and multiple languages): Zodchii sotsialisticheskogo obshchestva (Moscow: Partizdat, 1934); The Architect of a Socialist Society (Moscow-Leningrad: Co-operative Publishing Society of Foreign Workers in the U.S.S.R., 1934); Der Baumeister der sozialistischen Gesellschaft (Moscow-Leningrad: Verlagsgenossenschaft ausländischer arbeiter in der UdSSR, 1934). See also Petrov and Petrov, Empire of Fear, 69; and Tucker, Stalin in Power, 244–6.

183. The congress amended the statutes to stipulate a gathering every three years. XVII s'ezd, 525–66. Even half the collective farms now contained at least one Communist. Party members of peasant social origin had risen to 28.5 percent, from 20.4 percent in 1930, but the still ongoing purge would wipe out these gains.

184. Kamenev had published an essay in Pravda (May 25, 1933) enjoining the opposition to desist (they were in prison or exile). The politburo had approved the reinstatement of Zinoviev and Kamenev on Dec. 12, 1933 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 936, l. 5). After the Congress, Kamenev would be installed as head of Academia, the country's highest prestige press for scholarship, which in 1934 would publish the first volume of a Russian translation of Machiavelli's collected works containing The Prince, whose publication had already been scheduled, but now Kamenev was able to write the preface, and he offered Soviet readers a Machiavelli who was an unmasker of despots, and repeatedly called him “secretary” of the Florentine republic—Stalin's title. Kamenev characterized the Florentine “secretary” as having “no gift for profound philosophical inquiry” and his society as “an oppressive class of masters struggling among themselves for power over the laboring masses.” Kamenev, “Predislovie,” I: 7–15.

185. XVII s'ezd, 124–9 (Bukharin), 209–12 (Rykov), 492–7 (Zinoviev), 516–21 (Kamenev). Stalin allowed Zinoviev to be named an editor of Bolshevik, the party journal. At a politburo session on Feb. 20, 1934, on Stalin's initiative, Bukharin was named editor of Izvestiya (replacing Gronskey, who was moved to the editorship of the journal Novy Mir). RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 939, l. 2. Even the die-hard Trotsky supporter Rakovski would publicly recant and be allowed back from internal exile, though not into the party. Pravda, April 18, 1934; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 326–34 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 139, l. 35–52; Oct. 11, 1932); Bukharin's appointment had implications for Kalinin, since Izvestiya was the organ of his own Soviet central executive committee. Brontman, Dnevnik. Brontman (b. 1905), who published under the name Ognev, wrote many of Pravda's unsigned editorials.

186. Chernobaev, Vvikhre veka, 178 (Alexander Arosyev diary, Jan. 26, 1934).

187. Sochineniia, XIII: 282–379 (at 366–70).

188. Sochineniia, XIII: 371.

189. Sochineniia, XIII: 294.

190. XVII s'ezd, 8–36; Sochineniia, XIII: 283. Stalin would repeat the idea that imperialist war could generate new revolutions at the next congress in 1939. Sochineniia, XIV: 338; van Ree, Political Thought, 212. See also Rieber, “Stalin as Foreign Policy Maker,” 142–3. There were close parallels between Varga's New Phenomena in the World Economic Crisis (1934) and Stalin's report to the 17th Party Congress. Varga, “Vskryt' cherez 25 let,” 155–6; Duda, Jenő Varga, 89, 109–10, 115. One émigré who claimed to have worked in Varga's Institute claimed that its staff had no reason to fear reprisals for what in their mind were realistic portrayals of the capitalist world. Rosenfeldt, Stalin's Special Departments, 71–3 (citing unpublished manuscript “Organizatsiia i funktsiia Osobogo sektora TsK VKP (b)” held at the Library of Congress). On German fears of a Soviet policy shift dating to 1933, Von Riekhoff, German-Polish Relations, 385. See also Sluch, “Germano-sovetskie otnosheniia,” 103 (citing AVP RF, f. 082, op. 14, pap. 62, d. 2, l. 365).

191. DGFP, series C, II: 421–2; Reichsgesetzblatt, 1934, II: 118–9 (German and Polish originals); Ahmann, Nichtangriffspakte, 310–25, 255–342; Niclauss, Die Sowjetunion, 151–63; Wandycz, Twilight of French Eastern Alliances, 300–35; Cienciala, “Declaration of Non-Aggression”; Ken and Rusapov, Politbiuro TsK VKP (b) i otnosheniia SSSR, 62–3; Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 14, 20–1; Beck, Final Report, 31–2. For the public Soviet reaction: Izvestiia and Pravda, Jan. 29, 1934.

192. Cienciala, “Polish Foreign Policy,” 44–59; Cienciala, “Foreign Policy of Józef Piłsudski.”

193. Wandycz, “Polish Foreign Policy: Some Observations,” citing Louis Eisenmann, “La Question de Teschen.” La Vie des peuples, I, 1920: 837. While Piłsudski had tried to diminish the Russian menace by carving out a quasi-federation of states in the east centered on an independent Ukraine, his nemesis Dmowski had pushed for annexations. Both had failed.

194. The French embassy in Warsaw seems to have submitted nothing to Paris between Dec. 21 and Jan. 26: DDF 1e série, VII: 907–10.

195. Laroche, La Pologne de Piłsudski, 138–45; Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 169–72; Steiner, Triumph of the Dark, 63.

196. Gasiorowski, “German-Polish Nonaggression Pact of 1934,” 27; Cienciala, review of La Décadence, 539; Pohle, Der Rundfunk, 397–8. The perceptive French ambassador in Washington ventured to the Americans that Germany wanted a short period of peace to strengthen itself for eventual European domination. Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 73 (citing State 760c.6212/10: undersecretary Phillips on conversation with de Laboulaye, Jan. 27, 1934).

197. Radek had argued to Stalin that while France was seeking to align with Germany, France’s ally Poland could be wooed away and promised a Soviet-Polish pact against Germany founded on Polish desires for a free hand in independent Lithuania and perhaps Danzig. Alarming for Moscow, however, in mid-Nov. 1933, Hitler and the new Polish ambassador Józef Lipski issued an odd public joint communiqué, vaguely implying (or maybe not) the possibility of a nonaggression pact. On Nov. 27, Piłsudski secretly received a concrete German proposal, which he sat on for some time.

198. This occurred on Dec. 20, 1933, at the sixteenth anniversary commemoration of the Cheka’s founding. Gorbunov, “Voennaia razvedka v 1934–1939 godakh” (no. 2), 103. Artuzov was said to have recruited Polish agents as double agents as far back as 1920, including the Riga-born, Moscow University-educated Ignay Sosnowski (Dobrzynski), who worked for the intelligence department of the Polish general staff. Pogonii, Lubianka 2, 175–9. See also Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, 445–51 (citing Artuzov’s letter to Yezhov, March 22, 1937); and Kolpakidi and Prokhorov, Imperia GRU, I: 205–7. Vladimir Antonov-Ovseyenko, Soviet envoy in Warsaw, had written shrewdly to Stomonyakov in Moscow that the Polish government had never believed an alliance with France or the Little Entente would guarantee its security against Germany. “You will be in all the combinations,” one Polish contact told him, “but we?” Still, Antonov-Ovseyenko had been taken in by Polish assurances that there were no negotiations under way with Germany. Dokumenty o materialy po istorii sovetsko-pol’skikh otnoshenii, VI: 112–6 (Nov. 29, 1933).

199. Yegorov, chief of the general staff, was urging Twardowski, “Change your policy and everything will be all right again.” DGFP, series C, II: 338–9 (Jan. 11, 1934), 352–3 (Jan. 13), 376–9 (Jan. 17). See also Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 271; and Tucker, Stalin in Power, 256–60. Nadolny, in reference to Stalin’s Jan. 26 speech, noted its “calm tone and matter-of-factness,” especially compared with Litvinov, and suggested the Germans make an acknowledgment. Hitler mentioned Stalin’s speech in his own speech to the Reichstag (Jan. 30). DGFP, series C, II: 435–6 (Jan. 29, 1934); Baynes, Speeches of Adolf Hitler, II: 1151–71; Völkischer Beobachter, Jan. 31, 1934. Nadolny, after arguing with Hitler, who blocked his efforts to attain a rapprochement, would resign on June 16, 1934. He would be succeeded by Count Friedrich Werner von der Schulenburg. “The German Foreign Office,” in Craig and Gilbert, Diplomats, 417–8; Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 180–3.

200. Shore, “Hitler’s Opening Gambit.”

201. On the eve of the Polish-German coup de main, the USSR had signed a modest, provisional trade agreement with France. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 307 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 15, l. 166; Jan. 11, 1934); DDF 1e série, V: 436–7. See also Carley, “Five Kopecks.” In early 1934, France and the USSR also exchanged aviation attachés, as Cor’s mission bore delayed fruit, and in Aug. 1934 the Soviets reciprocated Cor’s visit with an aviation squadron that landed in France. Scott, Alliance Against Hitler, 119–21.

202. Piłsudski received the interlocutor in question, Hermann Rauschning, head of state in Danzig, in Warsaw on Dec. 11, 1933. Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 72 (citing German foreign ministry memo IV Po 9133, T-120, 3024/6601/E 495072–77; Dec. 14, 1933). On Nov. 23, 1934, Rauschning would resign his Nazi party membership and later emigrate.

203. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 269; Ken, Collective Security or Isolation, 121–2, 146–7; Morozov, Pol’sko-Chekoboslovatskie otnosheniia, 9, 27, 504; DVP SSSR, XVII: 133–4; Izvestiia, April 20, 1934.

204. Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-pol’skikh otnoshenii, VI: 167–73; DDF 1e série, V: 783–5. Beck admitted that Piłsudski convened discussions of possible preemptive war against Germany, but claimed the idea was put to rest in spring 1934. Beck, Final Report, 51–3.

205. Sochineniia, XIII: 321–2, 329–30. Stalin also conceded that “it must be said of state farms that they have failed to achieve what is required of them.” He deemed them too specialized and too cumbersome to administer properly, without admitting this had been his vision. XVII s’ezd, 23. In 1933, state farms had supplied only a few million of the 20 million tons of grain procured by the state. Davies and Wheatcroft, Years of Hunger, 332–47.

206. Davies et al., Years of Progress, 11–4; XVII s’ezd, 435–6, 439–41, 443–55, 668; Zaleski, Stalinist Planning, 132. A politburo decree of Jan. 20, 1934, committed state supplies of seeds and equipment for workers to garden on household plots in their free time, legally and without being taxed. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 509–11 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 937, l. 1, 8, 52, 68–9).

207. XVII s’ezd, 525. The views of actual farmers were far from the discussion. “Under the current regime it is necessary to tie a noose around one’s neck, or to cheat the state,” I. Gribanov told a group of collective farmers in 1934, according to a police summary. Kedrov, Lapki Stalinizma, 151 (citing GAAO, otdel DSPI, f. 290, op. 2, d. 337, l. 16–8).

208. XVII s’ezd, 236–9.

209. XVII s’ezd, 251–9; RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 271, l. 529–33 (Chagin). Kirov, exhausted, had been compelled to spend Nov. 23 to Dec. 29, 1933, at a sanatorium in Tolmachevo, outside Leningrad, but insisted on a direct telephone line to Smolny and daily postal deliveries, with his wife serving as his secretary. He complained to his physician (G. F. Lang) of heart palpitations, pains, insomnia, and occasional trouble walking, and submitted to a regimen of saltwater baths. Pazi, Nash Mironych, 412–8, 448; Sinel’nikov, Kirov, 357–8; Krasnikov, Kirov v Leningrade, 179–83; Knight, Who Killed Kirov?, 167–8.

210. XVII s’ezd, 269. “Whereas at the 15th Congress it was still necessary to prove the correctness of the party line and to fight certain anti-Leninist groupings, and at the 16th Congress to finish off the last supporters of these groupings,” Stalin had noted in his congress report, “at the present congress there is nothing to prove and, it seems, nobody to beat.” XVII s’ezd, 28. Manuilsky also made no reply to the discussion of his report on the Comintern.

211. At the 15th Congress (1927), forty-three did not. At the 1939 congress vote, forty-four bulletins would go unused. RGASPI, f. 56, op. 1, d. 61, l. 39; op. 2, d. 36, l. 23; f. 58, op. 1, d. 37, l. 31–3; op. 2 d. 46, l. 9; Pavliukov, Ezhov, 99–106 (citing f. 477, op. 1, d. 41, l. 4). Delegates had to insert their folded ballots into urns specifically for their delegation.

212. Mikhailov and Naumov, “Skol’ko delegatov XVII s’ezda partii goslovalo protiv Stalina?”; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 613 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 23, l. 43–43ob.: Napoleon V. Andreosyan [sic] deposition). According to Mikoyan, Andreasyan told him that his delegation alone recorded twenty-five votes against Stalin. Mikoian, Tak Bylo, 592–3.

213. Sotsialisticheskii vestnik, Feb. 25, 1934; Medvedev, Let History Judge, 331–4.

214. Pravda, Feb. 7, 1964. V. Verkhovyykh would later claim that “in conversation with Kosior the latter told me: ‘Some of us spoke with Kirov in order to get him to agree to become general secretary.’ Kirov refused, saying: ‘It’s necessary to wait, all will settle down.’” Mikhailov and Naumov, “Skol’ko delegatov XVII s’ezda partii goslovalo protiv Stalina?” 114. Khrushchev, who at the time of the 17th Congress was close to Stalin, would recall (or imagine) that Sheboldayev had approached Kirov on behalf of a group of colluding provincial bosses, but that Kirov went straight to Stalin, which implanted permanent suspicions of Kirov in Stalin’s mind. (Khrushchev acknowledged that he “personally did not have direct interaction with” Kirov.) Mikoyan claims that, in Stalin’s office on the evening of Dec. 2 (the meeting was actually the 3rd), when he questioned why Yagoda was not being held accountable, Stalin defended him—raising suspicions that Stalin had organized the assassination through Yagoda. Mikoyan has the events taking place at the Winter Palace, not Tauride, and has Medved, not Zaporozhets, absent from Leningrad. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 97–9; Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 91–3; Mikoian, “V pervyi raz bez Lenina,” 6; Mikoian, Tak bylo, 316–8. It has also been asserted that the Caucasus delegations lobbied Mikoyan and Orjonikidze to have Kirov (an honorary Caucasus figure) replace Stalin as general secretary, with Stalin moving over to head the government in place of Molotov. Bondarenko and Efimov, Utaennye stranitsy sovetskoi istorii, 70.

215. Kirilina, Rikoshet, 76–80; Benvenuti, “Kirov in Soviet Politics.” Kirov’s public profile paled in comparison to those of Kaganovich, Orjonikidze, or Molotov, let alone Stalin. Kirov rarely attended politburo meetings, which took place in Moscow, and sometimes did not even vote on politburo matters by telephone poll. See also Khlevniuk, Politburo, 122; Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 215–6.

216. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 93; Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 86.

217. Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 122–3.

218. XVII s'ezd, 303. See also Tucker, Stalin in Power, 247.

219. XVII s'ezd, 573–6; Furer, Novaia Gorlovka. In response to disarray in Ukraine's strategic coal industry, Kaganovich had visited the mining town of Gorlovka, then the Donbass capital, in spring 1933. Among the many measures forced through, Furer became Gorlovka party boss and worked like a demon to lift the miners out of mud huts and barracks, paving streets, building housing, sidewalks, tram lines, a hospital, schools, and a stadium with lights for night matches, a first for the USSR (it opened in Sept. 1933 and was named for living Ukraine OGPU chief Balytsky). Furer would last in Gorlovka until Dec. 1934, when Kaganovich would summon him to head the agitation and propaganda department in the Moscow province-city party committee. Kuromiya, "The Commander and the Rank and File," 154–5; XVII s'ezd, 162–3; www.gorlovka360.dn.ua/sport-i-zdorovie/stadion-shahter-virtualnyiiv-tur.

220. Chuev, Sto sorok, 307–8, 478; Chuev, Molotov, 375–6; Krasnikov, Kirov v Leningrade, 187–8; Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 28–9. There is some ambiguity as to whether the Kirov incident took place in a narrow circle or at the Central Committee plenum.

221. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 121–2. Kirov would end up spending more time in Moscow: he would be recorded in Stalin's office for 63 hours in 1934, compared with 10 in 1933, 28 in 1932, and 23 in 1931. Na prieme.

222. Zhdanov replaced the now Ukraine-based Postyshev, whom Stalin promoted to candidate member of the politburo even as he relieved him of the Central Committee secretary position. Kaganovich remained Stalin's top deputy in the party, receiving all the documentation concerning party affairs, economic management, and foreign affairs. On Jan. 17, 1934, Stalin had required that all hiring and firing in the Central Committee apparatus have either his own or Kaganovich's authorization. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 5; Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 195–6; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 77, l. 3.

223. Zhdanov, born in Mariupol, had grown up mostly in Tver, where in Aug. 1914 he joined a Marxist group led by A. I. Krinitsky. In Jan. 1918, Zhdanov, a veteran of the Great War, was part of a group of Red Guards who seized the small town of Shadrinsk in the Urals (near Perm); by 1919, however, he was said to be exhausted and allowed to go home to Tver to recuperate; his comrades abandoned Shadrinsk. Zhdanov served for a decade as party boss of Nizhny Novgorod, 1924–1934. He would go after Krinitsky in 1935 and help destroy him in 1938. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 562; Andrei Aleksandrovich Zhdanov, 1896–1948; Glotova, "Andrei Aleksandrovich Zhdanov"; Borisov, Andrei Aleksandrovich Zhdanov.

224. "Vospominaniia: memurary Nikity Sergeevicha Khrushcheva," 62–3. The scientist and Leningrad-resident Vladimir Vernadsky, in his diary, would deem Zhdanov a "petty, talentless figure, especially after Kirov." Vernadskii, "Dnevnik 1940 goda."

225. Kaganovich, in Feb. 1932, had needed a six-week respite, bedridden for headaches and dizziness. He would have a tonsillitis operation in July 1934. Rees, Iron Lazar, 217. Zhdanov was given the agriculture portfolio on March 3, which Kaganovich had managed, but Zhdanov held it for a mere thirty-eight days (it went to Yakovlev) and instead got planning, finance, and trade; Yezhov got industry, which he would hold for a year; Kaganovich, transport (the next area for a trouble-shooter, after agriculture's stabilization); Stetsky, culture and propaganda. Posokryobyshev remained head of the special sector; that is, Stalin's office. Zhdanov, although not a member of the politburo, would attend more than half the meetings in Stalin's office in 1934. E. K. Pramnek, appointed hastily to replace Zhdanov in Nizhny Novgorod, was awkwardly promoted to Central Committee candidate member after the Congress.

226. Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 102. See also Chuev, Sto sorok, 468. Whereas in 1923, 88 percent of all decisions were taken at a formal meeting, by 1933 that was down to 13 percent (by 1937, it would be 0.6 percent). In 1933, there were twenty-four formal politburo sessions for the year, two a month, usually on the first and fifteenth; from Sept. 1934, formal meetings would drop to one per month, with additional meetings as necessary. In 1936, there were no politburo meetings in Jan., Aug., and Nov. Rees, "Stalin as Leader, 1924–1937," 25–7. See also Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 289. Formal politburo meetings could be attended by sixty people or more at any one time: non-members were invited for specific agenda items or the whole meeting. Wheatcroft, "From Team-Stalin to Degenerate Tyranny," 88–9.

227. XVII s'ezd, 680–1. Stalin allowed the former Trotsky supporter Pyatakov into the Central Committee, and Bukharin, Rykov, Tomsy, and Sokolnikov to return as candidate members.

228. Stalin also formally pared back the powers of his own workers' and peasants' inspectorate-party Control Commission (he had already entrusted the 1933 party purge to a special commission), slashing its size in a push for greater efficiency and less local collusion. "What we need now," he had told the congress, "is not inspection but check-up on fulfillment of the center's decisions." Many of the commission's powers, in any case, had already been taken by the OGPU. XVII s'ezd, 35; Turkan, Ian Rudzutak, 91–2; Rees, State Control in Soviet Russia, 219–23. "From now on," Stalin added, "nine-tenths of the responsibility for the failures and defects in our work rest not on 'objective' circumstances but on ourselves and on ourselves alone." Sochinienia, XIII: 367–70. See also Markevich, "Monitoring and Interventions."

229. Pravda, Feb. 7 and 8, 1934. Stalin had been signing documents for some time only as "secretary of the CC." From 1931, he was being listed as just "secretary," not general secretary. Rosenfeldt, Stalin's Special Departments, 9. Politburo members as of Feb. 1934 were: Stalin, Molotov, Kaganovich, Voroshilov, Kalinin, Orjonikidze, Kuibyshev, Kirov, Andreyev, and Kosior. Candidate members were: Mikoyan, Chubar, Petrovsky, Postoyshv, and Rudzutaks. Secretariat members were: Stalin, Kaganovich, Kirov, and Zhdanov.

230. Inside the street entrance used by visitors to Stalin's Kremlin office, there was a small, dark waiting room and an elaborate staircase. Upstairs, a broad corridor led to a massive double door, behind which was Stalin's spacious anteroom. A table there was usually piled with newspapers and other reading materials, paper, and pencils. Another door led to the office of his top aide, Alexander Poskryobyshev, where two or three guards in uniform sat, and whence there was access to Stalin's office. Stalin's expansive wing, formally the "special sector" of the Communist party apparatus, had a special door separating it from the offices for the Council of People's Commissars and the Soviet central executive committee, on the same floor and one floor above. "I had a pass to all areas [of the Kremlin], except to the corridor leading to Stalin's wing of the building," wrote Valentin Berezhkov, an interpreter. "A special pass was made out for each trip" to Stalin's office. Berezhkov, At Stalin's Side, 203–4. See also Deviatov et al., Blizhniaia dacha Stalina, 57; Shepilov, Kremlin's Scholar, 16; Iakovlev, Tsel' zhizni (2nd ed.), 184–5; Yakov Chadaev, in Kumanev, Riadom so Stalinyim, 383; and Chuev, Sto sorok, 292.

231. Before the Near Dacha was built, Soviet higher-ups had used a small pensione on the steep banks of the Setun River in the Volynskoe Wood, which was on the ninth kilometer of the Mozhaik Road (Zubalovo was on the 32nd km). Dmitry Donskoi had once awarded the land as a gift to one of the victors in the Battle of Kulikovo Field, Voevoda Bobrok-Volynsky. In the sixteenth century, the land was claimed by the sovereign; after that it went to the courtier who had conducted the inquiry into the death of Ivan the Terrible's son, then to the Dolgoruky, the Loanov-Rostovskys. Rudomino, Legendaiaia Barvikha, 44; Deviatov et al., Blizhniaia, 28.

232. Merzhanov had been named central executive committee chief architect in June 1931. In 1929, he had won an open competition to design a resort for the Red Army in Sochi. It was built into a hillside (with a funicular), a triumph of constructivism in harmony with the landscape, completed on July 1, 1934, and named in honor of Voroshilov. (It would win a grand prize at the 1937 Paris Exhibition.) The architect and defense commissar struck up a friendship, and the Soviet press spotlighted his Sochi sanatorium. Merzhanov got many commissions, including the NKVD sanatorium in Kislovodsk.

233. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiiaikh, 160; Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 41–2; Shepilov, Kremlin's Scholar, 2. In the nineteenth century, Kuntsevo had become a summer resort for Muscovites (Ivan Turgenev stayed there). It was recognized as a town in 1925–6 and by the mid-1930s counted perhaps 40,000 inhabitants. There was a sewing needle factory, and a dacha that served as the Comintern's department for international communications (known as facility No. 1). Davydovo, less than a mile from the territory of Stalin's dacha complex, became a dacha complex for others in the elite at Stalin's directive. Trembitskii, Po Zapadnomu okrugu.

234. Zubalovo-4 stood on the left bank of the Medvenka River. Nadya had soured on it and found another spot much farther out on an old estate, Lipki, at the 200km mark on the Dimitrov Highway, where she initiated construction on a new single-family dacha, perhaps to avoid the relatives—both the Alliluyevs and Savnidzes had accommodations at Zubalovo—but Lipki had been finished only after her death. The building of a new Far Dacha, Semenovskoe, would begin in 1937, according to the Near Dacha design, but with bricks from the start. Murin, Stalin v o'iatikh, 23–4; Alliluyeva, Dvadsat' pisem, 30–1, 36. The regime established other elite dacha settlements in the dense forests of largely unsettled rural Barvikha county, along the Moscow River and several tributaries, where there had been estates of the Romanovs (Ilinskoe, Usovo, Znamenskoe) or other grantees: Prince Yusupov (Arkhangelskoe), Prince Golitsyn (Petrovskoe), Baron Meyendorf (Podkushino). The Chekists took a shine to Zhukovka: on the high right bank of the Moscow River, between Barvikha village and Usovo. Rudomino, Legendarnaia Barvikha.

235. Hitler had initially rented the alpine hideaway, known as the Haus Wachenfeld, a modest, rustic lodge, during a 1926 holiday (the rent was paid by an admirer), but by 1933, using monies he earned from the sale of Mein Kampf, he had purchased the property. “This place is mine,” Hitler had proudly told a writer for the British Homes and Gardens in 1938. “I built it with money that I earned.” The breathless magazine article, featuring photographs, called Hitler “his own decorator, designer, and furnisher, as well as architect.” It would acquire a remodeled study, a film screening room, and a great room with a marble fireplace, chandeliers, Persian rugs, paintings, and wall tapestries. The furniture was Teutonic-style.

236. Stratigakos, Hitler at Home. See also Schuster-Winkelhof, Adolf Hitlers Wahlheimat; and Hoffmann, Hitler in seinem Bergen.

237. Pauker had a personal Cadillac, a gift from Stalin. Yezhov would ride in a gold-colored Chrysler airflow sedan, one of two in the USSR. Lakoba got a Lincoln. Beria would obtain a coveted Packard. Zhukovskii, Lubianskaia impertiia NKVD, 31; Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 309; Orlov, Secret History, 346.

238. “There are others like Leshchenko,” Stalin was said to have told Artyom and Vasya, “but there’s only one Vertinsky.” Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 42.

239. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 352–3.

240. Their treehouse (“Robinson Crusoe”) was removed, perhaps for security reasons, even though Stalin did not go there much anymore. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 122. Zubalovo would be renamed Gorky-4.

241. Pauker had ended up in Russia in April 1915 as an Austro-Hungarian POW, and was sent to work on a railroad in Turkestan, where in March 1917 he was released and stayed on and joined the Cheka (Dec. 1918), and, around 1920, relocated to Moscow. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 102, 335; Naumov, Stalin i NKVD, 80. Orlov is the source of numerous fairy tales about Pauker, which have been repeated in the secondary literature. Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 305–17.

242. Svetlana began first grade in fall 1933; Vasily entered fifth. After completing the eighth grade, Vasily in 1937 would be transferred to special School No. 2; the next year he would be sent to the Kachinsk Military Aviation School in Sevastopol. Svetlana would complete all ten grades at No. 25 and graduate in 1943. Holmes, Stalin's School, 165–8. Pauker’s men would drop the children off in a car at Pushkin Square, after which they walked the short rest of the way.

243. The unofficially adopted Artyom, after Nadya’s suicide, had gone back to live with his mother full-time in her Moscow apartment, though he continued to visit the Stalin family. He recalled how once at a meal Stalin discovered ashes in the soup and demanded to know the culprit. Artyom admitted responsibility. Stalin told him to eat the soup and if he liked it to ask Karolina Til to put ashes in it every day, but if he did not like it, to desist from doing so ever again. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 89–96, 123. In 1937, Artyom’s mother would obtain a dacha in the elite settlement of Zhukovka.

244. Loginov, Teni Stalina, 97.

245. “She and her father are great friends,” Nadya had written to Keke, back on March 12, 1931, when Svetlana was five. Murin, Stalin v ob'iatikh, 15–6 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1549, l. 40–40ob.).

246. After her mother’s death Svetlana got a new governess, Lidiya, with whom she clashed. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 132.

247. Charkviani, Napriki da nazazrevi, 503. Khrushchev claimed he observed such scenes and pitied Svetlana “as I would feel for an orphan. Stalin himself was brutish and inattentive. . . . [Stalin] loved her, but . . . his was the tenderness of a cat for a mouse.” Khrushchev, Khrushchev Remembers, 310–1.

248. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 30, 144. Stalin usually had his afternoon meal in his Kremlin apartment, around 7:00 p.m., often in company, and that was when he saw the children. The conversation was often just between the adults, but eventually he would get around to asking Svetlana and Vasily about school. "His time for seeing me and Vasily was during dinner at the apartment," Svetlana recalled. "He'd ask me about my lessons, look at the [day]book my marks were entered in and sometimes ask me to show him my exercise books. He used to sign my books, as parents were supposed to do." Vasily often left his daybooks at home, and refused to carry out his assignments, or did them in ways that violated school regulations, prompting his homeroom teacher to phone his governess. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 122–3, 133; Holmes, Stalin's School, 71–2, 166–7. Stalin in 1937 ordered the keeping of a secret second daybook to track Vasily's academic work. Murin, Stalin v ob'iatyakh, 56.

249. Murin, Stalin v ob'iatyakh, 177 (Svanidze diary: May 9, 1935). Svetlana sometimes visited grandma Olga Alliluyeva and grandpa Sergei Alliluyev, who had a homey Kremlin apartment. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 43.

250. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 145–6.

251. The first article, "Stalin the Terrible," appeared April 8, but the note from Doletsky (TASS) in London was dated April 7, so the Soviets had a heads-up. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 313 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 1540, l. 33), 313–4 (l. 34–5), 315 (l. 36), 315–6 (l. 51), 316 (l. 37), 316–7 (l. 52: Astakhov in London), 317 (l. 53: Soviet ambassador), 317–8 (l. 54: German press). The newspaper was owned by Lord Beaverbrook.

252. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 318 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 49, l. 30, 31–31ob.).

253. Slavinskii, Sovetskii soizuz i kitai, 275–6.

254. Barmin, Sovetskii Soizuz i Sin' tshian, 146–7.

255. Chiang had been ready to send his own expeditionary force to back the Muslim rebels against the warlord. Forbes, Warlords and Muslims; Gritsenko, "Chto eto bylo?"; Pravda, June 22, 1934; Hedin, History of the Expedition in Asia, III: 84, 112–5; Goldman, Red Road through Asia, 132. On Dec. 15, 1934, the politburo resolved to have a commission look into whether some Uzbek and Kazakh school textbooks could be adapted for Xinjiang. Gatagova, Sovetskaiia etnopolitika 1930–1940-e gody, 33–4 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 166, d. 533, l. 14). Molotov would publicly deny, at the 7th Congress of Soviets in Jan. 1935, "the slanderous rumors of the Sovietization of Xinjiang." Not long thereafter, Soviet forces were fully withdrawn from Xinjiang. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 45; Barmin, Sovetskii Soizuz i Sintsian, 77–9 (citing AVP RF, f. 8/08, op. 14, pap. 130, d. 146, l. 12; d. 147, l. 17, 31; RGASPI, f. 62, op. 2, d. 2798, l. 27), 107–8 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 154, d. 457, l. 31–8, 9), 111–2 (AVP RF, f. 8/08, op. 15, pap. 162, d. 117, l. 3, 9), 116, 129–30 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 16, l. 32), 132 (l. 113).

256. Bullitt, For the President, 83.

257. Litvinov wrote to Maisky (April 19) that "the negotiations with America have for now ground to a halt. The Johnson Act has as good as halted our trade with America . . . We have firmly stated that we will not give in to pressure and that we can exist without American trade." Haslam, Threat from the East, 40; DVP SSSR, XVII: 274–5.

258. Radek and Bukharin told Bullitt, in wishful thinking, "If war can be delayed for a few years a social upheaval in Japan may not be out of the question." Haslam, Threat from the East, 41, citing FRUS, 109–10 (Bullitt to Hull, April 16, 1934).

259. Litvinov had proposed to German ambassador Nodolny a joint "guarantee" of the independence and territorial inviolability of the Baltic states. On April 14, Germany declined the proposal, observing that the Baltic states might view such a guarantee as tantamount to a German-Soviet protectorate over them. "This fascist concern for the national sentiment of our Baltic neighbors sounds truly touching on fascist lips," Pravda (April 27, 1934). See also DGFP, series C, II: 686 (Nadolny report, March 29, 1934).

260. Stalin wrote: "my archive." RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 196, l. 54–62 (received at the foreign office on Feb. 5). RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 196, l. 131–7. In May 1934, Stalin received Phipps's account of his meeting with Hitler and Neurath in Dec. 1933. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 196, l. 17–23. Stalin had told the 17th Party Congress that the termination of parliamentarism in Germany was a sign of "the bourgeoisie's" weakness, its inability to maintain its rule by so-called respectable methods. Sochineniia, XIII: 283, 293. "Lots of foolishness, but still interesting," he had written, without specifics, in green pencil on a report from a Soviet agent in Berlin forwarded by the OGPU (April 11, 1934).

261. Stalin also underlined another passage: “The single great achievement is the rather paradoxical success in the sphere of foreign policy . . . Inside the country, there is none of the socialism that he promised to impose . . .” Phipps also noted “empty theaters, bankrupt bookstores, starving writers, artists, and composers all remind one that the cultural life of Berlin is threatened with disappearance under the National Socialist regime.” RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 186, l. 68–9, 76–8 (sent to London Feb. 7, 1934).

262. These Nazi consulates, Balytsky claimed, also aimed to use German specialists working in the USSR to sabotage Soviet military industry. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 494–500 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 172, l. 11–23; March 5, 1934). Throughout 1934, the OGPU had been secretly gathering information on all ethnic Germans employed in industry in the Soviet Union. Fleischhauer and Pinkus, Soviet Germans, 89–91 (citing Evgeniia Evelson, who had taken part in drawing up the lists of Germans before emigrating). On Nov. 5, 1934, the party apparatus sent a ciphered telegram to “all Central Committees of national communist parties, krai committees and oblast committees,” including Western Siberia (home to many Soviet ethnic Germans), warning that Soviet ethnic Germans “openly conduct counterrevolutionary work.” Hundreds of arrests followed. Shishkin, “Sovetskie nemtsy.”

263. Pravda, May 6, 1934; Biegański et al., Documents on Polish-Soviet Relations, I: 21–2 (extension until Dec. 31, 1945); Demski, “Pol’sko-sovetskie otnosheniia,” 191–218; Soviet intelligence had reported that Piłsudski was prepared to strengthen his nonaggression declaration with Germany in the event of a Franco-Soviet alliance, though he would be cautious not to stray too far from France. Soviet intelligence would note to Stalin that Poland was trying to mount two horses at once and would fail. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 187, l. 18 (May 9, 1934).

264. Germany was a disarmed state, yet a resentful and prideful one that British operatives knew would endeavor to create a military befitting its self-conception. An ad hoc committee of British intelligence designated Nazi Germany the “ultimate potential enemy” in a series of meetings across late 1933 and mid-1934. Undersecretary Vansittart’s April 7, 1934, memorandum for the cabinet on Mein Kampf and recent propaganda, added, as one Foreign Office contemporary noted of his essays generally, “the forlorn beauty of hopelessness to all their other beauties.” DBFP, 2nd series, VI: 975 ff; Lawford, Bound for Diplomacy, 270.

265. Britain had been cast as the main driver of a new imperialist war in a 1933 trial in Moscow of engineers of the British company Metropolitan-Vickers (“a frame-up,” as one of the arrested British citizens stated, “based on evidence of terrorized prisoners”). Mozokhin, VChK-OGPU, 284–90 (citing APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 363, l. 119; d. 364, l. 176–77; d. 368, l. 18, 62, 70–72, 87, 93; d. 367, l. 1–2, 9–10, 58–64; TsA FSB, no. PF-6740, t. 17, l. 175, 177; t. 12, l. 203); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 415–6 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 171, l. 84–5: interrogation of MacDonald, March 16, 1933). See also Morrell, Britain Confronts the Stalin Revolution. On April 2, 1933, Rozengolts, foreign trade commissar, had reported to Stalin and Molotov that of the 33 turbines supplied between 1925 and 1933, 24 experienced breakdowns, some multiple times. The contract with Metropolitan Vickers had been annulled. Litvinov negotiated the release and deportation of the engineers in exchange for termination of the embargo the British had imposed following their arrests.

266. DBFP, 2nd series, VII: 558 (June 4, 1933); Palme-Dutt, “Britanskii imperialism”; Pravda, Aug. 19, 1933.

267. XVII s’ezd, 305–22 (at 307–8); Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 267–8. See also Pravda, June 1, 1934 (Mayorsky); and VII Kongress Kommunisticheskogo internatsionala, 383–4.

268. Kokoshin, Armiia i politika, 95, 96–9.

269. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 243–7 (citing RGVA, f. 40442, op. 2, d. 32, l. 103: draft of Voroshilov report, not earlier than Dec. 13, 1933). Lithuania secretly cooperated militarily with the USSR on the basis of shared antagonism toward Poland. Tukhachevsky visited the United Kingdom in April 1934 and returned with a description of the Royal Air Force new Hampden bomber with a sketch of its weaponry, obtained by Soviet military intelligence. Hastings, Secret War, 2–3 (no citation).

270. Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 23, 237n33; Tukhachevskii, Voprosy sovremennoi strategii (Moscow: Voennyi vestnik, 1926), reprinted in Tukhachevskii, Izbrannye proizvedeniia, I: 244–61 (at 254–5).

271. “Europe remains in equal doubt both as to our policy and to our capacity,” Vansittart, the dominant official in the foreign office, observed in an internal memorandum (June 2, 1934). “The results are already—or perhaps I should say at last—becoming manifest. Italy, Poland, Yugoslavia, Romania, are all at varying degrees tending to be drawn into the German orbit; and on Italy's inconstancies now largely depend Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria. The political map of Europe is, in fact, altering under our eyes and to our disadvantage, if we must look upon Germany as the eventual enemy." McKercher, "Deterrence," 98 (citing "Minute by Sir R. Vansittart" [DQMX32] 117), PRO, CAB 27/510). On British intelligence and Germany, see also Winterbotham, Ultra Secret, 4–5; Winterbotham, Nazi Connection; West, M16, 45–7.

272. Anon., "Zametki o persechenii biografii," 316.

273. Shentalinsky, Arrested Voices, 168–96 (citing the case file). See also Bykov, Boris Pasternak, 472–7.

274. Literaturnaia gazeta, May 14 and 16, 1934.

275. Pridvorov, "Ob otse," 219.

276. Fleishman, Pasternak v tridsiatye gody, 153–96; Mandelstam, Hope against Hope, 25–6; Akhmatova, "Mandelsham (Listki iz dnevnika)," 182; Anon., "Zametki o persechenii biografii," 316–7; "Impressions of Boris Pasternak," 88. Neither the generally unforgiving Nadezhda nor Osip ever blamed Pasternak.

277. Ivinskaya, Captive of Time, 61–3. It remains unknown which of the narrow circle of people informed on Mandelstam. Shentalinsky, Arrested Voices, 172, 178–80.

278. Mandelstam, Hope against Hope, 84–5.

279. Stalin wrote in blue pencil on the letter: "And who gave them authorization to arrest Mandelstam? An outrage." RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 709, l. 167–167ob. See also Maksimenkov, "Ocherki nomenklaturnoi istorii."

280. Bykov, Boris Pasternak, 495–504. Stalin might have been bothered by the circumstance that Pasternak had run to Bukharin, who at Izvestiya was attempting to act as patron and protector of the great writers, rather than directly to the dictator. Trapping Pasternak into failing to admit friendship with Mandelstam, if that is what Stalin did, could have been like psychological payback for an offense Pasternak did not knowingly commit.

281. In the 1950s Pasternak would tell two British academics, Isaiah Berlin and D. P. Costello. Fleishman, Pasternak v tridsiatye gody, 185–7. Pasternak's friend and German studies specialist Nikolai William-Wilmont was present, and Pasternak's second wife, Zinaida Neuhaus, was sitting on a couch in the adjacent room during the call.

282. Koltsov, who had helped make Dimitrov famous, was in the airport greeting party. Pravda, Feb. 28 and March 1, 1934. In 1932, in Berlin, the married Koltsov had started a romance with his interpreter, the blond beauty Maria Gresshöner (b. 1908), who accompanied him back to Moscow and took the surname Osten ("East"). He installed her at a German-language periodical in Moscow, and took on her on his foreign trips.

283. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 8 (Feb. 27, 1934). B. Popov and V. Tanev arrived with Dimitrov in Moscow.

284. Borkenau, Communist International, 405; Cockburn, Crossing the Line, 54.

285. In 1933, the original four stories of the Lux were expanded to six, bringing the hotel to 300 rooms. Visiting Soviet inhabitants had to leave their identification cards at the desk and fill out questionnaires in order to enter the Lux; at midnight, all were supposed to be out. Kennel, "New Innocents Abroad," 15; von Mayenburg, Hotel Lux; Vaksberg, Hôtel Lux.

286. The sprawling twelve-floor structure had some 550 rental apartments, which were centrally allocated and equipped with oak wood floors, gas stoves, constructivist furniture, telephones, radio receivers, gramophones, and frescoes on the ceilings. The complex had schools and nurseries, shops, a laundry, a medical facility, a savings bank branch, a post office, a performance space, and the "Shock Worker" cinema (the country's first sound-equipped cinema), with 1,500 seats. Prepared food could be delivered to one's door. Each family had access to a maid, and there were elevator operators and building staff who kept the keys. It was assumed that early service personnel worked for or reported to the OGPU.

287. After nearly an hour, Molotov and others joined. Na prieme, 126. The central Comintern apparatus numbered about 500 staff (more than 800 with inclusion of technical personnel).

288. Jackson, Popular Front, 17–51.

289. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 11 (April 3, 1934), 12–5 (April 7, 1934). Hundreds of Austrian socialist "Schutzbundists" escaped the crackdown, fleeing to Czechoslovakia, whence they were invited to the USSR. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 19n16; Fischer, Le grande rêve socialiste, 280–1."

290. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 19 (May 2, 1934).

- 291. Dobry, "February 1934," 129–50; Jenkins and Millington, France and Fascism.
- 292. Chase, Enemies within the Gates?, 15 (citing Community party archives, Sofia, f. 146, op. 2, a.e. 317, l. 11); Leibzon and Shirina, Povorot v politike Komintern, 93 (citing Tsentralen partien arkhiv pri TsK na VKP [Sofia], f. 146, op. 2, d. 317, l. 11). See also Carr, Twilight of the Comintern, 127, 191. In Austria, in Feb. 1934, street thugs, police, and army forces loyal to Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss (who had suspended parliamentary rule) assaulted banned yet still powerful socialist organizations—and Social Democrat-led workers fought back.
- 293. Artuzov was in the Little Corner on April 19, May 16 and 25, 1934. Na prieme, 127, 562–3. In May 1934, Stalin also cut off the ability of Radek's bureau to request secret information from Soviet intelligence or diplomatic agencies. Ken, "Rabota po istorii," 108–16.
- 294. The exposures occurred in Vienna, Riga, Hamburg, Helsinki, and Paris between 1931 and 1933, and led to the loss of dozens of agents. A politburo injunction against recruitment of agents among foreign Communists (Dec. 8, 1926) came up against the fact that individuals who were ready to serve the Soviet cause, held foreign passports, and spoke accentless foreign languages were in very short supply outside foreign Communist circles. Kolpakidi and Prokhorov, Imperiia GRU, I: 196; Lurie and Kochik, GRU, 477; Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 185–6; Gorbunov, Stalin i GRU, 248–9; Damaskin, Stalin i razvedka, 164. One key figure in the Soviet spy network in Paris, Léopold Trepper (b. 1904), the son of a failed Jewish shopkeeper in Habsburg Galicia, escaped via Nazi Germany to the Soviet Union; he would eventually be posted to Brussels.
- 295. Gorbunov, "Voennaia razvedka v 1934–1939 godakh" (no. 2), 99 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 599); Kolpakidi and Prokhorov, Imperiia GRU, I: 201; Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 311 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 16, l. 25). TASS denied the Soviets in France had been engaged in espionage. Pravda, March 30, 1934. See also Primakov, Ocherki, III: 62.
- 296. On May 25, 1934, Stalin received Artuzov without Berzin. Na prieme, 127, 130. The politburo decree insisted on better cooperation between military and civilian intelligence, better compartmentalization in operations, paying attention in hiring not only to social origins but nationality, and quickly establishing a school to train large numbers of new spies in small groups. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 522–3 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 16, l. 64–6).
- 297. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 208–9. Artuzov was supposed to spend two-thirds of his time in military intelligence. At civilian intelligence, his deputies, Abram Slutsky and Boris Berman, were to bear the load.
- 298. In June 1934, the civil war-era Revolutionary Military Council was abolished, and a more modest advisory Main Military Council was created. Erickson, Soviet High Command, 371–2.
- 299. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 526 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 172, l. 105; Igor Sitnikov). Back on March 15, 1934, Artuzov had reported that Captain Makoto Tanaka of the Japanese army had reconnoitered parts of the Chinese Eastern Railway, possibly for sabotaging tunnels. Stalin underlined passages and wrote: "Comrade Artuzov, what should be the measures to counter explosions and in general diversionary activity? Who is working them out, who is implementing them?" Khaustov, Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 505–6 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 186, l. 115–6).
- 300. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 202–3 (Vaizer). See also, Khaustov, Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 526 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 172, l. 105; Igor Sitnikov).
- 301. Yagoda wrote to Stalin (Feb. 17, 1934) recommending removal of Smagin (b. 1894) as head of Red Army external relations. Smagin had served as an aide to the deputy head of military intelligence (1924–26) and then through May 1930 as an aide to the Soviet military attaché in Japan, Primakov, who had reported that a Japanese officer in a drunken state had uttered the secret code used for the head of Soviet military intelligence Berzin ("Crow") and had referred to content in a classified report by Primakov. Only Primakov and Smagin knew that code name. Primakov's report of the incident had not been properly investigated at the time. Smagin returned to Soviet military intelligence in Moscow, then, in July 1933, was appointed to his current post. Yagoda recommended against trying to turn Smagin against the Japanese. Stalin made a note to himself: "Speak with Klim." Maybe Stalin decided, contrary to Yagoda, to try to "double" Smagin. But Smagin was removed in June 1934 and left unemployed. In Jan. 1935, he would be appointed to the Frunze Military Academy. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 482–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 186, l. 79–87); Lurie and Kochik, GRU, 303; RGVA, f. 37837, op. 1, d. 1300, l. 190b.–27. In 1934, Kawabe would be named chief of intelligence to the Kwantung Army. Smagin would be arrested Dec. 16, 1937, and executed Aug. 26, 1938.

302. Paul-Boncour, Entre deux guerres, II: 364. “The mystique of the League,” notwithstanding its failures, “remained the essential element of our foreign policy as well as our domestic policy,” General Maurice Gamelin would later claim. Gamelin, Servir, II: 56; DDF, 1e série, IV: 258–62 (April 16, 1934).

303. Dullin, Men of Influence, 2, citing Leon Trotsky, Oeuvres (Paris: EDI, 1985), XII: 107–9. Karakhan was banished as envoy to Ankara, and Sokolnikov by May 1934 to the timber commissariat. Their departures enhanced Litvinov’s position. But the party cell inside the commissariat kept a watchful, envious eye on Litvinov and his associates. Total foreign affairs personnel in the 1930s hovered around 1,000, including the central commissariat and the roughly 30 embassies and 40 to 50 consulates. Roshchin, “V narkomindele v predvoennye gody,” 41–9; Crowley, Soviet Diplomat Corps.

304. Bernard Attolico, the Italian envoy in Moscow, explained to Twardowski that the Soviets pursued “the policy of the free hand,” but “if there is no other way out, they would swallow the bitter pill, join the League of Nations and make an alliance with France, . . . unless German policy succeeded in meeting the Russian ‘pact mania’ in a form acceptable to them.” DGFP, series C, III: 150–1 (Twardowski, July 9, 1934).

305. Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 37–44. Litvinov latched onto a renewed offer on April 20, 1934, by a new French foreign minister, the conservative nationalist Louis Barthou, to renew the talks begun under his predecessor for a regional alliance. In private talks with Germany, however, the Soviets distanced themselves from the “French idea.” AVP RF, f. 5, op. 14, pap. 103, d. 117; Na prieme, 128; DDF, 1e série, VI: 496–502.

306. Pravda, June 10, 1934; Wheeler-Bennet, Documents on International Affairs, I: 253ff. The thorny issue of Bessarabia was left unresolved. DVP SSSR, XVII: 379–81; Pravda, June 11, 1934; Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TiK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 312 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 16, l. 59, 87, 89). DDF, 1e série, VI: 664–6. Diplomatic relations had been normalized with Hungary (Feb. 1934). “The Russians do not understand what dogs they could have against Europe in the form of Central European small states,” the Czechoslovak diplomat Jaroslav Papoušek had told the Soviet envoy in Prague, Alexandrovsky, on March 24, 1934, claiming to be citing President Masaryk. Ken and Rupasov, Zapadne prigraniche, 123 (AVP RF, f. 0138, op. 15, pap. 122, d. 2, l. 226).

307. Stalin forwarded the report to Molotov, Voroshilov, Kuibyshev, and Orjonikidze for discussion. The report asserted that Poland and Germany, in parallel, were negotiating a military alliance with Japan and that Romania would join and perhaps even Italy, Austria, and Hungary. “War against the Soviet Union,” the alarmist report concluded, “was never as realistic a possibility as now.” Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 533–41 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 187, l. 28–44). See also Harris, “Encircled by Enemies,” 536. In July 1934, the head of the Polish foreign ministry’s Eastern Department (Colonel Tadeusz Schaetzel) told the Bulgarian chargé d’affaires in Warsaw that Poland “was counting on the circumstance that if a war broke out in the Far East, Russia would be crushed, and then Poland would include in its borders Kiev and part of Ukraine.” Jurkiewicz, Pakt wschodni, 66 (citing Bulgarian foreign ministry archives).

308. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 24–5 (June 18, 1934). From late 1934, Dimitrov and Fleischmann would start a household in Moscow as she became his second wife.

309. It met from June 29 through July 1, 1934. KPSS v rezoliutsiakh (9th ed.), VI: 166.

310. Longerich, Die braunen Battalione, 223; Bessel, Political Violence; Frei, National Socialist Rule in Germany.

311. In April 1934, Hindenburg became terminally ill, meaning a presidential succession loomed. On June 11, the Evening Standard in London implied that the German military could take over. On June 17, Vice Chancellor Franz von Papen publicly called for restoration of some freedoms and an end to the SA’s lawlessness. He had failed to coordinate his speech (written for him) with the Reichswehr or the Reich president, but its remarkable content made it seem that he had. Evans, Third Reich in Power, 26–41; Kershaw, Hitler: 1889–1936, 499–525, 744n57. See also Höhne, Mordasche Röhm, 218–24.

312. Longerich, Die braunen Battalione, 215–6; von Bedrow, Hitler rast; von Papen, Memoirs, 310–1; Wheeler-Bennett, Nemesis of Power, 319–20; von Fallois, Kalkül und Illusion. See also Hancock, “Purge of the SA Reconsidered.” When the SA leader in the Rhineland had received information in late June about an impending crisis, he rightly assumed this meant Göring was preparing a putsch against Röhm. Hüttenberger, Die Gauleiter, 86.

313. Domarus, Hitler: Reden, I: 418 (July 13, 1934). Domarus commented that Hitler projected onto the SA the failings of the Nazi party (400n138, 414n155).

314. The British ambassador dubbed the episode Hitler's "Sicilian vespers." Wark, Ultimate Enemy, 82 (citing M13 summary, July 18, 1934, WO 190/263; Phipps dispatch, Nov. 14, 1934, C7703/20/18, FO 371/17696); Steiner, Triumph of the Dark, 74 (no citation).

315. Carr, Twilight of the Comintern, 123 (citing Rundschau, July 5, 1934: 1541–3). See also Radek in Pravda (July 3, 1934).

316. Nekrich, 1941, 19 (citing a personal conversation in the 1950s with Surits, the envoy in question). Krivitsky, an NKVD operative in Europe at the time (who later defected), would claim from hearsay that Stalin summoned Jan Berzin, head of military intelligence, the very night of the long knives. But Berzin was recorded in Stalin's office on April 19, 1934, and then not again until 1937. Krivitsky would also assert that "Stalin was profoundly impressed by the manner in which Hitler exterminated his opposition, and studied minutely every secret report from our agents in Germany relating to the events of that night." Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service, 1–2, 183; Na prieme, 569.

317. Izvestiia, July 16, 1934.

318. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 534.

319. Kershaw, Nazi Dictatorship, 73.

320. Those killed included the immediate previous chancellor Kurt von Schleicher, the Catholic Action leader, aides to von Papen, and other conservatives. Höhne, Mordsache Röhm, 319–21. Another scholar gives a figure of ninety killed: Gritschneider, "Der Führer hat Sie zum Tode verurteilt . . .," 60–2.

321. German National Socialism tipped even more decisively away from its internal factions pushing for full-scale nationalization of banks and industry and for closer ties with the Soviet Union, while the SS felt even less encumbered. Pringle, Master Plan, 41. Von Hindenburg died on Aug. 2, 1934; von Papen resigned as vice chancellor five days later. On Aug. 19, in a 90 percent vote, Hitler became head of state ("Führer and chancellor").

322. Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin, 13–6 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 73, d. 1, l. 1–3); Firsov, "Stalin i komintern," 12 (citing TsPA na TsK na BKP, f. 146, op. 6, a.e. 754, l. 1); Komolova, Komintern protiv fashizma, 326–9; Borkenau, European Communism, 110–1. On July 4, Dimitrov was again received one-on-one by Stalin ("thorough discussion"), but in late July Stalin was still defending his "social fascist" theory. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 24 (July 4, 1934); Na prieme, 135–6; McDermott and Agnew, Comintern, 92.

323. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 15, l. 114–4; July 5, 1934. The Soviet envoy in Rome told Mussolini if Germany ceased its hostility, "nothing would prevent the Soviet government from continuing the friendly collaboration with Germany in the spirit of the Rappallo and Berlin agreements." DVP SSSR, XVII: 471 (July 13, 1934). Negotiations with Germany for the proffered credit would drag on. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 17, l. 88–9; Dec. 5.

324. Izvestiia, July 11, 1934.

325. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 801 n70 (Feb. 6, 1934). He had abandoned his small Kremlin apartment in the Cavalry Building for good, unable any longer to climb to the second floor, and stayed at his state dacha in Gorki-6 (Arkhangelskoe). Mozokhin and Gladkov, Menzhinskii, 346–9, 354–5 (no citation). After the death of his second wife, Maria Rostovtva, in 1925 he was said to have become a recluse. But he married a third time, and had another child, his fifth.

326. An intentionally provocative obituary in a prominent surviving liberal German newspaper alleged a falling-out between Yagoda and Stalin over forced collectivization. Paul Scheffer, in Berliner Tageblatt, May 11, 1934, translated in Vinogradov, Genrikh Yagoda, 377–81 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 1, d. 12, l. 2–5).

327. Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 25.

328. Stalin had initiated the change, introducing a politburo resolution Feb. 20, 1934, to place the OGPU inside an all-Union NKVD, and forming a commission. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 486 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 939, l. 2), 487–9 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 4, l. 14–5), 509 (l. 20), 514–5 (l. 124–6), 515 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 943, l. 10) 543–4 (d. 948, l. 33, 92–3); Yezhov had sent suggestions on personnel for the NKVD on April 8, 1934: Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 514–5.

329. The expansion occurred on June 8, 1934. On June 6, 1937, the regime would add subarticle 14: “counterrevolutionary sabotage.” Zaitsev, Sbornik zakonodatel'nykh i normativnykh aktov. “In all truth, there is no step, thought, action, or lack of action under the heavens which could not be punished by the heavy hand of Article 58,” Solzhenitsyn would write. Solzhenitsyn, Gulag Archipelago, 60. Criminal codes were by republic, and in Ukraine, it was article 54.

330. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b): povestki dnia zasedanii, II: 511 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 941: March 20, 1934); Karnitskii, Ugolovnyi kodeks RSFSR. See also RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 730, l. 22 (Oct. 7, 1934).

331. Yagoda had already issued a circular on the imperative for labor camp bosses to better organize their work, properly employ machinery, and fulfill the plan with attention to quality and cost, citing cases of failures to meet plan targets. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 375 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 1, d. 594, l. 20: June 22, 1934), 382–90 (d. 7, l. 4–14). In Nov. 1934, the USSR NKVD would assume control over the prisons previously under the commissariats of justice in the Union republics, and thereby unite them with the corrective labor camps and colonies and special settlements. Jakobson, Origins of the Gulag.

332. Solomon, Soviet Criminal Justice, 166–7 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, 948, d. l. 95–100); Pravda, July 26, 1934.

333. Solomon, Soviet Criminal Justice, 166 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 165, d. 47, l. 3). USSR procurator general Ivan Akulov had followed up a petition by Aleksei Selyavkin (b. 1896), the former head of anti-aircraft defense, who was serving a ten-year sentence in Gulag from 1933 for the alleged sale of secret military documents. Selyavkin's petition, which Akulov forwarded to Stalin, stated that he had falsely admitted his guilt under the threat of execution. Stalin decided to use this as an example. On June 5, 1934, the politburo freed him and admonished the OGPU leadership and even the procuracy for ignoring Selyavkin's earlier petitions. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 106 (no citation); APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 71, l. 11–31; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 16, l. 88–9. On July 9, Voroshilov had written to Stalin in Sochi about granting early release to the Provisional Government war minister General Alexander Verkhovsky from his ten-year sentence (“considering that the situation has now sharply changed, I think that we could free him without special risk, using him in scholarly-research work”). Stalin accepted the recommendation, further evidence he had decided to rein in indiscriminate repression. Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 222 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1015, l. 61–2).

334. The secret-police central apparatus in Moscow alone now numbered more than 8,200, and the chaotic expansion had come at the expense of educational levels, competence, and probity. Police bookkeeping, as the rival procuracy's investigations showed, entailed all manner of “black” accounts enabling self-dealing, while contraband running and other abuses of office were pervasive. OGPU archives were spread around many buildings of Moscow's Lubyanka quarter. Yakov Genkin, head of the OGPU records and statistics department, wrote to the hierarchs (Feb. 15, 1934) that the archives then contained almost 825,000 folders (dela), and more than 100,000 folders were not enumerated. Investigation records were merely “a mountain of paper which presents itself for reading with difficulty,” often handwritten, in pencil, and sewn in such a way that trying to read them led to ripping the pages; they were also filthy, overwhelmed with stamps on the cover. Of his predecessors Genkin wrote, “They looked upon the archive like a warehouse, where they could dump paper, if there was no room to hold it or send it some place.” In May 1934, the OGPU archives got a new facility, in the basement of one of the Lubyanka quarter's buildings, and a staff increase to five, as well as folders for redoing files and metal cupboards for securing secret materials. Vinogradov, “Istoriia formirovaniia arkhiva VChK,” 15 (citing TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 3, d. 1607, l. 1).

335. Yagoda cited Stalin's speech of Jan. 1933 about enemies (“This of course is not frightening. But we have to keep it in mind if we want to terminate these elements quickly and without especially numerous victims”). Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 407, 410 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 1, d. 4, l. 1–35).

336. Molchanov would later testify that “in 1934 Yagoda many times pointed out to me the need to conduct a more liberal course in our punishment policy. I recall, for example, a conversation in the summer of 1934 at the Water Station Dynamo. In this conversation Yagoda openly said that it is time perhaps to stop shooting people.” RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 174, l. 137.

337. Solomon, Soviet Criminal Justice, 168–70; Sharlet and Beirne, “In Search of Vyshinsky.” See also Goliakov, Sbornik dokumentov po istorii ugolovnogo zakonodatel'stva SSSR, 333–4.

338. “Autocracy,” as one scholar observed of the tsarist regime, had “maneuvered between arbitrariness and legality, between the principle of unlimited personal power and the imperative to strive for a more rational organization of the state.” Taranovsky, “Osobennosti rossiiskoi samodержavnoi monarkhii,” 166.

339. Max Eastman, who had created a sensation in the 1920s by defending Trotsky and publishing Lenin's Testament, did so again with Artists in Uniform (1934), which equated the Soviet and the Hitler-Mussolini enlistment and regimentation of cultural figures. Eastman had belatedly come to understand that the problem was not Stalin alone but “the bigotry of Marxist metaphysics.” Radek wrote a rebuttal that highlighted Nazi book burnings and concentration camps in Izvestiya (July 18, 1934), bringing Eastman's book greater attention. (The newspaper's circulation was 1.5 million.) Eastman, Artists in Uniform, 133–4. See also Eastman, “Artists in Uniform.” “All Moscow writers seem to have been promoted in rank: they've all acquired high-style apartments, fur coats, and mistresses and fallen in love with the luxurious life,” Korney Chukovsky had written in his diary as early as Nov. 24, 1931. (Chukovsky moved to Peredelkino, the leafy writers' colony.) Chukovskii, Dnevnik, 34. The émigré Vladimir Nabokov wrote that “in Russia before Soviet rule there did exist restrictions, but no orders were given to artists.” Nabokov, “Russian Writers, Censors, Readers,” 3.

340. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 370–2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 304, l. 171–5; May 3, 1937).

341. Several years earlier, a group of nearly one hundred cultural figures had established a cooperative to build dachas in Peredelkino, just twelve miles from Moscow. Gorky had written to Stalin “skeptical” about such a writers' village, and Stalin had agreed (“a far-fetched business that could also remove writers from the real world and develop their conceit”). But the regime approved it anyway. (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 719, l. 104; Feb. 28, 1933; l. 112; March 1, 1933). The original cooperative was abolished, and the money returned.

342. Khodasevich, Portrety slovami, 280.

343. Shentalinsky, Arrested Voices, 262–78. For speculation on possible murder, see Baranov, Gorky bez grima. Yagoda was in love with Maxim Peshkov's wife, Timosha. Gel'man, “Zalozhnik OGPU,” 8. Maxim had joined the party in April 1917, served in the Cheka 1918–1919, but emigrated in 1922 to join his father in Italy, where he married and had two daughters; he returned, bringing his family, with his father, in 1932. Maxim had no job, lived the life of a sybarite, and clashed with Gorky's secretary, Pyotr Kryuchkov.

344. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 430–2 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 742, l. 21–7; Aug. 12, 1934), 437–8 (d. 83, l. 67–9; Aug. 15); Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 220–3 (IMLI, Arkhiv Gor'kogo; Aug. 2, 1934).

345. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 219–20 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 949, l. 29, 95); Antipina, Povsednevnaia zhizn', 63–4 (citing RGALI, f. 631, op. 1, d. 40, l. 18; Sept. 5, 1934).

346. In 1935, the average monthly salary in industry was 194 rubles; in state administration, 212; in management of the economy, 293; but 750 for the Literary Fund director; 500 for his deputy; and 300 for a secretary of the directorate. In time, when bona fide writers were unable to work, the Literary Fund awarded them significant monthly sums (200 to 600 rubles, to a total of 3,000 to 6,000 per year). The USSR also established an administration for the protection of authors' rights, for writers and composers, covering the live stage, cinema, clubs, traveling and restaurant performances. But these were done at the republic level, and sometimes the author of a work in the RSFSR found that work re-used without compensation in a different Union republic. Tolstoi and Vishnevskii, “Ob avtorskom prave,” 3.

347. Babichenko, Literaturnyi front, 16–20 at 18; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 257, l. 14–9; Aug. 29, 1936), 23–5 (at 24; d. 304, l. 171–5). The Literary Fund lobbied to build at least eighty dachas at state expense, and got permission for thirty. Writers watched over the construction, often a full-time job because of insider theft of scarce construction materials, not to mention shoddy workmanship. Sartakova, “Nash pisatel'skii les,” 24.

348. Wells was under the spell of Roosevelt's New Deal and now envisioned a collectivist world-state, with the United States and the USSR converging—if only Stalin would give up Marx. Stalin dismissed Wells's technocratic enthusiasms, insisting that only classes could make history and that the technical intelligentsia was a mere stratum. For Stalin, any New Deal–Five-Year Plan convergence was a non-starter, and so was the concept of general humanity (“I do not believe in the goodness of the bourgeoisie”). But Stalin also denied capitalism was in its death throes. “It seems to me that I am more to the Left than you, Mr. Stalin," Wells, twelve years Stalin's senior, interjected. New Statesman and Nation, Oct. 27, 1934. Wells received a copy of the transcript Stalin had already edited. Wells, as president of the PEN club, added a delicate reference as to whether freedom of thought was possible in the USSR, to which Stalin replied it already existed: Bolshevik "self-criticism." RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 3151, l. 1–23; Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 495 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 742, l. 99–104 Sept. 24, 1934), 496n5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 3151, l. 2–3). Stalin had the edited interview published in the party journal, but not in a mass circulation newspaper. Bol'shevik, 1934, no. 17: 8–18. In the United Kingdom, two prominent public figures jumped on Wells for the interview, George Bernard Shaw (not enough praise of Stalin) and John Maynard Keynes (too much praise of a demagogue): Stalin-Wells Talk: Verbatim Record and Discussion (London: The New Statesman and Nation, 1934). See also Wells, Experiment in Autobiography, 683–702; Cowley, "Interview with Stalin"; Taunton, "Russia and the British Intellectuals," 209–24; and Le'chuk, "Beseda I. V. Stalina s angliiskim pisatelem G. Uellsom," 326–52. Wells correctly recalled his interpreter as Konstantin Umansky; Stalin's logbook has N. M. Goloded (a government official in Soviet Belorussia). Na prieme, 138.

349. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 792, l. 121–46 (at 121: Nov. 9, 1934).

350. "I accompanied Stalin on his trips to the south, I spent a lot of time with him, we always ate meals together, and practically all his free time he spent with us," Vlasik would recall. "I mean myself and his secretary Poskryobyshev. In Moscow I saw him far less. I accompanied him on his trips around the city, to the theater, the cinema." Loginov, Teni Stalina, 106.

351. "O nekotorykh voprosakh istorii bol'shevizma," Proletarskaia revoliutsiia, 1931, no. 6: 3–21 (Oct. 26, 1931); Pikhoia, I. V. Stalin, 128–37 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 2983, l. 1–15). Sochineniia, XII: 84–102. See also Slutskii, "Bol'sheviki o germanskoi sotsial-demokratii"; Dunaevskii, "Bol'sheviki i germanskii levye na mezhdunarodnoi arene," 504–6 (citing a letter from Slutsky, June 9, 1964); Barber, "Stalin's Letter to the Editors of Proletarskaya Revoliutsiia," 39–41; and Tucker, "The Rise of Stalin's Personality Cult," 355–8.

352. Enteen, "Marxist Historians During the Cultural Revolution"; Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 189–91 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 255, l. 179–82). Popov, Ocherk istorii.

353. "History at long last has been restored" to schools, Andrei Bubnov, the enlightenment commissar, had remarked at the Communist Academy (March 13, 1934). "Peter was Peter, Catherine was Catherine . . . We must give an impression of the epoch, about the events that took place at that time, who ruled, what sort of government there was, what sort of policies were carried out, and how events transpired." Brandenberger and Dubrovsky, "The People Need a Tsar," 874 (citing Arkhiv RAN, f. 350, op. 1, d. 905, l. 1–3ob.); Brandenberger, National Bolshevism, 32–3. See also Pikhoia, I. V. Stalin, 186 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1013, l. 4: March 3, 1934). History education was reintroduced as a separate subject in schools, and meant to displace the study of Engels's Anti-Dühring or Dialectics of Nature. Scott, Behind the Urals, 45.

354. The meeting took place March 20, 1934. Litvin, Bez pravo na mysl', 55–7 (quoting the unpublished diary of Sergei A. Piontkovsky). D. Osipov in Pravda (April 5, 1934), lambasted schemata without facts as "skeletons in the schools." See also Pravda and Izvestiia, May 16, 1934: 1; Spravochnik partiinogo rabotnika, IX: 137; Suny, Structure of Soviet History, 229.

355. For example: Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 12–5 (April 7, 1934).

356. Farnsworth, "Conversing with Stalin," 961 (Kollontai diary, summer 1934: RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 749, l. 105).

357. "Iurii Zhdanov, vtoroii muzh docheri 'otsa narodov': ia znal Stalina s 15 let," Komsmol'skaia pravda, Jan. 10, 2007.

358. Rybin, Stalin v oktiabre, 9. Kirov had been in Stalin's office July 25, 26, and 27: Na prieme, 138.

359. Similarly, Kirov complained in a letter to a minion in Leningrad, "By the whim of fate I've ended up in Sochi, and I'm unhappy about it. The heat here is not tropical but hellish." Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 141 (citing Kirov Museum, f. III-414), 324–8 (TsPA, f. 80, op. 26, d. 68, l. 1, 4–4, ob. 7).

360. Andreev, Vospominaniia, pis'ma, 294.

- ³⁶¹ Stalin also noted that foreign currency had to be conserved. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 462 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 84, l. 20–20ob.).
- ³⁶² Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 455 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 61–6), 465 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 84, l. 23–23ob.), 473–6 (d. 742, l. 75–84). Stalin demanded additional grain levies from the harvest, in the form of purchases (zakupki) at low prices, beyond the obligatory quotas. But grain exports in 1934 were a mere 800,000 tons, less than half the much reduced 1933 amount. Baykov, Soviet Foreign Trade, appendix, table IV. The NKVD was ordered to take charge of grain elevators and grain collection points as of July 27, 1934.
- ³⁶³ RGASPI, f. 558 op. 1, d. 3155; Kvasnonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 245–9 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 419, l. 55–7; Goloshchokin, Aug. 4, 1933); Kirilina, Neizvestny Kirov, 328 (LPA, f. 24, op. 2–v, d. 936, l. 94; Sveshnikov to Agranov, Dec. 16, 1934), 331–2 (RGASPI, f. 80, op. 18, d. 67, l. 67–9; d. 137, l. 1–2). Kirov was in Kazakhstan Sept. 6–29. Pazi, Nash Mironykh, 449.
- ³⁶⁴ Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 479 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 85, l. 44–5; Sept. 12, 1934), 479–80 (f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 76–82; to Kaganovich, Zhdanov, Molotov, Kuibyshev—but not Kirov, Sept. 13).
- ³⁶⁵ Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd sovetsskikh pisatelei, 687–96. See also Struve, “Pan-Soviet Literary Congress.” Garrard, Inside the Soviet Writers' Union.
- ³⁶⁶ Antipina, Povsednevnaia zhizn', 27.
- ³⁶⁷ Maksimenkov, “Ocherki nomenklaturnoi istorii sovetskoi literatury,” 247 (Pavel Yudin, Aug. 15, 1934).
- ³⁶⁸ “K 40-letiiu Pervogo vsesoiuznogo s'ezda,” Voprosy literatury, 1974, no. 8: at 14 (Valery Kirpotin).
- ³⁶⁹ Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd sovetsskikh pisatelei, 1, 5–18. One bitter witness would recall that Gorky just stopped reading his own text partway through. Kochin, Spelye kolos'ia, 299. See also Baranov, “Nado prekoslovit'!”
- ³⁷⁰ Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd sovetsskikh pisatelei, 20–38, 291–318, 416–20.
- ³⁷¹ Kužmin, Dnevnik 1934 g., 95 (Aug. 30, 1934).
- ³⁷² Zhdanov thought that party-member writers spoke less brightly than the non-party, and noted to Stalin that Gorky thought the party-member writers had no authority whatsoever in the writers' milieu. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 230–1 (RGASPI, f. 77, op. 3, d. 112, l. 2–8).
- ³⁷³ Babel added: “Since everything is done artificially, under the stick, the congress is proceeding deathlike, like a tsar's parade, and no one abroad will believe in this tsar's parade.” Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 232–4 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 1, d. 56, l. 185–89). The non-party loyalist Ilya Ehrenburg would later deem the gathering “a great and marvelous festival.” Ehrenburg, Men, Years—Life, IV: 40. Rozhkov, who was not a delegate to the congress, published an essay collection on the value of romanticism right at this time: Nuzhna li nam romantika? (Moscow: Sovetskaiia literatura, 1934). Stalin evidently took an interest in Rozhkov's ideas. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 412–3 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 793, l. 95; Radek to Poskryobyshev, April 10, 1936).
- ³⁷⁴ Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd sovetsskikh pisatelei, 74–103; Zhgenti, “S'ezd velikogo edineniia,” 53; Fleishman, Pasternak v tridsatye gody, 201–2. Toroshelezde's report was published in the press the next day with a front-page photograph of the Georgian delegation accompanied by Pasternak (known for his translations from Georgian). Literaturnaia gazeta, Aug. 21, 1934. One scholar has asserted that, as a minority, “Ukrainian writers lost more than their Russian colleagues.” Luckyj, Literary Politics, 203.
- ³⁷⁵ Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd sovetsskikh pisatelei, 286–7 (as translated by Olyesha).
- ³⁷⁶ Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 232–4 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 1, d. 56, l. 185–89). Kirilenko served as the secretary to Petrovsky, head of the central executive committee in Soviet Ukraine.
- ³⁷⁷ Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 223–6 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 1, d. 56, l. 125–32), 226 (l. 150), 227–8 (l. 160–3), 229 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 950, l. 40).
- ³⁷⁸ Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 447 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 83, l. 122–122ob.). Attendees' national composition was registered as follows: 201 Russians, 113 Jews, 28 Georgians, 25 Ukrainians, 19 Armenians, 19 Tatars, 17 Belorussians, and 12 Uzbeks (43 other nationalities were represented by fewer than 10 and in some cases just one person). The politburo strongly criticized the party organizations in Bashkiria, Buryat-Mongolia, Yakutia, and the German region in the Volga for sending ill-chosen delegates and not overseeing the speeches. Gatagova et al., Tsk RKP (b)—VKP (b) i natsional'nyi voprosy, II: 75 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 951, l. 8; Aug. 28, 1934).

379. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 83, l. 156–7.

380. Antipina, Povednevnaia zhizn', 43–4; Osokina, Za fasadom, 113.

381. “Many members of our government attended,” recalled Valentina Khodasevich, principal designer of the storied Leningrad (formerly Mariinsky) Theater of Opera and Ballet. “Supper, served in the dining room, was very lively and interesting. People made speeches. Aleksei Maximovich asked that I sit next to Malraux, since I speak French, to entertain him and translate . . . [Louis] Aragon, Elsa Triolet, the Spanish writer Mara-Teresa León and many others spoke very well.” Khodasevich, Portrety slovami, 280–1.

382. Pravda, June 19, 1934; Katsman, “Cheliuskin”; Groza and Dubenskii, Slavnym zavoevateliam Artiki.

383. Radio was still mostly live at this time, and arrests followed “accidental” announcements (e.g., mentioning that there had been a famine in 1933), but sometimes the utterances were deliberate: the announcer of the ceremony on Red Square for the Cheliuskin rescuers signed off, “The comedy is over.” (He turned out to have noble descent and a relative arrested by the OGPU.) Gorიაeva, Radio Rossii, 158. See also Bollinger, Stalin's Slave Ships, 65–71; McCannon, Red Arctic, 61–8; The Cheliuskin Odyssey (1934).

384. Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd sovetских pisatelei, 4–5. Pavel Yudin and Alexander Fadeyev authored “On Socialist Realism,” which had been approved by the Central Committee and published in Pravda (May 8), on what was thought to be the eve of the congress. See also Kemp-Welch, Stalin and the Literary Intelligentsia, 177. The literary section of the institute of philosophy, at the Communist Academy, would mount what ended up to be a debate about socialist realism on Dec. 20 and 28, 1934, and Jan. 3, 1935, prompted by a draft encyclopedia article on the novel by a Hungarian-born Germanophone intellectual, György Lukács (b. 1885), a Hegel devotee who had once been expelled from the Hungarian Communist party for the heresy of advocating alliances with non-proletariat forces in democratic settings, and lived in Moscow, for a time editing Marx's German-language notebooks and manuscripts at the Institute of Marx-Engels-Lenin. Lukács cast the novel as both pure avatar of bourgeois culture and capitalist modernity and as temporary displacement of the grand epic tradition, but the proletariat's rise forced the creation of a “positive hero,” the “conscious worker,” who overcame the “degradation of man” and forced the novel back into the arms of the epic. Socialist realism—thanks to this class analysis contortion—became an instrument for a supposedly genuine world literature. “Problemy teorii romana: doklad G. Lukacha,” Literaturnyi kritik, 1935, no. 2: 214–49, and “Pravleniia stenogramma diskusii po dokladu G. Lukacha,” Literaturnyi kritik, 1935, no. 3: 231–54; Clark, Moscow, 163–5; Tikhonov, Master and the Slave, 112–28; Lukach, “Roman kak burzhaznaia epopeia,” IX: 795–832; Sziklai, After the Revolution; Gurchich, “Vtoroe rozhdenie,” 347–8.

385. Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd sovetских pisatelei, 464–6 (Aug. 28). Zarkhi (b. 1900) died July 17, 1935.

386. Katerina Clark presents “Soviet socialist realism as a canonical doctrine defined by its patristic texts,” and offers an “official short list of model novels.” For Boris Groys, socialist realism just signifies “the art of the Stalin period.” Evgeny Dobrenko calls socialist realism “the USSR's most successful industry . . . a machine for distilling Soviet reality into socialism.” Clark, Soviet Novel, 3, appendix B; Groys, Total Art of Stalinism, 72; Dobrenko, Political Economy of Socialist Realism, 5–6.

387. Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 42–3. Jelagin was himself class enemy, like his stand-partner, “Count” Sheremetev. See also Smrž, Symphonic Stalinism.

388. Matthew Cullerle Bown, Socialist Realist Painting (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1998), 87, 109. As Bown notes, there is scant information on Stalin's views on painting (184). Bown rehabilitates socialist realist visual art by arguing that avant-garde artists changed their style voluntarily in order to make their work widely accessible, a goal they passionately wanted to achieve. Margarita Tupitsyn's work on photography—which the authorities did not consider an art form, and therefore for which no union was established—also argues that the Soviet version of the avant-garde aesthetic project was about mass media, such as the photograph in a mass-produced journal, and mass culture. Christina Kiaer, in her work on Alexander Deneika, attempts to show how socialist realism was avant-garde. These works follow from Boris Groys's provocation. Tupitsyn, Soviet Photograph; Kiaer, “Was Socialist Realism Forced Labor?,” 45; Kiaer, Imagine No Possessions. See also Susan Reid, “Socialist Realism in the Stalinist Terror”; Reid, “In the Name of the People,” 716; and Johnson, “Alternative Histories of Soviet Visual Culture.” Stalin had become the subject of oil paintings in 1928, 1931, and 1932 by the Leningrad-based artist Isaac Brodsky (b. 1883), who depicted him in exaggerated size, with an iconic copy of Pravda on the desk. In 1934, Brodsky became the first painter to receive the Order of Lenin. That same year Alexander Gerasimov (b. 1881), a traditional realist before the revolution (when he opposed the avant-garde) and a Red Army veteran of the civil war, completed his Stalin Gives His Report to the 17th Party Congress. Gerasimov, too, favored a larger-than-life heroic realism. Pravda, April 10, 1934, and Feb. 6, 1935. Mikhail Avilov painted The Arrival of Comrade Stalin at the First Cavalry in 1919 for the 1933 exhibition “15 Years of the Red Army.” Pravda, Aug. 13, 1933. Yevgeny Katsman recorded Stalin’s reaction to the exhibition: “Next to Nikonov’s picture, Stalin said, when looking at Kolchak with a revolver in his hand, ‘he wants to shoot himself.’ . . . When we got to Avilov, Stalin saw himself painted, laughed and immediately turned his eyes to other works. Then back to Avilov, and he examined himself longer.” Plamper, Stalin Cult, 136–7 (citing RGALI, f. 2368, op. 2, d. 36, l. 12–3).

389. The sales were carried out by the foreign trade commissariat, which had no expertise in art treasures and formed a state company, Antiquariat. Some of the paintings that were sold, along with icons, furniture, jewelry, and antiquarian books, came from museum collections, but many were looted from the public or churches. The first paintings sold were bartered for oil (in 1930). Andrew Mellon, the U.S. secretary of the treasury, purchased twenty-one of the paintings in 1931, for $6.65 million; one painting alone sold for $1.166 million, then the largest amount ever paid. “‘Nuzhen li nam ermitazh,’” 106–10 (APRE, f. 3, op. 42, d. 141, l. 1189–90, 94–95ob.); Stetsky to Kaganovich; 94–95ob.: Lergan to Stalina); Artizov and Naumov, Vlast, 179 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 12, l. 183); Odom and Salmond, Treasures into Tractors. Mellon would donate the art in 1937 to the U.S. government in Washington, where they would form the basis of the National Gallery. The Metropolitan Museum of Art bought some. Stetsky wrote to Kaganovich (Oct. 23, 1933) that the secretive process had resulted in rumors of a firesale, lowering prices, and that the Hermitage Museum had sunk from third-ranked in the world to perhaps seventeenth. The politburo resolved to terminate the sales on Nov. 15, 1933. Ilin and Semenova, Prodannyye Sokrovisha Rossii. Hermitage deputy director Iosif Orbeli soon replaced his boss (Legran), who had complied with the sales as mandated by the regime. Megreldze, Iosif Orbeli; Iubashian, Akademik Iosif Orbeli.

390. Bown, Socialist Realist Painting, 87, 109.

391. Mindlin, Neobyknovennyye sobesedniki, 429.

392. Conformism was rampant but with a culture this vast, various tendencies inevitably vied with each other. Schlögel, Terror und Traum, 30–1.

393. Stalin commented that he had liked Radek’s speech but not Gorky’s. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 461–2 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 84, l. 53; d. 50, l. 49), 465–6 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 84, l. 42–42ob.), 466n3 (f. 17, op. 3, d. 951, l. 28; Sept. 1, 1934).

394. Ponomarev, Aleksandr Shcherbakov, 18.

395. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 329–32 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1494, l. 13ob.–18ob.).

396. Chukovskii, Dnevnik, 140 (April 10, 1936).

397. Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 114.

398. Mirskii, Istoriia russkoi literatury, 794.

399. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 340–1 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 730, l. 18–20, 17; Sept. 6, 1934). An abridged version of Bukharin’s speech to the congress was published in Pravda (Aug. 30, 1934); his closing speech was also published (Sept. 3). Gorky’s closing speech was likewise published in Pravda (Sept. 2). Zhdanov had written another report to Stalin on the Writers Congress, Sept. 3, 1934. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 332–8 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 730, l. 2–16).

400. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast, 236–8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 951, l. 28–30).

401. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast, 238–50 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 1, d. 56, l. 70–93).

402. Ivanov-Razumnik, Neizdannyyi Shchedrin; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 3, d. 231, s. 301–2; Gromov, Stalin, 161–2.

403. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast, 170–1 (APRE, f. 3, op. 34, d. 186, l. 213–5; March 1932).

404. Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 73.

405. Bykov, Boris Pasternak, 491.

406. For an analysis of the reader under the Stalin dictatorship, see Dobrenko, Formovka Sovetskogo chitatelia.

407. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 338–40 (RGASPI, f. 58, op. 11, d. 729, l. 52–65; Sept. 5, 1934). The Sukharyov Tower in Moscow had also been demolished, despite vehement opposition from scholars. “We cannot deal with a single decrepit little church without a protest being delivered.” Kaganovich complained. “K istorii snosa Sukharevskoi bashni,” 109–16.

CHAPTER 4. TERRORISM

1. The other task: “The mood of the masses regarding the revolutionary movement in Spain.” Kozlova, Sovetskie liudi, 232 (citing the Memorial archive, TsDNA, f. 30, d. 12, l. 64–5; Stepan Polubny, b. 1914).

2. Zolotarev et al., Velikaia Otechestvennaia voina 1941–1945 gg., I: 9; Grechko et al., Istoriia Vtoroi mirovoi voiny, I: 214; Kirshner and Novikov, Kanun i nachalo voiny, 29; Mel’tiukhov, Upushchennyi shans Stalina, 358.

3. Włodarkiewicz, Przed 17 września 1939 roku, 132; Habeck, Storm of Steel, 214–5 (citing RGVA, f. 4, op. 18, d. 51: “Stenograficheskii otchet zasedanie Voenogo Soveta pri NKO Soiuza SSR 10–12 dekabria 1934 g.: ob itogakh boevoi podgotovki 1934 i zadachakh na 1935 g.”).

4. E.g.: Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 477 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 72–5; Sept. 6), 479 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 85, l. 44–5; Sept. 12), 479–80 (f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 76–82; Sept. 13), 483–4 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 742, l. 85–9; Sept. 16).

5. By late July 1934, Stalin had shaved the list of Soviet conditions for joining the League of Nations down to a mere seat on its Council. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 313 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 16, l. 119); DVP SSSR, XVII: 479 (Litvinov to Rosenberg, July 14, 1934); DDF, 1e série, VII: 5 (Barthou to Payart, July 27, 1934).

6. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 59.

7. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 315–6 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 17, l. 49); RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 85, l. 26, 31–32ob.

8. The invitation was portrayed as coming from France, just as the Soviets had insisted. Poland demanded that Moscow declare that all bilateral agreements with Warsaw remained inviolable. Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-pol’skikh otnoshenii, VI: 220–1, 225; DDF, 1e série, VII: 406–7; Beck, Final Report, 65; Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 483 (RGASPI, f. 558, p. 11, d. 85, l. 48, 61; Sept. 16). Thirty-nine member countries voted yes, three voted no (Netherlands, Portugal, Switzerland), and seven abstained.

9. Haslam, “Soviet-German Relations,” 789, citing Sotsialisticheskii vestnik, Jan. 25, 1934, and Kommunisticheskaia revoliutsiia, 1934, no. 8: 43–4.

10. Back on Nov. 5, 1927, Stalin had told a delegation of foreign workers that “the Soviet Union is not prepared to become a part of that camouflage for imperialist machinations represented by the League of Nations. The League is a ‘house of assignments’ for the imperialists who arrange their business there behind the scenes.” Sochineniia, X: 206–7 Carr, Twilight of the Comintern, 104–16; Izvestiia, Jan. 4, 1934.

11. Pravda, Sept. 17 and 20, 1934; DVP SSSR, XVII: 589; DDF, 1e série, VI: 683–4. Left unsaid was that Geneva would be a gold mine of information: more than 600 people worked at the League, of varied nationalities, and many were willing to talk to the builders of a new socialist world. Zhukovskaia, “SSSR i liga natsii.”

12. DVP SSSR, XVII: 606 (Litvinov on Beck, Sept. 22, 1934), 608 (Litvinov on Bartou, Sept. 25); Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 318 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 17, l. 17; Sept. 23), 318–9 (l. 75–6; Nov. 2, 1934); DDF, 1e série, VII: 254–5.

13. Miličević, King Dies in Marseilles; Paul-Boncour, Entre deux guerres, II: 21–7. On the supposed involvement of Nazi Germany, see Thorndike et al., Unternehmen Teutonenschwert, 21–43; Volkov, Operatsiia “Tevtonskii mech”; and Volkov, Germano-ugoslavskie otnosheniia, 64.

14. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 86, l. 89, 26. Voroshilov received a secret intelligence brief (Oct. 23, 1934) remarking on the increasing closeness of Japan, Poland, Finland, and Latvia to Nazi Germany. “War,” the analysts wrote, “might not happen for several years and at the same time it could break out quickly and unexpectedly.” P. N. Bobylev et al., Voennyi soviet pri narodnom komissare oborony SSSR, dekabr’ 1934 g., 5 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 14, d. 1136, l. 90–5).

15. Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin, 18–22 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 73, d. 1, l. 4–7; f. 558, op. 1, d. 3162, l. 1–2; Oct. 25, 1934); Leibzon and Shirina, Povorot v politike Kominternia, 97 (TsPA pri TsK na VKP [Sofia], f. 146, op. 4, d. 639, l. 7–8).

16. Multiday discussions took place (Dec. 9–19, 1934) in the Comintern. Carr, Twilight of the Comintern, 144–5, citing Thorez, Fils du peuple (Paris: Éditions sociales, 1960), 102.
17. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 566 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 246, l. 1: Sept. 2, 1934); Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 70; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 17, l. 31; Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 19, 58–66.
18. Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 229–30 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 17, l. 74, 80, 82, 86; GARF, f. R-5446, op. 27, d. 73, l. 3); Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 511 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 86, l. 41: Oct. 9, 1934; l. 23: Oct. 9), 512 (l. 55: Oct. 10).
19. Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 226–8 (citing APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 72, l. 180–7, 253–4; RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 80, l. 4, 33–40, 91; f. 17, op. 162, d. 17, l. 2–3, 42, 57, op. 163, d. 1046, l. 21–3; GARF, f. R-5446, op. 27, d. 81, l. 428–9); Viktorov, Bez grifu “sekretno,” 139–40; Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 130–4. With the kulak crushed, Kaganovich had explained to the Moscow party organization (Sept. 21, 1934), it was necessary “to conduct our measures, repressions, the struggle with enemies within the law . . . educating our population within the frame of socialist legal consciousness.” Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 222 (RGASPI, f. 87, op. 3, d. 164, l. 39).
20. “Reconciliation inside the party could not have appealed to him,” Tucker surmised of Stalin at this time. Tucker, Stalin in Power, 243.
21. Whereas the OGPU had made 505,000 arrests in 1933, including 283,000 for counterrevolution, in 1934 the OGPU–NKVD would make 205,000, including 90,000 for counterrevolution. Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 229 (GARF, f. R-9401, op. 1, d. 4157, l. 202); Werth and Mironenko, Istoriia stalinskogo gulaga, I: 609; Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 123.
22. As an overstated U.S. headline, which was translated for the internally circulated regime summaries of the foreign press, had it, “Red Russia was becoming pink.” Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 106 (Baltimore Sun). Utyosov (who had been born Lazar Weisbein) discovered jazz on a trip to Paris.
23. Stalin’s first post-holiday meeting is recorded as Oct. 31. Na prieme, 139.
24. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 288–9.
25. Dullin, Men of Influence, 97 (citing AVP RF, f. 05, op. 14, d. 103, l. 117); Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 318–9 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 17, l. 75–6). In Nov. 1934, the regime belatedly created a training institute inside the foreign affairs commissariat.
26. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 587.
27. On Nov. 3, 1934, Stalin repaired to his Kremlin apartment after meetings in his office until 8:30 p.m. On Nov. 4, he had late supper at his Kremlin apartment with Kaganovich and Zhdanov. Murin, Stalin v ob”iatiakh, 158–9 (Svanidze diary: Nov. 4, 1934); Na prieme, 139–40. Rybin, Stalin v oktiabre, 9; See also Barmine, One Who Survived, 268.
28. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 108.
29. Stalin would also be rumored to be having Kremlin rendezvous with the Bolshoi soprano Valeria Barsova [Vladimirova] and the mezzo-soprano Vera Davidova, who many years later would assert that Stalin had wanted her to be his “housekeeper.” Kun, Stalin, 222.
30. Gromov, Stalin, 63.
31. Shumyatsky had replaced the Stalin critic Ryutin, who had been shunted over to the then backwater film industry for a time. Kopley Jr., “The First Perestroika.” Shumyatsky compiled notes of his notes on his film showings at the Kremlin from May 1934 through Jan. 26, 1937. In summer 1935, in Shumyatsky’s absence, Ia. Chuzin, his deputy, made notes. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 919–1053. The first Soviet sound film, Putevka v zhizn’, by N. V. Ekka, had premiered in June 1931. Shumiatskii, Kinematografiia millionov, 121; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 892, l. 93; Christie, “Making Sense of Early Soviet Sound,” 176–92; Kul’turnaia zhizn’ v SSSR, 1928–1941, 184, 199, 255.
32. Mar’iamov, Kremlevskii tsenzor, 9.
33. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 144–5.
34. Late into the 1930s, all Soviet sound films were released in silent versions, too, for many movie projectors still lacked audio equipment. Bulgakova, Sovetskii slukhoglas, 98.

35. Stalin first saw Chapayev on Nov. 4, 1934; an anxious Shumyatsky had asked Stalin's permission to summon the directors, the brothers Sergei and Georgy Vasilyev, to help answer questions. Stalin would watch Chapayev again and again that month (the viewing on Nov. 8–9 lasted until 3:51 a.m.). Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 949–51 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 56). On the arguments between the Vasilyev brothers and the actor who played Chapayev, Boris Babochkin (b. 1904) of the Leningrad Drama Theater, see Babochkin, Liuto Sovetskogo kinoaktera.

36. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 959–61 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 63–63ob.). Stalin invited Budu Mdvinai, with whom he had clashed in the 1920s over Georgian affairs, to the screening that evening.

37. Pravda, Nov. 3, 1934 (S. S. Dinamov); Izvestiia, Nov. 10 (Kh. N. Khersonsky). Stalin directed Shumyatsky to work more closely with Mekhlis; on Nov. 20, the dictator again phoned Mekhlis directly from a screening, which resulted in “The Whole Country Is Watching Chapayev” (Pravda, Nov. 21, 1934). Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 969–70 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 69–69ob.: Nov. 20, 1934). See also Brooks, “Thank You, Comrade Stalin!,” 59–60.

38. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 961–7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 64–6).

39. Murin, Stalin v ob'iatyakh, 160–2 (Nov. 14 and 26). See also Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 138.

40. Bullard and Bullard, Inside Stalin's Russia, 243; Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 68–70.

41. Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 70–1; Kokurin and Petrov, Lubianka, 49. Medved had served as OGPU boss in the Soviet Far East (1926–1929) before his transfer to Leningrad in Jan. 1930. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 295.

42. Viktorov, Bez grifa "Sekretnosti", 140 (Stalin to Kuibyshev and Zhdanov). At the May 2, 1934, Kremlin reception, when Voroshilov observed “from the Chekists no one has come. Neither Yagoda nor anyone else,” Stalin responded, “Yesterday I somewhat offended them. They arrested people for nothing.” Banac, Diary of Georgii Dimitrov, 18 (May 2, 1934).

43. In Medved's case, Yagoda singled out lapses in reconnoitering the Finnish frontier (permitting spies and saboteurs to cross), grain procurements, and the struggle against factory sabotage. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 372–4 (TSA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 9, l. 243–5); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 569–71.

44. Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 68. On Aug. 16, 1934, Stalin had Zinoviev sacked from the journal Bolshevik, as a scapegoat for controversy related to writings of Engels. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 716–7 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 950, l. 87–9), 419 (f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 43–6), 428–9 (f. 558, op. 1, d. 742, l. 15–20), 439–40 (f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 154–60); Tucker, “The Emergence of Stalin's Foreign Policy,” 564–5. Zinoviev's sacking spurred an NKVD move to arrest fourteen ex-Zinovievites in Leningrad, but Kirov, according to Medved, overruled the operation as counter to Stalin's recent stress on “socialist legality.” Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 473; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 146 (citing RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 62, l. 62–76; Fomin deposition, 1956). On Kirov's continuing confidence in Medved in 1934, see Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 71. Sveshnikov, interviewed in 1960 and 1964, recalled tensions in 1934 between Kirov and Medved. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 146–7 (citing RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 73, l. 102); V. K. Zavalishin, “Vokrug ubiistva Kirova,” Boris I. Nicolaevsky Collection, Hoover Institution Archives, series 236, box 411, file I: 1–55.

45. Markus had taken charge of a clinic (Bolshaya Podyacheskaya, no. 30) for patients with syphilis, mostly prostitutes, whom she strove to reeducate by forcing them to attend political meetings and read about exemplary Bolsheviks. She took the tram to work, dressed simply, and wore no makeup, but two students she had recruited pimped the prostitutes at a nearby bar, causing a scandal. The difficult hospital environment was thought to have exacerbated her health problems and she resigned. Chudov arranged for one of Markus's sisters, a doctor, to come stay with her in Tolmachevo. Lebina, Povedeniia zhizni, 95–6; Lebina and Shkarovskii, Prostitutsiia v Peterburge, 148–9; Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 324, 405–6 (recollections of Danil Shamko, Feb. 11, 1965). Markus was officially listed as born 1885—Kirov was born in 1886—but she seems to have been at least three to four years older than him. Zen'kovich, Samyie sekretnye rodstvenniki, 184–5.

46. Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol'shaia chistka, 37–8.

47. Kirov's office had been on the long part of the L-shaped corridor, closer to the main stairway, but was moved to the short part. Deviatov et al., “Gibel' Kirova,” 59; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 125–6, 403–9 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 80, l. 137–9; Gubin to Mironov, Jan. 7, 1935; d. 13, l. 1–18; Pelshe report). Lenoe gives a figure of fifteen guards, citing Pelshe; Deviatov gives a figure of twelve (through Feb. 1934). While in Leningrad, Stalin chose not to stay at Kirov's place—a building with some 250 apartments—but in a detached house, which prompted Medved to have subordinates scope out a possible detached house as a more secure residence for Kirov. Kirov resisted any move. Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 37; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 407–8 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 13, l. 279–81, 288–95ob.).

48. Sept. 28–Oct. 8, 1934, the Mongol party had held its first congress since the New Course. Batbayar, “Stalin’s Strategy in Mongolia.”

49. RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 13, l. 1–24. Stalin noted that when property was collective, enrichment signified raising the general well-being; under private property, enrichment meant exploitation by some of others. But Mongolia was a “bourgeois-democratic republic,” even if “of a new type,” so there would be exploitation. “Allowing exploitation, you do not sympathize with it and support it but circumscribe it by means of taxes.” He advised that the better-off should be kept out of the party. Stalin edited the transcript of the conversation. See also “Sovety I. Stalina mongol’skomu premer’u,” Azia i Afrika segodnia, no. 6 (1991): 63–5.

50. Choibalsan belonged to the arrested Lhumbe’s circle, and was evidently incarcerated with the “Japanese spy group,” but soon he himself was torturing the other arrested Mongols on Moscow’s behalf. Okhtin, Moscow’s former envoy to Mongolia, wrote to Choibalsan absolving him of the Lhumbe association yet emphasizing that a lesson had been imparted. Roshchin, Politicheskaiia istoriia Mongolii, 285–6, citing L. Bat-Ochir, Choibalsan: namryn n’ balarkhaig todruulakhui (Ulan Bator: [n.p.], 1996), 105–7. Choibalsan studied for long periods in the USSR (April–Sept. 1933; Feb.–autumn 1934).

51. Khaustov, Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 594–7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 188, l. 1–7; Jan. 5, 1935). On April 17, 1935, Stalin received a secret report via an agent in New York about a possible U.S.–Japan pact of nonaggression (661–2: l. 71–3).

52. RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 14, l. 1–8. The Mongols were in the Soviet Union Oct. 21–Dec. 2, 1934. On Nov. 24, 1934, Molotov hosted a diplomatic luncheon for them: Stalin, Voroshilov, and, Mikoyan attended. Gol’man and Slesarchuk; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 351, l. 66.

53. Baabar, Twentieth-Century Mongolia, 342–3.

54. A letter from the Mongol leadership in Ulan Bator (Dec. 20, 1934) to Stalin reported unanimous formal approval of the negotiations with the USSR (RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 15, l. 1–4).

55. Stalin had decided unilaterally to abolish rationing for bread in the new year while in Sochi in Oct. 1934. On Dec. 8 the regime finally published the much-rumored forthcoming decree. Malenkov wrote to Kaganovich (Dec. 21) about large numbers of workers at factories condemning the move, amid anger over wage arrears as well. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 513 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 83–7); Davies and Khlevniuk, “Otmena kartochnoi sistemy v SSSR”; Khlevniuk and Davies, “The End of Rationing in the Soviet Union, 1934–1935”; Kвашonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 302–3 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 255, l. 1).

56. Stalin added: “Money will circulate, money will become fashionable, which has not been the case here for a long time, and the money economy will strengthen.” RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 530, l. 79–98.

57. On Nov. 6, at dinner with Bagirov, Orjonikidze fell ill with high fever and chills. He returned to Tiflis to take part in the Revolution Day parade, but that night, at Beria’s apartment, he suffered stomach pains and intestinal bleeding. Four days later, he had heart palpitations. Several photos of Orjonikidze with Beria were published in the newspaper Beria controlled: Zaria Vostoka, Nov. 4, 18, and 27, 1934.

58. Rybin, Riadom so Stalinym, 10.

59. Kirilina, Rikoшет, 38–9.

60. They lived at Bateinin St. 9/39, Vyborg Side. According to her party autobiography (June 1933), Draule was born in St. Petersburg gubernia of peasant parents; her supposedly landless father had moved there from the ethnic Latvian province, and Milda supposedly began tending the gentry family’s pigs and cows at age nine. Secret police files indicate her father managed an estate in Luga province and was well-off, making her a class enemy. Deviatov et al., “Gibel’ Kirova,” 60–1 (TsGA IPD St.P, f. 1051, op. 2, d. 6, l. 93; f. 1728, d. 698355, l. 10–12ob.; Olga Draule); Sukharnikova, “My nagli takoi.”

61. Deviatov et al., “Gibel’, Kirova” 62.

- 62. Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 465; Kirilina, “Vstrely v Smol’nom,” 72; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 200–5 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 25, l. 39–43).
- 63. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 247; Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 464; RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 112, l. 5; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 215–6 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 1, l. 10–53). Also in Aug. 1934, borrowing money, Milda had rented a dacha on the Gulf of Finland at Sestroretsk with the two children. Deviatov et al. have Kirov on holiday there at the same time, but Kirov was in Sochi with Stalin for all of Aug. Deviatov et al., “Gibel’ Kirova,” 62 (TsGA IPD S.T.R. f. 1957, op. 2, d. 3754, l. 161).
- 64. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 257; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 220–2 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 1, l. 65–74).
- 65. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 398–9 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 13, l. 7–45; Klimov report on Nikolayev detentions, 1961). See also Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol’shaia chistka, 43; and Barmine, One Who Survived, 252.
- 66. Deviatov et al., “Gibel’ Kirova” 57–8; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 183, 185, 191, 647, 664, 685. Nikolayev purchased bullets and practiced shooting at the city’s Dynamo sport society, run by the NKVD (perhaps the only place to get ammunition legally).
- 67. According to Draule’s testimony: Zhukov, “Sledstvie,” 40 (citing Yezhov archive materials).
- 68. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 209, 227 (TsA FSB, a.u.d. N-Sh44, t. 12, l. 401–10; May 13, 1934); Zhukov, “Sledstvie,” 40; Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 253.
- 69. Sotsialisticheskaiia zakonnos’, 1991, no. 2: 70–1; Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 466–7; Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 262; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 229–35 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 24, l. 24–32; d. 1, l. 65–74). “Dear Wife and School Brothers!” he wrote again, probably in late Oct. “I am dying for political convictions, on the basis of historical reality, without even a dollop of fear, or an iota of consolation . . . I must die since there is no freedom of agitation, the press, or voting, in life.” Zhukov, “Sledstvie,” 38; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 228 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 24, l. 24–32).
- 70. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 258–9, 397; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 237–8, 242–3 (TsA FSB, a.u.d. N-Sh44, t. 12, l. 401–10).
- 71. Petukhov and Khomchik, “Delo o ‘Leningradskom tsentre,’” 17–8; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 245–6 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 1, l. 85). Leonid’s half-brother Pyotr had deserted from the Red Army and would be captured in a gunfight. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 217–8, 247–8.
- 72. Deviatov et al., “Gibel’ Kirova,” 59 (citing TsGA IPD, f. 24, op. 2a, d. 30, l. 16–7: report by Alekhin, head of the NKVD operative department, to Zakovsky on Dec. 12, 1934). Smolny had had no pass system whatsoever through 1932; in 1933, its security was taken over by the secret police.
- 73. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 408–9 (Nikolayev interrogation, Dec. 3, 1934).
- 74. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 211–4; Rosliakov, Ubiistvo Kirova, 40; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 150–1 (citing RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 73, l. 114–5; Sveshnikov interview). On rationing anxiety: Rimmel, “Another Kind of Fear”; Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 125–6.
- 75. Deviatov et al., “Gibel’ Kirova,” 60; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 162 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 80, l. 137–9; Gubin testimony, Jan. 7, 1935), 408–9 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 13, l. 252–62, 263–74, 279–81, 289–95pb.; Baskakov and Mikhailchenko, 1960–1); Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 494. Deviatov et al. have Borisov as head of Kirov’s bodyguards from Feb. 1, 1934.
- 76. Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 494. Borisov initially testified that he was twenty steps behind, but later that it was twenty to thirty. RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 113, l. 22 (Dec. 1, 1934); Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 209. Deviatov et al. write that Kirov’s traveling detail did not go inside the building, in violation of regulations. Vinogradov, Genriekh Iagoda, 390–1 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 60, l. 47); Deviatov et al., “Gibel’ Kirova.”
- 77. Leбина, Povsednevnaia zhizn’, 216–8.
- 78. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 408; RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 114, l. 81, 7.
- 79. Bravy, the commandant duty officer, on the basis of having heard the shot, placed two calls to NKVD headquarters. According to A. L. Molochnikov, chief of economic security in the Leningrad NKVD, who was at Liteiny, the first call was merely a summons of Medved; the second, seconds later, mentioned Kirov being shot. He judged that Fomin had also received a call, evidently placed by Mikhailchenko, Bravy’s superior as deputy commander of the Smolny guard. Zhukov, “Sledstvie,” 36; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 159–60 (RGANI, f. 6. Op. 13, d. 71, l. 15–7; Molochnikov, Dec.

9), 164–6 (TsA FSB, a.u.d. N-Sh44, t. 24, l. 99–104; Mikalchenko, Dec.), 762–3n28 (RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 113, l. 72–3; Bravy).

80. Reabilitatsiia, kak eto bylo 490.

81. Bogen, chief of the Leningrad health department, who was on the third floor, arrived early to the scene, and found Kirov without a pulse. Dr. Maria Galperina, of the Smolny clinic, found Kirov already dead when she arrived (nonetheless she applied artificial respiration). Professors began arriving around 5:00 p.m.; Professor of Surgery Yustin Janelidze arrived last at 5:40 p.m., not long after which Kirov was finally pronounced dead. Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 41–2; Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 221–8; Koenker et al., Revelations, 74–5 (Sept. 9, 1965); Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 168–9.

82. Zhukov, “Sledstvie,” 36; Deviatov et al., “Gibel’ Kirova,” 58. Deviatov has the Draule interrogation taking place at Smolny; Zhukov, at NKVD HQ. The location is not specified on the protocol, which lists 16:45 as the start and 19:10 as the conclusion. The otherwise scrupulous Lenoe surmises that the interrogation commenced at 18:45, and a mix-up of 6 and 8 occurred in the record. He bases this unnecessary speculation on the brevity of the protocol, arguing that its length corresponds to a twenty-five-minute conversation. Of course, the NKVD interrogators included in “protocols” what they deemed important. A short text could have resulted from a conversation lasting 2 hours and 25 minutes. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 176 (RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 114, l. 1–2).

83. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 218; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 157. The witness accounts are supported by the post-Stalin memoirs of Rosliakov (first put to paper around 1959–60, and published in 1991), who was the deputy director of Leningrad regional planning (for finances), and was in Chudov’s office and one of the first to the scene. (Rosliakov believed Stalin organized the assassination.) Silverst Platoch, an electrician, was fixing the light fixtures on the third floor; Grigory G. Vasilyev, a stockman, was also there, to carry a typewriter from the secret department to the former Tauride Palace for the speech.

84. “It seems to be the most likely that at the moment Kirov was wounded he was not in a vertical position.” Deviatov et al., “Gibel’ Kirova,” 64; author interview with Devyatov in Moscow (Dec. 23, 2014). Kirov’s body was cremated at the Donskoi Monastery; his clothing was preserved at a museum dedicated to him in Leningrad.

85. RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 117, l. 1–18 (Pelshe commission report, 1966); Petukhov and Khomchik, “Delo o ‘Leningradskom tsentre,’” 15–8; Rosliakov, Ubiistvo Kirova, 43–4; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 763n30 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 13, l. 314–6; Kulesh, 1960).

86. The person closest to Kirov at the time of the shot, Platoch, who upon seeing an approaching Kirov had turned his back to lock the glass door (it had been opened to use the elevator to transport the typewriter), claims when he heard the shot he turned again and saw Kirov on the floor in the corridor alongside another male, whom he punched in the face. Another witness, Mikhail Lioninok, a city party functionary, claimed he came into the hall after hearing the first shot and saw Nikolayev standing, screaming, waving the gun, and then firing the second shot. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 153–4 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 44, l. 22; Platoch testimony, Dec. 1, l. 15–7; Molochnikov testimony, Dec. 9; RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 113, l. 18–20; Platoch testimony, Dec. 2), 154 (TsA FSB, a.u.d. N-Sh44, t. 24, l. 81; Dec. 1), 167 (TsA FSB a.u.d. N-Sh44, t. 12, l. 15–6; Nikolayev testimony, Dec. 3). On the bullets, see RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 117, l. 1–18 (Pelshe commission report, 1966); Petukhov and Khomchik, “Delo o ‘Leningradskom tsentre,’” 15–8; Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 43–4; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 763n30 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 13, l. 314–6; Kulesh, 1960).

87. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 170, 671–2, 764n32. The autopsy, performed on Dec. 2, determined that the bullet from the Nagant had entered Kirov’s cerebellum from behind, near his left ear, passed through the cerebellum and part of the left side of the temporal lobe, then bounced backward off the front of the skull slightly above the left eye; Kirov fell face forward with the left side of his forehead hitting the floor, and the combined bullet ricochet and floor impact cracked his skull, causing massive bleeding and bruising. He died instantly. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 223–5 (Kirov Museum, f. III-293, l. 1–4).

88. Deviatov et al., “Gibel’ Kirova,” 64 (TsA IPD StP, f. 25, op. 5, d. 52, l. 3–4, 119; d. 54, l. 53, 56).

89. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 211–4; Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 40; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 150 (citing RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 73, l. 114–5; testimony of NKVD courier M. F. Fyodorova).

90. Rimmel, “Kirov Murder and Soviet Society,” 59, 62–4. Pavel Sudoplatov, whose wife (Emma Kaganova) was said to have helped compile a list in the central NKVD of Kirov’s mistresses and possible mistresses, wrote that Draule and Kirov were intimate, but that party leaders refused to acknowledge their hero had died because of adultery. Sudoplatov also asserted that Draule was a waitress in the Smolny cafeteria, and had considered filing for divorce. Sudoplatov, Razvedka i kremli, 60–1; Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 50–1.

91. Kirilina, “Vystrely v Smol’nom,” 33, 70–8 (interview with interrogator Leonid Raikhman, recounting his Dec. 2, 1934, interrogation of Draule).

92. Tatyana Sukharnikova, director of the Kirov Museum in St. Petersburg, with the aid of Marx Draule, was able to read through all eighty-five volumes of the Kirov investigation in secret police archives, and reported that the notebook-diary was in Nikolayev’s hand and that there is no mention of an affair between Draule and Kirov. Sukharnikova, “My nagnali takoi”; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 691–2.

93. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 171–2 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 62, l. 62–76; Fomin testimony, March 1, 1956; TsA FSB, a.u.d. N-Sh44, t. 24, l. 332–3; clinic examination, Dec. 1); Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 465; Petukhov and Khomchik, “Delo o ‘Leningradskom tsentre,’” 18 (Isakov, March 15, 1961); Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 251.

94. The interrogator noted that, upon reading the written record, Nikolayev “categorically refused to sign the present protocol of his testimony, and attempted to rip it up.” Zhukov, “Sledstvie,” 37; Petukhov and Khomchik, “Delo o ‘Leningradskom tsentre,’” 18; Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 250, 406–7; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 256–9 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 1, l. 92–9).

95. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 390–1 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 60, l. 47); Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 151 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 71, l. 14). Why Medved’s telegram was sent so late—well after Kirov was dead and Draule had been arrested—remains puzzling.

96. Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 491; Deviatov et al., “Gibel’ Kirova,” 58; Koenker et al., Revelations, 73–4 (Poskryobyshev’s written recollections, 1961). Poskryobyshev recalled Stalin not being in; this could be faulty memory, or a reflection of the fact that Poskryobyshev’s office was in the Kremlin’s Imperial Senate, while that day Stalin was at Old Square.

97. Chuev, Tak govoril Kaganovich, 71–2.

98. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 259 (citing RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 62, l. 62–76; Fomin, 1956).

99. Molotov has Stalin saying “shliapy,” but he could have used saltier language. Chuev, Molotov, 376.

100. Pravda, Dec. 2 and 4, 1934; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 488 (APRF, f. 3, op. 62, d. 95, l. 14–15ob.).

101. Na prieme, 142. This was Suslov’s first recorded visit to Stalin’s office.

102. Pravda, Dec. 4, 1934. A draft terrorist law had been prepared after an earlier assassination (Voikov, the Soviet envoy in Warsaw, in 1927). Now, this one would be approved by telephone poll of politburo members by Dec. 3, but dated the day of the assassination. Pravda, Dec. 4, 1934; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 17, l. 87; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 795n55, 796n60; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 137–8 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 3, l. 113–113ob.); Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 252 (APRF, f. 3, op. 62, d. 95, l. 1); Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 233. Both the decree and the order for the special train were issued after the assassination. Rayfield, Stalin and His Hangmen, 240–5. The Dec. 1 decree scuttled the work of the commission and its draft politburo resolution on “rooting out illegal methods of investigation.” Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 132–3.

103. Local newspapers for the next morning, as well as some late-night extra editions, carried the announcement. Leningradskaia pravda, Dec. 2, 1934; Kirilina, Rikoshet, 30–1; Rimmel, “Kirov Murder and Soviet Society,” 21, 27–8; Boris I. Nicolaevsky Collection, Hoover Institution Archives, series 212, box 249, file 3 (V. I. Rudolf-Iurasov memoir). Ehrenburg’s name along with that of Pasternak and other writers was affixed to a note that appeared in Izvestiya (Dec. 2). Liudi, gody, zhizn’, in Ehrenburg, Sobranie sochinenii, IX: 53.

104. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 173–5 (TsA FSB, a.u.d. N-Sh44, t. 24, l. 1–2), 177–8 (l. 3–4). The consulate was actually at 43; the phone number was correct. Ves’ Leningrad na 1933 g. (Leningrad: Lenoblspolkom i Lensovet, 1934), 19.

105. Taubman, Khrushchev, 69, 71 (quoting Gostinskaya); Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 39, 92.

106. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 232 (A. Tammi).

107. Agranov took possession of the case materials at 11:00 a.m., and put the local army garrison, local NKVD troops, and regular police, as well as Fomin, at Pauker’s disposal. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 263 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 62, l. 62–76). Stalin, according to Fomin, demanded all operational documents concerning anti-Soviet groups and individuals, and, after looking over the list said, “Your recording-keeping is poor.” Petukhov and Khomchik, “Delo o ‘Leningradskom tsentre,’” 19 (Fomin recollections).

108. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 152–3 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 71, l. 14: Borisov’s Dec. 1 interrogation), 159 (l. 15–7: Molochnikov, Dec. 9), 263 (d. 92, l. 169–72: Zavilovich, Dec. 4).

109. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 414–27 (TsA FSB, a.u.d., N-Sh44, t. 24, l. 253–4: Maly, 255–6: Vinogradov, 259–62: Kuzin, twice; 242–44: expert commission report, 291–2: Chopovsky; RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 1, l. 10–53: Khviuzov; d. 2, l. 78–107; Aug. 1956 commission report; RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 271, l. 539–40), 686 (Lyushkov, 1939); Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 494–8; “O kul’te lichnosti,” 138; Kirilina, Neizvestny Kirov, 343–54.

110. The bodyguard responsible for the entire third floor, Nikolai Dureiko, had been even farther behind Kirov than Borisov on Dec. 1, and he was not killed in a vehicle accident. In fact, no other operative was killed.

111. Fomin and others, seeking a foreign link, had again interrogated Nikolayev in the wee hours on Dec. 2. After Stalin’s arrival, the Leningrad NKVD interrogated Nikolayev again, on Dec. 3. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 260–1 (TsA FSB, a.u.d. N-Sh44, t. 12, l. 12–4), 157, 249–50 (TsA FSB, a.u.d. N-Sh44, t. 12, l. 15–6: Nikolaev interrogation, Dec. 3).

112. See Stalin’s response to the incident (Aug. 5, 1934) involving Artyom Nakhayev, who brought unarmed cadets to an infantry barracks in Moscow and told them to start a new revolution: “He is, of course (of course), not alone . . . He is probably a Polish-German (or Japanese) agent.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 411–2, 421, 425, 429, 431–2, 437, 459–60; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 17, l. 87; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 565 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 84, l. 15: Agranov to Stalin, Aug. 26, 1934), 818–9n147; Khromov, Po stranitsam, 154–5. Nakhayev had been expelled from the party and the Red Army for supporting the Trotskyite opposition in 1926–28. Zdanovich, Organy, 326 (citing TsA FSB, delo R-45677, l. 1).

113. Molotov added: “I don’t think any woman was involved.” Chuev, Sto sorok, 310–1; Chuev, Molotov, 376.

114. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 264–7 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 21, l. 86–93: A. I. Katsafa, who retook custody of Nikolayev after the interrogation); Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 46; Artizov, Reabilitatsiya: kak eto bylo, l. 296 (Molotov, Dec. 31, 1955).

115. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 271–3 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 79, l. 1).

116. The NKVD pursued not the German but the Latvian consul connection. Nikolayev proved able to pick the Latvian consul (Georgs Bissenieks) out of eighteen photographs, and to describe the facility’s interior. Bissenieks was expelled from the Soviet Union on Dec. 30, 1934. (The Soviets would capture and execute him in 1940–1.)

117. Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 482. Mikoyan is among the many sources who falsely assert that from the first minutes Stalin fingered the Zinovievites. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 316.

118. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 955, l. 20. A former Socialist Revolutionary who had joined the Bolsheviks in 1919, Kandekali had served as commissar of enlightenment in Georgia (1925–30) and Soviet trade representative in Sweden. He would make twenty visits to Stalin’s office, according to the logbooks. Na prieme, 627.

119. Gnedin, Iz istorii otnoshenii, 34–5; Gnedin, Katastrofa i vtoroe rozhdenie, 237–9. See also Raymond, “Witness and Chronicler.”

120. Rybin, Riadom so Stalinym, 10.

121. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 970–2 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 70–3). See also Mikoian, Tak bylo, 115, 148–50. The filmed Kirov speeches were to the second Leningrad province congress of collective farmers (July 17, 1933) and the Leningrad party plenum (Oct. 10, 1934). The documentary would open Jan. 14, 1935. Bliokh was awarded the Order of Lenin.

122. According to the heavy industry staffer Semyon Ginzburg, for days after Kirov’s death Orjonikidze would not appear at the commissariat. Upon his return, the staff “did not recognize the typically enthusiastic and vivacious Sergo. He had turned gray and aged noticeably. He often seemed lost in thought, with a face heavy from grief.” Ginzburg, “O gibeli Sergo Ordzhonikidze,” 89. Zinoviev and his former supporter Grigory Yevdokimov evidently sent an obituary to Pravda, which refused to publish it. Pravda, Aug. 15, 1936.

123. Stalin also liked “The Varangian” (“Tell the whole word, seagulls, the sad news: they did not surrender to the enemy, they fell for Russian honor”). Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 22–3, 78.

124. Stalin added: “Moreover, in the hands of talented masters, it is the most powerful art. We, the leaders, need to get directly involved in the work of cinema to help this extremely important cause. Those working in film need to take a great deal of care to ensure that films should be varied, that, together with serious works there should also be jolly ones, as in theatre, so that the viewer, depending on his mood and his level, might choose where he’d rather go today.” Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 973–42 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 74–5).

125. Taranova, Golos Stalina, 69–70. Levitan had been designated to break the news of Kirov’s assassination for the Soviet public, but he had been out sick. His voice (“Moscow speaking!”) was now heard across the USSR multiple times a day, in a broadcast known as “The Latest News,” from a studio at the Central Telegraph Station. (Natalya Tolstova was the second-most-heard voice.) Legend also has it that Stalin, in his office working on Jan. 25, 1934, on his speech for the 17th Party Congress, had turned up the dial on the radio and heard Levitan, who after a three-year training period, had finally gotten a chance to be assigned to read the next morning’s edition of Pravda over the radio; Stalin called the head of Soviet radio, Konstantin Maltsev, and directed that his congress report the next day—a five-hour performance—be read over the radio in its entirety by the same announcer. Taranova, Golos Stalina, 55–6. See also Tolstova, Vnimanie, vkluchaiu mikrofon!; Liachenko, “Tak proletelo sorok let . . .,” 47–51; and Goriaeva, “Veiklia kniga dnia,” 77 (GARF, f. R-6903, op. 1 l/s, d. 25, l. 24).

126. Murin, Stalin v ob’iatiakh, 168 (Svanidze diary: Dec. 5, 1934).

127. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 281–3 (TsA FSB, u.a.d., N-Sh44, t. 12, l. 95–6; Nikolayev interrogation, Dec. 4). Agranov reported to Stalin and Yagoda (Dec. 5) over the phone that, according to Draule’s interrogation, “until August she participated in the compilation of her husband’s diary. She confirmed that she read several of his entries that carried a counterrevolutionary character.” He added that Draule’s relatives, in Latvia, were “traders” (i.e., class enemies) and that her brother in Leningrad had been sentenced to a three-year term in a labor colony for embezzlement. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 393 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 60, l. 1–6).

128. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 391–6 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 60, l. 1–6); Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 285–7 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 71, l. 23–6). Nikolayev, in an interrogation protocol (Dec. 13) delivered to Stalin, “confessed” that he belonged to a “group” of former oppositionists (Shatsky and Kotolynov), which adhered to Trotskyite-Zinovievite views and “considered it necessary to change the existing party leadership by all possible means.” This passage was underlined in pencil. The protocol further stated that they had directed Nikolayev to make it appear he acted alone “to hide the participation of the Zinovievite group.” This passage was also highlighted with pencil. Agranov called the threesome “best friends.” He tried to get Nikolayev to confess that his visits to the German and Latvian consulates in summer and fall 1934 constituted attempts by his “group” to contact Trotsky abroad. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 578–9 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 198, l. 2); Zhukov, “Sledstvie.”

129. Khlevniuk, Stalin: zhizn’, 187 (no citation).

130. Na prieme, 144; Mikoian, Tak bylo, 316. Agranov was relieved of his post as acting director of the Leningrad NKVD to focus on the investigation; Zakovsky was appointed in his place (Dec. 10).

131. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 304 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 138, l. 4–9; RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 271, l. 542); Kotolynov had been expelled in 1927 and reinstated in 1928. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 411.

132. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 49–50 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 130, l. 161), 51 (d. 131, l. 34). From Dec. 1934, Polish-language instruction at schools and institutes was curtailed or eliminated. Kuromiya, Freedom and Terror, 208 (citing TsDAHO, f. 1, op. 16, spr. 12, ark. 278, 304, 313).

133. Murin, Stalin v ob’iatiakh, 167; Na prieme, 144.

134. Zhukov, “Sledstvie,” 42.

135. Kotolynov claimed he heard the following from Zinoviev: “It would be better if he [Stalin] did not exist.” Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 416.

136. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 577–8 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 198, l. 8, 9).

137. When they came for Zinoviev at night, he hastily composed a note to Stalin: “In no way, no way, am I guilty before the party, before the Central Committee or before you personally. I swear to you all by everything that is holy to a Bolshevik, I swear to you by Lenin’s memory. I cannot even imagine who could have raised suspicion against me. I beg you to believe this, my word of honor. I am shaken to the depth of my soul.” Stalin did not answer. He had Zinoviev, along with Kamenev, expelled from the party again on Dec. 20. The first draft of the indictment (Jan. 13) would note that Zinoviev and Kamenev pleaded innocent; the indictment soon changed. "O dele tak nazyvaomom 'Moskovskom tsentre'."

138. "O dele tak nazyvaomom 'Moskovskom tsentre,'" 80; Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie portsesy, 154.

139. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 955, l. 42 (Dec. 19, 1934). "We lived and live under an unflagging regime of terror and force," the Nobel Laureate Ivan Pavlov wrote to the Council of People's Commissars (Dec. 21, 1934). "I more and more see the parallel between our life and the life of ancient Asiatic despotisms . . . Remember that humans, descended from animals, can fall easily, but elevating them is difficult . . . Take pity on the motherland and on us." Sovetskaia kul'tura, Jan. 14, 1989.

140. Na prieme, 144. Akulov, frozen out by the clans at the OGPU, had been removed as first deputy there in Oct. 1932; he had been named USSR procurator general with the position's creation on June 20, 1933. Golunskii, Istoriia zakonodatel'stva SSSR, 510–1; Kolpakidi and Seriaikov, Shchit i mech, 343. In Feb. 1936, Akulov would fall off a horse, cracking his skull. "Bolezn' tov. Akulova," Pravda, Feb. 28, 1936: 6. Akulov would be arrested (July 1937) and executed.

141. Svetlana developed a high temperature (from scarlet fever). Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 144, 147.

142. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 169–71 (Maria Svanidze diary: Dec. 23 and 28, 1934). Svanidze effectively confessed to her diary that she was in love with Stalin, and vied with many women for the now twice-widowed Stalin's attention: Sashiko and Mariko Svanidze, the sisters of Stalin's deceased first wife; Anna Alliluyeva; Yevgeniya "Zhenya" Alliluyeva (Stalin's sister-in-law, married to Pavel Alliluyev, Nadya's elder brother)—all of whom hoped to become indispensable to "poor Iosif," as Maria described him. Svanidze imagined that Stalin was having an affair with Zhenya (b. 1898), since he was attentive to her and the two were often missing at the same time. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 157–8.

143. On Dec. 25 at 9:15, Stalin convened a meeting in his office to discuss and edit the indictment; the sentence of execution for all fourteen defendants was printed before the trial commenced. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 344–52 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 34, l. 36; TsA FSB, a.u.d. N-Sh44, t. 1, l. 1–16).

144. Vinogradov, Genrikh lagoda, 396–404 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 60, l. 48–56, 33); Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 358–77. Others have Nikolayev supposedly falling to the ground and shouting, "You cannot shoot me. Comrade Stalin promised . . ." Kirilina, Rikoshet, 67.

145. Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 303 (Matveyev).

146. Sedov et al., "Spravka"; Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 302–3; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 370–1 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 24, l. 51–68).

147. Maslov and Chistiakov, "Stalinskie repressii i sovetskaia iutsitsiia," 105.

148. Lugovskaia, Diary of a Soviet Schoolgirl, 140.

149. Stalin had the politburo in May 1934 decree the Stalin Institute, in Tiflis, subordinated as an affiliate to the central Marx-Engels-Lenin Institute. Still, whether he was fully aware of the enormous pile of documents concerning his youth that was being accumulated remains unclear. Kun, Stalin, 3–4.

150. Hoover Archives, Lakoba papers, 1–57.

151. Lakoba, Stalin i Khashim, 5, 32–5.

152. Hoover Archives, Lakoba papers, 2–22. Sebastian Kirakozov made a painting of Stalin and Hashim. Kravchenko, Stalin v izobrazitel'nom iskusstve, opposite 26.

153. See also the intrigue surrounding Baron Bibineishvili's biographical celebration of Kamo (1934), the revolutionary bandit: Sukharev, "Litsedeistvo," 107, citing PA IIP pri TsK KP Gruzii, f. 8, op. 1, d. 22, l. 5; f. 14, op. 9, d. 18, l. 239. Bibineishvili, Kamo.

154. Enukidze, Nashi podpol'nye tipografii Kavkaza.

155. Shaumian, "Stoikii bol'shevik."

156. Yenukidze wrote a response (Jan. 8, 1935) claiming the mistakes were not his; Stalin marked up and had Yenukidze's response circulated. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 351–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 206, l. 111), 355–61 (d. 728, l. 108–24); Enukidze, Bol'shevistskie nelegal'nye tipografii.

157. Stalin had ordered a film crew out of the 16th party conference in April 1929 for creating a ruckus ("turning the conference into a bazaar"). Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 100 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 132, l. 77).

158. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 227 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 379, l. 163–4), 229–30 (d. 661, l. 97–9; Jan. 17, 1934). “Newsreels are an interesting type of art, they have notably done well here, they are pleasant and edifying to watch,” Stalin remarked after watching the May Day 1934 newsreel. Typically, he wanted them shortened and sharpened. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 919–23 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 27–30).

159. Bulgakova, Eisenstein, 137 (citing Eisenstein archive, 1923–2–1116); Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 139 (PARF, f. 3, op. 35, d. 87, l. 13). Geduld and Gottesman, Sergei Eisenstein and Upton Sinclair. On Dec. 1, 1931, Eisenstein’s colleagues in Moscow pronounced the AWOL director a “deserter.” Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 150 (APRF, f. 3, op. 35, d. 87, l. 27; Yukov, Dec. 1, 191), 151 (l. 32; Shumyatsky, Dec. 1). On May 20, 1932, eleven days after Eisenstein and his assistant Grigory Alexandrov had finally arrived back from their three-year sojourn, they asked for an audience with Stalin, who wrote on the request, “I cannot receive them, no time.”

160. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 184 (APRF, f. 3, op. 35, d. 87, l. 81; June 8, 1932). See also Pyřev, Izbrannye proizvedeniia, I: 64; Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 176–7 (APRF, f. 3, op. 35, d. 87, l. 77–8), 180 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 403, l. 62); and Pravda, Jan. 23, 1973. Thunder over Mexico, attributed to Eisenstein, was screened in Los Angeles on May 10, 1933. In July 1933, he entered a hospital in Kislovodsk with depression. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 195–200 (RGASPI, f. 142, op. 1, d. 586, l. 11–22).

161. Shumyatsky had only been able to show parts of the film at the first screening; a week later he showed it in its entirety. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 940–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 46–60; July 14, 1934), 945–7 (l. 51–2), 947n3 (d. 27, l. 88). One of the film’s numbers, “Such a lot of nice girls!” would be immortalized as the tango “Heart” by Pyotr Leshchenko. Stalin tended to like thoughtful songs, even those a bit sad (such as “Suliko”) but he was captivated by the dance numbers. Stalin’s thirst for relaxation was immense. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 947–9 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 53–4).

162. Aleksandrov, Epokha i kino, 159; Kushnirov, Svetlyi put’, 96–7; Shumiatskii, Kinematografiia millionov, 236. On the resistance of some musicians to the acting tricks under Utyosov, and the changeover in his band’s personnel, see Batashev, Sovetskii dzhaz, 40–3; and Chernov and Bialik, O legkoi muzyke, 120. Igor Savchenko, the Ukrainian filmmaker, had actually made the first Soviet musical comedy, The Accordion (June 1934), about a youth who stops playing the supposedly frivolous instrument after he becomes a village Communist Youth league secretary. Aleksandrov, Epokha i kino, 196; Zel’dovich, Liubov’ Orlova, 17. Stites, Russian Popular Culture, 90–2.

163. “A film and its success are directly linked to the degree of entertainment in the plot,” Shumyatsky had noted in Dec. 1933. But that year, of the eight Soviet films released, a mere three were comedies. Shumiatskii, “Tvorcheskie zadachi templana”; Taylor, “Ideology as Mass Entertainment,” 193.

164. At the orgburo cinema commission, Jolly Fellows came in for severe criticism as “counterrevolutionary” and “muck, hooliganism, false throughout.” Sidorov, “‘Veselye rebata’—komediia kontrevoliutsionnaia,” 73–4; (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 1, d. 293, l. 18–20; July 28, 1934), 75 (l. 21; July 29). Iurii Saakov, “Secha v kommunal’noi kvartire,” Iskusstvo kino, 1995, no. 2: 134–44; Salys, Films of Grigorii Aleksandrov, 34. Stalin had the orgburo cinema commission dissolved. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 246–7, 248, 252 (f. 17, op. 163, d. 1048, l. 156; Dec. 17, 1934), 252n3 (op. 3, d. 955, l. 57). Shumyatsky showed Stalin a screed in Literaturnaia gazeta accusing Jolly Fellows of being “great talent wasted.” Stalin erupted and tasked Zhdanov with setting things right. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 969–70 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 69; Nov. 20, 1934); Literaturnaia gazeta, Nov. 18, 1934. On Dec. 11, 1934, when Stalin asked Shumyatsky how things were going he got an earful; the dictator phoned Molotov on the verushka and inquired about the reserve budget fund and how much extra could be given for cinema. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 976–8 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 77–80).

165. Douglas, Inventing American Broadcasting.

166. In Britain, the number of radios would jump from 3 million in 1930 to 9 million by the end of the decade—three of four British households—while the number of listeners would increase from an estimated 12 million in the 1920s to 34 million by 1939. By the second half of the 1930s, Germany would have more than 9 million radio receivers. Goebbels had noted (Aug. 1933), “What the press was to the 19th century, radio will be to the 20th.” Bowden and Offen, “Revolution that Never Was,” 244–74; Williams, Communications; Bergmeier and Lorz, Hitler’s Airwave, 6, 9.

167. The USSR would have 7 million by decade's close, including 1.6 million in rural areas. It had planned for far more, but Soviet industry could not manufacture sufficient quantities of vacuum tubes. Inkeles, Public Opinion in Soviet Russia, 243–4, 274–5; Gurevich and Ruzhnikov, Sovetskoe radioveshchanie, chap. 5.

168. Lovell, Russia in the Microphone Age, 101. Small local stations had proliferated, but they were soon obliged to rebroadcast set amounts of Moscow material. Initially, live material predominated, although by 1933 texts for live broadcasts had to be submitted in advance, and programs were monitored for compliance. Gorjaeva, Radio Rossii, 157; Gorjaeva, "Veilkaia kniga dnia," 91–2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 558, l. 9–10: July 9, 1935), 93 (GARF, f. A-2306, op. 60, d. 79, 84: Dec. 27, 1935); Gorjaeva, "Zhurnalistskaia tsenzura."

169. Taylor, "Ideology as Mass Entertainment," 198.

170. Letters to the party propaganda department asked that radio lectures be read more slowly, to allow for notetaking. Lovell, Russia in the Microphone Age, 67 (citing Mikhail Angarskii and Voicheslav Knushev, "Slovo slushatelei o peredachakh: obzor pisem radioslushatelei," Govorit SSSR, 1933, no. 12–13: 33–4; GANO, f. 3630, op. 5, d. 54, l. 15–6; GARF, f. 6903, op. 1, d. 49, l. 2, 4, 9). Nazi-era radio featured popular music and comedy as well as anti-Semitic speeches. "Disney, Dietrich and Benny Goodman," Anson Rabinbach observed, "shared radio time with Goebbels, Göring and the Führer." Rabinbach, "Imperative to Participate," 7.

171. Nikolaevich, "Poslednii seans," at 22.

172. Ivanov, Ocherki istorii rossiisko (sovetskoe)-pol'skikh otnoshenii, 195; Dolinskii, Sovetskaia kinokomediia tridsatykh godov, I: 11.

173. Zil'ver, Za bol'shoe, 22–49, 58–80 (quote at 72).

174. Sovetskoe Kino, 1935, no. 1: 9; Taylor and Christie, Film Factory, 348–55 (Leonid Trauberg). See also Shumiatskii, Kinematografiia millionov, 7.

175. Maksimenkov, Kremlevskii kinoteater, 257–61 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 958, l. 15, 45–7; op. 163, d. 1051, l. 90–4); Pravda, Jan. 12, 1935; Sovetskoe kino, 1935, no. 1: 11–2; Fomin and Deriabin, Letopis' Rossiiskogo kino, II: 315–6. See also Miller, Soviet Cinema, 22–3.

176. Eisenstein's closing remarks were published (Kino, Jan. 17, 1935: 4), and Shumyatsky sent a withering complaint about them. Fomin and Deriabin, Letopis' rossiiskogo kino, II: 317 (RGALI, f. 2456, op. 4, d. 23, l. 17–8). When the film industry completed an apartment house in 1934 in central Moscow (between Malaya Nikitskaya and Povarskaya streets, behind the House of Cinema), Eisenstein put in for two apartments (for himself and his mother); he got nothing. Bulgakowa, Eisenstein, 159–60.

177. Leyda, Kino, 319–20. Leyda attended the evening at the Bolshoi.

178. Shumiatskii, Kinematografiia millionov, 249, 8.

179. Evans, Third Reich in Power, 623–7; Domarus, Hitler: Reden, II: 643–8 (at 644); Kershaw, Hitler: 1889–1936, 546–8. "The French have definitely missed the opportunity for a preventive war," Hitler remarked internally once the plebiscite arrangements had been finalized. DGFP, series C, III: 704–6 (Dec. 4, 1934).

180. Bud, "Fil'm o Kirove."

181. Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 162, 166

182. Pravda, Jan. 16, 1935. See also Haslam, "Political Opposition," 409–10.

183. A third trial, with another 77 defendants, including Zinoviev's wife, Zlata Radić, and various relatives of Nikolayev, would result in sentences of two to five years.

184. Stalin authored the letter. The day before he sent the text to other politburo members. "O tak nazyvaemom 'Antisovetskom ob'edinennom tsentre Trotskistko-Zinov'evskom tsentre,'" 95–100; Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 191–5; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 147–50; Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 381 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 13, l. 18).

185. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 446–7 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 201, l. 106–8, 114), 447–50 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 92, l. 173–7: draft), 450 (169–72: draft). A draft is also in Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 592–3 (TsAFSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 7, l. 1–2).

186. Brontman, Dnevnik. See also Kommunisticheskaia revoliutsiia, 1935, no. 1: 23–4.

187. Stalin offered both praise and complaints about parts that were missing despite his instructions. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 989–90 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 111); Pravda, Jan. 21 and 22, 1935. I. P. Kopalina and I. F. Setkina made the Lenin documentary.

188. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 436–52 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 79, l. 99–104; d. 82, l. 15–132).

189. See also Gronskey to Stalin in 1933 on Kuibyshev's drinking: RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 725, l. 49–58.

190. Recently, on his trip to Central Asia to pressure the cotton harvest, he had undergone an emergency operation, but then returned to Moscow to work, refusing to lie in hospital. One evening, after countless meetings, he told his staff that before giving a speech that night he was going across the courtyard to his nearby apartment (on the third floor) to lie down. His aides and then the apartment staff woman wanted to call a doctor. He refused. By the time a doctor arrived, he was dead. Kabytov, "Valerian Kuibyshev"; Sochineniia, XI: 220.

191. Lota, "Alta" protiv "Barbarossy," 143–191, 248–55; Lota, Sekretnyi front, 75–94; Lurie and Kochik, GRU, 504, 511–2, 531, 532.

192. Sorge had been born in the Baku oil fields (1895)—his father was an oil technician—and grew up in Germany, where he fought in the Great War, then became a Communist in 1919, before moving to Moscow. In late 1929, military intelligence poached him from Comintern intelligence and sent him to China; he arrived in Tokyo in 1933. He joined the Nazi party, to aid his spy work, and criticized Nazi officials and actions, which, however, enhanced his credibility. He chased women and drank. Colonel Ott, the German military attaché in Tokyo, invited Sorge to travel with him to Manchuria in Oct. 1934; Sorge wrote the trip's report. Soon, Sorge bedded Ott's wife, Helma. When Ott learned of the affair, he surmised it would not endure and did nothing, keeping the valuable Sorge, whom he called "the Irresistible" and "the man who knew everything." Whymant, Stalin's Spy, 145–94 (at 153, 184, no citation).

193. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 20, 26–39, 41; Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 448n50, 449n65; Tsarev and West, KGB v Anglii, 44–7; Poretsky, Our Own People, 72–85; Peake, Private Life of Kim Philby, 220–1; Gazur, Secret Assignment, 15. See also Borovik, Philby Files; and Koch, Double Lives.

194. Golubev, "Nash tovarisch"; Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 445n3. Maclean would deliver his first purloined secret file in Jan. 1936 (about secret negotiations between Britain and Nazi Germany over an airforce agreement). The Soviets soon were able to discern that the British had an agent in the foreign affairs commissariat and in Willi Münzenberg's circle. Maclean would also discover, through correspondence, the home address of Vernon Kell, the head of the secret MI5, allowing the Soviets to establish surveillance on the residence. See Primakov, Ocherki, III: 40–9. An alleged Polish agent who worked in Molotov's secretariat, who passed on evaluations of Soviet brass, was never discovered. Dzanovich, Organy, 723n54, citing TsA FSB, f. 1, op. 9, d. 19, l. 339–400.

195. Shearer, Policing Stalin's Socialism, 136–7. The special departments were particularly busy hauling in soldiers for counterrevolutionary utterances in relation to the Kirov murder. Suvenirov, Tragediia, 27; Whitewood, Red Army and the Great Terror, 170 (citing RGVA, f. 37837, op. 10, d. 26, l. 289, 194–6). In March 1935, the NKVD instructed an agent in Germany to investigate the links between Tukhachevsky and the Wehrmacht high command. "M. N. Tukachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor'," 11.

196. Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 735: Dec. 13, 1934); Gamarnik had managed, during the push for socialist legality, to obtain a ruling whereby the OGPU could summon army personnel for interrogation only with the agreement of the unit's commissar. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 524 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 16, l. 66: May 26, 1934).

197. Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-pol'skikh otnoshenii, VI: 249–250 (AAN, d. AMSZ, Poselstwo RP, Berlin); Roos, Polen und Europa, 208–12; Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 193 (citing Bundesarchiv, Papers of General Beck, H 08–28/1, f. 54: Schindler to Blomberg, Feb. 22, 1935); Mikhutina, Sovetsko-pol'skie otnosheniia, 239–41, citing Diariusz i teki Jana Szembeka, 1935–1945, 2 vols. (London: Polish Research Centre/Orbis, 1964–6), I: 217–25, 230; Wojciechowski, Stosunki polsko-niemieckie, 243–4; and Beck, Final Report, 27–31. See also Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 204.

198. "General Goering to Visit Poland," "General Goering's Secret Visit to Warsaw," and "Conscription in Germany," Manchester Guardian, Jan. 25, 28, and 29, 1935, respectively; "General Goering in Warsaw," The Times, Jan.

28, 1935; Izvestiia, Feb. 14, 1935. See also Harris, "Encircled by Enemies," 539 (citing AVP RF f. 05, op. 15, pap. 109, d. 67, l. 5: Göring with Bek).

199. Bobylev et al., Sovetskie Vooruzhennye Sily, 143 (no citation). In 1933, the actual figure for military expenditures had been 4.299 billion, versus the published 1.421 billion rubles (hence Tukhachevsky's claims of fourfold increase in one year). Harrison and Davies, "Soviet Military-Economic Effort," 369–70.

200. Barmine, One Who Survived, 221 (confirmed in the Pravda account).

201. Erickson, Soviet High Command, 381; Berson, Kreml na bialo, 49. On Feb. 23, 1935, Red Star published a photomontage of five military portraits: Tukhachevsky occupied third position, after Voroshilov and Gamarnik, ahead of Yakir and Uborevičius.

202. Iurii Domobrovskii, in Literaturnaia gazeta, Aug. 22, 1990: 6; Larina, Nezabyvaemoe, 270.

203. Zhavaronkov, "I snitsia noch'iu den'," 52; Pavliukov, Ezhov, 335–6 (citing Aleksander Fadeev, "Nikolai Ivanovich Ezhov").

204. Encountering Yezhov in spring 1930 at a government resort in Sukhum on the Black Sea coast, Nadezhda Mandelstam, wife of the poet Osip, found him "a modest and rather agreeable person." Mandelstam, Hope against Hope, 321–5.

205. Razgon, Plen v svoem otechestve, 50–1.

206. On Yezhov's remarkable workload, see Pavliukov, Ezhov, 96 (citing RGASPI, f. 17m, op. 114, d. 298, l. 1–5; d. 300, l. 8–11).

207. "Blizhaishee okruzhenie diktatora," Sotsialisticheski vestnik, 1933, no. 23: 8–9. Yezhov suspected the essay's source was Pyatakov, first deputy commissar of heavy industry, who had traveled to Berlin in late 1932. Pyatakov was Yezhov's old drinking buddy. (Once, after Pyatakov, inebriated, had pricked him with a pin, Yezhov had punched in the face.) Pavliukov, Ezhov, 99–100; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 29–30.

208. They would adopt a daughter (Natasha) from a children's home. Yevgeniya ran a literary salon, while pursuing extramarital affairs. Yezhov, for his part, bedded subordinates' wives, household and cleaning personnel, prostitutes, and various male lovers; he drank and became pugnacious, beating her.

209. Chubar, whom Stalin met during the October days of 1917, had a reputation as an expert, and Stalin promoted him to deputy chairman of the Council of People's Commissars and finance commissar and invited him to inner-circle meals. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 228–9; Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh sem'i, 167.

210. This resolution appears to have been dictated by Stalin to Poskryobyshev; other members of the politburo signed it in the same red pencil on Stalin's desk (Kalinin's was evidently a telephone approval). The logbook for Stalin's office records no meeting that day. Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 139 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1056, l. 35–6); Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 142 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 960, l. 7; op. 2, d. 538, l. 3), 143 (op. 3, d. 961, l. 16); Na prieme, 152.

211. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 141.

212. Mironenko, Moskovskii kreml', 187, 210, 241.

213. On Sept. 23, 1934, Barbusse had requested an audience with Stalin, which was granted. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 341–2 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 699, l. 81). On the Sept. 16, 1927, audience, see RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 699, l. 2–10; "'U nas malo rassstrelivaiut': beseda I. V. Stalina s A. Babiusom" (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 699, l. 2–10); and Barbusse, Voici ce qu'on a fait de la Géorgie (Paris: E. Flammarion, 1929). On the Oct. 5, 1932, meeting: Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 251–8 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 699, l. 35–42, 43–51), 259 (l. 53–4).

214. Stetsky, who was assigned to edit Barbusse, mostly raised issues about the portrayal of Trotsky and the Stalin-Trotsky clash. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 341–6 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 699, l. 124–5; Sept. 29, 1934).

215. Barbusse described the Amusement Palace apartment, where Stalin no longer lived by the time the book came out. Barbusse, Stalin, vii–viii, 7, 277, 278. Louis Fischer would write that in Moscow, Barbusse had talked mostly about Jesus Christ. Margarete Buber-Neumann, who had encountered Barbusse in Moscow in 1932, would write that "I was very surprised my idol Barbusse displayed such traits of the bourgeois and the prima donna" by complaining about the hotel. Fischer, Men and Politics, 193; Buber-Neumann, Von Potsdam nach Moskau, 326.

- 216. Davies et al., Years of Progress, 153–6; Pravda, Jan. 30 and Feb. 16, 1935; Vtoroi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd kolkhoznikov-udarnikov, 186–7 (Yezhov), 247–97; Vyltsan, Zavershchaiushchii etap, 25–40.
- 217. Pravda, Feb. 10, 1935; Vtoroi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd kolkhoznikov-udarnikov, 144. See also Kolkhoznitsa, 1935, no. 11–12: 14–5; “Priem kolkhoznits-udarnits sveklovichnykh polei rukovoditeliami partii i pravitel'stva,” Sotsialisticheskaiia rekonstruktsiia sel'skogo khoziaistva, no. 11 (1935): 15–8; Kataev, “Mariia Demchenko,” 295–300 (dated 1938).
- 218. Buckley, Mobilizing Soviet Peasants, 235–6, citing Sergei K. Korotkov et al., My predsedatel'stvuem na Vsesoiuznom s'ezde (Moscow: Sel'khozgiz, 1935), 12–3, 39. See also Kazakhstanskaia pravda, Feb. 18, 1935. All congress delegates received a copy of the bound published record. Stoletov, “Zamechatel'nye knigi.”
- 219. Pravda, Feb. 15, 1935. A model statute had been drafted in late 1929 and published in revised form on March 2, 1930, but it had contained no specifics on organization, forms of payment, and so on. Ivinskii, Kollektivizatsiia i raskulachivanie, 78–80. As one scholar has demonstrated, enduring regulations governing the collective farm system were not in place until 1933, when the concessions of 1932 were acknowledged as permanent. Merl, Bauern unter Stalin.
- 220. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, IV: 390–402 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 138, l. 68–91). Yakov Yakovlev, head of the CC agriculture department, gave the report on the new model statute the first day; Mikhail Chernov, the new USSR land commissar and chairman of the commission, reported on Feb. 17 with the Stalin-corrected version. II vsesoiuznyi s'ezd kolkhoznikov-udarnikov, 225–32. The 1935 statute defined “land as state property owned by the whole people, and assigned to artels for permanent use.” Land was “not subject to either purchase-sale or leasing.” Nomad households in Kazakhstan were allowed 8–10 cows and their calves, 100–150 sheep/goats, 10 horses, and 5–8 camels. Izvestiia, Feb. 18, 1935; Sobranie zakonov, 1935, art. 82; “Soviet Legislation (XIII): Selection of Decrees and Documents,” Slavonic and East European Review 14, no. 40 (1935): 188–99.
- 221. Women made up 30.5 percent of the delegates (more than double the number at the first congress in 1933). Pravda, Feb. 16, 1935. According to the Soviet press, more than 7,000 women served as collective farm chairmen (up from just 1,290 in 1931), 8.1 percent of the total. Women made up 49.2 percent of managers of livestock units. Sotsialisticheskoe zemledelie, March 7, 1935; II vsesoiuznyi s'ezd kolkhoznikov-udarnikov, 247–97.
- 222. Yakovlev, in a report to party activists, summarized Stalin's remarks: Pravda, March 13, 1935; Sotsialisticheskoe zemledelie, March 13, 1935; Sotsialisticheskaiia rekonstruktsiia sel'skogo khoziaistva, 1935, no. 2–3: 8–30. See also Fitzpatrick, Stalin's Peasants, 122 (quoting Krestianskaia pravda, Feb. 27, 1935: 2).
- 223. Whitman, “Kolkhoz Market,” 393. Rural laborers' market sales fed regime coffers in the form of taxes, but the household plots and the direct marketing absorbed time from collective farm duties, and the opportunities for marketing further reinforced rural laborers' deep commitment to the plots.
- 224. Maslov, Kolkhoznaia Rossiia, 198, 227–8.
- 225. Remuneration was calculated by a system known as the “labor day” (time plus skill, so that the chairman's work time was worth more than the field hand's). But only about 10 percent of the collective farmers' cash income came from collective farm work; more than half came from sales at market or to state contractors. Seasonal labor at factories and construction sites provided significant cash income as well. Vyltsan, Zavershchaiushchii etap, 101 (citing GRAE, f. 4372, op. 36, d. 356, l. 18), 203–4; Kolkhozy vo vtoroi, 37; 20 let sovetskoi vlasti, 48.
- 226. Pravda, March 13, 1935 (Yakovlev). New members were to be admitted even if they had no animals or implements to contribute, a bitter pill for those who had had to yield up their property. Fitzpatrick, Stalin's Peasants, 124–7, citing Krestianskaia pravda, Feb. 28, 1935; II vsesoiuznyi s'ezd kolkhoznikov-udarnikov, 17–8, 85.
- 227. Fitzpatrick, Stalin's Peasants, 139–42. Collective farmers “could shout, fume, curse,” wrote the eyewitness Hindus, “but they could not dodge the challenge the kolkhoz had thrust upon them.” Hindus, Red Bread, 210.
- 228. Peterson (b. 1897), an ethnic Latvian who had commanded Trotsky's civil war train in 1919, since 1920 served as a punctilious Kremlin commandant, earning high praise and two Orders of the Red Banner and the Order of Lenin. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKa, 158 (citing AVKVS RF, op. 64, d. 776, l. 1–4); Zhukov, Inoi Stalin, 141–3.
- 229. “We were sitting together, Avdeyeva, Zhalybina-Bykova, and I on the first floor of the government building in a small room drinking tea,” one woman, E. S. Mishakova, testified. “Avdeyeva started to talk about how we lived badly, how our bosses drank, ate well, and we eat poorly. And I said to her that I live better now than before.” Then Avdeyeva supposedly started to say that Stalin was not a Russian, divorced his first wife [sic], and the second had shot herself. “I said that this is not true, we do not know. On this note the conversation ended and we returned to work.” For her part, A. E. Avdeyeva, a twenty-two-year-old cleaning lady in the central executive committee school, claimed “all that was said by [M. S.] Zhalybina.” Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 599–600 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 231, l. 1, 14).

230. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 84–5 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 8, l. 3). This was not Stalin’s first such appearance at a secret police meeting, sessions that were followed by generous tables of food and drink. Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 22, 27.

231. “O tak-nazyvaemom dele ‘Moskovskogo tsentra,’” 70; Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 155; Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 465.

232. Vasily Doroshin, a forty-year-old aide to the Kremlin commandant, was said to have testified that “the commandant of the Grand Kremlin Palace Lukyanov Ivan Petrovich told me on the second day after the death of N. A. Alliluyeva that the Kremlin commandant Peterson had gathered a group of comrades and announced that Alliluyeva had died an unnatural death.” Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 602–3 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 231, l. 22–6).

233. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 606–10 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 230, l. 67–75; E. K. Mukhanova testimony, Feb. 10). Another librarian, P. I. Gordeyeva, daughter of workers and herself a Communist Youth League member, testified (March 1) that after the official news about Kirov’s death, Kremlin library employees discussed how “the murder of Kirov was not political, but a result of personal revenge” (618–9; d. 232, l. 31–4).

234. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 610–2 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 231, l. 54–9; Feb. 10, 1935). See also Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 253.

235. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 604–6 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 231, l. 32–6; Feb. 7), 230 (d. 230, l. 67–75; Feb. 10).

236. Gosudarstvennaia okbrana Rossii, 49 (no citation).

237. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 617 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 231, l. 88).

238. “O tak nazyvaemom ‘Kremlevskom dele,’” 90–1.

239. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 961, l. 58 (March 31, 1935). See also Hoover Institution Archives, Nicoalevsky Collection, box 233, folder 9 (“Iz zapisonoi knizhki Boris Ivanovicha Nikolaevskogo [rasskazy A. F. Almazova]”, 1–2).

240. Ivanov, “Operatsiia ‘Byvschie liudi,’” 118–9, 121, 129; Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 465–6.

241. Of the 11,095 he listed, 5,044 were said to be former “big” merchants and rentiers, 2,360 aristocrats, and nearly 1,000 family members of executed terrorists, spies, and saboteurs. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 613–6 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 174, l. 42–9; Feb. 16, 1935), 617 (l. 41).

242. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 613–6 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 174, l. 42–49; Zakovsky to Yagoda, Feb. 16, 1935), 617 (l. 41; Yagoda to Stalin, Feb. 26, 1935).

243. Various officials in Karelia, too, were arrested as “spies,” and at least 5,000 “kulak” families within a fifteen-mile radius of the Finnish border were evicted, and their livestock and possessions confiscated. Dmitriev, Pominal’nye spiski Karelii, 17. In Oct. 1935, Zakovsky opened an NKVD training school in Leningrad desperately seeking more personnel. Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol’shaia chistka, 51.

244. Dubinskaia-Dzhaliilova and Chernev, “Zhmu vashu ruku, dorogoi tovarishch,” 188–9. Turbins had been approved for staging in Leningrad in 1933. In 1936, it would be permitted in Kiev. Milne, Mikhail Bulgakov, 168.

245. On Stalin’s fifteen visits, see V. Lakshin, preface to Bulgakov, Izbrannaia proza, 30. See also Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 102–3; Shapoval, “Oni chuvstvuiut sebja, kak gosti . . .,” 107–8, 122; Smeliansky, Is Comrade Bulgakov Dead? 170–3; Shentalinskii, Raby svobody, 120. Between 1926 and 1941, the Moscow Art Theater would stage Turbins 987 times. Bulgakov, Dramy i komedii, 583.

246. Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 15.

247. Bulgakova, Eisenstein, 168–72. Sixty-five films were submitted and twenty-six accepted. Kino, Feb. 2 and Feb. 21, 1935; Pravda, Feb. 22, 1935; 4. On Feb. 22, the state medals for cinema that had been announced in Jan. were presented by Kalinin in the Kremlin, with Stalin in attendance.

248. Pravda, Nov. 29, 1935.

249. Iasenskii, “O dvukh neudachnykh popytkakh.”

250. Mekhlis summoned the editors to Old Square (March 11), reading them the riot act; the next day's editorial in Pravda was unsigned. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 996–7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 829, l. 9–10; March 11, 1935); Fomin and Deriabin, Letopis' Rossiiskogo kino, II: 325; Pravda, March 12, 1935.

251. Izvestiia, March 3, 1935; Kino, March 5, 1935; "K itogam pervogo sovetskogo kinofestivalia," Sovetskoe kino, no. 3 (1935): 3–5. By now, Chapayev was being shown in New York on Broadway. "Sovetskie fil'my v N'iu-lorke," Pravda, March 2, 1935.

252. The Soviets produced almost no expressly antifascist movies, beyond Pyrev's Assembly Line of Death (Nov. 7, 1933), set in an unspecified European country, which portrayed fascism as a movement aiming to restore capitalism in the Soviet Union.

253. Friedberg, Literary Translation in Russia, 115. See also Baer, "Literary Translation." "The Style of Soviet Culture," a Pravda article by a literary critic, put forth Balzac, Goethe, Shakespeare, and Lev Tolstoy for emulation. Pravda, April 29, 1935 (Dinamov, pen name of Sergei Ogladkov). ("Mayakovsky shot himself while I translate," Pasternak supposedly remarked of his means of livelihood.)

254. "Bol'she' shekspirovat'" Literaturnaia gazeta, April 23, 1933. Translations included Rabelais's Gargantua and Pantagruel (1929), Virgil's Aeneid (1933), Homer's Iliad (1935), and Homer's Odyssey (1935).

255. Litovskii, "Korol' Lir"; Harshav, Moscow Yiddish Theater, 90; Clark, Moscow, 189 (citing GARF, f. 5283, op. 8, d. 242). See also Fowler, "Yiddish Theater in Soviet Ukraine."

256. Mikhoeis, "Moia rabota nad 'Korolem Lirom,'" 94–123. A Shakespeare conference (Nov. 25–27, 1935) sparked controversy about how best to translate and interpret the playwright. Pravda, Nov. 29, 1935; O. Litovskii, "Zhivoi Shekspir," 7–8; Clark, Moscow, 184–5.

257. Lang, Modern History of Soviet Georgia, 253.

258. Lakoba, Or VI k VII 'ezdu sovetov ASSR Abkhazia; Lakoba, "Sel'skoe khoziaistvo Abkhazii—baza Sovetskoi pishchevoi promyshlennosti," Hoover Archives, Lakoba papers, 2–32. See also Kol'tsov and Lezhava, Sovetskie subtropiki.

259. Lakoba, "Ia Koba, a ty Lakoba," 58 (March 15, 1935).

260. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 610–2 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 231, l. 54–9; Feb. 10).

261. It seems that in 1932, Kamenev had stopped by Yenukidze's Kremlin office after being sentenced to exile in Minusinsk, asking that he be allowed to keep his Moscow apartment and that Yenukidze later passed on to Stalin a letter Kamenev intended to write from exile asking to be allowed to return to Moscow. Vinogradov, Genrikh lagoda, 508–17 (TsA FSB, f. 13614, tom 2, l. 308–10, 314–22; May 30, 1937).

262. "Irina Gogua: semeinye istorii," Ogonek, April 1997: <http://kommersant.ru/doc/2284891>; Chervyakova, "Pesochnye chasy." Maria Svanidze took a more sinister view, writing in her diary about Yenukidze's deceit, abuse of the perquisites of his office, and involvement with girls as young as nine to eleven, corrupting them morally if not physically." Murin, Stalin v ob'iatikh, 182 (Svanidze diary: June 28, 1935).

263. Zaria vostoka, March 5, 1935. Peterson was dismissed in April 1935 but not arrested (Yakir brought him to the Kiev military district as an aide in June).

264. Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 287–8 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 33, l. 49–50; Ulrich to Stalin, March 11, 1934).

265. Kokurin and Petrov, Lubianka, 548–52; RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 271, l. 565–65ob.; Yezhov notes for presentation to Stalin, Dec. 1934 or Jan. 1935.

266. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 628–31 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 232, l. 168–76; March 11, 1935). A June 17, 1935, joint Central Committee and Council of People's Commissars decree, "On the procedure for conducting arrests," superseded the May 8, 1933, instruction, and stipulated that the NKVD could make arrests only with the sanction of the procuracy; arrests of personnel who reported to commissariats could be made only with the sanction of that particular commissar, including in the defense commissariat. Arrests of members and candidates of the Central Committee only with CC approval. A further directive would be issued Dec. 1, 1938, to take into account institutional changes, but arrests still required the authorization of the governing institution's leadership. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 63 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 36, d. 1339, l. 191–2ob.).

267. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 648–50 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 234, l. 1–6; March 21, 1935). Zakovsky would report from Leningrad that more than 11,000 "former people" had already been sentenced and 22,000 inhabitants of border zones deported. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 64; Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 465–76 (March 31, 1935); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 654–7. Yezhov presented Stalin a list (April 4, 1935) of the recipients of the various dachas that Yenukidze had doled out. Maksimenkov, Boľshaia tsenzura, 371n4 (RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 52, l. 32; Yezhov to Stalin, April 4, 1935). The politburo ordered the purchase—rather than the confiscation—of some valuable literary archives by people being deported from Leningrad in the wake of the Kirov murder. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 255 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 962, l. 48; April 23, 1935), 763n92 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 174, l. 78–9).

268. The document was worked out by Stalin, Molotov, Kaganovich, and Yezhov, but not Voroshilov or Orjonikidze, and would be dated April 3, 1935. Stalin was in his office with those three only on March 15, 1935. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 658–60 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 234, l. 47–53); Na prieme, 156–7.

269. “Zamenit' Vas nekem': pis'ma M. Gor'kogo I. V. Stalinu,” 116–7 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 284, l. 127–127ob, 124).

270. Izvestiia, March 24, 1935; DVP SSSR, XVIII: 204–13; Lensen, Damned Inheritance, 457–9; Slavinskii, Vneshniaia politika, 53. See also RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 83, l. 73–83, 104–6.

271. Davies et al., Years of Progress, 91n5 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 17, l. 157–8). Stalin would inspect the first ZIS-101 luxury limousine on April 29, 1936.

272. Paine, Wars for Asia, 92.

273. Crowley, Japan's Quest for National Autonomy, 214–7; Safronov, SSSR, SShA, i iaponskaia, 145.

274. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 626 (Spil'vanek in Nanking to Moscow, Jan. 28, 1935).

275. Khlevniuk, Stalin: zhizn', 195.

276. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 173–6 (Svanidze diary: April 29, 1935), 178 (May 9); Na prieme, 161. See also Medvedev, K sudu istorii, 628; Brandenberger and Dubrovsky, “The People Need a Tsar,” 873, 884n4. When a common person, Petrushenko, was asked in a study circle that same year who Stalin was and answered, “someone like the tsar used to be,” the secret police reported the remark. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 176, l. 45; Davies, Popular Opinion, 168–9. The metro opened with two lines: from Sokolniki to the Park of Culture through Hunters Row station; and from the latter to Smolensk Square. Medvedev, All Stalin's Men, 124–5.

277. Tucker, Stalin in Power, 223–37. Ulam observed that “it is unlikely that Stalin would have wanted to establish the precedent of a successful assassination attempt against a high Soviet official.” Ulam, Stalin, 385. “One thing is certain,” wrote the émigré Nicolaevsky, “the only man who profited by the Kirov assassination was Stalin.” Nicolaevsky, “Kirov Assassination.”

278. Medved evidently discussed with other NKVD officials and his closest relatives his suspicion that Stalin and Yagoda were responsible for Kirov's death. Shreider, NKVD iznuri, 26–9. In 1935, Yefim Yevdokimov evidently asked Frinovsky if he had any information about the hand of Yagoda in the murder of Kirov (insinuating Stalin's involvement). Protocol of Frinovsky interrogation, Beria to Stalin, April 11, 1939 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 373, l. 3–44), http://www.hrono.ru/do_kum/193_dok/19390413beria.php.

279. All six 1956–57 commissions formed under Khrushchev concluded that no underground Zinoviev-Trotskyite terrorist group existed; the thirteen people executed with Nikolayev would be rehabilitated in 1989.

280. Lenoe rightly assesses the evidence provided by Genrikh Lyushkov, who worked alongside Agranov and interrogated Draule, Zinoviev, Kamenev, and others, as the most important. Lyushkov would write in 1939: “I can confirm that Kirov's murder was the individual deed of Nikolayev. Nikolayev was a psychologically unbalanced person who suffered many anxieties and was unhappy with life. He believed that he had the abilities to accomplish anything and he imagined himself as a man of intrigue. In reality, he was a constant complainer who could not get along with people. Confronted at every turn by the horrifying inertia of the state apparatus, he nonetheless fought to maintain the right and battle corruption. Society's indifference aroused in him hatred and an intense desire for revenge . . . And so Nikolayev's disenchantment with the party apparatus drove him to make plans for the assassination of one of the party leaders.” Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 681–6 (Kaizo, April 1939).

281. Rimmel, “Another Kind of Fear,” 484, citing TsGAIPD, f. 25, op. 5, d. 47, l. 2, 492, citing TsGAIPD, f. 25, op. 5, d. 46, l. 3ob.

282. A group of workers from the Kirov plant in a letter to new Leningrad party boss Zhdanov condemned “deceivers,” “scoundrels,” and the regime’s “soap-bubble comedy,” and called the end of rationing “Molotov’s vile deception,” given how workers continued to live in squalor. Davies, Popular Opinion, 137 (citing TsGAIPD, f. 24, op. 2v, d. 1518, l. 184–8). By contrast, Tokayev, a young military engineer, noted that “the public . . . felt a cloud lifted . . . There was a new sense of freedom in domestic life; not that food became more plentiful, but it was not hard to draw the conclusion that, if the Government could take this step, ‘things could not be so bad after all.’” Tokaev, Betrayal of an Ideal, 278–9.

283. Davies, Popular Opinion, 115–6 (citing TsGAIPD St.P f. 25, op. 5, d. 35, l. 7, 90; d. 54, l. 99; f. 24, op. 5, d. 240, l. 22; TsKhDMO, f. 1, op. 23, d. 1102, l. 167); Rimmel, “Another Kind of Fear,” 484. See also Kedrov, Lapki Stalinizma, 152 (citing GAAO, otдел DSPI, f. 290, op. 2, d. 312, l. 107–10; d. 462, l. 56–60); Fainsod, Smolensk under Soviet Rule, 422; and Kuromiya, Freedom and Terror, 210 (citing DAHO, f. 326p, op. 1, spr. 304, ark. 34).

284. As we shall see, all of Orjonikidze’s relatives would suffer from the dictator’s falling out with his former intimate, while none of Kirov’s relatives suffered.

285. “Comrade Stalin, as I now recall, summoned me and Kosaryov and said: ‘Look for the murderers among the Zinovievites,’” Yezhov would state three years later. “I must say the Chekists did not believe in that and as insurance for themselves they were developing a second scenario, involving foreigners, on the off chance something would leap out.” Yezhov was discrediting Yagoda and added that in Yezhov’s presence, Stalin phoned Yagoda and said, “Look, we’ll smash your face.” L. P. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral’-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda,” (1995, no. 2): 16–7; Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 482–3.

286. The bodyguard detail lacked even written operational instructions. Sedov et al., “Spravka,” 494.

287. Shubin, Vozhdi i zagovorschiki, 273.

288. A wealth of documents demonstrates this, which Yezhov would stress at the Feb.–March 1937 plenum: “Materialy marto-fevral’skogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1995, no. 2), 17.

289. See the incisive memorandum by the American diplomat George Kennan (March 1935) about how “all the resources of the Soviet state have been applied to the construction of a vast military machine . . . A generation has been reared whose patriotic arrogance and whose ignorance of the outside world rival the formidable traditions which the history of Tsardom can offer in this respect.” Kennan noted further that the Soviet willingness to sign pacts and enter the League of Nations derived from a belief that the next war would be fought by others, so that the Kremlin was interested not in collective security but in continuing to throw wrenches in efforts to achieve any sort of peaceful settlement among the Western powers. George Kennan, “The War Problem of the Soviet Union,” in George F. Kennan Papers, Box 1, Mudd Library, Princeton University, reprinted in Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 176–83 (at 178).

CHAPTER 5. A GREAT POWER

1. The correspondent added that pure Communist types had been set on edge by French Foreign Minister Laval’s pending arrival. Sotsialisticheski vestnik, May 25, 1935: 24.

2. About a quarter million copies of Mein Kampf, first published in 1925–26, had sold before he became chancellor, when sales really took off. In 1933, he earned more than 1 million marks in royalties, when schoolteachers averaged under 5,000 marks in annual salary. See also Lukacs, Hitler of History, 3.

3. Hitler, My Struggle (London: Hurst and Blackett, 1933); Hitler, Mon combat (Paris: Nouvelles éditions latines, 1934). Horace Rumbold, British ambassador in Berlin, had written a 5,000 word report (April 23, 1933) about Mein Kampf (“blood and thunder book”) and Hitler’s vow to restore German power “by force of arms.” The memo was read by the cabinet and prime minister, and internally called “our Bible” on Germany. DBFP, 2nd series, V: 47–55 (Rumbold to Simon, April 26, 1933); Medlicott, Britain and Germany, 6n1; Steiner, Triumph of the Dark, 22–3; Durocelle, La décadence, 61. But see also Vansittart, Mist Procession, 305, 500; Glibert, Roots of Appeasement, 132.

4. Gitler, Moia bor’ba (Shanghai: Gong, 1935).

5. Hitler, Mein Kampf, 553. Radek would pointedly tell a German official in Moscow that there had been no changes to chapter 14 (treating of expansion to the east) in the recent reissue of Hitler’s book—evidently the argument being used against Radek by foreign affairs commissariat personnel. DGFP, series C, II: 296–8 (unsigned memorandum, likely Twardowski, Jan. 1, 1934).

6. Pipes, Russian Revolution, 586; Ludendorff, Kriegführung und Politik, 51.
7. Krasnaia zvezda, 1935, no. 57; see also no. 10, no. 31, no. 40, and no. 59.
8. Harris, "Encircled by Enemies," 513–4 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 188, l. 31–51).
9. Wandycz, "Polish Foreign Policy: an Overview," 65–73.
10. Na prieme, 152 (Feb. 28, 1935), 154–5 (March 8).
11. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 280 (citing AVP RF, f. 82, op. 18, pap. 80, d. 3, l. 35; Stern to Bessonov, March 17, 1935).
12. In Feb. 1935, Tukhachevsky and Jeronimas Uborevičius, commander of the Belorussian military district, had separately submitted secret memoranda arguing for war plan revisions. For Tukhachevsky, defeat of Poland remained a primary objective, but he foresaw Germany as "the chief agent of anti-Soviet intervention." Uborevičius also named Germany and Poland as the main enemies, and deemed this new coalition more formidable because it could quickly get assistance from Finland and the Baltic states, and perhaps Britain, while still, as before, drawing in Japan in a two-front war. He argued that a quick defeat of Poland would prevent Germany from being able to mobilize fully. Aptekar' and Uspenskii, Marshal M.N. Tukhachevskii, 2–11; Samuelson, Soviet Defence Industry Planning, 193–4; Samuelson, "Wartime Perspectives," 187–214, at 207 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 400, l. 226–36; Tukhachevsky, Feb. 5, 1935; and d. 279, l. 124–49; Uborevičius, Feb. 19, 1935); Roberts, "Planning for War," 1304–5; Dullin, Men of Influence, 97–8; Bruce Menning, personal communication.
13. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 300 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 15, l. 5–6).
14. Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 50–1.
15. Seraphim, Das politische Tagebuch Rosenbergs, 74–5.
16. Kershaw, Hitler, 1889–1936, 549–53; Shirer, Berlin Diary, 34; Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 204; Pravda, March 17 and 18, 1935.
17. New York Times, March 17 and 18, 1935; Washington Post, March 18, 1935.
18. Bullock, Hitler, 333; Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 203–6.
19. He added: "The only unusual thing about him was the length at which he spoke." Schmidt, Hitler's Interpreter, 17–26. This was Schmidt's first encounter with Hitler.
20. DBFP, 2nd series, XII: 703–46; DGFP, series C, III: 1043–80 (Schmidt). A few days later, Hitler told Luftwaffe officers: "I don't know how many aeroplanes Göring really has got, but that seemed about what there ought to be." Kershaw, Making Friends with Hitler, 99–102 (citing PRO FO 800/290, fol. 200: April 2, 1935). See also Simon, Retrospect, 200–3; Strang, At Home and Abroad, 66–7; and Dodd and Dodd, Ambassador Dodd's Diary, 228 (April 4, 1935).
21. Andrew and Elkner, "Stalin and Foreign Intelligence," 76–7; West and Tsarev, Crown Jewels, 81–2.
22. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 461–7.
23. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 651–3 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 188, l. 74–8; Slutsky); Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 234 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 188, l. 74–6).
24. DBFP, 2nd series, XII: 793–5 (Sargent: April 1, 1935), 795 (Simon to G. Clerk in Paris, April 1). "Laval," one shrewd observer noted, "was very intelligent but he was also more cunning than competent. He wasn't a man of clear-cut decisions but rather 'everybody's friend.'" Duroselle, France and the Nazi Threat, 87. In general, the French got caught up in "pactomania," then sought loopholes in them.
25. A joint intelligence committee would be established in July 1936, but only at deputy director level; it would remain peripheral until summer 1939. In the 1930s, major militaries switched from medium to high frequencies for wireless, which, paradoxically, allowed more signals to be intercepted, but these still had to be decrypted. (Britain, after the end of the Great War, had not even tried to intercept German traffic again until 1934.) By 1935, Britain's specialists had broken Japan's main army and naval ciphers and some of Italy's, but German, as well as Soviet, ciphers remained inaccessible. Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, I: 36–43, 52–3, 57, 61, 199–200; Wark, Ultimate Enemy, 158–60; West, M16, 45, 48–9; Strong, Intelligence at the Top, 24.
26. Benjamin Disraeli, at the time Britain's Tory party opposition leader, had admonished his fellow conservatives in 1872 that the choice was "whether you will be content to be a comfortable England, modelled and molded upon continental principles and meeting in due course an inevitable fate, or whether you will be a great country—an imperial country—a country where your sons, when they rise, rise to paramount positions, and obtain not merely the esteem of their countrymen, but command the respect of the world.” Kebbel, Selected Speeches, 529–34 (at 534).

27. Holman, “Air Panic of 1935”; Levy, Appeasement and Rearmament; Neville, “Prophet Scorned?” British intelligence knew the claim of air parity to be false. Wark, Ultimate Enemy, 44 (citing CP 100[35], May 13, 1935, Cab 24/255; and AA Berlin to Director, AI, April 3, 1935, Air 2/1356); Vansittart, Mist Procession, 499; Winterbotham, Nazi Connection, 127–33.

28. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 228–39 (at 232–3, 235–6); DBFP, 2nd series, XII: 771–84 (Chilston to Simon, April 1).

29. Eden rose to answer that his mission aimed for an exchange of views in the quest for peace and toasted Litvinov’s health. The festivities ended at 1:30 a.m. Pravda, March 29, 1935; DVP SSSR, XVIII: 226–8; Eden, Facing the Dictators, 144–63.

30. Eden, Facing the Dictators, 164.

31. When Eden and Chilston broached the issue of expanding bilateral trade, Litvinov, according to the British notetaker, replied positively (“why not?”), but, according to the Soviet notetaker, stated that no negotiations were possible because of the British position on tsarist debts. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 240–5 (at 242–3); DBFP, 2nd series, XII: 784–91.

32. Eden found the exchange enigmatic. Eden, Facing the Dictators, 156.

33. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 246–251; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 521; Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, I: 98–101.

34. On the evening of March 29, Eden was taken to Swan Lake at the Bolshoi, where the orchestra played “God Save the King,” the British anthem. He was also afforded a ride on the new Moscow metro and a visit to the aircraft factory at Fili, just outside Moscow, which produced the TB-3 heavy bomber. Eden, Facing the Dictators, 155–60. The British omitted their full record of the Eden-Stalin conversation from the published document collection. See also DBFP, 2nd series, XII: 803–10 (Eden and Beck in Warsaw, April 2–3, 1935), 812–7 (Eden and Beneš in Czechoslovakia, April 4). By early 1936, after Eden would become foreign secretary, he would no longer doubt German aggressiveness, according to Maisky. DVP SSSR, XIX: 77 (conversation Feb. 11, 1936).

35. The idea had grown out of the secret cooperation with Germany, but “deep operations” offered a more comprehensive vision. Triandafillov, Kharakter operatsii sovremennykh armii; Isserson, Evolution of Operational Art, 43–76; Savushkin, Razvitie sovetskikh vooruzhennykh sil, 59–62; Iakov, V. K. Triandafillov; Harrison, Russian Way of War, 194–217; Habeck, Storm of Steel, 206–28.

36. Of three main Red Army groups, a Northwestern (Leningrad military district), Western (Belorussian military district), and Southwestern (Kiev military district), the first was primarily to deter aggression from enemy use of Finland and the Baltic states, while the second and third would launch operations on enemy territory (north and south of the swampy Pripet Marshes) by means of mobile ground and air forces prepositioned and concealed in fortified frontier regions. Menning, “Soviet Strategy,” I: 218–9; Gorkov, “Gotovil li,” 30–1.

37. Reprinted (abridged) in Tukhachevskii, Izbrannye proizvedeniia, II: 233–9.

38. “Nakanune voiny (Dokumenty 1935–1940 gg.),” 168–9 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 400, l. 238ff.). Tukhachevsky’s argument resembled what Svechin had suggested back in 1926–27. Svechin, Strategia, 184. Tukhachevsky had savaged Svechin as “a conduit for the influence of bourgeois ideology” in the introduction to the Russian edition of Hans Delbrück’s History of the Military Art, “Predislovie k knige G. Del’briuka,” in Tukhachevskii, Izbrannye proizvedeniia, II: 144. See also Kokoshin, “A. A. Svechin,” 134. Soviet war planning envisioned only enemies, no allies: Budushchaia voina, 35–6; Plekhanov, VChK-OGPU, 102; Stoecker, Forging Stalin’s Army, 148–9; Samuelson, Soviet Defence Industry Planning, 46–52.

39. DGFPI, series C, IV: 1–2 (Schulenburg, April 1, 1935), 7 (state secretary, April 2); DVP SSSR, XVIII: 262 (April 4); “Nakanune voiny (Dokumenty 1935–1940 gg.),” 171–2 (Gekker for Berzin, April 4).

40. DBFP, 2nd series, XII: 766–7 (Chilston to Simon quoting Eden, sent March 30, 1935), 768–9 (March 31).

41. Eden deemed Stalin “the quietest dictator I have ever known, with the exception of [Portugal’s] Dr. Salazar.” Eden, Facing the Dictators, 153.

42. An “economic agreement” had been signed March 20, 1935, but the more critical loan terms were signed on April 9. DGFP, series C, III: 1028–31, IV: 28–38, 38–43; DVP SSSR, XVIII: 270–4. Schacht (now acting economics minister), who had sought to sabotage the credit negotiations, emerged as the lead proponent. Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 17–9; DGFP, series C, III: 367–9 (Aug. 29, 1934), 682–5 (Nov. 27, 1934), 930–3 (Feb. 14, 1935), 935–6 (Feb. 15), 960–1 (Feb. 25), 1002. See also Doering, Deutsche Ausenwirtschaftspolitik, 169–75; von Strandmann, “Grossindustrie und Rapallopolitik,” at 337.

43. Abramov, “Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki,” 147 (citing AVP RF, f. 082, op. 18, pap. 81, d. 7, l. 150–1: April 12, 1935). Kandelaki returned from Berlin and Stalin received him on April 13, May 4 and 5, July 5 and 7, 1935. Kandelaki appears to have imagined that opposition to Hitler existed and could be galvanized via improved relations, a view dismissed by Litvinov and Surits. Na prieme, 160, 162, 169; Roberts, “Soviet Bid for Coexistence.”

44. Laval had been stalling Moscow over the deadlocked negotiations with Germany for a multilateral Eastern Pact, but on March 30, 1935, fearful that events would outrun him, he had handed Potyomkin a text for a bilateral pact solely between France and the Soviet Union, and possibly one also with Czechoslovakia, and with Italy, all within the framework of the League. DDF, 1e série, X: 75–83; DVP SSSR, XVIII: 253–4. The politburo instructions for Litvinov specified that the Soviet government preferred a Franco-Soviet pact that included Germany, or if not, then Poland, or if not, then France, Czechoslovakia, and the Baltic states. The French stuck to two bilateral pacts, France-USSR, Czechoslovakia-USSR. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 158–60 (Litvinov to Potyomkin: March 4, 1935), 174 (Potyomkin, April 9, 1935), 174 (April 10); Borisov, Sovetsko-fratsuzskie otnosheniia, 248–9; Herriot, Jadis, II: 530. It seems that both Edvard Beneš (Czechoslovak foreign minister) and Nicolae Titulescu (Romanian foreign minister) were at the French foreign ministry and helped draft the public announcement of France’s decision. Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 51 (citing AMZV Prague, incoming 1935, Osuský from Paris, April 9). During three meetings in the Little Corner (April 22, 23, 28, 1935), Litvinov pressed for France’s much-reduced incarnation (no Germany, Poland, or even Baltic states); Litvinov agreed. DVP SSSR, XVII: 280–6 (at 281: April 21, 1935), 292–3 (April 18, 1935), 295, 296; Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TSK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 322–3 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 18, l. 2), 323–4 (l. 5: April 19, 1935); DDF, 1e série, X: 322–5, 334–5; Na prieme, 160–1.

45. Pravda, May 4, 1935. Stalin was seen to leave early, but it is unclear why. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 293 (N. Charles to John Simon, May 7, 1935: PRO FP 371/19450/N2376).

46. Voroshilov had initiated these celebratory “breakfasts” (as well as a separate annual May graduation ceremony for the military academies). At the May 2, 1933, reception, during the famine, 1,800 pounds of meat, poultry, fish, and sausage were served. Nevezhin, Zastol’ia, 66; Osokina, Ierarkhia potrebleniia, 79n21; Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 41–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1117, l. 9–10); Borev, Staliniada, 90.

47. The immense interior encompassed more than seven hundred rooms. Deviatov and Zhuravleva, Dvortsy Kremliia; V. Bogomolova et al., Moskovskii kremli’; Chuev, Molotov, 96; Kabanov, Stal’nye peregony, 53. Two ancient monasteries (the Chudov and Voznesensky) were demolished. So was Moscow’s onion-domed Savior in the Wood, originally consecrated in the thirteenth century, to make way for a five-story service facility, while the magnificent Red Porch leading to the Palace of Facets was destroyed for a two-story canteen. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 435–6 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 3, d. 883, l. 1–2, June 2, 1936).

48. “Stalin slowly gets up from his chair” amid deafening applause, noted a record of the 1933 banquet. “The hall quiets. ‘I am not inclined to speak, but I am being obliged. The first toast is for Lenin, the second for technology.’” Warming to the room, Stalin continued: “Lenin did not die, he lives together with the party he created, together with the Soviet power he created. Who are we, Soviet power and the party of Bolsheviks? We are considered great people. No, we are little people in comparison with Lenin. Lenin organized the party and the proletarian revolution on one-sixth of the earth, which astounded the whole world . . . To the dictatorship of the proletariat, to the great teacher Lenin!” Stalin then toasted “the Russian nation—the most talented nation in the world,” and raised a glass to “our military technology! To our air industry personnel! To our aviators! To our tank drivers! . . . To the leaders and vozhds of the Red Army! To the best student of Lenin, Klim Voroshilov! Hurrah!” (stormy applause). Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 43–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1117, l. 9–10). See also Pravda, May 2 and May 4, 1934; Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 46–55 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 1, d. 164, l. 165–8, 162–4; d. 160, l. 23–5). The Soviet brand of champagne had been developed on the basis of tsarist foundations in Crimea and blossomed after 1934, when a former aristocrat and chemist, Anton Mikhailovich Frolov-Bagreev, perfected a process of fermenting sparkling wine in large reservoirs, rather than in bottles, facilitating mass production.

⁴⁹ Izvestiia, May 2, 1935. See also Nevezhin, “Bol’shie Kremlevskie priemy Stalina” (no. 3), 56–70, (no. 4), 123–39. Stalin would approve replacement of the tsarist double-headed eagles atop the Kremlin’s main gates—the Savior (Spassky), Nikolsky, Trinity, and Pinewood (Borovitsky)—with metal red stars in 1935 (two years later, the metal would give way to glass).

⁵⁰ Nevezhin, Zastol’ia, 280.

⁵¹ Shmidt, “Priemy v Kreml’e,” at 274; Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 192.

⁵² Izvestiia, May 4, 1935. The account in Pravda (May 4, 1935) by Mekhlis was less exuberant. In Feb. 1935, Bukharin had written to Stalin begging for approval, “in order that I could say, ‘all the same, comrade Stalin thinks that the newspaper is not such a bad one.’” Adibekov and Anderson, “‘U menia odna nadezhda na tebia,’” 50. Security at the banquets would tighten considerably. Moiseev, la vospominaiui, 47.

⁵³ Krenkel’, RAEM, 492–3. One scholar has asserted (without presenting the evidence) that Soviet military academies began teaching ballroom dancing and manners in the 1930s. Tumkina-Perfil’eva, Russkii etiket, 148.

⁵⁴ RGASPI, f. 558, op. 4, d. 657, l. 236.

⁵⁵ Back on May 2, 1932, at the close of the evening’s concert, Stalin had remarked that the artists “were dressed not the way artists of a great country should be” (part apology for Soviet material life, part directive). Barsova, “Nash veilikii drug,” 59.

⁵⁶ Pravda, May 4, 1935; Le Temps, May 5, 1935.

⁵⁷ Beloff, Foreign Policy of Soviet Russia, I: 152–4; Scott, Alliance against Hitler, 247. “One must remember that there was never an alliance between the tsarist government and France,” Maisky wrote to Litvinov on May 3, 1935, of the 1892 military convention that was activated by the Great War, “only an exchange of notes and an agreement between the two high commands.” Dullin, Men of Influence, 112, citing AVP RF, f. 10, op. 10, pap. 48, d. 7.

⁵⁸ Hilger, a German embassy counsellor, reported goodwill toward Germany in Ukraine in late spring 1935. “Germany was only trying to liberate itself from the oppressive fetters of the Versailles Treaty,” the chairman of the provincial soviet told him at a consular reception in Kiev. “But instead of aiding her to do so, the Soviet government was making a pact with Germany’s oppressors.” The Ukrainians blamed Litvinov. Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 269.

⁵⁹ Pravda and Izvestiia, May 16, 1935; Humanité, May 17, 1935.

⁶⁰ Some Polish officials understood better than others. In Nov. 1934, the Polish envoy to Germany, Lipski, had told his American counterpart that “Germany intends to re-annex part of our country, the maps posted all over Germany show this clearly.” Lipski predicted Hitler would also annex Alsace-Lorraine, Austria, and Czechoslovakia, too. Dodd and Dodd, Ambassador Dodd’s Diary, 192 (Nov. 17, 1934).

⁶¹ Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 71–5 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 1, d. 160, l. 42–9). A German periodical would observe in late 1935, in a comment reprinted in the Red Army newspaper, that “alongside his great organizational talent, the people’s commissar Voroshilov possesses a surpassing gift for speaking, thanks to which he takes listeners prisoners of war.” Krasnaia zvezda, Jan. 5, 1936.

⁶² Stalin was said to have directed the bygoness quote at Bukharin and to have proposed a toast to him, which elicited applause, but if so, this was not recorded in the raw transcript. Larina, Nesabyvaemoe, 33.

⁶³ Back on Dec. 27, 1934, at a Kremlin reception for the metal industry, Stalin, speaking about the first Five-Year Plan slogan, “Technology Decides Everything,” had stated that the people operating the technology were more important, and “must be carefully and attentively cultivated the way a gardener tends a beloved fruit tree.” “Metallurgi u tovarishcha Stalina, Molotova, i Ordzhonikidze,” Pravda, Dec. 29, 1934: 1, reprinted in Sochineniia, XIV: 49–50.

⁶⁴ Stalin loved gardening metaphors. Jochen Hellbeck, “Laboratories of the Soviet Self: Diaries of the Stalin Era,” PhD dissertation, Columbia University, 1998, 64–6. One scholar noted a shift in novels in the 1930s from machine to gardening metaphors. Clark, Soviet Novel, 99, 105.

⁶⁵ Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 76–84 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1077, l. 43–9).

⁶⁶. See also Arsenidze, “Iz vospominaniia o Staline,” 235. One scholar has argued that “consumption . . . was one of the most frequent items on the politburo’s agenda” and, in Stalin’s words, one of “the most contested issues.” Gregory, Political Economy of Stalinism, 94.

⁶⁷. The original had been: “Now we have reached the stage of development when cadres decide everything, not mares and machines.” Pravda, May 6, 1935. See also Rees, Political Thought from Machiavelli to Stalin, 227. The newspaper account contained an insertion after Stalin’s mention that he had had a hand in smashing some people along the way: “stormy applause.” Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 69, 84–91 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1077, l. 31–42); Pravda, May 6, 1935, reprinted in Sochinieniia, XIV: 56–64 (at 61–4). See also Oleinikov, “Chetvertoe maia.” In his speech on May 4, 1934, for Soviet military academy graduates, Stalin had also struck a note of populism. “I do not deny that leaders [vozhdii] have significance, they organize and lead the masses,” he allowed. “But leaders without the mass are nothing. Such people as Hannibal, Napoleon, perished as soon as they lost the masses.” Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 55 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 1, d. 160, l. 23–5).

⁶⁸. Svanidze noted of Stalin’s May 4, 1935, speech: “Iosif said that he had forgotten to add ‘our leaders came to power as landless peasants and have remained that way to the end, that they are driven by ideas, not acquisitiveness,’ as we can observe in capitalist countries. Over there, being in power means getting rich. I don’t remember exactly, but something to that effect.” A mixed message: soulless functionaries yet selfless leader(s). Murin, Stalin v ob’iatiakh, 177–8 (Svanidze diary: May 9, 1935).

⁶⁹. DDF, 1e série, X: 575–7, 630–1. The Soviets did not publish the record of the conversation, only a speech by Litvinov at the May 13 banquet for Laval: DVP SSSR, XVIII: 328–30. See also DVP SSSR, XVIII: 337 (TASS); Pravda, May 14, 1935.

⁷⁰. Harrison and Davies, “Soviet Military-Economic Effort,” 391 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 18, l. 123: Aug. 28, 1935).

⁷¹. “‘Osnovnaia tsel’ ego priczda,” 139. On May 14, 1935, a grand ceremony was held in the Columned Hall of the House of Trade Unions for the Moscow metro. Lazar Brontman and another Pravda colleague were assigned to the event. Kaganovich opened the proceedings for his beloved project (“his most memorable, temperamental speech,” Brontman decided). But Stalin walked in during the speech, with Voroshilov and others in tow, provoking an ovation. The dictator took the podium, to delirium. In the din, Brontman and a colleague had a difficult time transcribing the speech (the journalists stopped to applaud as well). They rushed to Pravda’s offices, typed it up and had the text run over to Poskryobyshev for approval—Brontman crowed in his diary that only Pravda had the speech the next day. Pravda, May 15. This was Brontman’s second encounter with Stalin: “The first time it happened during the 5th Congress of Soviets at the Bolshoi . . . Stalin looked at my astonished face, laughed and continued to his box.” Brontman, Dnevnik (Aug. 10, 1936): http://mathscinet.ru/files/Dnevnik_1932_1947.pdf.

⁷². “I listened without comment,” Schulenburg reported. DGFP, series C, IV: 138 (May 8, 1935). On the immediate public distancing from the pact in France, see Borisov, Sovetsko-frantsuzskie otnosheniia, 230–95; and Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 83–5.

⁷³. Laval, according to Litvinov, was shocked at Stalin’s bluntness. Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, I: 110–1 (June 19, 1935); Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 51–2. On June 7, 1935, Laval took the reins of the French government for the second time.

⁷⁴. Scott, Alliance against Hitler, 253–4. Trotsky, then living in Grenoble, noted: “Even though I am sufficiently familiar with the political cynicism of Stalin, his contempt for principles . . . , I still could not believe my eyes when I read those lines.” Trotsky’s Diary in Exile, 1935, 120 (May 17, 1935).

⁷⁵. M. Mourin, Les Relations Franco-Soviétiques (1917–1967) (Paris, 1967), 208; Scott, Alliance against Hitler, 254–5, 266; Les événements survenus en France de 1933 à 1945, I: 142–3 (Laval to Flandin, May 16, 1935).

⁷⁶. “The obligations of mutual assistance will take effect only under the condition, as stipulated in this agreement, of assistance being extended on the part of France to the side that is the victim of aggression.” DVP SSSR, XVIII: 336–7; DDF, 1e série, X: 575–7, 630–1; Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 326–7 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 18, l. 49: June 1, 1935). The Soviets would undertake no efforts to establish a transit right for the Red Army through Poland or Romania to defend Czechoslovakia in the event of a German attack. Both bilateral pacts, as per

French insistence, were limited to Europe. Still, Czechoslovakia pledged not to supply Japan with arms. Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 53, citing Zabraniční politika (Prague, 1935), 324–6. For a time, the Soviets took credit for the clause that provided for taking action only if France did so. Potemkin, Istoria diplomatii, III: 387–9.

⁷⁷. Potocki, Master of Lancut, 207; Szymberg, Journal, 85.

⁷⁸. Roos, Polen und Europa, 218–9; Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 209. Göring was in Poland May 17–24, 1935: DGFP series C, IV: 184–5 (May 21), 223–5 (May 28).

⁷⁹. Domarus, Hitler: Reden, I: 505–14; Kershaw, “Hitler Myth,” 125–6.

⁸⁰. Stalin had Berzin, after eleven years heading military intelligence, reassigned to the Soviet Far Eastern Army. Moisei Uritsky, the nephew of the celebrated Chekist who had been assassinated in 1918, brought over his own deputy, Alexander Nikonov, who was appointed alongside Artuzov. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 11; Kolpakidi and Prokhorov, Imperiia GRU, I: 121–2, 196, 219–20; Gorbunov, “Voennaia razvedka v 1934–1939 godakh” (no. 2); Lota, “Alta’ protiv ‘Barabrossy’,” 51; Na prieme, 161–2. The Danes shared their findings with other European intelligence services, which produced still more revelations on Soviet agents. See G. Solonitsyn, “Nachal’nik sovetskoi razvedki.”

⁸¹. Yagoda had reported to Stalin (May 2, 1935) that the NKVD had completed interrogations of the librarian Nina Rozenfeld, establishing that the Mukhanova “terrorist group” in the library, to which Rozenfeld was said to belong, had “links” to the Kremlin commandant office and a group of Trotskyite youth and White Guards. “Lev Kameney,” Yagoda wrote of Nina’s brother, “is not only the inspiration, but the organizer of the terror.” Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 427–8 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 9, l. 241–42). See also Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 380 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 900, l. 137). As of summer 1935, the Kremlin housed just 374 inhabitants (102 households), not including bodyguards, soldiers, and service personnel.

⁸². Yagoda had proposed nine death sentences (for “Trotskyites”), eighteen sentences of ten years in camps for key figures, and for the rest, three to five years in camps or exile; three were to be released. Stalin wrote in ten years instead of five for Irina Gogua, and freed three more of the hundred and twelve. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 663–9 (APRF F 3, op. 58, d. 237, l. 37–49), 681 (d. 238, l. 1: July 17).

⁸³. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 963, l. 37.

⁸⁴. The circular threatened local party bosses with expulsions for failures to restore order, giving a deadline of two to three months. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b): povestki dnia zasedanii, II: 645; Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 240; Pavlov, Kommunisticheskua partiia, 51. In Oct. 1934—before Kirov was murdered by a holder of a party card—the regime had decided on a universal re-registration of party members in 1935. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 963, l. 3.

⁸⁵. Getty, Origins of the Great Purges, 60–1 (citing Partiinoe stroitel’stvo, 1935, no. 4: 32–6); Pravda, May 16, 1935. Another 340,000 Communists had been expelled in the 1934 purge, which mostly targeted those who had recently joined. Total membership as of January 1, 1935, was 2.35 million. Fainsod, How Russia Is Ruled, 212, 224; Bol’shevik, 1934, no. 15: 9.

⁸⁶. “We have a lot of Americans,” Yezhov stated during a meeting connected to the party document verification. “Traditionally our people take the view that these are wonderful people. Relations with Germany have worsened, so you need to keep an eye on them, Poles as well, and you need to watch the English . . . Keep in mind, that Americans, as a rule, are almost all spies.” Pavliukov, Ezhov, 159–60 (RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 32, l. 20–1: July 1, 1935).

⁸⁷. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 86 (RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 273, l. 700).

⁸⁸. Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 175.

⁸⁹. Biulleten’ oppositsiia, no. 1–2 (July 1929): 2; Trotsky, Writings of Leon Trotsky, 1929, 61–2. When Radek asked Stalin (June 4, 1935) whether he should be republishing Trotsky’s writings in the regime’s internal Bulletin of the Foreign Press for high officials, the dictator told him “to liquidate” the publication. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 86 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 420, l. 40b.). By contrast, when Tal (head of the Central Committee press and publications department) queried the politburo about which émigré subscriptions he should take for the next year, Stalin commanded: “Order the lot!” Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 228 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 273, l. 36: Dec. 1935).

90. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 161–6 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 542, l. 55–86), 177–71 (l. 125–41), 172–3 (l. 175–8).

91. The usual chorus had followed the dictator's lead and remained reticent. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 161–7 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 542, l. 55–86).

92. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 176 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 547, l. 69), 177 (d. 544, l. 22, l. 70); Pravda, June 8, 1935. The regime abolished the Society of Old Bolsheviks (which had its own publishing house) on May 25, 1935, and the Society of Political Prisoners on June 25.

93. No new charges were brought in the Kirov case, despite Yezhov's ominous speech, which Stalin alone could have authorized. Pravda (June 16 and 19, 1935) issued follow-up fulminations, by Zhdanov and Khrushchev, over “former princes, ministers, courtiers, Trotskyites, etc. . . . a counterrevolutionary nest.”

94. DBFP, 2nd series, XIII: 364–71 (June 5, 1935), 477–84 (E. Drummond in Rome to Samuel Hoare, June 25); XIV: 329–33 (Drummond in Rome to Hoare); DGFP, series C, IV: 253–62 (June 4), 262–6 (June 4), 269–71 (June 5), 271 (June 5), 272–3 (June 5); Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 213. Germany's Admiral Raeder had caught British attention in April 1935 when he had announced, in an obvious negotiating ploy, that Germany had begun to build twelve submarines. To London, it appeared to be a choice between a deal to get the Germans to proceed more slowly, as Hitler claimed he was inclined to do, or to build up the British fleet even more rapidly. But even beyond financial straits, the British admiralty rightly anticipated that between 1936 and 1941 their ship building capacity would be sufficient to replace the existing fleet but not to expand it. The British also reasoned, conveniently, that resistance to approving German rearmament of any kind (the French position) would only elicit a far stronger German action. And British naval intelligence concluded that Hitler needed a fleet for use against the Soviet Union in the Baltic Sea, not against Britain. Wark, Ultimate Enemy, 134–9, 141–2.

95. The battleship plans originally dated to Nov. 1934. Dülffer, Weimar, Hitler und die Marine, 570. In May 1936, Germany laid the keels for five instead of the agreed two A-cruisers. Hildebrand, Foreign Policy, 43. The Bismarck would be laid down in July 1936 (and finished in Sept. 1940), while the Tirpitz would be laid down in Oct. 1936 (and finished in Feb. 1941). The Germans reported the Bismarck to Britain as 35,000 tons displacement; in reality, the design was for 41,000. See also R. Ingram, Hitlers Glücklicher Tag: London, den 18 Juni (Stuttgart: Seewald, 1962).

96. Aubrey Kennedy, the journalist, replied that Baldwin was more the kind of man to hear political proposals than expositions of ideas. Martel, Times and Appeasement, 180. Kennedy had written a book calling early for Versailles treaty revision. Kennedy, Old Diplomacy and New.

97. Most of the rest of the seats had to be purchased. Many of the attendees were political émigrés, such as Bertolt Brecht, Heinrich and Klaus Mann, Anna Seghers, and Robert Musil. Stalin evidently wanted to prevent an anti-German eruption, for though Shcherbakov had been dispatched to keep a watchful party eye on the proceedings, the dictator sent him a telegram to “harmonize all reports and speeches with our envoy Potyomkin.” Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 386n7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 52, l. 114; June 20, 1935). Shcherbakov wrote privately in his diary, “there is not one tractor or motorcar on the roads of Poland . . . And Vienna loses its past greatness, and withers, and is dying.” Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 145 (citing RGASPI, f. 88, op. 1, d. 467, l. 1, 3–4); Golubev, “Esl' mir obrushitsia na nashu Respubliku,” 13 (citing RGASPI, f. 88, op. 1, d. 467, l. 1).

98. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 384–6, n1 (RGASPI, f. 329, op. 2, d. 4, l. 160–161ob.), n2 (f. 17, op. 163, d. 1059, l. 186), n3 (d. 1063, l. 131; f. 558, op. 11, d. 52, l. 108), n5, n7; Artizov and Naumov, Vlas', 256–7 (RGASPI, f. 88, op. 1, d. 472, l. 1–2; Shcherbakov to Stalin, May 27), 264–5 (f. 17, op. 3, d. 965, l. 42; June 19). A giant Gorky likeness was set up in the hall. Ehrenburg, living in Paris with a Soviet passport, had written worriedly to Bukharin (editor of Izvestiya, which published Ehrenburg) that “there will be few stars and many Bohemian wretches of the Trotskyite-anarchist type. Our delegation is peculiar: none speak foreign languages, and out of eighteen souls just five are even a bit known in the West as writers.” Voroshilov voted against Babel's inclusion.

99. Ehrenburg's denunciation: Literaturnaia gazeta, June 17, 1933, published in French translation in his essay collection Dumael, Gide, Malraux, Mauriac.

100. Mezhdunarodnyi kongress pisatelei; Klein, Paris 1935; Teroni and Klein, Pour le défense de la culture. A joint report to Stalin by Shcherbakov and Koltsov deemed this “the biggest event in the sphere of the consolidation of antifascist forces,” but added that “not a little difficulty in our work was caused by the ambiguous behavior of Ehrenburg,” whom they accused of wanting to “appear neutral,” rather than influencing the French or defending Soviet interests. Ehrenburg in a report that reached Stalin called Koltsov a journalist rather than a writer. Stalin, for his part, advised Kaganovich not to allow Soviet Communists to “finish off” Ehrenburg. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 382–6 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 710, l. 25–9: July 20, 1935), 387–9 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 710, l. 30–4: July 21).

101. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 255 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 964, l. 14: May 19, 1935). The timing with the congress in Paris might have been a coincidence; Rolland had delayed the trip for reasons of health.

102. Remark dating to 1928, as cited in Drabovitch, Les Intellectuels français et le bolchévisme, 151–2. An internal Soviet evaluation (1934) of Rolland cited his “individualistic humanism” and pacifism as detriments. David-Fox, Showcasing the Great Experiment, 243 (citing RGALI, f. 631, op. 14, d. 716).

103. Yagoda had commissioned a twenty-volume Russian translation of Rolland's collected works and assigned oversight of the task to the Russian-French Maria Kudryashova; Rolland had married her, and she accompanied him as interpreter. “Stalin did not look anything like his portraits,” Rolland wrote in his diary. “He is neither large nor stocky, as he is imagined . . . His characteristic coarse dark hair is beginning to turn gray and lighten . . . But as before he has a direct and vigorous visage and enigmatic smile, which is (or can be) cordial, impenetrable, indifferent, good-natured, implacable, amused and mocking. In all situations, a perfect self-control. He speaks without raising his voice, with a timber a bit nasal and guttural at times (a Georgian accent, I'm told), with long pauses, to think things through. He listens still better than he talks, noting the principal points of what I said, scribbling with blue and red pencil on a piece of paper while I spoke. (I greatly regret not having asked him for that sheet.)” Rolland, Voyage à Moscou, 126–34; “Moskovskii dnevnik Romena Rollanda,” 217.

104. Stalin did not let on that he had personally edited the draft of the law. “Moskovskii dnevnik Romena Rollanda,” 221–2. That night, after returning to the Savoy hotel with his wife, Rolland was approached by Antonio Gramsci's two sons, aged nine and eleven, who thanked him for all he had done for their father (imprisoned in Mussolini's Italy). On the law, see Izvestiia, April 8, 1935; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 962, l. 32, 57; Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 145–6 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1059, l. 23–4, 27); Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 144–5 RGASPI, f. 78, op. 1, d. 550, l. 7, 7a: (Voroshilov, March 18, 1935). See also Suvénir, Tragediia RKKA, 325.

105. Besides a certain hero-worship, Rolland's purpose had included inquiring about the fate of the writer Viktor Kibalchich, known as Viktor Serge, who had been born in Brussels to Russian Jewish political émigrés from tsarism, emigrated after the revolution to the Soviet Union, and had been arrested in Leningrad (March 9, 1933) and internally exiled for “Trotskyite” propaganda. (Rolland would leave without being satisfied.) Serge's case had been forced into the discussion at the international gathering in Paris. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 428–31 (TsA FSB, f. N-13614, tom 2); Mikhailov, M. Gor'kii i R. Rollan, 313–5; Bialik, Gor'kii i ego epokha, III: 190–2 (Gorky to Yagoda, July 29, 1935), 191–2 (Gorky to Yagoda, March 7, 1936), 206; Comédie, August 30, 1933; Flores, L'immaginare dell'URSS, 235–42; Stern, Western Intellectuals, 27–8; Serge, Memoirs of a Revolutionary, 317–8.

106. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 775, l. 1–16 (unedited). Both Stalin and Rolland edited the text. Rolland, Voyage à Moscou, 237–47. Rolland recorded the session in his diary immediately, and noted that it lasted from 4:10 to 5:50 p.m. Pravda (June 29, 1935) also reported a duration of one hour and forty minutes, while the logbook for Stalin's office has two hours. “Moskovskii dnevnik Romena Rollanda,” 215–6; Na prieme, 168. Alexander Arsyev, the head of all-Union society for cultural ties with foreigners, who was present (and made the transcript), reported to Stalin that Rolland “repeated several times to me that he had not expected anything like that and that he had never in his life imagined Stalin that way.” Stalin wrote: “into my archive.” Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 377–8 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 795, l. 60–1). Rolland would also pepper Gorky with queries about Soviet repression.

107. “Moskovskii dnevnik Romena Rollanda,” 226–8 (July 9, 1935). Rolland read out a greeting on Soviet radio that July. “It's a wonderful thing, to laugh . . . Genuine joy is . . . in us, comrades, in a well dispositioned spirit, in a proud consciousness, in any beloved labor, joy is in the work in the cornfield of all humanity.” Gorlaeva, “Velikaia kniga dnia,” 300–1 (GARF, f. 6953, op. 15, d. 53).

108. Rolland, Voyage à Moscou, 149–54 (July 4, 1935); “Moskovskii dnevnik Romena Rollanda,” 238–40. Stalin's pipe, by now, had become a significant part of his iconography. Pravda (April 17, 1935), for ex., had run a caricature by Viktor Deni called “peace pipes” contrasting Stalin’s with that of a fat bulldog-faced bourgeois.

109. Hitler received Beck again in the afternoon, with Göring, Neurath, and Ribbentrop, but skipped Beck’s third and final conversation on July 4, when the Polish foreign minister summoned the courage to mention Germany’s freight arrears and the currency exchange problems Germany caused in Danzig. DGFP series C, IV: 398–407 (July 3), 410 (July 4); Wojciechowski, Stosunki polsko-niemieckie, 205; Beck, Przemówienia, 164–5; Beck, Final Report, 92–9. A British Foreign Office summary mentioned deep Soviet fears of becoming simultaneously the object of Western and Japanese ambitions, as well as smaller countries’ opportunism. Lensen, Damned Inheritance, 465 (FO 371/19460–881, Colonel Ismay to Collier, July 8, 1935). The NKVD’s Prokofyev wrote to Stalin (July 11, 1935) about the arrest of a saboteur parachuted in by Japan; two of three were killed, one fled but was captured, and the politburo resolved to stage a public trial in Irkutsk. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 679–81 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 247, l. 105–7), 681 (l. 104), 683 (l. 157).

110. It is not clear the German foreign ministry even knew of Schacht’s proposal. Kandelaki wanted the offer in writing. Litvinov warned against it as a German “maneuver.” Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 221; DVP SSSR, XVIII: 646–7 (Litvinov to Potyomkin, June 26, 1935), 647 (Litvinov to Surits, June 27); Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 85–6, 127; Na prieme, 169.

111. On the unexpected twists and turns concerning finance and cash in a “planned” economy, see Arnold, Banks, Credit and Money; Nakamura, “Did the Soviet Command Economy Command Money?”; and Gregory, Political Economy, 213–42.

112. Stalin had played a key role in the moderation of investment targets in 1932–4, which proved important for stabilization. Davies et al., “The Politburo and Economic Decision Making,” 113–4. The state planning commission did have a few line-management functions, but mostly it served in an advisory capacity, and tried to counter the systemic prevarication of commissariats and factories. Gregory and Harrison, “Allocation under Dictatorship.”

113. Na prieme, 170.

114. The 22 billion included 6.5–6.7 billion for Orjonikidze’s heavy industry (vs. the proposed 6, and a requested 9), and 3.5 billion for Kaganovich’s railroad commissariat (vs. the proposed 3, and a requested 4.5).

115. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 241–2; Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TSK RKP (b)—VKP (b): povestki dnia zasedanii, II: 673.

116. Davies et al., Years of Progress, 264 (citing GARE, f. 5446, op. 26, d. 66, l. 266, 264–6), 266 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 769, l. 159–60, 162–3); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 969, l. 1, 31–8; Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 249–50 (Aug. 2, 1935); Davies, “Making Economic Policy,” 64–80.

117. Narodno-khoziaistvennyi plan 1936, 269, 280. In July 1936, the investment plan introduced for 1937 would, again, be relatively moderate. Davies and Khlevnyuk, “Stakhanovism.”

118. Following much back-and-forth, the agreed amount was 112.75 billion in July, but the battles were refoisted and the numbers rose again to 133 billion. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro: mekhanizmy, 136–7 (RGAE, f. 4372, op. 92, d. 17, l. 366; d. 18, l. 76–8); Davies, Crisis and Progress, 292–301. Stalin wrote to Molotov (Sept. 12, 1933), “I agree that capital investment should not be fixed at more than 21 billion rubles for ’34, and that the growth of industrial output should not be more than 15 percent. That will be better.” Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 248–9.

119. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 646–7n157 (Litvinov to Potyomkin, June 26, 1935); Abramov, “Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki,” 147 (citing AVP RF, f. 010, op. 10, nap. 51, d. 45, l. 136). Schacht advised Kandelaki to have the Soviet ambassador approach the foreign ministry. DGFP series D, IV: 453–4. Kandelaki was received by Stalin on July 5 and July 7, 1935. Na prieme, 169.

120. Kommunisticheskiei International pered VII Vsemirnym kongressom: materialy (Moscow: Partizdat, 1935), 116.

121. Dimitrov, “Nastuplenie fashizma,” 12–1; Dimitroff, Against Fascism and War, 14. Manuilsky spoke of the victories of socialist construction in the USSR, Thorez about how the USSR’s very existence had radicalized capitalism’s crisis and contradictions, and Togliatti about Soviet foreign policy (“Can one imagine a more remarkable achievement than a great capitalist country having to sign a mutual assistance pact with the Soviet Union, involving defense against an aggressor and a willingness to defend peace and the borders of the homeland of the dictatorship of the proletariat?”).

This was the only Comintern Congress for which a complete stenographic record was not published. Carr, Twilight of the Comintern, 403–27. See also Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 52–9.

122. There was speculation that the photograph in Pravda of Stalin and the delegates was faked. Peschanski, Marcel Cachin, IV: 111 (July 26, 1935).

123. Clark, “Germanophone Exiles.” At a meeting with the scholars at the Institute of World Economics and World Politics, Yezhov “said that he does not trust political émigrés and those who have been abroad.” By Sept. 1935, he would come to the (inevitable) conclusion that spies were rampant among the political émigrés. Solov’ev, “Tetradi krasnogo professora 1912–1941 gg.,” IV: 178. See also Zhuravlev and Tiazhel’nikova, “Inostrannye kolonii,” 181. On Feb. 28, 1936, a politburo decree would restrict the movement and further arrivals of political émigrés. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 79, l. 98–100; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 738–41 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 248, l. 115–8; March 9), 823n171. In 1935–6, of the 9,965 arrests for espionage, 7,100 were accused of espionage on behalf of Germany (1,322), Japan (2,275), or Poland (3,528). Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 46 (TsA FSB, f. 8 os, op. 1, d. 79). 317).

124. One person died before sentencing. “O tak nazyvaemom ‘Kremlevskom dele’”; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1062, l. 167–9; Zhukov, Inoi Stalin, 133–72. Abroad, a Ukrainian-language newspaper published in the then Romania-controlled city of Cernăuți (Chernivtsi/Czernowitz) imagined with the Kremlin Affair that Soviet elites could not be bought off with a return to bourgeois private property or reinvigorated with an influx of youth. “Dictatorship in Soviet Russia is seriously reeling,” the article fantasized. “Stalin already is no longer master of the secret police . . . Stalin—whose name makes 160 million quake with fear—is already staggering.” “Propast’ radianskogo soiuza i nezalesna Ukraina!” Chas, July 6, 1935, courtesy of Cristina Florea.

125. Bediya did not write the text; he oversaw the working group (P. Butyrina, G. Khachapuridze, V. Mertskhulava), whose draft Merkulov edited. Sukharev, “Litsdeistvo,” 112 (citing PA IIP pri TsK KPSS, f. 8, op. 1, d. 39, l. 1; f. 8, op. 2, chast’ 1, d. 32, l. 117; f. 8, op. 1, d. 39., l. 3, 11–12). See also Beria’s remarks (Jan. 1934): VII s’ezd Kommunisticheskikh organizatsii Zakavkazia, 29–30. Dawn of the East also published “responses” confirming the narrative. Bediya would be arrested on Oct. 20, 1937; Beria would have him admit Beria’s authorship in his presence. Popov and Oppokov, “Berievshchina” (1989, no. 7), 82–7; “Plenum TsK KPSS, iul’ 1953 goda: stenograficheskii otchet,” 181.

126. Pravda, July 29 to August 5, 1935. Pravda then praised it in a separate editorial (Aug. 10, 1935). See also RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 704–5; op. 4, d. 662, l. 428.

127. Beria, K voprosu ob istorii bol’shevistskikh organizatsii na Zakavkaz’e (Moscow: Partizdat, 1935); Maslov, “Kratkii kurs istorii VKP (b),” 53n15.

128. Zaria vostoka, Sept. 2, 1935. The Soviet envoy to Hungary, Alexander Bekzadyan, an ethnic Armenian, while giving a mandatory report about the Central Committee plenum to embassy party members, was said to have remarked, “They took down Yenukidze wrongly, he’s a big-time revolutionary of the Caucasus, and they swallowed him on the basis of settling personal scores.” He said in reference to Beria, “I know him.” APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 324, l. 84–8 (a denunciation by I. D. Ovsinnikov later sent by Yezhov to Stalin: <http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/61210>).

129. Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 94–100 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1077, l. 62–5), 100–7 (l. 67–73), 108–10; Pravda, Aug. 2, 1935.

130. Menning has noted that in Dec. 1935, “a special group of the party Control Commission would report to Stalin that an investigation had revealed that railroads along the Baltic, western, and southwestern strategic directions ‘were unprepared in a full sense for a mobilization period.’” Voroshilov pointed out that on the right bank of the Dnieper, Poland’s throughput capacity exceeded the Soviet Union’s, 195 trains against 156, and he requested massive construction, and special appropriation of 387 million rubles. Bruce W. Menning, “Soviet Railroads and War Planning,” unpublished ms., 19–20 (citing RGUA, f. 4, op. 14, d. 1452, l. 27, 30–33, 2–3).

131. Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 94–100 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1077, l. 62–5), 100–7 (67–73—a second variant). Stalin removed from the transcript Kaganovich’s phrase “for the victory of the world revolution.” It became just “toward victory.”

132. Leibzon and Shirina, Povorot v istorii Kominternu, 93–102.

¹³³ Rosenfeldt, Knowledge and Power, 181. On Sept. 29, 1935, the Central Committee decreed the founding of the Central Museum of Lenin in Moscow. All documents and other materials were ordered sent to Moscow (local museums were supposed to make do with photo duplications, even if the original had been generated in their locale). RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 971, l. 72; Shul'gina, "Teoretiko-metodologicheskie osnovy deiatel'nosti museev." In 1936, the Lenin Museum would be given the building of the old Moscow city Duma.

¹³⁴ RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 5089, l. 1; Brandenberger, "Stalin as Symbol," at 257–8. Tovstukha, rebuffing Yaroslavsky's request for assistance, had rudely stated: "It will not turn out as a biography of Stalin—it will just be another history of the party and Stalin's role therein." Sukharev, "Litsedeistvo," 105–7, 110–1, 116; RGASPI, f. 89, op. 8, d. 1001, l. 7, 23–4; f. 155, op. 1, d. 88, l. 1; d. 90, l. 1–10b. On Aug. 19, on the dictator's instructions from Sochi, the politburo forbade Beria to republish Stalin's writings from 1905–10 without his express authorization. Beria responded that there had never been a plan to republish without authorization. The politburo also resolved to publish Stalin's collected works, projected at eight volumes. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 526 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 88, l. 21–2, 23; f. 17, op. 3, d. 970, l. 50); Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 394 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 905, l. 6, 10; d. 1164, l. 113); Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 745n17. Ilizarov, Tainaia zhizn' Stalina, 138; Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 405–6 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 905, l. 11–3; Nov. 13, 1935). The second edition of Lenin's Collected Works was being completed in thirty volumes: Sobineniia, 30 vols. (Moscow-Leningrad: Gosizdat, 1926–35).

¹³⁵ Despite the secrecy and lies of the regime surrounding Stalin's life, Souvarine managed thorough, judicious research in published sources. He wrote a classic political history of the regime rather than a biography per se, but attained an insight into Stalin's character. Souvarine, Stalin, with a new chapter added to the 1937 French re-edition. See also Lyons, "Stalin, Autocrat of all the Russias." In France, Gallimard had rejected the manuscript. Panné, Souvarine, 222–6. Adam Ulam, and many others, would largely follow Souvarine's template. Ulam, Stalin.

¹³⁶ The breakout to the Long March occurred on Oct. 16, 1934. Radio contact with the Comintern had already been lost the month before. Wilson, Long March; Yang, From Revolution to Politics; Shuyun, Long March; Braun, Kitaiskie zapiski. The Japanese had demolished Chinese Communist organizations in Manchuria by 1934. Lee, Revolutionary Struggle in Manchuria, 231; in Krymov, "Istoricheskoe portrety," 65–6.

¹³⁷ Koshleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 252–3 (Aug. 5, 1935). Trotsky predicted from exile that the gathering would "pass into history as the liquidation congress." Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 46 (Dec. 1935): 12.

¹³⁸ RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 18, l. 110. Kaganovich and Yezhov telegraphed from Moscow that they had spoken to Pyatnitsky and Knorin, both of whom were being moved out of the Comintern. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 523 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 88, l. 9; Aug. 14, 1935), 523 (l. 9; Aug. 15), 523 n1 (f. 17, op. 3, d. 970, l. 42; Aug. 16).

¹³⁹ Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 141–3 (TsA FSB, ASD P-4497, t. 1, s. 24, ASD p-4574, t. 1, l. 31; Baumanis). Kaganovich's profile had risen higher still thanks to the successful metro construction. He would receive a thunderous ovation at the Central Committee plenum in Dec. 1935. After a Dec. 1936 banquet for the wives of engineers, Galina Shtange would write in her diary that Kaganovich was simple, expressive, and handsome, with "above all, enormous serenity and intelligence, then firmness of purpose and an unyielding will; but when he smiles, his basic goodness shows through." Garros et al., Intimacy and Terror, 184.

¹⁴⁰ Pravda, Aug. 21, 1935.

¹⁴¹ Bullitt had conveyed the same warning to Litvinov. FRUS, The Soviet Union, 1933–1939, 111, 131, 156–7, 221–3. U.S. complaints were already frequent about Soviet violations of the no-domestic-interference clause. The Nov. 16, 1933, agreement on noninterference in internal affairs did not specifically mention the Comintern, but the Soviet government had promised "not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group—and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group, or of representatives of any organization or group—which has as an aim the overthrow or the preparation for an overthrow of, or the bringing about by force of a change in, the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States." FRUS, The Soviet Union, 1933–1939, 29. Louis Fischer, who on July 2, 1935, had passed to Bullitt the probable dates of the Comintern Congress, lobbied him not to protest, given the spread of fascism in Europe and the Comintern's intention to take up the question of how to stop it. Fischer, Autobiography, 305; Bennett, Search for Security, 63.

- 142. VII Congress of the Communist International, 83–8, 245–8; Maddux, Years of Estrangement, 41 (citing Bullitt to Washington, Aug. 21, 1935).
- 143. From Washington, Troyanovsky wrote that the Aug. 25 note could be seen as a threat of war. On Aug. 27, Krestinsky handed Bullitt a response (approved by Stalin) maintaining that the Americans had not cited one fact of the supposed interference in their domestic affairs. In a new telegram to Washington, Bullitt additionally recommended expulsion of the Soviet military navy and air attachés. FRUS, The Soviet Union, 1933–1939, 242–3, 249, 250 (Bullitt to Hull); DVP SSSR, XVIII: 474, 476–7; Sevost'ianov, "Obostreniye sovetsko-amerikanskikh otnoshenii," 27 (citing APRE, f. 05, op. 15, pap. 113, d. 126, l. 85, l. 11); Maddux, Years of Estrangement, 149 (citing National Archives, 711.61/541: Bullitt to Hull, Aug. 29, 1935); Bishop, Roosevelt-Litvinov Agreements, 50; Hull, Memoirs, I: 305.
- 144. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 507 (letter to Warsaw, B. G. Podolsky, Sept. 8, 1935).
- 145. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 532–3 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 88, l. 87, 88–91: Aug. 25, 1935), 534–5 (l. 81–3: Aug. 26), 535 (l. 81: Aug. 27), 536–7 (l. 110–110ob.: Aug. 27), 546 (d. 89, l. 4, 5–8: Sept. 2); Khromov, Pro sratsam, 205. Soviet press accounts were restrained: Pravda and Izvestiia, Aug. 28 and Sept. 3, 1935.
- 146. G.N. Sevost'ianov, "Sud'ba soglasheniia Ruzvel't—Litvinov o dolgakh i kreditakh"; Maddux, Years of Estrangement, 27–43; Browder, Origins of Soviet-American Diplomacy, 204–13.
- 147. Dodd and Dodd, Ambassador Dodd's Diary, 277–8 (Nov. 19, 1935). Bullitt would return to Moscow in Feb. 1936, but leave for good in April 1936 without informing Soviet officials that he was not coming back.
- 148. No meetings are recorded in Stalin's office from Aug. 10, 1935, through Nov. 2, 1935. Na prieme, 171.
- 149. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 527 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 89–90: Aug. 19, 1935).
- 150. Kaganovich and others sent a telegram to Sochi with a recommendation to make the funeral broader than just a Comintern event, and to send the ashes to Paris. Stalin agreed, pending the wishes of Barbusse's relatives. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 83, l. 139.
- 151. Barbusse, Stalin. Barbusse's book contained numerous names of people who would turn out to be enemies of the people, and within two years, all copies would be pulled. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 817–8.
- 152. The regime would claim a harvest of 90 million tons, based on inflated yield estimates. Davies et al., Years of Progress, 254–5 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 977: April 29, 1936; RGAE, f. 4372, op. 35, d. 467, l. 85–6), 258; Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, IV: 615 (Oct. 18, 1935); Sochineniia, XIV: 93–9.
- 153. Kaganovich added that "the smartest of the foreign correspondents, Duranty, had written: 'in America they make noise about the Comintern Congress and do not see the most decisive main thing that was published yesterday in the newspapers—the report of the Azov–Black Sea territory about the completion of grain procurements.'" Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 145–6 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 27, d. 93, l. 1–11). See also Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 553–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 743, l. 29–36: Sept. 5).
- 154. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 533–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 743, l. 29–36), 558 (f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 91–4: Sept. 8, 1935), 558n3 (APRE, f. 3, op. 64, d. 663, l. 128–9: Kandelaki to Stalin, Sept. 3).
- 155. "Since Yenukidze does not admit his fall, and does not suffer from humility, he is trying to control the local organizations, assigning them tasks, distributing holidaying comrades among the sanatoriums, giving them their residences," Stalin explained, adding that this had spurred talk Yenukidze had not been sent to Kislovodsk "as punishment but on holiday." Stalin also noted that local comrades Yevdokimov and Sheboldayev had objected to Yenukidze's appointment in Kislovodsk, and that Kalinin and Shkiryatov (head of party control), holidaying in Sochi, agreed. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i kaganovich, 557–8 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 89, l. 71–76). Agranov (Sept. 5, 1935) wrote to Stalin about an anonymous letter sent early in the summer to "the Moscow party organization, Khrushchev personally," which stated of the Kremlin Affair that "the whole plan consists in removing that odious figure who now blocks even the sun." Stalin wrote in "Stalin" next to the words "odious figure." In another passage, which referred to "that cook," he also wrote in "Stalin." The letter blamed Lominadze's suicide (still not publicly announced) on "the new tyrant" and expressed concern that Yenukidze would commit suicide, too. The NKVD checked hundreds of people via handwriting analysis and arrested B. I. Shilikhin, who until 1930 had worked in Kalinin's reception office and in 1935 was a jurist in the metal import office. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 683–6 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 238, l. 86–93), 821n163. The letter to Khrushchev was dated June 4, 1935.

156. The decree was dated Sept. 10–11, 1935, but Yenukidze stalled his relocation from Kislovodsk. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 557–8 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 89, l. 71–76), 558 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 91–4; Sept. 8, 1935); 560 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 89, l. 89; f. 17, op. 3, d. 971, l. 30), 580 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 90, l. 41; Sept. 22), 583 (l. 55; Sept. 23). Yenukidze would be arrested on Feb. 11, 1937. Much later Stalin would state, “I recommended that he be expelled from the party already back then, but they did not believe me, thinking that as a Georgian I am severe toward Georgians. But the Russians, you see, they decided to defend ‘this Georgian.’” RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1120, l. 28–57 (at 46–7; Stalin, June 2, 1937, Main Military Council).

157. Yezhov sought permission to conspire behind Yagoda’s back with Yagoda’s first deputy Agranov to get to the bottom of things. Agranov, it seems, fell ill, so Yezhov schemed with others in the NKVD. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 162–3, 170–1 (citing RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 28, l. 177–81); Pavliukov, Ezhov, 172; Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 91.

158. The politburo decreed that Yezhov take a two-month holiday, and approved hard currency worth 3,000 rubles for him to go abroad for medical treatment with his wife. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 572n5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 743, l. 37–9; d. 755, l. 39; d. f. 17, op. 163, d. 1079, l. 63; op. 3, d. 971, l. 57).

159. Chigirin, Stalin, 83 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1482, l. 51ob.).

160. Valedinskii, “Organizm Stalina vpolne zdorovyi,” 72. The incident is not dated; Shneiderovich saw Stalin in 1934–6.

161. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1479, l. 14–8.

162. Soviet diplomats noted cold, distant attitudes of the French officials with whom they interacted, while in Sept. 1935, a Soviet military mission to France received a favorable reception and were shown the Maginot Line (which was to be operational the next year) but came away unimpressed. Gamelin evaded being drawn into political discussions. Alexander Sedyakin (b. 1893), deputy head of the general staff responsible for Red Army training, concluded that the Soviets had next to nothing to learn from the French. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 505–6 (Potyomkin, Sept. 11, 1935), 659n212 (Hirschfeld to Krestinian, Sept. 11); Castellan, “Reichswehr et armée rouge,” at 254–5; Orlov, “V poiskakh soizuznikov.” France had sharply curtailed military spending beginning in 1932. Jackson, “French Strategy,” 63.

163. Kievskii Krasnoznamennyi, 101–6 (citing RGVA, f. 25580, op. 74, d. 25, l. 12; d. 29, l. 332–3, 373–6); Dubynskii, “Bol’shie kievskie manevry,” 157–69; Eremenko, V nachale voiny, 7–13 (esp. 9 and 13, illustrations); Orlov, “V poiskakh soizuznikov,” 48; Sovetskaia voennaia entsiklopediia, V: 121–2; Grechko et al., Istoriia Vtoroi mirovoi voiny, I: 299; Kokoshin, Armia i politika, 95, 192–6; Ziemke, Red Army, 194; Erickson and Simpkin, Deep Battle.

164. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 311–2 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 37, l. 94–6). Voroshilov studied the assembled foreign reactions. Samuelson, Plans for Stalin’s War Machine, 242n43 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 740, l. 193–208). On the Red Army’s internal assessment and subsequent extended discussion: RGVA, f. 4, op. 15, d. 5, l. 419–23 (Sept. 22, 1935); op. 18, d. 52 (Dec. 8–14, 1935). General Ludvík Krejčí, head of the general staff, led the Czechoslovak delegation.

165. Loizeau’s observations were reported in Le Temps, Sept. 20, 1935. See Loizeau’s meeting with Tukhachevsky: DVP SSSR, XVIII: 518–21 (Sept. 25, 1935); Samuelson, Plans for Stalin’s War Machine, 242n44 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 687, l. 64–74; Sept. 25); Izvestiia, Sept. 27, 1935.

166. Dreifort, “French Popular Front,” 219, citing General Lucien Loizeau, “Une Mission militaire en U.R.S.S.,” Revue des Deux Mondes, Sept. 15, 1935: 275.

167. Habeck, Storm of Steel, 231 (citing RGVA, f. 4, op. 15, d. 5, l. 419–23; Sept. 22; l. 163, 165–6; Dec. 28, 1935).

168. Habeck, Storm of Steel, 231 (citing PA-AA, R31683K, pp. 134–39: report from Hagemeyer, German Consulate in Kiev, “Inhalt: Herbstmanöver der Roten Armee bei Kiew,” Oct. 2, 1935).

169. In his final remarks Hitler repudiated those who said, “The Führer, yes—but the party, that’s a different matter.” “No, gentlemen! The Führer is the party, and the party is the Führer.” Der Parteitag der Freiheit vom 10.-16. September 1935, 287.

170. It also forbade employment of German females under forty-five in Jewish households. Pätzold, Verfolgung, Vertreibung, Vernichtung, 113–4.

- 171. Kershaw, Hitler: 1889–1936, 569–71; Domarus, Hitler: Reden, I: 536–7.
- 172. Goebbels, Kommunismus ohne Maske, 5, 7. See also Bamsted, Goebbels and National Socialist Propaganda.
- 173. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 567 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 89, l. 122: Sept. 15, 1935), 569 (l. 114–7: Sept. 15). In response to Kaganovich's and Molotov's proposed list of Soviet journalists to be sent to Prague at the invitation of Czechoslovakia, Stalin wrote, "It is necessary to include . . . one or two female journalists, one more Ukrainian writer, one or two Belorussian writers; in that connection, it's not required to send editors of newspapers, it's possible to send just popular writers." Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 567 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 89, l. 110–110ob.), 571 (l. 152: Sept. 17), 571 (l. 154: Sept. 17).
- 174. Holmes, Stalin's School, 167 (citing interview of Krasnogliadova, who referred to conversations with Belogorskaya).
- 175. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 53–4 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1553, l. 7–8).
- 176. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 183–4 (Svanidze diary: Nov. 17, 1935), 185 (Dec. 4).
- 177. Leushin, "Staliniada," 105 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 754, l. 112–3).
- 178. The upshot was a drop between 1927 and 1935 in the ratio of dependents to earners from 2.5 to 1.6. Goldman, Women, the State and Revolution, 103. "I like good clothes," Sophie Kienya, a technician of Shaft 82, Metro Construction, was quoted as telling a foreign resident. "At work underground I wear rubber waders, breeches, and tie up my hair in a handkerchief. But at home and on free days I want my dresses to be fashionable and pretty and to fit well. All our girls like pretty clothes. At the theater or at parties when you meet girls from the Metro you would never think that they spent their days working underground . . . Our shoes are now excellent, but our factories should pay more attention to producing elegant buttons, trimmings, bags, gloves." Malnick, Everyday Life, 221.
- 179. Kaganovich assured Stalin that "many workers made a calculation and themselves pointed out that, since previously they were buying supplementary meat and butter at markets, now they were gaining. Now, it seems, we will need to pay attention to shops and organizing sales." Davies et al., Years of Progress, 174–6; Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 589–90 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 743, l. 40–4: Sept. 26, 1935). See also Davies and Khlevniuk, "Otmena kartochnoi sistemy v SSSR," 127.
- 180. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 34.
- 181. Osokina, Ienarkhiia potrebleniia; Osokina, Za fasadom; Hessler, Social History of Soviet Trade; Randall, Soviet Dream World.
- 182. "Moscow restaurants left nothing to be desired," wrote Juri Jelagin, a violinist at the Vakhtangov Theater, of an evening meal that, with entertainment, could easily cost two weeks of a worker's salary. "Magnificent, live Volga sturgeons swam in a pool in the center of the dining room at the Metropol on Theater Square. The patrons could select the fish they wanted in the clear water." Ziegler's Czech jazz band played at the Metropol and Tsafman's and Utyosov's bands at the National, while gypsies sang at the Prague on the Arbat. Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 136–8. Charles Thayer, the U.S. embassy official, recalled, "a good dinner at the Metropol or the Medved Restaurant was cheap enough." Thayer, Bears in the Caviar, 106.
- 183. Martelli, Italy Against the World; Hardie, Abyssinian Crisis; Robertson, Mussolini as Empire Builder; Strang, Collision of Empires. See also Durand, Crazy Campaign.
- 184. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 545 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 89, l. 2–2ob.: Sept. 2, 1935). The Abyssinian invasion also did not inhibit Soviet participation in Milan's first international air show (Oct. 12–28, 1935), where the Soviets exhibited their well-designed Il-15 biplane, which impressed as best in show. Their Il-16, a low-wing cantilever monoplane, was then the fastest fighter in the world, but the international audience dismissed its performance data as too good to be true. I Salone Internazionale Aeronautico; Ziemke, Red Army, 193. The story would make the rounds that Stalin mischievously ordered one of his NKVD attendants to get Ras Kasa—a tribal leader in the resistance to Italian forces—on the phone, and when the operative returned distraught, unable to connect to the mountain Ethiopian, Stalin was said to have replied, "And you are still working in security?" Gromyko, Memoirs, 103 (no citation).
- 185. The USSR had lost to Mexico by a single vote. Stalin added that "now you couldn't chase Litvinov from the assembly presidium with a broom." Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 561–2 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 89, l. 92–3: Sept. 11, 1935), 562–3 (l. 93: Sept. 11), 563 (l. 103: Sept. 12), 563–4 (l. 99–102: Sept. 12). See also DVP SSSR, XVIII:

523–4 (telegram to Litvinov, Oct. 4, 1935), 525–6 (Potomykin speech Oct. 10), 661 (Potomykin telegram, Oct. 11); Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 329–30 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 18, l. 173), 330 (l. 175), 330–1 (l. 178), 332 (l. 187), 333 (op. 162, d. 19, l. 14), 334 (l. 32), 337–8 (d. 20, l. 4, 8); and Walters, History of the League of Nations, I: 358–9. Stalin allowed Litvinov to support sanctions against Italy, but the politburo instructed him to “follow an independent Soviet line . . . and avoid anything that could be interpreted as a subordination of our line to the position of Britain.” Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 331 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 18, l. 178; Oct. 15, 1935).

186. DGFP series C, IV: 778–9 (Oct. 29, 1935).

187. Murin, Stalin v ob”iatiakh, 183 (Svanidze diary: Nov. 17, 1935).

188. She was either 75 or 77 (Keke’s birth year remains uncertain because of a possible effort to increase her age at marriage). Stalin had visited her, briefly, in 1921 and in 1927.

189. Murin, Stalin v ob”iatiakh, 16–7 (l. 45–6; March 24, 1934). “I. V. profoundly suffered from the loss of his wife and friend,” Vlasik would recall. Loginov, Teni Stalina, 97. Artyom recalled an incident when Vasily told his father that he and his buddies had seen old women crossing themselves and praying, and how they threw a firecracker at their feet. Stalin erupted: “Why, why did you do that? Vasily: “Why were they praying?” Stalin: “Do you respect grandmother? Do you love her? She prays. Because she knows something that you do not know!” Sergeev and Glushik, Besedy o Staline, 89–96; Moskovskii komсомоlet, Aug. 3, 2004.

190. Sukharev, “Litsedeistvo,” 106 (citing PA IIP pri TsK KP Gruzii, f. 8, op. 1, d. 17, l. 20, 24; G. V. Khachapuridze, 54).

191. A visiting Moscow inspector had just approved the plans. Sokolov, Beriia, 97–8 (Sept. 1935).

192. Stalin, in a letter to his mother (June 11, 1935), mentioned she was ill (“Do not be afraid of illness, get strong, it shall pass”). Murin, Stalin v ob”iatiakh, 18 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1549, l. 55–6). Beria had had a journalist transcribe and edit what were purported to be Keke’s “memoirs,” which he evidently intended to use to flatter Stalin. (Instead, they were buried in the Georgian party archive.) The interviews took place on Aug. 23, 25, and 27, 1935. Dzhugashvili, Moi syn Iosif Stalin. See also the hearsay about Stalin in Georgia at this time: Blagoveshchenskii, “V gostiakh u P. A. Sharii,” 472n28.

193. The same source has Stalin saying, “Mama, do you remember our tsar? Well, I’m something like the tsar.” “You’d have done better to become a priest,” Keke is said to have replied. Radzinsky, Stalin, 24 (recollections of N. Kipshidze, a doctor who treated Keke, quoted without citation).

194. On the supposed lingering influence of Georgian literary styles on Stalin, see Vaiskopf, Pistael’ Stalin, 130–1, 181–98.

195. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 92, l. 22–3.

196. Dorofeev, “Mat.” One observer in the same issue reminisced that “whoever has met comrade Stalin even just once, will never forget his modesty, wisdom, and ability to size up events quickly and offer correct, clear directives, will never forget his sagacity, his ability to cultivate in a person a lifelong selfless dedication to the cause of the working class, implacability against all enemies of the revolution.” Here was a self-portrait in another’s words.

197. “Beseda s mater’iu tovarishcha Stalina,” Pravda, Oct. 27, 1935; Zaria vostoka (Oct. 28).

198. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 92, L82.

199. DGFP series C, IV: 482–3 (July 26, 1935), 493–6 (July 27), 507–10 (July 30), 596–8 (Aug. 29), 618–20 (Sept. 5), 825–9 (Nov. 18), 833–5 (Nov. 19), 835–7 (Nov. 19), 841–2 (Nov. 20), 847–9 (Nov. 22), 849–51 (Nov. 23), 859–62 (Nov. 27), 866–8 (Nov. 30), 872–4 (Dec. 8), 925–6 (Dec. 18). The French Assembly would ratify the pact with the USSR on Feb. 27, 1936 (353 votes to 164); the Congress of Soviets would do so on March 8, 1936.

200. DGFP series C, IV: 778–9 (Oct. 28, 1935), 783–4 (Nov. 1), 811–3 (Nov. 11, 1935); Na prieme, 171; Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 221–2. Schacht and Kandelaki haggled over how much of existing debts the Soviets needed to pay in gold and hard currency.

201. Functionaries had dug out the old tsarist emblems and made sketches for Soviet versions. Stalin also allowed the “staff” to become once again the “general staff.” Solov’ev, “Tetrady krasnogo professora, 1912–1941 gg.” IV: 183; Erickson, Soviet High Command, 366–403, 445–6; Zaloga, “Soviet Tank Operations,” note 2.

202. The decree creating the marshal rank was issued on Sept. 22, 1935, and the rank was ceremoniously conferred on Nov. 20; Pravda's account (the next day) sought to smother the whiff of tsarism: "Kliment Voroshilov is a proletarian to the marrow, a Bolshevik in every movement, a theoretician and practitioner of the military art, a cavalryman, a sharpshooter, one of the best orators in the party, a thoughtful and hardworking organizer of the immense defense machine."

203. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 51–4.

204. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 822n166.

205. By fall 1935, 16,000 people had received a USSR state medal, such as the Order of Lenin or Order of the Red Banner. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 81n6 (citing GARF, f. R-3316, op. 65, d. 144, l. 5). The regime would introduce a "director's fund" in 1936 for payment of "bonuses."

206. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 183 (Svanidze diary: Nov. 17, 1935).

207. Yevgeny was born Jan. 10, 1936. At some point Yakov acknowledged him and his last name was changed from Golyshv to Jughashvili. Golyshv received money from the Jughashvili household for the boy.

208. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 183–4 (Svanidze diary: Nov. 17, 1935).

209. Norm-busters appeared in automobiles (Alexander Busygin), machine tools (I. I. Gudov), textiles (Yevdokiya and Maria Vinogradov), and the Gulag, but it was Stakhanov's name that got affixed to the "movement." Siegelbaum, Stakhanovism; Benvenuti, "Stakhanovism and Stalinism"; Davies and Khlevniuk, "Stakhanovism"; Davies et al., Years of Progress, 164–9; Kвашonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 310–1 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 29, d. 460, l. 2–3; Orjonikidze to Sarkisov, Sept. 6, 1935); Goriaeva, "Veitkaia kniga dnia," 301 (RGAKFD, no. Sh-192, Vr. Zv. 02:00).

210. Soldatenkov, Politicheskie i npravstvennye posledstviia, 82–8 (citing TsGAIPD StP, f. 24, op. 2, d. 1190, l. 6: Zhdanov, April 5, 1936).

211. In 1937, the mine's party organizer, Konstantin Petrov (b. 1908), would replace the mine boss, Iosif Zaplavy, who ended up in Norilsk, a Gulag site.

212. Mikoyan advised that "if one is to study by the capitalists, then in the first instance it is necessary to study by the Americans." Pervoe soveshchanie rabochikh; Mikoian, V polose velikogo pod"ema, 15.

213. Pravda, Nov. 22, 1935; Sobineniia, XIV: 79–102 (at 89–91).

214. Stakhanov made the cover of Time on Dec. 16, 1935. Stalin also pushed through a campaign against managers' "sabotage" in late 1935, which, like Stakhanovism, he largely abandoned by spring 1936. See also Stakhanov, Rasskaz o moei zhizni.

215. Raskol'nikov, O vremeni i o sebe, 476–86. Raskolnikov's acquaintances were phoning with congratulations, having somehow heard news of Stalin's treatment of him. He and Molotov had once studied together at the St. Petersburg Polytechnic and worked together at Pravda before the revolution. Bulgaria was Raskolnikov's fourth ambassadorship. In between, he had chaired the state repertory committee, which oversaw live theater, and himself tried his hand at writing plays.

216. Raskolnikov mentions that he encountered Mikhail Koltsov in the reception area; in fact, Koltsov was received by Stalin just before Raskolnikov. Raskol'nikov, O vremeni i o sebe, 486–8; Na prieme, 174–5.

217. Roediger (deputy head of the German foreign ministry's Eastern Department) told Bessonov that "except for the ideological hostility between Germany and the USSR there are no differences and we certainly welcome expansion of economic relations." On Dec. 12, Hermann Göring told Bessonov that War Minister Blomberg and Schacht had "agreed a readiness to supply the USSR with any military equipment, including the most advanced," under a new credit, which Bessonov continued to view as the key to unlocking political rapprochement, rather than as entirely separate, the way the Germans treated it. Abramov, "Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki," 147 (citing AVP RF, f. 082, op. 18, pap. 81, d. 7, l. 360–5); DGFP, series C, IV: 870–2 (Dec. 4, 1935), 897–9 (Dec. 10), 931–3 (Dec. 21). See also Nekrich, 1941, 23; and Fischer, Russia's Road, 240. Litvinov wrote to Surits (Dec. 19, 1935) that he was skeptical of any movement on the German side, while Krestinsky wrote to Surits (Jan. 11, 1936), "it seems to me we shall reach agreement with the Germans on this 500-million credit. As for the question of the Germans changing their political position in relation to us, there has been no indication of any changes in this direction neither in Berlin nor in Moscow nor any other points on the planet." DVP SSSR, XVIII: 595–7, XIX: 25–6.

218. DGFP, series C, III: 306–9 (Aug. 10, 1934), 556–8 (Nov. 1); DBFP, 2nd series, VI: 883 (July 31). The British were still waiting for a German response to the Feb. 1935 Anglo-French proposals; Hitler claimed he had already responded. Orme Sargent and Wigram had written a long memorandum (Nov. 21, 1935) rejecting both inaction toward and encirclement of Germany, and concluding that “a policy of coming to terms with Germany in Western Europe might enable Britain and France to moderate the development of German aims in the Centre and East.” Medlicott, Britain and Germany, 19 (citing C7752/55/18 FO 371/18851).

219. The German notetaker has Hitler characterizing Phipps’s suggestion for engagement as analogous to “having plague germs shut up in a cupboard and then believing that one could make them less dangerous by opening the door and letting the germs loose on mankind.” DBFP, 2nd series, XV: 488–93 (Phipps to Hoare, Dec. 16, 1935). DGFP, series C, IV: 917–9 (Neurath account, Dec. 14). Hitler told a ministerial conference after meeting Phipps that he could not agree to arms limitations with Britain and France so long as the Soviet Union freely armed, or take part in any Western European treaty system in which the Soviet Union took part. DGFP, series C, IV: 913–4.

220. The renaming was official on Dec. 17, 1935. A writers’ union plenum dedicated to poetry had been planned for Dec. 1935 in Minsk but was postponed to February 1936, likely in connection with Stalin’s sudden elevation of Mayakovsky. Fleishman, Boris Pasternak, 293.

221. Stalin added: “I am ready if my help is needed.” Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 270–2 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 729). Back at the writers’ congress the previous year, Stetsky had said, “I also don’t know of any decisions of the party and government about the canonization of Mayakovsky.” Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s’ezd sovetkikh pisatelei, 614.

222. V. A. Katanian would recall that Mekhlis, editor of Pravda, “did not evince any particular enthusiasm. On the literary page of Pravda, dedicated to Mayakovsky, which appeared a few days later (Dec. 5), two sentences from that resolution, which soon gained worldwide fame, were printed with a mistake. Instead of ‘the best and most talented’ it read ‘the best and talented.’” Pravda issued a correction, however (Dec. 17). Katanian, “Ne tol’ko vospominaniia,” 224–5.

223. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 275 (APRF, f. [4]5, op. 1, d. 788, l. 107–110ob.). An affirmation of Stalin’s praise was hastily arranged in the form of a letter, in the name of several Soviet poets then on a trip to Paris, and published in Moscow (it was written by Aragon, whose name was left off). “Sovetskie poety v Parizhe,” Literaturnaia gazeta, Dec. 9, 1935; Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 17–8 (RGASPI, f. 88, op. 1, d. 512, l. 1).

224. Seishirō Itagaki, who as Kwantung Army intelligence chief had helped stage the Mukden incident to seize Manchuria and was promoted to Kwantung vice chief of staff, “urged Japanese predominance in Inner Mongolia, to deny the USSR a platform (like it enjoyed in Xinjiang) and to serve as a springboard for conquest of Outer Mongolia, which would allow takeover of the Soviet Far East almost without fighting.” Haslam, Threat from the East, 48–9 (citing Hoover Institution Archives, International Military Tribunal, the Far East Documents, 7830–33; prosecution document no. 1466, exhibit no. 761–A). Stalin decided to support Sheng, and NKVD operatives brought the leader of the anti-Sheng Muslim rebellion, General Ma Zhingying, to the Soviet Union, both to deflate the rebellion and for insurance. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 216–8; Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 594–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 90, l. 119, Oct. 1, 1935). On further developments, see Milward, Eurasian Crossroads, 200ff; and Ledovskii, SSSR i Stalin v sud’ba Kitaia, 190–1.

225. Baabar, Twentieth-Century Mongolia, 338–9. The Soviet Union continued to fudge the recognition question, so as not to anger Chiang Kai-shek’s government (which claimed “Outer” Mongolia as part of China), but Japan quietly hinted at recognizing Mongolia’s independence. In late Nov. 1935, the Mongols, following Soviet orders, had broken off a months-long Mongolia-Manchukuo conference to regulate their disputed border, citing Manchukuo’s demands for diplomatic recognition. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 649–50n172; Pravda, Nov. 21, 1935.

226. Chang and Halliday, Mao, 139.

227. Haslam, Threat from the East, 61–5; DVP SSSR, XVIII: 587–8 (Dec. 9, 1935), 601–3 (Dec. 28). In Jan. 1936, the Soviet Union and Xinjiang signed an agreement on military and economic aid that excluded access to “third powers.” Hasiotis, Soviet Political, Economic, and Military Involvement, 100.

228. Haslam, Threat from the East, 50 (citing FRUS, 489–90: Henderson in Moscow to Hull in Washington, Dec. 14, 1935). The follow-up border incident took place on Dec. 19.

229. The Soviet foreign trade commissariat had sent Choibalsan 20 Gorky Factory (GAZ) automobiles, which the Moscow loyalist awarded as patronage to other Mongol ministers. Genden had felt constrained to send a lengthy report to Stalin, Molotov, and Voroshilov on implementation of Stalin's recommendations, but also noted that 96.4 percent of Mongolia's 731,686 people were illiterate, and expressed concern about Japanese war provocations. RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 16, l. 1–33 (Oct. 14, 1935).

230. Baabar, Twentieth-Century Mongolia, 344–6.

231. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 185–6 (Svanidze diary: Dec. 26, 1935), 189. Kun, Stalin, 227. The polar explorer Belyakov witnessed an evening of dancing at Stalin's Black Sea dacha: "He played many records, mostly Georgian folk songs. He explained to us that Georgians sing on their way to the market." RGASPI, f. 558, op. 4, d. 668.

232. As of July 1935, the party had 1.66 million full members and 681,245 candidates. By the time the exchange process was all done, about a quarter million party cards would be confiscated. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 561, l. 127–64; Khlevniuk, 1937–i, 56–7. Yezhov's report was published: Pravda, Dec. 26, 1935; Partinoe stroitel'stvo, 1936, no. 2: 9–23. According to the NKVD date, as of Oct. 20, 1935, 255 "spies" had been expelled from the party, but the NKVD of Eastern Siberia and the Soviet Far East—the front line with Japan—together had found only one spy in the party ranks. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 822–3n169 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 3, l. 131–4), 724–31 (op. 3, d. 62, l. 129–44).

233. Beria followed him to the dais, boasted that the South Caucasus NKVD had arrested 1,020 enemies through this month, and congratulated himself. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 561, l. 143, 146, 162.

234. Damage of machinery while operating it as well as the production or supply of poor quality goods became crimes of sabotage too. Andreyev gave the main report, for which he had been copiously supplied with NKVD materials on "sabotage" of the Stakhanovite movement. Other speakers cited cases of anti-Stakhanovite "sabotage" in their regions. Davies et al., Years of Progress, 171–2 (citing RGASPI, f. 73, op. 1, d. 141, l. 205; f. 17, op. 2, d. 561, l. 32; Ryndin); Pravda, December 29, 1935.

235. Pravda, Dec. 27, 1935. Yagoda reported an expansion in Polish agents crossing Soviet borders in pursuit of information on weapons depots and other secrets. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 712–4 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 248, l. 80–4; Dec. 27, 1935).

236. Harrison and Davies, "Soviet Military-Economic Effort," 370, citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 19, l. 16; Dec. 15, 1935; GARE, f. 5446, op. 57, d. 38; Dec. 16, 372; Cooper, "Defence Production," 35.

237. The Mongols complained that it was very difficult to struggle against the lamas "when some officials believe in and pray to god." RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 17, l. 1–5.

238. RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 17, l. 6–8.

239. Baabar, Twentieth-Century Mongolia, 347–8 (citing the eyewitness Luvsansharev, a secretary of the Mongolian Central Committee, speaking at the 2nd plenum [March 11–20, 1936], in connection with Genden's removal). See also Dashpürev and Soni, Reign of Terror, 34. Another version has Genden chasing Stalin around the table, yanking his pipe out of his mouth, and dashing it to the floor. Sandag and Kendall, Poisoned Arrows, 77.

240. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 186 (Svanidze diary: Dec. 7, 1936: erroneous dating, more likely Jan. 7).

241. Molotov himself said it was "up to the German government to draw practical conclusions." Izvestia, Jan. 12, 1936.

242. DGFP series C, IV: 967–72 (Jan. 6, 1936).

243. The foreign office forwarded the report to Chilton in Moscow for comment. The British in Moscow were skeptical. Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 110 (citing DBFP/Russia Correspondence, F.P. 371/19460, 142–8; Dec. 7, 1935; F.P. 371/20346, 150–2; Jan. 29, 1936).

244. Bezemenskii, Gitler i Stalin, 98, 100–1; Brügel, Stalin und Hitler, 38. Hitler soon forbade new sales of military technology to the Soviets. DGFP series C, IV: 1033 (Jan. 24, 1936). Schacht omitted any mention of Kandelaki or the negotiations in his memoir. Schacht, My First Seventy-Six Years.

245. It is not out of the question that the NKVD tasked the Swiss-born Olberg, who had been expelled from the German Communist party in 1932 for Trotskyism, with infiltrating Trotskyite circles in Europe, then decided he needed to serve another purpose. On Olberg, see Chase, Enemies within the Gates?, 134 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 175, d.

105, l. 9). Vyshinsky wrote to Stalin and Molotov (Jan. 8) of a separate case of a “Trotskyite group” just turned over to the courts with supposed plans for a “terrorist” act against the dictator Stalin on Red Square back during the Revolution Day parade, while Yagoda and Vyshinsky together wrote to him (Jan. 11, 1936) about the liquidation of a Zinovievite organization of thirty-four people, asking how should they be tried. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 715–6 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 230, l. 65–65ob.), 716–20 (l. 68–76), 723 (l. 64).

246. Jansen and Petrov, Stalin's Loyal Executioner, 46–8.

247. Baabar, Twentieth-Century Mongolia, 346–7. On the evening of Jan. 7, 1936, Stalin had received the Mongols again, in Molotov's office, and repeated his demands. Stomonyakov summarized the discussion about the lamas to the Soviet envoy in Mongolia (Tairov), noting, “comrade Stalin said that in a difficult moment one does not liberate criminals but punishes them or holds them under lock and key, like a hostage.” RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 18, l. 1–9; d. 19, l. 1–8; Jan. 10. On Jan. 29, a Manchukuo border company killed its Japanese officers and successfully defected to the Soviet Union. The next day, two Japanese companies crossed the Soviet border in belated pursuit, killing three Soviet border guards and suffering dozens of casualties in a gun battle. They retreated. Shishov, Rossia i Iaponiia, 424–68; Erickson, Soviet High Command, 414. In Jan. and Feb. 1936, the politburo authorized the building of new roads, petrol stations, aircraft and artillery repair installations, shipbuilding plants, oil storage facilities, and a refinery capable of making airplane fuel in the Soviet Far East. Davies et al., Years of Progress, 278 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 19, l. 27–9; Jan. 11, 1936, 73–5, 93–7; Feb. 18, 81–2).

248. Dawson, “Convenient Medical Death,” 1445; Rose, King George V.

249. Castellan, “Reichswehr et Armée Rouge,” 244. Göring would tell the Poles in February that “Marshal Tukhachevsky, when on his way through Germany, had not been received, although he had clearly wanted to get in touch with military circles.” DGFP, series C, IV: 1201–2 (Feb. 26, 1936).

250. In late Jan., Uborevičius traveled via Warsaw to Paris, ostensibly to link up with Tukhachevsky, and met an aide to the German military attaché in Poland, from whom he requested a meeting on his return from Paris with an authoritative German military official such as War Minister Blomberg. McMurry, Deutschland und die Sowjetunion, 320–1.

251. Tukhachevsky had never accepted German officers' professions of friendship at face value. “I spoke especially long with Tukhachevsky,” Ambassador Dirksen had written to a friend (Oct. 17, 1931). “He is far from the direct and sympathetic person who speaks openly in support of a German orientation, as does Uborevičius.” In 1933, Tukhachevsky did profess profound friendship, to rescue the relationship. D'iakov and Bushueva, Fashistkii mekh kovalsia v SSSR, 121; Bushueva and D'iakov, “Reikhsver i soveti, tainyi soiuз,” 183 (no citation).

252. Castellan, “Reichswehr et armée rouge,” 217–8 (citing Köstring); Gamelin, Servir, II: 196; Erickson, Soviet High Command, 412. The strongly anti-German French journalist Geneviève Tabouis, who was present at a farewell banquet at the Soviet embassy, would later allege that Tukhachevsky, while entertaining Édouard Herriot, the French foreign minister Joseph Paul-Boncour, and the Romanian foreign minister Nicolae Titulescu, among others, had rhapsodized about Nazi Germany (“They are already invincible, Madame Tabouis”). Ambassador Potyomkin was present but appears to have reported nothing of the kind to Litvinov. Neither did French diplomatic sources. Tabouis, They Called Me Cassandra, 257; Erickson, Soviet High Command, 413. Tukhachevsky, seeking rubber-stamp approval for the military budget at the Central Executive Committee (Jan. 15, 1936), had stressed that Germany could attack the USSR even without a common border, as it had attacked France—smashing through Belgium—in 1914. Tukhachevskii, Zadachi oborony SSSR, 6, 14–5.

253. Sipols, “SSSR i problema mira,” 50–1 (citing PRO 418/81: 55, 78–79; Jan. 11, 1936). Maisky did not desist: DVP SSSR, XIX: 62–4 (Feb. 5, 1936), 206–11 (April 2).

254. Buryat-Mongol households individually held between twenty and seventy cattle. “The collective farmers' relation to labor has changed fundamentally,” the leaders' report boasted, praising the expansion of skilled personnel, schools, and theaters. Gatagova et al., TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i natsional'nyi vopros, II: 164–6 (RGASPI, f. 78, op. 1, d. 585, l. 25–8; D. Dorzhiev, Council of People's Commissars, M. Yerbanov, party secretary).

255. The Mongol-Buryat pageant had been preceded by collective farmers of Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, and Kara-Kalpak, when Stalin, Molotov, and Kaganovich were photographed in the national costumes, including head covering, for the first time. At a Dec. 4, 1935, Kremlin reception for forty-three Tajik and thirty-three Turkmen collective farmers in national dress, honored for the cotton harvest, a ten-year-old girl, Mamlakat Nakhangova, presented Stalin with the Tajik translation of his Questions of Leninism, and a photograph was taken of her in her head shawl, her arm around a seated Stalin's shoulder. Pravda, Dec. 6, 1935; Kun, Stalin, 220–1. See also Levushin, "Dokumenty VKP (b) kak istochnik po istorii istoricheskoi nauki," 386–9; Nevezhin, Zastol'nye, 247–72; and RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 4314, l. 2–4. Whereas in Pravda's coverage of the First All-Union Congress of Collective Farm Shock Workers, one-third of the photographs were of non-Russians, by the second gathering two years later in 1935, the ratio was reversed: Central Asians, Ukrainians, and Belorussians accounted for two-thirds of the photographs and illustrations. Brooks, "Thank You, Comrade Stalin!" 75.

256. "Comrades, there is one thing more valuable than cotton—that is the friendship of the peoples of our country," Stalin was quoted as remarking during the Tajik-Turkmen reception. The tsarist legacy, "a savage, wolf-like policy," had been overcome. "While this friendship lives and flourishes, we are afraid of no one, neither internal nor external enemies. You can have no doubt about this, comrades. (Stormy applause, all present stand and shout, 'Stalin, Hurrah!')." "Rech' tovarishcha Stalina na soveshchanií peredovykh kolkhoznikov i kolkhoznits Tadzhikistana i Turkménistana," Pravda, Dec. 5, 1935; Sochineniia (Hoover), XIV: 113–5. Molotov's speeches at the many Kremlin national receptions were published as a pamphlet: Velikaia družba narodov SSSR (Moscow: Partizdat, 1936).

257. Pravda, Dec. 21 and 31, 1935; Jan. 24 and 30, 1936.

258. This was not his first photograph with children, a shift first visible in schoolbooks for children, which had rendered Stalin overtly fatherly. Rasskazy o Staline. Unlike the fatherly tsars, Stalin was called otets, not batushka.

259. Pravda, Aug. 3, 1935 (credited to Vlasik). Stalin visited a children's home in Moscow as well. Heizer, "Cult of Stalin," 169; Plamper, Stalin Cult, 44; Plamper, "Georgian Koba or Soviet 'Father of Peoples,'" 131. Maria Osten wrote to Stalin requesting permission to republish the photograph in her book Hubert in Wonderland, about adopting a son in the Saarland under the Nazis and bringing him to the USSR. "This would be such a pleasure for all little grown-up readers of my book in the USSR and the entire world!" she wrote. Stalin acceded ("I agree"). RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 781, l. 126.

260. Kun, Stalin, 316.

261. During the first Five-Year Plan images of modernity in the borderlands—railroads, factories, workers—had predominated, but in the 1920s, even the most modern architects, who generally eschewed any hint of ornamentation, when outside Russia proper had chosen to incorporate folkloric "national" flourishes in public buildings, such as Moisei Ginzburg's administrative center in Alma-Ata or others in Baku. Bliznakov, "International Modernism," 112–30. Ginzburg had lived in Crimea and studied Tatar art there. On females and backwardness, as well as nurturing, see Stites, Russian Popular Culture, 83–4; and Igmen, Speaking Soviet, 66.

262. The RSFSR was the only union republic without its own Communist party, and although it had state institutions, they often overlapped with those of the USSR (Kalinin was the head of both the RSFSR and the USSR central executive committees of the Soviet). Although there had been some institutions for ethnic Ukrainians and ethnic Belorussians in the RSFSR, these were abolished or allowed to lapse, which seems to have further spurred some ethnic Ukrainians and Belorussians in the RSFSR to identify as ethnic Russians. Martin, Affirmative Action Empire, 403–6.

263. Back on Dec. 15, 1925, at a central Committee plenum, Stalin had lauded the Russians as "the most industrial, the most active, and the most Soviet of all nations in our country," a statement partly in response to unexpected resistance to the alteration of the party's name from all-Russian to all-Union, but also reflecting deep conviction. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 205, l. 5. In his furious letter (Dec. 12, 1930) to Bedny over the latter's mocking Russians warming themselves on stoves, Stalin had called the Russian working class "the advanced guard of Soviet workers, its acknowledged leaders, having conducted a more revolutionary policy and activist politics than any other proletariat of the world could dream of." On July 6, 1933, at one of his Moscow dachas, in the presence of the portraitists Yevgeny Katsman and Isaak Brodsky, Stalin had toasted Russians as "the boldest Soviet nation, which achieved the socialist revolution before others." Nevezhin, Zastol'nye, 42 (RGALI, f. 2368, op. 2, d. 36, l. 16). For the impressions of one of the artists ("What a colossal man! To me he seems as immense and beautiful as nature"), see Plamper, Stalin Cult, 92 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 1, d. 292, l. 92–92ob.; July 15, 1933).

264. Ryutin had derided Stalin's regime as "national Bolshevism," a designation originated in a positive sense by the anti-Marxist nationalist émigré Nikolai Ustryalov (b. 1890). "Platforma 'Soiuza marksistov-lenintsev' ('Gruppa Riutina')." (1990, no. 9), 76.

265. The demolition had taken place on Dec. 5, 1931. Conceived in the wake of the defeat of Napoleon by Alexander I, it had been consecrated in 1883 on the day Alexander III had been crowned. Its valuable gold (half a ton from the cupola alone) was removed before demolition, whereas its marble went into the Moscow metro construction. Once the rubble was cleared, the crater was supposed to see erection of a grandiose Palace of Soviets designed by Boris Yofan, who sketched a neoclassical stepped colossus of porphyry, marble, and jasper, which aimed to be taller than the Eiffel Tower, at more than 1,300 feet, topped by a 260-foot statue of Lenin, making it resemble a pedestal. Construction of even the foundation was delayed by the grandiosity, and would finally commence in 1937, with the foundation completed in 1939, but nothing else after that. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 827, l. 9 (May 25, 1931); d. 828, l. 17 (June 5); Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 158 (RGASPI, f. 667, op. 1, d. 17, l. 95–7; Molotov to Yenukidze, Aug. 24, 1931); Lebedeva, "O snose khrama Khrista Spasitelia," 14; Iofan, "Dvorets s'ezdov SSSR." See also Tarkhanov and Kavtaradze, Architecture of the Stalin Era; Paperny, Architecture in the Age of Stalin. Before the revolution, Moscow counted 460 Orthodox churches; already by Jan. 1, 1933, this stood at perhaps 100.

266. Arfon Rees correctly noted that "the significant aspect of Stalinist ideology was not the extent to which it adjusted to a nationalist perspective . . . but the extent to which . . . a Marxist-Leninist perspective, modified over time, remained the dominant ideology." Rees, "Stalin and Russian Nationalism," 102–3. Carr wrongly called Russian nationalism "the only political creed which moved [Stalin] at all deeply." Carr, Russian Revolution, 170.

267. "Neizmennyi drug"—eto obiazvaet . . . : pis'ma O. I. Sobalevoi-Mikhail'tsevoi," 113 (APRF, f. 345, op. 34, l. d. 2731118, l. 7149; Dec. 10, 1935); Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 279–80. The writers' union was a trade union and its members wrote to management seeking all manner of material help. Even some of the published writers said they could not make a living and requested additional employment (as editors or reviewers). Osip Mandelstam wrote from internal exile in 1936 to the poet and union management official Nikolai Tikhonov, "I am seriously ill, abandoned by everyone and destitute . . . I cannot translate either, because I have become very weak, and even the worry about my verse, which I cannot lay aside, is costing me palpitations." Antipina, Povednevnaia zhizn', 12–3 (citing RGALI, f. 631, op. 15, d. 637, l. 136), 13–21.

268. Golubev, "Esli mir obrushitsia na nashu Respubliku," 64 (citing TsAODM, f. 3, op. 50, d. 75, l. 38).

269. The censor organ was organized into four sectors: political-economic, artistic, agricultural, and regional (or provincial). In late 1935, according to a party commission probe, the political-economic sector did not have even a single economist, and the artistic sector lacked anyone with specialized arts training. "And if the situation with the censor in the center is blatantly unsatisfactory," the commission report concluded, "in locales, and especially in the counties, it is utterly catastrophic." Zhuravlev, Obshchestvo i vlast', 114–6. Locally, almost every member of the censor staff had to work other jobs concurrently.

270. Shcherbakov composed a long analysis of the situation in literature (Jan. 2, 1936), professing optimism about recent and forthcoming literary works, but complaining that his deputy Stavsky was going behind his back (something Stalin encouraged). Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 284–8 (RGASPI, f. 88, op. 1, d. 474, l. 1–8). Shcherbakov had sent two memoranda to Stalin, Kaganovich, and Yezhov about a struggle to the death of "two camps" inside the underperforming Moscow Art Theater, "'Priniat' srochnnye mery k ozdorovleniiu": 122–3 (APRF, f. 3, op. 35, d. 24, l. 10–1; Aug. 3, 1935), 125–6 (l. 18–21; Sept. 17), 131–2 (l. 33–4); Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 265–6, 267–9, 288–9, 327–31 (APRF, f. 3, op. 35, d. 24, l. 45–51; Oct. 11, 1936).

271. The committee was approved on Dec. 16, 1935, and Kerzhentsev named on Jan. 17, 1936. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 281 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 973, l. 3); Pravda, Jan. 18, 1936. See also Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 69 (RGASPI, f. 77, op. 1, d. 557, l. 1). Kerzhentsev must have been glad to escape radio, where the NKVD had turned up "anti-Soviet class alien elements, climbers, and hacks." Gorjaeva, Radio Rossii, 158–9 (APRF, f. 3, op. 35, d. 14, l. 44–60, 70–1; May 9, 1935); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 588, l. 9–10. In 1937, Stalin would subordinate the Bolshoi, Maly, Moscow Art Theater, Vakhtangov State Theater, Kirov ballet, and others to the committee. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 588, l. 12.

272. Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 77–9 (RGALI, f. 962, op. 10, d. 13, l. 12–3). Gorky had reached his wit's end with Shcherbakov ("Literature for him is alien, a secondary matter") and the bureaucratic machinations in the writers' union. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 276–8 (RGASPI, f. 73, op. 2, d. 44, l. 17–20; Dec. 8, 1935); Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 413–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 720, l. 101–6). In Sept. 1936, Shcherbakov would be sent back to Leningrad as second secretary. He was replaced at the writers' union by Stavsky.

273. Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 88–112. Samosud's production of Shostakovich's Lady MacBeth had premiered in Moscow at the Bolshoi affiliate on Dec. 26, 1935, but Stalin had not attended. Soviet press accounts had been ecstatic. A third festival production, Bright Stream, also elicited superlatives; Stalin did not see that one either before it had closed. On Jan. 16, 1936—the same day as the government decree appointing Kerzhentsev to the new committee—Stalin, in the company of Kerzhentsev, Molotov, and others, returned for the final performance of Quiet Flows the Don. Again he showed himself applauding in the imperial box. Stravinsky would deem the opera Lady MacBeth "lamentably provincial." Pravda criticized its sympathetic portrait of the murderess. Taruskin, "Opera and the Dictator," 34–40.

274. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 307–8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 976, l. 56). Of the Bolshoi dancers, only Igor Moiseyev (then 30 years old) remained, but the Leningraders commenced intrigues against him. Kerzhentsev enabled him to establish what would become a celebrated folk dance ensemble. Moiseyev, Ja vospominaiu, 292–4.

275. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 829, l. 69–72. Pravda (Feb. 29, 1936) celebrated the achievements of Soviet film music.

276. RGALI, f. 962, op. 6, d. 42, l. 6. The NKVD's Molchanov reported that most cultural figures properly understood the Pravda article, but named and quoted a number who had reacted with "anti-Soviet" remarks. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 290–5 (TsA FSB, f. 3 op. 3, d. 121, l. 31–8; Feb. 11, 1936). Gorky wrote to Stalin (March 1936) complaining of the vicious campaign against Shostakovich. Gorky also complained that the theater of "the genius Meyerhold" seemed to exist solely for his lover, the actress Raikh, while the theater of "the genius Tairov" seemed to exist solely for the actress Koonen. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 300–2; Literaturnaia gazeta, March 10, 1933.

277. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 289–90 (APRF, f. 3, op. 35, d. 32, l. 42). See also Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 110–2. The day before Shostakovich was received, another attack had appeared in Pravda (Feb. 6, 1936) titled "Balletic Falsity" (about Bright Stream). See also Glikman, Pisma k drugu, 317.

278. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 308–9 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1108, l. 125–6; May 19, 1936); Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 227–8.

279. On Feb. 18, Bulgakov met with the new Moscow Art Theater director Mikhail Arkadyev, who asked about his next project. Bulgakov, according to his wife, "answered that the sole subject that interested him at the moment was Stalin." This referred to a planned play, Batum, likely inspired by recent publications about Stalin's days in the underground. Losev and Ivanovskaia, Dnevnik Eleny Bulgakovoi, 112, 114. The critic Osaf Litovsky had mercilessly attacked previews of Molière in the journal Sovetskoe iskusstvo (Feb. 11, 1936). Other vicious denunciations followed in lesser periodicals by Bulgakov rivals (Alexander Afinogenov, Yuri Olyesha, Vsevolod Ivanov).

280. "Polozhenie ego deistvitel'noe bezyskhodnoe," 117–9 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1099, l. 96–8; Feb. 29, 1936); Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 298–300 (otdel rukopisi GPB, f. 562, k. 19, d. 33). See also Sakharov, Mikhail Bulgakov, 439. In 1933, Bulgakov had authored a life of Molière in the series Lives of Remarkable People, a popular prerevolutionary staple which Gorky and Koltsov had revived, but the manuscript was rejected.

281. Pravda, March 9, 1936. (Yelena wrote in her diary: "When we read it, M. A. said, 'the end of Molière is the end of Ivan Vasilievich.'") Literaturnai gazeta followed suit (March 10). Kerzhentsev summoned Bulgakov on March 16, an encounter that lasted ninety minutes inside the just opened grandiose new Council of People's Commissars building, on Hunters Row. Elena deemed it a "senseless meeting." Losev and Ivanovskaia, Dnevnik Eleny Bulgakovoi, 116, 118.

282. Losev and Ivanovskaia, Dnevnik Eleny Bulgakovoi, 72, 120–1. Whether the Bulgakovs knew that Kerzhentsev had been the author of the anonymous article against Bulgakov and the ban on his works is unclear. Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 184, 187–90. In Sept. 1936, Bulgakov would resign from the Moscow Art Theater and take a nominal position at the Bolshoi as a consultant-librettist, rewriting the illiterate works submitted by Soviet librettists who retained the credit for them.

283. Stalin inserted “in connection with the 20th anniversary of the October Revolution.” Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 295–6 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1101, l. 65–6).

284. Miller, Soviet Cinema, 26–9.

285. Pravda, July 3, Aug. 20, 21, and 25, 1935; Doklad komissii B. Z. Shumiatskogo, 150; Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 1026–7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 55–56ob.). After Shumyatsky had returned, he wrote to the Council of People's Commissars, on Sept. 29, 1935, requesting hard currency to purchase copies of Charlie Chaplin's Modern Times. Molotov indicated it was for the politburo to decide. (Kaganovich wrote on the document: “I do not object, though we should know its content.”) It turned out to be a smash hit in the USSR. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 286–7 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1082, l. 114–5; op. 3, d. 972, l. 14; Oct. 7, 1935); Pravda, Dec. 2, 1935.

286. Stalin, with Svetlana and Vasily present, watched Girlfriends, written and directed by Leningrad's Lev Arnshtam, with music by Shostakovich. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 1031–3 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 829, l. 64–6).

287. Shumyatsky explained the enormous efficiencies of having producers for each film and centralized studios—a single Hollywood studio was outproducing all Soviet cinema—and argued that a single location would enable economies of scale and eliminate the costly trips around the USSR in search of sites for each film. Just 45 Soviet films had been completed in 1935, against a plan of 130, and 46 would be made in 1936, against a plan for 165. For its Hollywood, the government settled on the Lapsi valley near Foros in Crimea, with an initial budget of 400 million rubles. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 312–14 (APRF, f. 3, op. 35, d. 63, l. 23–6; Shumyatsky to Stalin, March 26, 1936), 327 (RGASPI, f. 82, op. 2, d. 958, l. 15, 16; Shumyatsky to Molotov, July 15, 1936); Taylor, “Ideology as Mass Entertainment,” 215–6; Kino, July 4, 1936: 4.

288. In their letter to Stalin, which he forwarded to Shumyatsky and the politburo, the satirists pointed out that in Hollywood directors did not use natural light anyway, shooting their works on indoor sets. Stalin dismissed their letter as blowing hot air. But Shumyatsky found himself on the receiving end of Kerzhentsev's denunciations for insubordination. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 302–5 (APRF, f. 3, op. 35, d. 63, l. 23–7; Ilf and Petrov to Stalin, Feb. 26, 1936), 1050–1 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 829, l. 94–6); Deriabin, Letopis' rossiiskogo kino, 1930–1945, 399, 408, 419. Hearsay has Beria learning of the proposed construction in Sukhum of a cinema city, and instigating the Ilf and Petrov opposition letter. On Dec. 26, 1935, Chiaureli had screened The Last Masquerade for Stalin, Beria, Svetlana, and Vasily. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 1033–4 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 828, l. 67–8); Fomin and Deriabin, Letopis' rossiiskogo kino, II: 391–2; Minchënok, Isaak Dunaevskii, 302–19 (no citations).

289. Ilf and Petrov were in the United States Sept. 19, 1935, to Jan. 22, 1936, and accredited as correspondents of Pravda. Ilf, with his Leica, took a wealth of photographs, which he and Petrov published along with eleven light, satirical installments about their travels in the illustrated mass magazine Ogonyok. They found ordinary America provincial and ignorant of the outside world. Ilf and Petrov, Odnoutazhnaia Amerika: Wolf, Ilf and Petrov's Road Trip, 136 (quotation); Ilf and Petrov, “Amerikanskii fotografi”; Rodchenko, “Amerikanskii fotograia Il'ia Il'fa.”; Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 1050–1 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 829, l. 94–6).

290. These data were for Jan. 1, 1937. Zemskov, “GULAG,” 11 (GARF, f. 9401, op. 1, d. 4157, l. 201–5), reproduced in Davies et al., Years of Progress, 432. Mikoyan had pushed for the construction of large meat factories in Moscow, Leningrad, Orsk, and Semipalatinsk, on the model of Chicago slaughterhouses, and Stalin backed him. The machinery was to be imported from Germany, the labor to come from the Gulag. Pavlov, Anastas Mikoian, 73 (citing RGASPI, f. 84, op. 1, d. 135, l. 1–2).

291. Yagoda sent a directive (April 2, 1936) to all camp commandants demanding they combat insect infestation, wash barrack floors and clothes, reduce the interminable queues and food poisonings at mess halls, and ensure that forced laborers, especially skilled ones, were employed properly. Kokurin and Petrov, “Gulag,” 113–7. The regime was cutting costs and mortality statistics with mass releases of invalids and the chronically ill, and incentivizing productivity with early release of inmates who earned the designation “shock worker.”

292. From inception in 1932 through 1941, Dalstroï would produce 430 tons of pure gold. Shirokov, Dal'stroï, 141 (citing GAMO, f. R-23ss, op. 1, d. 5, l. 14–5); Khlusov, Ekonomika Gulaga, 74–7 (GARF, f. 5446, op. 20a, d. 9496, l.

2–3, 6, 58: Oct. 30, 1937). The steep rise in gold production enabled the USSR to export 411 gold rubles' worth of precious metals between 1932 and 1936. Dohan, "Economic Origins of Soviet Autarky," 610.

293. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 67 (TsA FSB, f. 80s, op. 1, d. 80, l. 39, 51). Yagoda also noted that the ranks of the regular police in 1935 were still only half the total in 1913 (albeit for a somewhat smaller country: no Poland, Baltic states, or Bessarabia). Shearer, "Social Disorder, Mass Repression," 518 (citing GARF, f. 5446, op. 18a, d. 904, l. 2–14).

294. Paris Midi, Feb. 28, 1936. This was only Hitler's second interview for the French press, and the first since fall 1933. For a detailed chronology of Nazi foreign policy through 1938, see Jacobsen, Nationalsozialistische Außenpolitik, 765–841.

295. DBFP, 2nd series, XVI: 73–7 (Feb. 28, 1936); Toynbee, Acquaintances, 279–82; Medlicott, Britain and Germany, 24 (C1814/418 FO 371/19891). Toynbee was director of studies at Chatham House, at Balliol College, Oxford University, from 1924. McNeill, Arnold J. Toynbee. Surits, the Soviet envoy, desperately scoured the German press for any lessening of hostility and wrote to Moscow (late Feb. 1936) that it was widely believed in the diplomatic corps "that German military circles continue to follow a special line in German policy toward the Soviet Union." Abramov, "Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki," 149, (citing AVP RF, f. 082, op. 19, pap. 83, d. 4, l. 36).

296. Ambassador von Moltke reported that Göring's "declaration was received with obvious satisfaction." DGFP, series C, IV: 1201–2 (Feb. 26, 1936).

297. Shillony, Revolt in Japan; Crowley, Japan's Quest for Autonomy, 244–300.

298. Trotsky would seize upon the Roy Howard interview ("the export of revolution is nonsense") to reassert his "gravedigger" portrait of Stalin. Revolution Betrayed, 186.

299. New York World Telegram, March 4, 1936; Pravda, March 5, 1936, reprinted in Sochineniia, XIV: 116–31. In mid-March 1936, returning from a trip through Western Europe, Uborevičius told a gathering of the Communist Youth League in the Western province that he expected war in the Far East "at any moment" and that "in this year or the next, or in two to three years, it's unavoidable that we will have an encounter with German fascism. . . . The fascists cannot not unleash war. Without war they cannot long exist." "Dva ochaga opasnosti: vystupeniie komanduiushchego Belorusskim voennym okrugom komandarma 1 ranga I. P. Uborevicha na soveshchaniia v Zapadnom obkome VLKSM v 1936 g." See also Erickson, Soviet High Command, 397–400.

300. War minister Blomberg and the German brass were apprehensive and instituted extensive air-raid precautions, spreading the anxiety. Hossbach, Zwischen Weltkrieg und Hitler, 97–8; Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 262.

301. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, III/ii: 30 (March 2, 1936).

302. Medlicott, Britain and Germany, 24–5 (citing CP73[36], CAB24, 261, extract in FO 371/19889); DBFP, 2nd series, XV: 713–36.

303. The German ambassador reported that the war minister, Duff Cooper, had told him "that though the British people were prepared to fight for France in the event of a German incursion into French territory, they would not resort to arms on account of the recent occupation of the German Rhineland." DGFP, series C, V: 57–8 (Hoesch, March 9, 1936); The Times, March 13, 1936. "With two lunatics like Mussolini and Hitler you can never be sure of anything," Prime Minister Baldwin would observe. "But I am determined to keep the country out of war." Jones, Diary with Letters, 191 (April 30, 1936).

304. DBFP, 2nd series, XVI: 45–226; Braubach, Der Einmarsch deutscher Truppen, 26–8; Emmerson, Rhineland Crisis, 97–8; Gunsburg, Divided and Conquered, 301–1; Bell, France and Britain, 205–6; Adamthwaite, France, 37–9; Höhne, Zeit der Illusionen, 325. "The need, and yet the difficulty, for Britain and France to work in tandem was the dominant feature of Anglo-French relations," one scholar aptly noted of the interwar period. Davis, Anglo-French Relations, 189.

305. Kershaw, Hitler: 1889–1936, 581–9. The United States did not bother to register a protest.

306. Shirer, Berlin Diary, 49–51. The ambassadors of Britain, France, the Soviet Union, and Poland chose not to attend. Dodd and Dodd, Ambassador Dodd's Diary, 318 (March 7, 1936). Hitler, at the opera house, had proposed "negotiations" to demilitarize both sides of the Rhine, and yet again offered nonaggression pacts to all and sundry. Then, he dissolved the Reichstag and called for new elections (the Nazis would win a publicly announced 98.7 percent of the vote). Litvinov wrote to Maisky (March 9) castigating the British for rewarding aggressors by intending to enter negotiations with Germany now, pronounced “collective security” and the League of Nations in grave danger, and noted (March 10) Hitler’s finesse in driving a wedge between Britain and France. DVP SSSR, XIX: 130, 134.

307. DDF, 2e série, II: 15–6 (April 1, 1936).

308. The treaty specified “military aid” in the event of a third-party attack on either country. Article 3 stipulated that troops “will be withdrawn from that territory as soon as the danger is passed, just as took place in 1925 with respect to the withdrawal of Soviet troops.” The Soviets published the treaty with a delay, following a major border clash near Tamsagbulag that involved tanks and aircraft. Izvestiia, April 8, 1936; Tisminets, Vnesniaia politika SSSR, IV: 99–104. The Soviet-Mongolia treaty did not mention Chinese sovereignty over Mongolia (recognized in a 1924 Sino-Soviet agreement) and Chiang Kai-shek’s government sent two diplomatic notes of objection. Stalin played it both ways. “No other country except us recognizes Mongolia,” Stalin had told Genden. “You are still a part of China. We have no obligation to help you at all.” Friters, Outer Mongolia, 203–4 (citing Chinese Year Book, 1938, 321–2); China Weekly Review, April 7, 1936; 227, April 25: 270; Baabar, Twentieth-Century Mongolia, 347–8. The treaty was signed by Amar (head of state) and Genden (prime minister), but not long after the signing, Amar displaced Genden, whom the Mongol leadership resolved to send to Moscow as ambassador. Genden, upon arrival, would refuse to take up the post and would be sent to Crimea on “medical leave,” effectively taken hostage. RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 21, l. 1–3, d. 25, l. 1; Dashpürev and Soni, Reign of Terror in Mongolia.

309. Stalin’s informal adviser Varga had been propagating the thinking that “the imperialists” might go after each other. Varga, “Konets Locarno.” Mistakenly, George Kennan surmised that Stalin had decided upon a great purge of the upper ranks (his potential opposition) following the March 1936 German reoccupation of the Rhineland, in order to gain a free hand to deal with Germany. But in foreign policy he already had a free hand, and the terror was not a single decision. Kennan, Russia and the West, 286–90. Kennan’s argument was repeated by Ulam, Stalin, 404–7.

310. DDF, 2e série, II: 15–6 (April 1, 1936).

311. Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 78 (citing FSB archives). See also Sibley, “Soviet Industrial Espionage.”

312. Le Temps, March 19, 1936; Izvestiia (March 24, 1936), reprinted in Molotov, Stal’ i rechi, 231–3, and DVP SSSR, XIX: 166–72. See also Watson, Molotov, 133–4. Also in 1936, Eliava, deputy commissar for foreign trade, let on to the Soviet embassy staff in Berlin that in Moscow, “at the top,” they evaluate Hitlerism “differently.” Gnedin, Iz istoriia otoshenii, 37; Nekrich, 1941, 23. See also Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 267–8.

313. Molotov reverted to Georgian at the end: “Gaumardzhos saakartvelos mshromel khakhs!” “Long live the toilers of Georgia!” Pravda, March 21, 1936; Molotov, Velikaia druzhba, 55–60.

314. Paustovsky, Story of a Life, 133–4.

315. Chukovsky, who spoke at the congress, had spotted Pasternak, whom he fetched to take an open seat next to him. Chukovskii, Dnevnik, 141 (April 16 and April 22, 1936). See also Baruzdin, “O Kornee Chukovskom,” 111–21; Bode, “Humor in the Lyrical Stories”; Luk’ianova, Kornei Chukovskii, 624–6. Also in April 1936, Stalin allowed the imprisoned Victor Serge to leave the USSR for the West, despite understanding that Serge would campaign against the Stalinist line, with the credibility of a firsthand observer. His release testified to the importance Stalin attached to the fellow-travelers, especially Rolland. So improbable did Serge’s release seem that Krivitsky, the Soviet spy in the Hague, suspected Serge of being an NKVD plant sent to infiltrate the Trotskyites. But Stalin did not need to pay the cost of international defamation by Serge to infiltrate the Trotskyists; he had already done so. Krivitsky, M15 Debriefing, 40–9 (letter to Boris Nicolavsky, Paris, Oct. 25, 1938). Like Trotsky, Serge would die in a Mexican villa (in Serge’s case, in 1947, of a heart attack, just short of fifty-seven years old).

316. Pravda’s account omitted Voroshilov’s improvisational references to Bolshevik vigilance in the context of filling glasses. Stalin altered the wording for the newspaper of his toast for Voroshilov, eliminating “to the Supreme Leader [vozhd] of the Red Army.” There was only one Supreme Leader of the army as well as the country. Nevezhin, “Bol’shie Kremlevskie priemi Stalina” (no. 3), 134–6 (citing RGASPI, f. 74, op. 1, d. 164, l. 206–13); Pravda, May 4, 1936; Krasnaia zvezda, May 4, 1936.

317. Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 62; Isserson, “Zapiski sovremennika o M. N. Tukhachevskom,” 73–5; Vinogradov, “1937: pokazaniia marshala Tukhachevskogo,” (no. 9), 63. “The neutrality of the Baltic states plays a very dangerous role for us,” Tukhachevsky would explain at length in prison in 1937, and underscore the need for a proper base far better than Kronstadt on the Baltic. He would add that “war against Finland presents a completely independent problem, difficult to a sufficient degree for us.” Vinogradov, “1937: pokazaniia marshala Tukhachevskogo” (no. 8) 48 (no. 9), 62.

318. Tukhachevsky replaced Alexander Sedyakin, who had been the subject of relentless criticism, not least from Tukhachevsky himself. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 350. More broadly, see Gareev, “Ob opyte boevoi podgotovki voisk.”

319. Vinogradov, “1937: pokazaniia marshala Tukhachevskogo,” (no. 8), 48 (between May 26 and June 10, 1937). If, in 1914, the tsarist army foresaw 360 train cars per day for its mobilization goals in the West (the number would reach 560 per day by 1917), the USSR in the mid-1930s in the western theater could perhaps count on 436 per day. Menning, “Sovetskie zheleznyye dorogi,” 363.

320. Simonov, Voenno-promyshlennii kompleks SSSR, 91–2; Reese, Stalin’s Reluctant Soldiers; Mawdsley, review of Roger Reese, War in History, 7/3 (2000): 375–7. Despite the vast buildup, some exhibited a startling lack of confidence. “Of course, the USSR is not prepared to fight a war, neither politically nor economically, we need to gain at least three to five years,” Ivan Kutuyakov, deputy commander of the Volga military district, had written in his diary (Jan. 9, 1936). Viktorov, Bez grifu “sekretno,” 258–9.

321. Stalin had met with Tukhachevsky six times in 1931, eight times in 1932, seven times in 1933, twice in 1934, and three times in 1935. Stalin again received him on July 21, 1935, with Voroshilov and Yegorov, among others. Na prieme, 154, 718. In April 1936, Banner of Russia, a Russian-language monthly published by the emigration in Prague, concluded a sensational four-part series about “Kraskomov,” said to be a clandestine organization of Red Army commanders plotting a putsch. The April issue offered responses to letters received doubting Kraskomov’s existence and wondering, if it did exist, why Banner of Russia would expose it. A military coup to save Russia from Communism was a long-standing fantasy of the emigration, which was penetrated by the Soviet secret police. Lukes, Czechoslovakia between Stalin and Hitler, 92–4; Znamia Rossii, Dec. 1935, Feb., March, and April 1936. In parallel, Voroshilov had received a convoluted secret report that insinuated a “secret connection” between Red Army and Nazi military circles would enable the Germans to bring forth a “friendly” regime in Moscow. The report, said to be by a White Russian officer for the French General Staff, had been shared with the Czechoslovak staff, which, in turn, passed it to Moscow. Samuelson, Plans for Stalin’s War Machine, 185–6 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 740, l. 170–5; Dec. 6–7, 1935).

322. The trade protocol was signed on April 29, 1936. DGFP series C, V: 488–94. See also Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 35–6; and DGFP series C, IV: 1009–10 (Jan. 18, 1936). On April 19, Litvinov had fretted to Surits in Berlin that any new large trade deal with Germany would alienate France and “play into Hitler’s hands.” Abramov, “Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki,” 149 (citing AVP RF, f. 010, op. 11, pag. 68, d. 34, l. 85–7).

323. Bessonov’s offer included walking back criticism (made by Litvinov in Geneva) of the Rhineland militarization. DGFP series C, V: 512 (Andor Hencke: May 6, 1936). Bessonov was accompanied by Yevgeny Gnedin, who would later falsely deny the involvement of himself or the foreign affairs commissariat in efforts to win over Nazi Germany. Gnedin, Katastrofa i votrooe rozhdenie, 34–5. Andor Hencke had been German consul in Kiev, and witnessed the famine.

324. Schacht, who was trying to rein in expenditures and inflation, miscalculated in suggesting Göring’s appointment. Overly, Göring, 40. Stalin had received Kandelaki without foreign affairs commissariat personnel on March 16, 1936; again, five days later, with a slew of police, intelligence, and military men; and finally, with Litvinov and Stomonyakov on April 4. Na prieme, 181, 183.

325. DGFP series C, V: 571–3 (May 20, 1936).

326. Niclauss, Die Sowjetunion, 192 (citing Dirksen report, May 19, 1936).

327. DGFP series C, V: 572.

328. Dembski, “Połsko-Sovetskie otnosheniia,” 196–7 (citing Akten zur Deutschen Austwärtigen Politik [ADAP], series C, VI/1: doc. 341); and Archiwum Akt Nowych, Warszawa, MSZ, Kabinet Ministra, 108, A.T. II, k. 47–8). Germany remained in arrears on paying transit costs for freight through the Polish Corridor, owing to hard currency shortages. On May 22, 1935, during a monologue with Polish ambassador Lipski, Hitler alluded to the need to build a railroad through the Polish Corridor, according to the Polish record—information Stalin received. Morozov, Połsko-Chechoslovatskie otnosheniia, 242 (citing AVP RF, f. 02, op. 1, d. 35, l. 162–9; Lipski from Berlin, May 27, 1935). Von Molke had broached the railroad idea to Beck back on May 26, 1934. Wojciechowski, Stosunki polsko-niemieckie, 200–1, 232.

329. Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 157 (citing RGASPI, f. 78, op. 1, d. 636, l. 73). Leopold Trepper, the military intelligence operative, recalled Berzin saying that “here we talk the whole time about the Nazi threat, but it is envisioned as something very far off.” Trepper, Bol’shaia igra, 79.

330. Robertson, “Hitler and Sanctions.” Mussolini had given approval for Hitler’s Rhineland remilitarization in advance.

331. The British, despite everything, were still trying to restart negotiations for an air-force arms limitation agreement with Germany. The Italians had mobilized half a million men and lost just 3,000 killed. On May 5 Italian troops took Addis Adaba. Bosworth, Mussolini’s Italy, 396–7. Ethiopia never officially surrendered. On June 18, 1936, Britain would end the limited economic sanctions imposed in 1935. The Soviet Union, along with China, the United States, and three others, would not recognize Italy’s annexation. Italy would use far more aerial bombing and chemical weapons in Ethiopia after the nine-month war of conquest, during the period of “rule.”

332. Medlicott, Britain and Germany, 26–7 (citing C3662–3/4/18 FO 371/19905). The remark is absent from the German record: DGFP, series C, V: 547–9 (May 14).

333. Weinberg, Foreign Policy, I: 363 (citing U.S., 1936, I: 300–1).

334. Sats, Sketches from My Life, 210–27. Attendance at opening night “was poor,” the composer lamented to himself, and it “failed to attract much attention”—a problem of venue. Prokofiev, Autobiography, 89.

335. Morrison, People’s Artist, 29–49. See also Morrison, Sergey Prokofiev and His World. Prokofyev would compose a series of “mass songs” (op. 66, 79, 89), adapting the lyrics of poets who were in favor, and in 1939 the oratorio Zdravitsa or Hail to Stalin (op. 85).

336. The orchestra portrayed the decadent world that the woman leaves behind, a trope borrowed from Chaplin’s Modern Times. A black doll was used for the infant son. During the filming of Marion Dixon’s escape from the American troupe, Orlova tripped on the slag under the railroad tracks, ripping her stockings and skirt and bloodying her knees. She got up and shouted, “Is the baby alive?” The film’s long-gestating appearance coincided with the opening of an outdoor cinema in Moscow’s Gorky Park called “Giant,” which had a three-story screen and a 400-watt imported sound system (instead of the usual Soviet-made 8–10 watts), and which could hold up to 20,000 people on wooden benches. Salys, Films of Grigorii Aleksandrov, 5, 123–200; Taylor, “Illusion of Happiness”; Kushnirov, Svetlyi put’, 145–6; Malkov, “Charlie Chaplin i Dunaevskii.”

337. Kuromiya, Freedom and Terror, 184–200.

338. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 829, l. 84–5; Pyr’ev, Izbrannnye proizvedeniia, I: 74–5. Stalin, after previewing the film (Feb. 28), had introduced a new denouement whereby Anna learns of the villain’s dark past and turns a gun on him, at which point the local party chief tells us the villain had killed the Communist Youth League activist and is a foreign spy, and the NKVD escort him away. The film would be shown in the United States beginning in July. After the film, Pyryev was suspended by Mosfilm, for reasons that are unclear, but managed to relocate to Ukraine. Iurenv, introduction to Ivan Pyr’ev v zhizni i na ekrane, at 32.

339. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 19, l. 78 (Feb. 27, 1936); “O tak nazyvaemom ‘antissovetskom ob’edinennom Trotskistsko-Zinov’evskom tsentre,” 83 (Léopold, March 25, 1936); no. 9: 35 (Vyshinsky’s comment to Stalin on Yagoda’s letter, March 31).

340. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 753 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 223, l. 1–2: April 29, 1936). The ones found with Trotsky’s Bulletin were Eduard Goltzman and A. N. Safonova.

341. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 756 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 224, l. 130); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 19, l. 172.

342. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 757–63 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 225, l. 71–86).

343. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 572, l. 340b–35; APRF, f. 3, op. 22, d. 150, l. 129; Davies et al., Years of Progress, 301–2.

344. Pravda, June 5, 1936.

345. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 231–5 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 572, l. 67–73).

346. Gorky visited his son's grave on May 27, 1936. Stalin managed to see Gorky on June 8 and June 12. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 420 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 720, l. 121); Rossiiskaia gazeta, June 17, 2011. Mekhlis had written to Stalin (May 27) that Gorky had submitted an article for Pravda, "The History of the Young Person in the 19th Century," which he judged full of philosophical issues that "raise doubts." Stalin ordered Mekhlis to publish the essay without changes. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 418 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 720, l. 119).

347. Pravda, June 21, 1936; Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 310 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 978, l. 55); Yedlin, Maxim Gorky, 214.

348. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 310 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 978, l. 55); Letopis' zhizni i tvorchestva A. M. Gor'kogo, IV: 599. Gorky had requested in his will to be buried next to his son. Shentalinsky, Arrested Voices, 276.

349. MacNeal, Stalin, 206; Tucker, Stalin in Power, 364.

350. Shentalinsky, Arrested Voices, 274.

351. The most authoritative study of Gorky's death, by the then head of IMLI, inclined towards natural causes, without ruling out foul play: Barakhov, "M. Gor'kii," 191. Gorky had returned to Moscow from his dacha in Tesseli, Crimea, on May 26, 1936. Malraux had visited Gorky at Tesseli March 7–10, in the company of Koltsov, who wrote of Gorky: "He was not well." Babel, also present, found Gorky alone and depressed. Letopis' zhizni i tvorchestva A. M. Gor'kogo, IV: 575–6, 586–93, 600–1; Shentalinsky, Arrested Voices, 269. Koltsov had conveyed a request from Malraux to see Stalin; Stalin chose not to grant an audience. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 411–2 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 754, l. 77–77ob.).

352. Kuskova, "Na rubezhe dvuh epoch." Carr, in an obituary in the Spectator (June 26, 1936), wrote that "posterity will not place Gorky with Dostoevsky, Chekhov and Tolstoy." See also Schroeder, Mit der Menschheit auf Du und Du, 83–5; and Trotsky, Portraits, 160–3 (July 9, 1936). That same day, Gide lunched with Babel and Eisenstein in Babel's Moscow apartment. Gide praised the USSR to the skies, but after he left, according to an informant for the NKVD, Babel said, "Do not believe the rapture. He is cunning, like the devil . . . Upon return to France he could conjure up some devilish piece." Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 316–8 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 3, d. 65, l. 225–8; July 5, 1936). Mikhail Apletin, the head of all-Union society of foreign cultural ties, noted of Gide, "he's not a simple writer like Rolland." Clark, Moscow, 140 (RGALI, f. 631, op. 14, d. 5, l. 18).

353. Kotkin, "Modern Times."

354. Vastly increased organization of society by the state under Stalin was one of the main reasons for the marked increase in his state's capacity. Kotkin, Magnetic Mountain. Hannah Arendt's characterization of the Nazi and Soviet regimes as almost condemned "to organize everyone and everything within its framework and to set and keep them in motion" was apt. Arendt, Origins of Totalitarianism, 361, 326. Barrington Moore noted the coincidence in Soviet politics of heavy coercion and grass-roots activism. Moore, Soviet Politics, 403. See also Gelb, "Mass Politics under Stalin."

355. Kasza, Conscription Society. See also Straus, Factory and Community. Generally, in U.S. social science, the effective organization of society has been viewed in terms of self-organization (nonstate), for example in the influential work of Robert Putnam, but as Sheri Berman points out, civic organizations served as an important vehicle for the spread and institutionalization of the Nazi movement, and did not cease to exist under the Nazis. Putnam, Bowling Alone; Sheri Berman, "Civil Society." In his critique of the state's utopian aspirations in so-called "high modernism," which effectively places forced collectivization on the same plane as surveys of land use, James Scott writes about the failure of society to resist, rather than its thorough organization in state-led crusades. Scott, Seeing Like a State, 89.

356. Pre-1914 France had managed to get tsarist Russia to build strategic railroads to the border with imperial Germany in exchange for rolling over massive economic development loans. Rieber, "Persistent Factors," 328.

357. Arnason, "Communism and Modernity."

358. Tsarism's executive branch was in theory autocratic but was moved—or not—by the operation of patronage networks. Only a strong-willed person at or near the top could impose direction and energy, and usually only for limited periods. Many tsarist loyalists had objected in principle to a strong government, detesting Witte and Stolypin; they wanted firm rule led only by the autocrat himself. But Nicholas II went into audiences with his ministers without seeking to be briefed beforehand, and, suspecting them of sabotage, worked to divide them. The tsar, one scholar has noted, “had his own interest in preserving the very confusion in government that was to be remedied.” Even an audience did not translate into effective action. Orlovsky, Limits of Reform, 125; Kuropatkin, Dnevnik A. N. Kuropatkina, 53 (conversation with Plehve); Yaney, “Some Aspects of the Imperial Russian Government,” 88–9; Khristoforov, Aristokraticheskaia oppositsiia Veikim reformam, 300.

359. The tsarist department of police had no more than 10,000 informants across its entire history, a scale the Soviets would dwarf. Lauchlan, Russian Hide and Seek, 133, 203. For perceptive comments on the Leninist revolutionary disposition and social engineering, see Massell, Surrogate Proletariat, 39–40.

360. Kotkin, Magnetic Mountain, 198–237.

361. Pokrovsky in his 1927 Essays on the History of the October Revolution wrote that the revolution had been the only way to avoid “the colonization of Russia by Anglo-American capital.” Ocherki po istorii oktiabr’skoi revoliutsii, II, 447–8. See also Agursky, “The Bolshevik Revolution as a Revolution of National Liberation.”

362. Baynes, Speeches of Adolf Hitler, II: 1312–3 (March 20, 1936); Bullock, Hitler, 404.

363. Stalin also said to Howard that “public [obshchestvennye] organizations, which we have created, may be called Soviet, socialist organizations even though they are not yet completed, but they are the root of the socialist organization of the public.” Pravda, March 5, 1936. De Tocqueville had dismissed the authoritarians who, hiding behind constitutional facades, cherished “the illusion that they can combine the prerogatives of absolute power with the moral authority that comes from popular assent.” De Tocqueville, Old Regime and the French Revolution, 45. Mobilization of the masses lay behind the claim of Giovanni Gentile, the fascist ideologue, for the superiority of Italian fascism over a parliamentary liberal order. Gentile, “Philosophical Basis of Fascism.” In Lenin’s vision of the party, the militant vanguard became meaningful if linked to a militant people. Miliukov, in emigration, would pay Stalin a backhanded compliment: “If, contrary to the American saying, Stalin succeeded in cheating the whole people the whole time, it was because people wished to be deceived.” Tucker, Political Culture and Leadership in Soviet Russia, 39; P. N. Miliukov, “From Nicholas II to Stalin: Half a Century of Foreign Politics,” typescript (n.d.), 334, Hoover Institution Archives.

364. George Mosse argued that the massification of politics threatened anarchy, but that the masses were shaped into a manageable political body by nationalist symbols and liturgy, a key challenge for liberal orders, too. He went too far in asserting that “parliamentary republics were naturally unable to construct effective representations of themselves, just as they failed to create national festivals.” Mosse, Nationalization of the Masses, 72.

365. A March 30, 1936, secret report for Maurice Gamelin warned bleakly of low morale and high Communist subversion among the French troops. Gamelin sent it to Daladier with a warning that France was coming to resemble Spain. Jackson, “French Strategy” (citing SHAT, 7N 4034–1, “Eta d’esprit de l’armée, April 1, 1936).

366. Rieber, “Persistent Factors,” 336–7.

367. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 93. In Odessa in 1934, a single Trotskyite “group” was unmasked; in 1935, suddenly, thirty-one such groups were found.

PART II. TERROR AS STATECRAFT

1. Kollontai added: “If I don’t fall ‘underneath the wheel,’ it will be almost a miracle.” Vaksberg, Alexandra Kollontai, 393; Farnsworth, “Conversing with Stalin,” 944 (citing RGASPI, f. 134, op. 3, d. 62, l. 6).

2. “A hero ventures forth from the world of common day into a region of supernatural wonder,” Campbell wrote. “Fabulous forces are there encountered and a decisive victory is won: the hero comes back from this mysterious adventure with the power to bestow boons on his fellow man.” Campbell, Hero with a Thousand Faces, 30.

3. One of Bukharin’s works, “Toward a Theory of the Imperialist State” [1916], which influenced Lenin, had argued that a “militaristic state capitalism” would produce a “new Leviathan, in comparison with which the fantasy of Thomas Hobbes seems like child’s play.” He denied socialism could lead to this result because “socialism is the regulation of production directed by society, not by the state.” Needless to say, his new Leviathan (“absorbing within the domain of state management everyone and everything”) had turned out to fit the Soviet state. Bukharin, “K teorii imperialisticheskogo gosudarstva,” 5–32. See also Harding, “Authority, Power and the State,” 32–56. Daniels, “The State and Revolution”; and Cohen, Bukharin, 39–40.

4. A typical absolution of Marx from the Soviet outcome is Dalrymple, “Marx and Agriculture.” The distance between Stalin and Marx was one of time period and context. “Everyone who contradicted him, he treated with abject contempt,” one of Marx’s fellow radicals, Carl Schurz, a student radical from Bonn (later a U.S. senator), wrote of their first meeting in Cologne in 1848. “Every argument that he did not like he answered either with biting scorn at the unfathomable ignorance that had prompted it, or with opprobrious aspersions upon the motives of him who had advanced it.” McLellan, Karl Marx, 15 (1909 memoir).

5. Self-styled socialists in the nineteenth century, initially, had employed other terms—“the anti-social system,” “the system of bourgeois property”—but then hit upon this single all-encompassing notion whose essence (property relations, a mode of production), if replaced, would supposedly alter not merely the economy but the entire world, delivering abundance, social justice, and peace. The invention of “capitalism” was a stunning achievement for the socialists, in a way, but a tragedy for humanity, and ultimately, for the entire left, too. Unlike Leninists, Social Democrats were never sure whether this “capitalism” would implode on its own, could be peacefully overcome inside parliaments by large worker-majority parties, or in the end required revolutionary intervention, but it had to go. Those Social Democrats who came to believe that “capitalism” was amenable to becoming more humane—capitalism with a human face—opened themselves up to accusations of being accomplices to exploitation and imperialism.

6. Hegel stated in a series of lectures published posthumously (1837): “But even regarding History as the slaughter-bench [Schlachtbank] at which the happiness of peoples, the wisdom of States, and the virtue of individuals have been victimized—the question involuntarily arises—to what principle, to what final aim these enormous sacrifices have been offered.” The answer was not Hegel’s Reason or World Spirit but misbegotten ideas. Hegel, Lectures on the Philosophy of History. Hegel’s lectures were published in Russian translation in 1932 as vols. IX and X of his Works by Partizdat.

7. In Marxism-Leninism, only one set of interests can be legitimate, the “proletariat’s,” the rest are ipso facto expressions of the “wrong” class interests, a stricture that effectively excludes lawful politics. But politics is how different groups, interests, and opinions are represented and allowed to compete via peaceful means, and with institutional restraint. Crick, In Defence of Politics, 28. More broadly, the idea that a self-appointed elite has the right, even the duty, to coerce a population for the latter’s benefit is beyond pernicious. That the destruction of whole “classes” can somehow produce freedom is beyond folly. Systemic prevarication and political murder in the name of some supposed higher humanity get institutionalized. Chamberlin, Evolution of a Conservative, 13.

8. Carr defended Stalin’s bloody revolution from above because it was the only way to build socialism (a system not based on private property and markets), which was true, but also because it enabled the socialist state to defend itself in the rapacious international order. A self-styled realist, Carr understood he was defending a morally repugnant system, but in his eyes capitalism had failed, while state planning and collectivization had appeared to succeed, against expectations. It also helped that socialism’s extreme violence and waste could be attributed to inevitable birth pangs that would pass, while capitalism’s crisis was seen as permanent. Wohlforth, “Russian-Soviet Empire,” at 226. See also Jonathan Haslam, “We Need a Faith,” 37.

9. Robert Caro has argued that Lyndon Johnson had a “hunger for power not to improve the lives of others but to manipulate and dominate them, to bend them to his will in a hunger so fierce and consuming that no consideration of morality or ethics, no cost to himself—or to anyone else—could stand before it.” Of course, Johnson was head of the Senate and then president in a constitutional order. Caro, Path to Power, xix.

10. Much escaped Stalin’s attention, obviously. And yet, nothing was too trivial to be brought to him by someone, or for him to involve himself. “People say that the square on the Arbat (where there used to be a church, in front of the cinema) has not yet been paved with blocks (or asphalt),” he wrote to Kaganovich (September 24, 1931) from Sochi. “Shameful! One of the busiest squares and it is full of potholes! Pressure them and make them finish up the square.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 117 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 38).

11. Sometimes the underlining in documents was done by an aide. Sometimes the underlining could be absent-minded, without retention. Much is not underlined. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, I/i: 221, I/ii: 141, II/iii: 153; Khlevniuk, Stalin; Zhizn, 144–5.

12. “He wrote everything himself,” Molotov would recall. “The staff never wrote for him. This was a Leninist tradition. Zinoviev wrote for himself, Kamenev, too, not to mention Trotsky.” Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 168. Stalin’s style borrowed from the catechism approach of his seminary training, and was well suited for agitation among the lower orders, including non-native speakers, where he had cut his teeth.

13. Brooks, "Thank You, Comrade Stalin!," 83–105. "What more is there to ask when there is Soviet power; when exploitation, oppression, lack of rights, and slavery have been abolished forever; when there is the party of Lenin-Stalin, a worker-peasant government, which exists only to make an abundant, joyful, and happy life for millions of working people—the men and women of the new socialist society," a group of female shock workers were quoted in Pravda (March 11, 1936). "We are obliged to you, our own dear Iosif Vissarionovich," Pravda, March 11, 1936. "Our republic," the writer Mikhail Prishvin had written in his diary in mid-1929, "resembles a photographic dark room, in which not a single ray of light is admitted from the outside, but inside everything is illuminated by a red lantern." Prishvin, Dnevnik, VI: 432 (July 22, 1929).

14. Simonov, Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia, 65 (Feb. 27, 1979).

15. Rees, "Leader Cults," at 22.

16. Goebbels intuited that "genius" was fine, but a leader needed to be in touch with the pulse of the people. Kershaw, "Hitler Myth," 59. See also Volkogonov, Triumfi tragediia, I/ii: 308.

17. Lewin, Making of the Soviet System (1985, 1994).

18. In 1935 the regime had stepped up the deportations of certain ethnics and convicted criminals, increased the size of the NKVD border guards, and erected forbidden zones along the western border, sometimes more than ten miles wide, removing people and installing barbed wire, watch towers, and strips of raked land in which footprints could be spotted. Dullin, La frontière épaisse, 206. See also Erickson, Soviet High Command, 406–7; and Chandler, Institutions of Isolation, 55–66; and XVII's ezd, 71–3.

19. "The Bolsheviks can satisfy the characteristic human striving for a purposeful and significant life, man's natural craving to transcend the humdrum routine of daily life, to give his activities a purpose more than personal." Gurian, Bolshevism. See also Stern, "National Socialism as Temptation," 151.

20. Garros et al., Intimacy and Terror, 206 (Galina Shtange). See also Overy, Dictators, 54–5.

21. Jasny, Soviet Industrialization.

22. Vagts, "Capitalist Encirclement," 506. See also Izvestiia, March 21, 1937: 2 (Zhdanov).

23. An entry on the "Inquisition" in the Great Soviet Encyclopedia that happened to appear in 1937 noted that "during just eighteen years under the principal Spanish Inquisitor Torquemada, more than 10,000 people were burned alive." Bol'shaia Sovetskaia entsiklopediia (1937), XXVIII: 510–2.

24. Soviet terror statistics are suspect, of course, but still indicate orders of magnitude. We will never know how many of those beaten to death during interrogations were recorded as dying from heart attacks, for example. Officially, executions were almost evenly distributed between the horrific years of 1937 (353,074) and 1938 (328,618). The number included both political and common crimes. These two years accounted for 91 percent of all the death sentences for political crimes handed down between 1921 and 1940. GARF, f. 9041, op. 1, d. 4517, l. 201–5 (report of late 1953); Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 26; Lukianov, "Massovye represii opravdany byt' ne mogut," 120 (data presented by a commission in 1962–3); Popov, "Gosudarstvennyi terror"; Ellman, "Soviet Repression Statistics"; Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 477–8 (TsA FSB, f. 8, op. 1, d. 80, l. 57–8, 61–2). The number 1.575 million does not include arrests by the regular police (militia).

25. Davies, "Soviet Economy," 11–37.

26. Davies, Popular Opinion, 35.

27. Many Soviet collective farmers preferred bribing the capitalists, with grain or whatever it took, to avoid war, and some were reportedly even ready to pay double tax if that meant war could be avoided for sure. 'Esl' mir obrushitsia na nashu Respubliku,' 125 (citing TsDOOSO, f. 4, op. 5, d. 87, l. 111).

28. Conquest, Stalin's Purge. "The nature of the whole purge depends in the last analysis on the personal and political drives of Stalin." Conquest, Reassessment, 33. "The Soviet Union one sees in the archives is perfectly recognizable to people who have tried to understand it from the open sources alone," wrote Joseph Berliner. Gregory, Behind the Façade, 6.

29. Gerschenkron, "On Dictatorship."

30. Rees, "Stalin as Leader, 1937–1953," 202–3.

31. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 585. Volkonov largely echoed Medvedev. Lars Lih argued that Stalin pursued an “anti-bureaucratic scenario,” but also that Stalin recognized the necessity of the state, an unresolved paradox. Lih, Introduction to Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 1–63.

32. Trotsky, Stalin; Tucker, Stalin in Power; Lewin, “Stalin in the Mirror of the Other,” 120. This represents a considerable improvement on the traditional Trotskyite formulation, whereby, in the misguided words of Deutscher, Stalin’s “own behaviour was now dictated by the moods, needs, and pressures of the vast political machine.” Deutscher, Stalin, 226–7.

33. Kuromiya, Stalin; Kuromiya, “Stalin in the Politburo Transcripts,” 41–56; Kuromiya, Freedom and Terror; van Ree, Political Thought; Rees, Political Thought from Machiavelli to Stalin. Harris depicted Stalin as a consummate misperceiver who never adequately understood that his own central policies were driving the phenomena he hated and struggled against—and so he murdered everyone. Harris, “Encircled by Enemies.” This misperception differs markedly from Harris’s earlier assertion that the terror arose “not because of the opposition to collectivization, high-tempo industrialization, or the leadership of Stalin,” but because regional officials, struggling to cope, had engaged in deception, blame-shifting, and scapegoating, which Stalin suddenly discovered—as if he had not known about inflated production reports before, and as if he needed such a pretext to attack. Harris, Great Urals, 189–90.

34. Ulam, “Price of Sanity,” 133.

35. Without embarrassment, Yuri Zhukov has asserted that the terror was forced upon a reluctant Stalin by regional officials, making Stalin a victim (meanwhile, all those who allegedly forced his hand were cremated). Zhukov, Inoi Stalin. J. Arch Getty has even suggested that the terror was provoked by “tensions” between the center and periphery, and fallout from genuine efforts to introduce democracy, a crackpot assertion he shares with Zhukov. “[I]t was a purely domestic event (the 1937 electoral campaign) that sparked the terror,” argued Getty, who added that the terror operations were “unplanned, ad hoc reactions to a perceived immediate political threat.” Getty, “Excesses are not permitted.” See also Manning, “Government in the Soviet Countryside”; Getty, “State and Society.”

36. Kotkin, “Conspiracy So Immense.”

37. Kotkin, Magnetic Mountain, 286.

38. According to the recollections of S. Yakubovsky, the phrase “Stalin is the Lenin of our day” arose at an editorial meeting of Pravda. Lel’chuk, “Beseda I. V. Stalina s angliiskim pisatelem G. Uellsom,” 345.

39. Scholars have identified a “dictator’s dilemma”: the more power the dictator has, the less sure he can be of the loyalty of subordinates. Wintrobe, Political Economy of Dictatorship, 20. In all authoritarian regimes, the ruler perceives the only path to securing his rule is an expansion of his power at the expense of elites (who, in theory, can remove him). That said, elite palace coups are hard, whereas the ruler enjoys greater opportunity to behave opportunistically, to cut back the degree of power-sharing or collective decision making, and, once his power passes a certain point, rebellion becomes near impossible and participation in decision making shrinks or even vanishes. Svobik, Politics of Authoritarian Rule. Machiavelli had argued that those who lead a country have more to fear from the scheming elites than from the populace, and therefore he advised a leader to form an alliance with the people against the aristocracy.

40. “The frenzy with which [Stalin] pursued the feud, making it the paramount preoccupation of international communism as well as of the Soviet Union and subordinating to it all political, tactical, intellectual, and other interests, beggars description,” Deutscher would write. “There is in the whole of history hardly another case in which such immense resources of power and propaganda were employed against a single individual.” Deutscher, Prophet Outcast, 125–6. See also Szamuely, “Elimination of Opposition,” 323.

CHAPTER 6. ON A BLUFF

1. Trotsky, Fourth International 2, no. 5 (1941): 150–4, reprinted in Trotsky, Writings of Leon Trotsky, 1936–1937.

2. Payne, Collapse of the Spanish Republic, 175–7. There would be some runoffs, reruns, and shifts in coalition allegiance, altering the totals.

3. On the problems of Spain’s democracy, some of them analogous to the situation in late Weimar Germany, see Payne, Spain’s First Democracy; and Preston, “Explosive Experiment.” Stalin might have received an intelligence warning about the Spanish generals’ plotting in April 1936. Mereshcheriakov, “SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii,” 84, no citation. Spanish conspirators had informed the British foreign office, in late May 1936, of an intention “to restore law and order,” that is, overthrow the Popular Front in favor of “a civilian, right-wing government.” The British cabinet, discussing Spain on July 6, knew a coup was imminent. Volodarsky, Stalin’s Agent, 143 (citing PRO FO 371, file 20522, documents W4919 and W5693; records of the cabinet office, minutes, file 85); Coverdale, Italian Intervention, 60.

4. Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 900; Preston, Spanish Holocaust.

5. This argument has been advanced by Khlevniuk and reinforced by Kuromiya, but rightly rejected by Rees. Khlevniuk, “Objectives of the Great Terror”; Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 173 (citing APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 223, l. 90, 141–2, 146); Khlevniuk, “Reasons for the ‘Great Terror’”; Kuromiya, “Accounting for the Great Terror”; Rees, “Stalin as Leader, 1937–1953.”

6. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 764–5 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 226, l. 159–61). The innermost circle—Kaganovich, Voroshilov—privately expressed their support to Stalin, at his prompting, for the annihilation of “lowlifes” such as Dreitzer and Pikel. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 627 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 743, l. 53; Kaganovich to Stalin, July 6, 1936); Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 333–4 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 37, l. 104–6; Voroshilov to Stalin, July 9, 1936).

7. Volodarsky, Stalin’s Agent, 216. Publicly, Stalin did not comment much on Spain. Many military intelligence reports from Spain were addressed to Voroshilov. Radosh et al., Spain Betrayed, 58–63 (Sept. 25, 1936), 63–5 (Oct. 16, 1936), 66–70 (Oct. 16, 1936). A mass of documents regarding Spain in the so-called Politburo or Presidential Archive were addressed to Kaganovich (and sometimes Molotov) in Stalin’s absence, but Stalin’s voluminous holiday correspondence with Kaganovich does not elucidate his motives in Spain. Crucially, there is no Dimitrov diary from Jan. 31, 1935, to Aug. 19, 1936, or Sept. 21 to Nov. 22, 1936, when Dimitrov and his wife were on holiday.

8. Some scholars have asserted that Stalin followed all events in Spain closely and read every single document on the country. Mereshcheriakov, “SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii,” 87 (no citation); Novikov, SSSR, Komintern, II: 7; Sarin and Dvoretzky, Alien Wars, 3. In fact, as the Russian analyst Rybalkin noted, “Stalin’s position in relation to the Spanish Republic was unpredictable and changed depending on his mood and the situation on the fronts of the Iberian Peninsula and in the international arena.” He continued: “Gradually Stalin’s interest in country X [Spain] fell—on the contrary, hostility arose. From mid-1937 at politburo meetings it became more frequent to discuss aid not to Spain but to Mongolia and China (country Z), as well as the struggle against anti-state elements inside the country.” Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X”, 45. Another scholar refers to “improvisations and adaptations.” Roberts, “Soviet Foreign Policy and the Spanish Civil War.” Yet another noted that “a historian looking back over events encounters the danger of reading into facts future motives of which the participants were not yet aware.” Cattell, Soviet Diplomacy and the Spanish Civil War, 120.

9. Stalin had many decisions on Spain approved by the politburo, but almost always via “telephone poll,” so it is not clear whether any discussions took place. (No transcripts were made of politburo meetings between the end of 1932 and late 1938.) Many of the decisions regarding Spain—“Operation X”—were left out of the politburo protocols entirely, not even with oblique reference. These were recorded as OOP, which could have connoted “separate special file” [otdelnaia osobaia papka], and are found in the Presidential Archive. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 23. Compare Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa.

10. No politburo member, and no other people’s commissar except for Litvinov, had traveled across the ocean. In Jan. 1936, Mikoyan had been awarded the Order of Lenin for the food industry commissariat’s overfulfillment of the 1935 plan and introduction of machinery. Pavlov, Anastas Mikoian, 75–6 (citing RGASPI, f. 84, op. 3, d. 164, l. 603), 76–7 (l. 590). See also Mikoian, Pishchevaia promyshlennost Sovetskogo Soiuza, 9–10. In the United States during the course of two months, he visited more than 100 enterprises: bread and biscuits, canned meats, non-alcoholic drinks, refrigerators, as well as slaughterhouses. He saw the mass production of hamburger patties at Macy’s and bought machines for manufacturing meat cutlets. “We traveled across America from east to west and back, and nowhere did the police create any difficulties for us,” Mikoyan would later remember. Pavlov, “Iz zapisok narkoma,” 107. See also Medvedev, Blizhnyi krug Stalina, 173.

11. Orjonikidze found out about the Soviet military intervention in Spain either by voting (via polling) for the politburo resolution on Sept. 29, 1936, or from Kaganovich’s letter to him the next day. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 149 (Sept. 30, 1936). See also Maisky, Spanish Notebooks, 20–1.

12. “Stalin’s position” in Spain, Daniel Kowalsky summarized, “was never one of strength, but rather one of weakness, incompetence, inexperience, and indecisiveness.” Kowalsky largely omits the Soviet domination of the Spanish Communist party. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraphs 792–5.

13. Firsov, “Stalin i Komintern,” 8 (no citation); Volkogonov, Trotskii, II: 295–7. See also Preston, We Saw Spain Die, 3.

14. Preston, Franco, 16; Fusi, Franco, 18. The statement dates to Dec. 31, 1938.

15. In 1934, when leftists in Spain had seized power in the mining province of Asturias—thanks to solidarity among normally uncooperative Socialists, Communists, and anarchists—it had been Franco who was summoned to suppress the strikers; more than 1,000 people died. Ferran and Amago, Unearthing Franco’s Legacy, 61.

16. Preston, Franco, 114.

17. Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 243. See also Jackson, Spanish Republic; Preston, Concise History; Brouè, Civil War in Spain; Carr, Spanish Tragedy; Payne, Spanish Civil War; and Linz and Stepan, Breakdown of Democratic Regimes, 142–215.

18. Preston, Franco, 129–30, 134.

19. De Madariaga, “Intervention of Moroccan Troops,” 77.

20. “We have to create the impression of mastery, eliminating without scruples or hesitation those who do not think as we do,” General Mola boasted. Preston, Spanish Holocaust, 179.

21. Malefakis, “La revolución social,” 319–54.

22. Payne, Franco Regime, 176; Novikov, SSSR, Komintern, II: 73 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 120, d. 245, l. 7, 11); Mezhdunarodnaia vstrecha, 201; Pertsov, Voina i revoliutsiia v Ispanii, I: 63. On July 6, 1936, the Popular Front government had imprisoned the Falange leader, Antonio Primo de Rivera. He would be sentenced to death on Nov. 20, 1936. Franco would not try to free him.

23. Edwards, British Government and the Spanish Civil War, 77; Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 791.

24. Spain had finally recognized the USSR in July 1933, but Madrid’s efforts to name an envoy were stymied by changes of government, while Moscow’s appointed representative, Anatoly Lunacharsky, had fallen ill in Paris en route to Madrid and died on the Cote d’Azur at age fifty-eight (Dec. 26, 1933), never taking up his post. Lunacharskaia-Rozenel’, Pamiat’ serdtsa, 15–6. Lunacharsky had written the play Don Quixote Liberated (1922), one of the few interesting books in Russian on Spanish culture.

25. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 107–8; Alpert, New International History, 19–24.

26. British intelligence had been warning about Comintern “financing” and “overt and subterranean activities in Spain,” while advising its French counterparts that “the establishment of a Soviet regime in the Iberian Peninsula is hardly a happening which anyone can view with equanimity for military, political or economic reasons.” The British ambassador to Madrid, Sir Henry Chilton, had bluntly warned that “if the military coup d’état, which it is generally believed is being planned, does not succeed, things will turn pretty awful.” Jeffrey, MI6, 22; Little, Malevolent Neutrality, 196; Steiner, Triumph of the Dark, 202–3. On July 26, Baldwin instructed foreign secretary Eden “that on no account, French or other, must he bring us into the fight on the side of the Russians.” Jones, Diary with Letters, 213.

27. Churchill, Step by Step, 76; Moradiellos, “Origins of British Non-Intervention.”

28. “Non-Intervention,” Blum’s chef de cabinet would later assert, “was essentially an attempt to prevent others from doing what we were incapable of achieving.” Lacouture, Léon Blum, 370.

29. Abendroth, Hitler in der spanischen Arena.

30. Göring had objected to Franco’s request. Leitz, “Nazi Germany Intervention,” 53–85; Kershaw, Hitler: 1889–1936, 13–7; von Ribbentrop, Memoirs, 59; Preston, Franco, 158–60.

31. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, III/ii: 140 (July 27, 1936).

32. Mussolini added: “to found a parliamentary republic today [1931] means using an oil lamp in the era of electric lights.” Bosworth, Mussolini, 315; Coverdale, Italian Intervention.

33. Bosworth, Mussolini, 316–7.

34. Jackson, “French Strategy,” 55–80.

- ³⁵. Coulondre, De Staline à Hitler, 20–2. See Ford and Schorske, “Voice in the Wilderness,” 556–61; and Jordan, Popular Front, 228.
- ³⁶. “O tak nazyvavomom ‘antisovetskom ob’edinennom trotskistsko-zinov’ievskom tsentre,” 94.
- ³⁷. Il’inskii, Narkom Iagoda, 709–16; Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 89.
- ³⁸. “My soul burns with one desire: to prove to you that I am no longer an enemy,” Zinoviev wrote to Stalin in 1935. “I am at the point where I sit for long periods and stare at your portrait in the newspapers and those of other members of the Politburo thinking: my dear ones, look into my heart and surely you will see that I’m no longer your enemy . . .” Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 184–5. “There has been a distinct cooling in my relations with Zinoviev,” Kamenev told his interrogator. “I think it necessary to mention that living in one dacha in the summer of 1934 we led completely separate lives and met rarely. . . . At the time of the inner-party struggle, I never regarded Zinoviev as fit to run the party; the recent years have confirmed my conviction that he possesses no leadership qualities.” Volkogonov, Lenin, 286, citing Arkhiv Ministerstvo Bezopasnosti Rossiiskoi Federatsii no. R-33 834, t. 1, l. 107. See also Izvestiia, March 21, 1990 (Kamenev to his wife, T. Glebova, Nov. 12, 1935).
- ³⁹. Profound insight into a despot’s psychology can be found in Canetti, Crowds and Power, esp. 231–4. Rogovin, 1937, 5–9.
- ⁴⁰. Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 135–6. Kaganovich confirmed the fact that Stalin and Voroshilov received Zinoviev and Kamenev: Chuev, Tak govoril Kaganovich, 140.
- ⁴¹. Trotskii, Prestupleniia Stalina, 72.
- ⁴². Yagoda was said to have written across the interrogation testimony of a link to Trotsky: “untrue,” “rubbish.” Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 179; “Materialy marto-fevral’skogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1994, no. 12), 18.
- ⁴³. On July 21, 1936, for example, Manuilsky relayed to Stalin a note with a citation from a document received from the head of the Spanish Communist party to the effect that “the military uprising has been put down.” Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 28 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 33). The British intercepted and decrypted the Spanish Communist party ciphered telegrams. Roberts, “Soviet Foreign Policy and the Spanish Civil War,” 100n11 (citing PRO HW/17/27).
- ⁴⁴. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 28 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 34).
- ⁴⁵. RGASPI, f. 495, op. 18, d. 1101, l. 15, 21–3 (ECCI Protocol No. 60, July 23, 1936); Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin, 46–8 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 210, l. 2–3).
- ⁴⁶. Meshcheriakov, “SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii,” 85 (citing AVP RF, f. 048 z, op. 14–6, d. 4, pap. 7, l. 69–106).
- ⁴⁷. Steiner, Triumph of the Dark, 187. Stalin’s Kremlin office logbook shows few or no visitors July 25–27, 1936. Na prieme, 190.
- ⁴⁸. Na prieme, 190–1.
- ⁴⁹. VII Kongress Kommunisticheskogo Internatsionala, 10–1, 28–33.
- ⁵⁰. Titarenko, VKP (b), komintern i kitai: dokumenty, IV/ii: 1055–60 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 249, l. 8–17; Dimitrov to Stalin, early July 1936); Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin, 96–100.
- ⁵¹. Titarenko, VKP (b), komintern i kitai: dokumenty, IV/ii: 1060–4 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 18, d. 1101, l. 17–20; edited transcript). See also Braun, Comintern Agent in China; and Garver, “Origins of the Second United Front.”
- ⁵². Borkenau, who went to Spain in Sept. 1936, was describing the scene in Barcelona, and added: “Practically all the factory-owners, we were told, had either fled or been killed, and their factories taken over by the workers.” Borkenau, Spanish Cockpit, 70–1. In a 1936 biography of Vilfredo Pareto, Borkenau employed the latter’s “circulation of elites” theory to try to explain the rise of and affinities among Italian fascism, Nazism, and Soviet communism. Jones, “Toward a Theory of Totalitarianism,” 457.
- ⁵³. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 29–31 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 38–40).
- ⁵⁴. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 84–5. Primakov names two Soviet agents in Trotsky’s inner circle, one code-named “Tomas,” the other “Tyulpan,” which is known to be Zborowski. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 82.
- ⁵⁵. Hoidal, Trotsky in Norway.

- 56. Zipperstein, “Underground Man.”
- 57. Volkogonov, Trotskii, II: 134–5 (citing Arkhiv INO OGPU, f. 31660, d. 9067, t. 1, l. 24–5). See also Antonov, “Kaznen i opravdan.”
- 58. In 1934, Stalin had quoted Trotsky’s Bulletin of the Opposition from the dais of the 17th Party Congress: XVII s’ezd, 32. In 1935, Yezhov quoted from Trotsky’s Bulletin at length at a Central Committee meeting. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 542, l. 73–6. In March 1937, Yezhov’s staff in the NKVD would give Stalin a very detailed compilation of all Trotskyite publications on every continent, with their contents outlined. Volkogonov, Trotskii, II: 141–2 (citing Arkhiv INO OGPU-NKVD, f. 17548, d. 0292, l. 17); Volkogonov, Trotsky, 347. At least one concrete example of draft articles forwarded before publication to Stalin (and Molotov), by Yezhov, has come to light. Volkogonov, Trotskii, II: 141 (citing Arkhiv INO OGPU-NKVD, f. 17548, d. 0292, t. 2, l. 160). See also Poretsky, Our Own People, 272–3.
- 59. Trotsky, “Lesson of Spain.”
- 60. Pozharskaia and Saplin, Komintern i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 9; Payne, Spanish Civil War, 124.
- 61. The official post-Soviet history of intelligence justifies Stalin’s assassination of Trotsky by referring to the latter’s responsibility for the fever pitch of anti-Sovietism abroad, the supposed role of Trotskyites in destabilizing the Spanish Republic, and the threat of the Fourth International. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 90. The forged Litvinov “diaries” that were handed to Carr and published in 1955 observed of Spain: “There was some confusion there. The Trotskyites have started a strong propaganda campaign against Iosif Vissarionovich calling him liquidator and traitor to the Spanish revolution, abettor of Hitler and Mussolini.” Litvinov, Notes for a Journal, 208, 211. The forger appears to have been Besedovsky, who figures prominently in them. Wolfe, “Adventures in Forged Sovietica”; Wolfe, “Case of the Litvinov Diary”; Wolfe, Strange Communists, 207–22. See also Agursky, “Soviet Disinformation,” 21. Litvinov’s actual diary is thought to have been destroyed by his American wife, Ivy’s, closest confidant, Joseph Freeman. Danielson, “Elusive Litvinov Memoirs.”
- 62. Pravda’s editorial (June 7, 1936) echoing Postyshev’s stance decried blanket accusations against the “majority of engineering and technical personnel.” Postyshev himself was criticized at the June 1936 plenum for a “high-handed” approach to the expulsions of rank and file party members.
- 63. Sovet pri narodnom komissare tiazhelei promyshlennosti SSSR, 25–29 iunია 1936 g.: stenograficheskii otchet (Moscow, 1936), 390; Khlevniuk, 1937–i, 116–20, 122; Khlevniuk, Stalin i Ordzhonikidze, 60–3; Benvenuti, “Stakhanovism and Stalinism,” 42–9; Davies, “Soviet Economy,” 20–1; Pravda, July 5, 1936. Zhdanov noted in a speech (July 16, 1936) that “it is not possible to declare that all engineers and technicians who do not lead the Stakhanovite movement are saboteurs.” Priestland, Politics of Mobilization, 347 (citing RGASPI, f. 77, op. 1, d. 600, l. 19).
- 64. Rybin, Kto otravil Stalina?, 23–4 (citing conversations with V. Tukov, one of Orjonikidze’s guards, responsible for his train carriage when he visited factories around the country).
- 65. Za industrializatsiiu, Feb. 20, 1937: 5 (S. Birman); Ordzhonikidze, O Sergo Ordzhonikidze, 259 (quoting I. I. Gudov); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 978, l. 75.
- 66. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 627 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 743, l. 53).
- 67. “Zakrytoe pis’mo Tsk VKP (b),” 100–15; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 250–7. Stalin’s motives have been a matter of guesswork: Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 203–6. Getty and Naumov speculate that the secret circular was actually Yezhov’s initiative, in a careerist move. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 578. Agranov divulged to a meeting of the NKVD “active” that the original trial of Zinovievites, in 1935, had resulted not from operational work, but from a command from the country’s leadership. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 90 (March 1937).
- 68. Harris, Great Urals, 178–9.
- 69. Rees, Stalinism and Soviet Rail Transport, 144–8 (citing Sotsialisticheskii transport, 1936, no. 5: 8, 150, 158–9); Pravda, July 31 and Aug. 2, 1936.
- 70. Izvestiia, Aug. 26, 27, 1936; Rees, Stalinism and Soviet Rail Transport, 150.
- 71. Izvestiia, Feb. 20, 1937.
- 72. Radek, “Dikhanie voiny.”
- 73. Vostryshev, Moskva Stalinskaia, 348.
- 74. “I am full of doubts,” Gide said in Pasternak’s oral account. “What I have seen in your country is not at all what I anticipated. Here state power is unbelievable. . . . While I was in France, it seemed that here there was personal freedom, but in reality I do not see it. This concerns me greatly, and I want to write about it in an essay and I came here to consult with you about it.” RGASPI, f. 57, op., 1, d. 64, l. 58–61 (Report to Molchanov). Christopher J. Barnes, Boris Pasternak: A Literary Biography, vol. 2 (New York: Cambridge University, 1998), 127–32. Gide took off for Soviet Georgia and Crimea, and would depart the USSR almost without notice.

75. Mikhail Kol'tsov, “Ispanskii dnevnik: kniga pervaiia,” Novyi mir, 1938, no. 4: 5–125 (at 5), reprinted in Kol'tsov, Ispanskii dnevnik, 11–2.

76. Kirschenbaum, “Exile, Gender, and Communist Self-Fashioning,” 572. When We of Kronstadt (1936), Yefim Dzigani's tale of an anarchist band's transformation into disciplined Red Army men during Russia's civil war, premiered in Spain, the entire Spanish Republic cabinet attended. Kowalsky, “Soviet Cinematic Offensive”; Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 51 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 86).

77. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 32 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 44); Pravda, Aug. 4 and 5, 1936; Izvestiia, Aug. 4 and 5, 1936; Trud, Aug. 4 and 5, 1936.

78. RGASPI, f. 495, op. 18, d. 1105, l. 1.

79. By the end of Oct., nearly 48 million rubles would be deducted from the pay of Soviet factory workers in solidarity with Spain. That was equivalent to £2 million sterling. Izvestiia, Oct. 27, 1936.

80. Pravda, Aug. 3, 1936; Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraphs 187–8. “The German and Italian fascists are preparing to intervene against the Spanish revolution to place in their hands the important trump cards for preparation of a world war and a new territorial distribution of the world,” Radek explained, outlining the case in Izvestiia (Aug. 4, 1936) for “humanitarian” aid by the USSR.

81. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 111, citing FRUS, 1936, II: 461 (Henderson to Hull).

82. Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War, 43.

83. DDF, 1e série, III: 97–8, 100–1.

84. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 339n2 (RGASPI, f. 71, op. 25, d. 3663); DVP SSSR, XIX: 392–3 (Weinberg, head of the Western department, report on conversation with Payart); 393–4 (Krestinsky to Maitsky); Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, III: 203; Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 112; Izvestiia, Aug. 6, 1936.

85. Volkogonov, Trotsky, 370 (citing Arkhiv INO OGPU-NKVD, f. 17548, d. 0292, t. 2, l. 130–2).

86. Volkogonov, who has little to say about Spain, noted that “Stalin's determination to get rid of Trotsky stiffened when he learned in late 1936 that Trotsky was writing The Revolution Betrayed and continuing his biography of Stalin himself.” Volkogonov, Trotsky, 444.

87. See also MacNeal, “Trotskyist Interpretations of Stalinism.”

88. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 189 (RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 168, l. 202: testimony attributed to Pikel); Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 81; Pravda, Aug. 20, 1936 (Reingold).

89. Haslam, “Spanish Problem,” 70–85 (citing PRO, HW17/26: British decryptions of Comintern telegrams). “Madrid's not receiving substantial external assistance could have heavy consequences for the course of the struggle,” Soviet military intelligence concluded in Aug. 1936. Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X”, 20 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 845, l. 9). On Aug. 7, 1936, the politbiuro approved Krestinsky's proposal to invite Blum of France's Popular Front government to Moscow. No visit materialized. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 338–9 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 20, l. 38); DVP SSSR, XXII: 49.

90. DVP SSSR, XIX: 394–6 (Stein); Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 112–3. See also Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 340 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 20, l. 58).

91. Moradiellos, “British Government and General Franco,” 44 (citing PRO FO371/20475, W11340, Sir Maurice Hankey, The Future of the League of Nations).

92. Krestinsky had written to Surits (Aug. 11) that “we recently discussed the so-called 500-million credit. It was rejected.” Abramov, “Osobaia missiia David Kandelaki,” 149 (citing AVP RF, f. 010, op. 11, pap. 68, d. 34, l. 130, 131).

93. Toose, Wages of Destruction, 205 (citing Institut für Konjunkturforschung, Weekly Report, May 6, 1936).

94. DGFP, series C, V: 853–62 (unsigned; Hitler's authorship established in a note by Speer, Aug. 1936).

95. According to an official then working in the Western military district: Samsonov, “Smysl ego zhizhi,” 217.

- ⁹⁶. Tooze, Wages of Destruction, 219–24.
- ⁹⁷. Titarenko, VKP (b), komintern i kitai: dokumenty, IV/ii: 1067 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 275, l. 1: Dimitrov to Stalin, July 27, 1936), 1067–71 (l. 5–9); Titarenko, Kommuunisticheskii internacional, 262–6, 266–9; Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin, 101 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 73, d. 48, l. 54), 102–5.
- ⁹⁸. Schram, Mao's Road to Power, V: 232–32.
- ⁹⁹. Meshcheriakov, “SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii,” 83–4 (citing AVP RF, f. 048 z, op. 14–6, pap. 4, d. 7, l. 194–5).
- ¹⁰⁰. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 42 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 66); Zuehlik, Gallant Cause, 35. See also Karmen, No Pasaran!; and Makaseev, “Iz khroniki geroicheskoi respubliki,” 158–64. Karmen would make the film Ispania (1939).
- ¹⁰¹. Litvinov instructed the Soviet chargé d'affaires in Paris to inform the Spanish ambassador that “the Soviet leadership does not consider it possible to comply with requests to supply arms on the grounds that Spain is far away from Russia, such deliveries are expensive, arms cargo can be intercepted, and because the USSR is bound by its declaration of nonintervention and cannot violate it.” DVP SSSR, XIX: 402–3; Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, III: 203–4.
- ¹⁰². Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 219; “O tak nazyvaemom ‘parallel’nom antisovetskom trotskistom tsentre,” 37. Pyatakov’s ex-wife Zina had been arrested in Dec. 1927 as a Trotskyite and internally exiled. See also Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 311. After Pyatakov, in bilateral negotiations, had unwittingly demonstrated too detailed knowledge of German metal industry, a Soviet undercover agent in Germany was arrested. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 157 (referencing uncited recollections of Spiegelglass).
- ¹⁰³. Pravda, Aug. 15, 1936.
- ¹⁰⁴. For Stalin’s role micromanaging the trial, see “O tak nazyvaemom ‘antisovetskom ob’edinennom trotskistsko-zinov’evskom tsentre,” 92. See also “O tak nazyvaemom ‘parallel’nom antisovetskom trotskistskom tsentre,” 42. The trial transcript was made available in foreign translations, including in English: The Case of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite Center (New York, 1936). For a multisided analysis of how contemporaries saw the trial, including Trotsky’s misapprehensions, see Schrader, Der Moskauer Prozess 1936.
- ¹⁰⁵. Kamenev’s Machiavelli volume was quoted against him at his trial in 1936. “You, Kamenev, transmitted the rules of Machiavelli and developed them to the height of unprincipled-ness and immorality,” thundered Vyshinsky, who deemed Machiavelli the “spiritual teacher” of the Trotskyites. Yet Vyshinsky also called the Italian “a bumpkin” and amateur compared with the Trotskyites. Vyshinskii, Sudebnye rechi, 403–4.
- ¹⁰⁶. Testimony about a 1932 meeting that had allegedly taken place with Trotsky in Copenhagen’s Hotel Bristol ignored that the building had been torn down in 1917 (the NKVD fabricators confused two sites). Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 70.
- ¹⁰⁷. Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 187–8.
- ¹⁰⁸. Izvestiia, Aug. 21, 1936.
- ¹⁰⁹. Dem’ian Bednyi, “Poshchady net!” Pravda, Aug. 21, 1936, reprinted in Literaturnaia gazeta, Aug. 27, and in Bednyi, Sobranie sochinenii, IV: 288–90. See also Horvath, “Poet of the Terror”; Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 415–6 (Sept. 9, 1938). On Aug. 13, 1936, in the presence of Molotov, Voroshilov, Orjonikidze, and Yezhov, Bednyi spent an hour in the Little Corner, his one and only recorded visit to Stalin’s Kremlin office. Bednyi’s abandoned wife, Vera Rufovna [Pridvorova], had written to Stalin indicating that she wanted to ask him for material help for her four children, possibly reminding the dictator of the poet’s existence. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 421–2 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 702, l. 109, 110–1); Na prieme, 191. Before the year was out, Bednyi would be fearing arrest. He would somehow survive. Pridvorov, “Ob otse,” 219.
- ¹¹⁰. Whereas since 1931 more than 40 percent of the correspondence had concerned economic matters (internal and external), especially grain collections, in 1936 these nearly vanished—despite the fact that a spring–summer drought in the Volga heartland and other difficulties resulted in a poor harvest in fall 1936. Davies, “Soviet Economy,” 22–3.
- ¹¹¹. Stalin had afforded Bukharin an opportunity to defect: in Feb. 1936, he had appointed Bukharin to lead a commission to purchase a Marx-Engels archive in France, leaving the trip’s duration up to Bukharin and permitting the pregnant Larina to join him. But his father, brother, first wife, second wife, and daughter lived in Moscow, and the trip to France had taken place before Zinoviev and Kamenev had been executed. Cohen, Bukharin, 472; Liebich, “I Am the Last.” See also Dan, “Bukharin o Staline,” 181–2; and Nicolaevsky, Power and the Soviet Elite.

112. Trotsky, Writings of Leon Trotsky, 1935–1936, 389; Hoidal, Trotsky in Norway, 133–4. In Dec. Trotsky would be expelled from Norway, and placed on a Norwegian oil tanker to Mexico; en route he would write in his journal that Zinoviev and Kamenev “lacked sufficient character.” Trotsky, “Zinoviev and Kamenev [Dec. 31, 1936],” in Trotsky, Writings of Leon Trotsky, 1936–1937, 48–55 (at 49).

113. “Samoubištvo ne opravdano: predsmertnoe pišmo Tomskogo Stalinu,” Rodina, 1996, no. 2: 90–3; Gorelov, Tsugtsvang Mikhail Tomskogo, 234.

114. Pravda, Aug. 23, 1936. The Menshevik émigré newspaper eulogized Tomsy as a “most colorful and splendid figure among the Bolshevik leaders.” Sotsialisticheskii vestnik, Aug. 30, 1936: 11.

115. Molchanov, dispatched to Tomsy’s dacha to investigate the scene, retrieved the note, which stated: “If you want to know who it was that pushed me onto the path of right deviation in May 1928, ask my wife personally. Only she will name them.” Tomsy’s widow told Yezhov that the person who had recruited Tomsy to the path of opposition was none other than NKVD chief Yagoda. Yezhov’s report to Stalin defended Yagoda. Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 244–5; “O partiinosti lits, prokhodivshikh po delu tak nazyvaemogo ‘antisovetskogo pravitel’skogo bloka,’” 71. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 204–6 (no citation).

116. Kvashonkin, Bol’shevistskoe rukovodstvo, 16 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 5391, l. 3).

117. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 642–3 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 93, l. 77–80).

118. Stalin forbade mention of the fact that there would be no appeal (“these words are superfluous and would give a bad impression”). Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 642 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 93, l. 62–4).

119. Vostryshchev, Moskva stalinskaia, 349 (Alexander G. Solovyov).

120. Eduard Goltzman wrote a note that he would not seek clemency. Volkogonov, Lenin, 276 (citing AMBRE, archive no. R-33833, t. 41, l. 256).

121. Conquest, Great Terror: Reassessment, 71–108; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 247–57.

122. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 44 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 217, l. 22); Izvestiia, Aug. 28, 1936.

123. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 43 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 217, l. 21), 44 (l. 20).

124. Antonov-Ovseyenko would take to the Spanish assignment energetically, writing pleading notes to Kaganovich suggesting resolute measures for organizing serious military resistance even before he had reached Barcelona (Oct. 1). Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 67 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 217, l. 23), 70 (d. 221, l. 141), 81–2 (l. 184–5); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 981, l. 213; Izvestiia, Oct. 3, 1936; Ehrenburg, Sobranie sochinenii, IX: 114–9. Antonov-Ovseyenko wrote to Rosenberg (Oct. 6): “Our view of anarchism in Catalonia is a mistaken one . . . The government is genuinely willing to organize a defense and it is doing a lot in that direction.” Ehrenburg, who arrived in Spain from Paris in the latter part of August 1936 as a special correspondent for Izvestiia, had already written to Rosenberg, in letters sent on to Stalin, accusing the anarchists of not understanding the critical importance of heavy industry and discipline, being infiltrated by German agents and, under the guise of pressing for “revolution,” aiming to demoralize and defeat the Republic. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 259, l. 73–4; Radosh et al., Spain Betrayed, 23–32; Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 39 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 217, l. 19), 43 (l. 17), 110 (d. 222, l. 88), 113–14 (l. 87); Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 342–3 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 20, l. 162); Ehrenburg, Sobranie sochinenii, IX: 100. By Nov. 1936, Antonov-Ovseyenko was complaining of the anarchy caused by the anarchists: Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 142–3 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 222, l. 145–46ob.).

125. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 39 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 217, l. 11). See also Efimov, “Vernost’ prizvaniu,” 29.

126. Koltsov had also composed profiles of Lenin (1920, 1923, 1924), Dzierżyński (1928), Gorky (1932, 1936), and Stakhanov (1935), and captured the boorishness of the new epoch in his short story “Ivan Vădimovich, A Person of a Certain Level.” Kol’tsov, Khochu letat’; Kol’tsov, Izbrannye proizvedeniia v trekh tomakh; Kol’tsov, Pisatel’ v gazete.

- ¹²⁷ Cockburn, In Time of Trouble, 245.
- ¹²⁸ Skorokhodov, Mikhail Kol'tsov, 158–9. On Koltsov's links to Soviet military intelligence in Spain, see Volodarsky, Stalin's Agent, 219, citing Paulina Abramson and Adelina Abramson, Mosaico Roto (Madrid: Compañía Literaria, 1994), 64 (Emma Wolf, Vladimir Gorev's interpreter and perhaps mistress). Ehrenburg would later call his rival Koltsov "the most important" Soviet representative in Spain, "more important than the official advisers." Literaturnaia gazeta, June 15, 1988. A recommendation by Berzin and Gorev (Jan. 4, 1937) to award Koltsov the Order of Lenin would be downgraded by Stalin to an Order of the Red Banner. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 170 (APRE, f. 3, op. 53, d. 470, l. 124). On May 23, 1937, Koltsov would send a telegram directly to Stalin from Paris about preparations for an antifascist congress in Spain; it included a number of political observations about Largo Caballero and Negrín, as well as about Ehrenburg and Gide. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 468 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 214, l. 67–8). Koltsov's archive seems not to have survived. Rubashkin, Mikhail Kol'tsov.
- ¹²⁹ Trotsky, "The Treachery of the POUM," New Militant, Feb. 15, 1936, and Trotsky, "The Tasks of the Fourth International in Spain," New Militant, May 2, 1936, reprinted in Trotsky, Spanish Revolution, 207–11, 211–4. Trotsky similarly condemned Spain's anarchists.
- ¹³⁰ Rogovin, 1937, 341 (citing Trotsky archives, document no. 5020); Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 631; Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 56–7 (1937): 14–5. See also Trotsky, "Lessons of Spain," 322.
- ¹³¹ Kennan, Russia and the West, 238.
- ¹³² Rogovin, 1937, 40–5, 8.
- ¹³³ Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 664–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 94, l. 32–9).
- ¹³⁴ Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 249–52 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 729, l. 83–4). On Aug. 22, 1936, in connection with the Moscow trial, Budyonny had sent a letter to Voroshilov noting that the Trotskyite network had penetrated the army, which needed to be thoroughly checked; Voroshilov forwarded the letter to Stalin, Yezhov, and Andreyev (Sept. 1). Whitewood, Red Army, 202 (citing RGVA, f. 4, op. 19, d. 16, l. 262, 265).
- ¹³⁵ Volkogonov, Lenin, 298 (Sept. 1, 1936).
- ¹³⁶ Jansen and Petrov, Stalin's Loyal Executioner, 58 (citing APRE, f. 57, op. 1, d. 176; RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 176, l. 66–74).
- ¹³⁷ Davies et al., Stalin-Kaganovich Correspondence, 357.
- ¹³⁸ RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 710, l. 164–5.
- ¹³⁹ RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 779, l. 99–107; Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 154.
- ¹⁴⁰ Arkhiv MB r-3383, d. 3257, Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 4.
- ¹⁴¹ RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 779, l. 106. On Sept. 11, when Stalin had Pyatakov's arrest submitted for post-facto politburo approval, Orjonikidze wrote: "I vote 'Yes.'" RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 94, l. 75, 84; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 290–1 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 573, l. 33). The NKVD arrested Radek on Sept. 16. Radek's mouth was a security risk: Lerner, Karl Radek, 163–4 (citing memo from Bullitt to Hull, Decimal Files, U.S. Department of State Archives, file no. 7600.61/692); Ken, "Karl Radek i Biuro," 173–4.
- ¹⁴² Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 340 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 20, l. 62); DVP SSSR, XIX: 418 (to S. B. Kagan). Litvinov had written to Rosenberg (Aug. 30, 1936) in Madrid that "the question of assisting the Spanish government has been discussed by us several times, but we have come to the conclusion that it will be impossible to send anything from here." Meshcheriakov, "SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii," 85, citing AVP RF, f. 048 z, op. 14–16, pap. 4, d. 7, l. 88, 105–6. See also Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War, 46 (citing AVP RF, f. 05, op. 16, pap. 114, d. 1, l. 195–8; Sept. 7).
- ¹⁴³ Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 434, 441; Pravda, Sept. 4, 1936.
- ¹⁴⁴ These developments were reported by Diaz, the Spanish Communist party head, via Comintern channels to Kaganovich as symptomatic of Popular Front internal tension. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 44–5 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 74), 45 (l. 78).
- ¹⁴⁵ Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 666 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 94, l. 53–4). Precisely when Stalin ordered and approved contingency planning for Soviet military assistance to Spain remains uncertain. On Aug. 13, he had received Vladimir Gorev and Semyon Uritsky together for twenty minutes. Na prieme, 191. Around the time of the Sept. 6 telegram, Stalin was also exchanging instructions with Kaganovich about Soviet protests to the Norwegian government about Trotsky's political activities.

146. Meshcheriakov, "SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii," 85.

147. Banac, Diary of Gerogi Dimitrov, 27 (Aug. 28, 1936); Richardson, Comintern Army, 30–46; Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 439–50; Eby, Comrades and Commissars; Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 115, 162 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 222, l. 90–1, 187). An international brigade training base was set up near Albacete, where the first 500 volunteers commenced their service on Oct. 14, 1936, and as many as 35,000 foreigners would be trained. Novikov, SSSR, Komintern, II: 100 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 76, l. 33, l. 18).

148. Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service, 95.

149. On Aug. 21–22, 1936, with the trial in Moscow climaxing, the politburo had formally approved the dispatch of a group of military and intelligence personnel, as well as the diplomats, to Spain. Kowalsky, Stalin, chap. 2, note 21 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 980, l. 308; d. 981, l. 213), 65, d. 217, l. 20, 22).

150. Kuznetsov, Na dalekom meridian, 8–15. Kuznetsov got to Spain Sept. 5.

151. On Gorev in the United States, see Ulanovskaia and Ulanovskaia, Istoriia odnoi sem'i, 101.

152. Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service, 96–9.

153. Pospelov, Istoriia Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny, I: 113; Rybalkin, Operatsiia "X", 11n6.

154. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 132; Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 462, citing Aleksandr Orlov, "Answers to the Questionnaire of Prof. S. G. Payne" (unpublished, 1968), 1–3.

155. Fischer, Men and Politics, 361.

156. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 45; Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 349; Volodarsky, Stalin's Agent, 129. The assistant was Galina Voitova.

157. Volodarsky, Stalin's Agent, 153 (citing stamp in Orlov's diplomatic passport, a copy of which is at LSE's Cañada Blanch Centre).

158. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 48–50 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 103–6).

159. Steiner, Triumph of the Dark, 215–6; Girard de Charbonnières, La plus evitable de toutes les guerres, 114–22; Gromyko and Ponomarev, Istoriia vneshnei politiki SSSR, I: 321.

160. Edwards, British Government and the Spanish Civil War, 137.

161. Isserson, "Zapiski sovremennika o M. N. Tukhachevskom," 73–5.

162. Ovchinnikov et al., Krasnoznamennyi Belorusskii voennyi okrug, 119–20; Sovetskaia voennaia entsiklopediia, V: 121.

163. Martel, Russian Outlook, 21–4; Erickson, Soviet High Command, 436–7. See also Lukes, Czechoslovakia Between Stalin and Hitler, 91. Major General Archibald P. Wavell, head of the British delegation, spoke Russian.

164. DDF, 2e série, IV: 510–4 (Daladier to Delbos, Oct. 13, 1936, reference to Schweighuth report Oct. 5). Schweighuth had traveled to Czechoslovakia (Aug. 15–Sept. 1) on his way to the USSR (Sept. 5–23).

165. Colton, Leon Blum, 211; Young, In Command of France, 147–8, 288n50.

166. DDF, 2e série, III: 511–4 ("Rapport du General Schweighuth, Chef de la Mission française," included in note from Daladier to foreign minister Delbos, Oct. 13, 1936); Dreifort, "French Popular Front," 218–9; Young, In Command of France, 145. See also Ragsdale, Coming of World War II, 32–3.

167. Yakir had visited France (August 19–September 2, 1936) accompanied by the Soviet military and aviation attachés and the air force officer Khripin, flattered his hosts, but back in the USSR quietly offered a negative assessment. Le Temps, Aug. 21, 26, 29, and Sept. 4, 1936; Pravda, Aug. 21 and Sept. 9, 1936; Orlov, "V poiskakh soizuznikov," 51.

168. Moravec added that soon enough the Soviets "made careful note of our experience with provincial newspapers, published in the smaller German towns, in which numerous indiscretions about military matters could still be found despite the severe Nazi censorship." Moravec, Master of Spies, 48–57.

169. Even British intelligence, by fall 1936, conceded German rearmament might be unlimited and aiming for domination of the continent. Wark, Ultimate Enemy, 228–31.

170. "No army," he wrote, "can manage without modern, well-organized and well-taught infantry." Habeck, Storm of Steel, 242–3 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 838, l. 2–5; Uborevicius to Voroshilov and Yegorov, Sept. 7–10, 1936; f.

4, op. 18, d. 53, l. 23–25, 712–7; Oct. 13–19, 1936). Voroshilov, in 1934, had called the tank corps “a very far-fetched idea and therefore we should have nothing to do with it.” Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 15.

171. At the invitation of General Fritsch, Uborevičius attended German maneuvers in fall 1936; Hitler became angry at German generals who “get drunk and go around with Communist generals.” Görlitz, German General Staff, 308; Hegner, Die Reichskanzlei, 255–6. Voroshilov tried to move Uborevičius to Moscow, out of his power base in the Belorussian military district. Fakel, II: 237–8 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 1/s, d. 151, l. 2–4); Minakov, 1937, 236–7. Yakir, who ran the Ukraine (then Kiev) military district for twelve years, for his part declined a promotion to head the general staff, also preferring a command in the field. Iakir, Komandarm Iakir, 226–7; Istoriia Kommunisticheskoi partii Sovetskogo Soiuza, IV/ii: 301.

172. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 32; Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 57–8 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 109–11). On Sept. 13, 1936, Yagoda submitted a memorandum to Kaganovich and Molotov in reference to an unspecified decision in the name of the politburo six days earlier about the clandestine purchase through third parties in Europe of rifles and fighter planes for Spain, which had been occasioned by a letter from Stalin in Sochi. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 52–3 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 92–6). The politburo had met on Sept. 11 in Stalin's absence and, in part, discussed Spain, but what decision was reached or confirmed remains unclear. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 666; Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 50–1 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 85).

173. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 54–6 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 97–101). See also Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraphs 458–62 (citing Iurii E. Rybalkin, “Voennaia pomoshch' Sovetskogo Soiuza ispanskomu narodu v natsional'no-revoliutsionnoi voine 1936–1939,” PhD diss, Institute of Military History [Moscow], 1992, 79). See also Novikov, SSSR, Komintern, II: 44.

174. Gorkii et al., Krakh germanskoi okkupatsii na Ukraine, 16.

175. Domarus, Hitler: Reden, II: 645 (editor's note). See also Kerll, Nürnberg 1936: Der Parteitag der Ehre.

176. Waddington, Hitler's Crusade, 109 (citing National Archives, State Department decimal file, 761.62/395: Dodd to Hull, Sept. 11). The British embassy in Berlin reported that “the extent of the attacks and their violent and pointed, and in fact provocative, nature exceeded all expectations.” DBFP, 2nd series, XVII: 319–26 (Newton, Sept. 23, 1936).

177. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, III/iii: 178 (Sept. 9, 1936).

178. Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War, 46–7 (citing AVP RF, f. 05, op. 16, papka, 114, d. 1, l. 213); RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 743, l. 56; DVP SSSR, XIX: 423, 762 n160; Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 341 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 20, l. 78).

179. Howson, Arms for Spain, 126.

180. Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X.” 26 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 266, l. 24; RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 845, l. 14, 17–18, 40; d. 848, l. 109).

181. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 115 (citing German intelligence reports). For Spain, 274 million rubles would be collected from 1936–39. Komshukov, “Natsional'no-revoliutsionnaia voina ispanskogo naroda,” 179. On aid, see also Novikov, SSSR, Komintern, I: 152–63; and RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 274, l. 1–2, 4–5.

182. Vechernyi Cheliabinsk, Aug. 9, 2001.

183. DVP SSSR, XIX: 762; Sipols, “SSSR i problema mira,” 51.

184. Dimitrov, “Zashchishchat' podlykh terroristov” (no. 14), 3–6, (no. 15), 17–8. In the same issue, Palmiro Togliatti presented Stalin's retrospective criminalization of long-ago factional activity as “an act to defend democracy, peace, socialism, and the revolution.” Ercoli, “Uroki protsessia,” 37, 43. “The Moscow trial has had a catastrophic effect and has dreadfully compromised the policy of the Popular Front,” the Austrian Marxist Rudolf Hilferding had lamented in Aug. 1936. McDermott and Agnew, Comintern, 156.

185. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 209 (citing author's archive); Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 53 (citing APRF, f. 57, op. 1, d. 27, l. 1–26; f. 045, op. 1, d. 729, l. 86–9).

186. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 66–7; Jansen and Petrov, Stalin's Loyal Executioner, 54.

187. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 147.

188. Orjonikidze was also summoned to Sochi from Kislovodsk, a distance of 200 miles over the mountains. Khlevniuk, In Stalin's Shadow, 104 (citing Kaganovich to Orjonikidze, Sept. 30, 1936: RGASPI, f. 85, op. 1/s. d. 136, l. 46).

189. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 682–3 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 94, l. 124–7).

190. Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol'shaia chistka, 241–2.

191. RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 852, l. 138–41; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 981, l. 50. Agranov was retained as deputy NKVD commissar under Yezhov.

192. Starkov, “Narkom Ezhov,” 27.

193. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 683n1 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 94, l. 131); Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 437–8 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 9, l. 239–40: Vlasik).

194. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 66.

195. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 148; RGASPI, f. 85, op. 27, d. 93, l. 12–23.

196. Shreider, NKVD iznuri, 35. Shreider recalled a conversation in which a colleague “began to extol [Yezhov’s] democratism and simplicity, explaining that he visited the offices of all the investigators, personally acquainting himself how the work was going” (37). Those visits often entailed Yezhov’s demonstrations of how to extract testimony by beating the accused to a pulp.

197. “O tak nazyvaemom ‘parallel’nom antisovetskom trotskistom tsentre,” 39; APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 241, l. 213. Also on Sept. 29, 1936, the politburo formally approved Operation X, which was well under way. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 75–7 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, 178–82), 78 (l. 173–7); Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X,” 28–9 (citing APRE, f. 3, op. 74, d. 20, l. 87); RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 20, l. 87.

198. Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X,” 42; Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 472 (citing RGAVMF, f. 1529, op. 1, d. 147, l. 56).

199. Grechko et al., Istoriia vtoroi mirovoi voyny, I: 54. Cf. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraphs 491–2.

200. Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X,” 37 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 853, l. 45); Howson, Arms for Spain, 125–6.

201. DVP SSSR, XIX: 463–4; Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, III: 211–2. On Oct. 6, 1936, Litvinov sent a telegram to Stalin (from Geneva) indicating that Blum had asked him to inform Stalin that Schacht had asked Blum to speak with British P.M. Baldwin about a pan-European settlement with Germany. When Blum had inquired whether the USSR could be included, Schacht answered that Hitler was unlikely to go for any direct agreement between Germany and the USSR, but that such an agreement might be reached indirectly. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 95, l. 23.

202. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 700 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 95, l. 97), 700 n2 (l. 96). Kaganovich told Stalin that the Spanish ambassador, Pascua, feared the fall of Madrid and was “not a genuine revolutionary-Bolshevik, but a Menshevik” (701–2: d. 743, op. 64–71: Oct. 11, 1936).

203. Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X,” 42 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 870, l. 341–3).

204. Gorev appended an eyewitness account: “the greatest impression, sometimes impossible to convey, was made by the tanks.” Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 105 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 222, l. 66–7: Oct. 16, 1936).

205. Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X,” 36–7, 43–5 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 870, l. 278–9); Grechko, Istoriia vtoroi mirovoi voyny, I: 53; Howson, Arms for Spain, 138–42; Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 502.

206. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraphs 503–14. When Kaganovich and Molotov reported (Sept. 5, 1936) on a proposed deal to sell England and Sweden petroleum products at a 5 percent discount to the world price, Stalin wrote back from Sochi, “Why . . . do we have so much oil? Stalin.” They informed him that that was standard international practice. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 94, l. 65–6. Stalin had just recommended selling oil to Republican Spain at well below world prices (d. 9, l. 28–30). The Nationalists got their oil from Standard Oil of New Jersey and the Texas Oil Company.

207. The regime discharged 22,000 soldiers for various reasons (including political ones) in 1936, worsening the housing shortage. RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 1045, Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 17.

208. The Soviets also unloaded on Spain some 280 British-, French-, and Japanese-made artillery pieces. Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X,” 30 (citing TsAMO, f. 119, op. 663, d. 1, l. 22: Nov. 2, 1936).

209. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 604 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 961, l. 158).

210. Meshcheriakov, “Sovetskii Soiz i antifashistskaia voina ispanского naroda,” 29; Radosh et al., Spain Betrayed, 147 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1010, l. 295; Krivoshein to Voroshilov, undated, probably early 1937); Rybalkin, Operatsiia "X," 25.

211. Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 255–6 (citing ASVRR, file 17679, operational correspondence, Spain, I: 20). On the mixed performance of Soviet military advisers, see Payne, Spanish Civil War, 166–72.

212. Pons, Global Revolution, 81 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 18, d. 1135).

213. Pravda, Oct. 16, 1936; Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, III: 212.

214. De Mayo, Last Optimist, 281, 285–6. It is possible other Soviet officials knew of the secret gold stash earlier than Rosenberg. The Spanish government made the request official on Oct. 15. Four days later, Krestinsky telegraphed Soviet assent and conditions to Rosenberg. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 89 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 234, l. 1), 99 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 234, l. 2; Krestinsky to Rosenberg, Oct. 13, 1936), 102 (l.3), 106 (l. 5), 107–9 (l. 9–10, 6, 11); Rybalkin, Operatsiia "X," 92–3 (citing APRF, f. 3, op. 74, d. 20, l. 104).

215. Kuznetsov worked with the Spanish navy, which had arrived at Cartagena around Oct. 18, to provide a secure escort. Possibly because of an enemy air raid, departure was delayed until the next night. Rybalkin, Operatsiia "X," 93 (APRF, f. 3, op. 74, d. 20, l. 104–5; RGVA f. 33987, op. 3, d. 912, l. 84); Bolloten, Spanish Civil War, 150; Kuznetsov, “S ispanskimi moriakami,” 241–4.

216. Rybalkin, Operatsiia "X," 31 (citing AVP RF, f. 010, op. 11, d. 53, pap. 71, l. 141: early Nov. 1936). See also Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 115; Pons, “Papers on Foreign and International Policy.” Litvinov wrote on a report by the Soviet delegate Stein from the League of Nations in Geneva that “France has given striking evidence of her weakness and indecision.” Dullin, Men of Influence, 127 (citing AVP RF, f. 5, op. 17, d. 128, pap. 15).

217. DVP SSSR, XIX: 463–4, 513–4.

218. DBFP, 2nd series, XVII: 475–6.

219. That Oct. 1936, a new French ambassador, Robert Coulondre, assumed his duties in Moscow and conveyed that French participation in any “preventive” war was unthinkable and instructed his hosts that Soviet interference in French domestic affairs was impermissible. Coulondre, De Staline a Hitler, 30–46.

220. DGFP, series C, V: 1066–8 (Oct. 12, 1936).

221. The memo by Schnurre called for trade to be “rendered completely non-political.” DGFP, series C, V: 1115–8; Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 284.

222. Surits wrote to Litvinov (Oct. 27, 1936) that “the initiative for revitalizing and strengthening economic relations in recent years has come from Göring and his entourage.” Abramov, “Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki,” 149 (citing AVP RF, f. 082, op. 19, pap. 83, d. 4, l. 110). In late Oct. 1936, Göring received Kandelaki (accompanied by Friedrichson), but would then push further contact into the hands of his cousin Herbert, who lacked the authority to make the decisions. Kandelaki would go back to Schacht, whose power had waned. Göring would pull together aluminum plants, oil refineries, ironworks, and manufacturing of synthetic oil and rubber (made from coal) and synthetic textiles (made from pulped wood). He also requisitioned foreign currency from the populace. Tooze, Wages of Destruction, 214 (citing BAI R2501 6446, 13–9), 219–24.

223. Khlevniuk, Stalin i Ordzhonikidze, 88–9; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 71, d. 43, l. 3, 26, 28–9, 31–2.

224. Izvestiia, Nov. 22, 1963.

225. Knight, Beria, 73–4; Vaksberg, Neraskrytye тайны, 123.

226. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 981, l. 384. His arrest was publicly announced on Nov. 14, 1936.

227. Ordzhonikidze, O Sergo Ordzhonikidze, 272 (Zinaida). Beria was preparing a volume of reminiscences on the occasion of Orjonikidze's fiftieth birthday. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 336 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 29, d. 418, l. 1).

228. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 173 (citation without specifics).

229. Leushin, “Ia davno uzhe ostavil sei greshnyi mir’: pis'ma Stalina s togo sveta,” Istochnik, 2003, no. 2: 33–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1160, l. 102–3, 98, 105, 107, 106). The AP bureau chief was Charles P. Nutter.

230. Rybalkin, Operatsiia "X," 94–5; Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 126 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 234, l. 34), 134–5 (l. 52–4). See also Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 124–5 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 234, l. 23–24), 126–7 (l. 36–7). Orlov received the Order of Lenin for the gold transfer, though his award was announced in Pravda under his former pseudonym (Nikolsky).

231. Karmen, No Pasarán!, 261; Volodarsky, Stalin's Agent, 172 and photographic plates (crediting Adelina Abramson-Kondratyeva, one of the attendees, LSE Cañada Blanch Centre).

232. Larina, This I Cannot Forget, 299; Cohen, Bukharin, 369; Volobuev and Kuleshov, Ochishchenie, 155. Rykov was evicted at this time from his Kremlin apartment and moved to the House on the Embankment.

233. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 108 (APRE f. 3, op. 24, d. 252, l. 99); Whitewood, Red Army, 206–10 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 29, d. 285, l. 22, 232–42); Cherushev, 1937 god, 70, 97. Arrests in the Red Army for Jan.–March 1937 kept the same pace: 125, including 43 officers. Whitewood, Red Army, 209 (f. 33837, op. 21, d. 107, l. 14).

234. The longer-term goal was to turn Spain into an economic colony. Harper, German Economic Policy; Leitz, Economic Relations; Barbieri, Hitler's Shadow Empire.

235. Ernest Hemingway, a war correspondent for the North American Newspaper Alliance living in Madrid's Florida Hotel, would complete Fifth Column, his first and only play, the next year. Kale, “Fifth Column.”

236. Soviet personnel viewed foreign embassy compounds and residences as storehouses for weapons to be used by fifth columnists, justifying raids and sweeping roundups. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 152–3; Kol'tsov, Ispaniia v ognе, II: 227.

237. Kol'tsov, Ispanskii dnevnik, 233–45.

238. Preston, Last Stalinist, 70–88.

239. Bollinger, “Fifth Column Marches On.”

240. V. A. Suiazin, “V boi vstupaiut istrebiteli,” in My internatsionalisty: vospominaniia sovetskikh dobrovol'tsev-uchastnikov natsional'noirevoliutsionnoi voiny v Ispanii (Moscow: Politizdat, 1975), 52. Airplane losses from accidents were high: 147 for the Republic, versus a mere 13 for the putschists. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 677.

241. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 724.

242. Medvedev, Nikolai Bukharin, 130; Conquest, Reassessment, 143–4, citing Solzhenitsyn, Gulag Arkhipelago, I: 415.

243. Preston, Franco, 205–6.

244. “Our great friend and parent,” Kaganovich wrote to Orjonikidze, “does not want to facilitate the nasty work of smothering the Spanish Republic, on the contrary he wants to help the Spanish Republic smother the fascists.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 151 (RGASPI, f. 85, op. 29, d. 435, l. 1–12; Oct. 12, 1936). Stalin told Spain's ambassador in Jan. 1937 that “in opposing the triumph of Italy and Germany, they are trying to prevent any weakening in France's power or military situation.” Smyth, “Soviet Policy,” 99.

245. DBFP, 2nd series, XVII: 30.

246. Pravda, Nov. 26, 1936; Chukovskii, Dnevnik, 149.

247. At the 7th Congress of Soviets, Pravda had announced a possible constitutional revision, including the prospect of direct, secret elections. Pravda, Feb. 7 and 8, 1935.

248. Bukharin and Radek, commission members, undertook analyses of the constitutions of Germany and of France; the commission also examined the Provisional Government's 1917 electoral law. On holiday in fall 1935, Stalin, working on a draft, asked Kaganovich for a copy of Switzerland's constitution (Kaganovich had it translated by Radek). RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 83, l. 92; d. 90, l. 121, 126; d. 53, l. 122; Pravda, July 8, 1935. An editorial subcommittee—Akulov, Krylenko, Vyshinsky, Stalin—drafted the text of the constitution.

249. Trotsky, “New Constitution.” Whether Trotsky's article influenced Stalin is unknown. Before it was published (May 9), but not necessarily before Stalin read it (it was finished April 16), Yakov Yakovlev, Stetsky, and Tal were summoned to the Little Corner (April 17, 18, 19, and 22, 1936) to go over the draft text of the constitution with Stalin. On May 15, the draft was discussed and further revised at a meeting.

250. Siegelbaum and Sokolov, Stalinism as a Way of Life, 158–206 (at 159–60).

251. Schapiro, Communist Party of the Soviet Union (2nd ed.), 410–1.

252. Translated in Field, Three French Writers, 29. See also Unger, Constitutional Development in the USSR.

253. For example: Petr Garvi, “Novaia Sovetskaiia konstitutsiia,” Sotsialisticheskii vetsnik, July 10, 1936. See also Liebh, From the Other Shore, 249–51.

254. Kozlov, Neizvestnaia Rossiia, II: 272–80. “Everybody thanks Soviet rule for the fact that the government took all the enterprises away from the landowners, and everybody thanks it for saying that there should be no war,” stated a letter from Voronezh province to Peasant Newspaper. “But people on the collective farm are not happy and everybody is hungry and are quietly saying, but obviously afraid to say, that because the whole enterprise belongs to the state, the peasant does all this work and has to give a certain amount from each hectare to the state, so that there will be no war.” She added that farmers wanted to quit the collectives, but newspapers made no mention of this. Siegelbaum and Sokolov, Stalinism as a Way of Life, 175 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 232, l. 83); 176 (l. 80–2).

255. In a few cases leaflets were printed and posted. Vasil’ev, “30-e gody na Ukraine.”

256. Many comments entailed demands to guarantee pensions, social insurance, and access to sanatoriums for collective farmers (the benefits accorded to workers). Siegelbaum and Sokolov, Stalinism as a Way of Life, 158–206; Petrone, Life Has Become More Joyous, 184–202. See also intelligentsia speculation about Stalin not trusting the party and instead wanting to be a president or emperor: Davies, Popular Opinion, 172 (citing TsGAIPD SPb, f. 24, op. 2b, d. 185, l. 50-2).

257. Trotsky, Revolution Betrayed, chap. 10 (“The Soviet Union in the Mirror of the New Constitution”). See also Hoffmann, Stalinist Values.

258. Chuev, Sto sorok, 289. Stalin had once said that “the dictatorship of the proletariat is the sharpest form of class struggle.” Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP IV: 654 (politburo meeting, uncorrected transcript, April 22, 1929).

259. Pravda, Nov. 26, 1936.

260. Krasnaia zvezda, Nov. 28, 1936. The order to print Stalin’s speech in 20 million brochure copies also ordered 5 million phonographic records. Petrone, Life Has Become More Joyous, 178 (citing RGALI, f. 962, op. 3, d. 293, l. 35, SSSR na ekrane, 1936, no. 10), 181–2 (TsMAM, f. 528, op. 1, d. 409, l. 7; f. 150, op. 5, d. 26. L. 163; TsAODM, f. 63, op. 1, d. 716, l. 4), 184–5. For the film of the speech: RGAKFD, 1–3470. Between 1921 and 1935, Stalin’s publications amounted to 160 separate items, in 75 languages, and nearly 116 million copies.

261. International Military Tribunal, X: 239–41. The negotiations had been conducted with Lieutenant-Colonel Hiroshi Ōshima, the military attaché to Berlin. Tokushirō, “Anti-Comintern Pact.”

262. Wheeler-Bennett, Documents on International Affairs, 299–300; Shirer, Berlin Diary, 69–70; DVP SSSR, XIX: 779 (Surits in Berlin to Moscow, Nov. 27, 1936). See also Beloff, Foreign Policy of Soviet Russia, I: 103.

263. Quoted in Chamberlain, Japan over Asia, 163–4. See also Presseisen, Germany and Japan, 115–6.

264. Presseisen, Germany and Japan, 190, citing International Military Tribunal for the Far East, Documents Presented in Evidence, exhibits 487, 3508; Jones, Japan’s New Order, 99n2.

265. Muggerridge, Ciano’s Diplomatic Papers, 58 (October 24, 1936). Alfred Rosenberg, the ideologue, had stated at a Nuremberg rally, “We acknowledge the destiny of the Yellow race and wish it in its own Lebensraum the development of its culture which originated from its racial soul.” Presseisen, Germany and Japan, 90; Baynes, Speeches of Adolf Hitler, II: 1258–9; Toynbee, Survey of International Affairs, 384–5n3; Rosenberg, Blut und Ehre, 347.

266. The Soviets undercut their own accusations that the pact was directed at the USSR by their long-standing pretense that the Comintern was an independent organization not controlled from Moscow.

267. “Well informed people refuse to believe that for the drawing up of the two scantily published articles of the German-Japanese agreement it was necessary to conduct negotiations for fifteen months, and that on the Japanese side it was necessary to entrust these negotiations to an Army general, and on the German side to an important diplomat,” Litvinov huffed to the Congress of Soviets (Nov. 28, 1936). Wheeler-Bennett, Documents on International Affairs, 1936, 302. The Soviet Union suspended the agreed but not yet signed bilateral fisheries convention with Japan. Grew, Ten Years in Japan, 196; Iklé, German-Japanese Relations, 41–2 (citing U.S. Govt., Dept. of State, Files 762.94/108: U.S. embassy in France to secretary of state).

268. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 240; Volkov, “Legendy i desiritel’nost’ o Rikharde Zorge,” 100; Korol’kov, Chelovek, dlia kotorogo ne bylo tain, 108; DGFP, series C, VI: 208 (Dirksen in Tokyo to Berlin, Dec. 23, 1936).

269. Peace and War—United States Foreign Policy, 340–2; Documents on International Affairs, I: 4–5. A Soviet diplomat in Tokyo would even inform his German counterparts that they had read the actual text. FRUS, Japan, 1931–1941, II, 153.

- 270. Chrezvychainyi VIII Vsesoiuznyi s"ezd Sovetov.
- 271. Waddington, Hitler's Crusade, 110 (citing BK, ZSg, 101/14, Presseanweisung, Nov. 28, 1931). Following a discussion with Hitler, Goebbels had recently written in his diary: "The showdown with Bolshevism is coming . . . The army is completely won over by us. Führer untouchable . . . Dominance in Europe is as good as certain." Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, III/ii: 251–2 (Nov. 15, 1936). In fact, German planning was directed at a war in the West, an aim for which the Hitler regime anticipated subordinating Poland and Hungary. Weinberg, Hitler's Foreign Policy, 13–4.
- 272. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, II: 272–3 (Dec. 2, 1936).
- 273. Moradiellos, "British Government and General Franco," 44 (citing PRO FO371/20470, W15925, minute by Gladwyn Jebb: Nov. 25, 1936).
- 274. Dullin, Men of Influence, 124–5 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1027, l. 148: Potyomkin to Krestinsky, Nov. 12, 1936; AVP RF, f. 010, op. 11, d. 77, l. 113: Litvinov to Potyomkin, Nov. 19).
- 275. Litvinov had made the same point. Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War, 60, 68. See also Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 122, citing Pravda, Nov. 29, 1936 (Litvinov speech to the Congress of Soviets).
- 276. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 254–89 (at 269, citing TsA FSB, f. 3–os, op. 4, d. 6, l. 1–61).
- 277. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 304–8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 575, l. 11–9, 40–5, 49–53, 57–60, 66–7); "Fragmenty stenogrammy dekabr'skogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1936 goda," 6; APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 256, l. 12.
- 278. Kaganovich differentiated party guilt from juridical guilt. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 309–12 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 575, l. 69–74, 82–6).
- 279. Mikoyan chimed in with other names (Skrypnyk, Khanjyan). RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1119, l. 63.
- 280. How many attendees (besides the stool pigeon Khrushchev) understood this targeting of Kaganovich remains unclear. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 156–8; Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 150–3; <http://www.gorlovka360.dn.ua/sport-izdorovie/stadion-shahter-virtualnyi-y-tur>; http://www.memo.ru/history/1937/dec_1936/VI9501.htm; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 312 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 576, l. 67–70); Rogovin, Stalin's Terror, 143. Shortly thereafter, Andreyev condemned Furer at a party meeting in Rostov. Khlevniuk, In Stalin's Shadow, 161.
- 281. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 132, l. 132; Khlevniuk, Khloziin, 277.
- 282. Jansen and Petrov, Stalin's Loyal Executioner, 58 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 575, l. 6–68); "Fragmenty stenogrammy dekabr'skogo plenuma TsK KPSS (b) 1936 goda," 4 (APRE, op. 76, d. 20, l. 129–133); Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 303–22 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 575, l. 69–74, 82–6, 94–7, 100–4, 122–6, 134–7, 1159–62, 165–7, 169–72; d. 576, 67–70); "O partiinosti lits, prokhodivshikh po delu tak nazyvaemogo 'antisovetskogo pravotrotskiskogo bloka,'" 75–6; Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 38–9. No transcript appears to exist of Stalin's full speech to the plenum, just excerpts.
- 283. Rogovin, 1937, 179–80. Bukharin ceased to be listed as editor from Jan. 16, 1937.
- 284. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 40 (Dec. 9, 1936). See also the entry for Nov. 26, 1936 (37).
- 285. Dmitri Bogomolov, the Soviet consul in China, told Dimitrov in Moscow (Dec. 9) that "Chiang Kai-shek will decide on an agreement with the Communists only on the brink of war with Japan and in connection with an agreement with the Soviet Union." Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 40.
- 286. Wai Chor, "Making of the Guomindang's Japan Policy."
- 287. Bertram, Crisis in China, 108.
- 288. Titarenko, VKP (b), komintern i kitai: dokumenty, IV/ii: 1068 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 275, l. 5–9).
- 289. Taylor, Generalissimo, 122, 124–5 (Zhang Xueliang, Columbia Interviews, XXXVII: 25–189).
- 290. Taylor, Generalissimo, 124 (Chiang Diaries, Hoover Institution Archives, box 39, folder 4: Nov. 24, 1936).
- 291. Zhang may have divulged to Mao's secret liaison in Xi'an that he intended to "stage a coup d'état." Guotao, Rise of the Chinese Communist Party, II: 478–9; Chang and Halliday, Mao, 181–2.
- 292. On Dec. 9, 1936, as a light snow fell, students marked the one-year anniversary of a nationwide anti-Japanese protest and headed out to confront Chiang; upon reaching Lintong they were fired upon; there were casualties. Taylor, Generalissimo, 126–7 (Zhang Xueliang, Columbia Interviews, XXXVII: 25–1901).

293. Li-fu, Storm Clouds, 119–20; Kai-shek, Soviet Russia in China, 73. Chinese Communists had repeatedly tried to solicit the help of the Young Marshal and, despite Moscow's warnings about his unreliability, preferred Zhang to the Nationalists. Many Chinese Communists were championing at the bit to eliminate Chiang by any means. See also Snow, Random Notes, 1–3.

294. Pantsov and Levine, Mao, 299, citing Ye Zilong, Ye Zilong huiyilu (Beijing: Zhongyang wenxian chubanshe, 2000), 38–9; Chang and Halliday, Mao, 183. See also Guotao, Rise of the Chinese Communist Party, II: 480.

295. Kai-shek, "A Fortnight," 58–63.

296. Peter H. L. and Edith Chang Papers, 1930s–2001, Columbia University, box 7.

297. Selle, Donald of China, 324. William Henry Donald, a journalist and assistant to Chiang, arrived in Xi'an on Dec. 14, sent by the wife, Soong Mayling, and brother T. V. Soong. Donald, once an adviser to Zhang (until 1933), was allowed to see Chiang, and pleaded with him to compromise on a united front and turn against the Japanese. Mayling, Sian.

298. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 41 (Dec. 13, 1936); RGASPI, f. 146, op. 2, d. 3, l. 29.

299. Krymov, Istoriko-memuarnye zapiski, 288–90.

300. Wu, Sian Incident, 101. Otto Braun, a Comintern official, recalled that word of the arrest "produced a genuine rapture, for Chiang Kai-shek was the most hated man in the CCP and the Chinese Red Army." At an open air meeting, Mao declared it time to settle accounts with the traitor and "bring him before a people's court." Those assembled adopted a resolution for a "mass trial" of Chiang Kai-shek. Braun, Comintern Agent in China, 183; Snow, Random Notes, 1; Short, Mao, 347; Guotao, Rise of the Chinese Communist Party, II: 481. Another account has Mao urging Zhou Enlai to make haste to Xi'an, several days away by horseback, to persuade Zhang "to carry out the final measure." Chang and Halliday, Mao, 184, citing Central Archive, 1997, 213, and Zhang Xueliang nianpo (Beijing, 1996), 1124.

301. Guotao, Rise of the Chinese Communist Party, II: 479–82; Taylor, Generalissimo, 128–9, citing Zhongguo gongchandang guanyu Xi'an shibian dangan shiliao xuanbian (Peking: Zhunguo dang'an chubanshe, 1997), 213.

302. Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin, 106 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 294, l. 6); Titarenko, VKP (b), komintern i kitai: dokumenty, IV/ii: 1084–5.

303. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 42; RGASPI, f. 146, op. 2, d. 3, l. 30.

304. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 41–2; RGASPI, f. 146, op. 2, d. 3, l. 29–30.

305. Na prieme, 195.

306. Titarenko, VKP (b), komintern i kitai: dokumenty, IV/ii: 1085–7 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 281, l. 11); Titarenko, Kommunisticheskie internatsional, 270 (abridged).

307. Shai, Zhang Xueliang, 77.

308. Gibson, "Chiang Kai-shek's Central Army," 333–4. See also van Slyke, Enemies and Friends, chapter 4; Wu, Sian Incident; Braun, Comintern Agent in China, 182–90; Sheng and Garver, "New Light on the Second United Front"; Garver, "Soviet Union and the Xi'an Incident."

309. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 42–3.

310. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 44 (Dec. 18, 1936); Radzinsky, Stalin, 352 (citing D. Karavkina, employee of VOKS, Dec. 19, 1936).

311. Snow, Random Notes, 1–3. Mao supposedly kept the telegram secret from Zhou, who was en route to persuade Zhang to execute Chiang; in any case Zhang had not moved to eliminate Chiang.

312. Pantsov and Levine, Mao, 302, citing Jin, Mao Zedong zhuan (1893–1949) (Beijing: Zhongyang Wenxian Chubanshe, 2003), 431–2.

313. Zhang had sent his personal Boeing for Zhou. Leonard, I Flew for China, 99. On Dec. 20, Zhang greeted T. V. Soong at the Xi'an airport and took him to Chiang; upon seeing his brother, a surprised Chiang wept. Chiang's wife, Mayling, arrived in Xi'an, too. Taylor, Generalissimo, 132 (T. V. Soong papers, box 60, folder 3), 133 (citing interview in 1995 with Wang Chi, who cited a conversation with Zhang; and T. V. Soong Papers, box 60, folder 3, pp. 6–7); Kai-shek, "Fortnight," 97; Mayling, Sian, 54–5.

314. Taylor, Generalissimo, 130 (citing Zhang Xueliang Interviews, Columbia University, XXIX: 25–1928); Suyin, Eldest Son, 153–4; Guotao, Rise of the Chinese Communist Party, II: 479–87.

315. Germany had its own naval technology (which the Soviets also sought). Maiolo, “Anglo-Soviet Naval Armaments Diplomacy.” See also Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 336 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 19, l. 185; May 27, 1936), 337 (l. 202; June 27); DVP SSSR, XIX: 272, 376. In London on July 17, 1937, Anglo-Soviet and Anglo-German naval treaties were signed, but Stalin’s large fleet construction appetites had only grown by then.

316. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 38–40; Volodarsky, Stalin’s Agent, 209 (citing PRO HW 17/27, mask traffic Moscow-Madrid-Moscow); Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 116; Communist International 142 (Feb. 1937): 136–8.

317. Kol’tsov, “Podlye manevery ispanskikh trotskistov,” 5; “Gnusnye manevery trotskistov v Katalonii,” Pravda, Dec. 17, 1936.

318. Also on December 17, an article appeared in the émigré press based on an interview with Noe Jordania, the exiled elder statesman of Georgian Marxism. “For him unacceptable methods do not exist . . . He is vindictive, ruthless, relentless. He is capable of any actions for the sake of power. The spirit of despotism of old times lives in him.” Vakar, “Stalin,” 2.

319. Kol’tsov, “Agentura trotskistov v Ispanii.” See also “Ispanskii dnevniki,” Notryi mir, no. 4 (1938): 5 (Jan. 21, 1937).

320. Valedinskii, “Organizm Stalina vpolne zdorovyi.”

321. Murin, Stalin v ob’iatiakh, 190–1. “Stalin’s children not there,” observed Dimitrov. “Till 5:30 in the morning!” Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 47 (Dec. 21, 1936).

322. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 156–7 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 222, l. 172–5); Pertsov, Voina i revoliutsiia v Ispanii, I: 419–21; Carr, Comintern and the Spanish Civil War, 86–8. See also VII kongress Kommunisticheskogo Internatsionala, 452 (Dec. 27, 1936, Comintern decree). Stalin would reiterate to Pascua in person on Feb. 3, 1937, that there would be no Soviet model for Spain, which was called “a democratic republic of a new type.”

323. Ercoli, “Ob osobennostiakh ispanskoi revoliutsii.” “Kautsky” was also the code name used for Diaz, the leader of the Spanish Communist party.

324. Göring had extended the invitation on Dec. 6; Litvinov had telegraphed permission to accept. Abramov, “Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki,” 150 (citing AVP RF, f. 05, op. 16, pap. 118, d. 46, l. 157–9; op. 17, pap. 130, d. 42, l. 7; Surits to Krestinsky: Jan. 27, 1937); Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 346–7n1 (RGASPI, f. 71, op. 25, d. 3646).

325. RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 22, l. 1–5 (Stomonyakov, Nov. 10, 1936); RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 23, l. 1–9 (Dec. 24). Stalin and entourage received the Mongols again on Jan. 4, 1937, this time with trade and economics officials. The meeting ended with supper and toasts. Stalin told the story of his escape from Buryat Novaya Uda in 1903. RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 24, l. 1–12.

326. Taylor, Generalissimo, 134–6.

327. Zhang was kept in indefinite house arrest. Taylor, Generalissimo, 135 (citing T. V. Soong Papers, box 60, folder 3, p. 15); Gibson, “Chiang Kai-shek’s Central Army,” 336.

328. “Chiang had left for Xian a popular leader,” his biographer writes, “but returned a national hero.” Taylor, Generalissimo, 135–6.

329. “The terrific personal shock Chiang had suffered might have embittered and unbalanced a man less gifted with foresight and hastened him into precipitate actions of revenge—which, in fact, Chiang’s angry followers in Nanking demanded,” wrote Edgar Snow. Snow, Red Star over China, 465.

330. Chiang Ching-kuo would return via Vladivostok to China on April 19, 1937.

331. In Dec. 1936, Wang Jingwei had an audience with Hitler, discussing China’s entry into the Pact and Germany’s reciprocation with greatly expanded aid. (The German foreign ministry dismissed reports of the meeting as “hearsay.”) Taylor, Generalissimo, 622n142. See also Wai Chor, “Making of the Guomindang’s Japan Policy,” 244. In late 1938, Wang would depart Chongqing for Hanoi, French Indochina, and announce his support for a negotiated settlement with the Japanese; he would fly to Shanghai and enter into negotiations with Japan, defecting to the Japanese side.

332. Larina, This I Cannot Forget, 324, 304.

- 333. Valedinskii, "Organizm Stalina vpolne zdorovyi."
- 334. Kommunisticheskie Internatsional, 1937, no. 1: 8–9.
- 335. AVP RF, f. 05, op. 17, d. 49, p. 131, l. 59–60 (La Batalla, Jan. 21, 1937). Orlov seems to have pushed in Jan. 1937 for approval for an armed uprising in the Nationalist rear, in Spanish Morocco, but the Spanish Republican government did not support the idea, wary of overly antagonizing France given the proximity to French Morocco. Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 274, 467n21 (citing ASVRR file 17679, I: 54). Orlov finally became official NKVD station chief in Spain in late Feb. 1937.
- 336. It seems that in Nov. 1936, one POUM activist who traveled to Mexico as head of a sports delegation transmitted a request from the POUM leadership to the Mexican president to grant Trotsky political asylum there. The next year, this same man, Bartolome Costa-Amik, met three times with Trotsky. The two men argued over the desirability and feasibility of POUM carrying out a socialist revolution in Spain, as in Russia. Rogovin, 1937, 355 (citing Trud, Feb. 22, 1994).
- 337. L. Trotsky, "V Meksike," Hoover Institution Archives, Nicolaevsky Collection, box 354, folder 37, pp. 124–5. Trotsky was under surveillance by the Mexican police, the Mexican Communist party (on behalf of Moscow), the NKVD, and the U.S. Government. Hoover Institution Archives, Joseph Hansen Papers, box 70, folder 8, pp. 1–15.
- 338. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1120, l. 1–20. On Jan. 6, 1937, the USSR conducted a population census (it had been delayed twice), the first since 1926. The enumeration encompassed Gulag camps, too, but it returned only 162 million people, versus an expectation of more than 170 million. The census further showed that 57 percent of inhabitants above the age of sixteen identified themselves as religious. That was more than 55 million people. The census results were suppressed. Zhiromskaia et al., Polveka pod grifom "sekretno", 98, 100. See also Merridale, "1937 Census."
- 339. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1120, l. 7–8, 11–12.
- 340. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1120, l. 8–10. Stalin had supposedly said much the same, more colorfully, to the Soviet writer Mikhail Sholokhov ("What can you do? People need a little god"). Gromov, Stalin, 160, citing M. M. Sholokhov, "Razgovor o otom," Literaturnaia gazeta, May 23, 1990. See also Feuchtwanger, Moskva 1937 goda, 65. Kolakowski asserted that "Stalin as a despot was much more the party's creation than its creator," but he got right that Stalin "was the personification of a system which irresistibly sought to be personified." Kolakowski, Main Currents of Marxism, III: 2, 5. See also Ennker, "Struggling for Stalin's Soul."
- 341. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1120, l. 14–7. What Stalin did not divulge was that while the number of people arrested for terrorist acts and statements had dropped in 1936, to 3,388 people (from 8,988 in 1935 and 6,504 in 1934), the number of those rounded up for belonging to an opposition had jumped to 23,279 (from 3,447 in 1935 and 631 in 1934). Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 93 (citing TsA FSB, f. 80s., op. 1, d. 79).
- 342. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1120, l. 7–8, 11–12.
- 343. Stalin could be ingratiating in these circumstances, but this statement about fascism was not at all what the antifascist crusader Feuchtwanger wanted to hear. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1120, l. 18–9.
- 344. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 983, l.14–15, 110–1. On Jan. 16, 1937, Postyshev was removed as Kiev province party secretary for having allowed "an extraordinarily great level of contamination by Trotskyites." RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 5023, l. 1–17 (Jan. 13, 1937); Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 353–7; Na prieme, 198–9; Khlevniuk, 1937–i, 90–114.
- 345. Larina, This I Cannot Forget, 312.
- 346. Titarenko, VKP (b), komintern i kitai: dokumenty, IV/ii: 1090–1 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 281, l. 17–18); Titarenko, Kommunisticheskie internatsional, 271–2.
- 347. Titarenko, VKP (b), komintern i kitai: dokumenty, IV/ii: 1098 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 281, l. 28: March 2, 1937).
- 348. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 9–19 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 269, l. 38–58, 80).
- 349. Khlevniuk, Stalin i Ordzhonikidze, 88–97.
- 350. Report of Court Proceedings, 54; "O tak nazyvaemom 'parallel'nom antisovetskom trotskistom tsentre": 30–50.
- 351. Yagoda belatedly lost this rank. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 60 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 983, l. 50); Kokurin and Petrov, Lubianka, 1917–1960, 14. In 1937, chief of the Gorky [Nizhny Novgorod] NKVD

Lavrushin wrote a note to Moscow about Yagoda's supposed past as an okhranka agent, with testimony from a witness about the removal on July 15, 1935, by former local NKVD boss Marvei Pogrebinsky of Yagoda's tsarist police file from the local archives. Il'inskiĭ, Narkom lagoda, 51–2; Vinogradov, Genrikh lagoda, 83–4 (testimony of Alexander Yevstifeyev, 1937). See also Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 209–10. Yagoda's supposed okhranka past would not be used against him at trial, perhaps because it was too evocative of whispers about Stalin. Pogrebinsky would commit suicide on April 4, 1937.

352. Lyons, Assignment in Utopia, 585. Some years earlier a German count had likened Radek to “something between Puck and Wolf, a bit of a street Arab, a cheeky, amusing, and terrifying Mephisto physiognomy.” Kessler, Tagebücher, 354 (1922).

353. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 51 (Feb. 2, 1937). The émigré Miliukov fantasized that Russia was being reborn, on the analogy of the French Revolution's counterrevolution. Poslednie novosti, Jan. 23, 1937: 1. See also Nielsen, Miliukov i Stalin.

354. Broué, “Trotsky”; Broué, “Party Opposition to Stalin,” 166; Rogovin, 1937, 60–6.

355. In public, Smirnov alone retracted his confession. Rogovin, 1937, 23.

356. Trotskii, “Otkrytoe pis'ma.”

357. Ingratiously, the NKVD agent Zborowski managed to report that, on Jan. 22, Trotsky's son Lev Sedov had told him apropos of the accusations, “now there is no longer vacillation, Stalin should be killed.” Volkogonov, Trotskii, II: 197 (citing Arkhiv INO OGPU-NKVD, f. 31660, d. 9067, t. 1, l. 98). Although, in an article (Oct. 1933), Trotsky had written that “the only way to compel the bureaucracy to hand over power to the proletariat is by force,” in a subsequent article on the Kirov murder he wrote that assassinating Stalin would accomplish nothing, because he would just be replaced by “one of those Kaganoviches.” “Klassovaia priroda sovetskogo gosudarstva (problemy chetvertogo internacionala),” Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 36–7 (October 1933): 1–12 (at 9–10); Trotskii, “Stalinskaia biurokratia i ubiistvo Kirova”; Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, III: 270.

358. Maksimenkov, Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 366 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1082, l. 1–2), 1051–3 (d. 829, l. 107–8).

359. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 350–1 (RGASPI, f. 71, op. 10, d. 127, l. 188–9; f. 558, op. 1, d. 5324, l. 33). Arrests at Lenfilm continued throughout the film's shooting. Mari'iamov, Kremlevskii tsenzor, 35. See also Latyshev, “Stalin i kino,” 495–6.

360. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 350–1 (RGASPI, f. 71, op. 10, d. 127, l. 188–9); Latyshev, “Stalin i kino,” 494–6; Milovidov, “Velikii grazhdanin,” 6.

361. Titarenko, VKP (b), komintern i kitai: dokumenty, IV/ii: 1094–6 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 281, l. 22–3).

362. Yezhov's pretrial instructions to Ulrich specified execution for all defendants, so Stalin had changed his mind and rewarded Radek. “Vse, chto govorit Radek—eto' absolutno zlostnaia kleвета . . .”

363. Pravda, Jan. 31, 1937.

364. Dullin, Men of Influence, 138, citing AVP RF, f. 5, op. 17, pap. 126, d. 1 (Jan. 8, 1937, draft). Soviet-German efforts at contact were convoluted. Abramov, “Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki,” 150 (citing AVP RF, f. 05, op. 17, pap. 126, d. 1, l. 17), 150–1 (citing AVP RF, f. 17, pap. 130, d. 41, l. 3), 151 (citing AVP RF, f. 011, op. 1a, pap. 1, d. 2, l. 5; f. 059, op. 1, pap. 244, d. 1717, l. 10), 151 (citing AVP RF, f. 05, op. 17, pap. 130, d. 42, l. 6, 17); Fischer, Russia's Road, 241.

365. Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service. Maisky (in London), writing to Litvinov, surmised that “Hider is not yet ready for a large-scale war and it is unlikely that Mussolini ever will be.” DVP SSSR, XIX: 673 (Dec. 17, 1936).

366. Radosh et al., Spain Betrayed. Stalin's refusal to permit a Spanish Communist takeover was manifest well before access to Soviet archives. Cattell, Communism and the Spanish Civil War. See also Schauff, Der verspielte Sieg.

367. Kowalsky, Stalin.

368. On Soviet motivations as given in the contemporary Soviet press, see Allen, “Soviet Union and the Spanish Civil War.”

369. DBFP, 2nd series, XVII: 754–6 (Jan. 2, 1937); “The Anglo-American Agreement,” Bulletin of International News 15/8 (1938): 11–3.

370. Izvestiia, Jan. 5, 1937. Hitler sent Göring to Italy to shore up relations; Mussolini received him on January 15. When Göring brought up Germany's desire to annex Austria, a development he insisted Italy had no choice but to accept, Mussolini became visibly displeased. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 68.

371. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 235 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 188 l. 100).

372. Andrew and Elkner, "Stalin and Foreign Intelligence," 85.

373. "The Communists have got into the habit of denouncing as a Trotskyist everybody who disagrees with them about anything," the Austrian Borkenau would note. "For in Communist mentality, every disagreement in political matters is a major crime, and every political criminal is a Trotskyist." Borkenau, Spanish Cockpit, 240.

CHAPTER 7. ENEMIES HUNTING ENEMIES

1. Boris Yefimov, in Beliaev, Mikhail Koltsov, 71 (1989 ed.), 103.

2. Arrests in the NKVD included incarcerations of border guards and regular police (the militia), who accounted for the overwhelming majority of NKVD personnel (around 400,000), as well as of Gulag camp guards and administrators and fire brigades, who were not directly involved in the mass arrests. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 258; Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 150 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 996, l. 187–9); Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 501. Different figures are given in Luk'ianov, "Massovye repressii opravdany byt' ne mogut," 121.

3. Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 7–20, 255; Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 111; Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 188–9.

4. Mlechin, KGB, 162–3.

5. Radek at his public trial on Jan. 24, 1937, had mentioned Tukhachevsky's name as a co-conspirator. Radek then tried to retract, but the deed had been done. Report of Court Proceedings, 105, 146. After the first Moscow trial, Werner von Tippelskirch, a German military attaché in Moscow, had reported to Berlin (Sept. 28, 1936) the speculation about a pending trial of Red Army commanders. Erickson, Soviet High Command, 427 (citing Serial 6487/E486016–120: Report A/2037).

6. Wollenberg, Red Army, 224; Erickson, Soviet High Command, 465; Conquest, Great Terror: Reassessment, 201–35; Ulam, Stalin, 457–8; Tucker, Stalin in Power; Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy. Assertions of a real plot go back to the time and have persisted: Duranty, USSR, 222; Davies, Mission to Moscow, I: 111. The claptrap persists: Prudnikova and Kolpakidi, Dvoinoi zagovor.

7. Whitewood, Red Army. This is a variant on Harris, "Encircled by Enemies."

8. Khrushchev had blamed German intelligence for inciting Stalin's suspicious personality. For the fables, see Höttl, Secret Front, 77–85 (Höttl was an Austrian intelligence officer swept into the German S.D. in 1938); Reitlinger, SS, 93–6. See also Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service, 213–43, and Erickson, Soviet High Command, 433–6. No such Tukhachevsky dossier obtained from abroad was ever mentioned by Stalin in the many discussions he held that have been transcribed; no reference to such a dossier appears in Tukhachevsky's secret case files.

9. Spalcke, "Der Fall Tuchatschewski"; Sluch, "'Delo Tukhachevskogo.'" The archive fire took place on the night of March 1–2, 1937. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, I/ii: 258 (quoting a Yezhov report to Stalin, no citation). The Gestapo had long been trying to set up the talented Red Marshal Tukhachevsky, echoing the Russian emigration's fantasies about a Russian Bonaparte. RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 864, l. 60–7, Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 17; Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 186 (citing GARE, f. 5853, op. 1, d. 8, l. 126; d. 9, l. 125; d. 14, l. 85); Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 99; Il'in, "Zapiski."

10. Pravda's Berlin correspondent wrote home that Wehrmacht circles were abuzz about their secret links to the Red Army, especially to Tukhachevsky. Mekhlis excerpted the letter for Stalin (Jan. 16, 1937). Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 15.

11. Uritsky discounted the possibility of such clandestine collaboration, but reported the rumors anyway. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, I/ii: 255, citing TsGASA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1036, l. 270–4 (April 9, 1937).

12. Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 20–2 (Daladier warning, Potyomkin to Moscow, March 16, 1937); Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 601. Czechoslovak president Edvard Beneš supposedly was informed of secret negotiations between Berlin and Moscow for a rapprochement, as well as of a military coup to topple the Soviet regime, and passed word or documents to the Soviet regime, but there is no such information in records of conversations by Alexandrovsky in Prague. No documents from Heydrich via Beneš have ever been found in Soviet or German archives, either. Nor were the alleged documents ever mentioned in the innumerable internal interrogation protocols or at the trial. Stalin had no need for such documents: if they had existed and he had used them, the Gestapo could have crowed about its handiwork, fooling Stalin into executing one of his best military men. Polišenská and Kvaček, "Archivní dokumenty hovoří," 29; TšRGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1028, l. 107–14; Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 5–6, 23–9; Lukes, Czechoslovakia Between Stalin and Hitler, 91–112. See also Watt, "Who Plotted against Whom?," 49 (citing PRO, FO 371/21104, N 3287/461/38, Newton, June 21, 1937); Les Événements Survenus en France de 1933 à 1945, I: 129. There is a grievous mistake in the annotations to Stalin's office logbooks connected to the myth of the Beneš role in passing on a Nazi file implicating Tukhachevsky: on May 21, Stalin received Mikhail K. Alexandrovsky, not the Soviet representative to Czechoslovakia (Sergei S. Alexandrovsky). Gorbunov, "Voennaia razvedka v 1934–1939 godakh" (no. 8), 93; Plimak and Antonov, "Nakanune strashnoi daty," 151; Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 120–1 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 175, l. 82); Na prieme, 208; Naumov, Stalin i NKVD, 344.

13. Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 10–1 (citing the interrogation of I. M. Kedrov, May 25, 1939).

14. Reese, Stalin's Reluctant Soldiers, 134–46. From 1937 to 1938, 34,501 Red Army officers, air force officers, and military political personnel were discharged, either because of expulsion from the party or arrest; 11,596 would be reinstated by 1940. As Voroshilov noted, some 47,000 officers had been discharged in the years following the civil war, almost half of them (22,000) in the years 1934–36; around 10,000 of these discharged were arrested. Few were higher-ups, however. Confusingly, sometimes the totals include the Red Air Force, and sometimes not. "Nakanune voiny (dokumenty 1935–1940 gg.)," 188; Suvénir, Tragediia RKKA, 137. In 1939, when Stalin turned off the pandemonium, 73 Red Army personnel would be arrested.

15. Alliluyeva, Tól'ko odin god, 334.

16. Pravda, Feb. 11, 1937: 3 (N. Tikhonov). See also the satire by Mikhail Zoshchenko, "V pushkinskie dni," originally in Krokodil, 1937, nos. 3 and 5, reprinted in Zoshchenko, Sobranie sochinenii, II: 416–21. In the restored apartment at Moika, 12, in Leningrad, busts of Pushkin and Stalin appeared side by side. Mastenitsa, "Iz istroii muzeinoi pushkiniany," 116; Tkhorzhvskii, "Cherez sto let," 9–10. See also Sandler, Commemorating Pushkin, 107–16; and Molok, Pushkin v 1937 g.

17. Snow, Red Star over China, 474.

18. Taylor, Generalissimo, 143 (citing Chiang Diaries, Hoover Institution Archives, box 39, folder 8: Feb. 18, 1937). An analysis by Varga (April 20, 1937) began with the premise that "recent years in China, undoubtedly, are characterized by the process of the transition to a bourgeois social system," but he called the conditions of transition unique (a combination of pre-capitalist agrarian relations, partial colonialism, and strong revolutionary forces). And although he noted an imperative to transcend feudalism, for the creation of a bourgeois economic and military superstructure on the feudally exploited peasantry would only worsen their exploitation, he cautioned that if a Japanese aggression was coming soon against China and/or the USSR, the Soviet Union would have to work to delay China's agrarian revolution. Titarenko, VKP (b), komintern i kitai: dokumenty, IV/ii: 1105–13 (RGASPI, f. 514, op. 1, d. 868, l. 20–32).

19. Adzhubei, Té desiat' let, 194–5. Similarly, Nikolai Leonov, the future chief analyst of the KGB, nine years old in 1937, would later choose to study the Spanish language under the lingering influence of the Spanish civil war. Leonov, Likholeté, 7–13, 18–21. "Moscow lived Spain," wrote Louis Fischer. Fischer, Men and Politics, 403. For typical Soviet press accounts, see International Solidarity with the Spanish Republic. But see also Davies, Popular Opinion, 96.

20. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 224; Fitzpatrick, Everyday Stalinism, 171. Helen Grant, a British woman traveling in Catalonia in 1937, noted that at a film screening, there were "great cheers from the gallery when Stalin's photo appeared on the screen, but only from the gallery [her emphasis]." Among the higher-paying middle class part of the audience (where she sat) "people kept quiet." Jackson, British Women, 117.

21. Radosh et al., Spain Betrayed, 129–33 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 960, l. 251–77; Nikonov, Feb. 20, 1937).

22. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 591.

23. He added that Soviet advisers “often led Spanish brigades in combat, especially in their first combat operations to show the officers how to command their units.” Meretskoy, Serving the People, 147–8.
24. Altogether, 204 interpreters, mostly women, served in Spain. On the White Guard émigrés in Spain, see Yezhov’s note to Stalin (Jan. 19, 1937): Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 179–81 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 223, l. 33–39).
25. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 263, l. 32; Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 163–4 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 223, l. 3–4; Gaikis, Dec. 31, 1936), 165 (l. 2: Litvinov to Stalin, Jan. 2, 1937), 166 (l. 1: politburo decision).
26. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 742, citing a memorandum of Colonel Sverchevskii, undated [1938], in RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1149, l. 237, 233.
27. Fischer, Men and Politics, 361.
28. Broué, Staline et la révolution, 102–3 (citing Luis Araquistain); Bollothen, Spanish Civil War, 319. Writing to Voroshilov in mid-October 1936, the military attaché Gorev reported that the Soviet ambassador possessed an “unhealthy self-esteem. He is terribly afraid for his authority.” Radosh et al., Spain Betrayed, 94 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 832, l. 239).
29. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 157–8 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 222, l. 164–64ob.; Dec. 21, 1936).
30. Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 517. Largo Caballero had tried to tamp down any tensions: “we are all satisfied with his [Rosenberg’s] behavior and activities with us. Here everyone loves him.” Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 173–4 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 223, l. 17–19; Jan. 12, 1937).
31. The request to be received, relayed by Krestinsky to Stalin, was dated the same day as the audience was granted (Feb. 3). Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 189–90 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 223, l. 80), 190 (l. 87); Na prieme, 201. On Feb. 4, Krestinsky had Gaikis summoned to Moscow: Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 190 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 223, l. 80), 190 (l. 88).
32. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 64 (reconstruction from Pascua’s notes of the meeting: AHN-Madrid. Diversos. M. Pascua, leg. 2, exp. 6, 12), paragraph 99.
33. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 191 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 223, l. 86; letter to Largo Caballero, Feb. 4, 1937).
34. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 191–5 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 223, l. 81, 82, 85). Stalin seems to have discussed them in the Little Corner on Feb. 5, 1937: Na prieme, 201.
35. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 197 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 217, l. 54).
36. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraphs 145, 789. Rosenberg’s replacement was Gaikis.
37. Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 265–6 (citing file 17697, l. 28).
38. Radosh et al., Spain Betrayed, 456–8 (Gorev report, March 23, 1937, secret archive 15), 69 (Gorev, code-named Sancho, Oct. 16, 1936). On the unreliability of communications, see Rees, “The Highpoint of Comintern Influence? The Communist Party and the Civil War in Spain,” 150.
39. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 582, citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 961, l. 171.
40. Voroshilov sent telegrams white-hot with accusations about “not putting into practice” his directives and threatening “severe penalties for all of you.” Rybalkin, “Voennaia pomoshch,” 108 (citing TsAMO, f. 132, op. 2642, d. 173, l. 23–24; d. 192, l. 1–3); Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X,” 56 (citing TsAMO, f. 132, op. 2642, d. 192, l. 32); 56 (d. 182, l. 22–3; Dec. 4, 1936).
41. Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X,” 82–83 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1082, l. 206: A. Agaltsov). Dimitrov wrote to Stalin that “the foe has the advantage that he has many spies in the Government camp.” Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 293 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 221, l. 38–40, Dec. 14, 1936); Sharapov, Naum Eitingon, 53.
42. Khlevniuk, “Prichiny ‘bol’shogo terrora,’” 10.
43. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 83 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 983, l. 64). Two days later Blyukher and Deribas sent a telegram from Khabarovsk asking to be excused from having to travel to the plenum, a request Stalin approved. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 83 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 65, l. 25).

44. Khaustov, "Razvitie sovetskikh organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti"; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 71, d. 43, 44, 45, 46. Malenkov's lists further specified that a mere 15.7 percent of provincial party bosses had any higher education, and that 70.4 percent had just elementary education. Similar percentages obtained for the next rungs down, county and city party bosses.

45. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 773, l. 115.

46. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 622, l. 13; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 421. See also Conquest, Reassessment, 33; and Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 364–5, 393–7.

47. Only a draft resolution in Orjonikidze's hand survives: RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 3350, l. 1; Kommunist, 1991, no. 13: 59–60.

48. Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 165.

49. Khlevniuk, In Stalin's Shadow, 128–31 (citing RGASPI, f. 85, op. 29, d. 156, l. 12, 14); Kuromiya, Freedom and Terror, 221 (d. 156, l. 10–2). S. Z. Ginzburg, head of the construction industry, investigated the Ural Train Carriage Construction Factory in Nizhny Tagil, returned to Moscow February 18, 1936—the same day the Popular Front won its electoral victory in Spain—and Poskryobyshev called him that same day to relay that Stalin had requested a copy of his report. Ginzburg, O proshlom, 195.

50. Za industrializatsiinu, Feb. 21, 1937: 6 (A. P. Zaveniagin); Orjonikidze bumped into Bukharin's wife, Anna, on Kremlin grounds returning to his apartment. Larina, Nezabyvaemoe, 333.

51. Dubinskii-Mukharadze, Ordzhonikidze, 6. Orjonikidze had lived in the so-called children's section of the Grand Kremlin Palace (Krestinsky lived here, too, as did Sverdlov's widow Klavdiya and her son Andrei, an NKVD operative), but when the palace was being reconstructed, Orjonikidze and others moved into the Amusement Palace, near the Trinity Gate, where Stalin had lived until the 1932 suicide of Nadya and where Bukharin lived.

52. Izvestiia, Nov. 22, 1963; Dubinskii-Mukhadze, Ordzhonikidze, 6. The evening before, Yezhov was received alone in the Little Corner. Na prieme, 202. Alternately, the apartment search may have occurred on Feb. 16, prompting Orjonikidze's tête-à-tête with Stalin on the morning of Feb. 17.

53. Khlevniuk, In Stalin's Shadow, 143–9; Medvedev, Let History Judge, 402–3. Around midnight, Orjonikidze had met with his deputy for the chemical industry to discuss Donbass coke plant sabotage. After leaving the commissariat, Orjonikidze might have spoken again with Stalin. Dubinskii-Mukhadze, Ordzhonikidze, 6.

54. Chubar, Mekhlis, Andreev, and Kalinin joined at that point. Levin was called back at 9:55 p.m. for another five minutes; he was among the four people who signed the official medical bulletin. (Levin would be tried and executed the next year.) Pravda, Feb. 19, 1937; Na prieme, 202–3.

55. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh, 154–96 (at 191). Amayak Nazaretyan wrote on the back of a photograph of his close friend Orjonikidze: "Every one of us who sees with his own eyes the enormous achievements of the Soviet regime in the field of socialist construction cannot and must not forget the people who gave their lives that we might build the world's first socialist state, marching toward communism." Pravda, Nov. 17, 1964: 4.

56. Pravda, Feb. 22, 1937. Molotov, later in life, would make Orjonikidze out to be the villain, harming Stalin with his suicide. Chuev, Svo sorok, 191–2. Khrushchev had blamed Pyatakov already: Pravda, Feb. 19, 1937.

57. Sotsialisticheskii vetsnik, 1937, no. 5: 16; Pil'niak, Rasplesnutoe vremia, 582 (quoting the Georgian poet Titian Tabidze); Conquest, Reassessment, 170.

58. Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 284–5.

59. Lenin, PSS, XLV: 361.

60. Tucker, Stalin in Power, 418.

61. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 327–33.

62. Mikoian was in Stalin's office on Nov. 2 and 14, 1937, both times with Yezhov. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 318–9; Na prieme, 224.

63. As one scholar explained, "Up to 1936, the leading group was held together by shared convictions in a shared project, but after 1937 the nature of the group changed." Rees, "Stalin as Leader, 1937–1953," 207. Mikoyan and Beria, assigned to comb through Orjonikidze's personal archive, discovered two sealed folders (received back when he headed the Central Control Commission), which held compromising tsarist police materials on politburo members Kalinin and Rudzutaks. Orjonikidze had marked the folders “Do not open without me.” Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 9–10 (RGASPI, f. 85, d. 2, l. 1–30).

64. The Feb.–March 1937 plenum is one of the few in the 1930s whose materials have been published in detail. Another was June 1935: Plenum Tsentral'nogo Komiteta VKP (b) 5–7 i iunia 1935 g. (Moscow: Partizdat, 1935).

65. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda,” (1995, no. 3): 8, 14; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 470. This was an old theme of his. Back on Sept. 19, 1931, for example, expressing disapproval of then transport commissar Moisei Rukhimovich, Stalin had vented to Kaganovich, “New people who believe in our cause and who can successfully replace the bureaucracy can always be found in our party, if one searches seriously.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 109–10 (RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 99, l. 35–6). See also Fitzpatrick, Cultural Front, 180, and Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 172.

66. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda,” (1992, nos. 4–5): 36.

67. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 710, l. 180–1.

68. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 143.

69. Rogovin, 1937, 221–2.

70. “Materialy marto-fevral'skogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (no. 2), 13, 17, 18, 20, 26, 27 (1994, no. 1), 12–3; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 412–5.

71. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda,” (1994, no. 1): 12–3. Stalin's recommendation was fixed in a formal plenum resolution on March 3: RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 577, l. 4 (l. 30–3 draft with corrections).

72. “O partiinosti lits, prokhodivshikh po delu tak nazyvaemogo 'antisovetskogo pravotrotskitskogo bloka,” 82–3; Stranitsy istorii (Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1990), 18; Galumov, Neizvestnye 'Izvestiia, 185.

73. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda,” (1992, no. 11–12), 10.

74. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda,” (1993, no. 5: 3–5, 6, no. 7: 3, A. S. Kalygina).

75. Schlögel, Terror und Traum, 250–3.

76. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda,” (1993, no. 8): 3–26 (Molotov), (no. 9): 3–32 (Kaganovich). Stalin marked up the draft of Molotov's plenum speech. Where Molotov wrote that Trotsky had instructed his supporters inside the Soviet Union “to save their strength for a more important moment—for the beginning of the war—and at that moment strike decisively at the most sensitive areas of our economy”—Stalin underlined it. In the margin beside Molotov's words about the party having been deserted by those who did not have the stomach to fight and “cast their lots with the bourgeoisie, and not with the working class,” Stalin wrote: “This is good. It would be worse if they had left during wartime.” RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 772, l. 14, 88.

77. Svanidze surmised that Stalin did not come to Svetlana's party “on purpose.” Murin, Stalin v ob'iatyakh sem'i, 191–2. Svanidze would be arrested December 29, 1939, and sentenced to eight years for “concealing the anti-Soviet actions of her husband” (Alexander Svanidze, the brother of Stalin's first wife). She would be executed in March 1942.

78. Yakov met Meltzer when she was married to Nikolai Bessarab, an aide to the head of the Moscow province NKVD, Stanislaw Redens, Stalin's brother-in-law. She gave her birth year as 1911, but was likely born in 1906. She and Yakov would legalize their marriage on Feb. 18, 1938 (the day before she would give birth to a daughter, whom they named Galina, the same as Yakov's first child, who had died in infancy in 1929). The family lived in a four-room apartment on elite Granovsky Street while keeping the Zubalovo dacha. Meltzer had a child from her first marriage. Alliluev, Khronika odnoi sem'i, 118; Zen'kovich, Samye sekretnye rodsvetenniki, 372–3.

79. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1994, no. 3), 4.

80. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1995, no. 2), 7. Molchanov had been arrested Feb. 2–3, 1937.

81. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1995, no. 2), 21 (Ivan Zhukov).

82. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1995, no. 3), 13–4. The theory went back to Lenin: “O diktature proletariata,” PSS, XXXIX: 261–3.

- 83. Sochineniia, XIV: 207–8.
- 84. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral’-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1995, no. 7), 11–3; Pravda, March 4, 1937.
- 85. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral’-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1995, no. 11–12), 13, 14, 16. Stalin’s March 5 concluding speech was belatedly published in Pravda (April 1, 1937) and as a pamphlet (Moscow: OGIZ, 1938) with translations into foreign languages. See also Sochineniia, XIV: 225–47, and Zhukov, Inoi Stalin, 360–1. None of the references to Orjonikidze’s sheltering of enemies appeared in Pravda’s version of Stalin’s speech, but plenum attendees once back home could orally convey Stalin’s remarks.
- 86. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 56 (March 4, 1937: misdated, should be March 5).
- 87. “O Partiinosti lits, prokhodivshikh po delu tak nazyvaemogo ‘antisovetskogo pravotrotskistskogo bloka,’” 74. One operative stated that the oppositionists in prison were able to hold debates, read newspapers and books, meet with friends and relatives, and drink brandy, and that during their volleyball games in the yard, if the ball were knocked far, NKVD personnel would run and retrieve it. Vinogradov, Genrikh iagoda, 6–7.
- 88. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral’-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1995, no. 11–12), 21; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 773, l. 115; Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 309–10.
- 89. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 266–8. At a plenum of the Spanish Communist party, also on March 5, 1937, José Díaz asked, “Who are the enemies of the people? The enemies of the people are the fascists, Trotskyites and uncontrolled elements.” Díaz called Trotsky “a direct agent of the Gestapo.” Novikov, SSSR, Komintern, II: 95. At a Nov. 1937 plenum of the Spanish Communist party, Díaz said of “Trotskyites” in Spain: “You need to eliminate them with the same mercilessness with which we eliminate fascists.” Bolshevik, 1937, no. 23–24 (1937): 86–7.
- 90. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 639–40n18 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 4, d. 13, l. 54–67; Lev Mironov).
- 91. Afanas’ev, Oni ne molchali, 217; Starkov, “Narkon Ezhov”; Ivanova, Gulag, 152; Jansen and Petrov, Stalin’s Loyal Executioner, 61–2; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 73–4; Conquest, Reassessment, 39–40. Krivitsky refers to a Yezhov speech on March 18 to the NKVD party active, and Pavliukov a Yezhov speech on March 19 to the NKVD higher-ups. Krivitsky, In Stalin’s Secret Service, 167; Pavliukov, Ezhov, 264–5 (citing TsA FSB stenogram of a Yezhov speech of March 19).
- 92. Il’inskii, Narkom Iagoda, 17–18. See also Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 39.
- 93. On March 31, 1937, Central Committee members were informed that “in view of the danger of leaving Yagoda at liberty for even a single day,” he had been arrested, a formulation by which Stalin could justify violating the regulation of having the Central Committee vote to expel him first. The 65 remaining full members of the Central Committee, down from 71, then “voted” in writing to expel Yagoda post-facto. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 614, l. 94–105; op. 3, d. 985, l. 34; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 124–5 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 299, l. 188–9), 126; Pravda, April 4, 1937.
- 94. Agabekov, ChK za rabotoi, 134, 178.
- 95. Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 17, 36.
- 96. Koenker et al., Revelations, 77 (Vlasik interviewed in 1965).
- 97. Kaganovich had written to Stalin that “some of the apparatus, even though it has quieted down, will not be loyal to him [Yezhov] There is talk that Yagoda remains general commissar [of state security], while Yezhov, they say, will not be given that rank and so on.” Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 683 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 95, l. 132), 701–2 (Oct. 12, 1936).
- 98. Conquest, Inside Stalin’s Secret Police, 13.
- 99. In April 1937, Yezhov and the new chief of the NKVD Special Department monitoring the army, Israel Leplyovskiy, pressured Balytsky (his former superior) in Ukraine to uncover a gigantic military conspiracy there; Balytsky evidently complained to military district chief Iona Yakir on the telephone about this directive, an implicit warning to Yakir about the gathering danger. Leplyovskiy, who had been chased from Ukraine in 1933, was returned to Ukraine, now as republic NKVD chief, on June 14, 1937, and carried out a pogrom against the republic NKVD. Tumshis, VChK: voina klanov, 391. Leplyovskiy would be arrested on April 26, 1938, and shot in July.

100. One NKVD operative acknowledged Yagoda as a gifted organizer, but vainglorious. Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 17, 36. Another who had defected abroad judged Yagoda “an adventurist, murderer, and sadist.” Agabekov, ChK za rabotoi, 134, 178. “He was a pragmatic type, a do-er, lacking any foundation in ideas,” recalled Boris Gudz, an NKVD foreign intelligence station chief in Tokyo (who would survive the terror). “In his relations with subordinates, he sought the negative moments, in order to use these moments to pressure this or that subordinate.” <http://www.fsb.ru/fsb/history/author/single.html?mId%3D10318010@fsbPublication.html>. Gudz was expelled from the party and kicked out of the secret police in April 1937, after the arrest of his sister. He got a job as a bus driver and worked his way up to director of the bus company. He would retire in 1962 and die in 2006, at age 104. His sister was married to Varlam Shalamov, who claimed that Gudz wrote the denunciation that got the writer arrested in Jan. 1937. <http://shalamov.ru/library/27/#t10>.

101. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 89–93 (TsA FSB, f. N-13614, t.2, l. 15–20).

102. On Yagoda's relations with other NKVD personnel: http://tortuga.angarsk.su/fb2/abramv02/Evrei_v_KGB.fb2_4.html.

103. Il'inskiĭ, Narkom Iagoda, 96.

104. Stefan Zweig's German-language biography Joseph Fouché (1929) was translated into Russian in 1932 (Leningrad: Vremia). Vyshinsky would quote from the Zweig biography at Yagoda's trial, equating the Soviet secret police chief with “the old, treacherous, double-dealing school of the political careerist and dishonest scoundrel . . . Joseph Fouché.” Protsess pravo-trotskistskogo bloka (Moscow: Iuridicheskoe izdatel'stvo, 1938), 610.

105. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 135–44 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 302, l. 125–44).

106. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 139–40; Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 674 (Ans Zalpetei); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 135–44 (at 136: APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 302, l. 125–44).

107. Yezhov even went so far as to attack the sacred founder of the Cheka (“Yes, comrades, everyone must grasp that Felix Edmundovich Dzierżyński vacillated in 1925–1926”). Afanas'ev, Oni ne Molchali, 217 (this speech appears to have taken place in April). Mark Gai (Stokland) was arrested on April 1, and Pauker on April 19. Between April 22 and 25, Georgy Prokofyev and Gai, under torture, linked Yagoda to Tukhachevsky in the plot for a military palace coup. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 522.

108. Jansen and Petrov, Stalin's Loyal Executioner, 60 (citing TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 4, d. 147, l. 34).

109. Agranov would be arrested on July 20, 1937, a fact not publicized. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 232 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 313, l. 37); Pavliukov, Ezhov, 271–3.

110. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1994, no. 8), 25 (Molotov).

111. When Pravda (Jan. 8, 1936) had reported on an assembly of so-called leading workers of machine tractor stations and agricultural agencies, Stalin had added Voroshilov's name to the conclusion of the text as an object, along with himself and Molotov, of the panegyrics. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1479, l. 34–5.

112. “Cherkni . . . desiatok slov,” 406.

113. Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 325 (according to NKVD functionary L. L. Nikolsky).

114. Montefiore, Court of the Red Tsar, 9–10.

115. Lebedev, “M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,’” 228 (Kutyakov diary entry for March 15, 1937; he was arrested May 15).

116. Khaustov, “Deiatel'nost' organov,” 348 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 4, d. 87, l. 292); Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 106.

117. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda,” (1994, no. 8): 15; Lebedev, “M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,’” 1: 164–5. In notes for his remarks made prior to the plenum, Voroshilov had written, “It is not excluded, on the contrary it is likely, that in the Red Army ranks there are not a few unrevealed, not unmasked Japanese-German, Trotskyite-Zinovievite spies, diversionaries, and terrorists”—a point he omitted at the plenum. Suvenirov, “Narkomat oborony,” at 28, citing TsGASA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1022, l. 267, 281. Voroshilov made only grammatical corrections to the plenum stenogram (film 2.2726, reel 78).

118. “Delo o tak nazyvaemoi ‘antisovetskoi trotskistskoi organizatsii’ v Krasnoi Armii,” 45; Suvenirov, “Narkomat oborony,” 28 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 36, d. 2376, l. 28). On March 29, 1937, Stalin had all party expellees in Red Army commanding ranks discharged and redirected to economic commissariats—where the grim reaper would come for them. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 189–227.

119. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 57. On Tukhachevsky’s holiday, see Bourne and Watt, British Documents on Foreign Affairs, XIV: 52–4. (Chilton report Feb. 23, 1937, PRO, FO 371/21099, N 1082/250/3); DDF 2e série, IV: 42 (Coulondre, Feb. 10, 1937).

120. Voroshilov’s formal report, stretching to eighty pages, stated: “I repeat, we have arrested [in the army] 15 or 20 so far, but that does not mean, comrades, that we have cleansed all the enemies. . . . We need to cleanse completely. We in the Worker Peasant Red Army have no right to tolerate even one enemy.” Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 58 (citing RGVA, f. 4, op. 14, d. 1820, l. 58). Voroshilov’s report to the party active in the Red Army, in mid-March, was far sharper about Trotskyite-fascist penetration and the need for a complete cleansing, indicating his succumbing to Stalin’s pressure. Budyonny and Gamarnik at the same gathering reinforced the pressure. Whitewood, Red Army, 226–7 (citing RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 117, l. 42, 47, 51, 51–3, 58, 95–7).

121. Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X,” 85 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 961, l. 123). Kulik appeared in the Little Corner, for the first time, on May 23, 1937, along with Molotov, Voroshilov, Kaganovich, and Yezhov, arriving after them, and departing before. Na prieme, 210. See also “Beria protiv Kulika,” in Bobrenov and Riazantsev, Palachi i zheruty, 197–264 (esp. 203–4).

122. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 56 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 39, d. 69, l. 13).

123. Khaustov, “Razvitiie sovetskikh organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti,” 362 (citing TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 45, d. 29, l. 246). Peterson would be shot on Aug. 21, 1937.

124. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, I/ii: 261 (citing TsGASA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 400, l. 137–9).

125. Eden, Foreign Affairs, 182–3 (Jan. 12, 1937).

126. Evidently, it was not until Feb. 16, 1937, that Largo Caballero would issue the first order to convert some gold ($51 million worth) to pay off the Spanish debt to the Soviets for the military supplies. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 539. Some of Spain’s gold reserves would be drawn upon in convertible currency via the Spanish Republic’s Eurobank account in Paris ($256 million of expenditures in 1937 alone) to pay for purchases of weapons and military supplies. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 137 (APRF; f. 3, op. 65, d. 234, l. 56).

127. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraphs 532–48; Howson, Arms for Spain, 151. On gold see also Viñas, “Financing the Spanish Civil War,” 266–83. In summer 1938, Stalin would receive a denunciation that some of the gold had been embezzled before shipment to the Soviet Union, and he had Beria investigate. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 42–3. The total mobilization of Soviet war matériel was something on the order of 600,000 tons. Grechko et al., Istoriia vtoroi mirovoi voyny, II: 54, 137.

128. Payne, Fascism in Spain, 262–3; Bosworth, Mussolini, 319; Preston, Franco, 228.

129. Payne, Falange, 212.

130. Preston, Franco, 242.

131. By the time Franco would finally advance on the Catalan front, in spring 1938, the Republic’s defenders would melt away, rendering his move more a military parade than an offensive. Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 852.

132. In Portugal and Greece, too, traditional authoritarian conservatism blunted indigenous fascist movements. Blinkhorn, Fascists and Conservatives.

133. Preston, Franco, 175–87; Orwell, Homage to Catalonia, chapter 5.

134. Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 905–6.

135. The Carlists supported the claim to the throne of Alfonso Carlos I de Borbón y Austria, but after he died in late Sept. 1936 without an heir, they had splintered, with some supporting Alfonso Carlos’s appointed regent (Prince Xavier of Bourbon-Parma) and others supporting Alfonso XIII (in exile at Rome’s Grand Hotel).

136. Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 907.

137. Bolloten, Spanish Revolution.

138. Before the putsch, on May 20, 1936, Dimitrov had informed Manuilsky that he had a discussion with Stalin about the Spanish question, and that Stalin had approved the Comintern line: support for the Spanish Republic government rather than the Spanish Communist party or revolution. Meshcheriakov, “SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii,” 88 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 208, l. 31; f. 17, op. 120, d. 439, l. 266). After the putsch, Stalin would still not support a Communist takeover or putsch, despite being urged to do so by Soviet military men who craved political unity in Spain. Sadly, some scholars continue to insist—against a wealth of evidence—that the “moderate” policies of the Comintern as well as the Spanish Communist party in the civil war were mere “temporary tactical adjustments.” Payne, Spanish Civil War, 293. Payne’s book is dedicated to Bollothen, his mentor, who called the Popular Front a “grand camouflage” for Communist penetration. Bollothen, Grand Camouflage. This is the same Bollothen mentioned in Soviet intelligence documents from the Spanish civil war as “our source.” Costello and Tsraev, Deadly Illusions, 237 (citing ASVRR, file 17679, I: 15 [or 161]; Volodarsky, Stalin’s Agent, 237).

139. The Soviet Union had interest groups—regional, institutional, personal—that formed over struggles for resources and influence, but they competed for Stalin’s favor, trying to anticipate his preferences and to destroy their rivals—jockeying that made them ultimately dependent on him.

140. Solomon Dridzo, known as Lozovsky, the general secretary of the Red Trade Union International, was just as incredulous: “And so, Hitler does not express the interests of finance capital in Germany?” Manuilsky felt compelled to interject: “Comrade Varga, it is clear to the [Comintern] secretariat that Germany is ruled by finance capital. Comrade Pieck is not denying that fact.” Komolova, Komintern protiv fashizma: dokumenty, 445–8 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 18, d. 1171, l. 24–9).

141. Fischer, Russia’s Road, 242 (Feb. 11, 1937); Abramov, “Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki,” 151–2 (citing AVP RF f. 05, op. 17, pap. 126, d. 1, l. 22; f. 059, op. 1, pap. 244, d. 1717, l. 15), 152 (pap. 244, d. 1715 (Surits to Litvinov, March 21, 1937)).

142. Abramov, “Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki,” 152 (citing AVP RF f. 05, op. 17, pap. 130, d. 42, l. 28, 29, 34; f. 059, op. 1, pap. 244, d. 1715, l. 28–9, 45; March 21, 1937).

143. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 56, l. 29.

144. Izvestiia, April 2, 1937. Rosenholz would be removed as foreign trade commissar on July 14, 1937, and replaced by Yevgeny Chyvalev.

145. Abramov, “Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki,” 152 (citing AVP RF f. 5, op. 17, pap. 1304, d. 42, l. 77).

146. DVP SSSR, XX: 174–5.

147. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 299–300 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 58, d. 249, l. 158); Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 45–6 (APRF; f. 3, op. 58, d. 249, l. 142–3; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 21, l. 29), 286 (APRF; f. 3, op. 58, d. 254a, l. 82).

148. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 55; Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 229–30.

149. Well described by Buber-Neumann, Under Two Dictators, 3–25. Her husband, Heinz, was arrested in April 1937; she was arrested the next year and sent to a camp in Karaganda as “the wife of an enemy of the people.”

150. Thurston, Life and Terror.

151. Medvedev, On Stalin, 102. See also Beck and Gordin, Russian Purge, 146 (“He’s not a party member and he’s not a Jew, so why has he been arrested?”).

152. Pravda, April 17 and Aug. 12, 1938. See also Vlasti’ soveto, 1938, no. 10: 52–3.

153. Pravda, April 29, May 11, June 24, Aug. 14 and 25, 1937.

154. Mandelstam, Hope against Hope, 336.

155. Muza, “Tragedy of a Russian Woman,” 495; “Iz stenogrammy repetitsii spektaklia ‘Anna Karenina,’” in V. I. Nemirovich-Danchenko, o tvorchestve aktera: khrestomatiia (Moscow: Iskustvo, 1984), 338. The play was featured at the Paris Exposition of 1937.

156. The coronation was scheduled for May 12, 1937. Between April 1 and June 10, 1937, 4,370 people would be discharged from the Red Army for political reasons, compared with 577 during the first three months of that year. Suvenirov, “Narkomat oboron,” 29 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 29, d. 340).

157. Izvestiia, April 23, 1937; Pravda, April 23, 1937.

¹⁵⁸ Sovetskoe foto, 1973, no. 9; Ogonek, 1937, no. 16–7; Lopatin, Volga idet v Moskvu; Shein, Kanal Moskva-Volga; Fedenko, Kanal Moskva-Volga. Stalin had visited sections of the canal on June 4, 1934, June 14, 1936, and April 22, 1937: <http://moskva-volga.ru/trete-prishestvie-stalina>.

¹⁵⁹ Davies et al., Economic Transformation, 127.

¹⁶⁰ Osokina, “Economic Disobedience,” 180.

¹⁶¹ Ellman, Socialist Planning, 107; Harrison, “National Income,” 52–3.

¹⁶² “What is there to say about the success of Soviet power,” one worker complained. “It is lies. The newspapers cover up the real state of things. I am a worker, wear torn clothes, my four children go to school half-starving, in rags. I, an honest worker, am a visible example of what Soviet power has given the workers in the last twenty years.” Davies, Popular Opinion, 135 (citing TsGAIPD, f. 24, op. 2v, d. 2282, l. 109).

¹⁶³ Thurston, Life and Terror, 166–8.

¹⁶⁴ Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, V/i: docs. 71, 76, 81, 93, 94, 98, 106, 125, 127; Berelowitch and Danilov, Sovetskaia derevnia glazami VChK-OGPU-NKVD, IV: 273–450.

¹⁶⁵ Khlevniuk, Stalin: Zhizni, 221 (citing RGASPI, f. 82, op. 2, d. 887, l. 17, 32, 41–2; March 2, 1937, and April 14 and 21, 1937).

¹⁶⁶ Semyon Firin-Pupko later alleged that in 1937 Stalin raised the question of a canal from Moscow to Vladivostok, cutting a west-east waterway across the entire continent to link the northern flowing Siberian rivers, a gargantuan task unprecedented in recorded history. Sokolov, Obshchestvo i vlast', 163–4.

¹⁶⁷ Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1994, no. 8), 18; Davies, “Soviet Economy,” 26–7.

¹⁶⁸ Khlevniuk, “Economic Officials in the Great Terror,” 58. Semyon Lobov (b. 1888), a former steelworker and forestry industry commissar until Oct. 1936 (when he was shifted to the food industry), had stated, “is it really normal that if I, the commissar, need to obtain a pair of traincars with sheet steel or equipment for papermaking, I need to get the authorization of the Central Committee.” Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 144 (TsA FSB, ASD P-4879, t. 2, s. 109). Lobov would be arrested June 21, 1937, and executed Oct. 30 of that year.

¹⁶⁹ Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 128 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 405, l. 64–5).

¹⁷⁰ Radosh et al., Spain Betrayed, 146–8 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1010, l. 295–300). Krivoshein appears to have returned from Spain at this time.

¹⁷¹ Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 43 (Dec. 16, 1936), 58 (March 14, 1937).

¹⁷² Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 212 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 223, l. 141–2), 213 (l. 146). “We are well aware of the scale of Soviet assistance, the steamships with Russian weapons all the while are passing by our shores,” Leonardo Vitetti, director of European Affairs in the Italian foreign ministry, told the Soviet embassy in Rome in April 1937. “We have not touched them, not wanting to complicate the already extremely sharp and awful Italo-Soviet relations.” Meshcheriakov, “SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii,” 86 (citing AVP RF, f. 048 z, op. 14–16, pap. 4, d. 8, l. 195); and Tournier, Les archives secretes de la Wilhelmstrasse III, 88, 91–2. On March 24, 1937, Mekhlis wrote to Stalin that “according to the information we have, comrade M. E. Koltsov is severely exhausted and completely physically worn down,” and was requesting permission to recall him to Moscow, a request Stalin approved. On Nov. 22, 1937, Mekhlis would write to Stalin that “Koltsov is in a bad mood now and, it seems, he has lost his bearings and could commit mistakes. He has been away from Moscow and party influence for a long time.” Mekhlis would again propose his recall, which Stalin would approve. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 215 (APRF [transferred to RGANI], f. 3, op. 34, d. 127, l. 27), 312 (l. 33–4). Mekhlis appears to have been angry that Koltsov wrote to him complaining he had been left out of the candidates approved for the Dec. 12, 1937, elections to the Supreme Soviet.

¹⁷³ Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 59 (March 16, 1937). Four days later, in the presence of Dimitrov, Stalin told the Spanish writers Rafael Alberti and Maria-Teresa Léonon that “the people and the whole world must be told the truth—the Spanish people are in no condition now to bring about a proletarian revolution—the internal and especially the international situation do not favor it.” Stalin added that “victory in Spain will loosen fascism’s hold in Italy and Germany. Communist and socialist forces must join forces—they now share the same basic aims—a democratic republic.” Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 60–1 (March 20, 1937). Dimitrov did not relent: On March 23, he provided Stalin with a report by a Bulgarian Comintern official who had spent two months in Spain. "The ability of the government to govern is very limited . . . Everyone, the broad popular masses, feels the need for a strong government, a government capable of ruling . . . The fundamental source of weakness of the government is that it lacks . . . a state apparatus." Stalin may well have agreed with this assessment, but he still refrained from having the Communists in Spain seize power. Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin, 51–8.

174. Kaganovich to Orjonikidze, Sept. 30, 1936: Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politburo, 149.

175. Spain's Communist party is alleged to have grown to 400,000 at its peak. Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 506–7.

176. Communist agents could not fail to learn of these probes. Payne, Spanish Revolution, 271–2. On April 15, 1937, a Comintern representative in the Republican camp wrote to Stalin urging him to break completely with Largo Caballero. Radosh et al., Spain Betrayed, 184–95.

177. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 58 (March 14, 1937).

178. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 221 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 223, l. 151), versus Berzin's report: 219 (l. 152). Berzin blamed the weak artillery support and weak offensive capabilities of the blue infantry, and the recent strengthening of the whites as well as the advantageous geography seized by them.

179. Southworth, Guernica, Guernica. Preston, Franco, 243–7. The article was by George Steer, South African born, who had written authoritatively about the Italian atrocities in the Abyssinian War. Steer would be killed in Burma in 1945. A Pablo Picasso canvas, an 11 x 25 foot mural commissioned by the Republican government for the Spanish pavilion at the 1937 Paris International Exposition, was completed already by mid-June and exhibited in July; it depicts the intense suffering of people, animals, and buildings subjected to violence.

180. Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 30–3. Stalin could have had the "information" delivered into the hands of the Japanese in Warsaw, in order to have it "leaked" back through foreign channels, perhaps to persuade Voroshilov.

181. Maclean, Escape to Adventure, 15; Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service, 227–8; Conquest, Reassessment, 214. Unusually, on April 28, 1937, Izvestiia issued a correction to a photo caption published the previous day: "Comrade Stalin the organizer of the strike of Tiflis railroad workers in 1902." The newspaper had to admit that at the time Stalin was imprisoned in Batum. It seems Stalin himself, or his aide, conveyed to the newspaper editor that the caption was "an utter misunderstanding from the point of view of historical truth." Izvestiia, April 27 and April 28, 1937.

182. Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 178; "Delo on tak nazyvaemoi 'antisovetskoi trotskistskoi organizatsii' v Krasno armii," 46–7 (S. P. Uritsky); Cristiani and Mikhaleva, Le repressioni, 254, 256 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1047, l. 70). Stalin canceled the annual reception at the Kremlin Grand Palace for graduates of military academies.

183. Sharapov, Naum Eitingon, 57.

184. Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 628–45.

185. Tatiana Tess, in Efimov, Mikhail Koltsov, 325.

186. S. Prokofeva and N. Godon, in Efimov, Mikhail Koltsov, 285, 384. The Embankment was officially known as Bersenevskaya. Koltsov previously lived on Bolshaya Dmitrovka. Of the fifty-six or so Central Committee members and candidates who had apartments in the House on the Embankment, forty-five would be arrested. Many residents, like Koltsov, were not Central Committee members.

187. Efimov, Mikhail Koltsov, 26–135 (at 103, 94–5). Koltsov had been in the Little Corner on Dec. 9, 1935, for twenty minutes, one-on-one. Na prieme, 174.

188. The Kremlin audience took place on April 15, after which Koltsov received a coveted invitation to the 1937 May Day reception at the St. George's Hall of the Grand Kremlin Place, where he was toasted by Voroshilov. On May 14, Stalin again received Koltsov in the Little Corner for one hour, alone. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 215 (APRF, f. 3, op. 34, d. 127, l. 27); Na prieme, 207, 209. Koltsov's Spanish Diary picks up again on May 23, on a train from Italy to Bilbao.

189. Orlov, the Soviet station chief in Spain, who was close to Koltsov, would comment, "The NKVD is like a gigantic mailbox, into which any irresponsible person may drop an irresponsible invention." Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 187–8; Orlov, Secret History, 187–8.

- 190. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 233 (APRF, f. 3, op. 53, d. 471, l. 73–4), 241 (op. 65, d. 224, l. 32), 242 (l. 30), 268, 276 (l. 115, 117–9), 249–52 (op. 53, d. 471, l. 3–4, 5, 75), 298–9 (d. 472, l. 3–4).
- 191. Volodarsky, Stalin's Agent, 205.
- 192. Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 165–8, 454n73, 454n75 (citing ASVRR, file 5581, I: 38, 45). See also Philby's obfuscatory memoir: Silent War, 17.
- 193. Andrew and Mitrokhin, Mitrokhin Archive, 114. (Later Grigulevich would be one of many tapped to assassinate Trotsky in Mexico.) Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 193; “V Madride ia rukovodil gruppoi” (Grigulevich interview); Primakov, Ocherki, III: 148–54.
- 194. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 153. With Orlov, Grigulevich participated in the kidnapping and murder of Nin.
- 195. Kol'tsov, “Fashistsko-shpionskaia rabota ispanskikh trotskistov.” On the forgery: Izvestiia, Nov. 26, 1992.
- 196. Sharapov, Naum Eitingon, 53. See also Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 291–2.
- 197. “It was a successful piece of disinformation reported directly to Stalin by Yezhov.” Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 44–5.
- 198. A Soviet military intelligence report had concluded that the “Trotskyite” and anarchist strongholds in Spain had to be broken. Radosh et al., Spain Betrayed, 129–33 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 960, l. 251–77; Nikonov, Feb. 20, 1937).
- 199. Orwell, Homage to Catalonia, 9. Orwell would complete his Homage to Catalonia in Jan. 1938, but his publisher, Victor Gollancz, who controlled the Left Book Club, would reject it—unseen. (The Left Book Club instead published pro-Soviet material on Spain.) But Frederic Warburg published Homage to Catalonia in a print run of 1,500, and managed to sell 800. Warburg also published Souvarine's Stalin and Gide's Back from the USSR. Arthur Koestler, who went to Spain in 1936 as a correspondent for Münzenberg media, recalls how the latter shouted at him concerning his manuscript about Spain, “Too weak. Too objective. Hit them! Tell the world how they run over their prisoners with tanks, how they pour petrol over them and burn them alive. Make the world gasp with horror. Hammer it into their heads. Make them wake up.” Koestler wrote in the published book: “If those who have at their command printing machines and printer's ink for the expression of their opinions, remain neutral and objective in the face of such bestiality, then Europe is lost.” Koestler, Spanish Testament, 177; Koestler, Invisible Writing, 333.
- 200. Herbert, Paris 1937. Both Speer and Yofan won gold medals; Kaplan, Red City. Blue Period, 179–87.
- 201. Petrov, Sroitel'stvo politorganov, 224, 237–8; Petrov, Partiinoe stroitel'stvo, 298; Erickson, Soviet High Command (3rd ed.), 460.
- 202. “Delo o tak nazyvaemoi ‘antisovetskoi trotskistskoi organizatsii’ v Krasnoi armii,” 47–8; Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 678 (Aleksandr Avseevich, 1962); Pravda, April 29, 1988 (B. Viktorov). Primakov (a Bolshevik since 1914) had served as military attaché in Afghanistan (1927–29) and then Japan (1930); in 1928 he had been forced to declare a break with the Trotskyites. Zdanovich, Organy 320 (citing TsA FSB, delo R-9000, t. 4, l. 53).
- 203. “Delo o tak nazyvaemoi ‘antisovetskoi trotskistskoi organizatsii’ v Krasnoi armii,” 46; Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia Otechestvennaia, XIII (2–1): 12. Also on May 10, 1937, the office of political commissar was reinstated (it had been abolished in 1934).
- 204. Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 41; Lebedev, “M. N. Tukhachevskii i ‘voenno-fashistskii zagovor,’” 182; Na prieme, 209; Viktor A. Aleksandrov, Delo Tukhachevskogo.
- 205. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 115–6 (TsA FSB, ASD P-4615, l. 258–61; ASD N. 15301, tom 2: 37–8); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChk, 170–6.
- 206. Tukhachevsky managed to clash not only with the partisan-war types of the civil war (Voroshilov, Budyonny, Kulik), but also old-line professionals, such as Shaposhnikov, whom Tukhachevsky derided as “cautious” and “an office Napoleon.” Koritskii et al., Tukhachevskii, 17. That said, Shaposhnikov's earlier appointment to the general staff might have been on Tukhachevsky's recommendation. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 198–9 (RGASPI, f. 134, op. 3, d. 17, l. 65: Kollontai diary); Nord, “Marshal Tukhachevskii,” 114.
- 207. Zdanovich, Organy, 282–4 (citing TsA FSB, delo R-9000, t. 24, l. 1, l. 210, l. 48ob, l. 72.).
- 208. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 89–90.

209. German intelligence purportedly sought to exploit these appetites, too, sending the blond, blue-eyed singer Josephine Heinze Tukhachevsky's way. Leskov, Stalin i zagovor Tukhachevskogo, 222–47.

210. Kantor, Zakliataia drzubba, 295. German general Blomberg had described Tukhachevsky as “youthfully fresh, sociable, sympatisch . . . He withheld himself from conversations about any political themes, but was a talkative and purposeful conversationalist when touching upon the operational and tactical areas. A very winning persona.” Kantor, Voina i mir, 296–7, 300 (citing Blomberg's private archive, “Reise des Chefs des Truppenamts nach Russland,” Aug.–Sept. 1928, 2–3, 14–16, 46).

211. Not long after Stalin had absolved Tukhachevsky, back in fall 1930, of plotting a seizure of power with the rightists, Voroshilov had forwarded two letters incriminating him, commenting that one “gave a brilliant and damning characterization.” The letters to Voroshilov were from Verkhovsky and Bergavinov, and forwarded to Stalin in Jan. 1931. Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 132. For hearsay about Tukhachevsky's criticisms of Voroshilov for incompetence, including in front of others, see Nord, Marshal Tukhachevsky, 102; and Simonov, Glazami chloveka moeogo pokoleniia, 383 (Zhukov).

212. Uborevich, known for his tactical and operational insight, mentored an extraordinary group of officers, including Semyon Timoshenko (b. 1895), Alexander Vasilevsky (b. 1895), Georgy Zhukov (b. 1896), Kirill Meretskov (b. 1897), Dmitry Pavlov (b. 1897), Ivan Konev (b. 1897), and Matvei Zakharov (b. 1898).

213. Svetlanin, Dal'nevostochnyi zagovor, 101 (the deputy was I. F. Fedko). In Sept. and Dec. 1936, the NKVD had received information that Blyukher was planning a military putsch. “M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistkii zagovor,’” 10.

214. This went far down the chain of command. “I feel that my every step is under observation,” remarked K. I. Sokolov-Strakhov, editor of the Military-Historical Bulletin, in comments that helped provoke his arrest. “It is hard and even frightening now to work on the literary-historical front.” (Sokolov-Strakhov was married to the niece of a former chief of the gendarmes.) Suvениrov, “Narkomat oborny,” 33, 56 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 39, d. 29, l. 5).

215. “The causes behind why I came to military intelligence are known to all,” Uritsky told the group's “party active” on May 19, 1937. “The causes were a breach . . . I arrived here and there were people who did not help me much. You and I are bad intelligence agents.” Gorbunov, “Voennaia razvedka v 1934–1939 godakh” (no. 3), 57 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 30, d. 54, l. 26).

216. Rodina, 1995, no. 2: 87; Pogonii, Lubianka, 2, 203; Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol'shaia chistka, 404–6, 445–51. Artuzov would be executed on Aug. 21, 1937.

217. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 299, 304, 307–10. Firin had helped supervise Stalin's visit to the Moscow-Volga Canal on April 22, 1937, before being arrested on May 9 as a German spy. Kokurin and Petrov, “Gulag,” 114.

218. Sever and Kolpakidi, GRU, 358.

219. Stalin also underscored the need to portray Soviet spies as “genuine patriots, heroes, of their country,” in order “to attract youth, talented people, girls, scientists” to intelligence work, but warned that “the enemy's strong intelligence and our weakness are a provocation to war.” Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 290–3 (TsA FSB, f. 6, op. 5, d. 25, l. 208–10). See also Vinogradov, “Tret'ia reform organov bezopasnosti,” II: 76–96, esp. 93. One account has Stalin going in person, on May 22, 1937, to military intelligence HQ: Gorbunov, “Voennaia razvedka v 1934–1939 godakh” (no. 3), 57. On the consequences, see also Alekseev et al., Ensiklopediia voennoi razvedki, 508–9.

220. Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 44; Lebedev, “M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistkii zagovor,’” 188. See also Pankov, Komkor Eideman, 103. Voroshilov had recommended promoting Eideman to head of anti-aircraft, arguing that it needed someone of “major authority.” Whitewood, Red Army, 212 (citing RGVA, f. 4, op. 19, d. 18, l. 176).

221. Some say the arrest occurred in the office of the provincial party secretary, others in his train coach (he had not yet moved into an apartment). Nikulin, Tukhachevskii, 190; Sokolov, Tukhachevskii, 310–1, (citing P. A. Ermolin); Kantor, Voina i mir, 370 (citing letter of N. I. Shishikin, in the personal archives of Iu. V. Khitrovo); Koritskii et al., Tukhachevskii, 128–9; Zen'kovich, Marshaly i genseki, 488.

222. Pechenkin, “1937 god,” 43, citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 615, l. 8, 10, 14.

223. Kantor, Voina i mir, 386–7; Svetlana Tukhachevsky's statement in Yuliya Kantor, Mikhail Nikolaevich Tukhachevsky: www.pseudology.org/colonels/Tukhachevsky.htm. The Central Committee, without a plenun, expelled Tukhachevsky as well as Rudzutaks from the party and handed them over to the NKVD. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 190 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 304, l. 112); Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 448. Ushakov would be executed in Jan. 1940.

224. Na prieme, 210. Kandelaki would be arrested Sept. 11, 1937.

225. Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service, 234.

226. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, IIii: 263; Krasnaia zvezda, June 4, Aug. 13, 1964. Pravda announced his suicide on June 1, 1937. There were nearly 800 suicides in the Red Army in 1937, and more than 800 the next year. Khlevniuk, 1937–i, 207. Gamarnik had been parroting the Stalin line, telling a party meeting in the military (March 13, 1937), for ex.: “Comrades, the Japanese-German Trotskyist agents, spies, and wreckers are in a full range of our army organization, in the staffs, the institutions, the academies, the military-training institutions.” He repeated this in more speeches before his arrest for being the phenomenon he was warning against. Whitewood, “Purge of the Red Army,” 296, citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 29, d. 319, l. 2.

227. Minakov, Za otovorotom marshal'skoi shinelii, 249–358.

228. Davies et al., Stalin-Kaganovich Correspondence, 556–7. The Azov–Black Sea Territory was divided in Sept. 1937; Yevdokimov became party chief of the new Rostov province.

229. Rumors circulated that when a preeminent sadist (Anatoly Yesaulov) had failed to beat a confession out of Yagoda for espionage, Stalin had assigned the task to Yevdokimov. The rumor was false yet indicative. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 95–243.

230. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 270–1.

231. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 274–5; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 67–8. See also Wheatcroft, “Agency and Terror.” Kursky shot himself on July 8, 1937.

232. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD; Naumov, Stalin i NKVD, 173–88.

233. http://www.hrono.ru/dokum/193_dok/19390413beria.php (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 373, l. 3–44: protocol of Frinovsky interrogation, Beria to Stalin April 11, 1939). Frinovsky and Yezhov were not close. “I had multiple clashes at work with him,” Yezhov would later observe of Frinovsky. “I cursed him out, and called him a fool to his face, because no sooner would he arrest someone among the NKVD operatives then he would run to me and shout that it was all fabrication [lipa], that the person was wrongly arrested.” “Poslednee slovo Nikolai Ezhova.”

234. http://www.hrono.ru/dokum/193_dok/19390413beria.php (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 373, l. 3–44: protocol of Frinovsky interrogation, sent by Beria to Stalin April 11, 1939); Afanas'ev, Oni ne molchali, 218.

235. “Poslednee slovo Nikolai Ezhova”; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 536 (citing TsA FSB, sledstvennoe delo No. N-15302, t. 1, l. 184–6); Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 560–2.

236. Gide, Vozvrashchenie iz SSSR (Moscow: Moskovskii rabochii, 1990), 80. On the Soviet response to the Gide book, see Fleishman, Pasternak v tridsatye gody, 378–83.

237. RGASPI, f. 77, op. 3–e, d. 117, l. 33.

238. Koltsov, who was cohabitating with Feuchtwanger's wife, Maria Osten, had lobbied for Feuchtwanger to be received in the Soviet Union. RGASPI, f. 17, op., 114, d. 952, l. 48 (Angarov to Ezhov, Nov. 2, 1936; note from Mikhail Apletin, deputy head of the writers' union foreign commission, to Angarov).

239. Feuchtwanger, Moskva 1937, 68. See also Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 238.

240. Feuchtwanger, Moskva 1937, 64–5, 91. See also Feuchtwanger, Moscow 1937, 93–5. Feuchtwanger visited Moscow Dec. 1, 1936, to Feb. 5, 1937. Stalin received him on Jan. 8. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 820, l. 3–22; Feuchtwanger, Moscow 1937, 152–3. Feuchtwanger's book would be withdrawn from Soviet libraries in 1938. One scholar noted that he “was the last in the line of the celebrated fellow-travelers of the interwar period to turn his journey into an eyewitness' public endorsement of Stalinism; he was the last European intellectual sympathizer to be received on the grand scale of Rolland and Gide.” David-Fox, Showcasing the Great Experiment, 270. Orwell conceded that he would support Communism over fascism if forced to choose. Davison, George Orwell.

241. Vishnevskii, Sobranie sochinenii, VI: 410–1.

- 242. Anderson, Voennyi sovet, 40–1, 57; “Delo o tak nazyvaemoi ‘antisovetskoi trotskistskoi voennoi organizatsii’ v krasnoi armii,” Izvestiia TsK KPSS, 1989, no. 4: 52.
- 243. Meretskov, Na sluzhbe narodu, 166–7.
- 244. Na prieme, 211; Pechenkin, “1937 god,” 51.
- 245. Polishchuk, “Zasedanie RVS 1–3 iunია 1937 goda.” Polishchuk was then the head of the Military Electrical-Technology Academy. He is listed as having received the interrogation protocols to read: Anderson, Voennyi sovet, 41.
- 246. Anderson, Voennyi sovet, 66–70, 74–5. See also Sokolov, Mikhail Tukhachevskii, 378.
- 247. “‘Nevol’niki v rukakh germanskogo reikhsvera,”” 74 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1120, l. 28–57 at 31–2). See also “Sovetskaia razvedka i russkaia voennaia emigratsiia 20–40x gg.,” 119. On Nov. 14, 1932, Męzyński sent a letter to Stalin proposing Dzierżyński for a medal; Stalin wrote on it “Opposed.” He had still not forgiven Dzierżyński’s brief wavering. But Stalin had authorized a Dzierżyński statue to be erected in front of the NKVD headquarters, on Dzierżyński Square, on the tenth anniversary of his death, in July 1936. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 5284, l. 1–3; Plekhanov and Plekhanov, F. E. Dzerzhinskii, 671 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 279, l. 41).
- 248. Anderson, Voennyi sovet, 128–43 (esp. 128, 131, 134–5); “‘Nevol’niki v rukakh germanskogo reikhsvera,”” 74 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1120, l. 28–57 at 31–2). See also Gorbatov, Gody i voiny, 122–3. In Jan. 1938, Stalin would take to arguing, unpersuasively, that skill in the military arts was not so crucial for military success and that what mattered were the social origins of military leaders and the overall correct government policy of the workers-peasants state. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1120, l. 104–5, 109.
- 249. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1120, l. 28–57 (at 46–7).
- 250. Pechenkin, “1937 god.” The 1961 commission on Stalin’s military repressions was published in two places: Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 29–113 (incomplete); and Voенно-istoricheskii arkhiv, 1997, no. 1: 173–255, no. 2: 3–81. See also the illuminating testimony about opposition to collectivization extracted from or written for Pavel Bulanov about Yagoda: Il’inskii, Narkom lagoda, 500–8 (at 500: TsA FSB, N-13614, tom 2: 211–21: April 30, 1937).
- 251. Pechenkin, “1937 god.” 50–1.
- 252. “‘Nevol’niki v rukakh germanskogo reikhsvera,”” 75–6.
- 253. The ten were Voroshilov, Budyonny, Shaposhnikov, Timoshenko, Kulik, Apanasenko, Gorodovikov, Shchadenko, Khrulyov, and Meretskov (arrested but released). The majority had been members of the First Cavalry Army in the civil war. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 288. Pechenkin gives eight not arrested. Pechenkin, “1937 god,” 52.
- 254. Anderson, Voennyi sovet, 250–6, 243–5.
- 255. Preston, Franco, 278–9.
- 256. Anderson, Voennyi sovet, 340–1. Already on May 10, 1937, in a detailed report to Stalin and Molotov, Voroshilov had parroted the new Stalin line. The mass arrests of the highest commanders had followed almost immediately. Whitewood, “Purge of the Red Army,” 300, citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 965, l. 65.
- 257. Ulam, Stalin, 18 (attributing the line to Budu Mdivani).
- 258. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1549. Keke had taken ill on May 13, 1937.
- 259. The inventory of her belongings: RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1549; Ilizarov, Tainaia zhizn’ Stalina, 281–2. The effects went to Maria Kvinkadze.
- 260. Memuary freiliny imperatritsy, 204–5 (Tatuli Gviniasvili).
- 261. Elagin, Ukroshchenie iskusstva, 55; Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 51–2.
- 262. “You’re wrong to talk about famine and penury abroad, because they write to me that everything there is cheaper than here and they send money,” one woman in Vologda, Stalin’s former place of internal exile, observed in 1937 in response to party agitation. Golubev, “Esli mir obrushitsia na nashu Respubliku,” 68–9 (citing BOANPI, f. 1858, op. 2, d. 940, l. 56). A Sept. 1938 secret directive confirmed the institutions that could receive foreign literature, dividing them into three categories. Only those in the first category—the secretariat of the Council of People’s Commissars, the Central Committee, the Supreme Soviet, Pravda and Izvestiya editorial boards, the foreign affairs commissariat, the NKVD foreign department, TASS, the Institute of Marxism-Leninism, leading members of foreign Communist parties, and foreign embassies—enjoyed unlimited privileges. Blium, Tsenzura v Sovetskomo Soiuze, 279–80. Despite the tight control, the censor still ended up pulping 10 percent of the purchased foreign periodicals (which cost the state a quarter million gold rubles). In 1939, the USSR would import 2.36 million individual foreign publications (books, pamphlets, issues of periodicals); the censorship examined about one-quarter of the total, and 10 percent were again destroyed. Goriaeva, Istoriia sovetskoi politicheskoi tsenzury, 311, 326.

263. “The window to the world can be covered by a newspaper,” in the ironic words of Stanisław Jerzy Lec, Polish poet and aphorist, who had been born de Tusch-Letz in Habsburg Lemberg (Lwów) in 1909. Lec, Unkempt Thoughts.

264. Meerovich, “V narkomindele, 1922–1939: interv’iu s E. A. Gnedinym,” Pamiat’: istoricheskii sbornik [Paris], 1981, vyp. 5: 381.

265. Rittersporn, “Omnipresent Conspiracy,” 101–20; also found in Getty and Manning, Stalinist Terror, 99–115. See also Rittersporn, Anguish.

266. He added that “we junior officers knew that personally we ran no hazards.” Akhmedov, In and Out of Stalin’s GRU, 104.

267. For a detailed account of how the NKVD fabricated the case, see Cherushev, 1937 god. Stalin edited the copy, drafted by Mekhlis, following sessions in the Little Corner. Na prieme, 211–2; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 217–19 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 308, l. 78–83). Józef Unszlicht, although long out of the military, was arrested that day but not included in the military trial. He would be executed on July 28, 1938.

268. Pravda, June 9–13, 1937. An abridged Soviet version appeared as Razvedka i kontrrazvedka (Moscow: Voentzdat, 1938).

269. Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 50; Lebedev, “M. N. Tukhachevskii i ‘voenno-fashistskii zagovor,’” 194; Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 688.

270. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKa, 103 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1038, l. 188–9: letter, June 5).

271. Gorchakov, Ian Berzin, 113. Berzin would only last until Aug. 1, 1937.

272. One author has alleged that there was a “plot” by these military men, not to seize power, but to have Voroshilov removed, which provoked Stalin’s actions. Minakov, 1937. There is no evidence whatsoever for such a “plot” (as opposed to a wish), Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 17.

273. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, I/ii: 264–5. A facsimile of Tukhachevsky’s “confession” and a copy of the “plan of defeat” are in: “Pokazaniia marshala Tukhachevskogo.”

274. Trotsky had condemned Tukhachevsky’s idea of a Red-Army-led “revolution from abroad” (which the latter had applied unsuccessfully to Poland in 1920). See also Tukhachevsky’s militant contribution to Der bewaffnete Aufstand, 21, 23.

275. Rapoport and Alexeev, High Treason, 5–8. The street where Tukhachevsky met his death, formerly known as Nikolskaya, had been the location of his original Moscow apartment.

276. Jansen and Petrov, “Mass Terror and the Court.”

277. Lebedev, “M. N. Tukhachevskii i ‘voenno-fashistskii zagovor,’” 199.

278. Verevkin-Rakhal’skii, Moi 90 let, 193. Voroshilov’s diary for June 7 indicates that Stalin went back and forth on precisely who of those already arrested would be put on trial, and who would sit in the panel of judges. Deputy Commander of the Far Eastern Army Mikhail Sangursky, who was arrested June 1–2, 1937, appeared in Voroshilov’s June 7 order on the trial, but before June 11 was removed. Voroshilov had Berzin and Smirnov originally listed as judges but crossed them off. Kun, Stalin, 400–1 (facsimiles of the pages from Voroshilov’s diary); “Prikaz narodnogo komissara oborony Soiuzu SSR no. 072 (7 iunია 1937 g.),” 46; Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKa, 91, 379.

279. Zen’kovich, Marshaly i genseki, 510–1 (citing the eleven-page trial transcript). Five of the seven military men sitting as judges with Ulrich would soon be executed themselves, except for Budyonny and Shaposhnikov.

280. RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3s, d. 828. Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 17. In his account for Stalin (June 26), Budyonny noted that although Tukhachevsky had shaken his head “no” during the reading of the charges and testimony, and denied passing any classified documents to the Germans, in the end he pronounced himself guilty. Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 55–6; Lebedev, “M. N. Tukhachevskii i ‘voenno-fashistskii zagovor,’” 199–200; APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 310, l. 170–83. See also the report of another “judge,” I. P. Belov, in Cristiani and Mikhaleva, Le repressioni, 192–8.

281. “Delo o tak nazyvaemoi ‘antisovetskoi trotskistskoi organizatsii’ v Krasnoi Armii,” 57.

282. Blokhin was assisted by Ignatev. Lebedev, “M. N. Tukhachevskii i ‘voenno-fashistskii zagovor,’” 199. Just after Ulrich had pronounced sentences, Stalin received Timoshenko, alone, for half an hour (June 12). He would be posted to Ukraine, to replace Yakir as commander of the Kiev military district. Na prieme, 212.

283. “World fascism this time, too, has discovered that its loyal agents, the Gamarniks and the Tukhachevskys, the Yakirs and the Uboreviches, as well as similar treasonous offal, lackeys serving capitalism, have been wiped from the face of the earth,” wrote Voroshilov, in a directive to all Red Army servicemen printed in Pravda (June 13). “Their memory will be cursed and forgotten.” Tukhachevsky was equated with “playing the same role as Franco.”

284. Pravda, June 13, 1937 (Krupskaya). See also Komsomol'skaia pravda, Jan. 18, 2013.

285. Vostryshchev, Moskva stalinskaia, 361–2; Kommersant vlast', July 9, 2012.

286. Bailes, Technology and Society, 387; Egorov and Kliucharev, Grazhdanskaia aviatsiia SSSR, 98–9, 101; Karpov, Aviatsiia strany sotsializma, 60–2. Stalin sometimes summoned these flight crews to the Little Corner before their flights, going over their plans, and occasionally saw them off at the airfield. Chkalov (with Baidukov) was recorded in the Little Corner twice: July 14, 1936, and May 25, 1937 (before the Pacific Coast flight). Na prieme, 189, 210.

287. Velikii letchik nashego vremeni, 315.

288. Bailes, Technology and Society, 381–406.

289. Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 332.

290. Kumanen, Riadom so Stalinym, 435–6 (Chadaev). See also Rubtsov, Alter ego Stalina; Rubtsov, Iz-za spiny vozhdia.

291. Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 4, telegrams to and from the military districts from TsAMO; Khrushchev, Khrushchev Remembers, 160–4. Mekhlis soon replaced Gamarnik as chief of the political department in the military (from Dec. 1937), a post he would hold until Sept. 1940. “The more ‘enemies of the people’ Stalin exterminates, rising upward on their corpses,” Trotsky acidly wrote of Mekhlis after his promotion to deputy defense commissar, “the greater the void that forms around him.” “Voroshilov Is Next in Line,” Biulleten' oppositsii, no. 62–3 (1938): 23.

292. A contemporary Soviet diplomat, who defected and survived, well understood the impossibility, physically and psychologically, of a Red Army plot in cahoots with Nazism. Barmine, One Who Survived, 223.

293. Volkogonov, “Marshal Voroshilov,” 163.

294. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 321 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 343, l. 84); Khaustov, “Razvitie sovetskikh organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti,” 362. Khrulyov was demoted to the Kiev military district in 1938, but Stalin would bring him back to Moscow in Sept. 1939. Voroshilov evidently also managed to save Mikhail Lukin, who became a lieutenant general. Muratov and Gorodetskaia, Komandarm Lukin, 262. See also Voroshilov's appeal to Stalin (July 11, 1937) for a member of the military council of the Ural Military District. (The file contains no answer.) Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 17.

295. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKa, 64; Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 4, telegrams to and from the military districts from TsAMO (this one dated Oct. 2, 1937). See also Cristiani and Mikhaleva, Le repressioni, 66.

296. Memo of Govorukhin, chief of PUR in Leningrad Military District, June 12, 1937, RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 993, l. 159ss, Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 17. Similar mood reports that month to Voroshilov contained the following: “Now, no one except the politburo can be believed.” “Only Comrade Stalin can be believed now, and no one else.” RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 993, l. 157–8, Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 17 (Kruglov, temporarily implementing duties of chief of PUR.)

297. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 194 (citing APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 312, l. 162, June 29, 1937). “Over there, over here, they started to arrest commanders, about whom we had never heard a bad word before,” recalled a division commander in the Kiev military district. “From mouth to mouth rumors were whispered, one more absurd than the next, about plots and espionage malefaction.” Gorbатов, “Shkola Iakira,” 176. See also Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 199 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 308, l. 212–3).

298. Afanas'ev, Oni ne molchali, 380.

299. The defense commissariat received more than 200,000 letters in 1938 (and would receive more than 350,000 in 1939). No small number were petitions sent from prisons. Kommunist, 1990, no. 17: 70.

300. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, I: 438; Suvenirov, “Za chest’ i dostoinstvo voinov RKKA,” 372–87 (at 377).

301. Kuznetsov, Krutye povoroty, 59, 76–9.

302. Just one of many examples: between May 7 and 10, Voroshilov issued a plan for liquidating wrecking—check all warehouses, all construction sites, all secret information storage holdings, all military units—but he did so without naming a single example of actual wrecking in the army. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 75 (APRE, f. 3, f. 401, l. 107–9).

303. Suvenirov, “Narkomat oborony,” 29 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1023, l. 22, 24, 26: June 1937). Notes to himself for his Nov. 1938 speech to the Main Military Council show how far Voroshilov had come. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 74–5 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1137, l. 3, 5, 6).

304. A few days after the June 1937 military soviet gathering, Voroshilov told an assembly of party members at the defense commissariat that the army was “the last place” in terms of “revealed” enemies, but that during the previous three months the situation had “sharply changed.” Whitewood, Red Army, 249 (citing RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 118, l. 3).

305. Kollontai, Diplomaticheskie dnevniki, II: 369–70. Voroshilov’s despair would also be evident in a draft outline of his speech to the June 1937 Central Committee plenum, in which he had written that the unmasking of the military-fascist plot “means that our method of work, our whole system for running the army, and my work as people’s commissar, have utterly collapsed.” This line was evidently not uttered. Brandenberger, Propaganda State in Crisis, 190.

306. Dubinskii, Osobyi schet, 212. Dubinskii was slandered and arrested back in Kazan.

307. Trotskii, Stalin, II: 276.

308. Machiavelli, Discourses, 181–2, 184–5.

309. Chuev, Sto sorok, 37.

310. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral’-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1995, no. 3), 6.

311. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral’-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1994, no. 2), 21.

312. Chuev, Sto sorok, 416. Or again: “We owe the fact that we did not have a fifth column during the war to ’37.” (Of course, the Soviet Union did have an immense Fifth Column during WWII.) Chuev, Molotov, 464. One scholar, who correctly cautioned against accepting the fifth column argument to explain Stalin’s motivations, hypothesized that Molotov’s and Kaganovich’s resort to the fifth column rationale might have assuaged their consciences. Rees, “Stalin as Leader, 1937–1953,” 210.

313. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 575, l. 69. Kaganovich, in June 1938, addressing the Donbass party organization, would state that if the enemies, spies, and kulaks had not been annihilated, “perhaps we would be at war already.” Kuromiya, “Accounting for the Great Terror,” 96 (citing RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 231, II. 73, 79). G. K. Dashevskii [Donskoi], a Latin Americanist at the Soviet Union’s Institute of World Economics and World Politics, published a pamphlet in 1938 drawing the parallels: Fashistskaia piataia kolonna v Ispanii (Moscow: Voenizdat, 1938). See also Kublanov, “Razгром fashistskoi trotskistko-bukharinskoi ‘piatoi kolonii’ v SSSR.”

314. The perceptive American John Scott cited four factors to explain the terror, two of which involved the presence of many “former” people, which he called “potentially good material for clever foreign agents to work with,” as well as the circumstance that Japan, Italy, and Germany “sent fifth-columnists of all kinds into Russia, as they did into every country” (italics added). The other two factors Scott cited were the long history of a secret police in Russia and Bolshevik intolerance toward opposition. Scott, Behind the Urals, 188–9. See also Davies, Mission to Moscow. See also the fellow traveler Strong, Stalin Era, 68; and Deutscher, Stalin, 376–7.

315. Stepanov, Rastrel po limitu, 13–4. Sholokhov mentioned a fifth column in a letter to Stalin (Feb. 1938). Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 309; Murin, “Prosti menia, Koba . . . : neizvestnoe pis’mo N. Bukharina,” 23 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 427, l. 13–8); “Vokrug menia vse eshche pletut chernuiu Pautinu . . . ,” 18 (f. 45, op. 1, d. 827, l. 41–61, Feb. 16, 1938).

316. The influential Khlevniuk has asserted that, based upon the intelligence he was being fed, Stalin became convinced the Republican side in Spain was being defeated because of traitors in its midst and that he feared the same could happen in the Soviet Union, goading him to undertake the domestic terror. Kuromiya, another top scholar, sought to refine the point, arguing that Stalin feared not latent internal opposition per se but internal opposition transformed by a war launched from without. Khlevniuk, "Objectives of the Great Terror," 158–76; Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 173 (citing APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 223, l. 90, 141–2, 146); Kuromiya, "Accounting for the Great Terror."

317. Border guards were gathering the harvest. Solov'ev and Chugnuov, Pogranichnye voiska SSSR, 9–10.

318. Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 104; Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 247–8.

319. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 296 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1049, l. 260–1, 265, July 14, 1937), 297; Suvenirov, "Klim, Koba skazal," 57–8.

320. During the nine days after the in-camera trial, nearly 1,000 more Soviet commanders and military intelligence operatives were arrested, a number now continuously rising. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 190–1 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 4, d. 30, l. 250–1; APRE, f. 3, op. 46, d. 807, l. 62); "Delo o tak nazyvaemoi 'antisovetskoi trotskistskoi organizatsii' v Krasnoi Armii," 57; Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 160–1.

321. Rybalkin, Operatsiia "X", 64 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 852, l. 115); Wheatley, Hitler and Spain, 102–3; Proctor, Hitler's Luftwaffe. It has been estimated that barring its losses in Spain, Italy could have gone to war in June 1940 with 50 full strength divisions, instead of the 19 full and 34 partial strength it mounted. Sullivan, "Fascist Italy's Military Involvement," 703, 718.

322. Some 100 Soviet military advisers served in Spain in 1936, 50 in 1937, 250 in 1938, and 95 in 1939, for a total of 495. Rybalkin, Operatsiia "X", 57 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 870, l. 344; f. 35082, op. 1, d. 15, l. 47–9); Tolmachev, "Sovetskii Soiuz i Ispaniia," 150 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1143, l. 127). See also Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 768 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 912, l. 158; d. 961, l. 170–1).

323. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 577. See also Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service, 95.

324. Mallett, Mussolini, 92.

325. Leitz, Economic Relations. Spain enabled Göring to increase his role in German economic planning at home. Franco was uneasy but had to accept Germany's economic aggrandizement inside Spain. Germany was able to obtain militarily significant raw materials—pyrites, copper, mercury, zinc (some 80 percent of Spanish exports of key materials were going to Germany by 1939), while Spain went into debt to Berlin. Wheatley, Hitler and Spain, 85.

326. Stalin was told on July 26, 1937, that the USSR had dispatched 460,000 tons of goods to Spain since Aug. 1936, from food, oil, and timber to trucks, tractors, ammonium sulfate, cotton, and cigarettes. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 260–4 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 224, l. 95–102). By Feb.–March 1938, the Spanish gold had been spent; Moscow extended a credit of $70 million to the Republic for further purchases. The loans, which might have reached $155 million, were never repaid. Kowalsky reasoned that "even if we subtract Howson's $51 million in overcharges, acknowledge only the unpaid loan of $70 million, (rather than the potential $155 million), and subtract the cost of three DC-3s (roughly $360,000), the total value of the Soviet assistance provided to the Republic comes to approximately $525 million, or $7 million more than their gold should have bought." Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 548. Politburo agenda items on Spain more and more took up resettling Spanish orphans in the USSR, as well as prisoner exchanges with Italy and Germany.

327. Antonov-Ovseyenko would be summoned to Moscow "for a short period to report" on July 24, 1937. Three days later he would write to Stalin asking to be received. Stalin would grant an audience only on Sept. 14 (first alone, then in the company of Yezhov and Molotov), when Antonov-Ovseyenko would be appointed justice commissar for the RSFSR. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 265 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 224, l. 106); Na prieme, 220. In Spain, management of Soviet diplomacy would fall to Tateos Mandalyan (b. 1901), an ethnic Armenian who went by the name Sergei Marchenko. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 418–9 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 228, l. 1–3).

328. On May 20, 1937, Pascua asked to see Stalin regarding the fall of Largo Caballero and the formation of a new Spanish coalition government. Pascua was worried (as he told Potyomkin) that he had committed errors that put him in Stalin's bad graces; Stalin assented to an audience—on Aug. 2, after Potyomkin reminded Stalin of Pascua's request on July 27. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 239 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 224, l. 18), 265 (105); Na prieme, 217.

329. Through summer 1938, Dimitrov and the Comintern continued to be preoccupied with Spain, sending many long reports to Stalin, but the dictator's engagement with Spain was essentially finished. Already in Sept.–Oct. 1937, the majority of Soviet advisers were withdrawn from Spain; the Comintern group there was disbanded. Novikov, SSSR, Komintern, II: 78. By Sept. 1938, the Soviets issued an order to withdraw the International brigades (Franco did not reciprocate by sending the Germans and Italians home).

330. The transfer east was formalized on May 11. Already on June 19, Yezhov ordered Balytsky to report to Moscow. Balytsky had to understand this meant his own arrest. Still, perhaps Balytsky imagined he could persuade the dictator of his loyalty, claiming, for example, that even though he and the enemy Yakir had worked together in Ukraine, he had not known of Yakir's plotting. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 127, citing APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 33, l. 81–5. At one time thought to be a candidate to replace Yagoda, Balytsky was executed on Nov. 21, 1937, at Kommunarka, Yagoda's former dacha. "O sud'be chlenov i kandidatov v chleny TsK VKP (b), izbrannogo XVII s'ezdom partii," 88.

331. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, IV: 214 (July 10, 1937). Erich Wollenberg, a German Communist who served fifteen years in the Red Army (1921–36), noted, "One cannot deny that as a result of the executions the Red Army is leaderless." Hitler, too, would use this phrase. Wollenberg, Red Army.

CHAPTER 8. "WHAT WENT ON IN NO. 1'S BRAIN?"

1. "Secret Speech" [1956], in Khrushchev, Khrushchev Remembers, 616.

2. Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 263.

3. Solzhenitsyn, without access to regime archives, got this right, writing that "old prisoners claim to remember that the first blow allegedly took the form of mass arrests" in Aug. 1937. Solzhenitsyn, Gulag Archipelago, I: 68. See also Weissberg-Cybulski, Accused, 7–10.

4. Yezhov's report was followed by four days of discussion. No transcript was made of the plenum through June 26 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 614, l. 1), and no complete text of Yezhov's speech has been adduced. We do, however, have his outline: Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 293–312 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 4, d. 20, l. 117–22, 163–83); Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 130–2; Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, V/1: 306–8 (d. 29, l. 200–7). On June 27–29, the plenum discussed the Supreme Soviet election laws, grain seeds, crop rotation, and machine tractor stations, which is what the Pravda post-plenum summary (June 30) mentioned, leaving out Yezhov's report.

5. Stalin had Voroshilov, Molotov, Mikoyan, and Zhdanov affix their assent. L. B., "'Tain Kremliia' bol'she ne budet?," 37.

6. The creative intelligentsia might have suffered fewer arrests per capita than other groups. Getty and Manning, Stalinist Terror, 243.

7. Koestler, Darkness at Noon, 15–6.

8. Payne, Life and Death of Adolf Hitler, 350; Conquest, Breaker of Nations, 317. Bullock asserted that both Hitler and Stalin "owed a great deal of their success as politicians to their ability to disguise from allies as well as opponents, their thoughts and their intentions." Bullock, Hitler and Stalin, 367.

9. Enteen, "Intellektual'nye predposylki."

10. Conquest, Reassessment, 14 (no citation).

11. Tichanova, Rastrel'nye spiski, 202, 211; Moskovskie novosti, 1994, no. 5.

12. The "politburo" ordered Yezhov to go on holiday on Dec. 7, 1937, outside Moscow, and directed Stalin to make sure Yezhov did not appear at work. RGASPI, f. 17 op. 3, d. 993, l. 74.

13. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 399–405. Savoleinen, the accused mercury poisoner, was executed in Aug. 1937.

14. Orlov, Secret History, 221–2. Yezhov's office as of Oct. 1936 was on the fourth floor (410). Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 67, citing GARF, f. 9401, op. 1a, d. 15, l. 242.

15. Those who had long minimized Stalin's role now admit that his "name is all over the horrible documents authorizing the terror." (Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 451.) And if it were not? If Stalin had kept his name off the documents, while making others sign them, would we be wondering if he were an instrument in their hands, or a neutral figure caught between factions, or an opponent of terror who went along with it? If all the documents on the terror had been destroyed during a wartime bombing or a botched evacuation, or by a fire, or on his command, would it still be unclear that the mass arrests and executions did not somehow begin and wind down of their own accord, but were carried out on Stalin's orders?

16. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 348–51 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 254, l. 165–72). Many examples have been gathered in Kurlandskii, Stalin, vlast', religiiu, 41–3.

17. Mlechin, KGB, 176.

18. Yezhov was instructed to “spend nine-tenths of his time on NKVD business”: RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 981, l. 50.

19. Fadeev, “Nikolai Ivanovich Ezhov,” cited in Pavliukov, Ezhov, 335–6, RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 270, l. 69–86 (at 80–1); excerpts are also in Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 13. This was part of a commissioned biography of Yezhov, whose arrest took place before the biography could be published.

20. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 207; Pavliukov, Ezhov, 536.

21. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1995, no. 1), 10.

22. In this case, by Poluvedko et al., Mech i tryzub, 122. See also Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 12–29.

23. TsA FSB, p-23634, t. 1, l. 195. Spiegelglass handled multiple key double agents, controlled Zborowski's virtuoso work with Sedov, and would oversee several more priority assassinations abroad—until his own regime executed him.

24. Rees has argued that the Great Terror “was the central and decisive event” in the history of Stalin's regime, a view I do not share, but I do share his contention that “in the experience of modern states [the terror] is without precedent.” Rees, “Stalin as Leader, 1937–1953,” 200–39.

25. Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 299–300. As of Nov. 30, 1937, Stalin started receiving not the lengthy raw interrogation protocols but summaries, and only of the most important cases. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 319–20.

26. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 322 (TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 6, d. 11, l. 384).

27. Conquest, Great Terror: Reassessment, 268–9; Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service, 143–4.

28. Sukhanovka had been retrofitted as a prison in 1931, and in late 1938 into early 1939 would be expanded for “especially dangerous enemies of the people.” Golovkova, Sukhanovskiaia tiurnia; GARF, f. 5446, op. 22a, d. 125, l. 5.

29. Papkov, Stalinskii terror v Sibiri, 230–1. In 1938, for example, the party boss of Karelia would tell Yezhov that because local prisons were already overflowing, he was unable to arrest more than a thousand “enemies.” Takala, “Natsional'nye operatsii,” 196–7. See also Joyce, “Soviet Penal System,” 90–115.

30. Gur'ianov, Repressii protiv poliakov, 30. As Frinovsky traveled by train in July 1938 through regions that had sent arrest albums to Moscow, he and his aides, having brought the overdue paperwork, rendered decisions on the train and dropped them off as they passed through. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 323.

31. The anti-terrorist machinery that had been introduced on the day of the Kirov murder in the form of a USSR Central Executive Committee decree (Dec. 1, 1934), had been formally approved nine days later by the RSFSR Central Executive Committee and the RSFSR Council of People's Commissars, but the anti-terrorism laws were not finalized until Feb. 1936, entered into the RSFSR criminal code via an added 18th chapter (“On the investigation and hearing of cases of terrorist organizations and terrorist acts against Soviet power”). Istoriia zakonodatel'stva SSSR i RSFSR po ugolovnomu protsessu, 53. These procedures were extended to wrecking and diversionary acts on Sept. 14, 1937. On the confusion, see Scott, Behind the Urals, 194.

32. Mironov, “Vosstanovlenie i razvitie leninskikh printsipov,” 19. In Yerevan in Sept. 1937, Malenkov, Mikoyan, and Beria, overseeing a regional party plenum, turned the sitting party bosses over to the NKVD and decided upon the new first, second, and third party secretaries for Armenia, sending a proposal to Stalin and Molotov in Moscow. Stalin approved “if the plenum of the Central Committee of Armenia does not have any doubts regarding these candidates.” RGASPI, f. 17, op. 19, d. 62, l. 2, 4; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 135, l. 65–65ob. Although this could have been a pose of false party democracy, he could hardly know or remember everyone even in the nomenklatura. On Yevdokimov's telegraphed request to arrest Amatouni Amatouni [Vardapetyan] Stalin had written, “Who is this Amatouni? Where does he work?” (Amatouni was the party boss in Armenia and among the gaggle of high officials arrested there on Sept. 23.) Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 68 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 65, l. 24), 379–80 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 332, l. 43). Amatouni was executed on July 28, 1938, from a long list of names approved by Stalin. N. P. Mironov, “Vosstanovlenie i razvitie leninskikh printsipov sotsialisticheskoi zakonnosti (1953–1963 gg.),” 19.

33. Some 43,000 people are on the lists; the USSR military collegium handed down 14,732 sentences in 1937 and 24,435 in 1938, a little more than 39,000 people total. An example of someone who survived is Ya. Yelkovich of the Altai, who was on two lists. Tepliakov, Mashina terrora, 296. Iakushev, Stalinskie nastrel'nye spiski.

34. As of June 1941, 1,500 telegrams and 33,000 thousand letters were being sent abroad from the Soviet Union and 1,000 telegrams and 31,000 letters were arriving from abroad every day. Most of that was likely official business, but not all. The censors were requesting a vast increase in personnel. Gorlaeva, Istoriia sovetskoi politicheskoi tsenzury, 85–6 (GARE, f. R-9425, op. 1, d. 19, l. 153–4).

35. Kotkin, Magnetic Mountain, 280–354.

36. Chegodaev, “Iz vospominanii.”

37. Many of the Soviet institutions and instruments of state power had been invented in expropriations of property and physical elimination of class enemies, and then reinvented or vastly expanded in the forced collectivization of the peasantry. Barrington Moore offered a general theory of the state as a reflection of its handling of the peasantry, but without adequately addressing the specifics of the Soviet case. Moore, Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy. See also van Atta, “USSR as a ‘Weak State.’” Von Atta, like others, missed how Stalin’s regime created its own society, which contributed immensely to state capacity.

38. Ellman rightly noted that “having destroyed independent social organizations, established total media censorship, and created a socioeconomic system in which organizations at all levels had an incentive to understate their possibilities and overstate their needs, getting accurate information became very difficult.” Ellman, “Political Economy of Stalinism,” 116.

39. Davies et al., “The Politburo and Economic Decision Making,” 126–7.

40. Markevich, “Monitoring and Interventions,” 1466.

41. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 288–91.

42. Stalin was the decisive actor, although “not immune to pressure and persuasion from politburo members, or from society at large.” Davies, “Making Economic Policy,” 69. See also Gregory, Political Economy, 68. A few functionaries cultivated clients across agencies. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 262–3.

43. Chuev, Sto sorok, 258–9, 263.

44. Rosenfeldt, “Special” World, I: 55–8.

45. “The essence of party leadership,” Stalin had remarked in July 1924, “lies precisely in the implementation of resolutions and directives.” “O kompartii Pol’shi” [July 3, 1924], Bol’shevik, Sept. 20, 1924, reprinted in Sochineniia, VI: 264–72 (at 269–70). How this was to come about was another matter entirely. “To raise the quality of the party official with a wave of the hand is not so simple,” Stalin had told Sverdlov university students. “It is still common for officials to apply the old habits of hasty administrative-izing . . . so-called party leadership sometimes degenerates into a sorry amalgam of useless directives, into empty and glib ‘leadership’ that accomplishes nothing.” Sochineniia, V: 197–222, VII: 171–2, VII: 349–50; Davies and Harris, Stalin’s World, 24.

46. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 19.

47. Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 217–9 (Sept. 22, 1930).

48. Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 210–1.

49. Kosheleva, Pisma Stalina Molotovu, 88–93 (Sept. 16, 1926); Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 126–9. See also Markevich, “Monitoring and Enforcement.” One scholar has argued that Stalin’s own policies made the country nearly impossible to govern, which infuriated and haunted him. Harris, “Was Stalin a Weak Dictator?,” 377, echoing Lewin, Making of the Soviet System (1985).

50. For the rubbish about Stalin’s terror as a reaction to regional party bosses’ failure to obey central authority, see Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 12–14, 16, 22. For the refutation that Stalin was not motivated by fear of elite resistance, see Tucker, Stalin in Power, 264–8; and Khlevniuk, “Stalinist ‘Party Generals,’” 195–6.

51. Soviet functionaries experienced inordinate mobility compared with their tsarist predecessors. In the tsarist state, those who started careers in the provinces remained there, destined never to reach the heights and perquisites of the capital. Pinter, “Social Characteristics.”

52. This statement occurred during forced collectivization and dekulakization, and Gorky helpfully pointed out that “if the enemy does not surrender, he is to be exterminated.” Hosking, First Socialist Society, 163.

53. Rigby, Communist Party Membership, 212–3.

54. The rise of the politburo had undercut the Central Committee's authority, but, in turn, Stalin's informal caucusing undermined the politburo; it met just fifteen times in 1935 and nine times in 1936. Daniels, "Office Holding and Elite Status," 77–95; Gill, Origins, 65.

55. Hearsay recollections by people not at the plenum have claimed Osip Pyatnitsky stood up to Stalin and Yezhov. Afanas'ev, Oni ne molchali, 219–20; Vilenskii, Dodnes' tiagoteet, 265–6. For a debunking, see Pavliukov, Ezhov, 300–5.

56. These totals do not include other functionaries who attended but were not members: for example, Nazaretyan, Stalin's first top aide, was arrested on his way to the Kremlin to attend the plenum. (He would be executed Nov. 30, 1937.) Pravda, Nov. 17, 1964. "During the breaks in the sessions," one person later poetically claimed, "Deputy NKVD Head Frinovsky walked through the corridors smoking, and used his cigarette to point, take this one, take that one." Afanas'ev, Oni ne molchali, 209 (Afanasy Krymov).

57. Syrtsov was serving as director of a factory in Moscow province when the NKVD came for him on April, 19, 1937. He would be executed on Sept. 10, 1937, and cremated at the Donskoe crematorium.

58. Conquest, Reassessment, 214–34; Gill, "Stalinism and Industrialization," 131–2. Already by late Oct. 1937, of the 139 members and candidates of the Central Committee, more than half had been arrested and seven shot; another 23 were now scheduled to be executed. The next month Yezhov submitted to Stalin a list for execution of all 45 incarcerated Central Committee personnel who were still alive. Stalin crossed out half the names, perhaps because they had yet to "testify" fully, but many of them were executed some months later. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 339.

59. See the example in Dagestan in 1937: Pravda (Sept. 25, 1937): Dagestanskaia pravda, Oct. 23, 2013; Akhmedabiev, "I opiat' o mifakh."

60. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 101–2 (citing APRE f. 3, op. 58, d. 6, l. 28: Feb. 13, 1937).

61. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 121; Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 115.

62. Kaganovich telegraphed Stalin that "acquaintance with the situation shows that the right-Trotskyite wrecking here has taken broad dimensions—in industry, agriculture, supply, trade, medicine, education and political work." XXII s'ezd Kommunisticheskoi partii Sovetskogo soiuza, III: 153.

63. Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 68–70.

64. Hlevnjuk, "Les mécanismes de la 'Grande Terreur'"; Thurston, Life and Terror, 62 (citing GARF, f. 8131, op. 27, d. 145, l. 49–57: Sept. 1939 report).

65. Gill, Origins of the Stalinist Political System, 273.

66. Scott, Behind the Urals, 195–6. Scott added: "Whereas most of the workers in the mills were fairly well trained by 1935, had acquired the knacks of electric welding, pipe-fitting, or what not, most of the administrators were far from having mastered their jobs" (175).

67. Khlevniuk, "Economic Officials in the Great Terror," 39 (citing GARF, f. 5446, f. 1, d. 122a, 26–8).

68. More than 2,000 personnel in the various commissariats were arrested just between Oct. 1936 and March 1937, and that did not even include the NKVD, foreign affairs commissariat, and defense commissariat, which did not fall under the jurisdiction of the Council of People's Commissars. Lukianov, "Massovye represii opravdany byt' ne mogu," 120 (data presented by a commission in 1962–3). Veitser was arrested on Oct. 17, 1937, and would be shot (May 7, 1938) at Kommunarka.

69. Kuromiya, "Stalinist Terror in the Donbas."

70. Vasiliev, "Great Terror in the Ukraine," 144–5 (citing TsGAOU Ukraini, f. 1, op. 20, d. 7115, l. 67, 86, 90, 167; d. 7177, l. 43–5, 47); Pravda, May 29, 1937; Kuromiya, Freedom and Terror, 219 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 574, l. 74; f. 589, op. 3, d. 2042); Likholobova, Totalitarnyi rezhym ta politychni represii, 72n.

71. Likholobova, Stalinskii totalitarnyi rezhym, 76–8.

72. Avdeenko, Nakazanie bez prestupleniia, 182–3.

73. Vasiliev, "Great Terror in the Ukraine," 145; Shapoval, Lazar Kaganovich, 35.

74. Kuromiya, Freedom and Terror, 224n141 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 3215, l. 3).

75. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 361–62 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 953, l. 212–3, Manuilsky letter to Yezhov, Andreev, and Shkiryatov, May 21, 1937).

76. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 52 (Feb. 11, 1937); Latshev, "Riadom so Stalinyim," 19.

77. Chase, Enemies within the Gates?, 275–6; Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 69 (Nov. 11, 1937). On May 26, 1937, Dimitrov had cryptically recorded in his diary: “At Yezhov’s (1 o’clock in the morning). The major spies worked in the Comintern.” The next day: “Examination of the apparatus” of the Comintern Executive Committee. (61: May 26, 1937.)

78. Weber, “Weisse Flecken,” 19–20, 24. By some accounts, the Nazis killed six German politburo members. Overall, of the 1,400 leading German Communists, a total of 178 were killed in Stalin’s terror, nearly all of them residents of Hotel Lux. The Nazis killed 222 of them. Fritz Platten, the Swiss Communist who had organized Germany’s help for Lenin’s sealed-train return in 1917, and who lived at the Hotel Lux since 1924, was caught in the sweeps (he would die in Gulag).

79. The resolution was written in Nov. 1937, but it is not clear when the disbandment went into effect. The resolution was formally passed by the Comintern presidium on Aug. 16, 1938. Voprosii istorii KPSS, 1988, no. 12: 52; Chase, Enemies within the Gates?, 287–9; Lazitch, “Stalin’s Massacre,” 139–74; McDermott, “Stalinist Terror.”

80. Naszkowski, Nespokoinye dni, 209–10.

81. Wladyslaw Stein, known as Anton Krajewski, a leading official in the Comintern cadres department, had presented a report on Oct. 25, 1934, accusing émigrés of acting as foreign agents. Yezhov, in a September 1935 speech to party secretaries, had voiced suspicion of political émigrés, especially from Germany and Poland, calling them foreign agents. “I’d like to discuss the question of verification measures of the Polish Communist party, which, as you know, in recent years has been the main supplier of spies and provocative elements in the USSR,” Manuilsky (an ethnic Ukrainian) had written ingratiatingly to Yezhov on Jan. 19, 1936, knowing this was Stalin’s view. Chase, Enemies within the Gates?, 48 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 21, d. 23, l. 6, 9, 23); 105–7 (op. 18, d. 1147a, l. 1–3); Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti,” 210 (APRE, f. 57, op. 1., d. 73, l. 3).

82. In April 1938, Pyatnitsky evidently named Mao among the “Bukharin group” in the Comintern as a spy for Japan. Boris Melnikov, a former Soviet agent in China who had been accused of having gone over to the Japanese, was accused of being involved in the Comintern “conspiracy” of Osip Pyatnitsky, and his “testimony” supposedly denounced Mao as “the leader of Trotskyism in the inmost depths of the CCP.” Piatnitskii, Zagovor protiv Stalina, 120–5 (citing a July 1987 interview with Mikhail Menndeleiev, a former cellmate of Melnikov); Vaksberg, Hôtel Lux, 218–21, 235. See also Chang and Halliday, Mao, 208–9. In 1935, Pyatnitsky had been moved out of the Comintern to the central party apparatus.

83. Starkov, “Ar’ergardnye boi staroi partiinoi gvardii,” 220–1. As of July 1938, a year after his arrest, Pyatnitsky was still not broken and Yezhov’s power was waning. (Béla Kun and Wilhelm Knorin, said to have been in league with Pyatnitsky, were broken.) Pyatnitsky was tried in camera and, on July 29, 1938, executed. Starkov, “The Trial that Was Not Held.” See also Dmitrievskii, Piatnitskii.ogists.

84. Murray, I Spied for Stalin, 83.

85. Stalin’s letters to Karakhan in the 1920s—an epoch ago—had burst with affection, but subsequent mentions were venomous. As late as April 14, 1937, he had asked Karakhan, then Soviet envoy to Turkey, if he would agree to a big promotion to ambassador to the United States. On May 3, he had Karakhan recalled to Moscow and arrested. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 56, l. 68 (ciphered telegram to Karakhan in Ankara). Yezhov, whether on Stalin’s direct order or to please him, had Karakhan implicated in the case against Tukhachevsky; Stalin wrote “important” on the first page of Karakhan’s June 2, 1937, interrogation protocols (which the dictator received on June 19). Karakhan was sentenced and executed on Sept. 20, 1937. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 222–5 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 309, l. 123–30).

86. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 180 (citing TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 4, d. 469, l. 167).

87. At the Feb.–March 1937 plenum, when Voroshilov asserted that Rykov had several times been trembling—a supposed admission of his guilt—Litvinov interjected, “When was this?” Deeper into the terror, Litvinov would complain to Andreyev that arresting journalists at the Soviet Journal de Moscou for having contacts with foreigners was tantamount to arresting them for doing their job. Dullin, Men of Influence, 217, citing AVP RF, f. 5, op. 17, pap. 126, d. 1, letter Oct. 26, 1937. The journal’s editor (Rayevsky) had been arrested in Oct. 1936; his successor, a bona fide proletarian, Viktor Kin (Surovikin), would be arrested in Jan. 1938. Journal de Moscou was soon shuttered. Babichenko, “‘Eсли aresty budut prodolzhat'sia, to . . . ne ostanetsia ni odnogo nemtsa-chlena partii,’” 119 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 292, d. 101, l. 13–8).

88. Uldricks, “Impact of the Great Purges” 192 (citing National Archives decimal file 861.00/11705: Henderson to secretary of state, June 10, 1937); Barmine, One Who Survived, 3.

89. The next greatest of executions would be 1942—23,000. Popov, “Gosudarstvennyi terror,” 20–31 (using the 1963–4 Shvernink commission report). See also Wheatcroft, “Victims of Stalinism”; and Khlevniuk, “Les mécanismes de la Grande Terreur.”

90. Beck and Godin, Russian Purge, 75; Avtorkhanov, Stalin and the Soviet Communist Party, 219–21; Junge and Binner, Kak terror stal “bol'shym”; Gregory, Terror by Quota.

91. Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 85.

92. Shapoval and Zolotar'ov, Vsevolod, 337; Iakovenko, Agnessa, 65.

93. Tepliakov, Mashina terrora, 571.

94. Iakovenko, Agnessa, 86–92.

95. According to Otto Schmidt, Stalin, in the course of conversation at the Presidium table, mentioned the names of high officials who had been arrested. Schmidt, “Priemy v kreml'e,” 273–4; Shevelev, 86.

96. Nezavisimaia gazeta, July 6, 1991.

97. Tepliakov, Mashina terrora, 477–8, 538; Gos. arkhiv Novosibirskoi oblasti (GANO), f. 4, op. 34, d. 26, l. 2; Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 262, 332–3. Yezhov and Frinovskiy may have been concerned about Western Siberian party boss Eihe getting out ahead of them in gaining credit for the reinstituting of troikas. On the establishment of a Western Siberian troika as supposedly an initiative of Eihe, see Zhukov, Inoi Stalin, 433–4; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 469; Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1993, no. 6), 5; Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 134, 228). Mironov was made chairman of the troika. When his arrest quotas were immediately increased, he tried to have them returned to the originally agreed levels. Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, V/1: 430 (telegram Aug. 9, 1937). See also Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 296 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 65, l. 58), 335 (d. 57, l. 68).

98. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 166, d. 575, l. 19–22. The typed version was first brought forth in “Rasstrelo po raznariadke, ili kak eto delali bol'sheviki,” Trud, June 4, 1992. See also Danilov et al., Tragediia Sovetskoi derevni, V/1: 258 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 21, l. 89). The troikas instituted as a result of Mironov's “request” would account for more than 90 percent of the mass sentences for execution in 1937 and 1938. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 470. One available factoid indicates that in the Mordovia autonomous republic (Russian Federation), 96 percent of those who passed through the sentencing troika refused to admit they were wreckers, but it remains unclear if this represented resistance or laziness (or incompetence) on the part of the local NKVD. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 286 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 43, l. 113).

99. That day, Stalin had received twelve people in the Little Corner, a mere two of whom were politburo members (Voroshilov and Molotov); the draft decree is in Kaganovich's handwriting, but he was not recorded in the Little Corner that day. Eight politburo members eventually signed the resolution. Junge et al., Vertikal bol'shogo terrora, 114–6; Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKB (b): povestki dnia zasedaniia, II: 876, 887. There would be no politburo meetings from June 19, 1937, to Feb. 23, 1938. Only two additional gatherings were held in 1938 (April 25 and Oct. 10–12), and only two more in 1939 (Jan. 29 and Dec. 17). “Politburo” decisions were taken in the Little Corner by Stalin alone or in limited company, written up by Poskryobyshev and “approved” by telephone vote or with signatures affixed the next time the cronies were summoned to appear. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 248–9. Stalin occasionally dropped all pretense and merely sent directives as his personal instructions: Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 329; Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 340.

100. Junge and Binner, Kak terror stal “bol'shim”, 79.

101. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 238–9 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 174, l. 107). See also Ilić, “Forgotten Five Percent,” 116–39.

102. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 21, l. 95–9; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 265; Tepliakov, Mashina terrora, 348.

103. To ensure everyone got the message, on July 16 Yezhov convened the regional NKVD chiefs from the Russian Federation, Ukraine, and Belorussia in Moscow. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 98–101; Leningradskii martirolog, I: 39; Junge et al., Vertikal' Bol'shogo terrora, 32–3. See also Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 41–3. A separate NKVD conference took place with the NKVD chiefs of the Central Asian republics, eastern Siberia, and the Soviet Far East.

104. Iakovenko, Agnessa, 59; Khaustov, “Deiatel'nost' organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti,” 142–3 (TsA FSB, N-15301, t. 15, l. 387). The chief in Chelyabinsk was Yos-Gersh Blat; in Tataria, Pyotr Rud.

105. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 249 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 989, l. 57, 60). “The greatest revolutionary vigilance and iron will, a sharp Bolshevik eye and organizing talent, an exceptional mind and the subtlest proletarian sense—these are the qualities shown by comrade Yezhov,” Pravda wrote, adding that he was assisted by “millions of eyes, millions of hands of workers . . . Such a force is invincible.” Pravda, July 18, 1937. On July 18, Alexander Barmine, a Soviet diplomat in Greece, defected, obtaining asylum in France. Rogovin, Partiia rastreliannykh, 353–5.

106. Tepliakov, Mashina terrora, 528–32.

107. “I can testify that my father's apartment did not resemble in the least the shop of a poor junk-dealer described in the document,” wrote Anton Antonov-Ovseyenko of his arrested father, Vladimir. The NKVD inventory of his family residence, the son claimed, had omitted “original engravings by famous artists, a typewriter, a radio phonograph player with eight albums of records, his wife's jewelry, her squirrel coat, expensive French perfume . . . and much, much more.” Antonov-Ovseenko, Portet Tirana, 187. V. Antonov-Ovseyenko had been arrested Oct. 12, 1937 (he would be executed on Feb. 10, 1938), and had lived at the famed Finance Commissariat House (Novinsky Boulevard, 25), built in 1930 by Moisei Ginzburg.

108. Uimanov and Petrukhin, Bol' liudskaiia, V: 102–11; Junge and Binner, Kak terror stal “bol'shim,” 81–3; Tepliakov, “Personal i povsednevnost' Novosibirskogo UNKVD,” 254.

109. The jazzmen's rendition prompted the aviators to rise, applauding, and shout for an encore. Chkalov, Nash transpoliarnyi reis, 59; Vodop'ianov, Letchik Valerii Chkalov, 195; Skorokhodov, V poiskakh urachenogo, 21–3. Utyosov claimed, in his recollections, that he was never invited back to a Kremlin reception, but the program for May 2, 1938, contradicts him. Nevezhin (Zastol'ia, 298–9) misdates the reception to Aug. 13, 1936, after a nonstop flight to the Soviet Far East, but Utyosov dates the performance to “summer 1937”—that would be July 26, 1937—when Baiduk, Chkalov, and Belyakov flew nonstop from Moscow to Vancouver; Chkalov also makes clear that the evening took place after their return from the United States.

110. Trud, June 4, 1992; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 273–81 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 212, l. 59–78), 281–2 (l. 52–4); Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, VI: 328–37; Werth and Mironenko, Istoriia Stalinskogo gulaga, I: 277–80; Junge and Binner, Kak terror stal “bol'shim,” 84–93, 94–6. This was followed by further related directives: Werth and Mironenko, Istoriia Stalinskogo gulaga, I: 363–5. Frinovskiy had three audiences with Stalin in July 1937: July 7 (fifteen minutes), July 26 (five minutes), July 29 (fifty-five minutes). Na prieme, 216.

111. Korneev and Kopylova, “Arkhivy na sluzhbe totalitarnogo gosudarstva.” The order specified that the mass operations were to last four months (instead they would last fifteen): on Jan. 31, 1938, the regime would extend the deadline and nearly double the country-wide quota to 500,000. Even the “final” quotas would be exceeded: in Georgia and Uzbekistan by 50 percent, in the USSR as a whole by 100 percent, in Western Siberia by 200 percent. The mass operations ended in different places at different times. Junge and Binner, Kak terror stal “bol'shim,” 83–103.

112. Mironov worked alongside another member of the local troika, Western Siberian party boss Eihe, and Mironov complained to Yezhov that the latter “interferes in the affairs of the NKVD,” showing up to participate in interrogations and arrests of party members. Yezhov advised Mironov not to conflict with Eihe. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 107 (citing TsA FSB ASD Frinovskogo, N-15301, t. 7: 36–7). Provincial practice varied. According to the NKVD operative Mikhail Shreider, Ivanovo province NKVD chief Israel Radzivilovskiy rendered the “troika” decisions himself, just sending the paperwork to the two other troika members, the local party boss and the procurator, to sign. Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 76.

113. Khlevniuk, History of the Gulag, 157–61 (GARF, f. 8131, op. 37, d. 145, l. 49–84); Leibovich, “Vkliuchen v operatsiiu,” 302–3.

114. Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, I: 320; Kuźmicheva, “Resheniia osobykh troek privodit’ v ispolneniie nemedlenno,” 85.

115. Leibovich et al. “Vkluuchen v operatsiiu,” 314–7 (based on former KGB archives in Perm). Some former kulaks, after their terms of exile ended, managed to return to their former places of habitation and sometimes even to reclaim their lands, which the regime deemed “sabotage.” Fitzpatrick, Stalin’s Peasants, 238–54. Recidivism was also a focus. “The main contingent committing disruptive offenses (robbery, brigandage, murder, aggravated theft) are people who have been convicted before, in most cases recently released from camps or places of detention,” Yezhov wrote in a memorandum to Stalin, a passage the despot marked in pencil. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 96 (citing APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 166, l. 151–4); Rittersporn, “Vrednye element,” 103; Hagenloh, “Socially Harmful Elements,” 300.

116. Ellman, “Regional Influences.”

117. Frinovsky sent out a ciphered directive that “anti-Soviet elements” whom local officials assigned to category 1 (“especially socially dangerous”) were not even to be presented with charges, just executed in cold blood. Stepanov, Rastrel po limitu, 30 (Aug. 8, 1937); Junge and Binner, Kak terror stal “bol’shim,” 99. See also Rabishchev, “Gnilaia i opasnaia teoriia,” esp. 55.

118. National operations would claim approximately 350,000 victims, 247,157 of whom would be shot.

119. In April 1936, the regime had decided to deport the ethnic Poles and Germans in Ukraine near the western border (more than 10,000 families) to Kazakhstan; then it deported Soviet Finns from the border areas with Finland as well as Iranians near the border with Afghanistan (some 2,000 families). Stalin authorized a request to arrest all Afghan nationals in Merva, Turkmenistan (where there was an Afghan consulate). RGANI, f. 89, op. 48, d. 8, l. 1–2 (ciphered telegram from Anna Mukhamedov, acting party boss of Turkmenistan, to Stalin, July 23, 1937, with Stalin’s handwriting). Mukhamedov was arrested Oct. 5, 1937.

120. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 22, l. 16; d. 21, l. 157; Gelb, “Early Soviet Ethnic Deportation”; Bugai, “Vysyleniie sovetsskikh koreitsev,” 144; Pohl, Ethnic Cleansing, 9–20; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 352 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 139, l. 23). The Soviet Pacific Fleet had been put on alert to prevent the Koreans from fleeing by sea, but several hundred boats from Korea showed up, just off Soviet waters, to rescue these people; Soviet border guards detained many of the boats. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 301. See also Polian, Against Their Will, 99–101. About 25,000 ethnic Koreans not near the border were not deported, at least not immediately. Belaia kniga, 68, 82. Khaustov and Samuelson claim around 180,000 Koreans were deported altogether: Stalin, NKVD, 300 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 14). The population of ethnic Koreans in the Soviet Far East had tripled, to 170,000, between 1917 and 1926; a secret plan had been adopted (Dec. 6, 1926) but not implemented to relocate 88,000 of them from frontier zones. In 1928, 1930, and 1933, a few thousand Koreans had been shifted to the interior. Khisamutdinov, 119–21; Boldyrev, “Iaponiia i Sovetskii Dal’nyi Vostok,” 187–94, 193–4; Stephan, Russian Far East, 212; Petrov, Ukrepim sovety DVK, 97. Sibirskaiia Sovetskaiia Entsiklopediia, II: 95.

121. Petrov and Roginskii, “Pol’skaia operatsiia” NKVD,” 22–43.

122. About 70 percent of Soviet ethnic Poles were in Ukraine, and until 1937 Poland maintained consulates in Moscow, Leningrad, Kharkov, Kiev, Minsk, and Tiflis, where they ran intelligence operations. But Stalin’s clampdown led the Polish embassies and consulates to desist from recruiting agents among Soviet ethnic Poles. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 48; Peploniński, Wywiad Polski na ZSSR, 126–7. Conversely, when a Polish citizen showed up at the Lubianka front door to betray his masters, he was tortured and forced to confess to having been sent to penetrate the NKVD for Poland. Stalin also demanded to know what border point he had crossed. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 229–30 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 254, l. 92–3, 203).

123. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 352–9 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 254, l. 173–88; September 14, 1937); Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 291; Sudoplatov, Tainaia zhizn’, I: 366–93; Gur’ianov, Repressii protiv poliatkov, 16–20. Stalin’s vindictiveness against “foreigners” was not unique. “Stop playing internationalism, all these Poles, Koreans, Latvians, Germans, etc. should be beaten, these are all mercenary nations, subject to termination,” one provincial party boss stated at a local NKVD conference. “All nationals should be caught, forced to their knees, and exterminated like mad dogs.” Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 114 (quoting Sergei Sobolev, Krasnoyarsk). On Sept.

15, 1938, the regime ended the “album procedure” and allowed troikas for the national operation; two months later, it ended the troikas.

124. Okhotin and Roginskii, “Iz istorii ‘nemetskoi operatsii’ NKVD,” 66. Mass operations were also ordered against the returning Harbin émigrés (Sept. 20, 1937), among others. Zaitsev, Sbornik zakonodatel'nykh i normativnykh aktov, 430–7.

125. “All Germans working on our military, semimilitary and chemical factories, on electric stations and building sites, in all regions are all to be arrested,” Stalin instructed (July 20, 1937). Yezhov, five days later, issued this as an operational order (no. 00439). Perhaps 4,000 German citizens were resident in the Soviet Union; around 800 were arrested and deported to Germany. APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 254a, l. 82; Okhotin and Roginskii, “Iz istorii ‘nemetskoi operatsii’ NKVD,” 35–7; Khlevniuk, History of the Gulag, 144–5.

126. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 251 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 253, l. 141). The author of the report, Alexander Minayev, was arrested on Nov. 6, 1938, and executed on February 25, 1939. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 298–9.

127. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 662 n86; Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 156 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 987, l. 79). Rudzutaks, even under severe torture, refused to admit any guilt. Chuev, Sto sorok, 410–2. According to Irina Gogua, the arrested Kremlin librarian, Rudzutaks kept the issue of the Menshevik Socialist Herald with Martov’s obituary behind books on his home bookshelf.

128. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 333–4 (citing GARF, f. 8131, op. 37, d. 86, l. 138–48). Nasedkin is listed in the Little Corner on Nov. 23, 1937. Na prieme, 225. Often, NKVD interrogators began by asking why the prisoner had been arrested, as if it were up to the prisoner to establish his or her own guilt.

129. Alliluyeva, Only One Year, 388.

130. Chuev, Sto sorok, 409.

131. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 65 (no citation). The attaché’s country is not identified.

132. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 60 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 983, l. 46; Jan. 9, 1937), 66; Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 509n2 (f. 17, op. 163, d. 1143, l. 73).

133. The sole German-speaking operative in the Soviet intelligence station in Paris was recalled to Moscow in 1937. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 66 (no citation). The person is not identified.

134. Yezhov informed Stalin that a housekeeper reported that Berzin had been close to Trotsky, who had promised him a future post. The housekeeper also supposedly said that Berzin had a great deal of White Guard literature in his personal library, in Russian and foreign languages, including works by Trotsky. (Berzin was head of military intelligence.) Stalin tasked Yezhov with going after military intelligence in the military districts as well, especially Ukraine, Belorussia, and Leningrad (“Did they not link the Trotskyites with Poland, like our Far Eastern intelligence linked the Trotskyites to Japan?”). Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 221 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 316, l. 86). Berzin was removed Aug. 1, 1937, and soon arrested for Trotskyism; he would be executed on July 29, 1938, at Kommunarka. In the meantime, on Sept. 8, 1937, Yezhov implanted a counterintelligence NKVD man as acting military intelligence chief, Semyon G. Gendin, telling his staff that he himself would run military intelligence.

135. Instead, the regime examined trunks, which had been lying around for some time, and found writings of Trotsky, Zinoviev, and other such former politburo officials. Kochik, “Sovetskaia voennaia razvedka” (no. 9–12), 101–2.

136. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 21, l. 133 (Semyon Gendin).

137. Lota, “Alta” protiv “Barbarosa,” 56 (no citation). Several dozen more were sacked but not arrested.

138. Polyakova added that “these comrades became my first pupils and later some became my bosses.” Kochik, “Sovetskaia voennaia razvedka” (no. 9–12), 98.

139. In an earlier part of the discussion, a mid-level commander stated his uncertainty about whether he could speak about enemies of the people “in full voice.” Stalin: “To the whole world?” The commander: “No, internally.” Stalin: “You are obliged to do so.” Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKa, 93 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 29, d. 318, l. 173, 174, 64).

140. Solov'ev and Chugnuov, Pogranichnye voiska SSSR, 538–58, 574–7.

141. Beloff, Foreign Policy of Soviet Russia, II: 179–80; Ikuhiko, “Japanese-Soviet Confrontation,” 137–40.

142. Goldman, Nomonhan, 1939, 28–34 (quote on 31).

143. Coox, Nomonhan, 102–19 (quote at 116).
144. Taylor, Generalissimo (citing Chiang's Diaries, Hoover Institution Archives, box 39, folder 13: July 12, 1937).
145. Jansen, Japan and China, 394–5.
146. The month before (June 1937), the Japanese completed the multiyear standardization of the railway gauge in northern China, converting from the wide gauge that the Russians had originally installed—just in time to move around their troops. Paine, Wars for Asia, 28.
147. Barnhart, “Japanese Intelligence,” 435.
148. Izvestiia, Aug. 30, 1937; DVP SSSR, XX: 466–8; Kurdiukov et al., Sovetsko-Kitaitskie otnosheniia, 161–2; Ledovskii et al., Russko-kitaitskie otnosheniia v XX veke, IV/i: 88–9 (APRE, f. 3–a, op. 1, d. 52, l. 1–3); Slavinskii, Sovetskii soiuz i kitai, 314–20. Dmitri Bogomolov, the Soviet envoy to China (since 1933), who signed the nonaggression pact, had been predicting there would be no full-scale Japanese attack on China. In July 1937, Litvinov rebuked him for supposedly implying to the Chinese that the Soviet Union might agree to a full alliance (a mutual assistance pact). In Sept., Stalin had Bogomolov recalled; he returned to Moscow on Oct. 7 and vanished. DVP SSSR, XX: 737–8 (July 19 and July 22, 1937); Ledovskii, “Zapiski diplomata,” 114; Sokolov, “Zabytyi diplomat”; Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 149.
149. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 21, l. 157; Bugai, “Vyselenie sovetskikh koreitsev,” 144.
150. FRUS, 1937, III: 636 (Bullitt to Washington, Oct. 23, 1937).
151. Chang and Halliday, Mao, 200–3.
152. The Soviets would extend $250 million in 1938–39; by mid-1939 there would be 3,665 Soviet advisers in China. Ageenko, Voennaia pomoshch' SSSR, 49.
153. Whiting and Shih-ts'ai-ai, Sinkiang, 51 (citing memoirs of the general who ruled Xinjiang with Soviet backing).
154. Garver, “Chiang Kai-shek's Quest.” Bogomolov called Chiang Kai-shek's hopes for a direct Soviet-Japanese war his “idée fixe.” DVP SSSR, XX: 389. Chiang did not submit the nonaggression pact for formal ratification until April 26, 1938, indicating he wanted either a formal alliance or was waiting on the Western powers to change their minds.
155. Ledovskii et al., Russko-kitaitskie otnosheniia v XX veke, IV/i: 105–8 (APRE, f. 3, op. 1, d. 321, l. 10–15).
156. Stalin's views on China in 1937 after the Japanese attack were recorded by Dimitrov: Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 67–9 (Nov. 11, 1937). Far more Soviet advisers and pilots would serve in China—3,665—than had served in Spain.
157. Barmin, Sovetskii Soiuz i Sin' tsiian, 157–8.
158. Kolt'sov, Ispanskii dnevmik, 519–20 (July 7, 1937).
159. The other wife was Elizaveta Koltsova, who had been sacked in Madrid from her job. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 268 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 217, l. 68).
160. Codovilla was replaced in Spain by Togliatti. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 283–8 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 225, l. 2–10). See also Payne, Spanish Civil War, 32. In 1938, Stalin would twice come to the conclusion that the Communists should quit the Popular Front government and form a new government of just Communists and Socialists; both times, Dimitrov—of all people—appears to have talked Stalin out of it. Meshcheriakov, “SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii,” 93 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 216, l. 2; TsPA VS BSP, f. 146, op. 2, d. 42, l. 1). In February–March 1938, Pascua tried to impress upon Potyomkin the dire military and economic situation of the Spanish Republic; the upshot was a Soviet $70 million loan to Spain, which had spent down its gold reserves. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 325–37 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 226, l. 28–31, 33–5, 37–8, 39; d. 232, l. 46, d. 234, l. 165–6, d. 226, l. 57–8, 42–4, 45, 46–460b., 59–60). By April 1938, Pascua had been transferred to Paris. He wrote yet another artful letter to Stalin, offering his gratitude on behalf of Spain. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 338 (citing APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 226, l. 64–640b.). In Aug. 1938 Pascua came to Moscow from Paris, with a letter to Stalin from Negrín. But by Aug. 29, 1938, Dimitrov and Manuisky were writing to Stalin about the evacuation of the international brigades from Spain. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 344 (APRE, f. 3, op. 65, d. 226, l. 83), 346–7 (l. 85), 354–5 (l. 109), 358 (l. 119–20).
161. Roshchin, Politicheskaia istoriia Mongolii.

- ¹⁶². They reconvened the next day, too. Na prieme, 218.
- ¹⁶³. Iakovenko, Agnessa, 95. The Soviet envoy, Vladimir Tairov (Teryan), an Armenian, arrested on Aug. 5, 1937, was evidently being conveyed in the other direction (to Moscow) along the same route.
- ¹⁶⁴. Papkov, Stalinskii terror v Sibiri, 269; Iakovenko, Agnessa, 97–8.
- ¹⁶⁵. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 382–7; Pravda, Aug. 29, 1937; Kolarz, Peoples of the Soviet Far East, 138–9. The secret autopsy cited death “as a result of . . . external poison.” Luzianin, “Rossiia-Mongoliia-Kitai,” 323.
- ¹⁶⁶. Dashpürev and Soni, Reign of Terror in Mongolia, 33–5. Captain Bimba, who defected to the Japanese, told them about a pro-Japanese conspiracy among the Mongol elite to which Demid supposedly belonged. But Bimba’s account is highly inconsistent and often blatantly wrong about dates and verifiable facts. Coox, Nomonhan, 161–3 (who largely accepts the testimony of defector Captain Bimba); Dashpürev and Soni, Reign of Terror in Mongolia, 2–3 (who point out that the testimony is unreliable).
- ¹⁶⁷. RGANI, f. 89, op. 63, d. 26, l. 1.
- ¹⁶⁸. Choibalsan had denounced Demid to Voroshilov in Oct. 1936. Baabar, Twentieth-Century Mongolia, 355–6, 360.
- ¹⁶⁹. When Frinovsky returned from Mongolia, his possible transfer to the defense commissariat, as deputy commissar, was evidently bruited. Protocol of Frinovsky interrogation, sent by Beria to Stalin April 11, 1939: http://www.hrono.ru/dokum/193_dok/19390413beria.php (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 373, l. 3–44: protocol of Frinovsky interrogation, Beria to Stalin, April 11, 1939).
- ¹⁷⁰. Dashpürev and Soni, Reign of Terror in Mongolia; Sandag and Kendall, Poisoned Arrows.
- ¹⁷¹. Genden was never repatriated and was executed in Moscow in Nov. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 388; Kaplonski, “Prelude to Violence”; Baabar, Twentieth-Century Mongolia, 361–2.
- ¹⁷². Khlevniuk, “Economic Officials in the Great Terror,” 61 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 997, l. 79–82; op. 120, d. 339, l. 42; op. 3, d. 992, l. 28: Feb. 1938; op. 120, d. 339, l. 57).
- ¹⁷³. At the Feb.–March 1937 plenum, Stalin had referred to the top 3,000–4,000 officials as the “general staff of the party.” Kosheleva et al., “Materialnyi fevral’-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1995, no. 3), 14. In one ward of Smolensk city for which we have data, forty-one people born in the nineteenth century were promoted in 1937–38—not exactly new people. Thurston, Life and Terror, 133 (citing the Smolensk archive).
- ¹⁷⁴. The budget for 1938 envisioned 160,400; the actual number would be 180,500. Khlevniuk, “Economic Officials in the Great Terror,” 60 (citing GARF, f. 5446, op. 22, d. 1065, l. 19–20; d. 1060, l. 89).
- ¹⁷⁵. Without CC approval young specialists were forbidden from beginning work. Khlevniuk, “Economic Officials in the Great Terror,” 60 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 992, l. 97). In 1938, after the name of Arseny Zverev (b. 1900) was presented on a list of party members who had completed the Moscow Institute of Finance and Economics, he was named finance commissar. Chuev, Sto sorok, 291.
- ¹⁷⁶. “Machiavellian duplicity” is the interpretation offered by Robert Tucker, Stalin in Power, 320. Cf. Fitzpatrick, “Making of a New Elite.”
- ¹⁷⁷. Pravda, Oct. 31, 1937; Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 117–33; RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 96, l. 148; Bardin, “Ispoln-mudrets,” 54–5. See also Khlevniuk, 1937–i, 104–5.
- ¹⁷⁸. Svetlana Alliluyeva, quoted in Richardson, Long Shadow, 211.
- ¹⁷⁹. Farically, Getty and Naumov have asserted that “it is not an exaggeration to say that the Riutin Platform began the process that would lead to terror, precisely by terrifying the ruling nomenklatura.” Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 54.
- ¹⁸⁰. Stalin might have wanted to clear a path for the rising new generation, but what kind of path? Confessions to crimes people did not commit and mass executions? Khlevniuk, “The Stalinist ‘Party Generals,’” esp. 59–60. See also Rees, “The Great Purges and the XVIII Party Congress of 1939,” 191–211.
- ¹⁸¹. Artizov, “V ugodu vzgliadam vozhdia,” (on the 1936 competition); Dubrovskii, “A. A. Zhdanov v rabote nad shkol’nym uchebnikom istorii,” 128–43. Mikhail Pokrovsky, before his death in 1932, had entrenched a Marxist orthodoxy based upon Engels deeming tsarist Russia the most reactionary power, the “gendarme of Europe.” Stalin countered that in the nineteenth century all the great powers were gendarmes. Even though almost all members of Pokrovsky's School would be physically annihilated, the summons to incorporate imperial Russian legacies in a patriotic history of the Soviet Union proved no easy task. The Pokrovsky School had destroyed the careers of most other historians, leaving a wasteland. Shestakov was one of the few Pokrovsky students to endure.

182. Dubrovskii, Istoriĭ i vlast', 274–5.

183. Kutsĭii, “A. V. Shestakov.” Shestakov would be elected a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences in 1939. For commentary on Shestakov as of 1929, see Iurganov, Russkoe natsional'noe gosudarstvo, 26n3.

184. Shestakov, Kratkii kurs istorii SSSR; Shestakov, Short History of the USSR, 8.

185. Brandenberger, National Bolshevism, 260. Another 5.7 million copies would be printed in 1938 and 3 million in 1939.

186. Brandenberger, National Bolshevism, 67 (citing GARE f. 2306, op. 69, d. 2640, l. 1).

187. The book mentioned Stanislaw Kosior and others who were soon arrested as enemies, but rather than recall and pulp the long-awaited, highly sought textbook, the censors dispatched directives to paste over the offending names and illustrations. Mekhlis would cross out a photograph of Marshal Blyukher in his own copy: RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 373, l. 99–99ob., 103ob., 108.

188. A. K., “Kratkii kurs istorii SSSR,” 85–6. The journal of the historical profession called the book “a great victory on the historical front.” “Bol'shaia pobeda na istoricheskom fronte,” Istoricheskii zhurnal, 1937, no. 8: 6. “He who understands history,” a Communist Youth League mass pamphlet of fall 1938 written by Shestakov would advise, “will better understand contemporary life and struggle more effectively with the enemies of our country and strengthen socialism.” Shestakov, “Ob izuchenii istorii SSSR,” 39 (quoting his own Short Course History of the USSR).

189. Brandenberger and Dubrovskii, “The People Need a Tsar” 879 (citing RGASPI, f. 77, op. 1, d. 847, l. 3–4). Zatonksy was arrested in a cinema (where he was with his family) on Nov. 3, 1937. He would be executed July 29, 1938.

190. Harold Denny, the Moscow correspondent for the New York Times, caught the trend with the observation that “there is a legend in Moscow—and the writer does not know whether or not it is true—that Stalin questioned his own son on English history and found that while his son could talk glibly about economic periods he had never heard of Cromwell.” Denny, “No ‘Formalism.’” Denny served in Moscow 1934–39, having replaced Walter Duranty, and he proved no less mendacious regarding Stalin's crimes. Heilbrunn, “New York Times and the Moscow Show Trials.”

191. Shestakov, Short History of the USSR, 76.

192. Shestakov, Short History of the USSR, 49–50. See also Tucker, Stalin in Power, 282.

193. The film, applauded Izvestiya (Sept. 2), “answers like nothing else the cultural demands of our country's populace. The masses are showing an unheard of interest in history . . . They want to see the paths that have brought them to glory.”

194. Tolstoi, in Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, XIII: 355. See also Petrone, Life Has Become More Joyous, 159 (citing RGALI, f. 962, op. 3, d. 287, l. 34); and Tucker, Stalin in Power, 114–8.

195. Garros et al., Intimacy and Terror, 209 (Galina Shtange). The depiction of Peter was so over-the-top positive that the American worker John Scott, who saw the film in Magnitogorsk, guessed that Peter the First had been imported. Scott, Behind the Urals, 236. See also Siegelbaum and Sokolov, Stalinism as a Way of Life, 211 (I. K. Karniush to Krest'ianskaia Gazeta, Oct. 30, 1938).

196. Back in April 1926, Stalin had ridiculed comrades who imagined Ivan the Terrible or even Peter as Russia's industrializers (“not all industrial development constitutes industrialization. The heart of industrialization, its basis, consists in the development of heavy industry, . . . the production of the means of production, in the development of its own machine-building”). At a Central Committee plenum in Nov. 1928, Stalin had said, “when Peter the Great, having dealings with the more developed countries of the West, feverishly built factories for the supply of the army and strengthening the country's defenses, this was the original attempt to leap out from the limits of backwardness. It is fully understood, however, that not one of the old classes, neither the feudal aristocracy nor the bourgeoisie, could resolve the task of liquidating our country's backwardness.” In 1931, speaking to Emil Ludwig, Stalin had again brushed off the parallel with Peter, because Soviet modernization efforts were not on behalf of the landowners or merchants but the working class. Sochineniia, VIII: 120–1, XI: 248–9, XIII: 104–5.

197. There is an anecdote that has Stalin rebuking Vasily when he caught his son attempting to trade on his name: “You’re not Stalin and I’m not Stalin. Stalin is Soviet power. Stalin is what he is in the newspapers and the portraits, not you, no, not even me!” Montefiore, Court of the Red Tsar, 6 (citing only “Artyom Sergeev”).

198. As Giuseppe Boffa observed, “no matter how numerous its ties with Russia’s past (and certainly it does have many), Stalinism is still a modern phenomenon, well rooted in our century.” Boffa, Stalin Phenomenon, 58. See also Rees, “Stalin and Russian Nationalism,” 77–106 (esp. 93–5).

199. Koliazin and Goncharov, “Vernite mne svobodu!,” 78–95 (Pyotr Tyurkin). Union and autonomous republics lobbied against too much time devoted to teaching Russian (time devoted to native languages would increase in 1938–39). Many locales lacked trained instructors to teach the Russian language. Russian was taught in fewer than half of Turkmenistan’s 728 schools, one-third of Kyrgyzstan’s 667, and one-seventh of Kazakhstan’s 330, and even when taught the quality of instruction was low. Blitstein, “Nation-Building or Russification?,” 256 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 840, l. 76–7).

200. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 628, l. 121–2. The decree rendering Russian obligatory in schools would not be issued until March 13, 1938 (evidently delayed by the terror and bureaucratic complexities). Never published, it stipulated that “in the conditions of a multinational state such as the USSR, knowledge of the Russian language should be a powerful means for communication and contact among the peoples of the USSR, enabling further economic and cultural growth.” RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 997, l. 103. Local versions of the decree were published. Kul’turnaia zhizn’ v SSSR, 1928–1941, 606n6. In the meantime, on Oct. 30, 1937, Mekhlis complained to Stalin and the other Central Committee secretaries, as well as Yezhov, about the absence of Russian-language newspapers in Ukraine. Georgia, Azerbaijan, and Kazakhstan all had republic-level Russian newspapers, while of the eleven republic and provincial newspapers published in Kiev, all the main ones were in Ukrainian. Of Ukraine’s twelve regions, only the Donbas had even a province-level Russian newspaper. Even Odessa lacked a local Russian-language newspaper. Kiev had German, Polish, Yiddish, and Bulgarian papers, but none in Russian. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 481–2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 114, d. 829, l. 135–6). Other changes included beginning instruction with seven-year-olds (one year earlier than previously), replacing Latin with Cyrillic for many languages of Soviet peoples, and abolishing all remaining national units in the Red Army. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 997, l. 95–6 (March 7, 1938).

201. During the viewing, the film snapped fifteen times. Schlögel, Moscow, 1937, 372–3; Petrone, Life Has Become More Joyous, 163–4; Literaturnaia gazeta, Dec. 12, 1937.

202. Massing, This Deception, 248–9.

203. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 65; van Ree, “Stalin as Marxist,” 175. Stalin had rendered still more severe the draft directives for spouses (including those divorced), children, siblings, brothers and sisters-in-law. And when relatives of the arrested wrote to him begging for help because of their indigence, he often ordered their arrests. Kurliandskii, Stalin, vlast’, religiiia, 44–5.

204. Khrushchev, in his ever-ingratiating way, sought to reconcile the moment: “What we have is a felicitous combination—both the great leader and the middle cadres!” Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 65–7 (Nov. 7, 1937). Tucker imagined that in the speech in Voroshilov’s apartment, Stalin self-consciously emulated Ivan the Terrible. Tucker, Stalin in Power, 482–6.

205. Such was Dimitrov’s account; a longer version was recorded by Voroshilov’s adjutant: “Trotsky was known, he was not a Bolshevik, he joined the Bolsheviks with his program of permanent revolution. Many said that the Republic was Lenin and Trotsky, he was an orator. Major figures joined together: Trotsky, Bukharin, Rykov, Tomsky, Zinoviev, Pyatakov (God only knows what kind of a figure); add to that Nadezhda Konstantinova [Krupskaya], who always supported these ‘leftist’ Communists. Me, Stalin, I was known, but not like Trotsky. Be brave and don’t invent what was not the case.”

206. Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 158 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1122, l. 158–65, 167–74: Khmel’nitsky notes).

207. Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 62–4, RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1122, l. 158–65, 167–74).

208. No figure acquired more place-names than the deceased Kirov. Murray, Politics and Place Names, 51.

209. Wang Ming had requested an audience with Stalin on Oct. 21, 1937. Moscow also sent an envoy to Yan’an, V. A. Adrianov, from the general staff, with $3 million, to build up the forces to fight the Japanese. Titarenko, VKP (b), komintern i kitai, V: 73 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 281, l. 48); Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 67–9; III: 124, 197–200, 229–33.

210. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 67–9.

211. Zaria vostoka, Oct. 29, 1937. See also Wilson, “Stalin as Ikon,” 271–3 (Wilson attended a physical culture parade on Red Square that glorified Stalin). Also on Nov. 15, 1937, two nervous functionaries in the party’s culture-enlightenment department wrote to Kaganovich and Yezhov about perceived shortcomings in Man with a Gun, the play by Nikolai Pogodin (Stukalov) on the October Revolution, which had premiered at Moscow’s Vakhtangov Theater. Kerzhentsev had inserted the character of Stalin, played by Ruben Simonov (b. 1899), days before the opening. “Simonov was given this important part [young Stalin] because he was Armenian and looked somewhat like a Georgian, and because next to Shchukin Simonov was the best actor in our company,” the letter writers complained. “But all this was not enough to transform the charming, spruce, somewhat eccentric Ruben Simonov into a future father of the people.” Kerzhentsev had dressed down Shchukin for his portrayal of Lenin (“Shchukin turned white and we stood frozen in amazement”), but Molotov told the actor that Kerzhentsev would regret his criticism. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 487–8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 256, l. 161–3; F. Shablovsky and K. Yukov); Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 107–9. Molotov had witnessed Stalin’s positive reaction to Shchukin’s portrayal of Lenin in Romm’s film. See also Shchukin, Boris Vasil’evich Shchukin.

212. Stalin had instructed a visiting Chinese Nationalist delegation (Nov. 18, 1937) to build their own weapons and aviation factories, in the rear, because capitalists tended to sell mostly standard arms, and might stop selling to China altogether. Ledovskii et al., Russko-kitaiskie otnosheniia v XX veke, IV/i: 151–7 (November 18, APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 321, l. 20–8). See also Ledovskii et al., Russko-kitaiskie otnosheniia v XX veke, IV/i: 136–8 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 321, l. 16–9; Voroshilov, Nov. 1).

213. Taylor, Generalissimo, 161.

214. MacKinnon, Wuhan. Membership would reach 800,000 by 1940.

215. Ledovskii et al., Russko-kitaiskie otnosheniia v XX veke, IV/i: 180 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 324, l. 21, Dec. 24, 1937).

216. The Soviet of Nationalities was to be filled by representatives of the union and the autonomous republics without regard to their size or population.

217. Pavlova, “1937.” As one soldier in the Soviet Far East aptly commented, according to an NKVD report, “So Stalin says that’s the way it will be and then everything is democratic.” Merritt, “Great Purges,” 168.

218. Pravda, Dec. 7, 1937; Getty, “State and Society.”

219. Fitzpatrick, Everyday Stalinism, 179–82. See also Golubev, “Esli mir obrushitsia na nashu Respubliku,” 68 (citing TsAODM, f. 3, op. 50, d. 16, l. 117–9).

220. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 5011, l. 1–2. At factories and collective farms, Cheka anniversary lectures were staged.

221. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 459 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 994, l. 17; Dec. 9, 1937).

222. Pravda, Dec. 21, 1937; Izvestiia, Dec. 21, 1937; Sultanbekov, “Nikolai Ezhov,” 28; Mlechin, KGB, 176–7.

223. Conquest, Inside Stalin’s Secret Police, 50–1.

224. Vecherniaia Moskva, Dec. 21, 1937: 1.

225. Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 167. Pravda (Dec., 17, 1937) had denounced Meyerhold in a broadside titled “A Foreign Theater.”

226. Na prieme, 227.

227. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 268 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 316, l. 50–61; July 23, 1937).

228. Bowing to practical demands, Molotov had to acquiesce in the promotion of non-party specialists to factory and administrative positions. “We have to admit at the present time, it is not simply a question of the selection of cadres,” Molotov said of a draft decree on Dec. 29, 1937. “What we are doing is a broad-front promotion of new cadres. We need to select new cadres who can work better than the old ones, who have not turned sour or gone over to the enemy camp.” Khlevniuk, “Economic Officials in the Great Terror,” 60 (citing GARF, f. 5446, op. 22, d. 1065, l. 10–7, 19–20).

229. This was evidently a meeting of the politburo, which commenced at 6:05 p.m. The logbook lists Molotov, Kaganovich, Kalinin, Chubar, Mikoyan, Voroshilov, Andreyev, Yezhov, and Zhdanov (candidate members), and Voznesensky (not a member). It does not list Kosior (full member) or Postyshev, Eihe, or Petrovsky (candidate members). Na prieme, 227–8.

230. Chigirin, Stalin, 88–114 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1482, l. 60–99). Yezhov would have the medical record forwarded to Vlasik on Dec. 12, 1938.

231. Bobylev et al., Voennyi sovets pri narodnom komissare oborony SSSR, noiabr' 1937 g., 73–4; Iakulov, “Stalin i Krasnaia Armiia,” 172. The gathering took place Nov. 21–27, 1937. Kuibyshev would be arrested on Feb. 2, 1938, and executed on August 1. The Soviet officer corps would total 179,000 in 1939.

232. Rapoport and Geller, Izmena rodine, 283–8.

233. Reese, Stalin's Reluctant Soldiers.

234. DGFP, 1918–1945, series D, I: 29–39 (“Hossbach Memorandum”).

235. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 46–60; Fest, Hitler, 539–43. Whereas Kershaw renders the ascent of Hitler to the top of the military command as almost an accident, Fest makes it overly preplanned.

236. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, V: 117 (Jan. 27, 1938). Read, The Disciples, 450. The bride was Eva Gruhn.

237. Hitler assembled all the generals to deliver the news in person on the afternoon of Feb. 5, 1938. No one objected. That evening he addressed the cabinet (it was the last formal cabinet meeting of the Reich) and sought to dispel rumors of rifts between the Nazi party and the Wehrmacht. The sensational news of the momentous changes in the Wehrmacht took up the press and radio airtime for days—both Blomberg and Fritsch were said to have retired “on health grounds”—spurring rumors of a plot on Hitler’s life. McDonogh, Hitler's Gamble, 7–19.

238. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 994, l. 51.

239. Kostrychenko, Tainaia politika Stalina, 160, 207–8. Postyshev, acting party boss in Kuibyshev (since March 18, 1937), was specially reprimanded for excesses.

240. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 159–67; Khlevniuk, “Party and NKVD,” 26–7; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 140–3; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 501. See also Rigby, Communist Party Membership, 214–8.

241. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 463 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 729, l. 94–5). Individual reprieves were often short-lived. On Sept. 25, 1937, following the arrest of his brother Aleksei Simochkin in the Western province, Vasily Simochkin, party boss of Ivan-Voznesensk province, wrote to Stalin to disown his brother. “You cannot answer for your brother,” Stalin answered. “Continue your work.” RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 57, l. 93. But Vasily Simochkin would be arrested on Nov. 26, 1938, and executed on March 10, 1939.

242. Starkov, “Kak Moskva chut’ ne stala Stalinodarov,” 126–7.

243. Pravda, Jan. 18, 1938; Pervaiia sessia Verkhovnogo Soveta SSSR, 135–41; Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 238–9; RGASPI, f. 77, op. 1, d. 672 (Zhdanov’s notes). On Jan. 4, 1938, Shumyatsky reported to Molotov on the need to install permanent filming and sound equipment in the Great Kremlin Palace hall used for party congresses; the equipment had already been purchased in the United States. That same day Malenkov signed an order for Kerzhentsev’s removal. Three days later, the politburo replaced Shumyatsky with Dukelsky (who would last two months). This spurred Gr. Zeldovich, an editor at Mosfilm, to denounce artists for drunken debaucheries at the Metropole and their “immense love for the West”. Many dream about foreign trips . . . I heard that G[rigory] Alexandrov has often been inside certain foreign embassies.” Zeldovich had one uncle living in Poland and another in Riga, while relatives on his mother’s side lived in America, perhaps accounting for his going on the offensive. Maksimenkov, Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 455–6 (RGASPI, f. 82, op. 2, d. 958, l. 66), 455–6n1 (l. 67), 457 (f. 17, op. 3, d. 994, l. 46), 462–77 (op. 120, d. 349, l. 47–60), 477n3 (f. 82, op. 2, d. 958, l. 38). In 1938, Kerzhentsev was replaced (by Aleksei Nazarov) but would die a natural death (heart failure on June 2, 1940). Maksimenkov, Sumbur, 288–90. Nazarov would last until April 1, 1939, giving way to his deputy, the enduring Mikhail Khrapchenko (b. 1904).

244. Nevezhin, Zastol'nye rechi, 170–83. Stalin allowed Zhdanov to give the speech commemorating Lenin at the Bolshoi.

245. Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 109, 287–8; Elagin, Ukroshchenie iskusstva, 322–3.

246. Milovidov, “Velikii grazhdanin,” 6; Dobrenko, Stalinist Cinema, 229–50.

247. In Feb. 1938, the NKVD received a report from Mark Zborowski out of Paris that had Trotsky's son Sedov once more stating, while reading a newspaper, that “the whole regime in the USSR rests upon Stalin and it would be enough to kill him so that it would come crashing down.’ He returned to and underscored many times the necessity of killing comrade Stalin.” Volkogonov, Trotsky, II: 198 (citing Arkhiv INO OGPU-NKVD, f. 31660, d. 9067, t. 1, l.140a-140v). See also Volkogonov, Trotsky, 378–80. See also Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 82–3; Serge, “Leon Sedov,” 203–7; Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 469–70 (quoting Spiegelglass interrogation). Supposedly in 1937, the NKVD's Yakov Serebrynsky had been tasked with kidnapping Lev Sedov without commotion on a Paris street and transferring him alive to Moscow, leaving no trace of the operation (and not informing the Paris intelligence station). Instead, Sedov suddenly died. This story appears to be given in an effort to deny Soviet intelligence's involvement in Sedov's death. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 83–4.

248. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 73 (Feb. 18, 1938). A Communist Youth League member appears to have written Stalin seeking redress after having been fired for failing to affirm that socialism in the Soviet Union had won “final victory” (preserving the country against repeat foreign intervention to restore capitalism). Stalin wrote back, agreeing with the fired petitioner, in a lengthy letter he had printed in Pravda (Feb. 14, 1938): “Since we do not live on an island but in a ‘system of states,’ a considerable number of which are hostile to the land of socialism, creating a danger of intervention and restoration, we say openly and honestly that the victory of socialism in our country is not yet final.” Tucker, “The Emergence of Stalin's Foreign Policy,” 570.

249. Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraph 608 (citing Pascua's personal notes of Kremlin meeting of Feb. 26, 1938. AHN-Madrid. Diversos. M. Pascua, Leg. 2, Exp. 6).

250. Danilov et al., Tragediia Sovetskoi derevni, V/i: 452, 486; Ellman, “Soviet 1937 Provincial Show Trials” (the order dated to Aug. 3, 1937, right as the “kulak” operation was unfolding); Ellman, “Soviet 1937–1938 Provincial Show Trials Revisited.” See also RGASPI, 558, op. 11, d. 57, l. 57; Izvestiia, June 10, 1992: 7.

251. Gupta, Ryutin Platform. On the difficulties involved in staging fabricated trials, see Lih, “Melodrama and the Myth,” 178–207 (esp. 202).

252. “O dele tak nazyvaemogo ‘soiuza marksistov-lenintsev,” 112–5 (Nov. 1, 1936).

253. Conquest, Great Terror: Reassessment, 23; and Tucker and Cohen, Great Purge Trial, 348. Vyshinsky, claiming to be quoting the defendant Sokolnikov, noted on Jan. 28, 1937, in his statement to the court that “as for the lines of the program, as far back as 1932 the Trotskyites, the Zinovievites and the Rightists all agreed in the main on a program, which was characterized as the program of the Rightists. This was the so-called Ryutin Platform; to a large extent, as far back as 1932, it expressed the program policy common to all three groups.” Report of Court Proceedings, 489.

254. Bukharin, Tiuremnye rukopisi. Four letters are dated between April 15, 1937, and Dec. 10, 1937. In the latter, Bukharin wrote: “I thought about what was taking place, and came up with the following conception: There is some kind of grand, bold political idea of a general purge a) in connection with a prewar time; b) in connection with a transition to democracy. This purge encompasses a) the guilty b) the suspicious and c) the potential-suspicious.” Bukharin also wrote that he had dreamt Nadya Alliluyeva—in whose room he had been living—was still alive and had promised to get Stalin to release him. Stalin circulated the letters to the other politburo members, who wrote across them, “The letter of a criminal,” “A criminal farce,” “A typical Bukharin lie.” Murin, “Prosti menia, Koba . . .”: neizvestnoe pis'mo N. Bukharina,” 23 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 427, l. 13–8); “No ia to znaia, chtory prov': pis'mo N. I. Bukharina I. V. Staliny iz vnutrennei t'iurnyi NKVD,” 56 (d. 301, l. 127, 128); 56–8; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 556–62. See also Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War, 78–9; and Fel'shtinskii, Razgovory s Bukharinym, 114–5. In late Feb. 1938, on the eve of the trial, Yezhov lied to Bukharin that his life would be spared: Khaustov, “Deiatel'nost' organov,” 365 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 589, l. 108). Bukharin's last communication with Stalin came March 13, 1938 (a futile appeal of his death sentence). Larina was arrested and sent to the Tomsk camp for wives of traitors and enemies (she would survive).

255. The indictment was presented for an international audience by Yaroslavsky, Meaning of the Soviet Trials. The defendants' biographies had been rewritten to make them descendants of capitalists and priests.

256. On Yagoda's attempt to negotiate for his life, see the prison snitch's report: Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 233–5 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 318, l. 113–4; V. Kirshon).

257. Conquest, Reassessment, 341–98; Maclean, Escape to Adventure, 59–83; Hedeler, “Ezhov's Scenario,” 34–55.

258. Sokolov, “N. N. Krestinskii,” 120–42; Trud, May 26, 1988.

259. Conquest, Reassessment, 352; Popov, “Byl i ostaius' kommunistom,” 244–51.

260. Trial of the Anti-Soviet “Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites,” 675.

261. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 173–6 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 42, l. 29–33; d. 40, l. 128, 347; d. 41, l. 51–70; APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 338, l. 59).

262. Avdeenko, “Otluchenie” (no. 4), 90–1. Avdeenko did not get in to the trial.

263. New York Times, March 1, 1938.

264. Besides Bukharin, Rykov, Yagoda, Krestinsky, and Ravovsky (former ambassador to Great Britain and France), the defendants were: Arkady Rosenholtz, Vladimir Ivanov (former People's Commissar for Timber Industry), Mikhail Chernov (former People's Commissar for Agriculture), Grigori Grinko (former People's Commissar for Finance), Isaac Zelensky (former Central Committee Secretary), Akmal Ikramov and Fayzulla Khodzhaev (Uzbek leaders), Vasily Sharangovich (former party boss in Belorussia), Prokopy Zubarev, Pavel Bulanov (NKVD operative), Venyamin Maximov-Dikovskiy, Pyotr Kryuchkov (Gorky's secretary), Sergei Bessonov (a trade representative), and three Kremlin doctors: Lev Levin, Dmitry Pletnev, and Ignaty Kazakov. Levin and Kazakov were sentenced to execution; Pletnev, like Rakovsky and Bessonov, was given a long sentence, but, after being remanded to Orlov prison, he would be shot without retrial in 1941. Borodulin and Topolianskii, “Dmitrii Dmitrievich Pletnev,” 51. On the NKVD's toxicology lab, see Sudoplatov, Spetsoperatsii, 441. The executioner was Pyotr Maggo.

265. http://www.memo.ru/memory/commu_narka/index.htm; Golovkova, Butovskii Poligon. Among those whose cremated remains were dumped at Kommunarka were Bukharin, Rykov, Béla Kun, Abram Belenky (Lenin's former bodyguard), Peters of the Cheka, Yakov Agranov, Trilliser, Leonid Zakovsky, Grigory Kaminsky, Krestinsky, Pyatnitsky, Postyshev, and Pauker.

266. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 238 (TsA FSB, ASD H-13706, l. 55–6; Grigory Vyatkin). Plestov would survive and prosper; Vyatkin, already infamous in 1934 in Novosibirsk for having knocked out someone's teeth with a whip, would be arrested in Nov. 1938, charged with having destroyed more than 4,000 people in Ukraine, and executed in 1939. Tepliakov, Mashina terrora, 252, 263, 478, 516.

267. Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 188; Orlov, Secret History, 188. “If the purges were bewildering to a person in my privileged position in Moscow,” a secret police defector observed, “they must have been absolutely incomprehensible to the toiling officials and loyal party workers in remote provinces, who suddenly found themselves denounced as secret enemies of the cause they served.” Petrov and Petrov, Empire of Fear, 78.

268. Iakir and Geller, Komandarm Iakir, 211.

269. Petrov and Petrov, Empire of Fear, 78.

270. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 138–9 (citing TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 591, l. 31–3). Rosenholtz (b. 1889) had met with Stalin often over many years as the Soviet representative to the secret negotiations for cooperation with the German military in 1922, a member of the central control commission from 1927, and foreign trade commissar. Na prieme, 694.

271. “Agoniia kapitalizma i zadachi Chetvertogo Internatsionala,” Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 66 (May–June 1938): 19.

272. Bohlen, Witness to History, 51.

273. Ullman, “Davies Mission,” 265.

274. Simonov, Glazami cheloveka, 54–5.

275. Maria Joffe, the widow of the Soviet diplomat, recounted a story, said to have been told to her by the inventive Radek, about how at the beginning of the 1920s Stalin, in a relaxed state, supposedly said, “The sweetest thing is to devise a plan, then, being on alert, waiting in ambush for a good long time, finding out where the person is hiding. Then catch the person and take revenge!” Another version of this story appears in the memoirs of the widow of Grigory Sokolnikov Joffe, Odna noch', 33–4; Serebriakova, “Iz vospominanii,” 241–2.

276. Not just those who had worked with Lenin and knew of his 1922–23 Testament were targeted, such as Trotsky, Kamenev, Zinoviev, Rykov, and Bukharin, but also those who were entirely creatures of Stalin (Kosior, Postyshev, Chubar, Eihe, and Rudzutaks, the loyalist whom Stalin had elevated to replace Zinoviev in the politburo). For a list of Central Committee members and candidate members not destroyed in the terror, see Mawdsley, “An Elite within an Elite,” 63.

277. The original end of the antikulkak “mass operations” was to have been the second week of Dec.—the precise time of the elections—and in the meantime, functionaries who suddenly would have to stand against competition were writing to the Central Committee apparatus complaining that former “kulaks” might get their names on the ballot. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 123; “Demokratiia . . . pod nadzorom NKVD,” Neizvestnaia Rossiia, II: 272–81; Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 195. Wendy Goldman asserts that Stalin’s speech back at the Feb.–March 1937 plenum “aimed for a ruthless yet limited attack on former oppositionists,” but that (pseudo)democratic procedures involving criticism from below wildly expanded the modestly set targets. Goldman, Terror and Democracy, 129.

278. Ehrenburg, Sobranie sochinenii, IX: 189; Medvedev, “O lichnoi otvetsvennosti Stalina za terror,” 289–330 (at 289–90). Sholokhov wrote to Stalin (Feb. 6, 1938) requesting that the arrests be checked, for “they are removing not only White Guardists, émigrés, torturers—in a word, those deserving of removal—but genuinely Soviet people.” The NKVD evidently arrived to arrest Sholokhov at his home in the village of Veshenskaya. He had fled north to Moscow; Stalin decided to spare him. “Vokrug menia vse eshche pletut chernuiu Pautinu . . .”: pis’mo M. A. Sholokhova I. V. Stalinu (1937–1950),” 18. See also Murin, “Prosti, menia, Koba . . .”: neizvestnoe pis’mo N. Bukharina.”

279. Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 106, 154–7. The case of Shreider (b. 1902) is particularly illuminating, and involves Stanislaw Redens, Stalin’s brother-in-law and by now the NKVD boss in Kazakhstan, then Beria. Shreider would refuse to confess but get ten years and be dispatched to the Northern Railway construction camps (SveZhelDorlag), where, because he was employed in administrative work, he would survive. Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 85–95, 252. Redens was arrested in Nov. 1938 and executed in Jan. 1940.

280. Vernadsky showed considerably more understanding of Soviet realities than most contemporaries: “Millions of prisoners—forced labor, playing a very significant and huge role in the state’s economy,” he recorded on Jan. 5, 1938. Sovershenno sekretno, no. 8 (1990): 10–3; Khlevniuk, 1937–i, 214–5. See also Prychodko, One of Fifteen Million, 21.

281. Fyodor Stebenev, the commissar, speaking to Andrei Vedenin, continued: “I would bet my head that Iosif Vissarionovich [Stalin] does not know. Signals, complaints, protests are being intercepted and not reaching him. We need to get Stalin to know about this. Otherwise ruin. Tomorrow they’ll take you, and after you me. We cannot keep quiet.” Vedenin, Gody i liudi, 55.

282. For the gamut of contemporary (and ongoing) speculations, see Medvedev, Let History Judge, 523–601. Then there is the “theory” of a Russian “tradition” of violence. Courtois, “Conclusion: Why?,” 728–31.

283. On April 3, 1938, Mironov reported to Frinovsky that 10,728 “conspirators” had been incarcerated. Pavliukov, Ezhboi, 390; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 118.

284. Mironov appeared at the Kremlin on New Year’s; he would be arrested on Jan. 6, 1939, at the foreign affairs commissariat and executed on the night of Feb. 21–2, 1940.

285. Mishima and Goto, Japanese View of Outer Mongolia, 21–2.

286. Coox, Nomonhan, 164–5.

287. Pravda, March 29, 1937; Getty, Origins of the Great Purges, 140. In 1935, the Soviet authorities recorded 340 aircraft “incidents” as well as 54 crashes (in which 88 people died); of these 394 events, fewer than half (163) were investigated as involving possible wrecking, but in 1937–8 everything became wrecking. Khaustov, “Deiate’nost’ organov,” 330 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 3, d. 1411, l. 255).

288. Zhukov, Inoi Stalin, 293. Stalin’s Nov. 1936 dismissal of the notion that all former kulaks and White Guardists were enemies would be republished in the 1939 edition of his Questions of Leninism. Stalin, Voprosy Leninizma, 531–2.

289. Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 586 (Aug. 1937). Similarly, arrests under article 58–10 (anti-Soviet agitation) had numbered 100,000 in 1931, during peasant rebellion, then fell to 17,000 in 1934, climbed to 230,000 in 1937, and fell to 18,000 in 1940. Davies, “Crime of ‘Anti-Soviet Agitation.’”

290. Chuev, Tak govoril Kaganovich, 138–9.

291. Kuromiya, Stalin, 136. This was a long-standing, self-serving view of Stalin: viz. Nov. 25, 1932, politburo session, RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 11012.

292. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 306.

293. Stalin, polemicizing with Uglanov and the rightists at the politburo (April 22, 1929), continued: “Don’t you know what class struggle is, don’t you know what class are?” Danilov and Khlevniuk, Kak lomali NEP, IV: 654, 674 (uncorrected transcript); Kuromiya, “Stalin in the Politburo Transcripts,” 52.

294. Pravda, Oct. 20, 1937.

295. Khaustov, “Deiatei’nost’ organov,” 48, 52 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 187, l. 24), 55–56.

296. Baker, “Surveillance of Subversion,” 497.

297. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 93; Rittersporn, Anguish, 39.

298. Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 175; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 203, l. 62, 77–8. On April 26, 1937, Uritsky, head of military intelligence, had reported to Stalin that “according to your directive a collective of military intelligence operatives wrote a number of articles concerning the organization and methods of work of foreign espionage.” (Stalin underlined this passage in pencil.) Seven such articles had already been published; five more were enclosed for final approval; six others awaited completion. Stalin was waiting upon the big article that would be published in Pravda on May 4. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 134–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1594, l. 1). See also “Spy International,” Pravda, Aug. 21, 1937; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 203, l. 62–88, 93–100; Davies and Harris, Stalin’s World, 60.

299. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 203, l. 62, 77–8. When the Soviet press launched saturation coverage of public charges about Soviet inhabitants serving as espionage agents on behalf of Japan, the Japanese embassy conducted thorough checks, verifying that the “confessions” contained lies and were contradicted by the whereabouts on the days in question of those Japanese officials said to be involved. These facts were internally acknowledged by the NKVD, at least early on: an April 2, 1937, NKVD document, for example, admitted that “evidence of the guilt of the arrested is lacking.” Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 47, 48 (TsA FSB, f. 66–1t., op. 30, d. 17, l. 185).

300. Khaustov, “Deiatei’nost’ organov,” 316 (TsA FSB, f. 8os, op. 1, d. 57–65); Khaustov et al., Liubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 659–60 n78 (TsA FSB, 8os, op. 1, d. 80); Plotnikova, “Organy,” 160.

301. In March 1938, all Soviet stamp collectors who engaged in correspondence with foreigners were registered. Khaustov, “Deiatei’nost’ organov,” 305 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 4, d. 13, l. 81–4; f. 66, op. 1, d. 460, l. 261). When Yezhov sent Stalin (April 5) an intercepted Japanese ciphered telegram noting that the number of Finnish tourists arriving via Intourist had increased and that their geographical possibilities of travel once inside the USSR had expanded, Stalin had Intourist placed under the NKVD. The decree was not made public. After a Dec. 1938 court case would be opened against Intourist in the United States for espionage activity—it belonged to the NKVD—Beria would get Stalin’s approval to transfer Intourist from the NKVD to the foreign trade commissariat in Jan. 1939. RGASPI, f. 16, op. 163, d. 1207, l. 69–72; Khaustov, “Deiatei’nost’ organov,” 223–5; Kokurin and Petrov, Lubianka, 20. A total of only 100,000 foreigners visited the USSR in the 1920s and 1930s, around 5,000 per year, and their interactions with Soviet inhabitants had become increasingly circumscribed to the point of prohibiting nearly all contact. At peak, between 20,000 and 30,000 foreign-born workers and specialists as returning émigrés were working alongside Soviets in factories and offices in the early 1930s, but by the mid-1930s they would be gone. Le’l’chuk and Pivovarov, “Mentalitet sovetskogo obshchestva,” at 29.

302. Khaustov, “Deiatei’nost’ organov,” 46 (citing TsA FSB, f. 3, os, op. 6, d. 9, l. 209, 216).

303. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 45.

304. When in fall 1937 the USSR had proposed opening two more consulates in Germany (Breslau and Munich), and to bring the total in each country to four by closing three of the seven German consulates, the Germans refused; Stalin ordered the number of German consulates brought down to two. In 1938, all consulates of both countries were shuttered. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 355, 355n1, n2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 22, l. 50, 56, 142); DGFP, series D, I: 903–4 (Schulenburg to foreign ministry, Jan. 13, 1938), 904–9 (Schulenburg to foreign ministry, Jan. 17). See also Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 155; Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 279.

305. Rittersporn, Anguish, 41–2 (citing Plotnikova, “Organy,” 70–1), 43 (citing PA AA, MOSKAU I 394: Gestapo to foreign ministry, July 27, 1939; I 393: 275, I 394: foreign ministry to Moscow embassy, May 14, 1939, R 101388: Rosette Eimeke to foreign ministry, March 27, 1940, Abwehr to chief of chancery, Aug. 29, 1940; I 419: Dec. 16, 1937 notes; I 421: July 2, 1938 note); Plotnikova, “Organy,” 25.

306. Rittersporn, Anguish, 51 (citing BA-MA, RW, 67, 48: 55).

307. Peplowski, Wywiad Polski na ZSSR, 126–7. Stalin was aware that the Polish government sent spies posing as Communist refugees to the USSR, which served to further discredit Moscow-resident foreign Communists in his eyes. The Poles, in turn, were aware that the NKVD recruited Soviet agents among émigrés in Poland, and managed thereby to infiltrate Soviet espionage efforts.

308. Khaustov, “Deiatel'nost' organov,” 48.

309. Kozlov, “Pokozatel'i po trudu” (a secret GPU-NKVD file from the Magadan archives). Back in 1936, Japan's Kwantung Army had set up a school to train Koreans for political agitation and espionage assignments on the Soviet side of the border. Nair, Indian Freedom Fighter, 141–6.

310. Solov'ev and Chugnuov, Pogranichnye voiska SSSR, 8–36.

311. Kuromiya, Freedom and Terror, 283–4. See also the story of the Polish agent who crossed the frontier at Baranovichi, was caught by the NKVD, confessed to being a Polish agent, but was beaten to confess to fantastic accusations that were untrue: Cybulski, Accused, 455–9.

312. Khaustov, “Deiatel'nost' organov,” 316 (TsA FSB, f. 8os, op. 1, d. 57–65); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 659–60n78 (d. 80).

313. “All foreign bourgeois specialists are or may be intelligence agents,” Stalin had written to Kaganovich (Aug. 7, 1932). The next year, he had exploded at Kaganovich when he learned that American journalists were traveling to the famine-stricken Kuban region, noting “there already are many spies in the USSR.” Davies et al., Stalin-Kaganovich Correspondence, 177; Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 307.

314. Rzhesheskii and Vehviläinen, Zimniaia voina, II: 207. For Stalin's connect-the-dots theory, see also Broide, Vreditel'stvo.

315. A Soviet writer has speculated that Stalin simultaneously believed and disbelieved his inventions of plots. Sinyavsky, Soviet Civilization, 99, 94.

316. Volkogonov, Stalin: Politicheskii portret, I: 263 (on Stalin's notes kept in the Presidential Archive). See also Tucker, Stalin in Power, 474 ff; and van Ree, Political Thought, 117–25. A fire at Kaganovich's residence spurred Stalin to issue a resolution (April 1937) to the effect that the politburo “considers this fire not an accidental occurrence but one organized by enemies.” RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 21, l. 30.

317. “Fragmenty stenogrammy dekabrskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1936 goda,” 6.

318. The year 1937 did not begin on Dec. 1, 1934, contrary to Yevgeniya Ginzburg's famous bon mot. Ginzburg, Into the Whirlwind, 11.

319. See the letter (Sept. 2, 1936) from Moiseyev (Yershisty), on which Molotov wrote: “To comrade Yezhov: Moiseyev-Yershisty could hardly be troublesome to anybody in Leningrad. I doubt he was justifiably expelled from the VKP (b).” Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 294–7 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 272, l. 54–5).

320. Chuev, Sto sorok, 463.

321. As Conquest wrote, “The nature of the whole purge depends in the last analysis on the personal and political drives of Stalin.” Conquest, Reassessment, 33.

322. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 291.

323. Countless examples could be adduced. For ex., when Yezhov sent Stalin a list of people “who were being checked for possible arrest,” Stalin wrote on it: “Don't check, arrest.” Mironov, “Vosstanovlenie i razvitie Leninskikh printsipov,” 19. One scholar has noted that “to attribute events that cost tens of millions of lives to the agency of a few individuals violates historians' sense of proportion, not to speak of theoretical commitments.” Pomper, “Historians and Individual Agency.” This issue is readily resolved, however, by the distinction between causative agency and collaborative agency. Kotkin, Magnetic Mountain.

324. Cherushev, “Dorogoi nash tovarishch Stalin!”

325. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 31 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 29, d. 318, l. 103; Prokofyev).

326. Mikoian, "V pervyi raz bez Lenina," 6; Chuev, Tak govoril Kaganovich, 154; Chuev, Kaganovich, Shepilov, 211; Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 85–6; Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 79. Although Bukharin grasped that Stalin was evil, he, too, failed to take the full measure of Stalin's enigmatic character. Dan, "Bukharin o Staline," 181–2. See also Nicolaevsky, Power and the Soviet Elite, 3–7.

327. Stalin (film by Thames Television, London, 1990); Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 113.

328. Robert Tucker offered the most detailed and thought-through portrait of Stalin as psychopath, which he attributed, among other factors, to Stalin's childhood years. But many of the observations (in memoirs of Stalin's early years are dubious, while Tucker's clever additional arguments—e.g., that Stalin had a "Lenin complex" and craved the feat of a "second October"—border on reducing to matters of psychology colossal events of geopolitics, Russian historical legacies, and Bolshevik ideas. In less capable hands than Tucker's, the psychologizing gets absurd. A bastardization of his argument portrays Stalin as a deformed product of his abusive father and overly devoted mother, motivated by unconscious urges, a need to alleviate anxieties arising out of an impaired narcissism (his "core"), and thus fundamentally irrational. Stalin, we are told, identified with "aggressors," and his favorite was Hitler, to whom he was homosexually attracted, and turned his "inner conflict" outward, with murderous results. Rancour-Laffiere, Mind of Stalin.

329. These came not just from the secret police but from such sources as Pravda correspondents, forwarded to him by Mekhlis, which presented highly tendentious characterizations of the situation in localities or institutions. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 153.

330. "We knew exactly by whom and where anti-Soviet conversations were conducted, badmouthing Stalin," recalled one NKVD operative of those years. "We opened dossiers [formuliri] on everyone." Kirillina, "Vystrely v Smol'nom," 73 (Popov).

331. Rudzutaks, for example, an erstwhile deputy chairman of the Council of People's Commissars, regaled cellmates with how during the early civil war Lenin had informed him he was being assigned to the Southern Front, where he would be working with Stalin. Rudzutaks had quickly affirmed his readiness to carry out the assignment, but Lenin, according to Rudzutaks, warned him it would be difficult: Stalin was an unscrupulous intriguer. Vladimir Khaustov, personal communication (Dec. 2012), referring to material in the APRE. Khlevniuk speculates that Stalin knew he was not held in high regard by those who knew earlier times. Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 303–4.

332. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 78. As an illustration, see the summer 1938 incident involving the Communist Youth League chief Alexander Kosaryov, as described by his widow, when Stalin clinked glasses with and kissed Kosaryov, then is said to have whispered in his ear, "If you're a traitor, I'll kill you." Kosaryov was arrested. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 595 (citing an unpublished memoir).

333. Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 318. One scholar has elaborated a so-called dictator's dilemma: the more powerful, the less he can trust his minions who claim to be loyal. Wintrobe, Political Economy of Dictatorship, 335–7. See also Harrison, Guns and Rubles, 7.

334. The Kremlin physicians Dmitry Pletnev and Lev Levin (executed in 1938) were said to have arrived at the diagnosis of paranoia, but Levin was an internist and Pletnev a heart specialist, and they appear to have diagnosed Stalin with a heart condition and gall bladder ailment. Valedinskii, "Organizm Stalina vpolne zdorovyi." For the hearsay, see Volski and Souvarine, "Un Caligula à Moscou," 16; Souvarine, Staline (1977), 582. Superficial psychologizing about dictators is rampant: Glad, "Why Tyrants Go Too Far." Rees, writing of Stalin, sought to distinguish between "criminal psychopaths," who tend to be impulsive, reckless, and "Machiavellian psychopaths," who are calculating, organized, determined, untroubled by self-doubt, audacious and often rise to the top of organizations. Rees, Iron Lazar, 218–22. See also Kovalevskii, Psikhiatricheskie eskizy iz istorii, III: 65–75 (on Ivan the Terrible). Stalin's self-control was duly noted by Conquest, Roy Medvedev, and many others. See Bullock, Hitler and Stalin, 494. One scholar has rightly observed that "the precise proportions of political calculation and psychological derangement that drove Stalin to these extreme measures will always be a matter of speculation." Rieber, "Stalin as Foreign Policy Maker," 142–3.

335. Rybin, Riadam so Stalinyim, 76.

336. Molotov later admitted that he and Stalin knew the secret police exaggerated the supposed threat, but Molotov did not admit that Stalin relentlessly pressured the police to do so. Chuev, Molotov, 466, 473–5.

337. Rees, Political Thought from Machiavelli to Stalin, 237–47.

338. Machiavelli, Gosudar'; Tucker, Stalin as Revolutionary, 315; Tucker, Stalin in Power, 282. Others denied Machiavelli's influence on Stalin: Souvarine, Stalin, 563, 583. Volkogonov claims he saw Stalin's copy of Machiavelli: Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/1: 107. Nikolai Ryzhkov, Soviet prime minister under Gorbachev, claims he read Stalin's underlined copy of Machiavelli: "To tell the truth, the book with its markings gave me a thousand times greater understanding of the personality of Stalin than all the biographies, all the films, about him, all the recollections of his friends and enemies." Ryzhkov made off with it. Ryzhkov, Perestroika, 354–6. The underlinings, in Russian, are: "Neeststvenno, chtoby vooruzhenyi stal okhotno pokoriat'sia nevooruzhenomu"; "Bez boiazni mogut byt' Gosudari zhestokimi v voennoe vremia."

339. Volubuev and Kuleshov, Ochishchenie, 146.

340. Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 267.

341. In the discussion of Augustus Octavian in Samuil Lozinskii's History of the Ancient World: Greece and Rome (Petrograd, 1923), Stalin underlined "first citizen, prince . . . supreme ruler." Volobuev and Kulsheov, "Istoriia ne terpit polupravdy."

342. Van Ree, Political Thought, 258–61.

343. Discussion of statecraft was almost entirely absent from Marx's voluminous writings. He had begun from the premise that the state did not possess interests of its own but incarnated class interests; those class interests were, therefore, the main object of analysis. Marx saw no need to subject the state's institutions and procedures—which differ significantly from country to country—to careful analysis. True, the phenomenon of Napoleon III in France provoked a change of heart in Marx, but not a full-fledged rethinking. Marx, Eighteenth Brumaire, 130–1; Civil War in France, 42. Engels had famously added the idea that after the proletarian revolution, as class contradictions were overcome, the state would "wither away." Lenin, initially, had also concurred that the state was an instrument of class oppression and would wither away (State and Revolution [1903]), but then changed his mind, albeit without managing to fill the theoretical gap.

344. van Ree, Political Thought, 135–8, 258.

345. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 3, d. 143, l. 372, 382, 424, 438.

346. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 3, d. 202, l. 21.

347. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 551–3; Brzezinski, Permanent Purge, 168.

348. Isaac Deutscher would imagine that Stalin ordered the purges to prevent "the managerial groups from consolidating as a social stratum," which could indeed have been part of Stalin's thinking. But Deutscher remained under the spell of Stalin's supposed special targeting of the Old Bolsheviks. Deutscher, Prophet Outcast, 306–7. It has been asserted with no evidence that young, aggressive new administrative cadres themselves pushed for the terror, being envious of the old guard Leninists. Voslensky, Nomenklatura (1984), 53–5, (1980), 82–6.

349. Stalinskie nastrel'nye spiski.

350. Khlevniuk, "Economic Officials in the Great Terror," 39.

351. Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 167.

352. Chalaia, Oboronaia dramaturgiia, 3. See also Kuleshova, "'Bol'shoi den'"; Kuznetsova, "Esli zavtra voina"; and Scott, Behind the Urals, 197–203 (about the play "Witness Confrontation"). Iu. Olesha and A. Macheret would adapt Confrontation for the big screen as The Mistakes of Engineer Kochin, which would premiere on Dec. 14, 1939 (Mosfilm).

353. Uldricks, "Impact of the Great Purges," 188–92; Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 130.

354. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 184. Several of the agents who had been assigned to Sedov were diverted to hunt down Soviet NKVD personnel abroad.

355. Mekhlis's response was to denounce Voroshilov to Stalin for impeding the destruction of additional "enemies." Rubtsov, Marshaly Stalina, 50–1 (Ivan Ilichev report to Mekhlis; Mekhlis letter to Stalin, Nov. 20, 1938).

356. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 17.

357. Pavel Alliluyev (Stalin's brother-in-law), Georgy Savchenko, Dmitry Pavlov, Kirill Meretskov, and Grigory Kulik supposedly sent a petition to Voroshilov that further arrests threatened the Red Army with disintegration. No such letter has been seen, only Pavlov's testimony, under torture, in July 1941 before he was shot. The letter seems to have been written in summer 1938. (Alliluyev died Nov. 2, 1938, in his Moscow office, unexpectedly, the day after returning from a holiday down south.) "Kulik was the main author of the text," Pavlov was recorded as testifying. "We sent it to Voroshilov but his secretariat informed us that the people's commissar would not even read our letter and requested us to withdraw it. At this Kulik called us together on a Sunday. We made some changes to the letter and sent it to the General Secretary of the Central Committee with a copy to Voroshilov. The letter argued that the main forces of the counterrevolution had already been liquidated within the army yet the arrest of its commanders continued. Indeed, to such an extent that the army might start to disintegrate . . . We believed that the Government would reduce the arrests." Bobrenov and Riazantsev, Palachi i zbertvi, 182–3, 186–91.

358. "The whole period of the purges was one of disillusionment and revulsion, the intensity of which, I suppose, accounted for my previous enthusiasm," confessed E. H. Carr. Cox, E. H. Carr, xviii.

CHAPTER 9. MISSING PIECE

1. Ehrenburg, Memoirs, 421; Ehrenburg, Sobranie sochinenii, IX: 183.

2. Khrushchev, Khrushchev Remembers, 314.

3. Yezhov also ordered the NKVD secretariat to reduce the number of "workers" and "collective farmers" in reported arrest statistics. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 279. This is hardly the only falsification in arrest statistics.

4. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 416 (citing RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 271, l. 708).

5. He sometimes also got drunk at a safe house, on Gogol Boulevard, before heading out for "exercise" at Lefortovo. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 139.

6. Rees, "The People's Commissariat of Water Transport," 235–61.

7. In March 1938, Malenkov ordered all leading party organs urgently, not later than the fifteenth of that month, to prepare lists of their members and candidate members who were "Poles, Germans, Latvians, Estonians, Finns, Lithuanians, Bulgarians, Greeks, Koreans, Chinese, Japanese, Turks, Iranians, English, French, Italian, Hungarians," and to indicate their place of employment as well as nationality and citizenship. Golubev, Esli mir obrushitsia na nashu Respubliku, 82 (citing TsAODM, f. 3, op. 50, d. 74, l. 7).

8. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 348–9.

9. Conquest, Reassessment, 57.

10. Zakovsky was a drinker, and Yezhov's notes on him refer to conversations about Stalin. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 441.

11. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 151 (TsA FSB, f. 3–os, op. 6, d. 3, l. 6: testimony of Frinovsky's son).

12. Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 43. Karutsky shot himself on May 13, 1938. Zakovsky, demoted to the Kuibyshev hydroelectric station, an NKVD object, and arrested there, was executed on Aug. 29, 1938, as an "agent of Polish and German counter-espionage." Stalin had Zakovsky blamed for arrests that supposedly ruined the naval shipbuilding program, an unwitting admission of the deadly effect of the terror on war preparation. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 242–3 (APRE f. 3, op. 58, d. 254a, l. 1).

13. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 412.

14. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 411–3; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 170 (TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 6, d. 3, l. 83). Yezhov would later claim, "I have known Yevdokimov, it seems, since 1934. I considered him a party man, verified. I visited him at his apartment, he visited me at my dacha." But "by my own denunciation to the Central Committee he was removed from his post" in the NKVD. "Poslednee slovo N.I. Ezhova na sudebnom protsesse, 3 fevralia 1940 goda": <http://www.perpetrator2004.narod.ru/documents/Yezhov/Yezhov.htm>

15. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 311 (TsA FSB, ASD p-4000, t. 7, l. 83–6).

16. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 319.

17. Khlevniuk, 1937-i, 67; Starkov, "Narkom Ezhov," 21–39 (at 37–8).

18. Popov and Oppokov, "Berievshchina" (1990, no. 1), 69.

19. According to his son, Beria speculated that Stalin had Persian blood and compared him to Shah Abbas I [1571–1629], the ruler of Persia's Safavid dynasty. (In 1587, a teenage Abbas had shoved aside his weak father, taking over a divided, nearly failed state, then went on to break the power and confiscate the wealth of the provincial chiefs, and fashion an imperial power that stretched from the Caucasus to the Tigris to the Indus and was distinguished by robust diplomatic relations and flourishing arts and architecture.) This might have been a Beria self-image. Beria, My Father, 21, 284.

20. Mikoian, S liubov'iu i pechal'iu, 27–8, 31–3; Mikoian, Svoimi glazami, 33–4, 36–40.

21. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 57–8. Nami Mikoyan's father would soon be arrested.

22. In Armenia, his replacement had been Khachik Moughdousi [Astvatsaturov], a Beria loyalist.

23. Popov and Oppokov, "Berievshchina" (1990, no. 1), 69. Tsaturov was arrested in Oct. 1937 but would survive.

24. Stepanyan also wrote about the absence of Leninist party democracy under Stalin. Aganian, Nersik Stepanian, 40, 49–50 (citing Arianskii filial IML, f. 4033, op. 6, d. 312, l. 1–6); Matossian, Impact of Soviet Policies, 129; Revolutsionnyi vostok, 1936, no. 4: 50. In April 1936 and again in Sept., Lyudmila Yanushevskaya, the wife of Semyon Sef, head of the party's culture-propaganda department in Tblisi, told people that Sef, not Beria, was the author of the work. Word reached Yezhov, who launched an investigation with interviews of witnesses. On Aug. 16, 1936, Yezhov wrote on the resolution: "Give me the material." Another report from a participant, written Oct. 22, 1936, after Yezhov had been named head of the NKVD, was less categorical, as if Yezhov had merely wanted to gather and hold the compromising material on Beria. (Sef and his wife were expelled from the party.) Sokolov, Beriia, 98–105.

25. Aganian, Nersik Stepanian, 52 (citing Arianskii filial IML, f. 1, d. 35, l. 98–9).

26. The bodyguards were detained but released after a month and a half. Sokolov, Beriia, 108–20.

27. Antonov-Ovseenko, Beriia, 92–6; Artsuni, "Samoubiistvo A. G. Khandzhiana"; Gazarian, "Etno ne dolzhno povtorit'sia" (no. 2), 65. After Beria's destruction in 1953, witnesses came forward to charge him with shooting Khanjian in his (Beria's) office, then having the body somehow delivered past the bodyguards to Khanjian's room. The Armenian head of the typist pool of the South Caucasus secretariat (Sushannik Safaryan) would testify that she was carrying the bureau-meeting typescript to Beria, gently pushed open his office door a bit, caught a glimpse of a man lying on the carpet, and quickly retreated. In 1961, KGB chief Shepin concluded that Beria had killed Khanjian in his (Beria's) office. The idea that the experienced operative Beria—with members of the Moscow Central Control Commission in the next room—would shoot Khanjian in his own office raises more questions than it answers. "Sovetskie praviteli Armenii" (Jan. 2009): <http://www.noev-kovcheg.ru/mag/2009-01/1499.html>; Izvestiia, Oct. 28, 1961; Medvedev, Let History Judge, 413, 624–5.

28. <http://www.noev-kovcheg.ru/mag/2009-01/1499.html#ixzz23qnzhqky>. See also Aganian, Nersik Stepanian, 52–3.

29. Zaria vostoka, July 11, 1936; Pravda [Armenia], July 12, 1936.

30. Tziternak, "Aghassi Khanjian."

31. Zaria vostoka, July 20, 1936.

32. In Georgia between 1932 and 1936, the combined print run of all writings by Marx—in both Russian and Georgian—had totaled 20,000; those of Lenin, 200,000; those of Stalin, 696,000; those of Beria, 430,000. Toptygin, Neizvestnyi Beriia, 41. Beria's Lado Ketskhoveli (1937), which celebrated Stalin's martyred mentor in Marxism, was evidently plagiarized from the manuscript of L. Shengelaya, a copy of which had entered the Tiflis Affiliate of the Marxism-Leninism Institute in Sept. 1935. Here, too, Beria emulated the master. Sukharev, "Litseidstvo," 112 (citing PA IIP pri TsK KPSS, f. 8, op. 1, d. 39, l. 23).

33. After Papuliya's arrest, Orjonikidze summoned the Azerbaijani party boss Bagirov to Kislovodsk. "Orjonikidze drilled me about Beria, and spoke of him very negatively," Bagirov would later testify. "In particular, Orjonikidze said that he couldn't believe in the guilt of his brother Papuliya. . . . Beria learned through his own people that Orjonikidze had summoned me to Kislovodsk, and he asked me the reasons for it over the telephone." Shariya would testify: "I knew that on the surface Beria thought well of Orjonikidze, but in fact he said all manner of despicable things about him to his circle of confidants." Goglidze would testify: "Beria in my presence and that of others made sharp, deprecatory comments about Sergo Orjonikidze. . . . I formed the impression that Beria said that as a result of some personal grudge against Orjonikidze and set others against him." Nekrasov, Beriia, 360; Popov and Oppokov, "Berievshchina," 1991, no. 1: 50.

34. Hoover Archives, Lakoba papers, 2–26 (speech to Sukhum city soviet, Jan. 1, 1936). Pravda on March 4, 1936, celebrated fifteen years of Soviet power in Abkhazia with a front-page photo of Lakoba, alongside Stalin, Orjonikidze, and Mikoyan, from 1927, which was said to have come from Stalin's private collection. No functionary—especially Beria—could miss a Kremlinological signal so immense, and for a place so small, a mere autonomous republic. Lakoba did not get to claim an article himself; instead, an article (“Itogi bor’ba i pobed”) was printed under the byline of Agrba, Abkhaz party secretary (Pravda was a party paper). In 1935 or 1936 Beria moved from an apartment building to a mansion at Machabeli St. 11. He also used a white stucco villa in Gagra, near Stalin's villa. Harriman and Abel, Special Envoy, 511–2.

35. An opportunity for Beria's pressure came with the suicide, in 1935 or 1936, of the daughter of the foreign trade commissar Rosenholtz at Lakoba's dacha in Gagra. At the time Beria was at his own dacha in Gagra, and there was a suspicion he had had sexual intercourse with her. In fact, she had sexual relations that day, but earlier, in the city, at the hotel where she was staying. In Gagra by invitation, she had supper with the host and others, then retired for the night and shot herself with one of Lakoba's guns. Beria either could not manage or chose not to mount a case against Lakoba. Popov and Oppokov, “Berievshchina” (1991, no. 1), 47–8.

36. Abbas-ogly, Ne mogu zabyt'; Abbas-ogly, Moia Abkhaziia, moia sud'ba.

37. Musto, “Pistolet ili iad?": http://www.hrono.ru/statii/2004/musto_yad.html. Once, it was said, in 1935, when Beria had used foul language in the presence of women, Mikhail Lakoba, Nestor's half-brother, had put a Brauning to Beria's temple. Rayfield, Stalin and His Hangmen, 294 (no citation).

38. Lakoba, “‘Ia Koba, a ty Lakoba,’” 74.

39. Lakoba, “‘Ia Koba, a ty Lakoba,’” 67. See also the hearsay in reminiscences by Musto Dkhikhasvili, “Konkurenty” (http://www.hrono.ru/statii/2004/musto_konkur.html). Musto writes that he did not attend the funeral in protest; photos show him as a pallbearer. Dimitrov's diary notes (Dec. 12, 1936) “with Lakoba and his wife.” Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 41.

40. Lakoba had to obtain formal permission from the local party bureau to travel to Tiflis at Beria's summons; permission was granted by telephone poll to him and M. Gobechiya on Dec. 25, 1936. Marykhuba, Moskovskie arkhivnye, 8 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 8, d. 97, l. 217–8).

41. By some accounts, Anastas Engelov, the Abkhaz plenipotentiary in Tblisi, assisted Lakoba in the walk to the hotel because Lakoba's driver, as instructed, was waiting back at the hotel. Engelov would be executed in connection with the Nov. 1937 trial of Lakoba-ites.

42. Minchenok, “Nestor i ten'.” Beria arrived at the hotel with South Caucasus NKVD chief Goglidze and, evidently, German Mgaloblishvili, chairman of the Georgian Council of People's Commissars. (Mgaloblishvili might have attended the theater with Lakoba and been at the hotel already.) Two Georgian NKVD operatives were already on the scene (including Kobulov), where the deceased Lakoba lay on the bed.

43. On April 26, 1935, the politburo in Moscow had discussed Lakoba's health, and directed him to observe physicians' instructions and enter the Kremlin hospital. The Kremlin doctors had recommended that Lakoba cut his workday down to four hours for a few weeks, observe a proper diet (including reducing meat consumption), refrain from smoking and drinking alcohol, engage in physical therapy, and apply cream and ointments. Marykhuba, Moskovskie arkhivnye, 23–4 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 971, l. 12); Hoover Archives, Lakoba papers, 1–7, Sept. 16, 1935.

44. Marykhuba, Moskovskie arkhivnye, 8 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 8, d. 97, l. 215; Dec. 29, 1936).

45. Pravda reported the death that day (Dec. 29).

46. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 624.

47. This started with Mgaloblishvili, whom Beria had chosen to lead the honor guard accompanying Lakoba's casket home from Tblisi and who was arrested for “ties.” Popov and Oppokov, “Berievshchina” (1991, no. 1), 48–9. The story goes that Beria's men beat Sarie to testify that Lakoba had wanted to sell Abkhazia to Turkey; she evidently refused, even when they beat her fourteen-year-old son Rauf in front of her. She was said to have died of torture in her cell. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 495–6.

48. Coincidentally or not, after Lakoba's demise, Stalin would not return to the Caucasus on a holiday for nine years. In 1937, the alphabet for writing the Abkhaz language would be changed to Georgian. On Dec. 16, 1936, the Abkhaz party bureau discussed an order to switch from the Latin to the Georgian alphabet (when elsewhere in the Union the Latin alphabet was being replaced by Cyrillic); all-new printing presses and typewriters would be required. Georgian peasants received land grants to settle on the Abkhaz coast, and Abkhaz language radio broadcasts were discontinued. Marykhuba, Moskovskie arkhivnye, 9 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 8, d. 105, l. 16–7); Abkhazia, 4. (The Abkhaz would switch to Cyrillic in 1954.)

49. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 64 (Aug. 4, 1937), 67–8 (Aug. 16, 1937), 69–70 (Aug. 16, 1937).

50. Beria promised documentation if necessary to testify to the supervision of lower level party organizations. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 29–30.

51. Mlechin, KGB, 199 (diary of Alexander G. Solovyov).

52. Popov and Oppokov, “Berievshchina” (1990, no. 5), 85 (testimony of Malik Dotsenko, citing Litvin).

53. Popov and Oppokov, “Berievshchina” (1990, no. 5), 86–7. (Yezhov's holiday was 1931–2.) Khrushchev recalled going out with Malenkov to Yezhov's Meshcherino dacha and finding Beria there. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 180.

54. Beria raised his own status by noting that “Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan are objects of especially heightened work of the imperialist powers”—a self-award of carte blanche to go after his enemies. Kosheleva et al., “Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda” (1995, no. 5–6): 8–13.

55. Popov and Oppokov, “Berievshchina” (1989, no. 7), 86 (Goglidze).

56. Nekrasov, Beria, 367.

57. In Sept. 1937, Orakhelashvili was said to have testified: “In my presence, in Sergo Orjonikidze's apartment, Beso Lominadze, after a number of counterrevolutionary slurs aimed at the party leadership, made an exceptionally insulting and hooliganistic slur against comrade Stalin. To my surprise, in response to this counterrevolutionary audacity by Lominadze, Orjonikidze, smiling, turned to me and said, ‘Have a look at him!’ And continued to conduct the conversation with Lominadze in a calm tone . . . In general I have to say that the parlor in Sergo Orjonikidze's apartment and, on days off, at his dacha (first in Volynskoe, then in Sosnovka) was a frequent meeting place for members of our counterrevolutionary organization, which, while waiting for Seergo Orjonikidze to arrive, conducted the most candid counterrevolutionary conversations, which continued right on after Orjonikidze himself showed up.” Nekrasov, Beria, 78. See also Knight, Beria, 83. As her husband had his eyes gouged out and eardrums perforated, Orakhelashvili's wife, Maria, Georgia's commissar of enlightenment, was compelled to watch.

58. Ginzburg, “O gibeli Sergo Ordzhonikidze,” 91–2. Beria's minion Goglidze would later admit the obvious: such “testimony” compromising Orjonikidze had been intended to please Stalin. Nekrasov, Beria, 360; Popov and Oppokov, “Berievshchina” (1991, no. 1), 55; Nekrasov, Beria, 378–9.

59. At the Pyatakov trial Mdivani was accused of plotting to kill Yezhov and Beria. Report of Court Proceedings, 74. Toroshelidze, former head of the Georgian Affiliate of the Institute of Marx-Engels-Lenin, was also arrested in Oct. 1936.

60. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 113. Nadezhda Lukina, Bukharin's first wife, had written to Stalin on Aug. 23, 1936, the day of the verdict against Kamenev and Zinoviev, claiming that during Kirov's Red Square funeral Kamenev had smiled at Mdivani (“I simply could not keep myself from writing you”). RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 710, l. 135–6.

61. Zaria vostoka, May 27, 1937; Pravda, June 5, 1937.

62. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 53–5. On police-reported gossip in Georgia, see Junge and Bonwetsch, Bolshevistskii poriadok, II: 69–72 (Arkhiv MVD Gruzii, 2–I otdel, f. 14, op. 11, d. 244, l. 19–22).

63. Beria's telegram to Stalin noted that Mezenin's superior in Moscow, Alexander Nikitin, had sent a telegram tasking the correspondent with delivering sharply critical information, and that Nikitin had twice phoned Meznin to render his reportage still sharper. Nikitin (b. 1901) would be named editor of Komsomolskaya Pravda in Aug. 1937 and head of the Central Committee press department in Jan. 1938, arrested on Sept. 3, 1939 (under Beria), and executed in July 1941.

64. Avalishvili, “Great Terror.” May 29, 1937, would be Ilya Chavchavadze’s 100th jubilee, and Beria telegraphed Stalin eight days prior to request permission to re-publish Stalin’s poetry from 1896 (some of which Chavchavadze’s journal had published). Stalin refused. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 46.

65. Nekrasov, Beria, 242–3. Mikoyan would recall that Beria’s role in Musavat was discussed at a Central Committee plenum in 1937. Naumov, Laurentii Beria, 1953, 165–6; Antonov-Ovseenko, Beria, 19.

66. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 253–4. See also Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 374 (RGASPI, f. 73, op. 2, d. 19, l. 49–50; Kaganovich to Stalin, Sept. 20, 1937).

67. Kaminskii, Grigorii Kaminsky; “Grigorii Naumovich Kaminskii.”

68. Pavliukhovich, Esboz, 296–7. Kaminsky supposedly told his wife on the morning of June 25 that he might not return home from the plenum; he is said to have already removed all documents from his safe and desk at the commissariat, prompting his assistant to ask if he was being transferred. Zhavaronkov and Pariiskii, “Skazavshii budet uslyshan,” 200–3 (quoting the recollections of Karmanova, his deputy in the health commissariat, and the writer Aleksandra Bentsianova, neither of whom attended the plenum), 209 (quoting I. I. Mukhovoz).

69. Afanašev, Oni ne molchali, 204 (Svetlana Kaminskaya). Kaminsky had been perhaps the sole Soviet journalist on the ground in Germany in fall 1923 reporting objectively that the Comintern efforts to instigate a seizure of power were disastrous. Lozhechko, Grigorii Kaminskii.

70. Afanašev, Oni ne molchali, 210–1 (Kaminskaya).

71. The sentence was carried out Feb. 10, 1938, at Yagoda’s former dacha (Kommunarka).

72. “Ochen’ vysoko tsenit t. Beria,” 163–5 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 788, l. 114–5ob; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 788, l. 114–16ob, June 25, 1937). Tite Lordkipanidze, a former head of the South Caucasus secret police, was arrested on June 22, 1937, along with several subordinates, in the Crimea autonomous republic; he was sentenced to execution on Sept. 14, 1937, and shot fifteen days later.

73. Already back on Oct. 21, 1933, Stalin had written to Kaganovich: “Pavkunovskiy destroyed the artillery. Orjonikidze must be given a scolding for having trusted two or three of his favorites. He was ready to give state benefits to these imbeciles.” Stalin to Kaganovich, RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 38–9. Pavkunovskiy would be shot on Oct. 30, 1937.

74. Already during his 1920s police work rooting out Menshevik sympathies, Beria had begun collecting dossiers on literary figures, musicians, and university personnel. Rayfield, Stalin and His Hangmen, 299.

75. Pravda, Jan. 15, 1937; Literaturnaiia gazeta, Jan. 5 and 10, 1937. The central regime awarded 3 million additional rubles for new apartments for artists of the Georgian National Opera and Ballet Theater, 700,000 for the theater’s refurbishment, 1 million to build a concert hall in the Tbilisi conservatory, and half a million to refurbish its building. Gatagova et al., TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i natsional’nyi vopros, II: 212–3 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 983, l. 28; Jan. 14, 1937).

76. Akhmeteli was executed on June 27, 1937. Urushadze, Sandro Akhmeteli, 250–1, 266–70. On Akhmeteli’s theater, see also Rayfield, Literature of Georgia, 213–4.

77. Rayfield, “Death of Paolo Iashvili,” 635–6.

78. Akhmeteli had been scathing toward fellow Georgian writers, whom he accused of giving in to political pressure; they now shrank from defending his name. Rayfield, “Death of Paolo Iashvili,” 655n23.

79. Zelinskii, “V iune 1954 goda,” 82–3.

80. According to the recollections of Semyon Chikovani, who carefully listed all the people who had been present. (Interview with Lasha Bakradze, director of the Georgian Literary Museum, who read out Chikovani’s Georgian-language memoir to me.) By other accounts, after Yashvili shot himself, Javakhishvili muttered, “He was a real man, he was a real man.” Be that as it may, four days later, the writers voted approval of a resolution condemning “Javakhishvili as an enemy of the people, spy and diversant [who] is to be expelled . . . and physically annihilated.” One friend, Geronti Kikodze, had the courage to walk out (and he would survive). Rayfield, “Death of Paolo Iashvili,” 660; Rayfield, Stalin and His Hangmen, 344; Rayfield, Literature of Georgia, 269.

81. Pasternak, Essay in Autobiography 110; Rayfield, “Pasternak and the Georgians”; Rayfield, Literature of Georgia, 262–3. Beria also stripped Tbilisi University of its professors, including the papyrologist and classical scholar Grigol Tsereteli.

82. Rayfield, “Death of Paolo Iashvili,” 636, 647; Rayfield, Literature of Georgia, 247. Countless others were executed, including Dimitri Shevardnadze, a painter who had established the country’s national gallery in 1920 (and had co-designed the emblem of Georgia’s Menshevik-dominated republic of 1918–1921); he had led opposition to a proposal by Beria to tear down Tbilisi’s ancient Metekhi Church (which would survive).

83. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 16–9, 20 (Mikoyan and Beria to Stalin Jan. 5, 1937). These are documents from the former Communist Party Archive, Georgian Affiliate of the Institute of Marxism-Leninism, Tbilisi (f. 14, op. 11, korobka 18, d. 152: telegrammy, poslannye na imia sekretaria TsK VKP [b] rov. Stalina).

84. Beria had asked Molotov for 33,000 more tons, and received an answer from Molotov’s aid (Antipov) that Georgia would have to make do within its existing allocation. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 31 (Feb. 4, 1937), 40 (May 5, 1937), 47–8 (May 22, 1937).

85. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 41–5 (May 9, 1937).

86. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 61–3 (Beria to Stalin and Molotov, July 31, 1937).

87. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 58–9, 66, 73–5 (Sept. 1, 1937). In Sept. 1937 Beria wrote to Stalin asking for additional kerosene, complaining of severe shortages and queues because of central cutbacks in supplies to the republic. Demand, he wrote, was increasing as a result of the return of students to Tbilisi and provincial capitals for the academic year. In Oct. 1937, he wrote to Stalin and Molotov about failures to deliver planned supplies of gasoline, complaining that the Azerbaijan oil distribution company was sending Georgia’s allotments to Moscow. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 76–7, 88–9.

88. Zen’kovich, Marshaly i genseki, 194–5. See also Kremlev, Beriia, 84–5.

89. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 252–5 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 315, l. 24–42).

90. Six others stood in the same trial. Zaria vostoka, July 11, 1937; Conquest, Reassessment, 225. There is a story that Mdivani told his interrogators at Metekhi: “Being shot is not enough punishment for me; I need to be quartered! It was me who brought the 11th Army here. I betrayed my people and helped Stalin and Beria, these degenerates, enslave Georgia and bring Lenin’s party to its knees.” Antonov-Ovsenko, Beriia, 27.

91. The trial was staged Sept. 24, 1937, in Batum’s House of the Red Army. Junge and Bonwetsch, Bolshevistskii poriadok, II: 293–9 (Arkhiv MVD Gruzii, 2-i otdel, f. 14, op. 11, d. 106, l. 61–6).

92. The trial took place on Nov. 3, 1937, in the Drama Theater. RGANI, f. 89, op. 48, d. 5; APRF, Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 27; Abkhazia, 433–40. See also Delba, “Besposhchadno borot’sia s vragami naroda,” 427–30. See also Sovetskaiia Abkhazia, Nov. 3, 1937; Marykhba, Moskovskie arkhivnye, 12–5, 26–7 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 18, d. 104, l. 15–7; op. 3, d. 993, l. 3).

93. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 71–2. See also Zaria vostoka, Aug. 26, 1937.

94. Ocherki istorii Kommunisticheskoi partii Armenii, 387; Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 586. On Aug. 19, 1937, Sahak Ter-Gabrielyan, former head of the Armenian Council of People’s Commissars, died, apparently throwing himself out the fourth floor window of the Lubyanka. For another version, see Matossian, Impact of Soviet Policies, 158.

95. Agrba would be executed April 21, 1938. Zakhar Suleimanovich Agrba, the director of the Abkhaz theater, was also arrested and executed.

96. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 583.

97. Ocherki istorii Kommunisticheskoi partii Armenii, 387; Tucker, Stalin in Power, 488–9.

98. Blauvelt, “March of the Chekists.” Beria wrote to Stalin to request authorization to strengthen defenses on the border with Turkey, reacting quickly after a central decree had ordered such strengthening in Central Asia on the borders with Iran and Afghanistan. Beria understood not to push too far: in one draft telegram to Stalin, he changed the phrase “the Georgia Central Committee proposes” to “requests” when seeking to escape a new decree by the railroad commissariat. Beria also reported to Stalin that Artyomi Geurkov, the former party boss of Ajaria, had shot himself in his apartment, leaving a letter to Beria (which he forwarded) admitting his guilt, perhaps to try to protect family members (“I should be punished, I am doing this myself, perhaps in excess”). Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 78–9 (Sept. 26, 1937), 80–1 (Sept. 1937), 82–4 (Oct. 1, 1937).

⁹⁹ Rayfield, Literature of Georgia, 270; Rayfield, “Death of Paolo Iashvili,” 663. Back on Oct. 30, 1937, Beria had written to Stalin that of the 12,000-plus people arrested, only 7,374 had had their cases decided, leaving some 5,000 in overcrowded prisons, because the traveling military collegium from Moscow was busy going around to various locations; Beria requested permission for a special collegium of the Georgian court to determine sentences. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 415–6 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 212, l. 137–9); Junge and Bonwetsch, Bolshevistskii poriadok, II: 23–4 (Arkhiv MVD Gruzii, 2–I otdel, f. 14, op. 11, d. 152, l. 171–3). Beria staged what would turn out to be his final show trial in Tbilisi, which resulted in executions for “wreckers” at the Georgian Animal Husbandry Institute. Zaria vostoka, Jan. 25, 1938.

¹⁰⁰ Beria had sought Stalin’s permission to hold a plenum of the Soviet writers’ union in Tbilisi in honor of the Rustaveli celebrations: Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 56–7 (Beria to Stalin, May 31, 1937). Vsevolod Vishnevsky did a radio broadcast from Gori on Dec. 26, 1937, briefly narrating its thirteen centuries of history and describing a visit to Stalin’s birth hovel. Gorიაeva, “Veilkaia kniga dnia,” 317–21 (RGALI, f. 1038, op. 1, d. 1181, l. 8–15).

¹⁰¹ In absolute terms, this was third highest, after the Russian and Ukrainian republics. Avalishvili, “Great Terror”; <http://stalin.memo.ru/images/note1957.htm>.

¹⁰² Georgia’s list for the proposed mass operations (NKVD 00447), sent to Yezhov and Frinovsky in Moscow on July 8, 1937, contained 1,419 names in first category (execution) and 1,562 in second (Gulag). An additional 2,000 people were said to be members of former political parties in the republic. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 166, d. 588, l. 36. The NKVD quotas for Georgia were set at 2,000 (first) and 3,000 (second). APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 212, l. 55–78. The Georgia troika would assemble in Goglidze’s office, usually around midnight until 4:00 a.m., and work through 100 to 150 “cases” in a session, spending two minutes or so on each. Junge and Bonwetsch, Bolshevistskii poriadok, II: 411–28 (Arkhiv MVD Gruzii, 1–i otdel, f. vosstanovlenykh del G. Mamuliya: I. Takahadze, Jan. 8, 1957).

¹⁰³ Junge and Bonwetsch, Bolshevistskii poriadok, I: 68, 71, 75, 81, 95, 200.

¹⁰⁴ Esaiaashvili, Ocherki istorii Kommunisticheskoi partii Gruzii, II: 160 (partarkhiv GF IML, f. 14, op. 40, d. 35, l. 13–4), 163.

¹⁰⁵ “Beria as a literary critic,” quipped Rayfield, “had been successful beyond the dreams of most critics: every writer he had disapproved of had ceased to write.” Rayfield, Literature of Georgia, 262–3.

¹⁰⁶ Already by this date, Beria reported to Stalin that more than 12,000 people had been arrested, of which 7,374 had been convicted, 5,236 extrajudicially (by troika). Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 95–7 (Oct. 30–31, 1937).

¹⁰⁷ Overall in Georgia, nearly 20,000 new members would join the party between Nov. 1936 and March 1939. Almost half were children of functionaries. XVIII s’ezd Vsesoiuznoi Kommunisticheskoi partii (b), 577.

¹⁰⁸ Among the targets were immigrants to Armenia: more than 40,000 ethnic Armenians had returned from Asia and Europe in the period 1921–1936, and many now met a grim fate. Melkonian, “Repressions in 1930s Soviet Armenia.” The decapitation at the top was roughly similar in Azerbaijan, under Bagirov: 22 people’s commissars, 49 county party secretaries, 29 chairmen of local soviet executive committees, 57 directors of factories, 95 engineers, 110 military men, 207 trade unionists, and 8 professors were arrested and, in the majority of cases, executed. And that was just in 1937. Ismailov, “1937.” See also Ocherki istorii Kommunisticheskoi partii Azerbaizhdzhan.

¹⁰⁹ Teplakov, Mashina terrora, 599.

¹¹⁰ Stephan, “‘Cleansing’ the Soviet Far East,” 51–3. The Soviet Far East was the fastest-growing region in terms of population in the Russian republic, doubling between 1926 and 1939. Stephan, Russian Far East, 185.

¹¹¹ In 1938, 98 percent of the troika sentences in Ukraine were death; in Georgia, 68 percent. Georgia was not a land of exile or giant Gulag camps with which to pad or exceed quotas. It was, however, rich in members of former non-Bolshevik parties. Junge and Bonwetsch, Bolshevistskii poriadok, II: 55, 77.

¹¹² Beria wrote to Stalin and Molotov seeking authorization to shut down the prestigious Sukhum Subtropical Institute and instead to transform a department at Georgia’s Agricultural Institute into the new de facto all-Union institution for training subtropical agronomists. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 36–7 (April 21, 1937). The Abkhazia Subtropical institute, as it had originally been known, had been opened in 1926 and six years later was designated an all-Union Institute. Anchbadze et al., Istoriia Abkhazskoi ASSR, 155; Blauvelt, “‘From Words to Action!’” 252.

113. Abkhazskaia oblastnaia organizatsiia, 25–56.

114. Grdzeldidze, Mezhnatsional'noe obshechenie, 102–3. Ethnic Abkhaz in the Communist party of Abkhazia fell from 28.3 to 18.5 percent over a single year (1929–30); the high water mark thereafter was 21.8 percent in 1936. In 1939, Abkhaz were down to just over 15 percent in their own party.

115. Ajarians had been designated “Muslim Georgians” under the tsars. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 104–5; Junge and Bonwetsch, Bolshevistskii poriadok, II: 67–8 (Arkhiv MVD Gruzii, 2–I ordel, f. 14, op. 11, d. 152, l. 169, 188; Jan. 5, 1937). Beria would sacrifice the boss of the Abkhaz NKVD, Grigory Pauchiliya (b. 1904), an ethnic Georgian whom he had promoted from the NKVD sports team Dynamo.

116. Iskanderov, Ocherki, 540–3. Bagirov initially had sought to impose limits. “Some people are not against demonstrating their ‘orthodoxy’ by firing from work the wives of those arrested, sisters-in-law, relatives,” he told a congress of soviets in Azerbaijan in March 1937. “Pardon me, please, this is not correct. This means arousing greater dissatisfaction, greater anger. This means increasing the number of enemies of Soviet power. Where are they supposed to go? We cannot leave them to starve.” Ismailov, Istoria “bol'shogo terora,” 72–3 (citing APD UDP AR, f. 1, op. 88, d. 137, l. 1), 73–4 (l. 8–9; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 20, l. 131–2), 92–3 (citing APD UDP AR, f. 1, op. 77, d. 101, l. 98).

117. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 380 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 57, l. 99).

118. Ismailov, Istoria “bol'shogo terora,” 145–8 (citing APD UDP AR, f. 1, op. 88, d. 137, l. 1), 73–4 (l. 8–9; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 20, l. 131–2).

119. For some, Khrushchev's rise presented a mystery. “I took part in the Moscow city party committee meeting, at which we were given instructions . . . Khrushchev's speech was confused and chaotic,” Aleksandr Solovyov had recorded in his diary (Dec. 14, 1931). “It is incomprehensible how he got to that position, obtuse and narrow minded as he is.” On Jan. 28, 1932, Solovyov privately added following Khrushchev's promotion: “I am, like many others, astonished at Khrushchev's rapid rise. He did very badly in his studies at the Industrial Academy. But he has won the sympathy of his classmates . . . He is an incredibly obtuse man. And a frightful bootlicker.” Kozlov, Neizvestnaia Rossiia, IV: 170–1.

120. Kolman, My ne dolzhny byli tak zhit', 192. A reporter for Vechernaia Moskva, A. V. Khrabovitsky, would recall: “I always saw Khrushchev together with Kaganovich. Kaganovich was the active, powerful one, whereas all I ever heard Khrushchev saying was, ‘Yes, Lazar Moiseyevich,’ ‘Right, Lazar Moiseyevich.’” Medvedev, All Stalin's Men, 124–5.

121. Dmitrii Shepilov, in Vostryshev, Moskva stalinskaia, 365.

122. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 112–5 (reference to D. Rabinovich and I. Finkel).

123. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 132–4, 145–7; Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 127–9, 138–40; Chuev, Tak govoril Kaganovich, 99; Taubman, Khrushchev, 103–4, 114–7; Na prieme, 227–9. See also Borys, “Who Ruled the Soviet Ukraine in Stalin's Time?” A blithe absence of genuine concern from Stalin was evident in another favorite, the peasant-born Andreyev, who as a young man back in 1920–22 had voted for Trotsky's platform in the trade union debate. During the June 1937 sessions of the Main Military Council, Stalin was seated next to Andreyev, pointed to him, and stated that “he had been a very active Trotskyite in 1921.” “Which Andreyev?” a voice interjected. “Andrei Andreyevich Andreyev, Central Committee Secretary,” Stalin answered, adding that Andreyev had “disarmed” and “is fighting the Trotskyites very well.” Istochnik, 1994, no. 3: 74.

124. That included both Moscow and Ukraine. Makarova, “Stalin i ‘blizhnyi krug,’” 301.

125. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 995, l. 5.

126. Borys, “Who Ruled the Soviet Ukraine in Stalin's Time?”, 230.

127. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 139–40.

128. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 184; Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 178–80.

129. Mikoyan later wrote that “Khrushchev made a career for himself in Moscow literally within a couple of years. As for how and why—it was because almost everybody else had been put in prison in the meantime. Besides, Khrushchev had Aliluyeva as his patron. They met at the Industrial Academy where Khrushchev was active in fighting against the opposition. It was then that he became secretary of the district party committee. He finally got onto the Central Committee over others' dead bodies, as it were.” Mikoian, Tak bylo, 614.

- ¹³⁰. This was formalized in a politburo decree on Feb. 17, 1938: RGASPI, f. 17, op., 162, d. 22, l. 127.
- ¹³¹. Yezhov's orders were dated Feb. 26 and March 3, 1938. Uspensky, for his part, told one of the newly appointed provincial NKVD chiefs under him, "all Germans and Poles living in Ukraine are spies and saboteurs." Kuromiya and Peplowski, "The Great Terror," 650 (citing Z arkhiviv VUCHK-HPU-NKVD-KHB, 1998, no. 1–2: 215).
- ¹³². Leplyovsky was transferred to NKVD transport; he would be arrested on April 26, 1938, and "confessed" that he had been a plotter since 1930, when he had helped mount the Springtime case against former tsarist officers. Naumov, Stalin i NKVD, 515–21. The last person connected with the Tukhachevsky trial, Marshal Blyukher, would be arrested on Oct. 22, 1938.
- ¹³³. Na prieme, 220 (Sept. 21, 1937).
- ¹³⁴. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 418–9. At a Jan. 24–25, 1938, gathering of NKVD central and regional bosses, several requested extensions for the mass operations. Yezhov goaded them on, indirectly invoking Stalin. Frinovsky interrupted the speech of Grigory Gorbach, Mironov's successor as NKVD chief in Western Siberia, "Have you heard? Fifty-five thousand arrested! Bravo Gorbach! There's a star (molodets)!" Both Yezhov and Frinovsky ominously warned that additional enemies were lurking in NKVD ranks. "We have provinces where the local GB apparatus has not been touched at all." Danilov et al., Tragediia Sovetskoi derevni, Vlii: 548; Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 241–2 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 13, l. 358–9, 280); Pavliukov, Ezhov, 348–55.
- ¹³⁵. Of the 204 special reports from the locales during the second half of July 1938 concerning the "struggle against counterrevolutionary elements," Uspensky was responsible for more than thirty. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 243–5 (TsA FSB, f. 3 os, op. 6, d. 4, l. 31–4; op. 5, d. 63); Shapoval et al., ChK-GPU-NKVD, 173–4.
- ¹³⁶. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 364–5 (TsA FSB, H-15301, t. 9, l. 100–2).
- ¹³⁷. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 359–62; RGASPI, f. 560, op. 1, d. 10, l. 38 (Zhabokritsky).
- ¹³⁸. Vasilev et al., Politicheskoe rukovodstvo Ukrainy, 35–47 (TsDAGOU, f. 1, d. 548, l. 1–105; June 13, 1938).
- ¹³⁹. Slutsky was in the Little Corner once in 1935, three times in 1936, and twice in 1937 (the last time on July 5, for twenty minutes). Na prieme, 705.
- ¹⁴⁰. Galina would later deny that this was her half-brother: V. Nechaev, "Vnuchka Stalina 'o belykh piatniakh v istorii svoei sem'i," Argumenty i fakty, Nov. 3, 1999.
- ¹⁴¹. Orlov, Secret History, 231–2, 237–8.
- ¹⁴². Pavliukov, Ezhov, 362–71 (citing TsA FSB, sledstvennoe delo No. N-15302, III: 100, XI: 184, Frinovsky testimony, Uspensky testimony); Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 81–2 (citing TsA FSB, sledstvennoe delo No. N-15301, t. 3, l. 117–23). Also in April 1938, an NKVD passport decree denied individuals the ability to determine their nationality and thus, from the regime's point of view, to hide behind a false front: rather, the determination would be derived from the nationality of one's parents. If mother and father were of different nations, both were inscribed in the passport. The decree aimed to "unmask" people, particularly in border regions, who had co-nationals abroad and were concealing their true nationality. Hirsch, Empire of Nations, 275, 294 (GARF, f. 7523, op. 65, d. 304, l. 1).
- ¹⁴³. For example, the June 16, 1937, reception given by Latvia for its foreign minister would be attended by Molotov, Litvinov, Mikoyan, Budyonny and Yegorov, and Kerzhentsev. Pravda, June 18, 1937. On July 10, 1937, a breakfast given by the Swedish foreign minister would be attended by Voroshilov, Kaganovich, Chubar, Rukhimovich, and Bulganin. Pravda, July 11, 1937.
- ¹⁴⁴. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 773, l. 1 (December 8, 1932); Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh sem'i, 159–60 (Nov. 4, 1934); Deviatov et al., Blizhnaiia, 88.
- ¹⁴⁵. Duggan, Fascist Voices, 319–24.
- ¹⁴⁶. "Recently I have been dreaming about you a lot, perhaps, I don't know, that is what stimulated me to write to you," wrote Rakhil Dizik, a pedagogue of the Moscow region, in an undated letter, evidently from the 1930s, that mentioned her Communist Youth League membership and desire to get to know him better. Stalin returned her letter and accompanying photo with a note: "Comrade Unknown! I ask you to believe me that I have no desire to insult you . . . But all the same I must say that I am without the opportunity [no time!] to satisfy your wish. I wish you all the best." "Tovarishch neznakomaia": iz perezpiski I. V. Stalina."

^{147.} Another service woman, who would be rumored to be Stalin's mistress, the housekeeper Varvara Istomina [née Zhbychkina, b. 1917], would be assigned to the Near Dacha only in 1946. Deviatov et al., Blizhniaia, 384. The top service position at the Nearby Dacha was held by Matryona "Motya" Butuzova.

^{148.} The occasion, Aug. 18, 1938, was Aviation Day, one of the country's most important holidays. Rybin, Stalin v oktiabre, 18–9; Rybin, Stalin na fronte, 41; Turchenko, "Zhenschiny diktatora." Rybin gives her name as Rusudan Jordaniya (Rybin, Stalin v oktiabre) and as Ruzadan Pachkoriya (Rybin, Stalin na fronte).

^{149.} Vlasik had served in the tsarist army in the Great War, then in the Red Army, soon joining the Cheka, and worked under Pauker from 1926 in the operative department as part of the elite bodyguard corps. On Nov. 19, 1938 (in an appointment signed by both Yezhov and Beria), Vlasik took command of the First Department (bodyguards) in the Main Directorate of State Security (GUGB) (the Kremlin Commandantura of State Security went to N. K. Spiridonov). GARF, f. R-9401, op. 1, d. 1623, l. 157. On Dec. 27, 1938, Vlasik was promoted from senior major to commissar of state security, third level: GARF, f. R-9401, op. 57, d. 1625, l. 273, 76. Like his nemesis Beria, Vlasik would move into a private mansion on Moscow's innermost ring road.

^{150.} Elagin, Ukroshchenie iskustu, 328.

^{151.} Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 289 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 82, l. 51), 304 (TsA FSB, f. 66, op. 1, d. 391, l. 55).

^{152.} Kuromiya and Peplowski, "The Great Terror," 665 (citing RGVA, f. 308k, op. 3, d. 456, l. 37, and Archiwum akt nowych Warsaw, Sztab Główny, 616/249: Dec. 10–13, 1937).

^{153.} Japanese consulates remained at Vladivostok, Petrovavlovsk, Okha, and Aleksandrovsk; Manchukuo, Japan's puppet state, maintained consulates in Chita and Blagoveshchensk.

^{154.} Stephan, Russian Far East, 207.

^{155.} Na prieme, 216 (July 28, 1937); Coox, "Lesser of Two Hells, Part 1," 151.

^{156.} Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 16.

^{157.} Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol'shaia chistka, 254.

^{158.} Petrov and Petrov, Empire of Fear, 74–5. Petrov wrongly gives the date for Lyushkov in Rostov as 1938, instead of 1937.

^{159.} On July 17, 1937, Balytsky wrote a confession to Yezhov of his involvement in a conspiracy, which Frinovsky forwarded to Stalin on July 21; Stalin underlined several passages and wrote: "discuss with Yezhov." Balytsky had refused to confess only three days earlier. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 257–8 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 316, l. 8–12).

^{160.} Na prieme, 216. Lyushkov was received in the company of Yezhov, Molotov, and Voroshilov. It was Lyushkov's one recorded visit to the Little Corner.

^{161.} Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 234–5 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 321, l. 11; op. 58, d. 405, l. 175).

^{162.} Pravda, Dec. 20, 1937; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 368–73 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 254, l. 203–15).

^{163.} Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol'shaia chistka, 79.

^{164.} Ethnic Chinese had comprised 13 percent of the Russian Far East population in 1911, but would fall to under 1 percent as of 1939. Stephan, Russian Far East, 213; Coox, "L'Affaire Lyushkov," 416. In 1938, the NKVD took inventory of all Chinese in the Soviet Far East with the idea of forcing anyone remaining to emigrate to Xinjiang or resettle in Kazakhstan. But on June 10, 1938, only those who wanted to relocate had to do so, and many Chinese under arrest were released and allowed to go to China. Yezhov informed the NKVD in the Soviet Far East that the USSR was following "friendly relations with China." Pobel' and Polian, Stalinskie deportatsii, 103–4.

^{165.} Merritt, "Great Purges," 456–7.

^{166.} Not including Yagoda, who was general commissar (equivalent to marshal), there were three levels of commissar of state security: first rank, second rank, third rank. Frinovsky held a military rank [komkor]. Two of these state security commissars would survive to 1941. Naumov, Stalin i NKVD (2010), 74–5; Pavliukov, Ezhov, 426.

^{167.} Yezhov supposedly directed Frinovsky to instruct Lyushkov to commit suicide if he were to be recalled to Moscow. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 160 (citing TsA FSB, ASD Frinovskogo, N-15301, t. 2: 173).

- 168. The second Order of Lenin came on Feb. 23, 1938, Red Army Day. Conquest, Inside Stalin's Secret Police, 90.
- 169. Svetlanin, Dal'nevostochnyi zagovor, 92 (referring to a conversation with Blyukher's political adjutant Semyon Kladko, whom the author ran into in Moscow in mid-Aug. 1938). On July 10, 1937, Stalin received a letter from Blyukher addressed to Voroshilov, in which the Far Eastern marshal rebuked those who had organized his meeting in July 1936 with visiting communications commissar Rykov, blaming the arrested former Far Eastern party boss Kartvelishvili-Lavrentyev. But Blyukher also attacked Vareikis for passing on different information to the Center. Stalin kept Blyukher's self-justification in his personal archive. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 205–6 (APRF, d. 313, l. 146–8).
- 170. Blyukher, "S. Vasiliiem Konstantinovichem Bliukherom," 80.
- 171. Coox, "Lesser of Two Hells, Part 1," 158.
- 172. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 422–4 (citing TsA FSB, seldstvennoe delo N-15302, t. 10, l. 169, 175), 428.
- 173. Haslam, Threat from the East, 94 (citing DDF, 2e série, IX: 613–5, May 3, 1938).
- 174. The despot elaborated "that it was the ultimate objective of the Japanese to capture the whole of Siberia as far as Lake Baikal," yet he made clear that "the Soviet Union would not, however, intervene in the war." U.S. ambassador William Bullitt, relating a conversation with Sun Fo (the envoy who spoke to Stalin): FRUS, 1938, III: 165.
- 175. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 58, l. 21–4, 33–4 (May 14, 1938).
- 176. Soviet Naval Commissar Pyotr Smirnov, who co-signed the warning, was sent to the Soviet Far East at this time. Coox, "Lesser of Two Hells, Part 2," 87.
- 177. Svetlanin, Dal'nevostochnyi zagovor, 105. Between May 28 and June 8, 1938, the Main Military Council in Moscow, with Stalin in attendance, resolved, among multiple agenda items in connection with the Far Eastern Army, "to purge the command-political cadres of enemies of the people, doubtful and morally debased elements." All ethnic Germans, Poles, Latvians, Estonians, Koreans, Lithuanians, Romanians, Turks, Hungarians, and Bulgarians in the Far Eastern Army's ranks were to be immediately discharged. Glavnyi voennyi sovet RKKA, 84–5.
- 178. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 427 (according to the then head of bodyguards, Dagin).
- 179. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 160–1 (citing TsA FSB, ASD Frinovskogo, N-15301, t. 2: 179).
- 180. It was said that Lyushkov had dispatched his twenty-seven-year-old wife, Nina, and their eleven-year-old adopted daughter, who needed a medical operation, to Moscow, with a secret plan for them to escape to Poland by train; to signal this plan was working, Nina was to send her regards by telegram. The telegram supposedly arrived. Whether this actually happened or was an invention by Lyushkov to put himself in a better light for having tried to save rather than abandon his family is unclear. It was also said that the Japanese used their "sources" to try to trace the fate of wife and daughter but without success; Lyushkov never saw or heard from his wife and daughter again. (His mother and sister were also arrested.) Nina was sentenced to eight years and incarcerated in a camp in Karaganda (Akmolinsk), survived, and was released in summer 1946. Coox, "L'Affaire Lyushkov," 410; Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol'shaia chistka, 129.
- 181. Na prieme, 237; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 161; Glavnyi voennyi sovet RKKA, 110n1.
- 182. RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 102, l. 54–6 (Soviet intelligence translation of Lyushkov's remarks); Pavliukov, Ezhov, 429–31; Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 183.
- 183. Coox, "Lesser of Two Hells, Part 2," 83.
- 184. Coox, "Lesser of Two Hells, Part 1," 176.
- 185. Coox, "Lesser of Two Hells, Part 1," 153.
- 186. Coox, "Lesser of Two Hells, Part 2," 79–80, 86–8. According to Lyushkov, in March 1938, Stalin had even dispatched an envoy—known under the code name Major Yartsev—to investigate the possibility of repositioning the Pacific Fleet and bringing Sakhalin, where Japanese companies managed economic concessions, to a state of full military readiness, including the building of new air strips, which would be conspicuous. It seems that Japanese sea, air, and ground forces were to be lured to defending Southern Sakhalin. Yartsev was Boris Rybkin (see chap. 12, below).
- 187. Kahn, Codebreakers, 637; Goldman, "Spy Who Saved the Soviets."
- 188. According to Coox, for strictly military matters the Japanese preferred the information of artillery officer Major Frontyarmar Frantsevich, of the 36th Motorized Infantry Division, who had defected to the Japanese by motor car from Outer Mongolia two weeks before Lyushkov, on May 29, 1938. Coox, "L'Affaire Lyushkov," 418.

189. "I did not want to leave my country any more than a fish wants to leave water, but the delinquent activity of criminal people has cast me up like a fish on ice," Orlov wrote in a letter for Yezhov and Stalin hand-delivered to the Soviet embassy in Paris after he was safely gone. Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 308–12 (letter to Yezhov from NKVD file).

190. In 1938, a book in Spanish, Espionage in Spain (Barcelona: Ediciones Unidad), was published under the name Max Rieger, a member of Spain's Socialist party, which brought together vast incriminating materials on the POUM; it was quietly translated into Russian with a different title: Spanish Trotskyites in Franco's Service. The secret materials had not been assembled by the rank and file leftist, but under the direction of the NKVD's Orlov, who had assigned a journalist to write the text. POUM members were said to have been discovered in Franco's intelligence service after the capture of a top Franco agent. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 140–1, 144.

191. According to the official historical essays on Soviet intelligence, Orlov never divulged to the West the secrets he knew. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 146n1.

192. Merritt, "Great Purges," 500 (citing "Statistika antiarmeiskogo terrora," Voenno-istoricheskii arkhiv, 1997, no. 2: 105–12). Lyushkov told his interrogators that between July 1937 and May 1938, more than 4,000 Far Eastern Army personnel—1,200 officers and political commissars and 3,000 junior officers—were arrested, including almost all of Blyukher's immediate subordinates. Stephan, Russian Far East, 220 (citing U.S. Army Department, "The Interrogation of Lyushkov," frame 0982).

193. Stephan, Russian Far East, 234.

194. Kubeev, "Obrechennyy na kazn'," 93–4; Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol'shaia chistka, 133–4; Coox, "L'Affaire Lyushkov," 412.

195. A large-scale operation at Lake Khasan appeared in the Japanese army's plan for 1938. Savin, "O podgotovke Iaponii k napadeniiu na SSSR."

196. Coox, Anatomy of a Small War, 3–9; Coox, Nomonhan, 124; Ikuhiko, "Japanese-Soviet Confrontation," 140–57.

197. Solov'ev and Chugnuov, Pogranichnye voiska SSSR, doc. 623 (Colonel Fedotov).

198. This would be Lyushkov's one and only intentional public appearance. He would publish an "open letter to Stalin" in the Japanese periodical Kaizo (April 1939). Kaizo, April 1939: 106–25, excerpted in Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 681–6. For a detailed Japanese report on the July 13 public appearance, see Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, VII/i: 148–51 (TsKhIDK, f. 1, op. 3, 4 d. 4601, l. 210–6).

199. Solov'ev and Chugunov, Pogranichnye voiska SSSR, 591–3; "Prikaz narodnogo komissara oborony Soiuzu SSR no. 0040 (4 sentiabria 1938)."

200. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 161–2. See also Svetlanin, Dal'nevostochnyi zagovor, 124–6.

201. Far Eastern Affairs, 1990, no. 3: 176–84 (Ivan Minka); Merritt, "Great Purges," 513–5 (citing RGVA, f. 35083, op. 1, d. 3, l. 35, 67; f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1084, l. 37–8; RGASPI, f. 71, op. 25, d. 359, l. 1–2), 526 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1136, l. 10; f. 35083, op. 1, d. 28, l. 113–4).

202. On July 20, 1938, the Japanese ambassador, Mamoru Shigemitsu, paid a call on Litvinov and the two clashed sharply over maps; Litvinov also complained of penetration of Soviet embassy territory in Tokyo by a person who then flung leaflets: Tsiminets, Vnesniaia politika SSSR, IV: 369–71 (July 22, 1938).

203. A published Soviet assessment noted Japanese strength in traditional infantry, a low level of mechanization, rendering them unable to mount breakthrough operations, and a domestic Japanese aircraft industry that, despite access to foreign prototypes, was relatively weak by top international standards. The Soviets had a high opinion of Japanese prowess on the sea. Japanese cruisers were state of the art in speed and firepower; they even carried more torpedo tubes than their American counterparts. New Japanese battleships, moreover, were coming off the stocks. Shvede, Voennii flot Iaponii, 31–2. This assessment would be maintained in the next edition: Voenno-morskoii flot Iaponii (1939).

204. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 252 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 67, l. 28).

205. Coox, Nomonhan, 123–4; Haslam, Threat from the East, 113–4.

206. Coox, Anatomy of a Small War, 57–70; Coox, Nomonhan, 134–5. Sorge would report that “this incident will not lead to a war between the Soviet Union and Japan.” Volkov, “Legendy i deistvitel'nost' o Rikharde Zorge,” 100, referring to Toshito Obi, Zoruge jiken, 4 vols. (Tokyo: Misuzu Shobō, 1962–71), I: no page number.

207. Grebennik, Khasanskii dnevnik, 54–7.

208. Coox, Anatomy of a Small War.

209. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, VII/i: 146–7 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22383, d. 3, l. 185–6).

210. Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 87–9

211. Back on July 20, 1936, the then head of Soviet military intelligence (Uritsky) had written to Voroshilov about Sorge concerning a review of intelligence, which had indicated that German-Japanese negotiations for a military alliance were bogged down because of Germany's desire not to force the issue. Stalin had written on it: “In my view, this is a disorientation emanating from German circles.” Uritsky explained to Voroshilov that the inside knowledge had come primarily from Sorge, who “usually produced good quality information and not infrequently genuine secret documentary material. For example, we have now received from this intelligence operative a report of the German military attaché in Tokyo (sent to you separately). We were able to verify the genuineness of this report, having received analogous documents directly from the German general staff.” On the basis of additional materials, including decoded telegraph traffic between Berlin and Tokyo, Uritsky concluded firmly that Sorge was correct. “In presenting these interpretations and materials to you, I request your instructions about their further forwarding to comrade Stalin.” Voroshilov's response is unknown. (Uritsky, of course, was later executed as a foreign spy.) Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, VII/i: 141–2 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 3108, d. 3, l. 239–41).

212. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/1: 273 (citing TsGASA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1140, l. 18–22); Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 327–8; Kortunova, “1938–I,” 175.

213. Shigemitsu made the suggestion to Litvinov in person on the evening of Aug. 4, 1938: Tisminets, Vnesniaia politika SSSR, IV: 373–5. The next day Soviet intelligence reported to Moscow that Kung Hsianghsi of the Chinese secret service, a stogie-smoking seventy-fifth generation descendant of Confucius, had pledged China's unconditional support to the USSR in the conflict with Japan. Ganin, who met Kung and wrote the report, inquired whether he should convey the information he had received to the Soviet foreign affairs commissariat. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, VII/i: 97–9 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1114, l. 324–8).

214. Sorge repeated that appraisal on Aug. 10: Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 91–2; Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, VII/i: 147–8 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22383, d. 3, l. 198–9).

215. DVP SSSR, XXI: 433–4 (Aug. 11, 1938).

216. Coox, Nomonhan, 138 (quoting Inada), 140–1.

217. MacKinnon, “Tragedy of Wuhan”; MacKinnon, Wuhan.

218. DGFP, series C, VI: 337–8, 396–7; von Weizsäcker, Memoirs, 126–7; Presseisen, Germany and Japan, 126–7.

219. Cherepanov, Zapiski voenno sovetnika, 323–3; Kaliagin, Po neznakomym dorogam, 92n, 282.

220. “Problems of War Strategy” (Nov. 6, 1938), reprinted in Tse-tung, Selected Military Writings, 269–85 (at 269, 273).

221. Goldman, Nomonhan, 1939, 76–7.

222. Krivosheev, Soviet Casualties, 47–51; Coox, Nomonhan, 132.

223. Blyukher, “S Vasiliiem Konstantinovichem Bliukherom,” 84–7. See also Erickson, Soviet High Command, 498–9.

224. Konev, when queried after World War II, would judge Blyukher a man of the past unsuited to modern warfare. “Besedy s marshalom Sovetskogo Soiuza I. S. Konevym,” in Simonov, Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia, 304–5.

225. One example was Mikhail Viktorov (Novoselov), newly named as NKVD chief in Sverdlovsk, who turned up a shocking state of affairs, even by standards of the terror, in the work of his predecessor (Dmitriev). Viktorov freed a large number of prisoners and sent Lubyanka a long analysis of local falsifications of cases. Pavliukov, Ezhbo, 444–5 (citing TsA FSB, sledstvennoe delo no. R-24334, t. 1, l. 67–8). Viktorov would be arrested on Jan. 22, 1939, and sentenced to fifteen years; he died in a camp in 1950.

226. RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1075, l. 57–63.

- 227. Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 229.
- 228. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 86 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 364, l. 155). Chubar would be arrested on July 4, 1938, and executed on Feb. 26, 1939; Beria would get his dacha.
- 229. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 538–41.
- 230. According to the memoirs of D. N. Sukhanov (b. 1904), an aide to Malenkov, dated March 6, 1993, Stalin had asked Malenkov for files on people who could be appointed to replace Yezhov as commissar of state security. Sukhanov claims he looked through the nomenklatura lists and selected as the finalists Beria, Kruglov, Pegov, Kuznetsov, and Gusarov. Malenkov's son said seven names were submitted to Stalin, who chose Beria. Hoover Archives, Volkogonov papers, container 13, excerpted Sukhanov memoirs (dated March 6, 1993); Malenkov, O moem otse, 34. Pavliukov has Malenkov asking his aide V. A. Donskoi to compile the list, not Sukhanov.
- 231. Another report (July 21, 1938) outlined the dubious leadership style and methods of Beria and Dekanozov. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 164–5, citing APRF, f. 57, op. 1, d. 264; f. 3, op. 24, d. 463, l. 236–7. Rumors circulated that Yezhov ordered Beria's arrest in July 1938, and that Beria was tipped off and flew to Moscow to see Stalin. The rumors were bunk. Jansen and Petrov, Stalin's Loyal Executioner, 149. See also Goldshtein, Tochka opory, II: 34–5 and Knight, Beria, 87–8.
- 232. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 355–9 (RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 265, l. 16–26ob.).
- 233. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 452, citing TsA FSB, sledstvennoe delo, N-15302, t. 7, l. 180.
- 234. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 451, citing TsA FSB, sledstvennoe delo, N-15302, t. 10, l. 163; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 163, citing TsA FSB, f. 3–os, op. 6, d. 3, l. 316–7.
- 235. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 179–80. Beria might have told Khrushchev afterward; Khrushchev might have been invited to the meal afterward at the dacha and heard there.
- 236. According to Malenkov's son, Stalin phoned Malenkov: “You wrote this yourself?” “Yes, I wrote it.” “This is what you think?” “Yes, I think this.” Malenkov, O moem otse, 33.
- 237. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 179–80.
- 238. RGANI, f. 5, op. 30, d. 4, l. 94–5; Knight, Beria, 88.
- 239. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 165, citing TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 92, l. 23.
- 240. Of course, by letting good slave laborers go, the camps would be left with the worst, rendering them unable to fulfill their assigned economic tasks. Vostryshnev, Moskva stalinskaia, 376; the politburo decree would be issued on June 10, 1939 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 25, l. 54–5), and formalized by the Supreme Soviet presidium on June 15.
- 241. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 167 (no citation). Frinovsky's advice was for Yezhov to stop moping and prevent Beria from implanting all his people in the NKVD. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 457–8, TsA FSB, sledstvennoe delo, no. N-15302, l. 10, l. 59; RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 265, l. 24.
- 242. Frinovsky testified that on Aug. 27–28, 1938, Yevdokimov, Yezhov's deputy in water transport, called and asked him to come to his apartment. “Verify whether Zakovsky has been shot and whether all the Yagoda people have been shot, because with Beria's arrival the investigations of these cases could be resumed and these cases could be turned against us.” Zakovsky, Lev Mironov, and others had been shot on Aug. 26–27. http://www.hrono.ru/dokum/193_dok/19390413beria.php (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 373, l. 3–44: protocol of Frinovsky interrogation, Beria to Stalin, April 11, 1939); Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 247 (TsA FSB, ASD p-4406). Yevdokimov would be arrested Nov. 9, 1938.
- 243. Rybin, Riadom so Stalinym, 73. See also Medvedev, Let History Judge, 587.
- 244. “People have completely stopped trusting each other,” Mikhail Prishvin, the writer, noted in his diary in Oct. 1937. “They go about their work and do not even whisper to one another. There is a huge mass of people raised up from poor social backgrounds who have nothing to whisper about: they just think ‘That's how it should be.’ Others isolate themselves to whisper, or study the art of silence.” Prishvin, Dnevnik, IX: 762–3.
- 245. The incident took place in summer 1937. Zaporozhets, “Iz vospominaniia,” 532–8 (the old friend, Zaporozhets' stepfather, was Pavel Dorofeyev).
- 246. Mandelstam, Hope against Hope, 108.
- 247. Pis'mennyi, “Ia iskrenne veril Stalinu . . .” 10.

248. Scott, Behind the Urals, 195. See also Rittersporn, "Omnipresent Conspiracy," 112 (citing Smolensk party archives).

249. Davies, Popular Opinion, 124.

250. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 995, l. 17 (Feb. 3, 1938). "As a rule, not one operational meeting, which were called often in Rostov, took place without a grandiose drinking bout, a total debauch, lasting sometimes twenty-four hours or more," complained one subordinate of the North Caucasus boss Yevdokimov. "There were cases when we found some operatives only on the third or fourth day somewhere in a tavern or with a prostitute." In Kazakhstan, the predecessor of NKVD chief Vasily Karutsky had actually been removed for corruption; Karutsky, a heavy drinker, maintained a harem (his wife committed suicide). Balytsky in Ukraine cohabited with the wives of subordinates, emulating tsarist-era lords of the manor who slept with the wives of house serfs and field hands. Tumshis, "Eshche raz o kadrakh chekistov," 190–1 (I. Ia. Ilin); Shapoval and Zolotar'ov, Vsevolod, 268, 337; Iakovenko, Agnesa, 55. Prime objects for liaisons were the wives of those arrested who sought information about their husbands or other favors, and were given false promises.

251. Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 22–4. Shreider claims he and his wife were frequent guests at Ostrovsky's dacha.

252. Afinogenov, Dnevnik, 481. Afinogenov had been criticized for excessively complex characters lacking obvious heroism, and in April 1937 he was expelled from the writers' union. Despite his reprieve in 1938, his plays were mothballed. Literaturnaia gazeta, May 1, 1937; Hellbeck, "Writing the Self in the Time of Terror," 69–93.

253. Stalin never cared for the popular front, but long-standing popular-frontists such as Dimitrov, Manuilsky, and Kuusinen survived, while anti-Popular Frontists, such as Kun, Knorin, and Pyatnitsky, were destroyed. Stalin badmouthed Manuilsky ("strictly a lightweight") to Dimitrov, while using him to maintain surveillance on Dimitrov. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 105 (April 26, 1939).

254. "Muzhstvo protiv bezzakoniia," Problemy mira i sotsializma, 1989, no. 7: 89–91 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 73, d. 60, l. 1–5). Varga was Jewish (at a time when Jews were being targeted), not a youth (at a time when long-time functionaries were targeted), and had once associated with the "renegade" Kautsky. See also Duda, Jenő Varga; Mommen, Stalin's Economist.

255. Yegorov had been removed as deputy defense commissar on Jan. 25, 1938. That same day, Pavel Dybenko was removed as commander of the Leningrad military district, soon transferred to the forestry commissariat, then, on Feb. 26, 1938, arrested. He was accused not only of the customary espionage but of using state funds for alcohol-fueled orgies, and, on July 29, 1938, was executed. By contrast, on March 2, 1938, at a confrontation with the arrested Belov, Graynov, Grinko, and Sedyakin, Yegorov was said to have performed well. Still, his wife was pronounced a Polish spy and he was expelled from the Central Committee although not arrested. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 465–6 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 330, l. 112–3), 456–7 (l. 113), 490 (d. 338, l. 4). Every officer acquired a damning dossier as a traitor, including Shaposhnikov, Timoshenko, Zhukov, and Vasilevsky, but they were not touched. Cherushev, "Nevinovnykh ne byvaet . . .," 382–3.

256. Inostrannaia literatura, 1988, no. 4: 172.

257. Ehrenburg, Memoirs, 429. Ehrenburg, in 1939, was listed as politically suspect, along with Babel and Pasternak. Babichenko, Literaturnyi front, 29–30 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 121, d. 1, l. 39–40: July 1939), 38 (l. 38: July 26, 1939). "Koltsov along with his boon companion Malraux made contact with the local Trotskyite organization POUM," Marti (general commissar of the international brigades in Spain) wrote to Stalin. "If one takes into account Koltsov's long-time sympathy for Trotsky, these contacts do not carry an accidental character." Marti added that the "so-called civil wife of Koltsov Maria Osten . . . is, I personally have no doubt whatsoever, a secret agent of German intelligence." Gromov, Stalin, 319. On Koltsov's recall, see also Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 215 (APRF, f. 3, op. 34, d. 127, l. 27), 312 (APRF, f. 3, op. 34, d. 127, l. 33–4; Mekhlis to Stalin Nov. 12, 1937); Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 486–7 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 754, l. 82: Nov. 6), 487n1 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 71, d. 46, l. 52); Efimov, Mikhail Kol'tsov, 114.

258. TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 262, l. 57–60. Stalin had had a sarcastic note about Bedny's long antifascist poem, "Struggle or Die," read to the poet in July 1937. Bedny kept trying, sending Mekhlis a poem for Pravda about the anniversary of the Kirov murder, which Mekhlis forwarded to Stalin and Molotov with a recommendation of rejection, and another about beating enemies, which Stalin called "weak." Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 476–9 (RGASPI, f.

558, op. 11, d. 702, l. 112; d. 130, l. 100; d. 702, l. 133; l. 113–21), 481 (f. 82, op. 2, d. 984, l. 50: Oct. 20, 1937; 496–7: f. 558, op. 11, d. 702, l. 134–6: Jan. 26, 1938). Without a paid job, Bedny was forced to sell his spectacular private library, which he had been assembling since his university days; Vladimir Bonch-Bruевич found out and bought it for the State Literary Museum. Bonch-Bruевич, Vospominaniia, 184. In Aug. 1938, Bedny was expelled from the party and the Union of Soviet Writers. Gronsky claimed that Stalin confidentially “took an exercise book out of his safe. Written in it were some rather unflattering remarks about the denizens of the Kremlin. I said that the handwriting was not Demyan’s. Stalin replied that these were the sentiments of the slightly tipsy poet, taken down by a certain journalist.” Gronsii, Iz proshlogo, 155. See also Gromov, Stalin, 165–6. The “journalist” may have been Mikhail Prezent, who was arrested and had kept a diary, writing in it that the literati joked, “Trotsky decided to commit suicide, so Trotsky sent Stalin a letter challenging him to a socialist competition.” Stalin underlined the passage. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 69 (diary); excerpts in Sokolov, Narkomy strakha, 24–37. Prezent died in prison from a lack of insulin.

259. Tolstoy, Tolstoy.

260. Litvin, “‘Chto zhe nam delat’?,” I: 505–27 (at 509, 521–3).

261. Poretsky, Our Own People, 214–6.

262. Duff, Time for Spies; West and Tsarev, Crown Jewels, 103–26.

263. Lewin, “Grappling with Stalinism,” 308–9; Khlevniuk, “Stalinist ‘Party Generals,’” 60.

264. Bagirov remained party boss in Azerbaijan and Grigor Arutyunov in Armenia. Suny, Making of the Georgian Nation, 278; Knight, Beria, 89.

265. Glavnyi voennyi sovet RKKA, 135–41 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 18, d. 46, l. 183–90).

266. Blyukher, “S. Vasiliiem Konstantinovichem Bliukherom,” 82–3. The same “take a holiday in Sochi” approach had been ominously suggested to Nikolai Kuznetsov when he returned from Spain in Sept. 1937; Kuznetsov survived to get a new assignment.

267. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, VII/i: 103–8 (TsAMO, f. 2, op. 795437, d. 1, l. 35–44). Gorbach, who replaced Lyushkov as NKVD chief for the Soviet Far East, wrote a report to Beria (dated Sept. 15, 1938), which was forwarded to Stalin and Voroshilov, that echoed the blame for Blyukher. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost organov,” 332 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 883, l. 100–3).

268. Na prieme, 239. Molotov and Zhdanov had left at midnight (Sept. 12) and were called back.

269. Goldstap complained to Stalin: “I am ready to yield this high honor if the artist Gelovani captures this genius of humanity better than I,” adding the names of many people who “openly told me that I convey your image more truthfully, sincerely, and softly.” Markova, “Litso vraga,” 98 (citing RGALI, f. 2456, op. 1, d. 345, l. 88).

270. Bernshtein, Mikhail Gelovani, no pagination; Bernshtein, “V roli Stalina.” See also Kenez, Cinema and Soviet Society from the Revolution to the Death of Stalin, 208.

271. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 73, 181.

272. Petrov, “Rodos.”

273. Rodos, Ia syn palacha.

274. Mozokhin, Pravo na represii, 217.

275. Tepliakov, “Sibir” (citing testimony of L. F. Bashtakov, Jan. 1954); Sanina, “R. I. Eikhe.” Eikhe had been transferred from Western Siberia to USSR commissar of agriculture in Oct. 1937 (replacing the arrested Mikhail Chernov) and was arrested April 29, 1938.

276. Gazarian, “Etno ne dolzhno povtorit’sia” (1989, no. 2), 63.

277. “I know him from 1923, when he was deputy chairman of the Cheka of Georgia,” Merkulov would write of Beria. “He was then all of twenty-four years old but that post already at that time did not satisfy him. He aimed higher. In general he considered all people beneath himself, especially those to whom he was subordinated.” Merkulov pointed out that Beria had studiously compiled a record of shortcomings everywhere in his domain, which he used to discredit officials who stood in his way around, and that he badmouthed other officials to his tight circle of subordinates, but when someone was powerful, Beria became obsequious. The second anyone fell under a cloud, however, Beria became rude. “‘Khochetsia proklast’ den’ i chas moego znakomstva s Beriia,” 101 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 465, l. 2–28);

Merkulov to Khrushchev, re-sent to Malenkov, July 21, 1953), 96–104 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 465, l. 2–28; Merkulov to Malenkov, July 23).

278. Loginov, Teni Stalina, 31 (Georgii A. Egnatashvili).

279. Also on Oct. 22, 1938, the Far Eastern territory was subdivided into two provinces, and Stalin had Nikolai Pegov, a student at the Moscow Industrial Academy, sent as the new party boss of the chunk whose capital remained Khabarovsk. Pegov, whom Malenkov had placed on the shortlist of candidates to take over as first deputy USSR NKVD chief, was instructed to gather five hundred Communists from the Moscow party organization to bring with him; he barely managed to round up a few dozen, including his brother. “Our whole life then was illuminated by sunshine, joy, and happiness,” Pegov would recall. He became a member of the local troika responsible for the still ongoing conveyor-belt mass arrests. Pegov, Dalekoe-blizkoe, 7; Stephan, Russian Far East, 216.

280. Blyukher died on Nov. 9, 1938. He would be convicted and sentenced to death posthumously, on March 10, 1939. Dushen’kin, Ot soldata do marshala. His wife received eight years in the Karaganda camp complex.

281. At the Sverdlovsk transit prison, Galina Serebryakova, whose husband, Sokolnikov, had been executed in the 1936 Trotskyite trial, was looking out upon a gaggle of fellow prisoners arrested for being “a member of the family of a traitor to the motherland,” when a companion nudged her and asked if she knew the identity of a tall, thinning woman a short distance away sitting on a sack of her belongings. She did not. “What? That’s Yekaterina Ivanovna Kalinina[-Lorberg], the wife of Mikhail Ivanovich Kalinin . . . Yes, she herself. Her husband is our president.” Although married to Kalinina-Lorberg since 1906, Kalinin, since 1924, had essentially been living with his nanny-housekeeper, Alexandra Gorchakova. Serebryakova approached and told Kalinina to remain firm, for Stalin had been duped but would figure things out and release them all. Serebriakova, “Smerch,” 335. Serebryakova, arrested while in exile, would be sentenced to eight years but serve eleven. In 1939 Kalinina would be sentenced to fifteen years; she would be released in 1945.

282. From Irkutsk, Shcherbakov had written to Zhdanov (June 18, 1937), his former superior, that “all leaders of the province soviet departments, the heads of provincial party departments and their deputies (with the exception of two so far), and the lower level province party officials, a number of party secretaries of the district party, the leaders of economic organizations, the directors of factories, [and so on] have been arrested. Thus, there are no functionaries in the party or the soviet apparatuses. It is difficult to imagine something like this. Now they have begun to dig into the NKVD.” Shcherbakov begged Zhdanov for cadres from Leningrad. Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 363 (RGASPI, f. 88, op. 1, d. 1045, l. 1–5); Na prieme, 212.

283. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 78–80; Ponomarev, Aleksandr Shcherbakov, 47–50; Pravda, March 12, 1991 (Aleksandr Aleksandrovich Shcherbakov, the son); Na prieme, 212, 234 (April 4, 1938), 244 (Nov. 4, 1938). The Shcherbakov family lived in the same building—Granovskiy, 3—as Stalin’s son Yakov; occasionally, Yakov and his wife, Yulia, paid visits to Shcherbakov and his wife, Vera. Ugarov had been the other person besides Shcherbakov whom Stalin had favored for the writers’ union secretary in 1934. Stavsky, at the Soviet Union of Writers, sent denunciation after denunciation of various writers; finally, Andreyev wrote to Stalin in 1938 that Stavsky had to be removed. The NKVD listened in on the phone conversations of Fadeyev, Pavel Yudin, and F. Panferov to assess their reactions to the move. Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’, 412–3 (RGASPI, f. 73, op. 2, d. 17, l. 105), 775–6n12 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 262, l. 19–35).

284. Kennan wrote that Stalin was “a man of incredible criminality . . . without pity or mercy: a man in whose entourage no one was ever safe: a man who . . . was most dangerous of all to those who were his closest collaborators in crime, because he liked to be the sole custodian of his own secrets.” Conversely, Rigby argued that Stalin was not “a disloyal patron.” Of the ten voting members of the politburo as of 1934, one was assassinated (Kirov), one committed suicide (Orjonikidze), and one died of a heart attack (Kuibyshev), but only one was executed—Kosior. Three candidate members from 1934 through 1937 were executed (Chubar [promoted to full member in 1935], Eihe, and Yezhov), while Mikoyan and Petrovsky survived. Kennan, Russia and the West, 254–5; Rigby, “Was Stalin a Disloyal Patron?”

285. The Zhdanov-Malenkov rivalry would perform a similar function of each holding the other in check. Harris, “Origins of the Conflict.”

286. Beria’s son Sergo recalled that his father noticed he was being spied upon by subordinates, who, he said, reported directly to Zhdanov in Moscow. Beriia, Moi otets, 56. In Moscow who was watching Beria for Stalin remains unclear—those sources remain classified, if they survived.

287. Nabokov, for the English translation, later explicitly called his fictional dictator a composite. Nabokov, Tyrants Destroyed, 2.

288. Davies and Harris, Stalin's World, 4.

289. Graziosi, "New Soviet Archival Sources," 34. See also Priestland, Politics of Mobilization. Some scholars see this as calculated manipulation of war scares and threats. Rieber, Struggle for Supremacy, 92, 98–9. Others assert that Stalin could not help himself. Davies and Harris, Stalin's World.

290. Without explaining where Stalin acquired the wherewithal to destroy the political machines with ease, Getty continues to insist not on a hypercentralized but a decentralized Soviet system whereby the central apparatus detested its supposed dependence on the backward clan dynamics of local party machines. Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror. See also Rittersporn, Stalinist Simplifications, which holds up 1938 as evidence of Stalin's defeat.

291. Cherushev, Udar po svoim, 109–10.

292. Overall, between May 1935 and May 1941, Stalin would convoke twelve Central Committee plenums, a single party congress, and one party conference, but more than forty major state banquets. That compares, in the ten-year period from 1924–34, with four party congresses, five party conferences, and forty-three plenums. Nevezhin, Zastol'ia, 382, 429–32. See also Nevezhin, Zastol'nye, 201–11.

293. "Vospominaia Velikuiu otechestvennuiu," 54; Emel'ianov, Na poroge voyny, 85; Nevezhin, Zastol'ia Iosifa Stalina, 424–5 (Brontman diary); Pravda, Oct. 28, 1938. On other occasions of use of the Facets, see Pravda, April 18 and Oct. 28, 1938, and June 5 and Nov. 5, 1939.

294. Gromov, Stalin, 147; SSSR na stroike, 1938, no. 9.

295. Rees, "Stalin as Leader, 1937–1953," 209. In Feb. 1938, when Detizdat wanted to publish Smirnova's Tales of Stalin's Childhood, he told them to burn it and not indulge a "cult of the personality, vozhdii, infallible heroes," which he condemned once again as an "SR theory." RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1121, l. 24.

296. Stalin's best biographers and analysts have well understood that he combined Marxism-Leninism with imperial Russian traditions. Tucker characterized Stalin's approach as "imperial-communist"; Erik van Ree, as "revolutionary patriotism"; Arfon Rees, as "revolutionary Machiavellism." Tucker, "Stalin and Stalinism," 1–16; van Ree, Political Thought; Rees, Political Thought from Machiavelli to Stalin.

297. For Shakespeare on the medieval Scottish tyrant Macbeth, see Frye, "Hitler, Stalin, and Shakespeare's Macbeth."

298. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 499 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 339, l. 199; March 13, 1938).

299. "I cannot not inform you about the abuses and nightmares in the activities of the NKVD organs in Abkhazia that I personally saw and, in truth, in writing about them, I risk my life, but I write in honor of justice and love of humanity," Mikhail Saliya (b. 1908) wrote to Stalin (Aug. 3, 1938). "A citizen is arrested following a denunciation, supposedly as a counterrevolutionary and is charged as such, and when he begins to protest his innocence, then he is subjected to 'repression.' First, he is stripped naked and placed on the floor, 'fighters' arrive with knouts in hand, about four of them, and begin to beat him, the combat lasts until the victim loses consciousness, he gets a breather of about forty-five minutes, for the 'fighters' too get tired from the combat, he is given ammonia under the nose, to revive him, then his whole body is soaked in water, and the four people begin to beat him again with all their might, the person gives off inhuman sounds, begs, that he is not guilty, but they are immovable. The person loses consciousness again, collapsed without memory, 'the fighters' among themselves say, 'oh, the scoundrel, he is simulating.' They tie paper or a rag in his mouth and continue beating him until he confesses that he is a counterrevolutionary." The rest of the description details rotting flesh ripped off by the blows and covered with flies. Saliya noted that this was not personal (none of his relatives had been arrested), and gave his address. His letter would serve as the pretext for an investigation, after Beria had been transferred to Moscow, which would reveal that a livestock pen water storage bin had been converted into a solitary confinement cell in early 1938 in the Sukhum internal prison and kept filled several inches high with water for interrogations. Stalin notified Georgian party officials (Nov. 14, 1938) of a Central Committee decision to investigate all top NKVD operatives in Georgia during the next three months, and demanded to be informed of all results and actions. Pauchiliya was arrested in Oct. 1938, fired from the NKVD in May 1939, and returned to the Dynamo sports club. Junge and Bonwetsch, Bolshevistskii poriadok, II: 355–58 (Arkhiv MVD Gruzii, 1–i otdel, f. 6, d.5520, tom 1, l. 28–30), 361–73 (Arkhiv MVD Gruzii, 1–i otdel, f. 6, d.5520, tom 1, l. 15–24; Oct. 10, 1938), 375–8 (2–i otdel, f. 14, op. 12, d. 256, l. 142–5), 378 (d. 363, l. 146; Nov. 15), 403–9 (1–i otdel, f. 6, d. 5520, tom 3, l. 73–6); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe, 604–6 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 6, l. 80–3; Nov. 14, 1938).

300. Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 339.

PART III. THREE-CARD MONTE

1. “Prime Minister on the Issues,” The Times, Sept. 28, 1938: 10. See also Chamberlain, Struggle for Peace.

2. DDF, 2e série, XI: 685 (Delmas to Daladier, Sept. 28, 1938).

3. Corvaja, Hitler and Mussolini. The duce would pass his own anti-Semitic laws and boast to his mistress (Aug. 5, 1938), “I’ve been a racist since ’21. I don’t know why people think I am imitating Hitler, he wasn’t even born. It makes me laugh.” Incensed at reports of the illegal miscegenation in Italy’s Africa colonies, he added, “I need to teach these Italians about race, so that they don’t create half castes and don’t ruin what is beautiful in us.” Petacci, Mussolini segreto, 391: 2.

4. Corvaja, Hitler and Mussolini, 27–41. Stalin had an undercover agent report via Poland on the Hitler-Mussolini meeting, and underlined passages related to their reported joint plans for an aggression against the USSR. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 533–41 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 187, l. 28–44).

5. The duce had once told the British ambassador in Rome that Hitler was “a dreamer” and suffered “from an inferiority complex and a bitter sense of injustice.” Robertson, Mussolini as Empire Builder, 57 (citing DBFP, 2nd series, V: 674–5; R. Graham to V. Wellesley, Oct. 11, 1933). Back in July 1934, British foreign secretary Simon wrote to the PM (MacDonald), “We must keep out of trouble in central Europe at all costs . . . There are circumstances in which Italy might move troops into Austria. There are no circumstances in which we would ever dream of doing so.” Aldcroft, “Versailles Legacy.”

6. Mallett, “Fascist Foreign Policy.”

7. Low, Years of Wrath, no pagination.

8. Speer, Spandauer Tagebücher, 199.

9. “That politics is an art there is no doubt,” Mussolini had observed in a speech in 1926 at an art exhibit. “Political,” like artistic, creation is a slow elaboration and a sudden divination. At a certain moment the artist creates with inspiration, the politician with decision.” Falasca-Zamponi, Fascist Spectacle, 15, citing Mussolini, Scritti e discorsi, V: 279.

10. Dिल्s makes the further point that the full depravity of Hitler and his regime was neither understood nor evident in 1938. Dिल्s, “We Must Hope for the Best,” 318, 347.

11. Honig, “Totalitarianism and Realism.”

12. Litvinov, too, rejected a Soviet solo defense of the Versailles order. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 153–4.

13. By March 18, 1938, Churchill was writing, in an article entitled “The Austrian Eye-Opener,” that “the scales of illusion have fallen from many eyes.” “Friendship with Germany” (Sept. 17, 1937), reprinted in Churchill, Step by Step, 141–4 (at 143–4), 192–5.

14. Weinberg, Hitler’s Foreign Policy, 13.

15. “Three bluffers united are much more powerful than three bluffers playing each for his own hand,” wrote Freda Uteley. “Germany, Japan, and Italy stand together, possessing neither the necessary economic strength nor political stability for a real war, yet able to blackmail the democratic powers which possess such strength.” Uteley, “Germany and Japan.” Stalin, on Stomonyakov’s recommendation, decided to notify Italy that the Anti-Comintern Pact was not an act of friendship toward the USSR. Sevost’ianov, Moskva-Rim, 436–8 (APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 692, l. 78, 80), 438 (l. 37). See also DVP SSSR, XVI: 494–6.

16. Eberhardt, Ethnic Groups and Population Changes, 111–36; Glassheim, Noble Nationalists; Heimann, Czechoslovakia.

17. RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 1144, l. 39–41. Prague was sharing intelligence with Moscow; Stalin had his own spy in the Czechoslovak general staff. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 277 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 1, d. 210, l. 257; op. 5, d. 63, l. 123; APRF, f. 3, op. 50, d. 32, l. 139).

18. Brook-Shepherd, Anschluss; Gehl, Austria, Germany, and the Anschluss; von Schuschnigg, Brutal Takeover; Low, Anschluss Movement.

19. Hitler privately judged Halifax “a clever politician who fully supported Germany’s claims.” After Eden resigned in a huff in Feb. 1938, Halifax became foreign secretary. Roberts, Holy Fox, 71 (citing A4 410 33); Eberle and Uhl, Hitler Book, 24–5. On Hitler and Britain, see also von Schuschnigg, Austrian Requiem, 20–32.

20. “His Majesty’s Government,” stated the torturous wording for Henderson to convey to the German government, “could not guarantee that they would not be forced by circumstance to become involved also.” DBFP, 3rd series, I: 331–2 (Halifax to Henderson, May 21, 1938, also referencing a Chamberlain warning in Parliament in March); DDF, 2e série, VIII: 772–4 (March 15); Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 174.

21. Steiner, Triumph of the Dark, 565–6.

22. Taylor, Sword and Swastika, 182. See also Waldenegg, “Hitler, Göring, Mussolini.”

23. Price, Year of Reckoning, 91–117; von Schuschnigg, Austrian Requiem, 20–32; Gehl, Austria, Germany, and the Anschluss; Churchill, Second World War, I: 270.

24. Lasserer, “Invasion of Austria,” 447–86. See also French Yellow Book, 2–3 (François-Poncet to Paris, March 12, 1938). The French military had its eyes on Spain. “The defeat of Franco would open the door to communism in Spain,” French military intelligence had noted on March 10, 1938. “Will [the communists] be able to retain power? No. But it would take only a few months for such a regime to precipitate a general European war.” Jackson, “French Strategy,” 68 (citing SHAT, 7N 2762–2, “L’influence soviétique en Espagne”).

25. Toozé, Wages of Destruction, 246.

26. Pravda, March 13 and 14, 1938.

27. Bukharin’s doctored final statement appeared in the press (Izvestiia and Pravda, March 13, 1938), and in the 700–page court record, which went to the printer on March 28. Murin, “Kak fal’sifitsirovalos’ delo Bukharina,” 69: APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 401, l. 03; “Moe poslednee slovo na sude, veroiatno, budet moim poslednim solovom voobshche: kto i kak pravil rech’ N. I. Bukahrina.” From March 1938, whether by coincidence or instruction, the NKVD political mood summaries mentioned “wrecking” less in reports on the actual problems of Soviet defense industry. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 173–6 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 42, l. 29–33; d. 40, l. 128, 347; d. 41, l. 51–70; APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 338, l. 59). Litvinov finally expressed an official Soviet reaction to the “aggression” at a press conference on March 17, 1938, proposing an international conference, but the Soviets followed with no concrete measures. Izvestiia, March 18, 1938; Tisminets, Vneshniaia politika SSSR, IV: 342–4; DVP SSSR, XXI: 138; Dullin, Men of Influence, 253.

28. DVP SSSR, XVIII: 309–12 (pact with France), 333–6 (pact with Czechoslovakia); Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-chechoslovatskikh otnoshenii, III: 106–7 (Beneš and Alexandrovsky, May 2–3, 1935), 111 (Beneš to Czechoslovak missions abroad, May 9), 112 (Litvinov to Alexandrovsky, May 11). Hochman argues that the condition of Soviet obligations (obliged to act only if France did so) had been insisted upon by Moscow. Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 52–3. Cf. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 51.

29. DVP SSSR, XXI: 125–6 (Potyomkin, March 15, 1938).

30. DVP SSSR, XXI: 142–7 (Alexandrovsky with Krofta, March 21); Späčil and Mal’tsev, Dokumenty po istorii miunbzhenskogo sgovora, 49–52 (Shaprov, March 15); Dokumenty po istorii sovetsko-chechoslovatskikh otnoshenii, III: 382 (Fierlinger from Moscow, March 15).

31. Sluch, “Pol’sha v politike Sovetskogo Soiuz,” 160 (citing AVPRF, f. 0138, op. 19, pap. 128, d. 1, l. 19); Na prieme, 233.

32. RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 1144, l. 86–7 (Kashuba from Prague, April 9, 1938), Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 16.

33. Pravda, March 29, 1938.

34. Young, “French Intelligence,” 274, 278: April 6, 1938.

35. Na prieme, 235–6; Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-chechoslovatskikh otnoshenii, III: 402 (Fierlinger to Krofta, April 23, 1938). “We come to the aid of Czechoslovakia in the event France comes to its aid and, conversely, Czechoslovakia comes to our aid in the event that France comes to our aid,” Kalinin explained to a gathering of propagandists on April 26. He added that the Soviet-Czechoslovak pact “does not prohibit either party rendering assistance to the other without waiting for France”—a statement not reproduced in the press account. Zemskov, Norve dokumenty iz istorii Miunkhena, 27–8; Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-chechoslovatskikh otnoshenii, III: 402–3 (April 26). On May 8, Kalinin informed a visiting Czechoslovak delegation that the Soviet Union would honor its treaty obligations “to the last letter.” Lukes, Czechoslovakia between Hitler and Stalin, 143.

36. Bandinelli, Hitler e Mussolini; Baxa, “Capturing the Fascist Moment”; Corvaja, Hitler and Mussolini, 59–74.

37. DVP SSSR, XXI: 276 (Alexandrovsky, May 18, 1938).

38. Henke, England in Hitler's politischem Kalkül, 150–62. Sir Horace Wilson, at a luncheon on May 10, 1938, told Soviet ambassador Maisky that “Germany's expansionary ambitions to create a Mitteleuropa would undermine it by its conglomerate of nationalities, state organizations, and economic regions, producing internal frictions and struggles.” Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 114.

39. Lukes, “Czechoslovak Partial Mobilization.” František Moravec, then head of Czechoslovak military intelligence, later insisted that the German attack plans (intercepted and decoded) were real, and that the Czechoslovaks had no choice except to mobilize in response. Moravec, Master of Spies, 110–1.

40. Weinberg, Hitler's Foreign Policy, II: 691–4; DGFP, series D, II: 473–7 (June 18, 1938); Grechko et al., Istoriia vtoroi mirovoi voyny, I: 104; Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 176. The British government tried to restrain the domestic press from crowing about Hitler's apparent climbdown. Parker, Chamberlain and Appeasement, 149.

41. Weinberg, Foreign Policy, II: 335, 465–6.

42. RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 1144, l. 325.

43. Glavnyi voennyi sovet RKKA, 135–42 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 18, d. 46, l. 183–90). On Lake Khasan, see also Voennyi sovet pri narodnom komissare oborony SSSR, 206–18 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 14, d. 2030, l. 108–23; op. 18, d. 47, l. 92–5; Nov. 26, 1938). On Aug. 4, 1938, in the middle of the Lake Khasan border war, the Soviet envoy to Czechoslovakia would assure Beneš that the Soviet Union would live up to its European military obligations regardless of the situation in the Far East.

44. Sakwa, “Polish Ultimatum”; DGFP, series D, V: 434, 442–3; DVP SSSR, XXI: 153–5 (Potyomkin, March 26, 1938). On March 24, Shaposhnikov, chief of the general staff, sent a draft war plan to Voroshilov stating that “the most likely enemies in the West were Germany and Poland.” Naumov, 1941 god, II: 557–60.

45. Gal'ianov, “Kuda idet Pol'sha.” Already in Feb. 1938, Potyomkin had told the Bulgarian envoy to Moscow that there might well be a new partition of Poland. Lipinsky, Das geheime Zusatzprotokoll, 24. See also Sluch, “Pol'sha v politike Sovetskogo Soiuza,” 162–3 (citing AVPRF, f. 05, op. 18, pap. 148, d. 158, l. 30: April 4, 1938); and Raack, “His Question Asked and Answered.”

46. Ragsdale, Coming of World War II, 81–2, 112–126, 166–7, 185.

47. The Romanian military did not oppose granting transit rights to the Red Army, but King Carol vetoed the idea. Ragsdale, “Soviet Position at Munich,” 35–72; Ragsdale, Coming of World War II, 81–2, 90–1; Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 56–77, 144–69. No airlift of troops of the necessary magnitude for aiding Czechoslovakia took place even during World War II. See also Ragsdale, in “Munich Crisis,” who demolishes the assertions in Pfaff, Die Sowjetunion und die Verteidigung der Tschechoslowakei, 392–7.

48. RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 1144, l. 150–5, 160, 183; 158–94; Seaton, Russo-German War, 56n16.

49. Ulam, Expansion and Coexistence, 254; Jackson, France and the Nazi Menace, 291; Jackson, “French Military Intelligence,” 88–9. Churchill (March 23, 1938) had put the question squarely to Maisky about the Red Army's self-annihilation. Maisky suggested to Litvinov that Churchill be permitted to observe Red Army maneuvers to put to rest the impression derived from the terror. No such visit took place. DVP SSSR, XXI: 151–3; Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 107; Steiner, “Soviet Commissariat of Foreign Affairs,” 755.

50. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 65 (no citation). Successive French military attachés had been reprimanded by superiors in Paris for “exaggerating” the USSR's military capacity. Young, In Command of France, 145–49; Coulondre, De Staline à Hitler, 129.

51. On Sept. 2, 1938, Jean Payart, long-serving French chargé d'affaires in Moscow, asked Litvinov what assistance the USSR could render to Czechoslovakia, given the reluctance of Poland and Romania to allow Soviet troops and aircraft to pass through; Litvinov reminded him that it was France that was under treaty obligation in the first instance, and that if France came to Czechoslovakia's aid, the Soviet Union would fulfil its obligations "utilizing every means at our disposal." Litvinov repeated the Soviet proposal for an immediate conference of Great Britain, France, and the USSR with military representatives, but Payart left the last part out of his report to the French foreign ministry, and instead managed to incite the idea that the Soviet answer had been "evasive." Steiner, "Soviet Commissariat of Foreign Affairs," 763–5. Litvinov repeatedly warned Alexandrovsky in Prague to make sure the Czechoslovaks did not expect unilateral Soviet assistance.

52. Weinberg, Hitler's Foreign Policy, 398; DDF, 2e série, IX: 394–5 (July 16, 1938), 402–4 (July 17), 437–8 (July 20), 487n2; Adamthwaite, France, 197–9.

53. Young, "French Military Intelligence," 271–309 (at 287).

54. Toose, Wages of Destruction, 246, 255–6, 271–2.

55. Das Deutsche Reich und der Zweite Weltkrieg, IX/i: 751–6; Mueller, Das Heer und Hitler, 361.

56. Moorhouse, Killing Hitler, 79–104, at 99, citing Helmuth Groschuth, Tagebücher eines Abwehroffiziers 1938–1940 (Stuttgart, 1970), 35.

57. See, for ex., the characteristic letter of Viscount Halifax to Sir Neville Henderson, July 28, 1938, in DBFP, 3rd series, II: 17.

58. Parker, Chamberlain and Appeasement, 174–81.

59. Weinberg, "Germany, Munich, and Appeasement," 115–6.

60. Young, Diaries of Sir Robert Bruce Lockhart, I: 402.

61. Dilks, "We Must Hope for the Best," 329 (Sept. 11, 1938).

62. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 185.

63. Sorge had reported (Sept. 3, 1938) Tokyo's preference for an alliance with Germany directed solely against the USSR. Eleven days later Sorge's radio man transmitted another of his dispatches about Japanese commitment to planning war against the Soviet Union. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 650n8.

64. Glavnyi voennyi sovet RKKA, 142–52 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 18, d. 46, l. 191–4), 145–8 (l. 195–200), 149–51 (l. 201–5).

65. Zemskov, Novye dokumenty iz istorii Miunkhena, 98–100; Dokumenty i materialy kanuna vtoroi mirovoi voyny, I: 240; DVP SSSR, XXI: 498–9, 500; Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 363–4 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 24, l. 5–6); DVP SSSR, XIX: 498–9, 500.

66. Ragsdale, Coming of World War II, 121–2; Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-chechoslovatskikh otnoshenii, III: 515–17 (Voroshilov's mobilization order, Sept. 21, 1938), 518 (implementation, Sept. 22, 1938); Spáčil and Mal'tsev, Dokumenty po istorii Miunkhenskogo sgovora, 254–6. See also Grylev, "Nakanune i v dni Miunkhena," 220–7; Grechko et al., Istoriia Vtoroi mirovoi voyny, II: 104–7; Zakharov, General'nyi shtab, 112–5; Jukes, "Red Army."

67. See Litvinov's appeal to Stalin from Geneva to seize the moment: DVP SSSR, XXI: 520 (Sept. 23, 1938). In Geneva since early Sept., Litvinov repeatedly urged Stalin toward a more activist policy over Czechoslovakia while vowing that his recommended actions would not increase the USSR's obligations, an implied reading of Stalin's concerns. Steiner, "Soviet Commissariat of Foreign Affairs."

68. Dullin, Men of Influence, 261 (citing SHAT, 7N3123: report of attaché, Oct. 18, 1938).

69. "Prime Minister on the Issues," The Times, Sept. 28, 1938: 10. See also Chamberlain, In Search of Peace, 393.

70. Weinberg, Foreign Policy, II: 378–464. See also Wendt, Grossdeutschland, 150–2.

71. The Soviets, Churchill later wrote of the Munich Pact, "were not brought into the scale against Hitler, and were treated with an indifference—not to say disdain—which left a mark in Stalin's mind." He added: "Events took their course as if Soviet Russia did not exist. For this we afterward paid dearly." Churchill, Second World War, I: 305. See also Eberle and Uhl, Hitler Book, 30–4.

72. Overly, "Germany and the Munich Crisis"; Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 113–25. On Aug. 2, 1938, British ambassador to Germany Neville Henderson had envisioned exclusion of the Soviet Union from a Four Power Conference supposedly for want of time. DBFP, 3rd series, III: 35–6 (Henderson to Strang).

73. Chamberlain had written (Sept. 13) to King George VI about the pending trip to meet Hitler. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 188. See also Crozier, Causes of the Second World War, 144.

74. Fry, "Agents and Structures."
75. Gunsburg, Divided and Conquered, 66–7.
76. Girard de Charbonnières, La plus évitable de toutes les guerres, 159–63; Thomas, "France and the Czechoslovak Crisis." Daladier told American ambassador Bullitt (Oct. 2) that Munich had been an "immense defeat for France and England." Haight, American Aid to France, 13 (citing Bullitt Papers).
77. Lukes, Czechoslovakia between Hitler and Stalin, 237.
78. Murray, Change in the European Balance of Power; Hauner, "Czechoslovakia as a Military Factor." Wilhelm Keitel, head of the High Command in 1938, when interrogated at Nuremberg in 1946 about whether Germany would have attacked Czechoslovakia in 1938 if the Western powers had come to Prague's aid militarily, would reply, "Certainly not. We were not strong enough militarily." Fritz Erich von Manstein, another general, would state under interrogation, "had Czechoslovakia defended itself, we would have been held up by her fortifications, for we did not have the means to break through." Similarly, Alfred Jodl would say that, after an invasion of Czechoslovakia, it would have been "militarily impossible" to hold out against a French move from the West. International Military Tribunal, X: 572, 600, 772. See also Churchill, Second World War, I: 392.
79. Deutsch, Hitler and His Generals; Steiner, Triumph of the Dark, 575–9.
80. Parssinen, Oster Conspiracy, 162.
81. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 247 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 4, d. 297, l. 50).
82. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, III/i: 17 (citing TsAMO, f. 5, op. 176703, d. 7, l. 431).
83. Herwarth, Against Two Evils, 123. The German invasion plan (Fall Grün) excluded Soviet intervention because of the upheaval in the Red Army. Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 140.
84. Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 162–3, 166–7.
85. Because Stalin did not take his southern holiday, there are none of the instructional letters to Moscow that are revealing of his thinking. In addition, Comintern General Secretary Georgi Dimitrov, who kept a diary on Stalin's thinking, was away on holiday (in Kislovodsk and Crimea) through Oct. 19, 1938.
86. Lukes, Czechoslovakia between Hitler and Stalin, 224.
87. Alexandrovsky wrote in his diary: "I confess that I felt uncomfortable, as I could say nothing." "Miunkhen," Mezhdunarodnaia zhizn', 1998, no. 11: 138–40.
88. Lukes, "Stalin and Beneš," 41. Stalin had to think about Japan's obligation in the Anti-Comintern Pact to assist Germany if the USSR and Germany clashed militarily over Czechoslovakia, as pointedly noted in Izvestiia (Sept. 30, 1938) in a TASS report on speculation in London newspapers. Koltsov had been dispatched to Czechoslovakia, whence he filed many evocative stories on the crisis—"Alarming Days of Prague," "Czechoslovakia on the Eve of New Tribulations," "Aggressors Mangle Czechoslovakia"—illuminating the Stalinist line.
89. DVP SSSR, XXI: 516–7 (Potyomkin, Sept. 23, 1938), 523 (conversation of Jankovski and Potyomkin, Sept. 23).
90. Cienciala, "Foreign Policy of Józef Piłsudski," 143, citing Polskie dokumenty dyplomatyczne 1938 (Warsaw: Polski Instytut Spraw Międzynarodowych, 2007), docs. 297, 317.
91. Coulondre, De Staline à Hitler, 165. On Sept. 26, the Soviet military attaché in Paris had claimed that thirty infantry and cavalry divisions, along with tanks and airplanes, had been positioned along the frontier with Poland. Gamelin, Servir, II: 356.
92. Landau and Tomaszewski, Monachium 1938, 462 (Beck to Lipski, Sept. 28, 1939).
93. For indirect evidence of Stalin's designs on Poland's eastern territories, see Raack, "His Question Asked and Answered."
94. Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War, 134–5 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 73, d. 61a, l. 1); DVP SSSR, XXI: 738.
95. On Sept. 28, Potyomkin was in the Little Corner from 3:15 a.m. to 3:25 a.m., in the presence of Molotov, Voroshilov, Kaganovich, Zhdanov, and Yezhov, all of whom were there from 2:00 a.m. to 4:15 a.m. Na prieme, 241.
96. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 77–8. On Sept. 30, Timoshenko and Poliakov gave an overview of Poland's military posture on the Soviet border to Voroshilov. Duraczyński and Sakharov, Sovetsko-Pol'skie otnosheniia, 82–3 (RGVA, f. 33797, op. 5, d. 479, l. 199–200).

97. Maslov, "I. V. Stalin o 'Kratkom kurse istorii VKP (b)';" APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1122, l. 28–11; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1122, l. 54ff.

98. In the early and mid-1930s, the regime had tried but failed to publish an official four-volume and then a two-volume history of the party. Yaroslavsky and Pyotr Pospelov (b. 1898), a graduate of the Institute of Red Professors, began work on a new text. In the meantime, Yaroslavsky's wife, Kirsanova, was expelled from the party, and his son-in-law, Marcel Rosenberg, was arrested. Finally, on April 3, Yaroslavsky and Pospelov presented Stalin with a text. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1217, l. 2–24; Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 252; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 193; Zelenov and Brandenberger, "Kratkii kurs," I: 213–8 (d. 1219, l. 1–6). Stalin had the draft circulated among the retinue and, with Zhdanov in tow, received Pospelov (without Yaroslavsky) in the Little Corner on March 4 and 5, 1938, during the Bukharin trial. Stalin made many changes: he transformed all leftist parties other than the Communists into counterrevolutionaries already before Oct. 1917, and all oppositionists (left and right) into foreign agents. From late May 1938, he was engaged in proofreading the revision, then decided to rewrite the text himself. On the author page, he replaced the names of Yaroslavsky and Pospelov with "party commission." "Of the twelve chapters," Stalin reported on Aug. 16, 1938, to the inner circle and the authors, "it turned out to be necessary to revise eleven." (Chapter 5 had been deemed acceptable.) RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1219, l. 36–7.

99. In his summary speech at the Feb.–March 1937 plenum, too, Stalin had included a reference to Antaeus and how Hercules defeated him. Pravda, April 1, 1937. See also Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service, 121.

100. Istoriia Vsesoiuznoi Kommunisticheskoi partii, 291–2. See also Deutscher, Stalin, 540; and Tucker, "Stalinism as Revolution from Above," 77–110. The expression "revolution from above" had first appeared as a characterization of Germany's unification in the "Bismarck" entry in the Great Soviet Encyclopedia published in 1927, a fact now forgotten.

101. Zelenov, "I. V. Stalin v rabote," 6. A collective farmer would write asking for more biographical detail on Stalin to be inserted in the book. Brandenberger, Propaganda State in Crisis, 210 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 125, d. 1, l. 5: I. Shabarov, collective farmer from Rostov). Tucker wrote that if Stalin had written memoirs, they would have amounted to nothing more than a second edition of the Short Course of the History of the Communist Party. Tucker, Stalin in Power, 533, 539.

102. Zelenov, "I. V. Stalin v rabote," 3, 6, 10–1, 25–7. Stalin deleted extended passages, including on his supposed leading party work in the South Caucasus before 1917.

103. Shestakov, Kratkii kurs, 291. See also Lih, "Melodrama and the Myth."

104. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1122, l. 3–4. Stalin would elaborate this core axiom two weeks later at the politburo. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 693; "I. V. Stalin v rabote nad 'Kratkim kursom,'" 19.

105. Na prieme, 239–40; Zelenov and Brandenberger, "Kratkii kurs," I: 373–4 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1219, l. 37); Zelenov, I. V. Stalin, Istorieskaia ideologiii, I: 312–91. See also Medvedev, "How the Short Course Was Created"; and Avrich, "Short Course and Soviet Historiography."

106. Zelenov and Brandenberger, "Kratkii kurs," I: 375–81 (RGASPI, f. 77, op. 3, d. 159, l. 338–78).

107. Zelenov and Brandenberger, "Kratkii kurs," I: 425 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1002, l. 12: Sept. 19, 1938). It would be translated into the languages of Union and autonomous republics the next year and, eventually, reach 42.8 million copies in 67 languages. "Izdanie proizvedenii I. V. Stalina v Sovetskom Soiuze c 7 noiabria 1917 goda na 5 marta 1953: statisticheskie tablitsii," Sovetskaia bibliografiia: sbornik statei i materialov, vyp. 1 (Moscow: Vsesoiuznaia knizhnaia palata, 1953), 224; Maslov, "Kratkii kurs istorii VKP (b)"—Entsiklopediia kul'ta lichnosti," 51. In 1937–38, the censor withdrew from circulation 16,435 titles, amounting to 24 million volumes. This was a partial accounting (the main censor lacked jurisdiction over military publications). Brandenberger, Propaganda State in Crisis, 222 (citing GARF, F. 9425, op. 1, d. 5, l. 66; d. 11, l. 61).

108. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1122, l. 1–18, 28–111. Stalin's speeches at the meeting can also be found in Zelenov, I. V. Stalin, Istorieskaia ideologiii, I: 394–9 (Sept. 27, 1938), 401–24 (Oct. 1) .

109. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1122, l. 58–9.

110. During Pravda's publication of the Short Course, Stalin phoned the editors, according to the journalist Brontman, and reiterated, over and over, the need to publish more material on the "white collar." Brontman noted: "It's a new matter." Brontman, Dnevnik (entry for Sept. 20, 1938).

111. Back when battling the Georgian Mensheviks before 1917, Stalin had advocated for working-class party members, but in power he offered ambiguous views. Chuev, Tak govoril Kaganovich, 31; Graziosi, “Stalin’s Antiworker Workerism, 1924–1931”; Lih et al., Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 219. The secret circular he had dispatched after Kirov’s assassination warned that Bolsheviks with worker origins sometimes turned out to be provocateurs (citing Roman Malinowski, whose secret spying for the okhranka had put Stalin back in prison before the revolution). Yezhov, in 1935, had complained, “look, this regeneration for the worker is completely un-Bolshevik and un-Marxist.” Davies and Harris, Stalin’s World, 198 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1118, l. 56–60); “Zakrytoe piśmo Tsk VKP (b),” 97; Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 201.

112. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1122, l. 10.

113. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 307, l. 7–11, 68–72, 80–5, 113–4.

114. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1122, l. 3–4. “I am not a theoretician [teoretik], but a practitioner [praktik] who knows theory,” Stalin explained, adding, “such are the kind of people we want to have: practitioners with knowledge of theory.” See the prompt from Yaroslavsky: Zelenov and Brandenberger, “Kratkii kurs,” I: 419–20 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1219, l. 101).

115. Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 166.

116. Telegrams had to be sent directly from the telegram office; there were also phonegrams transmitted by special telephone. Moscow received the first message around 5:00 p.m., and the second at 5:15; each had to be decoded. DVP SSSR, XXI: 549–50 (Potyomkin, Sept. 30, 1938); Lukes, “Stalin and Beneš,” 37–9. Beneš’s moods vacillated, according to Alexandrovsky (one of the few envoys to see the Czechoslovak president regularly). Alexandrovskii, “Munich Witness’s Account,” 129, 132. See also Steiner, “The Soviet Commissariat of Foreign Affairs,” 772–3 (citing AVP RF, f. 0138, op. 19, pap. 128, d. 6, l. 161–75; Alexandrovsky’s diary, written Oct. 1938).

117. DVP SSSR, XXI: 548–9 (Alexandrovsky, Sept. 30, 1938), 549 (Sept. 30, 1938), 549–50 (Potyomkin, Sept. 30, 1938), 552–3 (Alexandrovsky, Oct. 1, 1938).

118. Lukes, Czechoslovakia between Hitler and Stalin, 262; Lukes, “Stalin and Czechoslovakia,” 14–6.

119. Soon he would add “cultural-educational” organization to the list of the state’s functions. Pravda, March 11, 1939, reprinted in Sochineniia, XIV: 394.

120. Zelenov and Brandenberger, “Kratkii kurs,” I: 452–66 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1122, l. 28–9, 34–42, 44–9, 51, 53–61, 63, 65–70, 77–88).

121. Wandycz, Twilight of French Eastern Alliances, 452, 478; Prażmowska, Eastern Europe, 144.

122. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor’be za mir nakanune, 25–28, at 28 (Lipski to Beck, Oct. 1, 1938).

123. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 28. Churchill would famously call interwar Poland a “hyena” for its actions over Těšin (Cieszyn). Churchill, Second World War, I: 311. Soviet intelligence evidently reported rumors from Riga (Oct. 10, 1938) that Poland had also demanded Latvia’s ethnic Polish regions (such as Daugavpils/Dzvin’sk-Dyneburg). Sotskov, Pribaltika i geopolitika, 56 (no citation).

124. DVP SSSR, XXI: 599. Stalin possessed a manuscript on German-Polish relations by the émigré Alexander Guchkov, one of the two Duma representatives in 1917 who had been sent to obtain Tsar Nicholas II’s abdication. Pilfered in Paris, the text discussed the possibility of Poland handing Danzig over to Germany, with the thinking that this would satiate German claims and redirect German aggression against Stalin’s Soviet Union. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 234. See also Tokarev, “Karā panam! Karā.”

125. On Oct. 2, Soviet ambassador to London Ivan Maisky telegraphed Moscow reporting that, on Sept. 30, he had gone to see Tomáš Masaryk, the Czechoslovak representative in Britain, to express condolences. “They sold me into slavery to the Germans,” Masaryk was reported to have told Maisky through tears, “the way that once the Negroes were sold into slavery in America!” Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor’be za mir nakanune, 29–31 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 278, d. 1931, l. 53–6; Oct. 2, 1938); God krizisa, I: 41–3. On Oct. 5, 1938, Beneš would resign under German pressure and, seventeen days later, go into exile in London.

126. Craigie, Behind the Japanese Mask, 67–8. Craigie served as Britain’s ambassador to Tokyo.

127. Von Hassel, Die Fesselhagebücher, 51; Genoud, Testament of Adolf Hitler, 84–5; Fest, Hitler, 742. Not for Hitler the ancient Sun Tzu’s wisdom: “the greatest victory is that which requires no battle.”

128. Jackson, "End of Appeasement," 237 (citing SHAT, 7N 2515 [Oct. 10–16, 1938] and 2605 [Oct. 11, 1938], 2602–1 [Nov. 9, 1938]). Hitler and his minions even felt that Munich had somehow reconfirmed the Western powers' objections to Germany's assumption of its rightful place, which justified Germany's forcing through even greater expenditures on the military, railways, highways, and other infrastructure. Tooze, Wages of Destruction, 288.

129. The Times, Oct. 1, 1938. The Soviets were in difficult trade negotiations with Italy at this time. The Italians were demanding additional oil deliveries; Litvinov recommended offering grain. Sevost'ianov, Moskva-Rim, 454 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 246, l. 128; Litvinov to Stalin, Oct. 15, 1938), 455 (l. 127; Oct. 22, 1938, politburo decree).

130. DGFP series D, IV: 602–4 (Tippelskirch, Oct. 3, 1938).

131. Sochineniia, XVI: 118.

132. Pravda, Sept. 18, 1938. See also Pravda, Nov. 4, 1938 (Zhdanov) and Izvestiia, Nov. 10, 1938 (Molotov).

133. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 235 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 81, l. 140); Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 305. Surits, in Paris, wrote to the foreign affairs commissariat in Moscow that "any Frenchman" could see that for France the Munich Pact constituted "a most terrible defeat" equivalent to a "second Sedan" (when Germany crushed France in Bismarck's wars of unification). Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 35–6 ("excerpted": Oct. 12, 1938). Following the Munich Pact, the British agent in Salamanca, Robert Hodgson, told Eberhard von Stohrer, the German ambassador to Franco's regime, that Britain intended to mediate the conflict in Spain. Franco, at dinner with Stohrer on Oct. 1, rhapsodized over Hitler's triumph at Munich. DGFP series D, III: 754–60; Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 555–6, 827–8.

134. Passov, appointed on March 28, 1938, had remained head of civilian intelligence with the formation of the NKGB in Sept. 1938, but would be arrested on Oct. 23 for anti-Soviet conspiracy. Sudoplatov served as acting chief of NKGB espionage until Dec. 2, 1938, when Vladimir Dekanozov would be appointed. Passov would be executed on Feb. 14, 1940. Abramov, Evrei v KGB, 260–1; Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 7; Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 252 (TsA FSB, f. H-15014, t. 2, l. 90); Kolpakidi and Prokhorov, Vneshtaiia razvedka Rossii, 106–7.

135. Khlevniuk et al., Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro, III: 694–6; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1217, l. 51–2. Only after publication of the Short Course would Stalin relinquish formal control over ideology in the Central Committee secretariat, giving the portfolio to Zhdanov on Nov. 27, 1938. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 171.

136. Zelenov and Brandenberger, "Kratkii kurs," I: 494–5. Stalin added: "Comrade Khrushchev thinks that to this day he remains a worker, when in fact he is an intelligent."

137. Eugene Lyons would write that "only another war, and a catastrophically losing one, could effectively challenge Stalin's ascendancy." Lyons, Stalin, 290. See also Kuromiya, "Accounting for the Great Terror."

138. Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War; Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 4. Yefim Dzig'an's feature film If War Comes Tomorrow, which had premiered earlier in the year, had made the Red Army seem invincible, mixing documentary footage of paratroopers during maneuvers with a catchy, reassuring song with words by Vasily Lebedev-Kumach: "If war comes tomorrow, if tomorrow it's into battle, be prepared today!"

139. Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-pol'skikh otnoshenii, VI: 366 (Grzybowski telegram to Warsaw, Oct. 9, 1938). Following a secret gathering of German military brass on Aug. 19, 1938, at the special SS complex in Yuteborg, Soviet intelligence reported on Nazi Germany's aggressive designs on the Soviet Union, noting that a major general on Göring's chief of staff had said that "the main goal of the Führer is a struggle with our real enemies, the Soviets, who have paralyzed Japan in the East and could defend Ukraine only with weak forces. The Führer's goal is to avoid conflicts with England and France and attain a European pact of the four. Germany needs colonies, not in Africa, but in Eastern Europe, she needs a breadbasket—Ukraine." A Soviet military intelligence analysis of Germany in Jan. 1939 would conclude that, whereas "Czechoslovakia had served as a barrier to German expansion toward the southeast, now, on the contrary, it serves as a trampoline." But the report would also quote the Manchester Guardian to the effect that "a shortage of oil might turn out to be the fateful weakness of the German war machine." Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 21–2 (RGVA, f. 25888, op. 11, d. 86, l. 15), 25–6.

140. On Oct. 31, Litvinov told the Polish ambassador their nonaggression pact remained in force. This would be confirmed bilaterally on Nov. 26, 1938, and announced by TASS the next day.

¹⁴¹. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 253, 309–10 (TsA FSB, f. 3 os, op. 6, d. 8, l. 13).

¹⁴². “Vospominaniia Nikity Sergeevicha Khrushcheva,” 87; Pavliukov, Ezhov, 470; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 179–80; Khlevniuk, Khoziaiin, 344. It seems that at Stalin’s direction, Yezhov had called Uspensky and summoned him to Moscow—Uspensky drew his own obvious conclusions.

¹⁴³. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 24, l. 62.

¹⁴⁴. Kostrychenko and Khazanov, “Konets Kar’ ery Ezhova,” 125–8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 85–86); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 607–11 (APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 6, l. 85–7); Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 532–7. On Yezhov’s anger at being accused of lawlessness, when he was following Stalin’s instructions, with which Vyshinsky had colluded, see Ushakov and Stukalov, Front voennykh prokurorov, 70–2.

¹⁴⁵. “The fear of war had spawned mass terror,” wrote Ulam. “But terror in its turn increased Stalin’s fear of war.” This appears to be exactly backward: Stalin’s fear of war seems to have ended the mass terror. Ulam, Stalin, 491–2. On Oct. 16, 1938, the politburo resolved to demobilize and return the forces called to the western borders: 330,000 troops, 27,500 horses, and 5,000 vehicles. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 24, l. 17.

¹⁴⁶. Kissinger, Diplomacy, 333. E. H. Carr also portrayed Stalin as the embodiment of Russian realpolitik in his forced industrialization and foreign policy. The Carr student Gabriel Gorodetsky has asserted that “Machiavelli rather than Lenin was Stalin’s idol,” a dubious claim that does not diminish the value of the treasure trove of evidence that Gorodetsky brought to the fore. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 317; Haslam, “Stalin and the German Invasion of Russia,” 134. See also, on Carr, D’Agostino, “Stalin Old and New.”

CHAPTER 10. HAMMER

¹. Chuev, Sto sorok, 414–5. Stalin, in the name of the politburo, had removed A. M. Mogilny, head of Molotov’s secretariat, on Aug. 17, 1937; he removed M. Khlusser, another top Molotov aide, eleven days later. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 990, l. 54, 72.

². Shpanov, Pervyi udar; Shpanov, “Pervyi udar.” The fantasy novella had been completed back in 1937, under the title Twelve Hours of War, and slated for publication by the Union of Soviet Writers publishing house, but the main censor had blocked it on the grounds that it was aesthetically “hopeless.” “Dokladnaia zapiska agitpropa TsK M. A. Suslovu po povodu izdaniia knigi ‘podzhigateli’ N. N. Shapnova” (April 20, 1949): <http://alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/is-sues-doc/69631>. It would be republished with other stories in summer 1939 by Sovetskii pisatel’. See also Ulam, Stalin, 492.

³. Vishnevskii, “Kniga o budushchei voine.”

⁴. Yezhov had tried to take Litvinov down. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 184–5. On Jan. 1, 1939, in verification of 22,000 people with access to classified materials in people’s commissariats and central agencies of USSR and RSFSR, more than 3,000 were fired. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 361–2.

⁵. DVP SSSR, XX: 579 (Litvinov to Maisky, Oct. 29, 1937).

⁶. The perspicacious British envoy Chilton observed “bitter disappointment” in Moscow over Munich, noting that the Kremlin “would like more than ever to pursue a policy of isolation if they could safely do so, [but] realize that, after Munich, they can afford to risk isolation even less than they could before.” Neilson, Britain, Soviet Russia, 257 (citing Chilton to FO, disp. 442 Oct. 18, 1938, FO 371/22289/N5164/97/38: minute, Collier, Oct. 28, 1938).

⁷. Edwards, British Government and the Spanish Civil War, 130 (July 5, 1938).

⁸. George Kennan, “The War Problem of the Soviet Union” (March 1935), George F. Kennan Papers, Box 1, Mudd Library, Princeton University, reprinted in Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 176–83 (at 176).

⁹. One group of analysts has argued that he began with a genuine commitment to achieve “collective security” with the West, only to sour on this option as a result of Anglo-French behavior. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security. Diametrically opposed, another group of analysts has insisted Stalin was bent all along on a deal with Hitler. Hochman, Failure of Collective Security. Stalin pursued both options. What neither group fully appreciated was the extent to which he was not the driver of events.

¹⁰. The British especially had looked to non-Nazi members of the German cabinet such as Baron von Neurath (foreign minister), General von Blomberg (war minister), and Hjalmar Schacht (economics minister), all of whom were gone by 1938. Then the British elevated Göring to the role of presumed restraining influence on the Nazi “wild” men around Hitler. Watt, “British Intelligence,” 249.

11. Bond, Chief of Staff, I: 155–6 (Aug. 8, 1938).

12. Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, I: 47, 68, 80.

13. Hitler, because of its association with Bolshevism, had rejected the term “dictator” and preferred to be known as the Führer of the German race, viewing democracy, dictatorship, and Judentum as of a piece. Nolte, “Diktatur,” I: 922; Schmitt, Die Diktatur; Cobban, Dictatorship. Baehr, “Dictatorship.”

14. Krivitskii, “Iz vospominanii sovetskogo kommunistu.”

15. In 1933, Hitler had arranged that all private documents concerning his childhood and youth were confiscated. These would be destroyed in April 1945. Ullrich, Hitler: Ascent, 17.

16. Ryback, Hitler's Private Library. Some 1,200 volumes of Hitler's 16,000-volume library are in the Library of Congress.

17. Hitler had met Mari Reiter, a pretty blonde, in Berchtesgaden in fall 1926; he was thirty-seven, she was sixteen. Her father was a founding member of the local Social Democrat Party and she ran a clothing shop. He called her “my dear child”; she called him Wolf. Their intimacy was episodic. Hitler met Eva Braun in Hoffmann's Munich studio. He was then forty; she was seventeen, middle-class, pretty. He took her for sausages and beer under a false name (Herr Wolf), but initially she rebuffed him. Hitler's main affections were directed at his niece, Geli Raubal, a girl with dark, wavy brown hair who resided in his Munich apartment, but in Sept. 1931 she was found dead there, shot with a revolver, and scandal rocked Munich. But Hitler was absent from the city that day. Geli's demise proved Eva's opening: in fall 1932, still living in Munich but despairing over her infrequent access to Hitler, she shot herself with her father's pistol, but survived. She tried and failed to kill herself again in 1935. By early 1936, she and Hitler had become a regular, if non-public unmarried couple. At the Reich Chancellery in Berlin, the company was almost all male, but at the Berghof alpine sanctuary, Hitler had afforded Eva a private apartment, next to his bedroom, and she presided as mistress of the retreat, present at meals (seated to his left) and at his ramblings on race and global conquest. Kershaw, Hitler: 1889–1936, 353; Görtemaker, Eva Braun.

18. Speer, Erinnerungen, 116.

19. Ullrich, Hitler: Ascent, 380–411; Hanfstaengl, Zwischen Weissem und Braunem Haus, 165; Speer, Spandauer Tagebücher, 523; Joachimsthaler, Hitlers Liste, 362; Ribbentrop, Zwischen London und Moskau, 48.

20. Speer, Inside the Third Reich, 140, 154. When films were shown, bodyguards and some of the female staff were admitted.

21. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, II/ii: 251 (March 29, 1932).

22. Neumann, Behemoth; Hayes, “Polycracy and Policy,” 190–210; Broszat, Hitler State; Broszat, Der Staat Hitlers. See also Trevor-Roper, Last Days of Hitler, 54; and Overy, Göring, 4.

23. On Oct. 28, 1938, the Head of the Reich Chancellery (Lammers)—the link between Hitler and state ministers—had written to Hitler's adjutant begging to report on urgent state matters, adding that he had not spoken with the Führer for more than six weeks. Noakes and Pridham, Nazism, II: 245.

24. Speer, Inside the Third Reich, 145.

25. Wiedemann, Der Mann, 69; also available, translated, in Noakes and Pridham, Nazism, II: 207–8. After 1933, Hitler almost never wrote anything either. The important exception was perhaps his “Four Year Memorandum” (1936), written in anger and frustration at the 1935–6 economic crisis; Hitler passed copies of the memorandum only to two people, both in the military: Göring and Blomberg. (Much later, a third copy went to Speer.) The Economics Minister did not get a copy. Kershaw, “Working towards the Führer,” 90.

26. Stalin “enjoyed settling . . . trivial issues,” one biographer has noted. He “got used to the idea that people couldn't manage without him, that he must do everything.” Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 147.

27. Kershaw, Nazi Dictatorship, 70.

28. Ullrich, Hitler: Ascent, 397 (citing BA Koblenz N 1340/384); Speer, Erinnerungen, corrected ms. (2nd version), chapter 1; and Schroeder, Er War Mein Chef, 78–81.

29. Shirer, Rise and Fall, 275–6. As Bracher noted, “among the men closest to the Führer, all joined long before the big wave of newcomers in March 1933.” They were distinguished by “the right of immediate access.” Bracher, German Dictatorship, 277; Bracher, Die nationalsozialistische Machtergreifung, 607.

30. Kershaw, “Nature of the Hitler Dictatorship,” 117; Kershaw, Hitler: 1889–1936, 527–91; Noakes and Pridham, Nazism, II: 207. Adolf Eichmann would testify that, “No sooner had Hitler made a speech—and he invariably touched on the Jewish question—then every party or government department felt that it was up to them to do something.” When it came to specific incidents—such as the pogrom known as Kristallnacht (Night of Broken Glass), on Nov. 8–9, 1938, which would leave around 100 Jews dead and 7,500 Jewish businesses vandalized—Hitler explicitly approved the action. On Dec. 6, 1938, Göring warned the Gauleiters against initiatives predicated upon the Führer’s presumed wishes. Von Lang, Eichman Interrogated, 59; Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, VI: 179–81 (Nov. 10, 1938); Friedlander, “Path that Led into the Abyss.” See also Rebenitsch, Führerstaat und Verwaltung. Kershaw presented the concept very broadly—a small businessman besting a competitor by questioning his Aryan credentials; ordinary people perniciously denouncing neighbors to the Gestapo to settle private scores—and in that guise, it could be tantamount to just living under Nazi rule. Kershaw himself writes, moreover, that “there was never any suggestion that Hitler might be bypassed or ignored, that anyone but he could make a key decision. And, once he finally decided to act, he did so . . . with ruthlessness.” Kershaw, Hitler: 1889–1936, 328. See also Kershaw, “Uniqueness of Nazism”; and Mommsen, “Hitler’s Position,” 163–88; Kershaw, Nazi Dictatorship (4th ed.), 59–79. The basic idea that minions were in competition to gain the favor of the Führer, creating a dynamic that radicalized policy, appears in Hannah Arendt. Seweryn Bialer had called this phenomenon “preemptive obedience.” Bialer, Stalin’s Successors.

31. Zhuravlyov’s denunciation followed the formation of the commission on the NKVD. Beria had passed the letter to Stalin on Oct. 13, 1938. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 249–50; Na prieme, 245–6. See also Shreider, NKVD iznuri, 237. Zhuravlyov briefly got a promotion to Moscow, but Beria would send him to run the Karaganda camps. Yezhov’s response—accepting guilt, claiming poor health, confessing he “had taken badly the appointment of Beria as my deputy. I saw in this an element of lack of trust towards me,” and requesting to resign—is misdated as Sept. (rather than Nov.) 23, 1938. Kostrychenko and Khazanov, “Konets Kar’ery Ezhova,” 129–30 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 82–4); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoie upravlenie, 552–4 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 82–4); Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 355–9 (RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 265, l. 16–26ob.). See also Sudoplatov and Sudoplatov, Memoirs of an Unwanted Witness, 59. This is another example where Sudoplatov’s memoir comports with archival materials.

32. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 355–9, at 357 (from APRE, f. 57, op. 1, d. 265, l. 16–26ob.).

33. Kostrychenko and Khazanov, “Konets Kar’ery Ezhova,” 131 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 34–5); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoie upravlenie, 611 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 34–5).

34. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 354–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 58, l. 61–2); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoie upravlenie, 611–2; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 35 (appointment of Beria). The last of the infamous execution lists for 1938 was dated Sept. 29: APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 409–19: <http://stalin.memo.ru/images/intro.htm>. But Volkogonov, citing military archives, claimed that Stalin, having received some 383 extended lists of names for execution in 1937–38, received yet another on Dec. 12, 1938, containing 3,167 names, albeit without even the charges or the results of any “investigation.” Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, I/ii: 301 (citing TsAMO, f. 32, op. 701323, d. 38, l. 14–6).

35. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 255–6. Of the 14,500 new NKVD employees in 1939, around 11,000 came from the party apparatus or Communist Youth League. Of the 3,460 newcomers in the central NKVD, 3,242 were party apparatchiks and Komsomol. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 491–502. There was no hint of societal rebellion. In early 1939, the police discovered a self-styled “fascist organization” in Moscow. Evidently, its handful of youthful members had fashioned a flag and put up seventy posters on the eve of Red Army Day, drew some graffiti, and wrote poems. They also seem to have discussed Nazism, anti-Semitism, and Russian nationalism. Four arrests were made; three of them turned out to have been nineteen years old when they joined the group, and the organizer was seventeen. The NKVD produced five volumes on the case. Rittersporn, Anguish, 174 (citing GARF, f. 5446, op. 81a, d. 335, l. 109–14).

- ³⁶. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 332 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 39, d. 54, l. 114, 119, 154).
- ³⁷. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 146 (TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 6, d. 11, l. 185). Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 629–30 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1004, l. 22). See also Knight, Beria, 91. Another 1,960 operatives in the NKVD would be arrested in 1939, including border guards and Gulag. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 151; Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 259. Some 7,372 NKVD personnel were let go in 1939, not all of whom were arrested. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 501; all told, some 60 percent of NKVD personnel would turn over between Oct. 1936 and the end of 1939, while 21,088 new people were promoted to operative positions in 1939. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 259.
- ³⁸. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 495.
- ³⁹. As of Oct. 1, 1936, of the 110 most senior operatives in state security, 43 had been Jews (declared), and 42 had been eastern Slavs (Russians, Ukrainians, Belorussians), along with 9 Latvians, 5 Poles, and 2 ethnic Germans; by Sept. 1938, of the 150 most senior ranks, 98 were ethnic Russians and 32 Jews, with no Latvians and 1 Pole. By 1939, there would be 122 Russians, 6 Jews, and 12 Georgians. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 492–500.
- ⁴⁰. Simonov, Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia, 58 (dated Feb. 27, 1979).
- ⁴¹. The Georgia NKVD was given to Avksenti Rapava, Beria's minion who had helped pulverize Abkhazia. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 89 (Beria to Stalin, Oct. 21, 1937).
- ⁴². The transfer took place in Aug. 1938, with Beria's promotion. Merkulov: RGANI, f. 5, op. 30, d. 4, l. 76–7; letter, to Malenkov, July 23, 1953; "'Khochetsia prokiasit' den' i chas moego znakovstva s Beriia,'" 101 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 465, l. 2–28); Tumshis, VChK, 211.
- ⁴³. Kuromiya and Peploniński, "Stalin und die Spionage," 29. Amid Stalin's self-inflicted chaos, NKVD operatives placed one foreign ambassador's perflustered letter into the envelope of another. Plotnikova, "Organy," 77, 79.
- ⁴⁴. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 162–3 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 7, d. 4, l. 14).
- ⁴⁵. Kochik, "Sovetskaiia voennaia razvedka," (Dec. 13, 1938). Khaustov writes that "by the results of the special reports that came to Stalin during the second half of the 1930s, one can judge that we did not succeed in recruiting valuable sources of information in European representative offices." Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 292.
- ⁴⁶. Jacobsen, Nationalsozialistische Aussenpolitik; Maser, Hitlers Mein Kampf; Hildebrand, "Hitlers Mein Kampf. Propaganda oder Programm?"
- ⁴⁷. Jackel, Hitler's Worldview, 47–66. Hitler did not use anti-Semitism as a vote-gathering or scapegoating ploy to come to power, but was using power to realize a deeply held anti-Semitic agenda. Kershaw, Nazi Dictatorship (4th ed.), 93–132.
- ⁴⁸. Heiden had been the correspondent for the liberal Frankfurter Zeitung in his hometown in the 1920s, watching Hitler's rabble-rousing, then in 1933 had gone into exile in the Saarland, before moving to Switzerland and eventually France. "The 'hero' of this book is neither a superman nor a puppet," he wrote in the preface (dated 1935). "He is a very interesting contemporary and, viewed quantitatively, a man who has stirred up the masses more than anyone else in human history." He depicted Hitler as both the reflection of and the antithesis to Europe, which, he argued, was a community of shared interests and of democracy that provided for freedom and peace. He called for a new "people's parliament, constituted by freely elected representatives of all nations," to replace "the conference of diplomats and bureaucrats in Geneva." Heiden, Hitler, I: 6, 330; Heiden, Hitler, II: 267, 369. Volume 1 was translated as Hitler: A Biography (New York: A. A. Knopf, 1936).
- ⁴⁹. Yaney, "War and the Evolution of Russian Government," 302–3.
- ⁵⁰. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 30–2.
- ⁵¹. "If there is any fighting in Europe to be done," British Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin had told a group of parliamentarians in 1936, "I should like to see the Bolsheviks and the Nazis doing it." He also remarked: "If he [Hitler] moves East, I shall not break my heart." Middlemas and Barnes, Baldwin, 947; Carley, "Soviet Foreign Policy."
- ⁵². Bullard also complained of his colleague, the British ambassador to Moscow, that "the dishonesty of the Soviet leaders does not disgust him." Bullard and Bullard, Inside Stalin's Russia, 144, 151.
- ⁵³. Carley, 1939.

54. "We are in the remarkable position of not wanting to quarrel with anybody because we have got most of the world already, or the best parts of it, and we only want to keep what we have got and prevent others from taking it away from us," Admiral Sir A. E. Chatfield had observed privately in mid-1934. "We are a very rich and very vulnerable Empire and there are plenty of poor adventurers who are not far away who look on us with hungry eyes," Chamberlain had written in a private letter (Jan. 16, 1938). Thorne, Limits of Foreign Policy, 397–8 (letter to Warren Fisher, June 4, 1934); Freiling, Life of Neville Chamberlain, 323 (Chamberlain to Mrs. Morton Prince).

55. Haas, Ideological Origins of Great Power Politics, 105–45. See also Neilson, Britain, Soviet Russia.

56. Overy, Twilight Years.

57. Gibbs, Ordeal in England, 409–10.

58. Schroeder, "Munich and the British Tradition."

59. Caputi, Neville Chamberlain and Appeasement; McDonough, Neville Chamberlain; Mills, "Chamberlain-Grandi Conversations"; Parker, Chamberlain and Appeasement.

60. Layne, "Security Studies"; Peden, Arms, Economics, 127, 138; and Reynolds, In Command of History, 99.

61. McKercher, "Deterrence," 119.

62. Kennedy, "Tradition of Appeasement," 195.

63. Carley, 1939, 108; Haslam, "Soviet-German Relations," 792 (citing a 1982 lecture by Lord Home, an eyewitness to the Munich Pact).

64. Tooze, Deluge.

65. Indigenous enmities in Eastern Europe would eventually prove enabling to Hitler, creating a kind of competition for his favor. Not for nothing did Czesław Miłosz recoil at the region's "acute national hatreds." Miłosz, Native Realm, 23.

66. Wolfer, Britain and France.

67. Dullin, Men of Influence, 265, citing AVP RF, f. 136, op. 22, pap. 172, d. 865 (Litvinov to Surits, Oct. 17, 1938); DVP SSSR, XXI: 618–9 (Litvinov to Surits, Nov. 4, 1938); Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War, 136. Stalin had Potyomkin reaffirm to Paris that their 1935 treaty remained in force. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 79–80 (Jan. 27, 1939).

68. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 301 (RGASPI, f. 71, op. 25, d. 3695); Laney, "Military Implementation of the Franco-Russian Alliance." Pravda and Izvestiya voiced disappointment on the second anniversary of the signing of the May 2, 1935, Franco-Soviet Pact. By late 1937, even Litvinov had broached the possibility to a French correspondent of Soviet rapprochement with Nazi Germany, an attempted warning to Paris. Dreifort, "French Popular Front," 222, citing Bullitt (Paris) to Sec. of State, June 17, 1937, State Department, no. 851.00/1684; Cot, Triumph of Treason, 362–3; Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 153–4.

69. DDF, 2e série, V: 311–2 (March 30, 1937), 363–5 (April 8), 507–9 (April 21), 510–1 (April 21), 613–4 (April 29), 614–5 (April 29), 615–8 (April 29); Coulondre, De Staline à Hitler, 44; Ford and Schorske, "Voice in the Wilderness," 556–61.

70. Dreifort, "French Popular Front." An internal French analysis—"Reflections on the Possible Consequences of Franco-Soviet military contacts" (May 1937)—had underscored how any deepening military ties with Moscow would risk alienating not just "Germany, Poland, Romania, Yugoslavia," but Great Britain. "French security rests above all on a close entente with England," the analysis noted, and "a Franco-Soviet military agreement risks putting in jeopardy the warmth and candor of Franco-English relations." Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 140–1, citing DDF, 2e série, V: 647–8 (May 1, 1937); Bell, France and Britain, 224–5; Adamthwaite, France, 49–50.

71. Jackson, France and the Nazi Menace, 237.

72. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 140. Litvinov had informed Coulondre that he could do nothing "to suppress the French Communist party," but that he "did not care in the least what the French government did to them. All that interested Russia was the military alliance with France." Carley, "Five Kopecks," 48–9 (citing PRO FO 371 20702, C362O/532/62: note of E. Rowe-Dutton, British embassy, Paris, June 17, 1937, MAE RC, Russie/2057, dos. 3: André-Charles Corbin, French ambassador in London, April 17, 1937); PRO FO 371 20702, C362O/532/62: (Note by R. Vansittart, May 13, 1937), and C3685/532/62: "Extract from a record of conversation at a lunch given by the Secretary of State to M. Delbos & Léger on May 15, 1937"); DVP SSSR, XX: 43–6 (Potyomkin with Chautemps, Jan. 19, 1937), 227–8 (Potyomkin to Surits in Berlin, May 4, 1937).

73. Kaiser, Economic Diplomacy, 239. In Jan. 1939, Léon Blum (Daladier's recent predecessor as prime minister) imported Litvinov for an invitation to Moscow to negotiate directly with Stalin for a "broad antifascist bloc." Blum also mentioned possibly merging the socialist and communist parties in France. The Soviet politburo formally approved the meeting request, but the trip never happened. Adibekov et al., Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa, 368 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 24, l. 85); DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 49 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 2, d. 11, l. 39).

74. "Stalin considered vocal music as the finest form of music," Jelagin thought. Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 297–9.

75. Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 268–75; Elagin, Ukroshchenie iskusstv, 302–9. Nazarov would be demoted to deputy chief of the state publishing house on April 1, 1939, and replaced by his deputy Mikhail Khrapchenko (b. 1904).

76. Novikova, "Obruchennyi s bogom," 427–8. Novikova, a journalist, was only born in 1938, and evidently heard the story from Kozlovsky. Concerning Stalin's views toward Kozlovsky, see also Gromyko, Pamiatnoe, 203.

77. Ivanov, Aleksei Ivanov, 159; Elagin, Ukroshchenie iskusstv, 332–3.

78. Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 296–7.

79. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i NKVD, 9 (APRF, f. 3, op. 57, d. 96, l. 110).

80. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 359–63 (TsA FSB, f. 3–os, op. 6, d. 1, l. 1–6); APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 409, l. 3–9). The commission concluded its work on Jan. 10, 1939; the report was dated Jan. 29.

81. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 502 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 5086, l. 1–2). In June 1939, Duklesky would insert twenty-six line-item corrections in Vishnevsky's screenplay for First Cavalry Army—a copy of the document made its way into Stalin's files (510–2: d. 165, l. 199–201).

82. Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 10, dated 26/27 Dec. 1938. Stalin had edited the proposal by Beria, composed at Stalin's wish, to restrict NKVD surveillance and arrests of nomenklatura. Khaustov, "Razvitie sovetskikh organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti," 364. An additional decree was issued reiterating the requirement for the NKVD to obtain army permission for arrests of officers and soldiers. Suvenirov, "Narkomat oborony i NKVD v predvoennye gody," 34 (citing RGVA f. 4, op. 15, d. 21, l. 3ob.).

83. APRF, f. 3, op. 22, d. 91, l. 168–70.

84. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i NKVD, 14–5 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 6, l. 145–6); Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 27; Iakovlov et al., Reabilitatsiia: Politicheskie protsessy, 40–1 (a copy of the telegram found in the Dagestan regional party committee: all such documents had to be returned to the Central Committee, so this one evidently survived thanks to negligence); Sluzhba bezopasnosti, 1993, no. 6: 2; Afanas'ev, Inogo ne dano, 561–2n2 (wrong date of Jan. 20, 1939). Kaganovich later testified (in 1957) that Stalin had written out the decree by hand. Kovaleva et al., "Posledniaia 'antipartiinaia' gruppa," 86–9.

85. Prazmowska, Eastern Europe, 228.

86. DGFP, series D, DAR, V: 167–8 (Ribbentrop and Beck, Jan. 26, 1939); Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 171–3 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 300, d. 2075, l. 46–9; Surits, Jan. 27, 1939); God krizisa, I: 194–6; Mel'tiukhov, Sovetsko-pol'skie voiny (2001); Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 160–4. Citing hearsay from Hans-Adolf von Moltke, Luftwaffe Lieutenant-General Alfred Gerstenberg, the German air force attaché in Poland in 1938 (who would fall into Soviet captivity and be interrogated on Aug. 17, 1945) would assert that Hermann Göring, while traveling to Poland on the pretext of hunting, bribed Beck to work on behalf of Nazi Germany. Gerstenberg knew how much the Soviets despised Beck. Tainy diplomatii Tre'tego Reikka, 581 (TsA FSB, d. N-21147, t. 1, l. 35–53).

87. DGFP, series D, V: 159–61; Cienciala, "Poland in British and French Policy," at 202, citing DDF, 2e série, XVI: 196 (May 17, 1939), and DBFP, 3rd series, VI: appendix II (foreign office on Danzig, May 5, 1939). Beck had also pursued "Third Europe," a bloc to be led by Poland with Romania, Hungary, Italy, and Yugoslavia, but that had failed amid mutual hostilities. Roberts, "Diplomacy of Colonel Beck," 579–614; Kornat, "Polish Idea of 'The Third Europe.'" On the intense dislike for Beck even inside Polish circles, see Lukes, Czechoslovakia between Hitler and Stalin, 165n124.

88. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 26–7 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 9717, d. 2, l. 93–5: Feb. 10, 1939). Retrospectively, a Polish journalist argues that, given the distasteful options, Beck should have yielded to Hitler's demands for Danzig and an extra-territorial highway through the Corridor and joined him in an attack against the Soviet Union. Zychowicz, Pakt Ribbentrop-Beck. For Beck's contemplation of possible concessions and his worries over the loss of international prestige and domestic political earthquake, see Weinberg, "Proposed Compromise"; Weinberg, "German Foreign Policy."

89. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanenu, 198–9; God krizisa, I: 228; Gavrilo, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 28.

90. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 169–70.

91. From 1938, the regime had begun a crash radio construction program. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 369–70 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 160. l. 4).

92. Baynes, Speeches of Adolf Hitler, I: 737–41; Hitler, untitled speech; Mommsen, "Hitler's Reichstag Speech"; Kershaw, "Hitler Myth," 240–1.

93. In a Jan. 25, 1939, circular, the Nazi foreign ministry identified the United States as the "headquarters of world Jewry." DGFP, series D, V: 926–33.

94. Gerwarth, Bismarck Myth, 151 (citing "Wegbereiter des neuen Reiches," Völkischer Beobachter, Feb. 15, 1939).

95. At the first meeting of the Reich Defense Council, on Nov. 18, 1938, Göring had told those assembled, "Gentlemen, the financial situation looks critical." Goebbels wrote in his diary: "The financial situation of the Reich is catastrophic. We must look for new ways. It cannot go on like this. Otherwise we will be faced with inflation." Mason, Arbeitsklasse, 925; Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, VI: 219 (Dec. 13, 1938). In early Jan. 1939, the Reichsbank Directorate sent Hitler a collective petition urging "financial restraint" to avoid the "threatening danger of inflation." Hitler, upon seeing eight signatures, responded, "That is mutiny." Twelve days later he fired Schacht as Reichsbank president. But that (and a mass of resignations from the bank's board) did nothing to alleviate the circumstance. Schacht, My First Seventy-Six Years, 392–4. Nazi Germany also canceled at the last minute a planned visit to Moscow in Feb. 1939 by Karl Schnurre, humiliating the Soviets.

96. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 161–2.

97. Given the labor shortages—estimated to be at least 1 million as of Jan. 1939—foreign laborers looked necessary for factories and farms. Mason, Arbeiterklasse, 847–55; Mason, Nazism, 106–113.

98. Bezymenskii, Stalin und Hitler, 183–209. Politburo approval came on Jan. 21, 1939.

99. Lisovskii, SSSR i kapitalisticheskoe okruzenie. See also Barghoorn, Soviet Image of the United States, 18.

100. Zemskov, "Zakliuchennyye," 55–6; Joyce, "Soviet Penal System," 104. A Nov. 17, 1938, report by the party cell in the Gulag finance department stated that the Gulag had attained just 71.6 percent of its assigned plan targets, including just 62.7 percent of railway construction. The report stated that costs were high, labor productivity low, and mismanagement so rampant it could not all be attributed to deliberate wrecking. Pliner, the Gulag head, was soon sacked and arrested. Afanas'ev et al., Istoriia stalinskogo gulaga, III: 148–56 (Chugunikhin); Joyce, "Soviet Penal System," 103. Beria, in April 1939, wrote to Molotov claiming that he lacked slave laborers to complete his assigned tasks—a shortage across Gulag of some 400,000 prisoners. Beria wanted a freeze on new projects assigned to Gulag and a recall of those prisoners loaned out on contracts to non-Gulag enterprises, and he sought measures to improve slave laborers' diet and health. Afanas'ev et al., Istoriia stalinskogo gulaga, III: 162–3; Khlevniuk, History of the Gulag, 203–5.

101. Nordlander, "Evolution of the Dal'stroi Bosses"; Kozlov, "Perviy direktor"; Ginzburg, Within the Whirlwind, 290–304. Stalin had congratulated and rewarded Berzin on a number of occasions. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 56, l. 13 (Feb. 8, 1937).

102. Dal'stroi had grown from 62,703 recorded prisoners in late 1936 to 93,978 by the end of 1938. Conquest, Inside Stalin's Secret Police, 106; Afanas'ev et al., Istoriia Stalinskogo Gulaga, II: 153–4 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 58, l. 77, 80); Nordlander, "Evolution of the Dal'stroi Bosses." Stalin received A. A. Khodyrev, deputy chief of Dal'stroi, twice (Jan. 24 and Feb. 7, 1939). Na prieme, 251, 253. Some of the ships used by the Soviets to transport prisoners were British and American built. Bollinger, Stalin's Slave Ships.

103. Sovietland, 1939, no. 4: 10.

104. Dallin and Nicolaevsky, Forced Labor, 133–34; Nikolaevskii, "Dal'stroi," 256–7; Conquest, Kolyma.

105. Rittersporn, Anguish, 174 (citing GARF, f. 5446, op. 81a, d. 335, l. 109–14).

106. Stalin had instructed the teacher to be firmer. In fact, the teacher and school director were fired. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh sem'i, 60–2 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1553, l. 9; June 8, 1938).

107. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh sem'i, 58–9 (l. 20–22; Dec. 8, 1938); Polianskii, 10 let s Vasiliiem Staliny, 17–8; Sokolov, Vasilii Stalin, 76–8; Tokaev, Stalin Means War, 120.

108. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh sem'i, 60–2 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1553, l. 26–8).

109. Vasily also "was a good athlete, rode a horse with aplomb, and was fond of motorcycles and cars." Polianskii, 10 let s Vasiliiem Staliny, 20.

110. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 145–6. She recalled that "by 1937 or 1938, except for my nurse, there was no one left of the people my mother had found." Even the long-standing head of the household staff, Karolina Til, "in spite of the fact that she'd been with us for ten years and was practically a member of the family," was replaced by a young Georgian woman from Beria's NKVD. "The whole staff at Zubalovo was changed, and new people whom none of us knew appeared at my father's house in Kunstevo as well." Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 143–4, 123–4.

111. Waltz, Theory of International Politics, 161–76 (esp. 3, 168); Posen, Sources of Military Doctrine, 61–3; Mearshimer, Tragedy of Great Power Politics, 13, 129; Posen, "Competing Images." See also Christensen and Snyder, "Chain Gangs and Passed Bucks."

112. Partiinoe stroitel'stvo, Oct. 1936: 3–5, July 1937: 42–44. In Aug. 1938, the apparatus streamlined recruitment procedures. Partiinoe stroitel'stvo, Aug. 1938: 63–4, Oct. 1938: 79–80.

113. RGAKFD, ed. khr. 3049, 3050, 3051.

114. XVIII s'ezd Vsesoiuznoi Kommunisticheskoi partii (b), 149.

115. Kumanev and Kulikova, Protivostoianie, 224–44; Pravda, Feb. 27, 1939; Drizdo, Nadezhda Konstantinovna Krupskaya.

116. Krupskaya became deathly ill the night of a pre-birthday celebration outside Moscow in Arkhangelskoe, in a narrow circle with her longtime secretary Vera Drizdo, as well as Gleb and Zinaida Kryzhanowski, Dmitry Ulyanov, Felix Kon, and Męzyński's sister Ludmila. Stalin had restrained himself from arresting Krupskaya, despite their mutual enmity, or Maria Ulyanova, both of whom continued to live in the apartment they had shared with Lenin. Lenin's former secretaries Lidia Fotiyeva and Maria Volodicheva also went untouched. Fotiyeva (b. 1881) from 1938 was posted to the Central Lenin Museum. Pravda, Aug. 28, 1975.

117. Rodnoi Lenin (Vladimir Il'ich) i ego sem'ia: http://leninism.su/private/4131-rod_noj-lenin.html?showall=&start=1.

118. Pravda, Feb. 28, 1939 (A. E. Badaev). See also Pravda, March 3, 1939; and Izvestiia, Feb. 28 and March 1, 1939.

119. Trotsky imagined that "Stalin always lived in fear of a protest on her part. She knew far too much." New International, 5/4 (April 1939): 117. In 1937–38, at the commissariat of enlightenment, Krupskaya had received upward of 400 letters per day, mostly asking for her intercession, which she was powerless to give.

120. Zhukov, Vsesoiuznoe soveshchanie, 260.

121. Kumanev and Kulikova, Protivostoianie, 243 (citing GARF, f. upravdelami SNK SSR, otel sekretariata, d. 4, l. 12). Nonetheless, Stalin would permit remembrance of the first anniversary of Krupskaya's death: see the news chronicle, RGAKFD film 1–3163.

122. XVIII s'ezd VKP (b), 10–21 maria 1939 goda: stenograficheski otchet, 175, 561; Medvedev, Let History Judge, 529. "It was the fault of the Comintern workers that they allowed themselves to be deceived by the class enemy, failed to detect his maneuvers in time, and were late in taking measures against the contamination of the Communist parties by enemy elements," Manuilsky, a survivor, told the 18th Party Congress. Land of Socialism Today and Tomorrow, 89. In May 1939, Proskryobyshev moved to create a new department—staffed by twenty-nine people—in the special sector to handle correspondence of ordinary Soviet inhabitants with Stalin. Khlevniuk, "Letters to Stalin," 329 (citing APRF, f. 3, op. 22, d. 65, l. 37).

123. Khlevniuk, "Economic Officials in the Great Terror," 57.

124. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/ii: 52–3; Khlevniuk, Khvoziain, 351 (RGASPI, f. 477, op. 1, d. 41, l. 62–83, 143–4; f. 17, op. 2, d. 773, l. 128); Khlevniuk, "Objectives of the Great Terror," 170; Davies, "Soviet Economy," 11–38

(at 31).

125. Whereas between 1918 and 1928 the USSR had graduated an average of just 46,000 new specialists per year, the number would climb to 335,000 per annum in the period 1938–41, which would give the Soviet Union nearly 1 million specialists with (some form of) higher education as of Dec. 31, 1940. Unger, “Stalin’s Renewal.”

126. Pravda-5, 1995, no. 1: 8 (Chuev via Mgeladze).

127. Whereas in 1928 the country counted about 4 million white-collar employees; by 1939, that number reached nearly 14 million. Lewin, “Bureaucracy and the Stalinist State,” 63. The proportion of working-class party members, even by official statistics (which inflated worker social origins), would drop from 8 percent (1933) to 3 percent (1941). Rittersporn, “From Working Class,” 187.

128. This was true from 1932 onward. DeWitt, Soviet Professional Manpower, 179.

129. “The enormous and unjustified growth, cost, proliferation, inefficiency, nepotism, narrow-mindedness, false reporting, inflexibility and arbitrariness,” the leading historian of the Soviet state summarized, “defied all party and other controls.” Lewin, “Bureaucracy and the Stalinist State,” 65.

130. Lewin, Russia/USSR/Russia, 204–6. An extraordinary seven of eight applicants for candidate membership in the party would be accepted between April and Oct. 1939; over the year, the party would grow by a record 1.1 million new full members.

131. An editorial in the Menshevik émigré newspaper duly noted the transition, commenting, “this is . . . the Congress of a new party which should be called Stalinist.” “Pered s’ezdom,” Sotsialisticheskie vestnik, March 15, 1939. See also Vishnevskii, “Stalin na XVIII s’ezde partii,” 73–83.

132. Pravda, March 11, 1939, reprinted in Sochineniia, XIV: 380–1.

133. Petrovsky was officially removed as a deputy chairman of the USSR Supreme Soviet presidium on May 31, 1939. He remained without employment for half a year, but then became deputy director of the Museum of the Revolution under Fyodor Samoilov, who knew him from the days in the Bolshevik Duma faction. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 407.

134. XVIII s’ezd VKP (b), 510–9; Pravda, March 20, 1939.

135. Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 221–2. Behind the scenes Zhdanov was said to have wisecracked about the terror. “Stalin complains that his pipe has disappeared,” Zhdanov supposedly joked. “I would give a lot to find it,” Stalin states. Within three days Beria has already unmasked ten thieves, each of whom confesses to being the one who stole Stalin’s pipe. A day later Stalin finds his pipe, which had fallen behind the couch.” Zhdanov, his interlocutor recalled, “laughed merrily at this terrible joke.” Iakovlev, Tsel’ zhizni (2nd ed.), 509.

136. Shvernink and one of his aides were trying to solve a difficult problem, and when the aide made a suggestion, Shvernink pointed out that it contradicted a Central Committee decree, to which the aide replied that this body could err. “It is difficult to describe what transpired with Nikolai Mikhailovich at these words. Reddening, he shouted, ‘Hands on the trouser seams, comrade Pogrebnoi, when you speak about the Central Committee, hands on the trouser seams!!!’” Guseinov, “Ves’m neodnoznachnyi N. M. Shvernink,” 102.

137. The Beria household census form for 1939 listed their Moscow address as Malaya Nikitskaya, 28, apt. 1. Beria himself is not listed for some reason; the five listed were his wife, Nina [Nino] (34 years old), his mother, Marta (66 years old), his sister Akesha (32), his son Sergei [Sergo] (14), and the German nanny Ellia Almeshtigler (38), who was a student at the Moscow Institute of Economics and Finances. Koenker et al., Revelations, 344 (GARF, f. 9430, op. 1S, d. 166, l. 1–2). Kuropatkin died in 1925. Knox, “General Kuropatkin.”

138. At the dacha, the Berias’ neighbors were the Kaganoviches. Beria, My Father, 34–5. Svetlana recalls it as Chubar’s dacha, not Postyshev’s. Alliluyeva, Only One Year, 412–3. It is possible that Chubar had it after Postyshev. Postyshev and Chubar, arrested at different times, were shot the same day (Feb. 26, 1939).

139. “‘Khochtsia proklias’ den’ i chas moego znakomstva s Beriia,” 100–101 (APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 465, l. 2–28: Merkulov to Malenkov, July 23, 1933). Merkulov claimed that Beria never opened up to him.

140. Traktory i sel’khoz mashiny, 1967, no. 6: 2, no. 7: 41. On harvest exaggerations for 1937–40, see Davies et al., Economic Transformation, 288nf. Tractors held by the regional MTS would rise from 7,100 in 1930 to 356,800 by 1937; harvester combines from 10,400 in 1933 to 96,300 by 1937.

141. Davies et al., Economic Transformation, 288nf; Zelenin, Stalinskaia 'revoliutsiia sverkhu', 262–7; Borisov, Proizvodstvennye kadry derevni, 200–1. Whereas about 3.3 million tons of grain had been exported in 1937–38, only 2 million tons would be exported in 1940 and the first half of 1941.

142. Osokina, Za fasadom, 201; Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, IV: 794–5 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 978, l. 62), 831–2 (f. 558, op. 11, d. 94, l. 17), 839 (d. 95, l. 3), 843–4 (l. 40–1), 862–4 (GANO, f. P-3, op. 2, d. 1063, l. 34–7), 868–74 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 3, d. 1292, l. 8–19), 886–90 (l. 247–57), 900–4 (l. 320–30), 913–4 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 982, l. 31–2). In 1936, Stalin had not objected to requests to mention in the regional press the assistance extended to regions suffering hunger (885–6: RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 55, l. 109).

143. Zelenin, Stalinskaia 'revoliutsiia sverkhu', 241–2 (RGASPI, f. 477, op. 1, d. 4, l. 114–5); Kollekhoz vo vtoroi, 24.

144. The first subdivision had taken place in Aug. 1937, when a separate machine building commissariat was formed. By 1941, there would be twenty-two separate industrial commissariats, one for each branch. Rees and Watson, “Politburo and Sovnarkom,” 24.

145. Davies, “Soviet Economy,” 32 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 336, l. 9–12). The author was Pakhomov, but this was not N. I. Pakhomov, the water transport commissar (who been shot in Aug. 1938). Stalin had Poskryobyshev forward the letter to Zhdanov.

146. Krokodil, 1939, no. 7; Chegodaeva, Dva lika vremeni, 50.

147. RGAKFD, ed. khr. 1–3050 (year 1939).

148. Reid, “Socialist Realism”; Bown, Socialist Realist Painting, 145–55, 180.

149. XVIII s'ezd VKP (b), 16.

150. “If I had said it right,” Molotov later explained, “Stalin would have felt that I was correcting him.” Pavlov, “Dve poslednie vstrechi”; Tucker, Stalin in Power, 586.

151. XVIII s'ezd VKP (b), 34, 26; Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/1: 10–1.

152. Pravda, March 11, 1939; XVIII s'ezd VKP(b), 15; Sochineniia, XIV: 337–8. For British reactions, see DBFP, 3rd series, IV: 210–7 (Henderson to Halifax, March 9, 1939), 260 (Henderson to Halifax, March 15), 266–9/8 (Halifax to Phipps, March 15), 278–9 (Henderson to Halifax, March 16). Ivan Maisky had written to Stalin in late 1937 on how to handle appeasement: “Let ‘Western democracies’ reveal their hand in the matter of the aggressors. What is the point of us pulling their chestnuts out of the fire for them? To fight together—by all means. To serve as cannon fodder for them—never!” Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, xxv (no citation).

153. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 205. Izvestiia’s foreign department did internally discuss the possibility of a change in foreign policy orientation, and the newspaper did suddenly discontinue its antifascist writings from Paris by “Paul Jocelyn” (a pseudonym of Ehrenburg’s). When Ehrenburg sought an explanation from Surits, the latter was said to have snapped, “Nothing is asked of you, and you are worried!” Ehrenburg, Sobranie sochinenii, IX: 228.

154. Sluch, “Germano-sovetskie otnosheniia,” 109 (citing Bundesarchiv Koblenz, Zsg. 101/12: 72).

155. From 1907 through 1914, Schulenburg had been a German consul in tsarist Russia. Sommer, Botschafter Graf Schulenburg. See also Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 19.

156. Schorske, “Two German Diplomats.” At the German embassy on Leontyev Lane, on March 5, 1932, five shots had been fired at Dirksen’s car, but he was not inside (one of the bullets struck an embassy counselor in the hand). A hasty trial linked the episode to the Polish embassy (a transparent Soviet effort to poison German-Polish relations). Dirksen, a parvenu aristocrat (from a long line of bourgeois civil servants), had been moved to Japan (1933–8), where he belatedly joined the Nazi Party (1936), and then to Britain (1938–9), where he succeeded Ribbentrop as ambassador and recognized that Chamberlain’s government was among Germany’s greatest political assets. Hilger, Incompatible Allies, 247–8. In 1938, Leontyev Lane would be renamed Stanislavsky Street, for the celebrated Russian theater director.

157. Maisky had written from London to Litvinov (Feb. 10, 1939) to the effect that war between the Axis and the “so-called” Western democracies was not imminent, though “one could not completely exclude such a possibility, especially in 1939,” because “matters depended on Hitler and Mussolini.” Maisky also wrote that Hitler “is little inclined to go full bore against Poland, let alone the USSR.” AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 3, d. 35, l. 51–3 (Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 1). Five days after the March 15 occupation of Czechoslovakia, Litvinov wrote to Stalin, latching on to Chamberlain’s dispatch to Moscow of a trade negotiator, Robert Hudson, but the Soviets put the onus on the British. "Since our many previous proposals have failed to yield results," Litvinov wrote to Hudson, "we do not now intend to advance any new proposals and are awaiting an initiative from those who must in some way indicate that they are ready to take measures to enter collective security." DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 209–11 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 2, d. 11, l. 154–8). DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 209–11 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, p. 2, d. 11, l. 154–8; March 20, 1939). The visit by Hudson would yield nothing, as Litvinov complained.

158. Watt, How War Came, 154.

159. Nowak, "Von der Karpatenukraine zum Karpatenland"; Winch, Republic for a Day; Kennan, From Prague after Munich, 58–75; Stercho, Diplomacy of Double Morality. Soon Mussolini, whom the Führer had not informed about his march into Czechoslovakia, responded by invading Albania, which would be incorporated into the Italian "empire."

160. Dokumenty i materialy kanuna vtoroi mirovoi voiny, II: 47.

161. A. Gerasimov, "O zakhvate Chechoslovakii Germaniei," RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 1237, l. 162–7. Litvinov had written to Malsky that the Western democracies were in essence saying to Hitler, "Go east, or we will unite with them [the Soviets] against you. I would not be surprised if Hitler undertakes the same gestures towards us." AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 4, d. 34, l. 39–41 (Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 1).

162. Volkogonov, Trotsky, 343–5; The Founding Conference of the Fourth International: Program and Resolutions (New York: The Socialist Workers Party, 1939).

163. On the eve of the Munich Pact, Trotsky had dismissed Stalin's policy of "collective security" against Nazi Germany as a "lifeless fiction" and predicted that "we may now expect with certainty Soviet diplomacy to attempt a rapprochement with Hitler." On the eve of Czechoslovakia's destruction, Trotsky wickedly observed that Hitler went from triumph to triumph, whereas "Stalin met only defeat and humiliation (China, Czechoslovakia, Spain)." Trotsky, Writings of Leon Trotsky, 1938–39, 29–30 (Sept. 22, 1938), 216–9 (March 11, 1939).

164. A plan would be presented to him in July 1939 and be approved in Aug. Soviet intelligence's documents on the Trotsky assassination efforts are said to be largely missing, except for the period Aug. 1940 to the end of 1941. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 91, 93, 109n1.

165. One of the abandoned field agents, code-named Felipe, would manage to get back to Moscow in Jan. 1940 and report details on Trotsky's security system and the comings and goings from his villa in Mexico, all of which he had undertaken to ascertain on his own; he would be sent back to Mexico to be part of the operations. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 94–5.

166. Eitingon had helped direct sabotage of rail lines and airfields, as a deputy to Orlov. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 29–36.

167. "This is not just an act of revenge, although Konovalts is an agent of German fascism," Stalin had supposedly explained to Sudoplatov. "Our goal is to behead the movement of Ukrainian fascism on the eve of war and force these gangsters to annihilate each other in a struggle for power." Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 23–4.

168. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 103.

169. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 64–7; Volkogonov, Trotsky, 441–54. Sudoplatov's visits to the Little Corner are not recorded in Stalin's Kremlin logbooks; Volkogonov's work and the documents he brought to bear strongly support Sudoplatov's overall veracity.

170. Eitingon was denounced by Peterss and Karakhan. Sharapov, Naum Eitingon, 70.

171. Schroeder, "Alliances 1815–1945," 195–222. More broadly, see Posen, Sources of Military Doctrine.

172. Posen, Sources of Military Doctrine.

173. On Nov. 10, 1938, Hitler told four hundred invited German journalists: "It was only out of necessity that for years I talked of peace. But it was now necessary gradually to re-educate the German people psychologically and make it clear that there are things which must be achieved by force." Noakes and Pridham, Nazism, III: 721–4.

174. Britain lost its Czechoslovakia intelligence station. Earlier, the Austrian station chief for British intelligence had been arrested in 1938 when the Nazis marched in. Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, I: 57.

175. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 29–33 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1237, l. 162ss–167ss.).

176. Parker, Chamberlain and Appeasement, 204–5; Salter, Personality in Politics, 85.

177. Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/i: 9–12.

- 178. DGFP, series D, VI: 91–6; DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 537–8n86. A Romanian-German timber agreement followed on May 13, 1939.
- 179. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 286 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 4, d. 105, l. 96–107).
- 180. DGFP, series D, VI: 121–4; Trial of the Major War Criminals, IV: 404 (Brauchitsch), III: 217. In March 1939, Lieutenant Colonel Stefan Mossor of the general inspectorate of the Polish armed forces wrote a memorandum urging the general staff “to prepare for Soviet air bases in the region of Brest and anticipate the march of Soviet forces primarily through northern Poland to attack East Prussia.” He was removed from his position.
- 181. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 230 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 2, d. 11, l. 172), 231 (pap. 20, d. 228, l. 1–2), 232 (pap. 1, d. 5, l. 117–8), 233 (l. 121).
- 182. Andrew, Defense of the Realm, 205.
- 183. French Yellow Book, 104 (George Bonnet to Léon Noël, French ambassador to Warsaw, March 31, 1939).
- 184. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor’be za mir nakanune, 290–1 (Maisky, 31, 1939); Falin, Soviet Peace Efforts, I: 300.
- 185. Gibbs, Grand Strategy, I: xxi–xxii, 689ff.
- 186. Interview in London, March 18, 1939; Fourth International (New York) 3/1 (1942): 117. Confronting Hitler would indeed cost the empire.
- 187. “As Prime Minister,” explained Strang, an adviser, “Chamberlain took increasingly into his own hands the conduct of foreign policy, or rather of that branch of foreign policy which might involve issues of peace or war, namely relations with the two European dictatorships”—meaning Germany and Italy. Strang, Home and Abroad, 124.
- 188. Aster, 1939, 14–16, 359–60. See also Bond, British Military Policy, 306; and Parker, Chamberlain and Appeasement, 214.
- 189. Chamberlain had assured the Cabinet that “it would, of course, be for us to determine what action threatened Polish independence. This would prevent us from becoming embroiled as the result of a frontier incident.” Newman, March 1939, 202 (citing CAB/98: Cabinet Minutes, March 31, 1939).
- 190. Strang, “Once More unto the Breach”; Newman, March 1939.
- 191. “It was in Spain that men learnt that one can be right and still be beaten, that force can vanquish spirit, and that there are times when courage is not its own reward,” Albert Camus would write. “It is this which explains why so many men throughout the world regard the Spanish drama as a personal tragedy.” Camus, “preface,” in Georges Bataille (ed.), L’Espagne libre.
- 192. Parker, Churchill and Appeasement, 156.
- 193. Thompson, Anti-Appeasers.
- 194. The gold was on deposit with the Bank for International Settlements, founded in 1930 in Switzerland, which used the Bank of England; still, the latter honored the request for transfer of the reserves. Blaazer, “Finance and the End of Appeasement.”
- 195. Watt, How War Came, 162–87; Cienciala, “Poland in British and French Policy,” reprinted in Finney, Origins of the Second World War, 413–33. On long-standing British sympathy for Germany’s claims to Danzig and the Corridor, see Cienciala, “German Propaganda.”
- 196. Steiner, Triumph of the Dark, 737–8.
- 197. Because Hitler could not attack the Soviet Union without bringing Poland into play, the French ambassador to the Soviet Union believed that, in effect, the “guarantee” to Poland brought about, indirectly, what Chamberlain had said he would never do: put Britain on the line to defend the USSR. Coulondre, De Staline à Hitler, 263.
- 198. Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 170.
- 199. DBFP, 3rd series, V: 104.
- 200. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 4–5.
- 201. On March 13, 1939, Frinovsky had written to Stalin recalling a conversation he had had in Molotov’s office in Jan. 1938 when, in front of Kaganovich and Mikoyan, Stalin had informed Frinovsky that a number of others had testified against him. Stalin had asked Frinovsky whether he was “honest before the party.” Frinovsky had answered affirmatively. “You will not let us down, then?” Stalin had said. “No,” Frinovsky had answered. What was this? A psychological game, theater, self-amusement, a moment of indecision? Toptygin, Neizvestnyi Beriia, 50.

- 202. “‘Druzhba narodov’: pervaiia polveka (1939–1989)”: <http://magazines.russ.ru/druzhba/site/history/i39.html>.
- 203. E. V. Tarle, Taleiran (Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1939).
- 204. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 237 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 180, l. 30). The Polish ambassador to Tokyo had been told by the Japanese foreign minister that the fisheries negotiations with the USSR were a matter not merely of economics but of national prestige, and that if a new agreement were not reached the Japanese “would undertake decisive steps, as I understand, of a military nature.” The Japanese foreign minister also said that “the Japanese government had not yet definitively decided the issue of deepening the Anti-Comintern Pact.” Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor’be za mir nakanune, 230 (March 10, 1939).
- 205. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 529 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 163, l. 2–2ob.). On April 9, Eisenstein wrote to Stalin requesting permission to travel to London for the premiere there of Alexander Nevskiy. Stalin wrote to Molotov that “this matter does not concern me,” but Molotov knew Stalin’s views and forbid Eisenstein to travel. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 538 (APRF, f. 3, op. 35, d. 86, l. 45–6). Andro Kobaladze would play Stalin in Yakov Sverdlov (1940).
- 206. Trauberg, “Rasskaz o velikom vozhdze,” 7–15; Trauberg, “Proizvedenie mysli i strasti,” 32–8. See also Tsimbal, “Obraz Lenina v kino,” 13–7; and Lebedev, Shchukin—akter kino: Sovetskie khudozhestvennye fil’mi, 4 vols. (Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1961–77), II: 197.
- 207. Toward the film’s end, Dzierżyński divulges that an agent-provocateur has “penetrated” the Cheka. Kataev, “Lenin v 1918 godu”; Sadoyskii, “Lenin v 1918 godu”; Dobrenko, Stalinist Cinema, 220–9.
- 208. Vernadskii, Dnevnik, 1935–1941, II: 52.
- 209. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i NKVD, 33–50 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 373, l. 3–44); Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 204 (citing APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 374, l. 3–47); Stepanov, “O masshtabakh repressii” (no. 5), 61–2.
- 210. D. N. Sukhanov, an aide to Malenkov, claimed he witnessed Yezhov’s arrest by Beria in Malenkov’s office: Hoover Institution Archives, Volkogonov papers, container 13, excerpted memoirs (dated March 6, 1993); Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 179–81; Briukhanov and Shoshkov, Opravdaniu ne podlezhit, 132; Sudoplatov, Spetsoperatsii, 100; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 200–1; Pavliukov, Ezhov, 512–3; Polianskii, Ezhov, 205–6, 219.
- 211. Kostrychenko and Khazanov, “Konets Kar’ery Ezhova,” 129–30 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 82–4).
- 212. Khaustov, “Razvitie sovetskikh organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti,” 362 (citing TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 45, d. 29, l. 246).
- 213. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 182.
- 214. Nikolai P. Afanasev, USSR deputy general procurator, recalls this as taking place at Lefortovo, but all other sources indicate Yezhov was held in Sukhannovka. Ushakov and Strukalov, Front voennykh prokurorov, 69.
- 215. Viktorov, Bez grafa “sekretnosti,” 326.
- 216. “Vospominaniia: memurary Nikity Sergeevicha Khrushcheva,” 87; Piliatskii, “‘Vrag naroda’”; Pavliukov, Ezhov, 513; Polianskii, Ezhov, 216–7. Others suggest these documents—which disappeared—need not have been compromising, but could have been flattering material Yezhov collected for a Stalin museum. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 228.
- 217. Briukhanov and Shoshkov, Opravdaniu ne podlezhit, 132–3. Malenkov’s son would assert that when his father had Yezhov’s safe opened, they discovered dossiers on Malenkov as well as Stalin; the latter included the recollections of an old Bolshevik that Stalin had prerevolutionary links to the tsarist okhranka. Malenkov, O moem otse Georgii Malenkov, 34.
- 218. Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 423–5. It is said that when Malenkov finally saw a transcript of this interrogation, in Feb. 1955, he destroyed it. Kovaleva et al., Molotov, Malenkov, Kaganovich, 44; Kovaleva et al., “Posledniaia ‘antipartiinaiia’ gruppa,” 23. For Khrushchev’s defense of Malenkov in 1937 in Moscow, see Ponomarev, “Nikita Khrushchev,” 135.
- 219. Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia, kak eto bylo, 330.
- 220. Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, 68. The former colleague was Sergei Schwarz.
- 221. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 470; Khrushchev, Vremia, liudi, vlast’, I: 172; Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 417.
- 222. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 365–6 (TsA FSB, f. 3–os, op. 6, d. 3, l. 42–3). For Yezhov’s interrogation on April 26 (by Kobulov and others), see Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i NKVD, 52–72 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 375, l. 122–64).

223. Sontag, “Last Months of Peace.”

224. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 332–3 (April 15, 1939); Falin, Soviet Peace Efforts, I: 342.

225. Stalin wrote on the TASS summary: “Expel the representative of this newspaper from Moscow.” (In Feb. 1939, the politburo had approved the foreign affairs commissariat request to grant Howard an entry visa, while warning him not to expect another audience with Stalin.) Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 506–9 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 207, l. 36–41; f. 17, op. 162, d. 24, l. 105). Howard also published a dispatch from Paris at this time pointing out that anti-Jewish actions in Nazi Germany were underestimated, not exaggerated.

226. God krizisa, I: 386–7 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1a, p. 25, d. 4, l. 27–8); DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 283–4, 284–5 (AVP RF f. 059, op. 1, p. 303, d. 2093, l. 27–8); Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 335–7 (April 17, 1939); Falin, Soviet Peace Efforts, I: 346–7.

227. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 335–6 (April 17, 1939); Falin, Soviet Peace Efforts, I: 345–6; Aster, 1939, 163; Neilson, Britain, Soviet Russia, 283, 287–9; God krizisa, I: 386 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1a, pap. 25, d. 4, l. 27–8); FRUS, 1939, I: 240; DDF, 2e série, XV: 789–90; Na prieme, 256. See also Carley, 1939, 126–34; and Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War, 159.

228. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 291–3 (Astakhov record: AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, p. 7, d. 65, l. 69–71); DGFP, series C, IV: 783 (Bräutigam memo, Nov. 1, 1935); Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 1–2; Roberts, “Infamous Encounter?”; Roberts, Origins of the Second World War, 69–71; Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 202–15.

229. Gafencu, Last Days of Europe, 78.

230. Neilson, Britain, Soviet Russia, 283 (citing FP [36], minutes of 43rd meeting, April 19, 1939, Cab 27/624); DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 541–2n101 (citing PRO, Cab. 27/624: 300–3, 309–12); Dिल्s, Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan, 175. Halifax told a British cabinet meeting (April 26) that the “time was not ripe for so comprehensive a proposal, and we proposed to ask the Russian government to give further consideration to our plan.” Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 341 (April 21), 684n103 (citing PRO, CAB 23/39: 58); Falin, Soviet Peace Efforts, I: 340, II: 308n103.

231. Overy, “Strategic Intelligence,” 474, citing DGFP, series D, VI: 289–90 (chargé d'affaires in London Kordt to foreign ministry, April 19, 1939), 336 (Kordt to foreign ministry, April 26, 1939), 472–3 (Dirksen to foreign ministry, May 11); Andrew and Gordievsky, KGB, 197–8.

232. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 252–3 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 7, d. 63, l. 14–5; Litvinov to Merekalov, April 4, 1939), 268–9 (f. 011, op. 4, pap. 27, d. 61, l. 77–8; Merekalov's reply, April 12, 1939). See also Bartel, “Aleksij Fedorovič Merekalov.” Litvinov's Anglophilia has been exaggerated. It was always a means to an end—Soviet security—which he saw as solely possible with a collective security agreement against fascism. Phillips, Between the Revolution and the West, 21–2, 52–3.

233. In early April, Potyomkin sent two notes, both handwritten, to Surits warning of “the very hard line” being adopted in Moscow vis-à-vis cadres. “The slightest lapse is not only recorded but also provokes a swift and violent reaction.” He had Surits send his subordinate to Moscow. Dullin, Men of Influence, 216 (citing AVP RF, f. 11, op. 4, pap. 32, d. 179: April 4 and 19, 1939). Surits was represented by Krapivintsev, who worked under him as embassy counselor in Paris. Na prieme, 257–8. This was only Maisky's second visit to Stalin's office, the first having been June 1, 1938, with Litvinov.

234. For the grim documentary trail of Litvinov's memorandums to Stalin, see DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 208–9 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 2, d. 11, l. 159: March 20, 1939), 209–11 (l. 154–8: March 20), 220–1 (l. 167–8: March 23), 230 (l. 172: March 27), 246 (l. 186: April 3), 269–70 (l. 209: April 13), 275–7 (l. 213–7: April 15), 277–8 (l. 218–9: April 15), 283 (l. 220–1: April 17); Resis, “Fall of Litvinov.”

235. Sheinis, Maksim Maksimovich Litvinov, 360–3; Dullin, Des hommes d'influence, 310–3; Dullin, Men of Influence, 230–1. Sheinis suggests that the meeting described by Maisky took place on April 27, but Litvinov does not appear in the Kremlin office logbook that day. Na prieme, 257–8.

236. Mel'tiukhov, 17 September 1939, 232; Neilson, Britain, Soviet Russia, 284.

237. The July 29, 1936, secret circular to the entire provincial party and state apparatus had omitted Molotov's name on the list of the assassination targets of the Zinoviev-Trotskyite Center, and at the public trial that Aug., the defendants never mentioned him as a target, possibly a show of Stalin's displeasure. But if so, Molotov's purgatory had not lasted long: on Sept. 21, 1936, a two-year-old attempt on Molotov's life had been included in the "testimony" taken in preparation for the second Moscow trial. And from the day of Stalin's return to Moscow (Oct. 25), Molotov was regularly in the Little Corner again. "The thought alone that it was possible," Pravda (Nov. 23, 1936) would intone of an assassination of Molotov, "is capable of making every citizen of the Soviet Union shudder." Stalin's decision to ratchet up the psychological pressure on Ordjonikidze might have been a factor in Molotov's abrupt return to favor. See also Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: Politicheskie protsessy, 231–2; Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 154–9; Conquest, Reassessment, 90–1; Pravda, Oct. 26, 1961; Watson, Molotov, 130. The incident in question had occurred on a visit to the Siberian coal town of Prokopevsk when Molotov's local driver had veered off an inclined road and came to a stop in a ditch (called "a ravine"). At the time, the driver had received merely a party reprimand, which Molotov had interceded to get rescinded. But in 1936, the driver was retrospectively charged with terrorism, and confessed. Molotov and Chuev wrongly recalled the incident as having occurred in 1932. Chuev, Sto sorok, 302.

238. Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 50 (1936): 15, no. 52–53 (1936): 47, no. 58–59 (1936): 18–19; Chuev, Sto sorok, 302. For Lev Sedov's response to the Novosibirsk trial, see Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 54–55 (1937): 4. Molotov was included as a target in the Jan. 1937 trial, alongside Stalin, Kaganovich, Voroshilov, Orjonikidze, Yezhov, Zhdanov, and four provincial party bosses, one of whom was Beria.

239. Rudzutaks, a deputy chairman of the Council of People's Commissars under Molotov, told the latter to his face that he had been tortured. "I think that he was not a conscious participant" in a conspiracy, Molotov admitted later in life. "A former [tsarist] prisoner, he had been at hard labor for four years . . . I formed the impression when he was my deputy, he had begun to self-indulge a bit . . . He enjoyed the life of a philistine—he would sit around, dine with friends, spend time with companions . . . It is difficult to say what brought about his downfall, but I think he shared the type of company where non-party elements were present, or god knows what other kinds." Another close Molotov comrade, Alexander Arosyev, the hack writer and head of the all-Union Society for Cultural Ties Abroad, was also executed. "The most devoted person," Molotov recalled. "It seems he was not discriminating in his acquaintances. It was impossible to mix him up in anti-Soviet affairs. But he had ties . . ." Chuev, Sto sorok, 410–1, 422–3. See also David-Fox, "Stalinist Westernizer?"

240. Chadaev in Kumanev, Riadom so Stalinym, 421–2. Molotov's Poskryobyshev was I. I. Lapshov.

241. XVIII s'ezd VKP (b), 493.

242. Watson, "Politburo and Foreign Policy," 141; Watson, Molotov, 147.

243. Dullin, Men of Influence, 233–6. Already by late 1937, fourteen of the foreign consulates in Leningrad had been forced to close—including those of Germany, Japan, Italy, and Poland. Magerovsky, "The People's Commissariat," II: 337–8.

244. Foreign policy had already been delegated to a permanent commission of the politburo back on April 14, 1937. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 55; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 986 (protocol for April 16, 1937).

245. In 1938, Litvinov had not traveled for his annual rest at Karlsbad, and had to summon his children home from England. Litvinov's talkative British wife, Ivy, had already been sent to the isolation of the Urals some years before. Carswell, Exile, 165–8.

246. Ulicks, "Impact of the Great Purges," 188–92; Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 130. Personnel arrested in the second wave included deputy commissar Stomanyakov (who tried to commit suicide but failed), as well as Litvinov's personal secretary (Nazarov) and others. After the March 1938 Bukharin trial, rumors had circulated in Moscow of a public trial of diplomatic personnel, but as in the case of the Comintern, no public process took place. Conquest, Reassessment, 423.

247. Kennan, Russia and the West, 231, 336; Watson, Molotov, 153–6; Gnedin, Katastrofa i vtoroe rozhdenie, 105–15; Meerovich, "V narkomindel'e 1922–1939"; Chuev, Sto sorok, 332–3.

248. Voroshilov's annual May Day holiday declaration to the troops for 1939 observed that "the capitalist world has entered the plane of new powerful shocks. The economic crisis threatens to become prolonged and more difficult than previous crises. Fascist aggressors, reshaping the world's map by force, have dragged humanity into a Second Imperialist War. . . . Unbridled fascist military aggression, intoxicated by easy victories, does not cease to threaten new attacks against weak and intimidated countries.” Krasnaia zvezda, May 1, 1939, reprinted in Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XIII (II/i): 100–2 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 15, d. 25, l. 227–29).

249. Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, I: 385–6; Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 182–3.

250. Gnedin, Katastrofa i vtoroe rozhdenie, 108–10.

251. DBFP, 3rd series, V: 400 (Seeds to Halifax, May 3), 410 (Seeds to Halifax, May 4), 542 (Seeds to Halifax, May 19); Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 213–4.

252. Litvinov evidently did refer to Molotov as “fool” (durak), including over the phone, which he knew was eavesdropped, according to Litvinov’s daughter Tatiana, cited in Phillips, Between the Revolution and the West, 166. Litvinov is listed for a mere thirty-five minutes in the Little Corner on May 3, 1939: Na prieme, 258.

253. Stalin’s telegram on Molotov’s replacement of Litvinov mentioned “the serious conflict between the chairman of the People’s Council of Commissars, Comrade Molotov, and the People’s Commissar for Foreign Affairs, Comrade Litvinov,” and blamed Litvinov’s “disloyalty.” APRF, f. 3, op. 63, d. 29, l. 71; DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 327 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 313, dl. 2154, l. 45); Sochineniia, XVIII: 174.

254. On Molotov’s influence on Stalin, see Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/i: 11–16. See also Gromyko, Memories, 30, 33, 404.

255. Watson, “Molotov’s Apprenticeship.”

256. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 98–102. Sudoplatov was then deputy director of NKVD intelligence and in charge of the German desk.

257. Khrushchev, “Vospominaniia,” 18.

258. Zhukov added that “it was another matter later, when all the calculations turned out to be incorrect and collapsed; more than once in my presence Stalin berated Molotov for this.” Simonov, “Zametki k biografii G. K. Zhukova,” 49, reprinted in Mirkina and Iarovikov, Marshal Zhukov, II: 201–2.

259. Sheinis, Maksim Maksimovich Litvinov, 363. The dacha may have belonged to Stalin, who had awarded it to Litvinov.

260. Gnedin, Katastrofa i vtoroe rozhdenie, 128–52. Gnedin would be the only one to survive to old age from the Soviet embassy or trade mission to Berlin.

261. “Sometimes he would stop for a few minutes and he would bring out his mouth organ and play arias from operas on it,” Korzhenko’s daughter Nora wrote of Nikolai, aged twenty-eight. “He was a brilliant player and if I closed my eyes I could imagine I was listening to an organ.” She added: “All the time we were living in the beautiful wooden house at Klyazma life was perilous and uncertain. Nearly every day men and women were being arrested, shot or sent into exile. You could never escape from the atmosphere of intrigue, misery and sudden death. It was a strange and sinister atmosphere for a young girl to live in, but somehow one just accepted these things as part of life.” Murray, I Spied for Stalin, 83–9, 112–3, 126; Barmine, Memoirs of a Soviet Diplomat, 17. Nora, who had studied foreign languages and mingled with foreigners, would become an informant in that milieu for the organization that wrecked her family and the families of nearly everyone she knew—the NKVD.

262. Conquest, Reassessment, 423.

263. “Vospominaniia nachal’nika vneshnei razvedki P. M. Fitina,” in Primakov, Ocherki, IV: 19; Bondarenko, Fitin, 41–7. Of the six hundred or so students admitted to the NKVD Central School in Moscow (Bolshoi Kiselnii Pereulok) in those years, just fifty were chosen for the separate spy school in Balashikha, just outside Moscow. Sinityn, Resident svidetelstvuet, 5; Sergutov, “Organizatsionnye aspekty deiatel’nosti vneshnei razvedki,” III: 237. See also Pavlov, Tragediia Sovetskoi razvedki, 349.

264. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 66–8.

265. Trotsky speculated that Stalin was titillated by Kollontai’s love life. Trotsky, Stalin, 243–4.

266. In late 1938, Litvinov had written several times to Boris Stein in Rome, forbidding him to return to Moscow because he was “needed” abroad. Sheinis, “Sud’ba diplomata,” 301. Stalin would dispatch Stein to Finland, after which, in Feb. 1939, he did return to Moscow. He would be spared, demoted to the editorial board of the periodical Trud, along with Trojanovsky, who had been ambassador to Tokyo and Washington.

267. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 10–12 (AVP RF f. 06, op. 1, p. 2, d. 11, l. 4–7; Jan. 3, 1939).

- 268. Molotov claims he was specifically tasked with removing the preponderance of Jews. Chuev, Sto sorok, 274.
- 269. “‘Avtobiograficheskie zametki’ V. N. Pavlova—perevodchika I. V. Stalina.” Pavlov turned over this unpublished short memoir to the Foreign Ministry in 1987, and was interviewed in 1989 to clarify certain points.
- 270. Bohlen, Witness to History, 65.
- 271. Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 68–9.
- 272. Seabury, Wilhelmstrasse, 31, citing Picker, Hitlers Tischgespräche, 106. By 1940, 71 of the 120 highest officials in the German foreign ministry would belong to the Nazi party. Davidson, Trial of the Germans, 152.
- 273. Serge, “Litvinov,” 419. Litvinov’s inner circle included young people, such as Eduard Hershelman (head of his secretariat from age thirty), who was nevertheless arrested.
- 274. Even before the massacre-induced vacancies, half of the 1,000 personnel in the Soviet diplomatic corps at home and abroad were recruited right out of school at the beginning of the 1930s. Still, some 85 percent of Soviet diplomatic personnel active from 1940 to 1946 had begun a diplomatic career after 1936. Magerovsky, “The People’s Commissariat,” II: 345. “It happened that one made an appointment with a colleague but could not find him on the fixed day—he had been arrested,” recalled one high-level official in the commissariat. “Exchange of opinions and conversations were reduced to a minimum.” Roshchin, “People’s Commissariat of Foreign Affairs,” 110–11. The commissariat’s private apartments at Blacksmith Bridge were sealed in wax after the arrest of their occupants, and the new residents often witnessed the unsealing by the NKVD. Dullin, Men of Influence, 238.
- 275. Kordt, Wahn und Wirklichkeit, 153.
- 276. Gafencu, Last Days of Europe, 83. On June 13, 1939, Nazi Party organizations would be forbidden to use “Third” when referring to the Reich—a repudiation of the Holy Roman empire (800–1806) as the first Reich (Bismarck’s having then been the second). Wilson, Heart of Europe.
- 277. Butler, Mason-Mac, 74–5. Mason-Macfarlane’s drawing-room window overlooked the Charlottenburg Chaussee, which ran from the Siegesäule gilded column commemorating the 1870–71 war of reunification eastward to the Brandenburg Gate.
- 278. Moorehouse, Killing Hitler, 190–1, citing DBFP, 3rd series, IV, appendix V, Mason-Macfarlane Memorandum, 626; Imperial War Museum Archive, Mason-Macfarlane papers, ref. MM40.
- 279. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 183–5.
- 280. McKee, Tomorrow the World, 27.
- 281. Domarus, Hitler: Reden, III: 1148–79; Domarus, Hitler: Speeches, III: 1561–96; Below, Als Hitlers Adjutant, 161–2; Muggeridge, Ciano’s Diary, 78; Shirer, Berlin Diary, 133.
- 282. Haffner, Meaning of Hitler, 32–4.
- 283. DGFP, series D, VI: 460 (Braun von Stumm, May 9, 1939). The order (“Immediately cease polemics against the Soviet Union and Bolshevism”) was issued on May 5, 1939. Sluch, “Germano-sovetskie otnosheniia,” 110 (citing Politisches Archiv des Auswärtiges Amt, Bonn, Zsg. 101/13: 5).
- 284. Stehlin, Témoignage pour l’histoire, 147–53; and French Yellow Book, 132–6 (Coulondre to Bonnet, May 7, 1939); Andrew, Secret Service, 423–4. On June 16, Bodenschatz would tell Coulondre that “Germany was making great efforts for an agreement with Russia.”
- 285. Borev, Staliniada, 182–3. Dunayevsky, the songwriter, would get the Order of Lenin after Volga-Volga. Turovskaiia, “Volga-Volga i ego vremia.” On May 7, the annual Kremlin banquet for military academy graduates was held, after a two-year hiatus.
- 286. Nekrich, Pariahs, 154 (citing RGAE, f. 413, op. 13, d. 2856, l. 5–6).
- 287. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 3.
- 288. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 339–41 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 7 d. 66, l. 21–4; Astakhov to Molotov, May 6, 1939); God krizisa, I: 457–8 (AVP RF, f. 082, op. 22, pap. 93, d. 7, l. 214–5; Astakhov to Potyomkin, May 12, 1939).
- 289. On the Germany embassy’s favorable report concerning Litvinov’s dismissal, see DGFP, series D, VI: 419–20 (Tippelskirch, May 4).
- 290. Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 45; Sipols, Tainy, 323–40.

291. Watt, “Initiation of the Negotiations,” 164–5. Alfred Rosenberg, following a conversation with Göring in spring 1939, had noted a willingness to go along with a temporary deal with Moscow out of expediency. United States Holocaust Museum, Alfred Rosenberg’s Diary, 269.

292. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 308–9; Fischer, Life and Death of Stalin, 56. Ehrenburg, along with everyone else, puzzled over why Litvinov had not been arrested. Ehrenburg, Post-War Years, 276–8.

293. Lev Helfand, the Soviet ambassador to Rome, who would defect in July 1940, surmised that Stalin was willing to reach agreement with the British at least through June 1939. Haslam, Russia’s Cold War, 8 (citing a report of Helfand’s Sept. 12, 1940, interview with Neville Butler, Washington, D.C.: FO 371/24845).

294. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor’be za mir nakanune, 375–6 (May 5, 1939). See also Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 153–4 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22407, d. 2, l. 183: April 14, 1939, l. 192, 210: April 17 and 26, 1939); and Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 98–9.

295. Muggeridge, Ciano’s Diplomatic Papers, 283, 286; Gibson, Ciano Diaries, 78–9, 82, 84–5 (May 7, 14, and 21, 1939).

296. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 342 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 303, d. 2093, l. 60–1: Molotov to Surits, May 8, 1939), XXII: 546n113 (pap. 294, d. 2036, l. 75: Molotov to Maisky, May 8), XXII/i: 356 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 300, d. 2076, l. 189–90: Maisky to Molotov, May 10); Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor’be za mir nakanune, 380–2 (May 8, 1939), 383–4 (May 8), 386–8 (May 10, 1939), 687n113; Falin, Soviet Peace Efforts, II: 25–6, 28, 311n113; DBFP, 3rd series, V: 487 (May 8).

297. Sluch, “Germano-sovetskie otnosheniia,” 110 (citing Politisches Archiv des Auswärtiges Amt, Bonn, Schnurre, “Aus einem bewegten Leben,” ms., 74–5). Hilger’s family’s property had been expropriated by the October revolution, yet he had taken part in the reestablishment of diplomatic relations between Germany and the Soviet Union and had joined the German embassy staff in 1923. Herwarth, Against Two Evils, 76–7.

298. Teske, General Ernst Köstring, 133–6.

299. DGFP, series D, VI: 494–6 (Ribbentrop to Tokyo, May 15, 1939).

300. Cienciala, “Foreign Policy of Józef Piłsudski”; Meysztowicz, Czas przeszły dokonany, 216; Beck, Final Report, 183–9; Mackiewicz, Colonel Beck and His Policy, 135; Overly, Road to War, 1–23; Von Riekhoff, German-Polish Relations, 329.

301. Potyomkin concluded his report by maintaining that he had summarized the conversation before departing and Beck had confirmed his statement. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 352 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 296, d. 2047, l. 92: May 10, 1939), 352–4 (d. 2046, l. 122–5: May 10); Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor’be za mir nakanune, 389.

302. God krizisa, I: 448–9 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1a, pap. 26, d. 18, l. 110: May 11, 1939); DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 356–7; Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor’be za mir nakanune, 393–4.

303. Still, Romania, like Turkey, viewed a Western-Soviet agreement as effectively inevitable. Watt, How War Came, 284–5.

304. Gorodetsky, Maisky’s Diaries, 202 (no citation).

305. Bulgakova, Dnevnik, 256–9. Mikhail Bulgakov’s play Batum (1939), which depicted a young Stalin, in the revolutionary underground, as a decisive personality—incisive, flexible, cunning, even deceitful, above all able to do whatever it took to lead people through difficult challenges, while lusting for power—had been banned before rehearsals. Bulgakov, Sobranie sochinenii, V (Master and Margarita), VII: 305–76 (Batum).

306. Shentalinsky, KGB’s Literary Archive, 42, 47. See also Povarov, Prichina smerti nastrel; Pirozhkova, At His Side, 115.

307. Shentalinskii, “Proshu menia vyslushat’,” 430–43.

308. Shentalinsky, KGB’s Literary Archive, 44.

309. Mandelstam, Hope against Hope, 321. Mandelstam records Babel’s brazenness in associating with foreigners as well.

310. Stalin could reveal limits to his hyper-suspiciousness. From Dec. 1938—when Valery Chkalov died in a crash during the maiden flight of an experimental fighter plane—through May 15, 1939, the country suffered thirty-four aviation crashes in which seventy people were killed. On May 16, at a meeting of the Main Military Council, Stalin raised the possibility of sabotage ("technicians can do this deliberately, and the aviators trust the aircraft") but added of Chkalov and four other heroes of the Soviet Union, "The aviator does not want to recognize the laws of physics and meteorology." Glavnyi voennyi soviet RKKA, 237. Nearly two hundred defects had been found on the rushed airplane earlier in the month that Chkalov flew it; the temperature was 25 below zero Celsius the day of the test flight. Maslov, Rokovoi isrebiteľ Chkalova; Ivanov, Neizvestnyi Polikarpov; Bergman, "Valerii Chkalov."

311. Gorbunov, "Voennaia razvedka v 1934–1939 godakh" (no. 3), 60–1.

312. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 233.

313. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 81–4 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 9157, d. 2, l. 173–9). The source might have been Kurt Welkisch ("ABC"), a German journalist and diplomat in Warsaw (1935–39). Soviet intelligence had reported that Kleist, following the destruction of Czechoslovakia in March 1939, had privately averred that "war against the Soviet Union remains the last and decisive task of German policy." Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 60–4 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 9197, d. 2, l. 245–54).

314. "Soobshchenie I. I. Proskurova I. V. Stalinu," 216–9; Na prieme, 259.

315. APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 455, l. 33–5 (June 1956 note from KGB chief Serov to the Central Committee); d. 448, l. 184, 189 (testimony by operatives Fedotov and Matusov). See also Petrov and Petrov, Empire of Fear, 69.

316. Ribbentrop inserted suggestions, in the German foreign ministry transcripts of the talks with the Soviets, to make it look as if Stalin was beseeching the great Hitler. Dębski, Między Berlinem a Moskwą, 84–91.

317. Dullin, Men of Influence, 30. "If one can speak of a pro-German in the Kremlin," Krivitsky asserted, "Stalin has been that figure all along." Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service, 3, 10.

318. Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War.

319. Savushkin, "K voprosu o zarozhdenii teorii," 78–82.

320. Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, I: 398–400; Gorodetsky, Maitsky Diaries, 192.

321. French Yellow Book, 147–9. "Russia is a good card, it is perhaps not necessary to play it," Beneš had told the French envoy in Prague back in April 1937, "but it is necessary not to abandon it from fear that Germany pick it up." Dreifort, "French Popular Front," 229 (citing DDF 2e série, V: 513–4; April 21, 1937).

322. Pravda, May 28, 1939; KPSS v rezoliutsiakh (8th ed.), V: 398–404 (May 27, 1939). Stalin also complained about labor shortages and called for extracting additional labor power from collective farms, claiming that much of it was idle. Zelenin, Stalinskaiia "revoliutsiia sverkh", 246–7, 285; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1123, l. 1–30: uncorrected transcript; Danilov et al., Tragediia sovetskoi derevni, v/ii: 416–24. The transcript of the plenum, which met May 21–24 and 27, was never printed or distributed to regional party committees. There would not be another plenum until March 26–28, 1940.

323. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 395 (May 14, 1939), 417–21 (May 27, 1939); Falin, Soviet Peace Efforts, II: 39–40, 61–4; DBFP, 3rd series, V: 679–80.

324. Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, V: 453 (Völkischer Beobachter, May 23, 1939); Toscano, Origins of the Pact of Steel.

325. DGFP, series D, VI: 586 (Weizsäcker, May 25, 1939). That same day, Japanese ambassador Shigenori Tōgō told Molotov that, according to the 1924 Soviet-Chinese Agreement, the USSR recognized Chinese suzerainty over Outer Mongolia, and therefore the Japanese government did not recognize the Soviet-Mongolian Pact. Tōgō also remonstrated that not Manchukuo but Outer Mongolia had violated the border. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XVIII (VII/i): VII/i: 115–6 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1233, l. 165–6).

326. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 8–9; DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 386–7 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, p. 1, d. 2, l. 24–26; May 20, 1939), also in God krizisa, I: 482–3; Stronski, "Soviet Russia's Common Cause." Schulenburg was evidently not allowed to bring an interpreter and had to speak French for the Russian interpreter.

327. Below, Als Hitlers Adjutant, 163–4; Der Prozess gegen die Hauptkriegsverbrecher, XXXVII: 546–56; DGFP, series D, VI: 574–80; Weinberg, Foreign Policy, II: 576, 579–83; Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 191–3.

328. Presseisen, Germany and Japan, 221–2; Sommer, Deutschland und Japan, 238–42, 248–56; Morley, Deterrent Diplomacy, 105–11.

329. Iklé, German-Japanese Relations, 101 (April 28, 1939, citing International Military Tribunal for the Far East, Documents Presented in Evidence, exhibit 497: Ōshima's interrogation).

330. On May 27, 1939, the German ambassador in Tokyo, Eugen Ott, reported to Berlin that "I hear from another source that the Emperor, during a report by [chief of the general staff] Prince Kanin, who put forward the Army's demands on the alliance, made his consent dependent on the Army and Navy coming to an agreement. In view of the stubborn resistance by opponents of the alliance, rumors have cropped up about terrorist plans by radical groups." DGFP, series D, VI: 594–5.

331. DGFP, series D, VI: 597–8 (received at Moscow embassy on June 2).

332. DGFP, series D, VI: 599–600, 603–4 (unsigned, May 29, 1939).

333. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 88–99 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 9157, d. 2, l. 101–17, 120–4), 740n40; God krizisa, I: 379–87, 405.

334. Mehringer, Die NSDAP, 5; Overy, Dictators, 639–40.

CHAPTER 11. PACT

1. Cadogan also wrote that he himself was "in favor of it [a Soviet alliance]. So, I think, is H. [Halifax]." Dिल्s, Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan, 182.

2. Michalka, Ribbentrop und die deutsche Weltpolitik; Bloch, Ribbentrop. "I honestly hated him," the long-serving state secretary in Ribbentrop's foreign ministry Baron von Weizsäcker would later claim. No one had a good word for him. Ribbentrop "was a man who occupied a responsible position for which he had neither talent, knowledge, nor experience, and he himself knew or sensed this very well," surmised the Moscow embassy official Gustav Hilger. "He sought to hide his feelings of inferiority by an arrogance that often seemed unbearable." Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 293. The old-line conservative Franz von Papen—who had midwived the invitation to Hitler to assume the Chancellorship at Ribbentrop's villa—deemed Ribbentrop "a husk with no kernel."

3. Schmidt, Statist, 312, 317. On the aspects of Schmidt's memoirs requiring scholarly caution, see Namier, In the Nazi Era, 104–8. The best account of Ribbentrop in London is Spitz, So haben wir das Reich verspielt, 92–122. Ribbentrop actually spent limited time in London: Jacobsen, Nationalsozialistische Aussenpolitik, 706.

4. Rees, Nazis, 93–5 (citing Spitz); Snyder, Encyclopedia of the Third Reich, 295. Prince Otto von Bismarck, grandson of the Iron Chancellor and Counselor at the German embassy in Rome, told Ciano of Ribbentrop "he is such an imbecile, he is a freak of nature." Ciano, Ciano's Hidden Diary, 151.

5. Ribbentrop had ended up in London almost by accident. On April 18, 1936, the German ambassador to the Court of St. James's, Leopold von Hoesch, died; initially, no one was appointed to take his place. Then, when von Bülow died on June 21, Ribbentrop expected to get his position as state secretary (number two) under Neurath, but the latter objected, and Ribbentrop was posted to London as consolation. Ribbentrop spent most of 1936 and 1937 not in the United Kingdom, but negotiating with Japan and Italy for an alliance against the UK. On Dec. 28, 1937, he wrote to Hitler that Britain was Germany's "most dangerous enemy." Heineman, Hitler's First Foreign Minister, 140–44; Seabury, Wilhelmstrasse, 54–6; Weinberg, "Hitler and England," 87–8; Waddington, "Ribbentrop and the Soviet Union"; Ciano's Diary 1937–1938, 24.

6. Almost alone, von Ribbentrop had interpreted the Munich Pact as a blow against Britain, commenting that Chamberlain "has signed a death sentence for the British empire and invited us to fix the date of implementation of this sentence." Dalton, Fateful Years, 195.

7. Ribbentrop later wrote that he constantly reminded Hitler of Bismarck's Russia policy. Ribbentrop, Memoirs, 151. Wilhelmstrasse, 76, was a two-story former private home constructed in the eighteenth century; Bismarck had had his medium-sized office as well as family quarters on the upper floor. Pflanze, Bismarck, II: 35.

8. Molotov, Stati i rechii, 1935–1936, 12, 20–1 (Jan. 28, 1935); Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 46. On a document sent to him by Molotov, Zhdanov wrote that "entering into agreement with England and France against Germany, even concluding a military alliance with them, we should not forget for one minute that in this alliance, England and France will conduct a policy of insincerity, provocation, and betrayal with respect to us." Nekrich, Pariahs, 105 (undated reference, letter by V. P. Zolotov).

9. Recall Stalin's statement to Eden that the world situation was worse than it had been on the eve of the Great War, "because in 1913 there was only one source of the threat of war—Germany—and presently there are two such sources, Germany and Japan" (both of which bordered the Soviet Union). DVP SSSR, XVIII: 246–251 (at 249–50: March 29, 1935); RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 1144, l. 325.

10. Efimenko et al., Vooruzhennyi konflikt, 32–6 (RGVA, f. 32113, op. 1, d. 203, l. 6–11: May 16, 1939), 36–40 (d. 202, l. 6–10: May 16), 41–3 (f. 33797, op. 1, d. 37, l. 17–21), 43–4 (op. 3, d. 1225, l. 5–6), 44–5 (op. 1, d. 38, l. 6), 45–6 (d. 36, l. 39–40, 48), 46–8 (l. 51), 48–50 (d. 35, l. 26–35), 51–2 (op. 3, d. 1225, l. 12–4), 52–3 (f. 32113, op. 1, d. 204, l. 33), 53–4 (f. 7977, op. 1, d. 37, l. 55); Coox, "Introduction," 122.

11. Coox, Nomonhan, 186–9 (April 25, 1939); Goldman, Nomonhan, 1939, 1 (citing U.S. Department of the Army, Forces in the Far East, Japanese Special Studies on Manchuria, 13 vols. [Tokyo, 1954–6], XI/1: 99–102), 83–8.

12. Coox, Nomonhan, 188–95.

13. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 406; Efimenko et al., Vooruzhennyi konflikt, 54–6: RGASPI, f. 82, op. 2, d. 1386, l. 8–12; AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 1, d. 2, l. 22–3.

14. Krasnov, Neizvestnyi Zhukov, 90–9; Zhukov, Vospominaniia, II: 249–87 (at 250–3). Zhukov's memoir dates the meeting with Voroshilov to June 2, but a letter to his wife and other documents indicate May 24. See also Roberts, Stalin's General, 48–9.

15. Sokolov, Neizvestnyi Zhukov, 115–8. In June 1938, when Zhukov had been promoted to deputy commander of the Belorussian military district, he denied in writing any ties to enemies of the people. Daines, Zhukov, 81.

16. Krasnov, Neizvestnyi Zhukov, 100–1 (Zhukov to Voroshilov, May 30, 1939).

17. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XVIII (VII/i): 116–8 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 1, d. 38, l. 102–6). See also Efimenko et al., Vooruzhennyi konflikt, 77–8 (RGVA, f. 37977, op. 1, d. 38, l. 110–2: Shaposhnikov, May 28, 1939).

18. Coox, Nomonhan, 200–65; Efimenko et al., Vooruzhennyi konflikt, 82–4 (RGVA, f. 37977, op. 1, d. 37, l. 109–15), 88 (RGVA, f. 37977, op. 1, d. 82, l. 74: May 31, 1939).

19. Tret'ia sessiia Verkhovnogo Soveta SSSR, 25–31 maia 1939 g., 467–76 (at 476); God Krizisa, I: 523–30.

20. God krizisa, I: 520–2 (AVP RF, f. 011, op. 4, pap. 27, d. 59, l. 105–10). Astakhov informed Moscow of Germany's evident wish to throw a wrench into Soviet-British talks. Weizsäcker sensed Soviet suspicions of German motives. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 406; Hill, Weizsäcker Papiere, 154. Ribbentrop had informed Weizsäcker and Friedrich Gaus (director of the foreign ministry legal department) on May 25 that Hitler for some time had been thinking about improving relations with the USSR; the two officials drafted instructions for the embassy in Moscow, to convey to Molotov, but then these instructions were not sent, either because Ribbentrop was still hopeful of a formal military alliance with Japan, which a deal with Moscow would scuttle, or Hitler found them excessive. DGFP series D, VI: 589–93 (Ribbentrop instructions, May [26], 1939); Fleischhauer, Der Pakt, 202–7.

21. DGFP series D, VI: 614–5.

22. The freedom to choose the moment implied Japan might not even carry out military actions. Iklé, German-Japanese Relations, 117–8 (citing International Military Tribunal for the Far East, Documents Presented in Evidence, exhibit 614: Ott telegram to foreign ministry, June 5, 1939); Presseisen, Germany and Japan, 212–3 (citing exhibit 614); Tokushirō, "The Anti-Comintern Pact," 103–5.

23. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informuiet, 99–105 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 9157, d. 2, l. 350–60); DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 583 n169.

24. Iklé, German-Japanese Relations, 87–118; Nolte, Der europäische Bürgerkrieg, 308.

25. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 18–20 (Schulenburg to Berlin, June 5, 1939), 21–2 (Tippelskirch, June 18, on Mikoyan's distrust). The Germans had gotten Stalin's point: in May 1939, the anti-Nazi Herwarth of the German embassy secretly conveyed it to U.S. ambassador Bohlen. Bohlen, Witness to History, 69–82 (at 71).

26. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 20–1 (Woermann foreign ministry memo, June 15, 1939).

27. Weinberg, Foreign Policy, II: 603. The German foreign ministry expert Nadolny was of the opinion that the Treaty of Berlin was still valid. DGFP series D, VI: 686–7 (June 9, 1939), 687 (June 9, 1939), 741–2 (June 17, 1939), 843–5 (July 4, 1939).

28. On June 17, Schulenburg, in Berlin, requested a meeting with Astakhov, and told him the German foreign ministry awaited a response to Weizsäcker's prompt of May 30, underscoring its sincerity and seriousness. God krizisa, II: 40 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 294, d. 2036, l. 115–6), 65–7 (f. 06, op. 1a, pap. 26, d. 1, l. 4–6; Molotov and Schulenburg, June 28).

29. Schulenburg brought up this incident to Molotov as a way of broaching touchy issues. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 53–6 (at 54: Schulenburg to the foreign ministry, Aug. 16, 1939).

30. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 25–6 (Hewel, June 29, 1939), 27–8 (Weizsäcker to Schulenburg, June 30). See also DGFP, series D, VI: 820–1 (Schnurre, June 30).

31. God krizisa, II: 105–6 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 302, d. 2090, l. 171–2; Surits, July 19, 1939); Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 496–7.

32. Duhanovs et al., 1939, 46–85.

33. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, DK266.A3 S2 1971; Gromyko et al. (eds.), Soviet Peace Efforts on the Eve of World War II (Moscow: Progress, 1973), 363. Lithuania further feared that Poland would immediately announce its own acceptance of a Soviet guarantee if Lithuania did so and that Hitler would blame Poland's action on Lithuania and take revenge. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 545–6 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 12, d. 126, l. 1–2; Pozdnyakov report to Molotov, July 19, 1939).

34. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 449 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 301, d. 2079, l. 186–7); Pravda, June 13, 1939.

35. God krizisa, II: 34–5 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 313, d. 2154, l. 107–8); Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 453.

36. Moiseev, la vospominaiu, 45–7. Moiseev provides no date for the incident, except that it took place before the Pact (Aug. 1939). His troupe's first appearance at a Kremlin reception was May 17, 1938 (banquet for schoolteachers); they appeared again on New Year's Eve 1938–9, May 5 and 7, 1939, July 5 and 20, 1939. Shamina, "Igor Moiseev." On Nov. 8, 1939, Moiseyev would write to Stalin, complaining of a lack of facility and resources; Stalin would turn the letter over to Shcherbakov, who gave them rehearsal space in the Tchaikovsky Concert Hall and apartments to some of the dancers. "My peremenili 16 mest raboty," Izvestiia, 2002, no. 3: 11–2; Ponomarev, Aleksandr Shcherbakov, 60.

37. Strang, Home and Abroad, 68. "Halifax invited me over and started complaining bitterly: we were creating unnecessary difficulties, we were absolutely unyielding, we were reusing the German method of negotiating (announcing our price and demanding 100% acceptance)," Maisky confided in his diary (June 23). "He admitted that, despite the large quantity of telegrams from Seeds and Strang, he still could not grasp what the problem was." Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, I: 415–6; Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 201.

38. Strang, Home and Abroad, 175.

39. Aster, 1939, 273 (citing letter to Hilda Chamberlain, Chamberlain Papers). Chamberlain, one British insider who hosted him in an intimate setting noted, "is not genuine in his desire for an agreement." Neilson, Britain, Soviet Russia, 300–1 (citing FO 371/23068/C8370/3356/18: Peake to Cadogan, June 9, 1939; Harvey Papers, ADD, MSS 5639).

40. Koliazin, "Vernite mne svobodu!," 220–40.

41. Medvedeva, "'Chornoye leto' 1939 goda," 318–66; Braun, "Vsevolod Meyerhold," 145–62; Morrison, People's Artist, 99–100 (citing RGALI f. 1929, op. 1, ed. khr. 655, l. 26ob.: Lina Prokofyeva); "Zagadka smerti Zinaidi Raikha," Komsomol'skaia pravda, Nov. 14, 2005.

42. Beria evidently awarded the larger part of Meyerhold's spacious, now vacant apartment in the heart of Moscow (just off Gorky St.) to one of his mistresses, Vardo Mataradze, officially a typist, whom he had brought from Georgia and, it is said, arranged to marry one of his NKVD drivers. The smaller half went to the driver, who found it too small and moved out. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 103–4. See also Radzinsky, Stalin, 434.

43. DGFP, series D, VI: 1059–62, VII: 67–9; Goldman, Nomonhan, 1939, 161–2.

44. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 108–9 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22407, d. 2, l. 359–60); DGFP, series D, VI: 737–40, 750–1.

45. DGFP, series D, VI: 821–2.

46. Domarus, Hitler: Reden, III: 1216; Vauhnik, Memoiren eines Militärattachés, 29.

- 47. DGFP, series D, VI: 858–60.
- 48. Weinberg, Foreign Policy, II: 601–27.
- 49. On June 9, 1939, Beria provided a denunciation from the local special department (“A powerful fist to destroy the enemy has not been formed. Troops are being thrown into battle without coordination and mutual support, suffering heavy losses”). Daines, Zhukov, 95–6 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1181, l. 126–7).
- 50. Sevost'ianov, “Voennoe i diplomaticheskoe porazhenie iaponii,” 70–1.
- 51. Barnhart, “Japanese Intelligence,” 436–7. The Kwantung chief was Ueda Kenkichi.
- 52. Efimenko et al., Vooruzhennyi konflikt, 133–4 (RGVA, f. 37977, op. 1, d. 86, l. 10–3; June 27, 1939), 192–3 (op. 3, d. 1225, l. 155–6; July 14, 1939), 164–5 (op. 1, d. 83, l. 166–71), 195 (d. 54, l. 121), 196–7 (d. 55, l. 92–6; Kulik), 219 (f. 4, op. 11, d. 54, l. 276); Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XVIII (VII/i): 124 (RGVA, f. 33977, op. 1, d. 54, l. 121), 124–5 (l. 129); Krasnov, Neizvestnyi Zhukov, 118–21. On July 10, 1939, Beria sent Voroshilov a copy of an intercepted letter from the Germany embassy in Moscow to Berlin concerning events at the Halha River. Military attaché Köstring reported the rumors that the Soviets had staged the border incident either to push the Japanese army back or to re-confirm to the British and French that the Japanese were a threat in the Far East, but he deemed these possibilities “unlikely.” Instead, he adhered to the view in the Japanese press that the borders were not clear and that the Mongol nomads migrated with their horses. He discounted the possibility of a full-scale Soviet-Japanese war in this remote border region. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XVIII (VII/i): 121–2 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1181, l. 166–9).
- 53. Hill, Weizsäcker Papiere, 157, 181.
- 54. DGFP, series D, VI: 870–1 (July 7), 889 (July 10).
- 55. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informuiet, 112–5 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 9157, d. 2, l. 418–31).
- 56. DBFP, 3rd series, VI: 389–91 (Wilson and Wohltat, July 19, 1939). See Metzmacher, “Deutsch-englische Ausgleichbemühungen.”
- 57. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 499–502 (July 21, 1939); Schorske, “Two German Diplomats,” 505–6.
- 58. Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, I: 426–7; Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 208; DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 574n158.
- 59. Aster, 1939, 243–51. On the parade: Pravda, July 21, 1939.
- 60. Dirksen, Moscow, Tokyo, London, 242; Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 113.
- 61. Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, I: 67–9; Gladwyn, Memoirs, 86–7. Pravda happened to announce on July 22, 1939, the resumption of Soviet-German trade and credit negotiations in Berlin. That same day, the German foreign ministry instructed the embassy in Moscow to try to restart political talks as well. DGFP, series D, VI: 955–6.
- 62. Overy, “Strategic Intelligence,” 465–6 (citing PRO WO 190/745: “Note on Germany's Present Position and Future Aims,” Jan. 17, 1939). See also MacDonald, “Economic Appeasement.” On May 23, 1939, Hitler had told his upper military that “it is not Danzig that is at stake. For us it is a matter of expanding our living space in the East and making food supplies secure and also solving the problem of the Baltic States. . . . No other openings can be seen in Europe.” DGFP, series D, VI: 574–80.
- 63. Neilson, Britain, Soviet Russia, 316 (citing Chamberlain Papers, NC 18/1/1108).
- 64. DBFP, 3rd series, IX: 323 (Halifax to Sir Robert Craigie in Tokyo, July 24, 1939); Neilson, Britain, Soviet Russia, 301–10 (citing Halifax Papers, FO 800/315: Henderson to Halifax, June 17, 1939; FO 371/23527/F7395/6457/10: Halifax interview with Maisky, July 25, 1939); Shai, “Was There a Far Eastern Munich?;” Parker, Chamberlain and Appeasement, 246–71; Watt, How War Came, 356–9.
- 65. Iklé, German-Japanese Relations, 182; Tokushirō, “The Anti-Comintern Pact,” 107–11. On June 24, 1939, Sorge reported by telegram that he had learned from Ott that the Japanese had allowed that “in the event of a war between Germany and the USSR, Japan will automatically enter into a war against the USSR.” Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 463 (June 24, 1939); See also Tokushirō, “The Anti-Comintern Pact,” 9–111.
- 66. Barnhart, “Japanese Intelligence,” 436–7.
- 67. Coulondre reported hearsay out of Berlin to Bonnet on July 11, 1939, that Ribbentrop had fallen out of favor with Hitler for failing to anticipate the strong British resistance to Germany's plans to reclaim Danzig. French Yellow

Book, 186–8.

68. Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 294.

69. Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 54. On Aug. 10, 1939, Hitler had summoned Carl Burckhardt, the conservative Swiss high commissioner of the League of Nations in Danzig, who had been working to avert a British-German war and generally blamed Polish intransigence. “Everything I undertake is aimed at Russia,” Hitler told him at the Berghof the next day, according to Burckhardt. “If the West is too stupid and too blind to see this, I shall be forced to come to an understanding with the Russians, defeat the West, and then marshal my forces against the Soviet Union. I need the Ukraine so that they cannot starve us out, as they did in the last war.” Hitler aimed to neutralize the British and sow distrust between London and Warsaw. Burckhardt, Meine Danziger Mission, 347–8; Levine, “Mediator.” On Sept. 1, 1939, the Nazi Gauleiter in Danzig, Forster, would order Burckhardt out of the “former” free city.

70. As Gaus testified at Nuremberg, “in the early Summer of 1939 . . . von Ribbentrop asked . . . von Weizsäcker and myself to come to his estate, Sonnenburg, near Freienwalde-an-der-Oder, and informed us that Adolf Hitler had for some time been considering an attempt to establish better relations between Germany and the Soviet Union.” This was Ribbentrop talking, not Hitler. Lasky, “Hitler-Stalin Pact,” 9, 15. Ribbentrop would seize upon any reports that Jews were being purged by Stalin to inform Hitler that the Soviet system appeared to be evolving toward a Russian fascism.

71. DGFP, series D, VI: 755–6, 1006–9, 1015–6, 1047–8; Hill, Weizsäcker Papiere, 157 (July 30, 1939); Weinberg, Foreign Policy, II: 604–5; Sipols, Tainy, 79–80.

72. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 33–7.

73. Henderson, Failure of a Mission, 252–3. Henderson had written to Horace Wilson in May 1939: “The responsibility of my small job in Berlin is greater than my capacity and I cannot feel otherwise than profoundly pessimistic.” Overy, 1939: Countdown, 57 (citing NA, PREM 1/331a).

74. Henderson, Failure of a Mission, 234. See also Cienfiala, “German Propaganda.”

75. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 38; DGFP, series D, VI: 1006–9 (July 27, 1939), 1059–62 (Aug. 4); DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 566–9 (AVP RF, f. 0745, op. 14, pap. 32, d. 3, l. 27–30; Aug. 2, 1939); AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1a, p. 26, d. 1, l. 7–12; f. 059, op. 1, pap. 294, d. 2036, l. 162–5, in Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 1. In Aug. 1939, Astakhov was recalled to Moscow; the Germans asked for him to be named ambassador to Berlin. Instead, Astakhov was demoted to a position in the Museum of the Peoples of the USSR. He seems to have died of muscular dystrophy in 1941.

76. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 585–7 (AVP RF, f. 011, op. 4, pap. 27, d. 61, 126–9; Astakhov to Molotov, Aug. 8, 1939); God krizisa, II: 179–80.

77. DGFP, series D, VI: 1059–62 (Schulenburg to Berlin, Aug. 3–4, just after midnight); Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 41.

78. Halder, who looked with trepidation on any pact between Britain and the Soviet Union, was said to have called the prospect “the only thing that could stop Hitler now” in a private conversation. Kordt, Nicht aus Akten, 313–19; Mosley, On Borrowed Time, 252.

79. Voroshilov appeared on nineteen of the twenty-seven days in August for which audiences were recorded in Stalin’s office logbook. For the instructions to Voroshilov (Aug. 4, 1939), see Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/i: 20 (citing AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1b, p. 27, d. 5, l. 22–32). Voroshilov would report to Stalin immediately after the conclusion of a session, and Kuznetsov writes that on occasion, he and Shaposhnikov attended, too. Kuznetsov appears in the office logbook only on Aug. 20 (without Voroshilov or Shaposhnikov); Shaposhnikov appears on Aug. 13, 14, and 25. There could also have been meetings at the dacha. Na prieme, 268–71; Kuznetsov, Nakanune, 249.

80. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/i: 19 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1235, l. 66–72). Beria continued to keep Voroshilov well informed of French, German, Italian, British, and other actors through eavesdropped conversations and agent reports, in the European capitals and in Moscow. RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 1235, l. 9/cc (Sept. 23, 1939: Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 16).

81. Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, I: 434–5 (Aug. 5, 1939); Pankrashova and Sipols, “Soviet-British-French Talks”; Roberts, Unholy Alliance, 140–1.

82. Primakov, Ocherki, IV: 261–2.

- ⁸³. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 55.
- ⁸⁴. Neilson, Britain, Soviet Russia, 310–1.
- ⁸⁵. Hill, Weizsäcker Papiere, 157–8. Molotov (July 28) praised Astakhov's detailed reporting of Schnurre's proposals and non-response. God krizisa, II: 145 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 295, d. 2038, l. 93); Fleischhauer, Der Pakt, 273–4.
- ⁸⁶. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 290.
- ⁸⁷. The intense impatience in Berlin was conveyed by Schnurre to Schulenburg in a telegram sent on Aug. 2 and received two days later: "Secret: Politically, the problem of Russia is being dealt with here with extreme urgency. During the last ten days I have daily had at least one direct or telephone conversation with the foreign minister and know that he is also constantly exchanging views with the Führer on this. The foreign minister is concerned to obtain some result on the Russian question as soon as possible, not only on the negative side (disturbing the British negotiations) but also on the positive side (an understanding with us) . . . You can imagine how eagerly talks with Molotov are awaited here." DGFP, series D, VI: 1047–8.
- ⁸⁸. DBFP, 3rd series, VI: 762–89 ("Instructions to the British Military Mission to Moscow, Aug. 1939"); Izvestiia, Aug. 12, 1939; Tsiminets, Vnesbnaia politika SSSR, IV: 439.
- ⁸⁹. Sipsol, Tainy, 89; Pravda, Dec. 24, 1989. Haslam maintained that "given the lack of serious intent in London it was inevitable that the Russians would turn to the Germans." Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 216.
- ⁹⁰. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 584 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 16, pap. 27, d. 5, l. 38; Aug. 7, 1939); Sluch, "Germano-sovetskie otnosheniia," 111.
- ⁹¹. Spiridonovka St. became Alexei Tolstoy St.; Litvinov resided on this street when he was people's commissar for foreign affairs.
- ⁹². Dokumenty i materialy kanuna vtoroi mirovoi voyny, II: 212–8 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1a, pap. 25, d. 12, l. 3–12); God krizisa, II: 191–6. Drax suggested that if the negotiations were switched to London, he would be able to produce the desired confirmation of his plenipotentiary powers. Someone remarked, to general laughter, that it would be simpler to have the documents sent to Moscow than to bring all the delegations to London. Kuznetsov, Nakanune, 247.
- ⁹³. Young, In Command of France, 239.
- ⁹⁴. Overy, 1939: Countdown, 13 (Borthwick Archive, University of York, Halifax Papers, A4.410.12/1).
- ⁹⁵. Dokumenty i materialy kanuna vtoroi mirovoi voyny, II: 218–23 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1a, pap. 25, d. 12, l. 13–22, Aug. 13, 1939), II: 239–47 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1a, pap. 25, d. 12, l. 48–59, Aug. 15, 1939); God krizisa, II: 196–202, 202–7, 220–8.
- ⁹⁶. "He that commands the sea," Sir Francis Bacon had explained of British strategy already in the seventeenth century, "is at great liberty, and may take as much and as little of the war as he will." Bacon, "Of the True Greatness of Kingdoms and Estates" [1612, enlarged 1625], as cited in Corbett, Some Principles of Maritime Strategy, 55.
- ⁹⁷. Ponomarev, Pokoriteli neba, 68–75.
- ⁹⁸. Schorske, "Two German Diplomats," 508. On Aug. 11, 1939, firm intelligence that Germany's attack on Poland was imminent reached the war office in London, effectively rendering further British moves toward Berlin a show to ensure that responsibility for the outbreak of war fell on Germany. Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, I: 83n.
- ⁹⁹. Schnurre summoned Astakhov on Aug. 13 (a Sunday) to convey agreement to conduct talks in Moscow. God krizisa, II: 185 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 7, d. 70, l. 1–2); DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 603, 606–7; DGFP, series D, VII: 62–4 (Ribbentrop to Schulenburg, Aug. 14), 68–9 (Weizsäcker to Schulenburg, Aug. 15). Interactions with Astakhov in Berlin had indicated to the Germans that an agreement was likely. DGFP, series D, VII: 17–20 (Schnurre to Berlin, Aug. 10, 1939), 20–1 (Schnurre to Schulenburg in Berlin, Aug. 10), 58–9 (Schnurre to Moscow embassy, Aug. 14).
- ¹⁰⁰. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 50–2 (Ribbentrop to Schulenburg), 52–3 (Schulenburg to German foreign ministry), 53–7 (Schulenburg), 57 (Schulenburg); Die Beziehungen, 55–7 (Ribbentrop's original instructions and Schulenburg's amendments); God krizisa, II: 229–31 (AVP RF, f. 0745, op. 14, pap. 32, d. 3, l. 33–6), 232–3 (l. 37–9); Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 353 (citing AVP RF, f. 0745, op. 15, pap. 38, d. 8, l. 126–8).
- ¹⁰¹. Also on Aug. 15, the Soviet military attaché in Tokyo reported that Japanese ruling circles remained gridlocked over a military alliance with Germany and Italy: the key players wanted the alliance to be directed solely against the USSR, while Berlin and Rome wanted to add Japan to their alliance against the Western powers. Gromyko et al., SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune, 583; The attaché was L. A. Mishin.

102. Lota, "Alta" protiv "Barbarossy", 70, 72 (no citation).

103. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 61–3 (Ribbentrop to Schulenburg, received in Moscow at 5:45 a.m. on Aug. 19).

104. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 7 (citing RGVA, f. [unspecified], op. 9157, d. 2, l. 418–31, 447, 453–4).

105. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 64–5 (Schulenburg to foreign ministry, Aug. 19, 1939), 65–6; God krizisa, II: 269–71 (AVP RF, f. 0745, op. 14, pap. 32, d. 3, l. 40–3), 271–3 (l. 44, 45–6), 274–6 (l. 47–51), 277–8 (l. 52–3), 280–91 (AVP RF, f. 03a, d. 05 Germaniia); DGFP series D, VII: 134 (Schulenburg to Berlin, Aug. 19, 1939); Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 214. Britain knew as well: Group Captain Malcom Christie, a former British air attaché who had excellent contacts among senior German officers and others hostile to Hitler, reported secret leaks to Sir Robert Vansittart (the retired undersecretary of the foreign office), who relayed the reports to the government. On June 27, 1939, Christie conveyed that the German mobilization for Poland would begin from Aug. 1 and be completed by the 27th. On Aug. 17, Christie reported that the war would commence between Aug. 25 and 28. Overy, 1939: Countdown, 23 (citing Churchill College, Cambridge, Christie Papers, CHRS I/29B); Andrew, Secret Service, 429.

106. Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 57–61; Trial of the Major War Criminals, XXXI: 233; DGFP series D, VIII: 310–3 (Ritter and Schulenburg to the foreign ministry, Oct. 18, 1939); Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 83–5.

107. As late as Aug. 20, Drax had written to Voroshilov that he had not yet received an answer from his government: Volkogonov, Triumf I tragediia, II/1: 21–2 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1235, l. 73); Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 351.

108. The agreement, at Soviet insistence, mentioned German "industrial goods," but had not specified what the term encompassed. In Oct. 1939, both Schnurre and Karl Ritter would deny this included armaments, perhaps as a way of bargaining for better terms of exchange. Wish lists the Soviets had passed on made abundantly clear industrial goods meant weaponry. Schwendemann, Die Wirtschaftliche Zusammenarbeit, 90–7.

109. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 66–7; Akten zur deutschen auswärtigen Politik, VII: 131 (Russian translation, Volkogonov, Hoover Institution Archives, container 1); DGFP series D, VII: 156–7 (Ribbentrop to the Moscow embassy, Aug. 20, 1939); God krizisa, II: 302 (AVP RF, f. 0745, op. 14, pap. 32, d. 3, l. 63–4); DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 585 n172; Volkogonov, Triumf I tragediia, II/1: 28–9.

110. Fleischhauer, Diplomatischer Widerstand, 14–28. Stalin preserved the exchange with Hitler in his personal archive: RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 296, l. 1–3.

111. God krizisa, II: 303 (AVP RF, f. 0745, op. 14, pap. 32, d. 3, l. 65); DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 624.

112. Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 300; Hoffman, Hitler Was My Friend, 102; Speer, Erinnerungen, 176; Domarus, Hitler: Reden, III: 1233; Das deutsche Reich und der Zweite Weltkrieg, IV: 142.

113. Watt, How War Came, 466–70; Meehan, Unnecessary War, 233–4; Maser, Der Wortbruch, 59–60.

114. Antonov, "Anatolii Gorskiï."

115. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 207; Baumgart, "Zur Ansprache Hitlers" (no. 2), esp. 126, 132–3 n53 and n55, 149n113; Below, Als Hitlers Adjutant, 180; Albrecht, "Wer redet heute noch von der Vernichtung der Armenier?"

116. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 212–3; Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, I: 439–40 (Aug. 22, 1939). "Of all the big Nazi leaders, Hermann Göring was for me by far the most sympathetic." Henderson would write in 1940. He had certain attractive qualities; and I must say that I had a real personal liking for him." Henderson, Failure of a Mission, 76. Prazmowska concluded that Britain's "guarantee to Poland had more to do with obtaining leverage with Poland in order to force her to the negotiating table, than with the defence of Poland from aggression." Prazmowska, Britain, Poland, 190.

117. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 225–6. On Aug. 22, 1939, with the TASS announcement of Ribbentrop's pending arrival, the Comintern executive (Gottwald, Dimitrov, Kuusinen, Manuïlsky, Marti, and Florin) assembled to map out a position defending against attacks by the "bourgeois" press in Britain and France. Lebedeva and Narinskii, Komintern i Vtoraia mirovaia voina, 69–71 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 18, d. 1291, l. 141–3).

118. Gorodetsky, Maïsky Diaries, 220.

119. Dिल्स, Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan, 199n. Sydney Cotton, an Australian pilot and aerial photography specialist who worked for British Air Intelligence, had been sent to Berlin to pick up Göring. DGFP, series D, VII: 235–6 (Woermann note, Aug. 23, 1939).

120. Volkogonov, Triumfi i tragediia, II/i: 110. For an earlier such incident involving Lord Beaverbrook in 1933, see Thayer, Bears in the Caviar, 33–4.

121. Memoir accounts claim that the airfield was festooned with Nazi flags, retrieved from the anti-Nazi productions at Mosfilm studios, and that a Soviet military band struck up “Deutschland über Alles,” but the detailed Soviet newsreels show neither the flags nor the band. RGAKFD, ed. khr. 16332. The German planes were “locked up” in a hangar under NKVD guard, no doubt so that they could be thoroughly examined. Baur, Hitler’s Pilot, 95.

122. Teske, General Ernst Köstring, 142.

123. Stalin had gathered Molotov, Mikoyan, Zhdanov, Voroshilov, Beria, and Kaganovich in the Little Corner until 3:30 p.m. Na prieme, 270–1. Also, on Aug. 23, 1939, the Moscow city soviet resolved to award land around the main NKVD HQ at Lubyanka, 2, for the building’s expansion; several residential structures housing 440 people were slated for demolition. (The residents received a mere 2,500 rubles’ compensation and free moving costs, and had to find or build their own new housing on plots granted outside Moscow.) Construction would begin almost immediately even as plans were still being drawn up by the architect, Alexei Shchusev, who went through various designs. The war would interrupt construction, which would be completed in 1948. A lack of resources inhibited the blending of the facades of the existing building and the addition until later (1979–82). Pogonii, Lubyanka, 2, 70–9.

124. Kalinin had told Schulenburg upon his appointment, “Don’t pay too much attention to the shoutings in the press. The peoples of Germany and the Soviet Union are linked by many different lines and to a great extent are dependent on each other.” Nekrich, 1941, 21 (citing German archives).

125. Berezhkov, At Stalin’s Side, 49–50.

126. “It was a move,” Hilger guessed, “that was calculated to put the [German] foreign minister off balance.” In fact, Stalin sought to demonstrate Moscow’s commitment to the new pact. Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 301. On Aug. 23, 1939, the logbook for Stalin’s office shows Molotov, Mikoyan, Zhdanov, Voroshilov, Beria, and Kaganovich (listed from 1:12 p.m. or so to 3:30 p.m., before the negotiations), then Molotov from 2:15 a.m. to 3:35 a.m. Na prieme, 270–1.

127. Chuev, Sto sorok, 257.

128. Shaposhnikov, Vospominaniia.

129. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 69.

130. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 210.

131. Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 303. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, using only German documents, attributed the Pact to Soviet initiative. This collection was immediately translated into Russian for Stalin and provoked his involvement in countervailing efforts, originally entitled “Answer to the Slanderers,” which in Stalin’s hands became Falsifiers of History, a work that would be published in Russian and English translation in 1948: RGASPI, f. 558, op. 2, d. 239–45. See also Nekrich, “Soviet German Treaty,” 9–13.

132. DGFP, series D, VII: 220 (Ribbentrop to the foreign ministry, Aug. 23, 1939), 223 (Kordt to Moscow embassy, Aug. 23, 1939); Herwarth, Against Two Evils, 165.

133. Van Creveld, Hitler’s Strategy, 186n8; Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 488–9 (no citation).

134. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 72–3.

135. “Mr. Stalin and Molotov commented in a hostile way on the behavior of the British military mission in Moscow which had not told the Soviet government what it actually wanted.” Naumov, 1941 god, II: 580 (German record). See also Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 72–6.

136. Antonov, “Anatolii Gorskii.”

137. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 581 (Politisches Archiv des Auswärtiges Amtes. Bonn, Bestand Büro RAM F/110019–30); Chuev, Sto sorok, 19. An alert SS adjutant, Lieutenant Richard Schulze, claims he managed to have his glass refilled from Stalin’s personal flask, and that it contained not vodka but water. Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 256. Schulze appears in the Pact photos.

138. For the text of the Pact, and the secret protocol, see DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 630–2 (AVP RF, f. 3a, d. 243; APRE, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675a, l. 3–4). Izvestiya carried the announcement of the Pact later that same day (Aug. 24, 1939).
139. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/i: 107 (no citation). Berezkhov writes that the cocktail party went on until dawn and that only after that was Ribbentrop able to inform Hitler. Berezkhov, At Stalin's Side, 40.
140. “‘Avtobiograficheskie zametki’ V. N. Pavlova—perevodchika I. V. Stalina,” 99.
141. This was Andor Hencke, the under state secretary, who added: “The cordial and yet at the same time dignified manner in which Stalin, without losing face, attended to each one of us, left a strong impression on us all.” Rees, World War II behind Closed Doors, 18 (citing Hencke’s 1950 interrogation, DGFP series D, VII: 225–9).
142. Bullock, Hitler and Stalin, 676. See also Hoffmann, Hitler Was My Friend, 102–14. Two German photographers were present, Hoffmann and Helmut Laux. Hoffmann, Hitler Was My Friend, 109.
143. Stalin’s logbook of visitors for Aug. 22 and 23 contains six names (aides were never logged in). On Aug. 24, Molotov alone is logged in (2:15 a.m. to 3:35 a.m.). Na prieme, 270–1. See also Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 96–7.
144. For the full Pact, see Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 76–8; and Naumov, 1941 god, II: 576–8, 585–93. Gaus appeared in the photos.
145. Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, III: 145 (Sept. 1935).
146. “Johnnie” Herwarth and his Bavarian wife, Pussi, spent time at Bohlen’s dacha, as Soviet intelligence and Stalin knew, but, officially, Herwarth was the chief contact at the German embassy in Moscow to Britain, the United States, and France. At the dacha they rode horses, played tennis, and sipped tea. Herwarth was one quarter Jewish. Bohlen, Witness to History, 69–83; Herwarth, Against Two Evils, 167.
147. Bezymenskii, “Secret Protocols of 1939,” 76; Bezymenskii, “Sovetsko-Germanskii dogovory,” 3, 20–1. Molotov would hold on to the Soviet original of the secret protocol until Oct. 1952, when it was belatedly placed in the “osobaia papka” of the party archives. Other 1930s agreements that contained secret protocols included the German-Polish nonaggression declaration of 1934, Franco-Italian and Anglo-Italian agreements of 1935 regarding Africa, the 1938 Munich Pact, the 1939 Anglo-Japanese Agreement on China, and so on.
148. Below, Als Hitlers Adjutant, 181–4; Ribbentrop, Memoirs, 109–15 (composed in prison while waiting to be hanged after the Nuremberg trial in 1946); Schmidt, Statist, 452–4; Bloch, Ribbentrop, 249. Stalin rewrote the text of the communiqué regarding Poland, and Hitler judged it superior to the text drafted in Berlin. Hilger recalled: “The old Romans,’ Stalin said, turning to me, ‘did not go into battle naked but with shields. Today correctly worded political communiqués play the role of such shields.” Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 302. Ribbentrop, who had conceded everything, later claimed to have been impressed by Stalin: “his sober, almost dry and yet so apt way of expressing himself, the hardness and yet generosity of his bargaining.” Ribbentrop, Memoirs, 113.
149. Na prieme, 271.
150. Simonov, “Zametki k biografii G. K. Zhukova,” 49. Khrushchev, who was at the Near Dacha on Aug. 23, 1939, recalled that Stalin said, “This is a game, who can outsmart and deceive whom.” Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 225–8. Stalin well understood that the Pact helped Hitler, too. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 115. Gaus claimed he overheard Stalin mutter “deception.” It is unclear if Gaus understood what could have been the Russian word (obman), though Stalin did know some words in German and might have uttered Täuschung; or Gaus could have misheard.
151. At the same time, complicating Japan’s attempt to conquer China, many Japanese forces were tied down in Manchukuo to deter the Soviet Union. Goldman, Nomonhan, 1939, 35 (citing U.S. Department of the Army, Forces in the Far East, Japanese Special Studies on Manchuria, 13 vols. [Tokyo, 1954–6], XI/3: 193).
152. Krasnov, Neizvestnyi Zhukov, 118–20.
153. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 252.
154. Efimenko et al., Vooruzhennyi konflikt, 319–20 (RGVA, f. 32113, op. 1, d. 670, l. 57–9). Zhukov would claim that he acted on Aug. 20 also because he learned that the Japanese planned an offensive beginning Aug. 24, but there is no such plan in the Japanese documentation record. Coox, Nomonhan, 578–9.
155. Coox, Nomonhan, 582. The Japanese espionage network in Mongolia, which had never amounted to much, evidently missed this massive buildup.
156. Grechko et al., Istoriia vtoroi mirovoi voiny, II: 217; Zhilin, Pobeda na reke Khalkhin-gol, 18; Khalkhin Gol, 71.

157. Vorozheikin, Istrebiteli, 224.
158. Mongol troops had been pressed into fighting by both belligerents, but, supposedly, many on the Japanese side refused to fight or defected to the Soviets. Dylykov, Demoktraicheskoe dvizhenie mongol'skogo naroda, 39–40.
159. Coox, Nomonhan. See also the blistering critique of Japanese strategy: Wilson, When Tigers Fight.
160. Erickson, Soviet High Command, 522.
161. Krasnov, Neizvestnyi Zhukov, 136–7.
162. Voroshilov forwarded the Zhukov telegram to Stalin, with a note: “As one could have anticipated, no divisions turned out to be surrounded, the enemy having either managed to remove the main forces in time or, more likely, no major forces were in this region for a long time, instead there was a specially prepared garrison, which now is completely destroyed.” A concentration camp for two thousand Japanese POWs had been prepared in Verkhne-Udinsk, but only around one hundred soldiers had been captured and they were sent to the Chita prison. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XVIII (VII/i): 127 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1225, l. 162), 139 (TsKhIK, f. 1 t/p, op. 1, d. 5, l. 93–4). See also Krasnov, Neizvestnyi Zhukov, 137.
163. Coox, Nomonhan, 914; Rossia i SSSR v voynakh XX veka, 177, 179; Goldman, Nomonhan, 1939, 101–53. For other numbers, see Krivosheev, Grif sekretnosti sniat, 77–85. Mongolia suffered 556 casualties.
164. “Muzhestvo i geroizm,” Krasnaia zvezda, Aug. 30, 1939; Sokolov, Georgii Zhukov, 143.
165. Simonov, “Zmetki k biografii G. K. Zhukova,” 54.
166. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 163–4 (RGVA, f. 37977, op. 1, d. 91, l. 32–3; Sept. 1, 1939). Zhou En-Lai brought some of the captured Japanese army codes to Moscow in Sept. to Dimitrov, who passed them to Beria. Lebedeva and Narinskii, Komintern i Vtoraiia mirovaia voina, 99 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 316, l. 12: note by Stern, Aug. 15); Sergutov, “Organizatsionnye aspekty deiatel'nosti vneshnei razvedki,” III: 241. “For the Japanese army, Nomonhan was the graveyard of reputations.” Coox, Nomonhan, 952; Ikuhiko, “Japanese-Soviet Confrontation,” 157–78.
167. Coox, Nomonhan, 1002 (Oct. 4, 1939); Coox, “The Lesser of Two Hells, Part 2,” 108.
168. Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 100–3; Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 123 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22407, d. 2, l. 417).
169. Weizsäcker, Memoirs, 210; Craigie, Behind the Japanese Mask, 71; DBFP, 3rd series, IX: 495–7; Iklé, German-Japanese Relations, 135 (citing International Military Tribunal for the Far East, Documents Presented in Evidence, exhibit 486: Ott to Weizsäcker, Aug. 25, 1939); Presseisen, Germany and Japan, 218 (citing exhibit 2735–A, 225, exhibit 3587); DGFP, series D, VII: 259–60 (Ott to foreign ministry, Aug. 24, 1939). The Soviet military attaché's aide in Tokyo sent a quick report to Moscow on Aug. 26: Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XVIII (VII/i): 159 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22410, d. 2, l. 131–2).
170. Robinson, Black on Red, 137. “It left us all stunned, bewildered, and groggy with disbelief,” recalled one loyal party member (who later defected). “Hatred of Nazism had been drummed into our minds year after year.” Kravchenko, I Chose Freedom, 332–5. Kravchenko, thirty-four years old in 1939, directed a factory in the industrial district of western Siberia.
171. Ehrenburg, Liudi, gody, zhizni, II: 202. Vsevolod Vishnevsky, then in the Soviet Far East, also heard about the Pact over the radio and was similarly shocked. The Far East received central newspapers with delay, and after the Aug. 23 treaty he received the August 15–17 newspapers, which had continued to rage about “cannibals” (Nazis). “What about the general ideational-philosophical and political evaluation of fascism, the bloc of aggressors?” he wrote in his diary. Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 200 (citing RGALI, f. 1038, op. 1, d. 2077, l. 390b., 41).
172. Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 74 (1939): 4 (Trotsky, “Stalin's Capitulation,” March 11, 1939), reprinted in Trotsky, Portrety revoliutsionerov, 147–9. Trotsky also asserted that Stalin was afraid. “The main source of the policy of Stalin himself is now fear in the face of the fear that he himself has begotten,” he wrote, apropos of Afriogonov's old play Fear. “Stalin never trusted the masses; now he fears them.” Trotsky, “Iosif Stalin: opyt kharakteristiki (Sept. 22, 1939),” in Portrety revoliutsionerov, 46–60 (at 58).
173. Manuilsky tried to explain to Hernandez at the Comintern villa in Kuntsevo, “Everything has been taken care of. We can't lose! . . . If the capitalists want to slit each other's throats, so much the better. When the time is right, when they begin to get weary, we will undoubtedly be solicited by both sides and can choose the one which suits us best. Don't worry, our army won't pull the chestnuts out of the fire for any capitalist country." Hernández, La grande trahison, 206–7.

174. Lebedeva and Narinskii, Komintern i Vioraia mirovaia voina, 71–85 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 73, d. 67, l. 44–59), 88 (op. 74, d. 517, l. 43); Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin, 150; “Komintern i sovetско-germanskii dogovor o nenapadenii,” 206; Firsov, “Arkhiyvi Kominterna”; Firsov, “Komintern,” 21–2. Daniil Kraminov (b. 1910), assigned to draft the first editorial for Izvestiya about the Pact, had no idea what to write. The editor, Yakov Selikh, approached Voroshilov, who compared the Pact to the 1918 Brest-Litovsk treaty with Germany for providing a breathing space. Already on Aug. 24, Selikh knew that Ribbentrop had proposed to insert words about German-Soviet friendship into the text, but Stalin had refused to do so. Selikh also knew the subjects of the toasts and the jokes exchanged. None of this information had been recorded in the Soviet documents. Kraminov, V orbite voyny, 55.

175. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 115–6 (Sept. 7, 1939). For the resultant new Comintern directive, dispatched abroad, see Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 117 (Sept. 8, 1939); Lebedeva and Narinskii, Komintern i Vioraia mirovaia voina, 88–90 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 18, d. 1292, l. 47–8); and King and Matthews, About Turn, 69–70. More broadly, see also Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin, 154–63.

176. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 115–6 (Sept. 7, 1939).

177. An antifascist documentary, Ispaniya (Spain), by Esther Shub, had premiered on July 20, 1939. Short and Taylor, “Soviet Cinema.”

178. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 539. See also Luk'ianov, “Aleksandr Nevskii: na s' emakh filma”; S. M. Eisenstein, “Zametkie rezhissera,” Ogonek, 1938, no. 22: 19, 20–1; and Izvestiia, Nov. 11, 1938. On Eisenstein's self-critique of the film, whose commercial success puzzled him, see Eisenstein, Film Sense, 123–68. Five other recently made anti-German films were also pulled.

179. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 160, l. 1 (note to Dukelsky). The Comintern's Dimitrov sent a long telegram admonishing Earl Browder, leader of the American Communists, that “now the issue is not just fascism, but the existence of the entire capitalist system,” and insisted there would be no more juxtaposing “democratic” capitalist countries to fascist ones. “This war is a continuation of the struggle between the rich great powers (England, France, the United States), which are the spine of the whole capitalist system, and the disadvantaged states (Germany, Italy, Japan), which in their struggle for a new division of the world are deepening and sharpening the crisis of the capitalist system.” Lebedeva, Komintern i Vioraia mirovaia voina, 132–6 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 469, l. 108–12).

180. Quoted in Hosking, First Socialist Society, 218–9.

181. Leonhard, Betrayal, 90.

182. Uttitz, Zeugen der Revolution, 134.

183. Vishnevskii, “‘Sami peredem v napadenie,’” 104–5: Aug. 28, 31, and Sept. 1, 1939.

184. The Anti-Komintern agency inside Goebbels's propaganda ministry, whose purpose was “a world anti-Bolshevik movement under German leadership,” was wound down with the signing of the Pact, but the Nazi regime's identity remained founded upon German racial superiority and a crusade against “Judeo-Bolshevism.” Waddington, “Anti-Komintern,” 576, citing NA, GFM34/1265: Goebbels circular, Dec. 8, 1936. See also Waddington, Hitler's Crusade.

185. Pravda, Sept. 1, 1939; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 581–3 (at 582); Mirovoe khoziaistvo i mirovaia politika, no. 9 (1939): 3; Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, III: 363–71. In connection with the Pact, the Soviets talked out of both sides of their mouths, allowing subsequent scholars on opposite sides to find quotes supporting their arguments about whether or not Stalin ever wanted a deal with the West. For example, Voroshilov said, via the Soviet press, that “military negotiations with England and France were not broken off because the Soviet Union concluded a nonaggression pact with Germany. On the contrary, the Soviet Union concluded a nonaggression pact with Germany because, among other reasons, the military negotiations with France and England had run into a blind alley because of insuperable differences.” (Those differences, he said, came down to a failure to guarantee western transit rights to Germany for the USSR in the event of an aggression.) But to the Germans, Stalin said that “the Soviet government”—i.e., himself—“never had sympathies toward England.” Stalin told Dimitrov, “We preferred agreements with the so-called democratic countries and therefore conducted negotiations. But the English and the French wanted us for farmhands and at no cost! We, of course, would not go for being farmhands, still less for getting nothing in return." Of course, these words on the Pact were precisely what the staunch antifascist Dimitrov would have wanted to hear. Izvestiia, Aug. 27, 1939, and Pravda, Aug. 27, 1939, in Tismineț, Vnesniaia politika SSSR, IV: 444–5; Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, III: 361–2; DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 606–17 (at 609, Schulenburg's papers); Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 115–6 (Sept. 7, 1939). See also Nekrich, Pariahs, 137; Roberts, "Pact with Nazi Germany," 94–5; and Fischer, Life and Death of Stalin, 162.

186. Fel'shtinskii, Oglasheniia podlezhit, 92.

187. Seraphim, Das politische Tagebuch Rosenbergs, 89–90 (Aug. 22, 1939); Deutschland-Berichte der Sozialdemokratischen Partei Deutschlands, VI: 985–8; Hoffman, Hitler Was My Friend, 103.

188. D'iakov and Bushueva, Fashistskii mekh kovalsia v SSSR, 364–5 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1237, l. 413). Maisky fell into shock upon word of the Pact: "Our policy is clearly making a sharp turnabout, the sense and consequences of which are so far not entirely clear to me" (Aug. 24, 1939). DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 647 (AVP RF, f. 017a, op. 1, pap. 1, d. 6, l. 223; Aug. 24, 1939); Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, I: 441.

189. Neilson, Britain, Soviet Russia, 314 (citing Chamberlain Papers, NC 18/1/1115).

190. Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 147.

191. Bell, France and Britain, 224–5; Adamthwaite, France, 49–50. Toward the end of 1939, a falsified "transcript" of a supposed politburo meeting would be published in France depicting a devious Stalin, an effort to discredit him in Hitler's eyes, and depicting the French Communist party as treasonous. Sluch, "Rech' Stalina," 113–39.

192. Just such a one-sided view of Chamberlain can be found in the once pro-appeasement foreign office official turned scholar E. H. Carr: German-Soviet Relations, 135–6. Carr's influential history of international relations since 1919 mocked "the notion that the maintenance of British supremacy is the performance of a duty to mankind." He sent his completed manuscript to the press in July 1939, and the book came out that Sept., when Nazism and Communism were together annihilating Poland. Carr, Twenty Years' Crisis, 72.

193. This priority on Chamberlain's part, however self-serving, had a strategic dimension: British success in maintaining the Commonwealth and empire in the interwar period would prove to be of considerable significance in the Allied victory over the Axis. Clayton, British Empire as Superpower, 517.

194. Neville Chamberlain Papers, University of Birmingham Library, 18/1/1091 (Chamberlain to Ida, March 26, 1939).

195. Chamberlain, according to Eden, had feared that "Communism would get its clutches into Western Europe" via the Spanish civil war. Smyth, "Soviet Policy," 105. It has been asserted that Chamberlain should have accepted Soviet expansionism into Central Europe if that could have avoided a war on the scale of World War II. Shaw, British Political Elite.

196. Overy, 1939: Countdown, 15 (citing Magdalene College, Cambridge, Inge papers, vol. 36, diary 1938–9, March 16, 1939).

197. Other Brits went even further in the Hitler apologetics than did Chamberlain, at the time and after. A. J. P. Taylor infamously wrote that Hitler "aimed to make Germany the dominant Power in Europe and maybe, more remotely, in the world. Other Powers have pursued similar aims, and still do. . . . In international affairs there was nothing wrong with Hitler except that he was a German." Taylor, Origins, 293.

198. Kennan in 1935 deemed the idea that Hitler intended to expand into the Soviet Union "the wildest stretch of the imagination." George Kennan, "The War Problem of the Soviet Union," in George F. Kennan Papers, Box 1, Mudd Library, Princeton University, in Hochman, Failure of Collective Security, 178. Looking back, Kennan would admit that he misread Hitler and the Nazi threat. Kennan, Memoirs, 1925–1950, 70–3.

199. Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 206–7 (the letter is dated March 26, 1939).

200. Conversely, the British ambassador to Germany had written in his annual report for 1935, a document read by Stalin, that "demanding a guarantee from Hitler vis-à-vis the Soviet Union is equivalent to demanding from the Church obligations to the devil." Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 234–5 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 315, l. 136).

201. Aster, 1939, 281.

202. Roberts, Holy Fox, 157.

- 203. Documents and Materials Relating to the Eve of the Second World War, 190–1 (von Dirksen memo, Sept. 1939).
- 204. Overy, “Strategic Intelligence,” 455.
- 205. Shirer, Berlin Diary, 148.
- 206. Overy, 1939; Countdown, 11, 34.
- 207. Below, At Hitler's Side, 29; Hill, Die Weizsäcker-Papiere, 160 (Aug. 25, 1939).
- 208. Henderson, Failure of a Mission, 259.
- 209. Documents Concerning German-Polish Relations, 122–3; DBFP, 3rd series, VII: 230, 235, 239; Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, VII: 77 (Aug. 26, 1939); Domarus, Hitler: Reden, III: 1257.
- 210. Hofer, Die Entstehung des Zweiten Weltkriegs, 237, 274; Weinberg, Foreign Policy, II: 633–4; Das Deutsche Reich und der Zweite Weltkrieg, II: 101–2.
- 211. Hartmann, Halder, 137.
- 212. Engelmann, In Hitler's Germany, 150. Not all German units received the new order to stand down, which meant fighting erupted in a few places, notably in the Jablonka Pass on the Slovak-Polish border.
- 213. I documenti diplomatici Italiani, 8th ser., 13 vols. (Rome: Libreria dello Stato, 1952–), XIII: 164–5. DGFP series D, VII: 285–6 (Mussolini to Hitler, Aug. 25, 1939); Hill, Die Weizsäcker-Papiere, 160–1 (Aug. 25, 1939); Gibson, Ciano Diaries, 128–9 (Aug. 25, 1939); Ciano, Diary, 264–5.
- 214. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 215. Italy had already informed Germany, in general terms, on May 31, 1939, that it would not be ready for war before 1943. In June 1939, Chamberlain told the committee of imperial defence that “the Italians would be on the lookout for any excuse to keep out of the war.” DGFP series D, VI: 617–20; Overy, “Strategic Intelligence,” 470 (citing PRO CAB 2/8: Minutes of CID meeting, June 22, 1939, 6).
- 215. Overy, 1939; Countdown, 36 (citing NA, PREM 1/331a: Strang to Cadogan, Aug. 26, 1939, 1; Halifax Papers, A4.4103/10 (i): Birger Dahlerus, 11; and Le Livre jaune français: documents diplomatiques 1938–1939 [Paris, 1939]), 312 (Coulondre to Bonnet, Aug. 25, 1939).
- 216. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 215; Hofer, Die Entstehung des Zweiten Weltkriegs, 276.
- 217. Engel, Heeresadjutant bei Hitler, 60 (Aug. 27 and 29, 1939).
- 218. Cienciala, “Poland in British and French Policy,” 215–6; DGFP series D, VII: 405–7 (Ribbentrop to Bernardo Attolico, Aug. 29, 1939). Joseph Kennedy, the U.S. ambassador to London, reported that Chamberlain was concerned that the Poles be “reasonable” vis-à-vis Hitler's demands. FRUS, 1939, I: 392 (Kennedy telegram, Aug. 30, 1939).
- 219. De Felice, Mussolini, II: 670.
- 220. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 581 (German account); Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 12. Ribbentrop had first told Stalin of the joke making the rounds in Berlin that “Stalin will join the Anti-Comintern Pact.” Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 75.
- 221. Hillgruber, Die Zerstörung Europas, 212. The expression to play “va banque” (translated here as “go for broke”), from baccarat, connotes wagering an amount equal to that held by the banker of the game.
- 222. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, VII: 85–6 (Aug. 31, 1939). On Sept. 1, Hitler launched a tirade at Dahlerus to the effect that he was prepared to fight Britain for a decade if forced to do so. Dahlerus, Der letzte Versuch, 130–1. On Aug. 28, 1939, Clare Hollingworth, a British correspondent traveling by car from Katowice to Gleiwitz, had glimpsed the vast German arsenal in the valley poised to attack and broken the news. Daily Telegraph, Aug. 29, 1939.
- 223. Dederichs, Heydrich, 89; Schellenberg, Schellenberg Memoirs, 68–70. On the bomber: Homze, Arming the Luftwaffe, 231; Weinberg, Foreign Policy, II: 513–4.
- 224. DBFP, 3rd series, VII: 501 (Halifax to Phipps, Sept. 1, 1939), doc. 504 (Henderson Sept. 2, 1939).
- 225. French Yellow Book, 307 (François-Poncet in Rome to Bonnet, Aug. 31, 1939).
- 226. Dietrich, The Hitler I Knew, 47; Schmidt, Statist, 464; Eberle and Uhl, Hitler Book, 47–8.
- 227. Back on Aug. 22, 1929, in a secret speech to his military brass, Hitler had restated his original grand strategy preference for attacking the Western powers first, explained his reversal of that sequence, declared his intention to strike Poland even if the Western Powers upheld their vows to act, and concluded that his sole concern was that the Schweinhund Chamberlain would find a way to cheat him out of war, just as the PM had at Munich. Weinberg, Foreign Policy, II: 610–1, 643n80. See also Baumgart, “Zur Ansprache Hitlers”; and Meyer, Generalfeldmarschall Wilhelm Ritter von Leeb, 184.

228. The prospect of Poland’s destruction and the “emancipation” of the ethnic German minority there beguiled the Wehrmacht brass as well, despite the latter’s concern about preparedness for a general conflict. Weinberg, Foreign Policy, II: 654; Tooze, Wages of Destruction, 321–2; Maiolo, “Armaments Competition,” 286–307.

229. Poland possessed only a provisional study for a western front, conducted in 1936. Prażmowska, Britain, Poland, 90–2, citing Polskie Siły Zbrojne w drugiej wojnie światowej, 3 vols. (London: Instytut Historyczny im. gen. Sikorskiego, 1951–86), I/i: 117–22, 209 (General Stachiewicz); Kirchmayer, 1939 i 1944 Kilka Zagadnień Polskich, 46–9; Colonel Jaklicz, typescript at the Polish Institute and the Sikorski Museum, London, 33, 121–2.

230. DGFP, series D, VII: 540–1; DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 600; Sontag and Biddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 86, 90.

231. Zaloga and Madej, Polish Campaign, 145–9; Tooze, Wages of Destruction, 304–29.

232. Cienciala, “Poland in British and French Policy in 1939”; May, Strange Victory, 93; Frieser, Blitzkrieg Legend, 18. On Sept. 5, Halder recorded in his diary of Poland: “enemy practically beaten.” (Halder Diaries, I: 53.) In fact, Polish forces emerged victorious in a major engagement with Wehrmacht forces in southeastern Poland.

233. Bédarida, La Stratégie secrète, 95.

234. AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 7, d. 68, l. 3–4, 5–6; God krizisa, II: 359–60; DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 6–7; Na prieme, 270–1. Accompanying Shkvartsev to Berlin was Vladimir Pavlov, sent as the new first secretary of the embassy; a new NKVD station chief, Amayak Kobulov; and a new military attaché, Maxim Purkayev (“Marble”). Shkvartsev had been received in the Little Corner on Aug. 19 (only with Molotov), and on Sept. 1 (again with Molotov, Voroshilov, Mikoyan, Pavlov, Purkayev, Kobulov, and Dekanozov). Shkvartsev would be present in the Molotov’s office on Sept. 28 during Ribbentrop’s second visit. In late December 1940, Pavlov would be transferred to Moscow as head of the Central European desk at the foreign affairs commissariat—at age twenty-five—overseeing Germany, Hungary, and former Czechoslovakia (under German occupation).

235. Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, 55.

236. Konstantin Simonov, then a writer at Red Star, would recall viewing the German invasion as an attack of the strong against the weak and not wanting to see a German victory. Simonov, Glazami cheloveka moego pololeniia, 309. See also Prishvin, Dnevnik, X: 276.

237. Semiriaga, “17 sentiabria 1939 g.”; DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 25–6 (AVP RF, f. 011, op. 4, pap. 24, d. 5, l. 29; Molotov-Grzybowski, Sept. 5, 1939).

238. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 91, 100.

239. Shaposhnikov had crossed out the order’s date in red pen and written in Sept. 14. Pikhoia and Gieysztor, Katyn’: pleniki, 59–63 (TsAMO, f. 148a, op. 3763, d. 69, l. 1–3, 4–6); Mel’tiukhov, Sovetsko-pol’skie voiny (2004), 435–47.

240. “The distrust on my side toward Stalin,” Hitler would observe to Mussolini on Oct. 28, 1940, “is matched by Stalin’s distrust toward me.” Langer, Undeclared War, 136 (no citation). According to Zhukov, Zhdanov, too, said it was impossible to trust Hitler. Simonov, “Zametki k biografii G. K. Zhukova,” 49.

241. Legner held an NKVD officer’s rank. Rybin, Stalin v oktjabre, 65–6. In Legner’s workshop, Nina Matveevna Gupalo sewed the clothes for politburo and other high-placed spouses. Back in 1938, after half the government guard detail had been arrested in a single night, Alexei Rybin (b. 1908), a member of the construction team for the Nearby Dacha and once a bodyguard for Kaganovich, then Orjonikidze, became military commandant of the Bolshoi Theater. Radzinskii, Stalin, 401; Rybin, Kto otravil Stalina?, 59.

242. Sharapov, “Piat’sot stranits v den”; Shefov, “Dve vstrechi,” 154; Ilizarov, Tainaia zhizn’ Stalina, passim; Medvedev and Medvedev, Neizvestnyi Stalin; Shepilov, Kremlin’s Scholar.

243. By some accounts, Radek had translated Mein Kampf for politburo members already in the early 1930s, before Hitler had come to power. The internal Russian translation of Mein Kampf would be published only after the fall of the Soviet Union: Adolf Gitler, Moia bor’ba (Moscow: T-Oko, 1992).

244. Asada, From Mahan to Pearl Harbor, 168.

²⁴⁵ Kalinin's copy has been preserved with marginalia about "a prolix, contentless" book "for petty shop owners": RGASPI, f. 78, op. 8, d. 140; Ilizarov, Tainaia zhizn' Stalina, 137; Ilizarov, "Stalin" (no. 4) 190–1.

²⁴⁶ Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 219; Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 216.

²⁴⁷ Gareev, Neodnoznachnye stranitsy, 20. Makhmut Gareyev (b. 1923) would rise to army general.

²⁴⁸ Heiden, Die Geschichte des Nationalsozialismus; Geiden, Istoriia germanskogo fashizma, 60. Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumf i tragediia, II/i: 23–26; Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 352–3. Heiden also produced the valuable Hitler: eine Biographie, 2 vols. (Zurich: Europa, 1936–7).

²⁴⁹ Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/i: 25 (no citation); Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 352.

²⁵⁰ Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 274–5.

²⁵¹ Izvestiia, Sept. 16, 1939; Tisminets, Vneshniaia politika SSSR, IV: 446.

²⁵² On the military orders, see Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XVIII (VII/i): 133 (RGVA, f. 33977, op. 1, d. 28, l. 36); and Efimenko et al., Vooruzhennyi konflikt, 409 (RGVA, f. 33977, op. 1, d. 28, l. 38). On July 18, 1940, Japan would effectively recognize the boundaries as claimed by the USSR. Ikuhiko, "Japanese-Soviet Confrontation," 174–5.

²⁵³ Ikuhiko, "Japanese-Soviet Confrontation." See also Sorge's report of Sept. 10, 1939: Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XVIII (VII/i): 159 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22407, d. 2, l. 455–6).

²⁵⁴ DGFP, series D, VIII: 79–80 (Schulenburg, Sept. 17, 1939)

²⁵⁵ Biegański et al., Documents on Polish-Soviet Relations, I: doc. 69; DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 94–96 (AVP RF, f. 011, op. 4, pap. 24, d. 7, l. 176–9; Potyomkin-Grzybowski, Sept. 17, 1939), 96 (f. 059, op. 1, pap. 313, d. 2155, l. 49–51: diplomatic note); Izvestiia, Sept. 18, 1939; Pikhoia and Gieysztor (eds.), Katyn: plenniki, 65–7 (APRF, f. 3, op. 50, d. 410, l. 35–9; Potyomkin diary, Sept. 17, 1939); Cienciala et al., Katyn, 44–7; Official Documents Concerning Polish-German and Polish-Soviet Relations, 211–12. Schulenburg had been shown the note and allowed to suggest changes. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 96.

²⁵⁶ Liszewski, Polsko-owiecka wojna, 24 (citing the prophetic words of Marshal Rydz-Smigła).

²⁵⁷ Pravda, Sept. 18, 1939; Izvestiia, Sept. 18, 1939, in Tisminets, Vneshniaia politika SSSR, IV: 446–8; New York Times, Sept. 18, 1939: 5. Zhdanov had written in Pravda (Sept. 14, 1939) that the Polish state was collapsing because of its repression of Ukrainian and Belorussian national minorities, which he blamed on the Polish bourgeoisie, capitalists, and landowners.

²⁵⁸ Zaloga and Madej, Polish Campaign, 131–8.

²⁵⁹ Kuznetsov, Krutye povoroty, 47.

²⁶⁰ Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 86–7.

²⁶¹ "Itinerar Hitlers vom 1.9.1939–31.12.1941," in Hillgruber, Hitlers Strategie, 659–98 (at 660–1); Below, Als Hitlers Adjutant, 205.

²⁶² DGFP, series D, VIII: 92.

²⁶³ DGFP, series D, VIII: 104–5; Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, 55. On Sept. 20, having received assurances from Berlin, both Schulenburg and Köstring separately offered assurances to Soviet officials.

²⁶⁴ RGVA, f. 4, op. 19, d. 22, l. 62. Soon, rumors would spread of additional clashes. "In town there is more and more talk about the Russians returning and about battles between German and Soviet troops somewhere along the Bug River and other locations," Dr. Zygmunt Klukowski recorded in his diary (Oct. 15, 1939). "Sorry to say, but some citizens are as equally brutal as the Germans toward the Jews." Klukowski, Diary from the Years of Occupation, 41–2.

²⁶⁵ Wheeler-Bennett, "From Brest-Litovsk to Brest-Litovsk."

²⁶⁶ Domarus, Hitler: Reden, III: 1354–66 (Hitler's Danzig speech).

²⁶⁷ DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 28–9 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 924, d. 2027, l. 19–20; Shkvartssev to Molotov, Sept. 5, 1939).

²⁶⁸ RGVA, f. 4, op. 19, d. 22, l. 60–3.

²⁶⁹ Molotov did allow that Germany might claim the Suwałki triangle (between East Prussia and Lithuania), except for Augustovo. Rossi, Deux ans, 75n1, 75–6n1 (Schulenburg to Ribbentrop, Sept. 20, 1939); Rossi, Russo-

German Alliance, 62–3 (citing a telephone message from Ribbentrop to Köstring and a telegram from Schulenburg to Berlin, neither published in Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations).

270. Mel'tiukhov, Sovetsko-pol'skie voiny (2004), 496–7 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 19, d. 22, l. 60–1); Teske, General Ernst Köstring, 176ff.

271. "Itinerar Hitlers vom 1.9.1939–31.12.1941," in Hillgruber, Hitlers Strategie, 661.

272. Mel'tiukhov, Sovetsko-pol'skie voiny, (2001), 303–350, (2004), 463–92; Erickson, "Red Army's March," 18–20; Włodarkiewicz, Lwów. Fifteen thousand Lvov defenders (1,000 of them officers) were taken prisoner; many would not survive captivity.

273. Krivoshein, Mezhdubur'e, 234–9; Schmidt-Scheeder, Reporter der Hölle, 101; Deutscher Allgemeine Zeitung, Sept. 25, 1939.

274. Guderian, Vospominaniia soldata, 105.

275. Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 85–6 (Sept. 20, 1939); Mel'tiukhov, Sovetsko-pol'skie voiny (2001), 319–23, 326–33 (citing RGVA, f. 4, op. 19, d. 22, l. 60–5); Nekrich, Pariahs, 130–2.

276. Back in 1934, Stalin's ambassador to Poland (Yakov Davtyan) had confided in the American ambassador his "doubt concerning the capacity of Poland to exist as an independent nation"—a widely held Soviet prejudice. The next year, Piłsudski, dictator of Poland, had died. "Piłsudski is the entire Poland," Radek claimed he had heard Stalin say. Kuromiya, "Stalin's Great Terror," 8 (citing Centralne Archiwum Wojskowe, I.303.4.3158, 235).

277. Wańkowicz, Po klęsce, 612.

278. Pikhoia and Gieysztor, Katyn': plenniki, 77 (RGVA, f. 35084, op. 1, d. 8, l. 168), 78–83 (Tsentr khraneniia istoriko-dokumental'nykh kollektsii, f. 1/p, op. 1a, d. 1, l. 1–9), 89–92 (l. 63–7), 92–5 (op. 1c, d. 1, l. 17–18), 114–8 (APRF, f. 3 op. 5, d. 614, l. 228–30), and 118–9 (APRF, f. 3, op. 50, d. 410, l. 148–9).

279. Freidländer, Nazi Germany and the Jews, I: 267–8; Polonsky, Politics in Independent Poland, 467–9; Melzer, No Way Out, 22, 43, 91; Milton, "Expulsion of Polish Jews from Germany"; Heller, On the Edge of Destruction.

280. Buell, Poland, 307 (General Stanisław Skwarczyński).

281. Westermann, Hitler's Police Battalions, 124–8; Madajczyk, Die Okkupationspolitik Nazi-Deutschlands, 19–20.

282. Broszat, Nationalsozialistische Polenpolitik, 41ff.

283. Fritzsche, Life and Death.

284. Gross, Revolution from Abroad, 48.

285. DGFP series D, VIII: 77 (Schulenburg, Sept. 16, 1939). Stalin in Aug. 1923 had predicted the need for "a war against Poland, and possibly the other limitrofa states," in connection with revolution in Germany. ("Naznachit' revoliutsiia v Germanii na 9 noiabria," 133.) Tukhachevsky shared this view and his close friend, the Polish Communist Tomasz Dąbal, deputy general secretary of the fledgling Peasant International, in May 1925 had spoken openly in Red Star, the Red Army newspaper, of "a right to separate [the Ukrainians and Belorussians] from Poland and join them to the Soviet republics." Krasnaia zvezda, May 7, 1925. According to French military intelligence, basing itself on a Polish source, the Soviet military commander Uborevičius, an ethnic Lithuania, had stated ingratiatingly at a banquet in Berlin with the German military brass on Feb. 1, 1930, "Have we not moved far enough in the past two years to be able to pose the question of a revision of the borders and a drubbing of the Poles? In fact, we ought to partition Poland again." Castellán, Le réarmement clandestin du Reich, 185 (citing letter att. mil., Berlin, no. 152: 295, March 28, 1930).

286. Gross, Revolution from Abroad, chap. 1, 206. Sukiennicki, "Establishment of the Soviet Regime"; Vakar, Byelorussia, 164–5, 168–9. Perhaps ten thousand more Ukrainians were repatriated westward as labor power by Nazi intelligence under falsified German racial origin designations.

287. Simonov, Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia, 80–1.

288. Vernadsky also pointed out a lack of white bread even for those with the money to pay, a decline in the quality of black bread, queues for vodka, and general dissatisfaction and hardship. Vernadskii, Dnevnik, 1935–1941, II: 56. See also Nevezhin, "Pol'sha v sovetskoi propagande," 69–88. Bolshevik, the party journal, in its Sept. 1939 issue called the Red Army's crossing into eastern Poland "a liberation" of ethnic Ukrainians and Belorussians, while making no mention of the Pact. The same issue celebrated the first anniversary of the Short Course and the country's pending progress in Marxist-Leninist training. Bol'shevik, 1939, no. 17: 6–11, 12–21. Identical treatment appeared in Ogonyok (no. 24 [1939]: 1–7), which had a thrice-monthly circulation of 300,000. On a poster by Viktor Korecki, printed in four languages and 800,000 copies, Stalin was quoted as declaring, “Our army is an army of liberators.”

289. “SSSR v voine,” Biulleten’ oppozitsii, no. 79–80 (1939): 8.

290. Iskusstvo kino, 1940, no. 1–2: 44. “In the heat of our work the radio brought news of the historic decision of the Soviet Government,” enthused the director Yefim Dzigan of First Cavalry Army. Kino, Nov. 7, 1939. Semyon Goldstab [b. 1906], who had debuted the Stalin role in Lenin in October, played him again. The real Stalin hand-corrected the screenplay. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 165, l. 1. See also Chernova and Tokarev, “Pervaia Konnaia”; Vishnevskii, “Pervaia konnaia.” During the Nov. 7, 1939, commemoration of the October Revolution, Burning Years would be screened outdoors on Moscow’s Sverdlov Square, across from the Bolshoi Theater.

291. Krasnaia zvezda, Oct. 17, 1938.

292. Tokarev, “Kará panam! Kará,” 49 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 36, d. 3792, l. 221), and Lebedeva, Katyn’: prestuplenie, 112.

293. Cienciala, “The Foreign Policy of Józef Piłsudski and Józef Beck,” 130–43; Kornat “Anna Maria Cienciala,” 37.

294. Stalin told the staunch antifascist Georgi Dimitrov, “Now [Poland is] a fascist state, oppressing Ukrainians, Belarussians, and so forth. The annihilation of that state under current conditions would mean one fewer bourgeois fascist state to contend with!” Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 116 (Sept. 7, 1939).

295. For example, Duraczyński and Sakharov, Sovetsko-Pol’skie otnosheniia, 67–70.

296. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 291.

297. Volobuev and Kuleshov, Ochishchenie, 157; Rayfield, Stalin and His Hangmen, 22 (citing Pravda, Dec. 21, 1994). Before the revolution, of Bogdanov’s critique of Lenin (which continued to circulate underground into the 1930s), Stalin had written privately in a letter, “How do you like Bogdanov’s new book? In my opinion some of Ilich’s blunders are very telling and correctly noted. It is also correctly pointed out that Ilich’s materialism differs in many ways from that of Plekhanov, which in spite of the demands of logic (and for the sake of diplomacy?) Ilich tries to cover over.” Dubinskii-Mukhadze, Ordzhonikidze, 92–3, n1. Stalin also wrote something similar in a letter to Mikho Tskhkaya: Istoriia KPSS, 6 vols. (Moscow: Politizdat, 1967), II: 272.

298. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 3, d. 257–63. Van Ree, Political Thought, 107–8.

299. Jasny, Soviet Economy, 418; Allen, Farm to Factory, 107–8. Some 77 percent of Soviet camp inmates at this time were ethnic Russians or Ukrainians.

300. Afanas’ev et al., Istoriia Stalinskogo Gulaga, 158 (RGANI f. 89, op. 73, d. 3, l. 1–2). A “labor day” was worth nothing in 15,700 out of 240,000 collective farms. Hosking, First Socialist Society, 169.

301. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe politbiuro, 171–2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 25, l. 156; f. 17, op. 3, d. 1015, l. 30; f. 17, op. 3, d. 1016, l. 33; f. 17, 163, d. 1237, l. 223–4); Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 242–4.

302. Fel’shtinskii, SSSR-Germaniia, I: 103–4; Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 102; Ulam, Stalin, 515. Warsaw fell on Sept. 26.

303. “Upon his arrival in Moscow, von Ribbentrop was welcomed by a group of Soviet officials and by Count Schulenburg,” wrote Herwarth. “I was standing next to Gebhardt von Walther,” who “seized my arm and pointed to a group of Gestapo agents who warmly greeted their counterparts from the NKVD.” Herwarth, Against Two Evils, 165.

304. DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 606–17n226 (translation of Hilger’s official record, discovered in Schulenburg’s papers in 1990); in German in Fleischhauer, “Der Deutsch-sowjetische Grenz- und Freundschaftsvertrag vom 28 September 1939.”

305. DVP SSSR, XXII/iii: 611, 614–5.

306. The pact with Estonia was printed the day after next (Izvestia, Sept. 29, 1939), without the confidential protocol: Polpredy soobshchaiut, 62–4 (AVP RF, f. 03a Estoniia, d. 010).

307. DVP SSSR, XXII/iii: 614.

308. Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 223–7.

309. Fleischhauer, “Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact”; Chuev, Kaganovich, Shepilov, 118; Chuev, Sto sorok, 19, 24; Chuev, Tak gorovril Kaganovich, 90; Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 313–4.

310. Davlekamova, Galina Ulanova.

311. Mel'tiukhov, Upushchennyi shans Stalina, 179–80; Ilmjärvi, Silent Submission, 365; Kuromiya, Stalin, 143; Izvestiia, Sept. 29, 1939. Already on Sept. 27, before seeing Ribbentrop inside the Kremlin, the Estonians had noticed a big airplane with a swastika at the Soviet aerodrome at Velikie luki. Rei, Drama of the Baltic Peoples, 264.

312. Bezemenskii, Gitler i Stalin, 309; Sommer, Das Memorandum; Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 103–7; Fleischhauer, “Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact”; Kaslas, “Lithuanian Strip.”

313. DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 616–7.

314. Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 304–5. Apparently, Stalin promised to come to Germany's aid if it fell into difficulties, a remark that appears to have stunned Ribbentrop. Stalin: “The fact is that for the time being Germany does not need foreign help, and it is possible that in the future they will not need foreign help either. But if, against all expectations, Germany finds itself in a difficult situation, then she can be sure that the Soviet people will come to Germany's aid and will not allow Germany to be suppressed.” Zhilin, O voine, 185; Fleischhauer, “Der deutsch-sowjetisch Grenz- und Freundschaftsvertrag,” 457–64.

315. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 267–8; DGFP, series D, VII: 92, 105, 109, 130. The “General Gouvernement for the occupied Polish territories” was proclaimed on Oct. 8, 1939.

316. Ribbentrop, Memoirs, 129–32 (at 132). Ribbentrop would call the Soviets old party comrades to Mussolini on March 10, 1941. DGFP, series D, VIII: 886. See also Dallin, Soviet Russia's Foreign Policy, 76–7.

317. Pravda, Sept. 29, 1939. For the text and secret protocol, see: DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 134–5 (AVP RF, f. 3a Germaniia, d. 246), 135–6 (APRF; f. 3, op. 64, d. 675a, l. 20). Facsimiles of the document in German and Russian can be found in Hass, 23 August 1939, 246–51; facsimiles of the maps, with Stalin's signature, can be found in Pikhoia and Gieysztor, Katyn': plenniki, 98–9. See also Izvestiia, Sept. 29, 1939.

318. Golovanov, “1,367 dnei iz zhizni Andreia Tupoleva.”

319. Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 90, 92.

320. Supposedly, Stalin, good-cop style, puffing his pipe, took to appearing from behind a curtain in Mikoyan's office and offering “compromises” to the Germans.

321. The regime's notetaker, Vyacheslav Malyshev, paid tribute to the effectiveness of the faux-populism, recording that “this was a characteristic trait of Stalin's: to drill down to the smallest details, especially when those small details affected people.” Malyshev, “Dnevnik narkoma,” 109; Na prieme, 275. This appears to have been a secret (non-published) decree. No such decree appears in late 1939 or 1940 in the account offered by Barber and Harrison, Soviet Home Front, chapter 9.

322. The “affinity thesis”—despite the profound ideological enmity—was subsequently re-presented by Tucker and Nekrich. Tucker, Stalin in Power; Nekrich, Pariahs.

323. More than four of every five Nazi Party members were male. A National Socialist Women's League counted approximately 2 million members; it offered classes for schoolgirls and brides and promoted consumption of German-made products. Payne, History of Fascism, 184.

324. Rigby, Communist Party Membership, 52. Communist Youth League membership, for those from age fourteen (to maximum twenty-eight), shrank to just 400,000 in 1938. Hitler Youth membership, which was compulsory from age fourteen for Aryans and closed to others, exceeded 7 million by then.

325. The best overview remains Orlow, History of the Nazi Party, II.

326. To be sure, German state demand for goods and services had gone through the roof since 1932, as the state share of GDP more than doubled to 30.5 percent. The state also influenced foreign exchange, set some wages, and froze some prices, but it only rarely nationalized property. Jewish property was confiscated by forced sale, but usually to Aryan private owners. Buchheim and Scherner, “Role of Private Property.”

327. Malyshev, “Dnevnik narkoma,” 111 (May 26, 1940).

328. Herwarth would tell U.S. ambassador Charles Bohlen after WWII that “We were able to make a deal with the Soviets because we were able without any problems with German opinion to deliver the Baltic states and eastern Poland to Russia. This the British and the French, with their public opinions, were unable to do.” Bohlen, Witness to History, 86.

329. Weinberg, “Nazi-Soviet Pacts,” 185 (citing PRO, FO 371/24846, f. 10, N 6526/30/38, Cripps to the Foreign Office, July 16, 1940). For the mostly matching Soviet transcript: “Priem angliiskogo posla S. Krippsa,” in Sochineniia, XVIII: 190–7 (at 191). Versailles revision was something Chamberlain, too, pursued in his own way, albeit only with regard to Germany—not the Soviet Union.

330. XVIII s'ezd VKP (b), 27.

331. Nevile Henderson, in an unintentional self-indictment, would correctly note that “though Hitler was constantly talking of the hand which he had held out to England and complaining that England had rejected it, whenever definite advances were made to him, he always found some way of withdrawing and of refusing to meet us half-way.” Henderson, Failure of a Mission, 110.

332. Bullock wrote that from “1934 through 1939 Hitler’s priorities were the reverse of Stalin’s: foreign policy and rearmament, not domestic issues. If Stalin had to pay increasing attention to foreign policy and defense in 1938 and 1939, it was not because of expansionist ambitions of his own but because Hitler’s successes threatened the security of Stalin’s achievement within the Soviet Union.” This misses Stalin’s opportunism and intense resentment at British power. Bullock, Hitler and Stalin (New York: Knopf, 1991), 639.

333. Hitler had told his military commanders on May 23, 1939, “for us it is a matter of expanding our Lebensraum in the East and of making food supplies secure,” not merely the city of Danzig. Overly, 1939: Countdown, 2 (citing ADAP, VI: 479).

334. “I am certain that even if the Germans were given more than they ask for they would attack just the same, because they are possessed by the demon of destruction,” Ciano recorded in his diary after meetings with Ribbentrop and Hitler on Aug. 11–12. Ciano, Diary, 118–20 (Aug. 11–13, 1939).

335. See the cryptic notes on Sept. 1939 by Orlova, Vospominaniia, 101. This passage was omitted from the translation: Orlova, Memoirs, 90–1.

336. Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War, 178.

337. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 451, l. 37–40, 57. On Oct. 7, 1939, the actor Boris Shchukin died suddenly, at age forty-five; he had been in the company of the Vakhtangov since 1920, where he played more than one hundred roles, including Lenin, and been named a USSR People’s Artist in 1936. But he had suffered some sort of nervous breakdown, after which he had developed a heart condition.

338. Trying to take advantage of the Pact, Boris Pasternak approached the journal Znamia in early Nov. 1939 to try to publish his three-year-old translation of the German writer Heinrich von Kleist’s Prince of Homburg (1809–10). The play, about the necessity of unquestioning obedience to orders, was enjoying good runs in theaters in Nazi Germany. But Znamia (under Vishnevsky) rebuffed Pasternak. Still, the play was published in a collection of translations: Pasternak, Izbrannnye perevody; Tarasenko, “Pasternak.”

339. “Thus begins a politics resembling a fight between two wild animals,” the antifascist Vishnevsky recorded in his diary on Oct. 5, 1939. “Uncommon cunning, but diplomatic, military, and hunting tricks—a common phenomenon between wild animals. This is what our Russian person fears, when he hears about ‘friendship’ with fascism.” Vishnevskii, Sobranie sochinenii, VI: 298.

340. Warlimont, Inside Hitler’s Headquarters, 37.

341. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 262–71. In Nov. 1939, Halder did engage acquaintances in the officers corps, civil service, and counterintelligence in conversation about possibly arresting Hitler and putting Göring in power (who was known to oppose war with Britain and France), but the plotters panicked and abandoned their talks.

342. Moorhouse, Killing Hitler, 49 (citing Bundesarchiv, Elser interrogation file, BA R30001/310/106).

CHAPTER 12. SMASHED PIG

1. Biulleten’ oppozitsii, no. 79–80 (Aug.–Oct. 1939), 14–6.

2. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 124–5 (Jan. 21, 1940).

3. Monakov, “Zachem Stalin stroil okeanskii flot?”; Rohwer and Monakov, Stalin’s Ocean-Going Fleet. A key motivation had been the Anglo-German Naval Agreement that had abandoned Versailles Treaty restrictions on the size of the German fleet. Ivanov, Morskoe sopernichestvo imperialisticheskikh derzhav; Morskoi sbornik, 1937, no. 9: 114–25. Contrary to some analyses, the key prompt was not the Spanish Civil War. Voroshilov, as early as the 17th Party Congress, in Jan. 1934, had promised that, as a result of industrialization, “we shall be able to create our shipbuilding industry and soon produce our fleets.” Herrick, Soviet Naval Strategy, 38–45; XVII s'ezd, 230. Naval commander

Vladimir Orlov had presented the initial draft of a big-fleet program in early Feb. 1936 and later detailed it publicly in a speech to the Congress of Soviets (Nov. 28, 1936). Gromov, Tri veka Rossiiskogo Flota, II: 340–3; Pravda, Nov. 29, 1936; Orlov, “Rech’ tov V. M. Orlova.”

4. The naval commissariat was approved Dec. 30, 1937. Pravda, January 17, 1938. Between May 1937 and Sept. 1938, more than 3,000 naval officers were executed. During the second Five-Year Plan (1933–37) Soviet naval academies graduated about the same number of green officers. Gromov, Tri veka Rossiiskogo flota, III: 358. Admiral ranks would be restored on May 7, 1940; Kuznetsov, Galler, and Isaakov became admirals.

5. Rohwer and Monakov, “Soviet Union’s Ocean-Going Fleet,” 855.

6. “Thus ended the conversation about battleships,” Kuznetsov commented, “whose construction was already going full speed ahead, while I as a Navy commissar was still not quite clear in my head why they were being built at all!” Kiselev, Admiral Kuznetsov, 105. As Hauner explains of the impossible fleet plans, in 1939 “the Soviets lacked much basic industrial infrastructure: their gun factories could not yet produce or test guns of sixteen-inch caliber; boilers for the powerful steam turbines could not have been manufactured until after the war; there was no sophisticated optical equipment for fire control.” Hauner, “Stalin’s Big-Fleet Program,” 106. In 1939, the Soviets remained a one-ocean power—i.e., the Arctic, frozen much of the year.

7. Aselius, Rise and Fall of the Soviet Navy; Philbin, Lure of Neptune.

8. Kuznetsov signed off on the new plan on July 27, 1940. Kuznetsov, “Voenno-Morskoi flot nakanune Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny”; Rohwer and Monakov, Stalin’s Ocean-Going Fleet, 71–106 (citing RGA VMF; f. 2, d. 39526, l. 1–33). Of the 25 billion rubles that would be earmarked for weapons systems in 1940, almost one quarter would go to the navy. The Soviets never completed the colossal battleships, but by the middle of 1941 they would have 267 submarines, more than any other country.

9. Stalin dispatched deputy commissar Admiral Ivan Isakov in May 1939 to the United States, but he proved unable to achieve a breakthrough in the negotiations (asking for the moon), and the attack on Finland ended them. FRUS, The Soviet Union, 1933–1939, 457–91, 670–707, 869–903; Davies, Mission to Moscow, 208. See also Maddux, Years of Estrangement, 86–8, 96–8. Stalin had unexpectedly appeared at negotiations with then U.S. Ambassador Davies in 1938, offering to settle repudiated tsarist-era debts in return for access to naval technology. The disadvantage of the Komsomolsk shipyard was the Amur’s lack of depth, forcing larger ships to be towed downstream after launch to be fitted out at Pacific Coast shipyards.

10. On Oct. 26, 1939, a sixty-person Soviet delegation led by shipbuilding commissar Ivan Tevosyan arrived in Berlin with a breathtaking wish list: complete materials for building four light cruisers; two hulls of heavy cruisers (Admiral Hipper class); ship and coastal guns (all calibers); torpedoes and mines; optical range finders, fire control directors, and hydro-acoustical devices; and entire blueprints for the battleship Bismarck, the Hipper-class heavy cruisers, Scharnhorst-class battle cruiser, and aircraft carrier Graf Zeppelin. Hauner, “Stalin’s Big-Fleet Program.” Bezemensky, “Sovetsko-Germanskii dogovory.” Thanks to Göring’s intercession, Tevosyan managed to inspect the Krupp plants in Essen twice in Nov. 1939. Von Strandmann, “Appeasement and Counter-Appeasement,” 167 (citing HA Krupp, WA 7, F 1044, Sept. 7 and Nov., 1114–5, 1939).

11. See Stalin’s self-justifying remarks on April 17, 1940, analyzing the Finnish campaign, in Chubarian and Shukman, Stalin and the Soviet-Finnish War, 263–75 (at 263). Stalin repeated this point a year later: Naumov, 1941 god, II: 599–608 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 165, d. 77, l. 178–211).

12. Bernev and Rupasov, Zimniaia voina, 85–112 (at 85–6; July 13, 1939). In 1932, Helsinki signed a nonaggression pact with Moscow, initially for just three years at Finnish insistence, but reaffirmed in 1934 for ten years. After the Nazis came to power, moreover, German-Finnish relations cooled for a time. But anti-Soviet agitation persisted on the part of Finnish nationalist pressure groups, whose activists the NKVD assessed as mere cover for the Finnish government. Stover, “Finnish Military Politics”; Rintala, Three Generations; Bernev and Rupasov, Zimniaia voina, 17–55 (1934), 58–82 (April 12, 1936); Backlund, “Nazi Germany and Finland.” The treaty and its subsequent modifications can be found in Development of Finnish-Soviet Relations, 23–37.

13. It was led by Major General von der Golz. Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 27. Jakobson based his account on unpublished Finnish foreign ministry sources, but did not cite them. He was a sixteen-year-old schoolboy in Helsinki when the war broke out.

14. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 147 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 18, l. 32: June 19, 1939).

15. Bernev and Rupasov, Zimniaia voina, 97; Manninen and Baryshnikov, "Peregovory osen'iu 1939 goda," I: 114 (citing Bundesarchiv-Militärarchiv, N 220/19; AVP RF, f. 0135, op. 22, d. 7, l. 8–9, 12–4); Haslam, Struggle for Collective Security, 221 (citing Falin, Soviet Peace Efforts, doc. 352: Derevyansky, June 28, 1939; and FO 371/23648: Snow to Halifax, July 3, 1939).

16. Before the signing of the Nazi-Soviet Pact, the Finnish military attaché in Moscow had managed to obtain information about the secret consultations from the wife of a high-level Soviet figure, an indication of Finland's obvious concern for its security, but, for Stalin, of something more sinister. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 47 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 172, l. 2). One of the Soviet sources in Finland was the former Kronstadt rebel leader Stepan Petrichenko, who had escaped into exile. V. P. Naumov and A. A. Kosakovskii (eds.), Kronstadt, 1921 (Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratii, 1997), 402; APRE, f. 3, op. 58, d. 283, l. 27, Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 27 (Yagodato Stalin).

17. Volkovskii, Tainy i uroki, 4.

18. Dullin, "Understanding Russian and Soviet Foreign Policy," 179. Secret planning through May 1940 in the Black Sea fleet specified the "likely enemy" as "England, France, Romania, Turkey." The fleet's aviation staff were studying the routes to India, while war contingency plans included Iran, Afghanistan, Iraq, Syria, Palestine, and Egypt as well as India—all colonies or allies of Britain.

19. Kumanev, Riadom so Stalinyu, 26 (Mikoyan on Molotov); Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 390–1; Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 288.

20. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 282 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 178, l. 35, 37). "Yartsev" also donated funds to the Finnish Small Farmers Party, which agitated for "peace" with the Soviet Union.

21. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 296–309; Na prieme, 234. Zoia Voskresenskaya (b. 1907) had been sent to Finland in 1936 as an intelligence operative, operating under Intourist cover; Rybkin, the new station chief, arrived six to seven months later, without his family, and she became his deputy. Half a year later, they asked NKVD intelligence in Moscow for permission to marry, which was granted. Her account has the correct Kremlin meeting date and the fact that Molotov and Voroshilov were also there, and gives a description of his impressions of the visit, as relayed via a conversation Rybkin had with Kollontai. Voskresenskaia, Pod pseudonym Irina, 150–5.

22. Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 7–11; Peshcherskii, "Kak I. V. Stalin pytal'sia predotvarit' voynu s Finliandiei." Gerrard, Foreign Office and Finland, 88–9 (quoting Lascelles's and Lawrence Collier's minutes on a report from Helsinki, Oct. 8, 1939), 28 (citing FO 371/22270/N2338: Snow to Halifax, April 26, 1938).

23. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 301. Rybkin-Yartsev does not appear again in Stalin's office logbook, but he could have been received at the dacha.

24. Tanner, Winter War, 5; Sharapov, Dve zbizni, 345–51; Primakov, Ocherki, III: 302.

25. Sudoplatov, the assassin who had leapt into the leadership rung of Soviet intelligence, surmised that Yartsev's work was also a device to sow dissension in the Finnish leadership. Sudoplatov and Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 94, 266. Sudoplatov is off by one day on the meeting: Na prieme, 234.

26. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 163 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 297, d. 2054, l. 33: Litvinov to Derevyansky).

27. Litvinov, on March 11, told the Finnish representative that the "Soviet government did not expect such an answer." Dongarov, "Voina, kotoryi moglo ne byt'," 34 (citing AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 17, d. 183, l. 80–2; pap. 18, d. 198, l. 6); "The Winter War (Documents on Soviet-Finnish Relations in 1939–1940)," 53–61.

28. Semiriaga, Tainy stalinskoï diplomatii, 143. Litvinov complained to the Swedish envoy to Moscow that "we cannot be sure that Germany, embarking on some sort of adventurism, might not demand from Finland even temporarily the transfer of its islands, and that Finland, either voluntarily, or involuntarily would, under threat, perhaps earlier agree to accede to such a demand." Dongarov, "Voina, kotoryi moglo ne byt'," 34 (citing AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 18, d. 198, l. 8: March 11, 1939).

29. Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 63–5; Dongarov, "Voina, kotoryi moglo ne byt'," 34 (citing AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 17, d. 183, l. 61–5). The politburo designated Stein an envoy of Litvinov (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 24,

l. 120). Stein left Helsinki on April 6. On April 19—the same day Litvinov was received in the Little Corner to discuss the failure of collective security negotiations—Stein wrote a memo to Stalin arguing that Helsinki could not respond positively to Soviet proposals prior to the upcoming Finnish elections, but predicted that afterward there would be some chance of success. He was also received that day (in the company of Litvinov and Potyomkin, as well as inner regime cronies). DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 297–9 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 2, d. 11, l. 224–8), XXII/ii: 526n65; Na prieme, 257. Very soon, of course, Litvinov was removed. Stein would be transferred out of Italy on Oct. 7, 1939; he would get a teaching post at the USSR higher diplomatic school.

30. The Soviets had a plan of attack against Finland (and Estonia) already by March–April 1939, but that is what all militaries do: they plan wars, just in case. Aptekar', Sovetsko-finskie voyny.

31. Chuev, Sto sorok, 34; Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 24.

32. Meretskov, Na sluzhbe, 177. Voroshilov visited the Karelian Isthmus sometime in April and ordered that combat readiness be raised and plans be developed for evacuation of women and children should war break out. Semiriaga, Tainy stalinskoi diplomatii, 146 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 4, d. 366, l. 134). Also in April 1939, the NKVD transport directorate produced an internal assessment of all the ports and military bases of all countries on or near the Baltic Sea. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 250.

33. Meretskov, Na sluzhbe, 177–80. Meretskov (Na sluzhbe, 178) claims that he was present during a conversation between Kuusinen and Stalin in late June 1939, and that Stalin expressed alarm over the situation with Finland. Neither appears in the logbooks for summer 1939. Na prieme, 646, 661. In summer 1939, the Finnish-Soviet border was largely quiet. Chugunov, Granitsa nakanune voiny, 10.

34. Fel'shtinskii, SSSR-Germaniia, II: 17 (Oct. 10, 1939).

35. Bernev and Rupasov, Zimniaia voina, 85–112 (Leningrad-province state security, July 13, 1939); Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 150–1 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 405, l. 200: Beria, no earlier than July 10, 1939).

36. Van Dyke, Soviet Invasion, 7 (citing PRO FO 371 23648, N3199). The British general might have been trying to induce London to help the Finns.

37. Development of Finnish-Soviet Relations, 42; Baryshnikov, Ot prokhladnogo mira, 229. On Latvia, see Dr. Alfred B i lmanis: Latvian Russian Relations, 192–8; Polpredy soobschchaiu, 75–86 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 12, d. 119a, l. 3–8, 9–17); Mel'tiukhov, Upushchennyi shans Stalina, 184; Izvestiia, Oct. 6, 1939.

38. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 201–3; Manninen and Baryshnikov, "Peregovory osen'iu 1939 goda," I: 116–7.

39. Volkogonov, Triumfi tragediia, III/i (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1235, l. 99); Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 160–1 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 30, l. 225–6). On the formulation of Soviet demands, see Manninen and Baryshnikov, "Peregovory osen'iu 1939 goda," I: 119–21.

40. Raskol'nikov, "Otkrytoe pis'mo Stalinu" (Aug. 17, 1939). He died Sept. 12. See also Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 420–53; and Magerovsky, "The People's Commissariat," II: 342–3. Speculation on the cause of Raskolnikov's death—poisoning, nervous breakdown—is inconclusive. Konstantinov, F. F. Ilin-Raskol'nikov, 153; "Smert' Raskol'nikov," Vorozhdenie, September, 29, 1939; Barmine, One Who Survived, 21; Ehrenburg, Memoirs, 469. Raskolnikov evidently did lose his mind. N. P. V., "Sumashestvie Raskol'nikova: beseda s A.G. Barminyim," Poslednie novosti, Aug. 28, 1939; I. M., "Raskol'nikov soshel s uma," Vorozhdenie, Sept. 1, 1939.

41. Raskolnikov added: "He does not like people who have their own opinion, and with his usual nastiness drives them away." Medvedev, Let History Judge, 592.

42. Gerrard, Foreign Office and Finland, 88–9 (quoting Lascelles's and Lawrence Collier's minutes on a report from Helsinki, Oct. 8, 1939). For the argument about Finland being a pawn in British strategy, see Pritt, Must the War Spread? (Pritt was expelled from the Labour Party, partly as a result of his pro-Soviet views in the Soviet-Finnish War.) On Britain's possible lack of inside information concerning the Helsinki government, see Sotskov, Pribalitika i geopolitika, 64–5 (Oct. 16, 1939).

43. DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 167–9 (Maisyk, Oct. 7, 1939); Maisky, Dnevnik diplomata, II/i: 28–31 (Oct. 6, 1939); Gorodetsky, Maisyk Diaries, 232. Churchill continued this line in further discussions with Maisky: DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 2 (Nov. 13, 1939). See also Gerrard, Foreign Office and Finland, 95 (citing FO 371/23683/N6384: British War cabinet, Nov. 16, 1939). Back in the Russian civil war, the lengthy Helsinki-London plotting had come to naught, opposed by the British cabinet, the Finnish parliament, and newly independent border states wary of collaboration with the Russian nationalist Whites. Ruotsila, "Churchill-Mannerheim Collaboration."

44. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 196 (RGVA, f. 25888, op. 11, d. 76, l. 12). Mobilization was complete by a second report, on Oct. 13 (199: l. 16).

45. Izvestiia, Oct. 11, 1939; SSSR i Litva, 1: 205–46; Polpredy soobshchaliut, 94–144; Mel'tiukhov, Upushchennyi shans Stalina, 193.

46. Zonin, Admiral L. M. Galler, 309.

47. DPV SSSR, XXII/ii: 178 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 297, d. 2053, l. 197).

48. Stalin had received Molotov and Derevyansky that afternoon, just prior to meeting the Finns: Na prieme, 276.

49. Dongarov, "Voina, kotoryi moglo ne byt'," 35 (citing AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 18, d. 193, l. 4); Tanner, Winter War, 25 (who claims his account of Stalin's presentation is based on the Finnish interpreter's notes). Paasikivi had been born Johan Gustaf Hellsten and Finnicized his name at age fifteen, in 1885, after he had been orphaned.

50. The Beria report was dated Oct. 12, 1939. Vrang had become a celebrity in Moscow diplomatic circles as a result of the circumstance that in a Soviet espionage film, the actor who played the role of the main bad guy, a foreign military attaché, happened to be a dead ringer for the Swede. Rentola, "Intelligence and Stalin's Two Crucial Decisions," 1091, citing U. A. Käkönen, Sotilasiamiehenä Moskovaassa 1939 (Helsinki, 1966), 62; Norberg, "Det militära hotet."

51. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 162–3 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 7, d. 393, l. 122–4: Oct. 12, 1939), 163–4 (op. 6, d. 31, l. 117–9, Oct. 12), 164–5 (d. 31, l. 122–4: Oct. 13), 165–6 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 7, d. 393, l. 122–4), 166–7 (l. 147–9: Oct. 14, 1939); Volkogonov Papers, Hoover Institution Archives, box 1. See also Rentola, "Intelligence and Stalin's Two Crucial Decisions," 1091–2. One clandestine Soviet source in Helsinki, Cay Sundström, a pro-Communist Social Democrat in the Finnish parliament (his NKVD code name was "the Count"), complained to the NKVD that when the parliamentary foreign-affairs committee discussed Soviet demands in his presence, other members told the rapporteur to stop speaking. He informed Moscow that Erko had stated there was no need for any concessions to the Soviet Union because Finland could count on the support of Britain, the United States, and Sweden. Rentola, "Intelligence and Stalin's Two Crucial Decisions"; Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 163–4 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 31, l. 117–9: Oct. 12); Volkogonov Collection, Hoover Institution Archives, box 1 (identifying the source as Sundström); Sinitsyn, Rezident svidel'stvet, 21. See also Manninen and Baryshnikov, "Peregovory osen'iu 1939 goda," 119.

52. Stalin received Molotov for fifteen minutes prior to meeting the Finns: Na prieme, 276.

53. Erickson, Soviet High Command, 474.

54. Upton, Finland, 29–30 (quoting J. K. Paasikivi, Toimintani Moskovassa ja Suomessa 1939–1941 [Porvoo: Werner Söderström, 1959], I: 45–6); Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 114–8; Tanner, Winter War, 27–8; Dongarov, "Voina, kotoryi moglo ne byt'," 35 (citing AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 18, d. 193, l. 1–2). Apparently, the Soviet side made no formal record of the talks: Baryshnikov, Or prokladnogo mira, 237–8.

55. Stalin also suspected that a coup could bring an avowedly fascist regime to power in Helsinki. The NKVD in Leningrad characterized the Cayander-Tanner government in Helsinki as proto-fascist. Bernev and Rupasov, Zimniaia voina, 85–112 (July 13, 1939).

56. Tanner, Winter War, 30.

57. A Soviet military intelligence on Finnish civilian evacuations from frontline areas was dated Oct. 14, 1939; the evacuations would be pronounced complete seven days later. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 199–200 (RGVA, f. 25888, op. 11, d. 76, l. 17), 200 (l. 20).

58. Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 120.

59. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 170–1 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 31, l. 282–4: Oct. 19, 1939).

60. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 169–70 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 31, l. 216–8: Beria, Oct. 17, 1939), 170–1 (l. 282–4: Oct. 19); Rentola, "Intelligence and Stalin's Two Crucial Decisions," 1093. See also Voskresenskaia, Pod pseudonym Irina, 112–8. On German policy toward Finland, see Jonas, Wipert von Blücher, 105–58. Stalin prohibited engaging ethnic Finns in espionage work, reminding Proskurov (head of Soviet military intelligence) that a radio operator working for them in Mongolia (under the name of Voroshilov, no less) had been exposed as a Finn. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i NKVD, 123 (Aug. 25, 1939).

61. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 172–3 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 31, l. 341–3; from Colonel Doi).

62. Stalin's ultimate aims are not spelled out in internal Soviet documents. We are left, like the Finns, to deduce his aims from his statements in the negotiations, and, above all, from his actions.

63. Rentola, "Finnish Communists and the Winter War," 596.

64. Upton, Finland, 35.

65. Dongarov, "Voina, kotoryi moglo ne byt'," 35 (citing AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 18, d. 193, l. 3–6).

66. Tanner, Winter War, 42.

67. Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 125.

68. Tanner, Winter War, 40–56. Stalin had been warned the Finns would drag out the talks. DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 184.

69. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 173 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 31, l. 145–6; Oct. 27, 1939).

70. Roberts, "Soviet Policy and the Baltic States." On pogroms against Jews by Poles in Wilno, following the arrival of Soviet and Lithuanian troops, see Senn, Lithuania, 55–67.

71. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 119–20. Dimitrov does not appear in Stalin's office logbook for Oct. 25 (no one does): Na prieme, 277. Dimitrov published his article "The War and the Working Class in the Capitalist Countries," in Communist International, 1939, no. 8–9.

72. Izvestiia, Oct. 31, 1939; Kabanen, "Dvoiaia igra."

73. Kollontai, Diplomaticheskie dnevniki, II: 466. Molotov instructed Kollontai to ensure the neutrality of Sweden in a Soviet-Finnish War. In the scholarly publication of her diplomatic notebooks, the Nov. visit to Moscow occurs without a meeting with Stalin. Kollontai is not recorded in the office logbooks after 1934. Kollontai, Diplomaticheskie dnevniki, II: 467. Another version has her meeting Stalin: "Beseda Stalina s A. M. Kollontai," in Sochineniia, XVIII: 606–11 (originally published in Dialog, 1998, no. 8: 92–4). Kollontai knew she was closely watched by the NKVD. Vaksberg, Alexandra Kollontai, 414–21.

74. Pravda (Nov. 3) stated defiantly in an editorial, "we will defend the security of the Soviet Union regardless, breaking down all obstacles of whatever character, in order to attain our goal."

75. Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 135; Tanner, Winter War, 67. Khrushchev recalled that at a dinner sometime in Nov. 1939, Stalin, along with Molotov and Otto Kuusinen, agreed "the Finns should be given a last chance to accept the territorial demands," otherwise "we would take military action." Khrushchev, Khrushchev Remembers, 177–8.

76. It is not clear that Paasikivi and Tanner were familiar with these islands. Rzheshvskii et al., Zimniaia voina, I: 127; Tanner, Winter War, 67–8; Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 136.

77. Molotov delivered a speech from the stage, followed by music and dancing. Stalin sat in the tsar's box, obscured. At intermission, as the guests took advantage of the buffet, Derevyansky, the Soviet envoy to Helsinki, approached Tanner, who claims to have told him the negotiations were going poorly. Tanner, Winter War, 69.

78. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XIII (II/i): 100–2 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 15, d. 25, l. 636–38). Pravda, in articles and cartoons (Oct. 6, 25, and 26, Nov. 12 and 20), relentlessly pounded home the view that the imperialist powers (Britain and France) were inciting war to garner profit and suppress freedoms at home, while scheming to drag "neutral powers" such as the Soviet Union into their bloody game—meaning a Soviet-German war.

79. "There can be no doubt that Stalin was genuinely anxious to reach a settlement," concluded the scholar Max Jakobson: Diplomacy of the Winter War, 144. Stalin watched the morning Revolution Day parade on Nov. 7 atop the Mausoleum, as massive columns of Red Army soldiers and armor passed, followed by columns of workers bearing aloft portraits of him, then attended the late-afternoon luncheon with the retinue at Voroshilov's apartment. "I believe that the slogan of turning the imperialist war into a civil war (during the first imperialist war) was appropriate only for Russia, where the workers were tied to the peasants and under tsarist conditions could engage in an assault on the bourgeoisie," he told those assembled. "For the European countries that slogan was inappropriate, for there the workers had received a few democratic reforms from the bourgeoisie and were clinging to them, and they were not willing to engage in a civil war (revolution) against the bourgeoisie.” Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 120–1.

80. Tanner, Winter War, 71–2.

81. DGFP, series D, VIII: 293 (Hitler to Sven Hedin); Tanner, Winter War, 82–3.

82. Upton, Finland, 43–44; Tanner, Winter War, 82; Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 142; Bernev and Rupasov, Zimniaia voina, 172; Ken et al., Svetsiia v politike Moskvy.

83. Rentola, “Intelligence and Stalin’s Two Crucial Decisions,” 1091 (citing report by the Swedish military attaché to Moscow, Major Vrang, no. 44, Oct. 4, 1939, KrA, FST/Und, E I: 15).

84. Mannerheim, Memoirs, 300–3, 315; Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 64, 150–1; Virmarita, “Karl Gustaf Emil’ Mannergeim,” 65–6.

85. Rei, Drama of the Baltic Peoples, 259–60. Rei was the notetaker for Estonian foreign minister K. Selter with Molotov. “Soviet Russia’s period of weakness was over,” Paasikivi observed of the Pact. Paasikivi, Meine Moskau Mission, 56.

86. Tanner, Winter War, 73.

87. Van Dyke, Soviet Invasion, 21 (citing AVP RF, f. 0135, op. 22, pap. 145, d. 1, l. 22–3; Yeliseyev to Dekanozov, Nov. 12, 1939). Sinitsyn captured the rivalry between Beria and Molotov firsthand. He also had an audience with Stalin, evidently on Nov. 27, 1939, which is not recorded in the office logbooks. He noted that “Mikoyan, Zhdanov, Kaganovich and even Voroshilov behaved like bad pupils in front of a strict teacher, or, more accurately, like mannequins.” Sinitsyn, Resident svidetel’stvet, 20–56 (quote at 40).

88. Tanner, Winter War, 75–6.

89. Na prieme, 279.

90. Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 221 (citing RGALI, f. 1038, op. 1, d. 2076, l. 31ob.), 225–6 (l. 68). The very same day, the all-Union Society of Cultural Ties Abroad demonstratively assembled novelists, film directors, composers, painters, journalists, and more to affirm friendship with Nazi Germany, according to the head of the import agency International Book (A. Solovyev). The next day, Vishnevsky told a meeting of screenwriters that “the question of the British empire, the destruction of this gigantic colonial empire, has been sharply posed, and here, paradoxically, . . . Germany is doing a progressive thing.” Solog’ev, “Tret’iaia krasnogo professora, 1912–1941 gg.” IV: 205; Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 221–2, citing RGALI, f. 2456, op. 1, d. 445, l. 23).

91. Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, II/i: 55–8; Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 238. Isolationist sentiment in Britain had not receded despite the guarantees to Poland. “What concerns me is the fate of the British empire!” Lord Beaverbrook, the conservative press baron, told Maisky in London on Nov. 15, 1939. “I want the empire to remain intact, but I don’t understand why for the sake of this we must wage a three-year war to crush ‘Hitlerism.’ To hell with that man Hitler! If the Germans want him, I happily concede them this treasure and make my bow. Poland? Czechoslovakia? What are they to us?” Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, II/i: 60–1; Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 239.

92. Upton, Finland, 25–50; Tanner, Winter War, 80–1; Spring, “Soviet Decision for War.”

93. A Soviet protocol official improbably reported that he found the departing Finns in high spirits. Baryshnikov, Ot prokhladnogo mira, 259 (citing AVPRF, f. 06, op. 1, p. 1, d. 7, l. 64 [B. Pontikov]).

94. Murin, Stalin v ob”iatiakh sem’i, 63 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1552, l.15–6).

95. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 66, l. 13.

96. DGFP, series D, VIII: 427–8. Molotov would blame the “Social Democrat” Tanner, rather than the prime minister and foreign minister back in Helsinki. See also Kollontai, “Seven Shots”; and Kollontai, Diplomaticcheskie dnevniky, II: 466–7. Paasikivi would make telling criticisms of Tanner in his memoirs.

97. Domarus, Hitler: Reden, III: 1422–4; Domarus, Hitler: Speeches, III: 1882–91; DGFP, series D, VIII: 439–46.

98. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 171 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 31, l. 282–4). Tanner recorded a different version of Stalin’s flippancy (“You are sure to get 99 percent support”). Tanner, Winter War, 30.

99. Paasikivi later recalled, “The proposals Stalin made to us in the fall of 1939 were completely different from those to the Baltic countries . . . Stalin from the very beginning backed off discussing with us a mutual assistance pact.” Baryshnikov, Ot prokhladnogo mira, 238.

- 100. Tuominen, Bells of the Kremlin, 154–5.
- 101. Upton, Finland, 30–2.
- 102. Rentola, “Intelligence and Stalin’s Two Crucial Decisions,” 1094, citing V. Vladimirov, Kohti talvisotaa (Helsinki, 1995), 163–4; Rentola, “Finnish Communists and the Winter War,” 598n27; Kolpakidi, Entsiklopediia sekretnykh sluzhb Rossii, 711–2. Unexpectedly, a report by the general staff for the Leningrad military district (Nov. 10, 1939) praised Finnish military training and judged “the morale of the Finnish army, despite the class difference between the officers and soldiers,” as “sufficiently steadfast.” Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 205–7 (RGVA, f. 25888, op. 11, d. 17, l. 194–200). Stalin finally posted a new military intelligence officer to Helsinki, Colonel Ivan Smirnov, who replaced the man executed in the terror. Sinitsyn, in his posthumously published memoir, would claim he had conveyed the opposite of what he had actually reported.
- 103. They took along Nikolai Voronov, the artillery specialist. Voronov, Na sluzhbe voennoi, 134; Na prieme, 279–80. The Main Military Council in Moscow, with Stalin in attendance (Nov. 21), approved a plan for an expansion to a peacetime army of 2.3 million. Glavnyi voennyi sovet RKKA, 269–86 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 18, d. 49, l. 1–26), 440–53 (RGVA, f. 40442, op. 2, d. 128, l. 120–39; Smorodinov and Gusev).
- 104. Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 140.
- 105. Rentola, “Intelligence and Stalin’s Two Crucial Decisions,” 1090.
- 106. Meretskov reported to Stalin that the deadly attack had originated from the Finnish side. Meretskov, Na sluzhbe, 182; Dvoynikh and Eliseeva, Konflikt, doc. 8 (RGVA. F. 33987, op. 3, d. 1240, l. 115).
- 107. Manninen, “Vystreli byli” (citing the recollections of a Soviet officer who took part). See also Zhdanov’s cryptic but suggestive notes: Baryshnikov and Manninen, “V kanun zimnei voiny,” I: 137 (RGASPI, f. 77, op. 3, d. 163, l. 3120). Khrushchev recalled that “Kuusinen and I . . . found out when we were at Stalin’s apartment that the first shots had been fired from our side. There’s no getting around that fact.” Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 254.
- 108. Na prieme, 282; Lota, “Alt’a protiv “Barbarossy.”” 200–3.
- 109. Balashov, Prinimai nas, 23; Pravda, Nov. 29, 1939.
- 110. Rentola, “Intelligence and Stalin’s Two Crucial Decisions,” 1096 (citing KrA, FST/Und E II: 15); Dongarov, “Voina, kotoryi moglo ne byt’,” 37 (citing AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 18, d. 188, l. 22–3, 26).
- 111. Dvoynikh and Eliseeva, Konflikt, doc. 16 (RGVA, f. 34980, op. 1, d. 794, l. 1). See also Azarov, Osazhdennaia Odessa, 5.
- 112. Vehviläinen, “Trudnaia doroga k miru,” I: 228. See also Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 142.
- 113. For a top-secret Finnish intelligence assessment (Nov. 25, 1939) translated into Russian, see Khristoforov et al., Zimniia voina, 195–200.
- 114. Upton, Finland, 50 (citing J. K. Paasikivi, Toimintani Moskovassa ja Suomessa 1939–1941 [Porvoo: Werner Söderström, 1959], I: 116); Development of Finnish-Soviet Relations, 72–3; Baryshnikov and Manninen, “V kanun zimnei voiny,” 135 (citing Finnish officials).
- 115. Pikhova and Gieysztor, Katyni: plenniki, 227–9 (GARF, f. 9401, op. 1, d. 528, l. 228–30; Dec. 1, 1939).
- 116. Na prieme, 279. On Stalin’s corrections of Kuusinen dating back to Aug. 1928, see Adibekov et al., Polirbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Komintern, 545–6 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 755, l. 116–7); RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 755, l. 164.
- 117. Tuominen judged Stalin’s humor offbeat (mostly from stories he heard from Kuusinen, with whom he had shared a flat in the House on the Embankment). Tuominen, Bells of the Kremlin, 158, 166, 173.
- 118. A few days after Tuominen’s initial summons by Kuusinen, the Soviet embassy in Stockholm followed up; again he refused. On Nov. 21, he claimed, he received a third order, this one delivered by a courier; Tuominen still refused. He also claimed that he decided not to inform the Finnish regime in Helsinki of the sensational news of a pending Soviet attack. Tuominen, Bells of the Kremlin, 315–8; Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 147. After seeing the Finnish resistance, Tuominen would issue feelers to Finland’s Social Democrats and publicly break with Moscow in spring 1940.
- 119. Dongarov, “Voina, kotoryi moglo ne byt’,” 38 (citing AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 18, d. 192). More broadly, see Vehviläinen, Finland in the Second World War, 30–73; and Kirby, Concise History of Finland, 197–216.
- 120. Pravda, Dec. 1, 1939.

- ¹²¹. Dongarov, "Voina, kotoryi moglo ne byt'," 39 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1380, l. 3; f. 25888, op. 13, d. 76, l. 1).
- ¹²². DVP SSSR, XXII/ii: 351–2 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 1, pap. 1, d. 4, l. 75–8: Molotov to Schulenburg, Nov. 30, 1939).
- ¹²³. Bor'ba Finnsskoogo naroda, 11. The protocols of the first official meeting of the "government" were recorded in Russian by Kuusinen's son. RGASPI, f. 522, op. 1, d. 46, l. 1, as cited in Baryshnikov and Baryshnikov, "Pravitel'stvo v Tertioki," 179.
- ¹²⁴. Baryshnikov, Ot prokhladnogo mira, 261 (citing RGVA, f. 25888, op. 1, d. 17, l. 199: report of the Leningrad general staff); Volkogonov, "Kliment Efremovich Voroshilov," 316. Krasnaia zvezda, Nov. 30, 1989 (A. M. Noskov); Volkogonov, "Drama of the Decisions," 32; Mel'tiukhov, "'Narodnyi front' dlia Finliandii?" 100n2 (citing RGASPI, f. 77, op. 1, d. 889, l. 1–10, 15–6; d. 891, l. 1–3). See also Mel'tiukhov, "'Narodnyi front' dlia Finliandii?," 100n2 (citing RGASPI, f. 77, op. 1, d. 889, l. 18–25; Dec. 26, 1939).
- ¹²⁵. Jakobson, Diplomacy of the Winter War, 144–8; Spring, "Soviet Decision for War," 217; Balashov, Prinimai nas, 43.
- ¹²⁶. Dongarov, "Pravitel'stvo Kuusinen," 74–5, 76–9 (facsimile).
- ¹²⁷. A Feb. 1, 1940, "Appeal to the soldiers of the Finnish army," issued in the name of the "People's Government" and written by Zhdanov, initially declared that "the Soviet Union does not want anything other than a government in Finland that would not fashion intrigues with the imperialist powers threatening the security of Leningrad." Zhdanov excised this passage in the final draft. Mel'tiukhov, "'Narodnyi front' dlia Finliandii?," 100 (citing RGASPI, f. 77, op. 1, d. 891, l. 14–5).
- ¹²⁸. Rentola, "Finnish Communists and the Winter War," 600 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 269, d. 134, l. 36: autobiography of Esa Kuusinen, Aug. 1, 1940). See also Rayfield, Stalin and His Hangmen, 316.
- ¹²⁹. Kuusinen, Rings of Destiny, 225, 230, 231. Aino last saw Otto in 1935.
- ¹³⁰. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 165, d. 77, l. 178–212, in Rzeshevskii et al., Zimniaia voina, II: 272–83; Chubarian and Shukman, Stalin and the Soviet-Finnish War, 268; Roberts, Stalin's Wars, 46.
- ¹³¹. Na prieme, 282–94; Meretskov, Na sluzhbe, 179.
- ¹³². Kuznetsov, Nakanune, 309, 328.
- ¹³³. Zakharov et al., 50 let Vooruzhenykh Sil SSSR, 230; Baryshnikov, "Sovetsko-Finliandskaia voina," 33 (citing RGVA, f. 25888, op. 14, d. 2, l. 1). Mekhlis and Kulik, both deputy defense commissars, mocked Voronov, the artillery specialist, in the presence of Meretskov when Voronov said the Soviets would be fortunate to achieve their combat aims in two to three months; they told him the war plan was for ten to twelve days. Voronov, Na sluzhbe voennoi, 136. Meretskov later admitted that the forces under his command were not ready to attack. Meretskov, Na sluzhbe, 171, 173–4, 179, 181–2.
- ¹³⁴. Shaposhnikov would learn of the outbreak of hostilities from the press. Simonov, Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia, 442–3; Simonov, "Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia," 79.
- ¹³⁵. Baryshnikov and Manninen, "V kanun zimnei voiny," I: 133 (RGVA, f. 37977, op. 1, d. 233, l. 4: telegram to Shaposhnikov, Nov. 19, 1939); Meretskov, Serving the People, 100–1.
- ¹³⁶. Mannerheim, Memoirs, 366. See also Tillotson, Finland at Peace and War, 121–75. During only 10 of the 105 days of the campaign was the temperature above freezing. The record low was on Jan. 16, 1940.
- ¹³⁷. Chew, White Death; Trotter, Frozen Hell.
- ¹³⁸. Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 252.
- ¹³⁹. Akhmedov, In and Out of Stalin's GRU, 112.
- ¹⁴⁰. Rittersporn, Anguish, 235 (citing GARF, f. 9415, op. 5, d. 87, l. 17).
- ¹⁴¹. Davies, Popular Opinion, 100 (citing TsGAIPD SPb, f. 24, op. 2v, d. 3723, l. 62, 50).
- ¹⁴². Zenzinov, Vstrecha s Rossiei, 37, 138. Zenzinov's book includes the full text of 277 out of the 376 surviving letters.
- ¹⁴³. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 253–61 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 185, l. 454–71; Dec. 7, 1939).
- ¹⁴⁴. Bernev and Rupasov, Zimniaia voina, 115–266.

145. “The pessimist Mannerheim raised his marshal’s baton, the would-be appeaser Tanner emerged as the most resolute political leader, and workers and peasants, who had voted the Centre-Left government into power, fulfilled their duty as soldiers,” as one historian aptly remarked. Rentola, “Intelligence and Stalin’s Two Crucial Decisions,” 1096.

146. Maisky recorded in his diary (Dec. 1): “The British reaction is rabid. The press, the radio, the cinema, Parliament—all have been mobilized.” Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, II/i: 75; Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 243. See also Maisky, Memoirs of a Soviet Ambassador, 40; Carley, “Situation of Delicacy,” 195–6; and Stalin’s comments to the chief of the Estonian armed forces, Dec. 11–12, 1939, as recorded by Rei, in Sotsialisticheskie revoliutsii v Estonii, 109. In Dec. 1939, Kollontai wrote from Stockholm to Molotov (a copy went to Voroshilov), calling the working situation “difficult and serious” and concluding, “I cannot fail to point out I still have no aide, and no one even to consult with, since everyone is new and they all need to be taught.” Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 218–20 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1202, l. 99–101ss). On the lack of experienced staff in Moscow, see Kraminov, V orbite voiny, 79.

147. Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 134; Philbin, Lure of Neptune, 61, 129.

148. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 361 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22407, d. 2, l. 586), 363 (op. 22410, d. 2, l. 196; Dec. 8, 1939), 372–3 (RGASPI. F. 495, op. 74, d. 618, l. 12, 13–4, 16). See also Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XVIII (VIII/i): 162.

149. Rentola, “Intelligence and Stalin’s Two Crucial Decisions,” 1096, citing Paasikivi’s notes from the Government of Finland foreign affairs committee, Dec. 2 and 3, 1939, in O. Manninen and K. Rumpunen (eds.), Murhenäytelmän vuorosanat: Talvisodan hallituksen keskustelut (Helsinki, 2003).

150. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 230–3. Molotov refused to meet with the Swedish mediator to hear the Helsinki government’s proposed concessions; Molotov told the American mediator that the Soviets would have no dealings with the Finnish government in Helsinki, especially since Tanner (the Social Democrat) had become foreign minister. FRUS, 1939, I: 1008–9, 1014–5.

151. The NKVD leadership demanded and received an accurate picture of the Red Army. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 406–7 (Dec. 31, 1939).

152. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 324 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. f. d. 351, l. 212–6).

153. DVP SSSR, XXIII/i: 57–61, 77–78. These German officials do not appear in the logs for Stalin’s office.

154. Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 251–2.

155. At the Johannisthal airfield outside Berlin Göring had paraded before them “twin-engine Junkers 88 and Dornier 215 bombers, single-engine Henkel-100 and Messerschmitt-110 fighters, Focke-Wulf-187 and Henschel reconnaissance planes, a twin-engine Messerschmitt-110 fighter, a Junkers 87 dive bomber, and other types of aircraft,” as Alexander Yakovlev described the scene. General Ernst Udet, Göring’s deputy, took Hovhannes “Ivan” Tevosyan, head of the Soviet delegation, up in a Fiesler Storch reconnaissance plane, then executed a “splendid landing, stopping exactly where it had started from.” Tevosyan was impressed. Later, Göring made him a gift of the aircraft. The delegation, according to Yakovlev, “returned to the Adlon strongly impressed.” Tarpaulins and ropes curtained off whole areas of the sites the Soviets visited—Messerschmitt in Augsburg, Focke-Wulf in Bremen, Junkers in Dessau, BMW in Munich, Henschel and Siemens in Berlin. Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 117–8; Berezkhov, At Stalin’s Side, 81–2.

156. DGFP, series D, VIII: 472–5 (shopping list), 513 (Ribbentrop, Dec. 11, 1939), 516–7 (Ritter to Schulenburg, Dec. 11, 1939).

157. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 289–91 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 35, l. 154–60; Dec. 12), 292 (d. 540, l. 266; Dec. 12), 312–4 (l. 225–9; Dec. 14), 319–21 (l. 276–9), 321–2 (l. 280–3), 326 (l. 290).

158. Na prieme, 9, 279, 284–5.

159. Malyshev, “Dnevnik narkoma,” 109–10.

160. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 122–3 (Dec. 21, 1939). Some guests at the banquets were known to carry home candies, nuts, fruit, and other portables for their families.

161. Raikin, Vospominaniia, 195–7.

162. Pirogov, S otom, 133–4. Pirogov was not again invited to perform at Kremlin banquets, but escaped arrest.

163. Vladimir Orlov, “Prokofiev.”

- 164. I. S. Rabinovich, in Stalin i liudi sovetskoï strany, 3. See also Rabinovich, "Obraz vozhdia"; Grabar', "Stalin i liudi sovetskoï strane"; and Kravchenko, Stalin v izobrazitel'nom iskusstve.
- 165. Pravda, March 18, 1939. The painting had first been exhibited at the show "Twenty Years of the Red Army."
- 166. Stalin had also supposedly sat for the painter Dmitry Sharapov in the 1930s, but did not like the result; in any case, Sharapov was arrested. Medvedev, "O Staline i stalinizme."
- 167. Chegodaeva, Dva lika vremeni, 152–8. Perhaps the most striking image of all appeared in USSR in Construction, a Stalin profile portrait formed from a vast abundance of tiny multihued flecks of millet, alfalfa, and poppy. USSR in Construction, 1939, no. 11–2; Margolin, "Stalin and Wheat."
- 168. Pravda, Dec. 20 and 21, 1939; Heizer, "Cult of Stalin." The thousands of congratulations in Pravda ran until Feb. 2, 1940.
- 169. Komsol'skaia pravda, Dec. 22, 1939.
- 170. For example: RGAKFD, ed. khr. 1–3553 (year 1939). A model of the hovel was on display in the Georgia pavilion at the all-Union Agricultural Exhibition in Moscow.
- 171. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1499, l. 39–54. Yaroslavsky incorporated many "reminiscences" in his book, O tovarishche Staline (Moscow: Gospolitizdat, 1939), in English, Landmarks in the Life of Stalin (Moscow: Foreign Languages Publishing House, 1940), printed in some 200,000 copies, which, unusually, included a chapter on Stalin's childhood. The work was based on a long speech on Stalin's life that Yaroslavsky had delivered at a conference of agitprop cadres on Sept. 17, 1939, which had been published in two parts in the agitprop journal: "Vazhneishie vekhi zhizni i deiatel'nosti tovarishcha Stalina," V pomoshch' marksistsko-leninskomu obrazovaniu, 1939, no. 10: 33–61, no. 13–4: 22–92. Also, some of the "reminiscences" Beria's minions had gathered and published in Tbilisi about Stalin's youth were republished in the mass-circulation youth periodical Molodaya Gvardiya (1939, no. 12). In Sept. 1940, Stalin forbade publication in Russian of the Georgian-language book Childhood of the Leader, by the famed children's writer Konstantin Gamsakhurdia, issued the previous year in connection with Stalin's sixtieth birthday. Galleys had been readied. Maksimenkov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 254–5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 730, l. 190); d. 787, l. 1–2. See also Davies and Harris, Stalin's World, 159.
- 172. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 3226, l. 1; d. 1281; Koniuskaia, "Iz vosponinaniï," 3; RGASPI, f. 629, op. 11, d. 55, l. 52.
- 173. K shestidesiatiletiu, 177. See also Barmine, One Who Survived, 258. The regime published recommended readings for Stalin's jubilee: Markovich, O Staline. See also O Staline: ukazatel' literatury. Yaroslavsky described the three earliest meetings between Stalin and Lenin: Dec. 1905 in Tampere, Finland at the 3rd Party Congress; April 1906 in Stockholm, at the 4th Party Congress; and in May 1907 in London, at the 5th Party Congress (the numbers were disputed by non-Bolshevik members of the Russian Social Democrat Workers Party). Iaroslavskii, "Tri vstrechi."
- 174. Pravda, Dec. 23 and 25, 1939, reprinted in Iu. Fel'shtinskii, Oglasheniïu podlezhit, 170–1. Stalin's name, one author wrote in a biographical note, "glows like a torch of freedom, like a battle flag of the toilers of the whole world." Badaev, "O Staline."
- 175. Time, Jan. 1, 1940.
- 176. Mydans, More than Meets the Eye, 119.
- 177. Van Dyke, Soviet Invasion, 77 (citing an unpublished essay by G. A. Kumanev).
- 178. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 332, 357.
- 179. Volkogonov, Hoover Institution Archive, box 1 (Voroshilov, Stalin, and Shaposhnikov order to frontline commanders); van Dyke, Soviet Invasion, 103, citing N. F. Kuz'min, Na strazhe mirovogo truda, 1921–1941 gg. (Moscow: Voensizdat, 1959), 238.
- 180. Gavrilo, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 210–2 (RGVA, f. 33988, op. 4, d. 13, l. 197ss–200ss), 212–4 (l. 247ss–249ss), 215–16 (l. 244ss–246ss), 216–8 (239ss–243ss).
- 181. Lota, "Alta" protiv "Barbarasy," 203. She sent the message on Dec. 8, 1939. When and in what form Stalin received this information remains unclear. On German troop positioning in the West, see Gavrilo, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 257–63 (Jan. 1940).
- 182. Semiriaga, Tainy stalinskoi diplomatii, 163–4; Meretskov, Na sluzhbe, 185–7; Na prieme, 288.

183. Stalin also permitted selection of quality troops from various military districts for Finland. Van Dyke, Soviet Invasion, 104 (citing RGASPI, f. 71, op. 25, d. 59).

184. RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3, d. 1386, l. 169–71, Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 17; RGASPI, f. 71, op. 25, d. 6861, l. 411–4. On Jan. 13, 1940, Beria reported that Soviet military communication codes had been carelessly distributed on the battlefield and fallen into enemy hands. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 428–9 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 7, d. 280, l. 18–20).

185. In Moscow Choibalsan also met with Voroshilov and Beria, who “helped” the Mongol leader reinforce his personal security detail, which increased Soviet surveillance. Baabar, Twentieth-Century Mongolia, 366–78 (citing sources with Mongol archives). After victory at the Halha River over the Japanese, Choibalsan had traveled again to the Soviet capital, arriving in Dec. 1939. He had last been there from Sept. 1938 through Jan. 1939, when Kremlin doctors diagnosed him with “physical and intellectual fatigue” and prescribed treatment at the Matsesta baths, after which, upon returning to Mongolia, he had Prime Minister Amar publicly tried and extradited to the NKVD in Siberia for execution.

186. Iakovlev, Tsel’ zhizni (6th ed.), 157–61. Yakovlev indicates he met Stalin twice, in late Dec. 1939 and on Jan. 9, but the logbooks give dates of late Oct. 1939 and Jan. 8, 1940. Na prieme, 277, 288. Yakovlev’s father had worked for Alfred Nobel’s oil concern. Mikhail Kaganovich was removed on Jan. 10, and demoted to the directorship of a military aviation factory (no. 124) in Kazan. In Feb. 1941, after being told by his brother Lazar that Stalin had criticized him, Mikhail would shoot himself.

187. Emel’ianov, Na poroge voyny, 154–8; “Vospoinaia Velikiui Otechestvennui,” 56; Malyshev, “Dnevnik narkoma,” 109. Yemelianov recalls the meeting as taking place sometime in Dec. 1939, but the office logbooks indicate the Jan. date. Na prieme, 289.

188. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 431–2 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 7, d. 189, l. 69–71; Beria, Jan. 13, 1940).

189. Finnish intelligence passed to the British a Soviet codebook that “bore the marks of a bullet.” Jeffrey, MIG, 371–2 (no citation).

190. Rentola, “Intelligence and Stalin’s Two Crucial Decisions,” 1098 (citing Brig Ling notes on Interview with Mannerheim on Jan. 8, 1940; Mannerheim to Ironside, Jan. 9; TNA War Office 208/3966; and Memo by Gen. Ironside, “Operations in Scandinavia,” Jan. 12; TNA, WO 208/3966).

191. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 431–2 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 7, d. 189, l. 69–71; Jan. 13, 1940), 409 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6; Jan. 1940); DVP SSSR, XXIII/i: 53–6 (Maisky to Molotov, Jan. 26, 1940); Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War, 195. Maisky feared British-Soviet diplomatic relations again would be severed and he himself deported. In the event, he remained in London but as a pariah. The British intended to publish a book of documents on the failed negotiations with Moscow, exculpating themselves, which would have exposed Maisky’s initiatives beyond his instructions. Maisky procured a microfilm of the never-published text, which would turn up in a search of his possessions and figure in his trial in 1955.

192. Rentola, “Intelligence and Stalin’s Two Crucial Decisions,” 1098–9.

193. Stalin had learned back on Oct. 13, 1939, that Paasonen, the Finnish military intelligence officer, had told Major Vrang, the Swedish military attaché, that, just as during the historic battle in 1808 against the invading Imperial Russian Army, the Finns would slowly withdraw toward the north and Sweden. Stalin had had the Soviet battle plan adjusted to include the goal of cutting Finland in two at Oulu (Oleaborg) on the Finnish far coast, to interdict Helsinki’s land contact with Sweden. The thought had sunk in so deeply that Stalin had reiterated the need to pay attention to the 1808 battle in a directive as late as Dec. 29, 1939. But by Jan. 8 the Finns had won what became known as the Battle of Suomussalmi, which protected the axis toward Oulu. The objective of slicing Finland in half appeared plausible on a map, but the territory was mostly forested marshland with only logging trails for roads. Nor had the Finns withdrawn the way Soviet intelligence had reported they would. The Soviets lost huge stores of war material and men. (It was in the drive toward the Oulu where Mekhlis had almost been killed.) Volkogonov Papers, Hoover Institution Archives, box 1 (Leningrad military district cipher telegram to the general staff, Nov. 29, 1939; order, Voroshilov to Shaposhnikov, Dec. 2).

194. Hastings, Inferno, 36–7 (no citation).

- 195. Pospelov, Istoriia Velikoi otechestvennoi voiny, I: 275; Richardson, “French Plans.”
- 196. RGVA, f. 33988, op. 4, d. 35, l. 35ss, in Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 227.
- 197. Rentola, “Intelligence and Stalin’s Two Crucial Decisions,” 1100 (Jan. 20, 1940).
- 198. APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 177, l. 116–36.
- 199. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 124–5, 144–5. In a lecture on June 26, 1940, at the Frunze Military Academy concerning the lessons of the Finnish war, Meretskov would claim that the Finns had built 150 airfields to receive foreign aircraft. Van Dyke, Soviet Invasion, 31n55 (citing RGVA, f. 34980, op. 14, d. 6, l. 1).
- 200. Na prieme, 290.
- 201. Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 481 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 6, d. 12, l. 59). See also Tanner, Winter War, 125–63.
- 202. West and Tsarev, Crown Jewels, 144 (citing an inaccessible secret History of the London Rezidentura, in Russian, file no. 89113, I: 434).
- 203. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1509, l. 82–4. Stalin was responding to E. Gorodetsky’s article in Pravda (Feb. 4, 1940), which was a summary of M. Moskaev’s article in Istoriik-Markist (Jan. 1940). Later, on April 27, 1940, when Yaroslavsky sought to rebut Stalin by citing many sources, Stalin again exploded (“sycophancy is incompatible with scientific history”). RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 842, l. 35–44.
- 204. Zhukovskii, Lubianskaia imperiia NKVD, 214–5.
- 205. <http://alya-aleksej.narod.ru/index/0-181>; Voronov, “Palach v kozhanom fartuke”; Nikita Petrov, “Chelovek v kozhanom fartuke lichno rassstrelial bolee desiaty tysiach chelovek” <http://discussiya.com/2010/08/26/blokhin-executioner>. Stalin signed the list, containing 457 names, including Yezhov’s, on Jan. 17, 1940: APRE, f. 3, op. 24, d. 177, l. 116–36. Another principal executioner was the Latvian Pēteris Mago, Russified as Pyotr Maggo (1879–1941), who would soon die of cirrhosis of the liver.
- 206. Ushakov and Stukalov, Front voennykh prokurorov, 75 (USSR deputy military procurator Nikolai Afanasev, who was present). Among the many rumors that would circulate inside the NKVD about Yezhov’s execution, one had Beria ordering that Yezhov undress and be beaten before being shot, just as Yezhov had done to humiliate his predecessor Yagoda. Kamov, “Smert’ Nikolai Ezhova.”
- 207. “Poslednee slovo Nikolai Ezhova,” Moskovskie novosti, Jan. 30–Feb. 6, 1994; Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 536 (citing TsA FSB, sledstvennoe delo No. N-15302, t. 1, l. 184–6); Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 560–2.
- 208. Iakovlev, Tsel’ zhizni (6th ed.), 212.
- 209. Voronov, Na sluzhbe voennoi, 153; Solovov, My Nine Lives, 119; Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 13; Baryshnikov et al., Istoriia ordena Lenina, 137.
- 210. Valedinskii, “Vospominaniia,” 124. Vyborg fell roughly three weeks later. On Stalin’s illness and treatment in mid-February 1940, see also Chigirin, Stalin, 115–20 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1482, l. 101–5ob.).
- 211. In Nov. 1939, thanks to Gerhard Kegel, the Soviet agent, the NKVD managed to photograph a long document on the German negotiating strategy in the talks, including the maximum prices the Germans would pay for various Soviet goods. “The negotiations were difficult and lengthy,” the German trade negotiator Karl Schnurre wrote in an internal memorandum, adding that, because “the Soviet Union does not import any consumer goods whatsoever, their wishes concerned exclusively manufactured goods and war materiel. Thus, in numerous cases, Soviet bottlenecks coincide with German bottlenecks, such as machine tools for the manufacture of artillery ammunition.” On top of that, “psychologically the ever-present distrust of the Russians was of importance as well as the fear of any responsibility. And people’s commissar Mikoyan had to refer numerous questions to Stalin personally, since his authority was not sufficient.” DGFP, series D, VIII: 752–9 (economic agreement), 814–7 (Schnurre memorandum); Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 131–4; Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 97–106; Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 439.
- 212. Pravda did not crow in its announcement. Pravda, Feb. 18, 1940. See also Werth, Russia at War, 62–71.
- 213. After his Dec. 1939 offensive quickly petered out, Chiang, in Feb. 1940, had convened a military conference in Liuzhou (Guangxi). He attributed Japan’s strength to its surprise attacks (on poorly defended places), stout defense of occupied positions, and disguise of movements. He saw its weakness in a failure to deploy sufficient forces, sustain its operations for sufficient time, and prepare sufficient reserves. Ryōichi, “Japanese Eleventh Army,” 227–8, citing Dai Tōa Sensō (Tokyo: Sankei Shuppan, 1977), in the series Shō Kaiseki Hiroku, XIII: 47–8.

214. Taylor, Generalissimo, 171 (citing Chiang Diaries, Hoover Institution archives, box 40, folder 15: Dec. 30, 1939).

215. The Chinese Communists were receiving $110,000 to support their armed forces from the Nationalist government and themselves collected some $200,000 in local currency via local governments under Communist control in northern regions, likely through traditional land taxes. Party dues amounted to another $40,000. But they were spending around $700,000 per month. Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin, 123–5 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 74, d. 317. l. 53–5).

216. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 126 (Feb. 23 and 25, 1940). On Feb. 25, 1940, Yan Xishan, the warlord ruler of small, poor, remote Shanxi region, who had an off-again, on-again collaboration with the Communists against the Japanese, halted his offensive against the Communists. The Eighth Route Army was based there.

217. A memo from the Comintern’s personnel department to Dimitrov denigrated Wang Ming, Mao’s rival, as possessing “no authority among the old cadres of the party,” and recommended that he not be given “leading positions,” while proposing promotion of a long list of Mao loyalists (including a young military leader in the Eighth Route Army named Deng Xiaoping). “Mao Zedong is certainly the most important political figure in the Chinese Communist party. He knows China better than the other CCP leaders, knows the people, understands politics and generally frames issues correctly.” Pantsov and Levine, Mao, 333–4 (citing RGASPI, f. 495, op. 225, d. 71, t. 3: l. 186–9).

218. Taylor, Generalissimo, 172; Suyin, Eldest Son, 170.

219. Pikhoia and Gieysztor, Katyn’: plenniki, 384–90 (APRF, f. 3, zakrytyi paket no. 1, with facsimile). Between late Sept. 1939 and March 1940, the Soviets and the Nazis had held a series of meetings (apparently four in total) to discuss anticipated Polish resistance, coordination of the respective occupations, POWs, and refugees. Contrary to some claims, the Feb. 20, 1940, meeting (at the Pan Tadeusz villa of the Zakopane spa, in the Tatra Mountains) did not coordinate or precipitate the Soviet Katyn massacre. Vishl’ev, Nakanune, 119–23; Bór-Komorowski, Secret Army. Beria’s March 1940 report and recommendation to Stalin is in Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 476–8.

220. Pikhoia and Gieysztor, Katyn’: plenniki, 390–2 (APRF, f. 3, zakrytyi paket no. 1); Cienciala et al., Katyn, 118–20; Ubyty v Katyni; Kozlov et al., Katyn’ mart 1940–sentjabr’2000 g. The total includes approximately 14,500 POWs held in NKVD camps in Kozelsky, Ostaskhovskiy, and Starobelsky, and more than 7,300 in remand prisons in the western regions of the Ukrainian and Belorussian republics. The execution sites included Smolensk city, Kalinin, Kharkov, and other places, as well as Katyn forest. Documents establishing the fact of Soviet culpability survived, but the full story will never be known because the files were purged. Pikhoia and Gieysztor, Katyn’: plenniki, 42n21.

221. Pikhoia and Gieysztor, Katyn’: plenniki, 16. See also Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 276–7, 295.

222. Osborn, Operation Pike, 92–6. Overflowing camps and prisons placed a strain on NKVD resources in the western regions. Of course, the inmates could have been deported eastward to labor camps rather than executed without trial.

223. In Nov. 1939, Mekhlis, as head of the army’s political administration, had told a gathering of Soviet writers that Polish officers held as prisoners of war could form the leadership of Polish legions of up to 100,000 men, which were being constituted in France, and therefore that they should not be released. Jasiewicz, Zagłada polskich Kresów, 175 (Vishnevskiy diary, Nov. 11, 1939). This passage was not included in Vishnevskii, Stat’i, dnevnik, pisma, 372.

224. Boiadzhiev, Maretskaia, 100; Kalashnikov, Ocherki istorii sovetskogo kino, II: 169–84.

225. Izvestiia, March 8, 9, 10, and 11, 1940; Pravda, March 9, 1940. That month, a “short biography” of Molotov, barely ten pages, went to press in a print run of half a million. It recounted his days in the underground, the 1917 revolution, and the civil war, and stressed his orthodox Leninism, organizing prowess, and close association with “the Supreme Leader of peoples comrade Stalin.” Tikhomirov, Viacheslav Mikhailovich Molotov, 15.

226. Shvarts, “Zhizn’ i smert’ Mikhaila Bulgakova,” 126. Pasternak, having learned Bulgakov was terminally ill, had paid a last visit.

227. Upton, Finland, 140 (citing J. K. Paasikivi, Toimintani Moskovassa ja Suomessa 1939–1941 [Porvoo: Werner Söderström, 1959], I: 187, 191); Tanner, Winter War, 235. For brief excerpts of the Finnish record of the March 12 discussions, in Russian translation, see Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 497–503.

228. For a Finnish police summary (March 15, 1940) of the domestic shock from the peace terms, see Khristoforov et al., Zimniaia voina, 519–22.

229. Dallin, Soviet Russia's Foreign Policy, 190.

230. Vakar, “Milukov v izgnan'e,” 377.

231. “The USSR, to be sure, received strategic gains in the northwest, but at what price?” Trotsky wrote in March 1940. “The prestige of the Red Army is undermined. The trust of the toiling masses and exploited peoples of the whole world has been lost. As a result the international position of the USSR has not been strengthened but weakened.” He added that Stalin “personally has emerged from this operation completely smashed.” Trotskii, “Stalin posle finliandskogo opyta [March 13, 1940],” in Portrety revoliutsionerov, 162–66 (at 166). Trotsky later clarified that “it does not follow from this that the USSR must be surrendered to the imperialists but only that the USSR must be torn out of the hands of the bureaucracy.” Trotsky, “Balance Sheet of the Finnish Events.” See also Trotsky, “A Petty-Bourgeois Opposition in the Socialist Workers Party” (Dec. 15, 1939), published posthumously in In Defense of Marxism, 44–62 (at 56–9).

232. This concession appears to have been connected to Finland's efforts to sign a defensive alliance with Sweden and Norway, which Molotov warned Helsinki would be considered a violation of the Soviet-Finnish peace treaty. Dallin, Soviet Russia's Foreign Policy, 196; van Dyke, Soviet Invasion, 190.

233. Chubarian and Shukman, Stalin and the Soviet-Finnish War, 263–75.

234. Waltz, Theory of International Relations, 194–5; Keohane, “Lilliputians' Dilemmas.”

235. Solodovnikov, “My byli molodye togda,” 210.

236. Timoshenko told the Finnish military attaché in Moscow, “the Russians have learnt much in this hard war in which the Finns fought with heroism.” Mannerheim, Memoirs, 371. Altogether, from Sept. 1939 through March 12, 1940, Red Army call-ups had amounted to 3.16 million. About half were demobilized, leaving an army of 1.547 million. Mikhail Mel'tiukhov, Upushchennyi shans Stalina, 360 (citing RGVA, f. 40443, op. 3, d. 297, l. 128).

237. Krivosheev, Grif sekretnosti sniat, 93–126 (esp. 125); RGVA, f. 34980, op. 15, d. 200, 203, 204, 206, 208, 211, 213, 215, 217, 219; f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1301, l. 165–8; Rossiiskaia Federatsiia, Kniga pamiati; Manninen, “Moshchnoe Sovetskoe nastuplenie,” I: 324–35; “O nakoplenii nachal'stviushchego sostava Raboche-Krest'ianskoi Krasnoi Armii,” 181; Balashov, Prinimai nas, 182, 186. Neither Hanko nor the islands would prove to be any protection for Leningrad, since the future Nazi onslaught against the city would not come from the Baltic Sea/Gulf of Finland but from overland.

238. Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 130. In early spring 1940, right after the end of the Soviet-Finnish War, the Soviet ambassador to Paris, Surits, would be declared persona non grata after sending a telegram to Moscow, intercepted by the French, in which he referred to the French and British as warmongers. It was payback.

239. The German ambassador to Finland (Wipert von Blücher) sent a report to Berlin in Jan. noting that “the Red Army has such shortcomings that it cannot even dispose of a small country and the Comintern does not even gain ground in a population that is more than forty percent socialist.” Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 411; Semiriyaga, Winter War, 63–4 (no citation). German circles were said by a Swedish Soviet agent to be stunned by the dismal Soviet effort, and wondered about the necessity of abiding by the Hitler-Stalin Pact. Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 220–1, 224–8.

240. Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, VI: 981–2 (Dec. 31, 1939).

241. Förster and Mawdsley, “Hitler and Stalin in Perspective,” 68. See also Förster, “German Military's Image of Russia,” 123–4.

242. Van Dyke, Soviet Invasion, xii–xiii, 103–27, 189–193.

243. Reese, “Lessons of the Winter War.”

244. Mannerheim, Memoirs, 367. See also Liddell-Hart, Expanding War, 72. One Soviet political commissar observed, “Regiments and divisions were sometimes given to incompetent, inexperienced, and poorly trained people who failed at the slightest difficulty in battle.” Rzheshvskii et al., Zimniaia voina, II: 21–2. The inadequacy of the Soviet officer corps was a long-standing point of critique. Zaitsev, “Krasnaia armia,” 12.

245. This testimony is second-hand, from Vasilevsky, Shaposhnikov's top subordinate at the general staff. Vasilievskii, Delo vsei zhizni, I: 102; Bialer, Stalin and his Generals, 132.
246. Vasilevsky, Lifelong Cause, 108–9. Vasilevsky was in the Little Corner between March 2 and 17, 1940, on all the days Stalin received visitors except one—thirteen visits total. Na prieme, 293–5.
247. Murin, Stalin v ob"iatiakh sem'i, 64–5 (APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 1553, l. 38–9).
248. They would marry on New Year's Eve 1940–1, just before Vasily would be scheduled to return to his officers' study courses in Lipetsk, where they would live together in the dormitory. In May 1941, they would return to Moscow; Stalin would order that they move into his Kremlin apartment, which would be subdivided for them. Mamaeva, "Vasily Stalin."
249. Sheinis, Maksim Maksimovich Litvinov, 367–8; Haslam, "Soviet Foreign Policy," 116–7; Watson, Molotov, 180.
250. Voroshilov, "Uroki voyny s Finliandiei." Much of the lively discussion of operations and strategy, prominent through 1936, had been killed off by the terror, but the disastrous Finnish war experience forced its revival. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 500–7.
251. Supposedly, Stalin privately fumed of Voroshilov, "He boasted, assured us, reassured us, that any strike would be answered by a triple strike, that everything is good, everything is in order, everything is ready, Comrade Stalin." Simonov, "Zametki k biografii G. K. Zhukova," 50. This conversation evidently transpired when Timoshenko was sent to Finland and after Zhukov was put in charge of the Kiev military district.
252. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 128 (March 28, 1940); Rubtsov, Alter ego Stalina, 135 (quoting, without citation, recollections of General Khrulev); Voroshilov, "Uroki voyny s Finliandiei" (APRF, f. 3, op. 50, d. 261, l. 114–58); Volkovskii, Tainy i uroki, 426–49 (RGASPI, f. 74, op. 2, d. 121, l. 1–35; Voroshilov report).
253. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 128. See also Gorodetsky, Grand Illusion, 117–8.
254. Malyshev, "Dnevnik narkoma," 110.
255. Stalin, Schulenburg added, could at most be expected to meet Hitler in a border town. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 134–6.
256. Pravda, March 30, 1940.
257. Duraczyński and Sakharov, Sovetsko-Pol'skie otnosheniia, 153–4 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1305, l. 210–1). Tevosyan's sister (Yuliya) was married to Levon Mirzoyan, the Armenian party official, who fell afoul of Beria. She was arrested. "Stal'noi narkom" (Jan. 15–31, 2011): <http://noev-kovcheg.ru/mag/2011-02/2363.html>.
258. The first issue of the KFSR newspaper Pravda in Finnish came out on April 10, 1940. Bol'shevistskaia pečat', 1940, no. 8: 71.
259. For the complete proceedings, see Rzheshvskii et al., Zimniaia voina, II (excerpts in Volkovskii, Tainy i uroki, 450–516, and Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 235–48); Chubarian and Shukman, Stalin and the Soviet-Finnish War.
260. Volkovskii, Tainy i uroki, 450–5, 464–5. See also Meretskov, Na sluzhbe, 182. Later, Khrushchev, citing a conversation with Timoshenko, said that "every pillbox the Finns had built on the whole Mannerheim line—all that was well known and even mapped out." Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 253.
261. Baryshnikov and Manninen, "V kanun zimnei voyny," I: 133 (RGVA, f. 37977, op. 1, d. 722, l. 410–1); Elliston, Finland Fights, 142 (citing German military attaché in Finland, General Arniké).
262. Baryshnikov, Ot prokhladnogo mira, 264 (citing RGVA, f. 37977, op. 1, d. 722, l. 411). Meretskov claimed he asked but could not get the necessary information on what to expect in the war. Meretskov, "Ukreplenie severo-zapadnykh granits SSSR," 123.
263. Akhmedov, In and Out of Stalin's GRU, 109.
264. Novobranets, "Nakanune voyny," 170.
265. Proskurov added that "If on the paper it is written 'secret,' then people will read it, but if it is just a simple publication, they'll say it's rubbish. (Laughter). I am convinced that big bosses treat materials thusly." Volkovskii, Tainy i uroki, 464–5, 492–504.
266. Stalin received Proskurov, alone, on July 7, 1940, for an hour. Four days later came the announcement that he had been replaced by Golikov. Proskurov was transferred to command of the Far East military district.

- 267. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 602 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 165, d. 77, l. 178–211).
- 268. Chubarian and Shukman, Stalin and the Soviet-Finnish War, 267, 268; “Zimniia voina”: rabota nad osibkkami, 36. See also Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/1: 47; Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 365–6 (citing TsAMO, f. 132, op. 264 211, d. 73, l. 67–110). Stalin would also criticize army political work. “It is not enough that the political worker in the army will repeat ‘the party of Lenin-Stalin,’ it is no more than repeating ‘Hallelujah, Hallelujah,’” he complained of the Finnish war campaign. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1124, l. 27.
- 269. Khrushchev added, “It was the only time I have ever witnessed such an outburst.” Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 257; Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 256. Khrushchev is the only source for this incident. He gives no date, though it seems likely to have occurred in 1940 after the Finnish war debacle.
- 270. “Military history—especially Russian—is being studied poorly,” Mekhlis, head of the army’s political directorate, complained in a speech to the Main Military Council (May 10, 1940). “We have a lot of unfair ridiculing of the old army despite the fact that we had such notable tsarist army generals as Suvorov, Kutuzov, and Bagration . . . All of this leads to the ignoring of concrete historical experience despite the fact that history is the best teacher.” Brandenberger and Dubrovsky, “The People Need a Tsar,” 881 (citing “O Voennoi ideologii,” RGVA, f. 9, op. 376a, d. 4252, l. 121, 138–40). In 1940, the war of 1812 against Napoleon once again became known as the Fatherland War: Nechkina, Istoriia SSSR, II: 76.
- 271. More than twenty top officials received copies of these top-secret documents. Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X”, 105–6. Stalin had received a long analysis, forwarded by Orlov and dated Dec. 31, 1938, on the performance of Soviet aviation in Spain. The analysis was written by F. A. Agaltsov (b. 1900), a commissar of the Red Air Force in the Spanish Republic army. Stalin wrote on the cover letter, questioning why Orlov and not Loktionov was sending him materials on aviation. Kudriashov, SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii, 433–53 (APRF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 228, l. 38, 39–84), 532n585.
- 272. Helmuth Klotz, an émigré German writer living in France, argued of Spain that the tank had been overtaken by the new German anti-tank guns. Klotz, Les leçons militaires de la guerre civile en Espagne (Paris, Édité par l’auteur, 1937); Militärische Leben des Bürgerkrieges in Spanien (Paris, Selbstverlag des Verfassers 1938); Uroki grazhdanski voiny v Ispanii (Moscow: Voenizdat, 1938). In the preface to the Russian translation, Soviet editors took Klotz to task for wrongly minimizing the role of the air force in Spain.
- 273. Roberts, Stalin’s General, 64 (citing RGVA, f. 32113, op. 1, d. 2). Stern wrote up a report, too. “In many ways, this operation resembles Hannibal’s campaign at Cannae,” he would boast, comparing Khalkin-Gol to Carthage’s battle against the Romans (216 B.C.). “I think it will become the second perfect battle of encirclement in all history,” Vorozheikin, Istrebiteli. Stern would later complain officially that Zhukov and his men were gossiping that Stern had had nothing to do with drawing up the battle plan. Krasnov, Neizvestnyi Zhukov, 121–2.
- 274. Rzheshhevskii et al., Zimniia voina, II: 276.
- 275. For example, Russian observers of the Crimean War (1853–6) had come to see the necessity of replacing the .70-caliber smoothbore musket, in use since Peter the Great. In 1857, Russia decisively opted for the .60-caliber muzzle-loader (manufactured abroad) and, by 1862, had acquired more than a quarter million of these shoulder rifles, nicknamed the vintovka. But in a head-snapping turnabout, the 1866 Austro-Prussian War demonstrated the inferiority of muzzle-loaders to breechloaders. Here was a very expensive decision for Russia: junk its huge stock of rifles, or try, somehow, to adapt them. After emotional debate, experiment, and testing, Russian strategists could not make up their minds and pursued both replacement and adaptation, which were at cross-purposes. Menning, Bayonets before Bullets, 30–3.
- 276. Despite failing to obtain approval, Gorky Factory No. 92 began producing the superior 76.2-mm F-34 guns, and they ended up being available for inclusion on the tank. Zaloga and Granden, Soviet Tanks, 130.
- 277. Mel’tiukhov, Upushchennyi shans Stalina, 600.
- 278. Thomas, Spanish Civil War, 606, 658–59; Kowalsky, Stalin, paragraphs 670, 784; Rybalkin, Operatsiia “X”, 118. In 1937, Italian aviation also stalled (industry could not build reliable motors above 1,000 horsepower). Maiolo, Cry Havoc, 199. The Soviets had captured a Messerschmitt Bf 109, which they discovered was superior to the Soviet Il-16. This would prompt a scramble to upgrade the latter with fourteen-cylinder, two-row radial engines, but that would take time.

279. Iakovlev, Tsel' zhizni (6th ed.), 166–7. The meeting in the Little Corner may have been Aug. 5, 1940: Na prieme, 308.

280. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 24, citing APRE, f. 56, op. 1, d. 298, l. 29–32 (Stalin-Ritter, Feb. 8, 1940) and AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 315, d. 2174, l. 153–4 (Shkvartsev, March 5, 1940); APRE, f. 3, op. 64, d. 688, l. 58–64 (Mikoyan Schulenburg, April 5, 1940), l. 72–8 (Mikoyan meeting Hilger, April 21, 1940); Sipols, “Torgovo-ekonomicheskie otnosheniia mezhdu SSSR.” See also Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 317.

281. Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 202; table 3.2; Musial, Stalins Beutezug, 28–9.

282. Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 205; (table 3.5, 210; table 5.1.

283. “Zimniaia voina”: rabota nad osibkami, 215–43.

284. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 296 (citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 36, d. 4252, l. 160); van Dyke, “Legko ordelalis,” 115.

285. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 317–24.

286. Erickson, Soviet High Command, 555. Timoshenko got an apartment in the turn-of-the-century building on the former Romanov Way, renamed Granovsky Street, which was the most prestigious address for those living outside the Kremlin; this is where Mikhail Frunze had lived when he became defense commissar. Budyonny had his apartment here as did the functionaries Yaroslavsky, Malyshev, and Khrushchev. This is where Trotsky was exiled from.

287. See also Mikoian, Tak bylo, 386.

288. Kira was evidently seized on May 5, 1940, by a squad overseen by Merkulov; she was executed by Blokhin without indictment or trial. “Beria protiv Kulika,” in Bobrenov and Riazantsev, Palachi i zhertvy, 197–264 (esp. 195–201, 211–3); Sokolov, Istreblennye marshaly, 300–1; Leskov, Stalin i zagovor Tukhachevskogo, 53–5; Montefiore, Court of the Red Tsar, 293–4.

289. DGFP series D, VIII: 942; Erickson, Soviet High Command, 508, 553.

290. One scholar gives the reason as Stalin’s desire to show the world that the lessons of the Finnish War had been absorbed by replacing both the defense commissar and chief of staff, even though Stalin acknowledged that Shaposhnikov had gotten the war right. Balandin, Marshal Shaposhnikov, 317–23.

291. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 717.

292. Komandnyi i nachal’stviushchii sostav Krasnoi Armii, 4–14; Kirshin, Dukhovnaia gotovnost’ Sovetskogo naroda k voine, 379; van Dyke, Soviet Invasion, 198–9; Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/i: 63–4.

293. Osokina, Za fasadom, 206–18; Khanin, Ekonomicheskaiia istoriia Rossii, I: 29.

294. Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 13–49.

295. Kuznetsov, Krutye povoroty, 37.

296. Zhukov, Vospominaniia, II: 283–7. Zhukov recalls Kalinin being present. The logbook lists Zhukov on June 2, 1939, only in the presence of Molotov and Stalin, and on June 3 in the presence of twenty-five people, almost all military men, but not Kalinin. Kalinin and Zhukov both appear on June 13, but not at overlapping times. Na prieme, 300–1, 302–3.

297. Already by May 1940, 12,000 repressed Red Army officers and troops had been reinstated (not including the air force or navy). “O nakoplenii nachal’stviushchego sostava Raboche-Krest’ianskoi Krasnoi Armii,” 182, 187, 188–9.

298. Konstantinov, Rokossovskii, 42. See also Gorbato, Gody i voiny, 162–72.

299. Drug plennykh, Jan. 27, 1940: 1.

300. Aron, Mémoires, 158.

301. Dullin, “How to Wage Warfare,” 224. See also Borkenau, Totalitarian Enemy, published in March 1939.

302. Schapiro, Totalitarianism; Gleason, Totalitarianism; Jones, Lost Debate. Stalin was likely unaware of these adverse currents. For May Day 1940, he altered the draft slogan for the Young Pioneers from “the cause of communism” to the “cause of Lenin-Stalin.” RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1257, l. 137.

303. Hilferding, “Gosudarstvennyi kapitalizm ili totalitarnoe gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo?” The Mensheviks, just before the Nazis would occupy Paris, would relocate to New York, while Hilferding would stay behind and fall into the clutches of the Gestapo. Liebig, From the Other Shore, 240–3.

304. Harrison and Davies, “Soviet Military-Economic Effort,” 373–93.

305. Adamthwaite, France, 269–79. There is little solid evidence on German intelligence assessments of Soviet capabilities. Germany used Iran, which in 1939 had declared its neutrality, as a platform for reconnaissance and covert action against the Soviet Union (the Shah shared with Hitler fear of the spread of Bolshevism; nearly half of Iranian trade was with Nazi Germany, mostly raw materials and oil for German weapons). Richard August, who went by the name Franz Meyer, an SS officer and spy working undercover as a representative of the Reichsgruppe für Industrie in the USSR from Sept. 1939 through Feb. 1940, was among those based in Tehran. He evidently reported that the Red Army was strong and the Russian émigré predictions of a pending anti-Bolshevik uprising fantastical. Dolgoplov, Vartanian, 16–7.

306. Emets, “O roli russkoi armii,” 64.

307. Adamthwaite, France, 232–4; Gates, End of the Affair, 57–8; Ulam, Expansion and Coexistence, 295.

308. Erickson, Soviet High Command, 513. For British views, see Murray, Change in the European Balance of Power, 274; and Adamthwaite, France, 51. On Stalin's respect for the French army (“worthy of consideration”), expressed to Ribbentrop on Aug. 23, 1939, see DGFP, series D, VII: 227.

CHAPTER 13. GREED

1. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, VIII: 196–7 (June 28, 1940).

2. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 374–5 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 339, d. 2315, l. 35, 35 a, 36, 38, 39).

3. Osborn, Operation Pike. See also Richardson, “French Plans”; Millman, “Toward War with Russia.”

4. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 317–8.

5. Fel'shtinskii, Oglasheniui podlezhit, 180.

6. Golubev et al., Rossiia i zapad, 223 (citing RGASPI, f. 77, op. 1, d. 745, l. 34).

7. Solonin, “Tri plana tovarishcha Stalina,” 44.

8. On May 10, 1940, the same day Hitler attacked France, Moscow was invaded by Leningrad culture. After so many Ten-Day festivals for the various Union republics—beginning with Ukraine in 1936 and most recently with Armenia in Oct. 1939—now came the star turn of the Union's second capital, with performances by the latter's principal theaters, symphony orchestras, choral group, and the fabled Leningrad choreography school, cradle of the country's ballet dancers. Altogether, 2,765 cultural figures from Leningrad would take part (by one press account, closer to 4,000). On May 29, Stalin hosted a banquet for them in the Grand Kremlin Palace. Izvestiia, May 10, 26, and 28, 1940; Kul'turnaia zhizn' v SSSR, 1928–1941, 732; Nevezhin, Zastol'ia, 120–1. Also in May 1940, the Nazis sealed off the Jews of German-occupied Łódź into a ghetto behind barbed wire.

9. Gilbert, Churchill and America, 131–3.

10. Self, Neville Chamberlain, 432–3; Lukacs, Five Days in London.

11. In a May 24–28, 1940, Cabinet debate, Churchill prevailed. Reynolds, “British ‘Decision’ to Fight,” 147–67.

12. Firsov, “Arkhivy Komintern,” 22 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 184, d. 4, l. 53: Sept. 29, 1939). Stalin evidently harbored a certain admiration for the new British PM, Haslam, Soviet Foreign Policy, 152n1.

13. Von Strandmann, “Appeasement and Counter-Appeasement,” 168. Germany sent a team under retired Rear Admiral Otto Feige (b. 1882) to fit out the 690-foot battleship's superstructure above the first deck. Philbin, Lure of Neptune, 121–2.

14. Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 117, 121n101 (citing PA, R 106232, E0418717 and PA/Schnurre, Leben, 97).

15. While dancing the ancient dance with her, Feige was said to have heard a clicking noise, started probing, and found a hidden camera in a large wall painting (it had a small hole cut out). Feige remained impassive to Beria's clumsy blackmail recruitment effort, while Hitler became indignant about the Soviet entrapment effort. According to Khrushchev, Stalin laced into Beria. Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 258.

16. Just before midnight, Stalin evidently invited Beria and Sudoplatov to stay for supper. Volkogonov, Trotsky, 454; Primakov, Ocherki, III: 98–9; Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 76–7.

17. Ribbentrop in fall 1939 had wanted to make a public declaration to counter British press assertions that while in Moscow he had requested Soviet military assistance but been rebuffed. Stalin rewrote the German foreign ministry's draft of his words to read, “The attitude of Germany in declining military aid commands respect. However, a strong Germany is the absolute prerequisite for peace in Europe, where it follows that the Soviet Union is interested in the existence of a strong Germany. Therefore, the Soviet Union cannot give its approval to the Western powers creating conditions which would weaken Germany and place her in a difficult position. Therein lay the community of interests between the Soviet Union and Germany." Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 124–27; Fel'shtinskii, SSSR-Germaniia, II: 18.

18. British policy-makers had discussed a possible seizure of Sweden and Norway, which were also major German suppliers, as well as the deployment of British naval squadrons to the Baltic Sea, in order to cut off Germany and confront the Soviets militarily. Such offensive operations remained largely in the realm of fantasy, however, their costs higher than the Western publics or even Western leaders were willing to incur. In any case, Hitler had beaten Britain and France to the punch, invading Norway.

19. Shirer, Rise and Fall, 731–8 (citing Halder letter, July 19, 1957). Hastings, Finest Years: Churchill as Warlord (London: Harper, 2009), 1–59; Lukacs, Duel, 97–103.

20. The June 10 issue of Poslednie novosti, the émigré newspaper of Paul Miliukov, announcing the Nazi triumph over France, would be its last in Paris; the next day it was shut down.

21. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 297.

22. <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/10339678>.

23. Shirer, Berlin Diary, 419–25. The Germans removed the railway carriage to Berlin.

24. On June 21, 1940, Köstring, the German military attaché, met his Soviet liaison officer, Colonel Grigory Osetrov, who asked about the terms imposed on France. Köstring stated, "I do not know the intentions of our command staff, but I think that there will still be something with Britain." Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 333–4 (RGVA, f. 33988, op. 4, d. 36, l. 69s); Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 33 (citing APRE, f. 3, op. 64, d. 674, l. 128).

25. France's military budget had jumped from 12.8 billion FF in 1935 to 93.7 billion FF by 1939; it was investing 2.6 times as much on weapons production as it had on the eve of the Great War. Doise and Vaisse, Diplomatie et outil militaire, 402; Frankenstein, Le prix du réarmement français, 34–35.

26. Of Germany's 93 combat-ready divisions, only 9 were panzer divisions, with a total of 2,439 tanks; France had 3,254 tanks (4,200 with Belgian, Dutch, and British ones included). Stolfi, "Equipment for Victory"; Tooze, Wages of Destruction, 371–2.

27. Forcade, "Le Renseignement face à l'Allemagne," 126–55.

28. French intelligence (the Second Bureau of the General Staff) had monitored the transfer of German divisions westward following completion of the Polish campaign, and by early May 1940, despite Germany's minimizing the use of radio communications, the Second Bureau nailed the number of German divisions almost exactly (estimating 137 for an actual 136). The Germans had altered their compromised codes on May 1, cutting off French signals intelligence for a time, making the already skeptical decision makers at the top that much more so when it came to intelligence, however. Schuker, "Seeking a Scapegoat," 81–127, citing Col. Ulrich Liss, "Die Tätigkeit des französischen 2. Bureau im Westfeldzug 1939/40," Wehrwissenschaftliche Rundschau, 10 (1960): 267–78.

29. Bloch, Strange Defeat, 36, 52.

30. France's Maginot Line, mocked by subsequent analysts, proved difficult to overcome even when the Germans attacked it from the rear, toward war's end; not one of its major fortresses was captured in the fighting. Doughty, Breaking Point, 69–70.

31. Förster, "Dynamics of Volksgemeinschaft," III: 204. In 1939, French intelligence had taken note of Guderian's new, controversial strategy of using combined tank and air power to smash through and get behind enemy artillery and wreak havoc, but very few German generals, even in 1940, expected an armored blitzkrieg to succeed in delivering a knockout blow (based on the experience of World War I). Young, "French Military Intelligence," 288–90.

32. Jacobsen, Dokumente zum Westfeldzug 1940; Jacobsen, Fall Gelb' der Kampf; Frieser, Blitzkrieg-Legende, 66–116; Goutard, Battle of France; May, Strange Victory, 215–26; Geyer, "Restorative Elites," 139–44.

33. "The great western offensive was a one-shot affair," one historian aptly explained. "Success, and Germany would acquire the economic base to fight a long war; failure, and the war would be over." Murray, Change in the European Balance of Power, 361.

34. Frieser, Blitzkrieg-Legende, 3. The same day—May 20, 1940—the Nazis opened a concentration camp at Oświęcim/Auschwitz for Polish political prisoners. It would later be expanded and specialize in gassing Jews.
35. Hooten, Luftwaffe at War, II: 61; Schuker, “Seeking a Scapegoat,” 114, citing Villelume, Journal, 333 (May 12, 1940). As the historian May has observed of France, “When Germany opened its offensive against the Low Countries and France in 1940, not a single general expected victory as a result.” May, Strange Victory, 7.
36. Nord, France 1940. See also Gunsburg, Divided and Conquered.
37. Deutscher, Stalin, 437–41; Erickson, Soviet High Command, 537. In France, the advocates of armor, such as de Gaulle, lacking a patron, had been stymied by traditionalists.
38. Hillgruber, “Das Russlandbild,” 296–310; Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 297–300.
39. Haffner, Meaning of Hitler, 31.
40. Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 267; Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 266.
41. Jervis, “Hypotheses on Misconceptions,” esp. 475–6. “The vozhd,” the contemporary Konstantin Simonov would later observe, “had created for himself a situation in the party and the state such that if he decided something firmly, no one contemplated the possibility of direct resistance. Stalin did not have to defend his correctness before anyone, he was by definition correct if he had taken the decision.” Simonov, Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia, 82.
42. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 115–6 (Sept. 7, 1939). “Hitler without knowing it leads to shattering [of the] bourgeoisie,” explained a secret cipher in early Oct. 1939, from the Dimitrov to Earl Browder of the American Communist party, in reference to the Pact. Jaffe, Rise and Fall of American Communism, 46–7.
43. DGFP, series D, IX: 585–6 (June 18, 1940); Naumov, 1941 god, I: 40–2 (AVPRF, f. 06, op. 2, pap. 14, d. 155, l. 206–8).
44. Lemin, “Novyi etap voiny v Evrope,” 28; Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 373–4; Ulam, Expansion and Coexistence, 296–7. Halifax, British foreign secretary, wrote in his diary on May 25, 1940: “the mystery of what looks like the French failure is as great as ever. The one firm rock on which everybody had been willing to build for the last two years was the French Army, and the Germans walked through it like they did through the Poles.” Colville, Footprints in Time, 92; Reynolds, “1940,” 329 (citing Halifax diary: Hickleton papers, A 7.8.4, Borthwick Institute, York).
45. Schwendemann, Die wirtschaftliche Zusammenarbeit, 373. The German air attaché in Moscow, Lieutenant Colonel Heinrich Aschenbrenner, called upon the international liaison department of the defense commissariat back on May 21, 1940, and in a jolly mood attributed German successes in the West to Soviet support. “Before my departure for your country,” he told his Soviet interlocutor, “I was received by Hitler, who said to me: ‘Remember, Stalin did a great thing for us, about which you should never forget, under any circumstances. Remember this, and do not turn yourself into a merchant, but be a worthy representative of our army in a country friendly to us.’” Later that same day, Köstring, the German army attaché, visited the international liaison department and passed on photographs from the war with France. (The package was marked solely for Stalin.) When asked how events would now unfold, Aschenbrenner had made ostensibly definitive statements; the shrewder Köstring had answered, “only Hitler and a very narrow circle of people close to him know. I am given very limited information.” Aschenbrenner asked that his conversation not be reported to Köstring, for the latter “is jealous, like a girl, and might be offended that I got here before him.” Gavrilov, Voeniia razvedka informiruiet, 315–6 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1305, l. 374s–375s; report of Colonel Grigory I. Osetrov [b. 1901]).
46. Trotsky, “Stalin—Intendant Gitlera.” Biulleten’ oppositsii, 79–80 (Aug.–Oct. 1939).
47. Wager, Der Generalquartiermeister, 106. “All in all,” Karl Schnurre, the German economic official, had crowed on May 10, 1940, the day Germany struck France, “trade with Eastern Europe, as a result of the Economic Agreement with the Soviet Union, has attained a volume that it never reached in previous years.” Der Deutsche Volkswirt (May 10, 1940), in RGAE, f. 413, op. 13, d., 2856, l. 5–6, cited in Nekrich, Pariahs, 154; Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 116–7. Hitler had written (March 8, 1940) to mollify Mussolini that “the trade agreement which we have concluded with Russia, duce, means a great deal in our situation!” DGFP, series D, VIII: 876 (March 8, 1940); Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 111.
48. In addition, the Soviets lent Germany a submarine base near Murmansk for refueling and maintenance, as well as launching raids on British shipping. An oil tanker with Soviet oil arrived to refuel Nazi warships and landing craft during the attack on Norway in April 1940.

49. "Friendship with Germany, the Pact, and so on is all a temporary move, tactical devices," wrote Vishnevsky in his diary in May 1940. "Will we win? Or will we only give the Germans time, a breathing space, supplies?" Golubev et al., Rossiia i zapad, 228–9 (RGALI, f. 1038, op. 1, d. 2077, l. 63, 64ob.).

50. Speer, Inside the Third Reich, 172. Speer gets the date wrong. See also Reynolds, "1940."

51. He had settled upon the novella after a long search for a vehicle, as he had once explained, to explore "the heroism of construction, the new [Soviet] man, struggle and the overcoming of obstacles." Morrison, People's Artist, 88 (citing RGALI, f. 1929, op. 3, ed. khr. 30, l. 1); Vecherniaia Moskva, Dec. 6, 1932.

52. Richter, "On Prokofiev," 187–8.

53. Final approval had come only after Vyshinsky, deputy commissar for foreign affairs, saw it and the film's depiction of the German occupation of Ukraine was toned down. Morrison, People's Artist, 102–4 (citing RGASPI f. 82, op. 2, d. 950, l. 99); Perkhin, Deiateli russkogo iskustva, 607–8n4. See also Shlifshtein, "Semyon Kotko," 3.

54. Zubkova, Pribaltika i Kreml. A Greek diplomat speculated, in an intercepted and deciphered communication, that "Moscow would like above all to drag out the war [in the West], from which it is trying to extract advantages—which, by the way, it is achieving, as evidenced by the example of the new impositions on the Baltic states." Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 256 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 7, d. 22, l. 106; June 1940).

55. DVP SSSR, XXIII/1: 350–2 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 2, pap. 2, d. 13, l. 103–4, 127).

56. Sabaliunas, Lithuania in Crisis, 54.

57. Kirby, "Baltic States," 27 (citing Third Interim Report of the Select Committee to Investigate Aggression and the Forced Incorporation of the Baltic States into the USSR [Washington, 1954], 315–6; File N 4794/803/59: Preston to Order, April 19, 1940).

58. Ocherki istorii kommunisticheskoi partii Latvii, II: 429. Stalin had murdered the entire Estonia Central Committee. Many of them had spent fourteen years in Estonian prisons following the 1924 failed coup, before being released in an amnesty in 1938 and emigrating to the USSR.

59. Gross, Revolution from Abroad. See also Kotkin, "The State." Lithuania had emerged from Stalin's gratuitous massacres with just 1,220 Communists.

60. Gross observes that "the Polish Military underground organization, the ZWZ, which thrived under the Nazi occupation in spite of persistent Gestapo efforts to destroy it, never had a chance under the NKVD." Gross, Revolution from Abroad, 148.

61. Gross, "Nature of Soviet Totalitarianism." Because Poland underwent Nazi and Soviet occupations simultaneously, it would seem the ideal (if that is the word) place to make the case for "totalitarianism" as a concept encompassing both regimes, yet Gross, a proponent of the term, also noted significant differences between the nature and consequences of Nazi and Soviet rule. Gross, Revolution from Abroad, 230–1. After a trip to newly acquired western Ukraine and western Belorussia as a Pravda correspondent, the writer Avdeyenko returned with a new Buick. (On Sept. 9, 1940, he would be taken to task for being a "serial goods pursuer.") Babichenko, Pisateli i tsenzory, 22–31. The writer Vishnevsky, afforded a visit to the front in Finland, had written in his diary (Jan. 2, 1940), "I am ashamed to the point of horror to see how our people soiled many homes in Finland, how they carried off everything." Golubev et al., Rossiia i zapad, 226–7 (citing RGALI, f. 1038, op. 1, d. 2076, l. 2).

62. Khabarovsk OGPU materials of the early 1930s (to which I was given access in 1993) contain extremely specific, comprehensive characterizations for the population, right down to dwellings drawn to scale, in the émigré settlements across the border in Manchuria, even as the Soviet authorities could not feed or clothe the population in Khabarovsk region.

63. In the 1940 Explanatory Dictionary of the Russian Language, the word sovietizirovat' (to Sovietize) was defined as "To implant Soviet ideology, worldview, and understanding of the practical tasks of Soviet power." Amar, "Sovietization as a Civilizing Mission in the West," 31.

64. Beria wrote to Stalin that in the summer of 1940, the police archive in Kishiněv, seized from Romania, had been burned before the NKVD could seize it. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 308 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 7, d. 22, l. 301).

65. “The capitalists succeeded for a time in playing on the national distrust of Latvian, Estonian, and Finnish peasants, as well as shopkeepers, toward the Great Russians,” Schcherbakov would admit after the annexations to the Supreme Soviet (Aug. 1, 1940), in connection with the failures in 1918–20 to reconquer these lands. When the transcript was getting ready for publication, he crossed out “national distrust” and inserted a passage about “bourgeois politicians” in cahoots with the “imperialist bourgeoisie,” “deceiving” these peoples. Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 86 (citing RGASPI, f. 88, op. 1, d. 1015, l. 5).

66. Kul'turnaia zhizn' v SSSR, 1928–1941, 734.

67. The Taras Shevchenko Theater of Ballet and Opera performed Natalka-Poltavka, The Zaporozhets beyond the Danube, and other folk favorites. Literaturnaia gazeta, March 27, 1936; Sovetskaiia kul'tura v rekonstrukivnyi period, 517. Pravda, March 24, 1936; Nevezhin, Zastol'ia, 115 (citing RGALI, f. 962, op. 21, d. 1, l. 10); Cherushev, Komendanty Kremliia, 477–8. A Kazakh Ten-Day followed (May 17–26), with 350 participants, including the Kazakh Musical Theater, which performed the first Kazakh opera, a form that was a Soviet implant but, in this case, with a story based on the sixteenth-century oral epic Kyz Zhibek. The sensation proved to be the traditional improviser-troubadours (akyns), who sang tales accompanied by a dombra. Literaturnaia gazeta, May 10 and 15, 1936; Nevezhin, Zastol'ia, 115–6 (citing RGALI, f. 962, op. 21, d. 1, l. 10). See also Ubiria, Soviet Nation-Building, 169–70. Maya Plisteskaia, the ballerina, condescendingly observed that “Soviet Leaders positively loved these showy-imitation Ten-Days,” then admitted that “these parades mobilized creative people to an extreme. Everyone worked to the limits (otherwise, you look up, and you don't get the little medal, and they don't summon you to the final banquet). So you forget all the negatives. . . . These Ten-Days gathered the best forces.” Plisteskaia, Chitaia zhizn' svoiu, 93.

68. Uzbekistan's Ten-Day had taken place May 21–30, 1937, with some 600 participants; they performed Farkhad and Shirin by V. A. Uspensky and Giulsara by R. M. Glier and T. D. Jalilov, with a Kremlin reception on May 31, 1937. Literaturnaia gazeta, May 30, 1937; Nevezhin, Zastol'ia, 116–7 (citing RGALI, f. 962, op. 21, d. 1, l. 11). Azerbaijan's took place from April 5–15, 1938, with more than 600 participants and a banquet on April 17 in the St. George's Hall and the Palace of Facets. Fadeev, Vstrechi s tovarishem Stalinym, 168. Armenia's would take place Oct. 20–29, 1939, with 550 participants. The Spendiariov Opera and Ballet Theater performed Spendiariov's opera Almast, A. T. Tigranyan's opera Anush, and Khachaturyan's ballet Happiness. Nevezhin, Zastol'ia, 119–20 (citing RGALI, f. 962, op. 21, d. 20, l. 70; d. 1, l. 11); Chegodaeva, Dva lika vremeni, 301.

69. The committee had sent the conductor Vasily Tselikovskiy (b. 1900) of the Bolshoi to Frunze, the Kyrgyz capital, already in 1936 for the Ten-Day in Moscow (planned for 1938). Ballet master L. I. Lukin, also sent to Frunze, would be imprisoned there as an enemy of the people, but released five days before the much-delayed Ten-Day opened in Moscow on May 25, 1939, with more than 500 participants. Bakhtarov, Zapiski aktera, 85–86. A Kyrgyz ensemble performed Alyn Kys as well as Aichurek (Moon Beauty), the first Kyrgyz opera, co-written by Vladimir Vlasov and Vladimir Feré from Moscow. Ivanov, Dnevnik, 28. Nevezhin, Zastol'ia, 113–4. Bakhtarov, Zapiski aktera, 82. Brusilovskiy wrote the Kazakh operas, Bogatryev, the Tajik ones. “The resourceful officials of the Committee on Artistic Matters,” Jelagin wrote, “even managed to conjure up a Buryat-Mongol opera.” Elagin, Ukroshchenie iskusstva, 262, 263.

70. Jelagin, Taming of the Arts, 232–3.

71. Latshev, “I eshche odin tost 'vozhdia narodov,’” 141–2; Sovetskaiia kul'tura v rekonstrukivnyi period, 517–20. Gromov, Stalin, 330.

72. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 120. See also Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 98–102.

73. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 163 (Ribbentrop to Fabricius, June 27, 1940); Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 483–4 (June 25, 1940); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, I: 371–3; Gafencu, Last Days of Europe, 387–91. Gafencu resigned as foreign minister; Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 489 (no citation).

74. Novikov, Vospominaniia diplomata, 41; Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 488–9 (no citation). The secret protocol (clause 3) of the Pact was ambiguous: “With regard to Southeastern Europe attention is called by the Soviet side to its interest in Bessarabia. The German side declares its complete political disinterestedness in these areas.” Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 78n34.

75. Izvestiya (June 29, 1940) trumpeted “the new victory of the USSR's politics of peace,” and called the northern part of Bukovina “a typically Ukrainian province.”

76. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, VIII: 196–7 (June 28, 1940). Stalin had even obtained approval for this action from Mussolini, Hitler's ostensible ally, in exchange for recognition of Italian primacy in the Mediterranean. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 29 (citing AVP RF, f. 06, op. 2, pap. 20, d. 229, l. 1–6: Molotov-Rosso, June 20, 1940; f. 059, op. 1, pap. 330, d. 2269, l. 84–5: Molotov to Gorelkin, June 27, 1940); Schramm-von Thadden, Griechenland, 27. See also Dima, Bessarabia and Bukovina, 26.

77. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 158–9 (Ribbentrop to Schulenburg, June 25, 1940), 159–60 (Schulenburg to Ribbentrop, June 25, 1940), 161–2 (Schulenburg to Ribbentrop, June 26, 1940), 163; Rossi, Deux ans, 153 n2 (Schulenburg to Ribbentrop, July 17, 1940). Romanian oil production had begun to decline after 1936. Pearton, Oil and the Romanian State, 201–3. On July 4, 1940, Moscow asked Tokyo, which had long agreed not to recognize Romania's annexation of Bessarabia, to recognize the Soviet annexation. Elleman, "Secret Soviet-Japanese Agreement," 294 (citing Gaimushō, B100–JR/1).

78. Gafencu, Last Days of Europe, 390–2.

79. German occupation authorities in Belgium sought to shutter the Soviet trade mission. Mikoyan urged Stalin and Molotov not to allow that to happen, for "we have unfulfilled orders from Belgium and the Belgian Congo totaling 8,578,000 rubles." Pavlov, Anastas Mikoian, 125 (citing RGASPI, f. 84, op. 2, d. 62, l. 39; July 20, 1940).

80. Soviet counterintelligence personnel did not trust even the Communists installed in power there by Moscow, especially in Estonia. Khaustov, "Deiate'l'nost' organov," 306–7 (TsA FSB, f. 8os, op. 1, d. 81, l. 2; f. 14os, op. 1, d. 15, l. 201–2). On July 27, 1940, Stalin's "big fleet" program was reined in: ten instead of fifteen battleships, eight instead of sixteen battle cruisers, even as two small aircraft carriers for the Pacific Fleet were added. Hauner, "Stalin's Big-Fleet Program"; Rohwer and Monakov, Stalin's Ocean-Going Fleet, 113.

81. The report reached Stalin the very next day. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 20–6 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 435, l. 39–51).

82. Of Chamberlain and the Tories, Cripps had publicly written, "I am convinced that our reactionaries have no genuine desire to enter into a reciprocal agreement with Russia, but rather wish to use Russia for our own purposes so that by embroiling Russia with Germany they may save their own skins." Tribune, March 24, 1939.

83. Gorodetsky, Mission to Moscow, 42–3.

84. Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, II/f: 197–99; Jones, Lloyd George, 247–8; Rudman, Lloyd George. Lloyd George had met Hitler in Sept. 1936, gushing that the Nazi desired friendship with the British people, had "achieved a marvelous transformation in the spirit of the [German] people, and was the greatest German of the age, the George Washington of Germany—the man who won for his country independence from all her oppressors." He even concluded that "the establishment of a German hegemony in Europe, which was the aim and dream of the old pre-war militarism, is not even on the horizon of Nazism." "I Talked to Hitler," Daily Express [London], Nov. 17, 1936; Jones, Diary with Letters, 269.

85. Hanak, "Sir Stafford Cripps"; Gorodetsky, Mission to Moscow; Clarke, Cripps Version, 183–241.

86. "I am sorry for Sir S. Cripps, who is now entering the humiliating phase which all British negotiators in Moscow have to go through when they are simply kept waiting on the doormat until such time as the Soviet Government considers it desirable, as part of their policy of playing off one Power against the other to take notice," a perceptive foreign office official in London observed on June 23, 1940. "Stalin hopes to be able to counter any German browbeating and nagging by pointing to Sir S. Cripps on the doormat, threatening to have him in and start talking with him instead of the German Ambassador." Hanak, "Sir Stafford Cripps," 59 (citing TNA, FO 371/24844 5853: Sir Orme Sargent).

87. The logbooks for Stalin's office for July 1 list only Molotov, 5:35 p.m. until 6:25 p.m., but also note "last ones departed at 9:40 p.m." It is likely that Molotov left to retrieve Cripps, who noted that the meeting commenced at 6:30 p.m., and returned with Cripps, but neither was recorded in the logbooks. Na prieme, 305. Cripps had handed Molotov the letter from Churchill at 5:00 p.m., according to the Soviet translator-notetaker Pavlov: DVP SSSR, XXIII/i: 399 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 2, pap. 10, d. 100, l. 1–2).

88. For the Soviet transcript of Cripps's July 1, 1940, conversation with Stalin, see "Priem angliiskogo posla S. Krippsa," Diplomaticheskii vestnik (Moscow, 1993), 74–7, reprinted in Sochinienia, XVIII: 190–7, and in DVP SSSR, XXXIII/i: 394–9 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 278, l. 4–11). For the British version, see Gorodetsky, Mission to Moscow, 52

(citing PRO, FO 371/24846, f. 10, N 6526/30/38: Cripps to the Foreign Office, July 16, 1940); and Clarke, Cripps Version, 192.

89. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 19–22; Gorodetsky, Stafford Cripps in Moscow, 52–5; Gorodetsky, Mission to Moscow, 60. For Churchill's message to Stalin: Woodward, British Foreign Policy, I: 466–7. British embassy staff concluded that “nothing of importance emerged from this interview” with Stalin. Clarke, Cripps Version, 192 (citing FO 371/29464, f. 128).

90. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 19–22. Maisky was convinced the foreign office was sabotaging Cripps. Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, II/i: 211–3 (July 1, 1940). Churchill later sought to scapegoat Cripps, but Gorodetsky exposed Churchill's distortions. Gorodetsky, Mission to Moscow, 116–22. Still, there was some truth to Churchill's remark concerning the Labourite Cripps that “we did not at that time realise that Soviet Communists [read: Stalin] hate extreme Left Wing politicians even more than they do Tories and Liberals.” Churchill, Second World War, II: 118.

91. Paxton, Vichy France, 43; Lukacs, Duel, 160–5. Maisky also claimed to have been received by Churchill at 10 Downing Street on July 3. Maisky, Memoirs of a Soviet Ambassador, 96–100.

92. “The ‘Vienna to Versailles’ period has run its course,” wrote the Polish-born British historian Lewis Namier in Feb. 1940. “The first task is to save Europe from the Nazi onslaught—a difficult task; but even greater will be the work of resettling a morally and materially bankrupt world on a new basis.” Namier, “From Vienna to Versailles,” 17–8.

93. On the Baltics as a sticking point for Britain, see Henderson, Failure of a Mission, 251.

94. A corrective, in domestic political terms, to those who see a gulf between the two Conservatives, Churchill and Chamberlain, can be found in Lawlor, Churchill and the Politics of War, 88–111.

95. “Russia and the West,” The Economist, July 27, 1940: 113.

96. Lukacs, Duel, 72–7, 184–6, 207–10; Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, II/i (Dec. 29, 1940: Lloyd George surmise).

97. Amid rumors of a Soviet-British rapprochement, Schulenburg reported that Stalin remained loyal to Berlin and only wanted some tin and rubber from Britain. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 142–3.

98. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 38 (citing APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 435, l. 39–51: Proskurov to Stalin, June 4, 1940).

99. DVP SSSR, XXIII/i: 399 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 326, d. 2238, l. 149–51: July 13, 1940); DGFP series D, X: 207–8 (Schulenburg to Ribbentrop, July 13, 1940); Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 166–8; Teske, General Ernst Köstring, 258–60.

100. Back in Feb. 1940, German violations of Soviet airspace had drawn fire, and the intruders turned tail. On March 17, thirty-two German fighters and bombers entered Soviet airspace on the path to Moscow, and again Soviet border guards opened fire; one German plane was hit and crashed. On March 29, Beria, following Stalin's instructions, sent a directive to the border guards: no opening fire; airspace violations were merely to be registered. On April 5, 1940, came a further prohibition against the use of firearms anywhere on the frontier (with the inflow of diversionists, the order was sometimes ignored). A June 10, 1940, border convention specified that any plane crossing the border accidentally was to be returned. Pogranichnye voiska SSSR, 1939–iun' 1941, 292; Sechkin, Granitsa i voina, 53–5 (citing TsAPV, f. 14, op. 224, d. 110, l. 1, 17, 21).

101. Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 490 (July 3, 1940); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 6–7.

102. This was before, it turned out, secret feasibility studies had even been completed by the Wehrmacht. Alt, “Die Wehrmacht im Kalkül Stalins,” 107–9; Glantz, Stumbling Colossus, 90–2.

103. Golovanov, Zapiski komanduiushchego ADD, 299. In the 1920s, Shaposhnikov, along with the Voroshilovs and Mikoyans, had used the dacha Zubalovo-2 when Stalin and his wife Nadzhezda used the dacha Zubalovo-4 next door. Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 27.

104. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XVIII (VII/i): 86 (RGVA, f. 40442, op. 2, d. 170, l. 112).

105. A. M. Vasilevskii, “Nakanune voiny,” 5–8 (citing TsAMO, f. 16, op. 2951, d. 239, l. 1–37, l. 197–244: Sept. 18, 1940), (d. 242, l. 84–90: Oct. 5), d. 239, l. 245–77 (not later than Dec.).

106. Pavlov, Anastas Mikoian, 125 (citing RGASPI, f. 84, op. 1, d. 15, l. 82).

107. Ogonek, Sept. 1940, Jan. 1941.

108. Woodward, British Foreign Policy, I: 487–500. See also Weinberg, World at Arms, 164. “Cripps argues that we must give everything—recognition, gold, ships and trust to the Russians,” Cadogan wrote in his diary (Aug. 17, 1940):

"This is simply silly . . . Extraordinary how we go on kidding ourselves. Russian policy will change exactly when and if they think it will suit them. And if they do think that, it won't matter whether we've kicked Maisky in the stomach. Contrariwise, we could give Maisky the Garter and it wouldn't make a penn'orth of difference." Dिल्s, Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan, 321.

109. On July 9, 1940, Pavel Fitin, head of NKVD intelligence, reported that "the former King Edward together with his wife, Simpson, are currently in Madrid, whence they maintain contacts with Hitler. Edward is conducting negotiations with Hitler on the question of forming a new English government and the conclusion of a peace with Germany on the condition of a military alliance against the USSR." This could well have been disinformation from MI6 to push Moscow into talks with London. Shirokorad, Velikii antrakt, 99. See also Varga, "Mezhdunarodnoe polozhenie," 15–6.

110. "Vansittart spoke eloquently and at length about the misunderstanding and underestimation of the English character abroad," Maisky would record in his diary (Dec. 12, 1940). "It has been so ever since time immemorial. Napoleon, Bismarck, the Kaiser, and now Hitler, Ribbentrop and Mussolini—they were all grossly mistaken in fancying the English to be a 'nation of shopkeepers,' 'degenerate gentlemen,' 'depraved plutocrats,' etc., who cannot and will not fight whatever the circumstances. A profound mistake." Maiskii, Dnevnik diplomata, II/I: 305–6; Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 324. On British arms exports, see Edgerton, Britain's War Machine.

111. Golubev, "Esl' mir obrushitsia na nashu Respubliku," 174–5. All propaganda outlets, from TASS on down, continued to trumpet the Soviet pursuit of "peace." Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 76 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 125, d. 57, l. 59–74).

112. Zhukov later stated that "the only one in Stalin's inner circle, in my memory and in my presence, who voiced another point of view about the possibility of a German attack was Zhdanov. He consistently spoke very sharply about the Germans and insisted that Hitler could not be trusted in anything." But Zhdanov distrusted the British no less. Simonov, "Zametki," 49. A table of Stalin's inner circle visitors appears in Khlevniuk, Politsbiuro, 290. Zhdanov had observed to the Leningrad party in spring 1940 that for the USSR, "it is more pleasant, useful, and valuable to have alongside us not anti-Soviet Anglo-French allies, who harbor the intention of attacking either Germany or Leningrad . . . [but] a country that is in friendly relations with us"—i.e., Germany. Nevezhin, "Sovetskaiia politika," 26.

113. "He's a thoroughly likeable person," I remember thinking as we sat there, and thinking it in astonishment," Lyons had recalled of the conversation in 1930. "Are you a dictator?" Stalin smiled, implying that the question was on the preposterous side. "No," he said slowly, "I am no dictator." Lyons, Stalin, 196, 200, 203; Lyons, Assignment in Utopia, 387. Waldemar Gurian rightly noted of Lyons's book that "the most valuable parts are based upon Souvarine's monumental study of Stalin." Review of Politics 2/4 (1940): 506–8. Souvarine's work had been translated into English the year before.

114. Lyons, Stalin, 278, 291–2.

115. Gregory and Harrison, "Allocation under Dictatorship."

116. Osokina, Za fasadom, 206–18; Khanin, Ekonomicheskaiia istoriia Rossii, I: 29. Harvests had stabilized (at overreported levels), and state procurements were high, but grain exports and their revenues had declined. In 1940 the Soviet state procured 33.8 million tons of grain and exported 1.2 million, earning the hard currency equivalent of 51.2 million rubles, compared with 26 million tons and exports of 2.1 million, earning 48.8 million gold rubles, in 1937. Vnesniaia torgovlia SSSR, 1918–1966, 20–1.

117. Pykhov, Ekonomika, 12. Annual per capita consumption of absolute alcohol was estimated at 0.6 gallon (2.24 liters) in 1940, and that was excluding brandy, champagne, fruit and berry wines, and imports. Prot'ko, V bor'be za trezvosť, 129.

118. The police labeled them "black commodity exchanges" and noted their shadowy existence in nineteen cities, but also that some instituted an arbitration panel to resolve disputes, and bribed investigative officials to avert their eyes. Those involved often legally worked as plenipotentiaries tasked with pushing along fulfillment of the official orders for state companies. Rittersporn, Anguish, 225 (citing GARF, f. 9415, op. 5, d. 87, l. 8–14, 18, 20ob.).

119. Rittersporn, Anguish, 220 (citing GARF f. 8131, op. 37, d. 242, l. 103–4).

120. Siegelbaum, Stakhanovism and the Politics of Productivity, 280; Filtzer, Soviet Workers.

121. Pravda, June 26, 1940; Filtzer, Soviet Workers, 233–53. Back at a meeting on June 19, 1940, Stalin had explained that workers in capitalist countries worked ten to twelve hours, and that the Bolsheviks had “understood the economy poorly” when introducing the seven-hour workday in 1927. The new labor law restored the eight-hour workday (without additional pay). He partly blamed indiscipline and turnover on Soviet trade unions (“not a school of communism, but a school of self-seekers”). Malyshev, “Dnevnik narkoma,” 112 (June 19, 1940); Khlevniuk, “26 iunია 1940 goda,” 89.

122. “Vor gde Pravda, Nikita Sergeevich!,” 17.

123. Solomon, Soviet Criminal Justice, 300–1, 327; Rittersporn, Anguish, 233 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 88, d. 550, l. 922–3, 101–3; GARF, f. 8131, op. 37, d. 137, l. 53–4; f. 9415, op. 5, d. 205, l. 5).

124. Filtzer, Soviet Workers, 239. Some managers were demoted or demonstratively arrested for failing to apply the draconian law, but job turnover and absenteeism persisted. “O kontrole nad provedeniem v zhizn' ukaza presidiuma verkhovnogo soveta SSSR ot 26 iunია 1940,” RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 676, l. 41–42ob.

125. Khlevniuk, “26 iunია 1940 goda.” See also Markevich and Sokolov, “Magnitka bliz Sadvogo kol'tsa.” “We cannot be indifferent to who is joining the working class,” Stalin would lament later. “If this goes on in spontaneous fashion, the composition of the working class may be ruined. And correspondingly, the regime as a dictatorship of the working class may be ruined. But at present they latch on to anyone who turns up for a job.” Malyshev, “Dnevnik narkoma,” 113 (Sept. 26, 1940).

126. Davies and Harris, Stalin's World, 225 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1124, l. 46–7).

127. Das deutsche Reich und der Zweite Weltkrieg, II: 368–74.

128. Hillgruber, Hitlers Strategie, 168.

129. Trial of the Major War Criminals, XXXIV: 277 (Raeder for Assmann, Jan. 30, 1944).

130. Churchill, Second World War, II: 200 (letter to Smuts).

131. Hillgruber, Hitlers Strategie; Martin, Friedensinitiativen und Machtpolitik.

132. Raeder explained on July 11 that “in her weakened state, Britain will seek the support of the United States, in whose interests it is to preserve England as a powerful European state. This will automatically make the United States Germany's enemy. The two Anglo-Saxon powers will retain or rebuild their maritime resources in order to defend their empire and will thus become the next natural enemies of Germany to be dealt with.” The next day Hitler ordered redirection of armaments investment to the Luftwaffe and the navy, with highest priority to U-boats. None of that would be achieved quickly. On July 13, Hitler convened a military conference at the Berghof. “He sees the answer (as we do) in Britain's hopes on Russia,” General Halder wrote in his diary. Hillgruber, Hitlers Strategie, 147 (citing Kriegstagebuch der Seekriegsleitung, Teil A, July 11, 1940); Tooze, Wages of Destruction, 394 (citing BAMA RW19/164; and IWM EDS al 1492, Chef Wi Rue Amt, Aug. 20, 1940, Aktennotiz); Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 504–6 (July 13, 1940); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 19–22.

133. Shirer, Berlin Diary, 355–6.

134. Churchill, Second World War, II: 230–1. Ciano, who met with Ribbentrop that day before the speech, recorded it as “a last appeal to Great Britain.” The next day, he met with Hitler and recorded: “He would like an understanding with Great Britain. He knows that war with the English will be hard and bloody, and knows also that people everywhere today are averse to blood.” Gibson, Ciano Diaries, 277 (July 19, 20, 1940).

135. “Telegramma I. F. Dergacheva I. I. Proskurovu,” 220 (June 6, 1940).

136. Dietrich, The Hitler I Knew, 124–5; Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 306–7; Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, 107–8; Naumov, 1941 god, I: 91 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22434, d. 4, l. 261: “Meteor,” July 9, 1940).

137. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 440–1 (RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1305, l. 438s), 443–5 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 9171, d. 4, l. 61–9; July 20, 1940).

138. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 442 (RGVA, f. 29, op. 35, d. 98, l. 11ss–12ss; July 16, 1940).

139. Fuehrer Conferences, 1940, I: 81; Wheatley, Operation Sea Lion, 43 (quoting naval staff diary, July 21, 1940).

140. Halder, as a result of hearing from Brauchitsch about the July 21 meeting, noted in his diary: “reasons for continuance of war by Britain: 1) Hope for a change in America . . . 2) Puts hope in Russia.” He added that “crossing the channel appears very hazardous to the Führer. On that account, invasion is to be undertaken only if no other means is left to come to terms with Britain. . . . Stalin is flirting with Britain to keep her in the war and tie us down, with a view to gain time and take what he wants. . . . Our attention must be turned to tackling the Russian problem and prepare planning.” Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 515–8 (July 22, 1940), I: 519 (July 24, 1940); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 30–4, 35–6.

141. By fall 1940, this would take the form of Germany declaring Japan’s “preeminence” in East Asia. Gavrillov, Voenmaia razvedka informiruet, 396 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22425, d. 3, l. 668).

142. Van Crefeld, Hitler’s Strategy, 28; DGFP, series D, VIII: 631–3. Jodl’s original memorandum on the peripheral strategy dated to Jan. 1940. By the end of June, with France defeated, he fleshed it out. “England’s will must be broken,” he wrote, via “a) Warfare against the British isles. b) Extension of the war to the periphery.” Trial of the Major War Criminals, XXVII: 301. See also Warlimont, Inside Hitler’s Headquarters, 109–10.

143. Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 30–4.

144. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 294–337 (at 306).

145. Warlimont, Inside Hitler’s Headquarters, 112.

146. Leach, German Strategy, 63.

147. Halder noted in his diary: “Russia’s aspirations to the Straits and in the direction of the Persian Gulf need not bother us. On the Balkans, which falls within our economic sphere of interest, we could keep out of each other’s way. . . . We could deliver the British a decisive blow in the Mediterranean, shoulder them away from Asia, help the Italians in building their Mediterranean empire and, with the aid of Russia, consolidate the Reich which we have created in Western and Northern Europe. That much accomplished, we could confidently face war with Britain for years.” Brauchitsch agreed. Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 527–30 (July 30, 1940); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 46 (July 30, 1940); Leach, German Strategy, 60–71. Halder as well as Jodl could see that the navy was proposing a force inadequate to an invasion of Britain. Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 523–4 (July 28), I: 527–30 (July 30); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 39–40, 43–6.

148. Attendees were Hitler, Keitel, Jodl, Raeder, Brauchitsch, Halder, and Puttkamer (naval adjutant at Hitler’s headquarters). The Luftwaffe was not represented.

149. This represented a change: from “prepare a landing” (July 16) to “prepare the ground” for a landing. Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, 106–7; Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 510–2 (July 19, 1940); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 26–8.

150. Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 47–8 (July 31, 1940); Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 530–4. Fabry quotes a letter (Oct. 5, 1954) from Halder to the historian Hillgruber stating that neither Halder nor Brauchitsch had understood the July 31, 1940, conference as an “irrevocable decision” to invade the USSR, only as the “start gun for foreseeable possibilities.” Fabry, Der Hitler-Stalin Pakt, 498n272.

151. Keitel ordered planning for production of armaments for 180 divisions on Aug. 17; within four days planning was under way for 200 divisions. Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, 119.

152. Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, 120.

153. Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, 109–17; Warlimont, Inside Hitler’s Headquarters, 111–4; DGFP, series D, X: 321; Vishlev, Nakanune, 11.

154. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 305–6.

155. Pravda, Aug. 11, 1940; Paetskis, V dvukh mirakh, 346.

156. Gavrillov, Voenmaia razvedka informiruet, 451–4 (RGVA, f. 33988, op. 4, d. 35, l. 134ss–135ss, 138ss–141ss).

157. Leach, German Strategy, 80 (citing Bundesarchiv/Militärarchiv N 22/7, Fedor von Bock, “Tagebuchnotizen,” Aug. 18, 1940). The Germans also now had confiscated French oil stocks.

158. Pavlov, Anastas Mikoian, 121–2 (citing RGASPI, f. 84, op. 1, d. 150, l. 1–5).

159. RGASPI, f. 82, op. 2, d. 1592, l. 4–7. In July 1940, after the two sides had hashed out a new demarcation of the Mongolia-Manchukuo frontier, the Japanese had proposed a neutrality pact, but Molotov told Ambassador Tōgō that “the Japanese had committed serious violations, and as a result we cannot consider the [1905] Portsmouth Treaty to be valid in its entirety.” Molotov sought to terminate Japanese oil and coal concessions on Soviet-controlled Northern Sakhalin, and reclaim Southern Sakhalin and the Kuril Islands, restoring Russia’s pre-1905 position in the Far East. After

Nov. 1940, the Japanese would propose a bilateral nonaggression pact, but Molotov remained adamant. Another five months of negotiations would ensue. Presseisen, Germany and Japan, 273–7.

160. Volkogonov, Trotsky, 454–69.

161. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 182–4. Stalin further inserted into the Pravda report of Trotsky's demise a hint of the biblical Cain and a reference to the old saw of Trotsky as Judas, making him not just a supposed murderer (à la Cain) but a traitor. Maksimov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 521–4 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1124, l. 63–6). Stalin had also edited the Pravda editorial about the Soviet-Finnish Friendship Agreement (Dec. 4, 1939) and the Izvestiya editorial (Oct. 9, 1939) about a Reichstag speech by Hitler. Maksimov, Bol'shaia tsenzura, 516–21 (citing RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1123, l. 41–51), 513– (d. 1124, l. 32–7).

162. Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, 254–9.

163. Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 81 (1940): 5; Volkogonov, Trotsky, 342–4. "Whatever the circumstances of my death," Trotsky had written in his will, "I will die with unshakeable faith in a Communist future." Trotskii, Dnevnik i pisma, 167–8. On July 17, 1940, just weeks before his murder, Trotsky's personal archive was shipped to the United States by train, arriving at Harvard University. Trotsky, Stalin, rev. ed., 863.

164. Deutscher, Prophet Outcast, 419–21.

165. Langer, Undeclared War, 129–46.

166. Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, III: 470–4 (Sept. 21, 1940); McMurry, Deutschland und die Sowjetunion, 214.

167. Watts, Romanian Cassandra, 217.

168. Deletant, Hitler's Forgotten Ally, 48–55.

169. Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 198 (citing RGALI, f. 1038, op. 1, d. 2077, l. 56: May 7, 1940). Other coveted dachas also changed hands, sometimes in unorthodox fashion. Sartakova, "Nash pisatel'skii les," 25; Antipina, Povednevnaia zhizn', 156–7 (citing RGALI, f. 631, op. 15, d. 457, l. 19).

170. Babichenko, Pisateli i tsenzory, 41. Many writers worked at factory clubs or publishing houses and were paid bureaucratic salaries, which in some cases exceeded their honoraria (royalties). Not many could count on reissues of their works, which paid 60 percent of the normal honorarium. Alexei Tolstoy, who had become chairman of the administration for protection of authors' rights, got the latter organization's staff to award him an advance of 83,000 rubles—an act that precipitated a special meeting in Sept. 1940. "His receipt of such an advance cannot in any way be justified," stated Lev Nikulin, a member of the writers' union apparatus. "This is when his average monthly earnings are 9,745 rubles." Tolstoy answered that he had no savings, and that the theatrical season had ended. "I think there is nothing to be surprised about here," he asserted. "Every month I pay 6,000 rubles to my first family." The writers' union decided to sack the functionary who had signed off on the advance. Antipina, Povednevnaia zhizn', 72–3 (RGALI, f. 631, op. 15, d. 451, l. 80, 85, 99, 4).

171. Antipina, Povednevnaia zhizn', 20 (citing RGALI, f. 631, op. 15, d. 501, l. 61: July 3, 1940).

172. Pravda, Aug. 15, 1940 (unsigned); RGASPI, f. 77, op. 1, d. 907, l. 1–5; Miller, Soviet Cinema, 67. The film was based upon a screenplay by Avdeyenko, who was subjected to withering criticism at the meeting. He was expelled from the writers' union and the party, but not arrested.

173. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 573–604 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1124, l. 134–45; f. 77, op. 1, d. 907, l. 12–82); Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 450–5.

174. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 587–9, 597.

175. Anderson et al., Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 599–600 (RGASPI, f. 71, op. 10, d. 127, l. 391, 396).

176. Na prieme, 311.

177. Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 123–6, 134–6.

178. Kershaw, Fateful Choices, 69; Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 143. At the time, the journalist William Shirer remarked upon Hitler's dependency on Stalin: Berlin Diary, 173–4.

179. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 459–62 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 9181, d. 7, l. 17–23). See also Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, 107–8, 119; Trial of the Major War Criminals, VII: 263 (Brauchitsch); Deitrich, The Hitler I Knew, 124–5; and Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 306–7. Altogether, between 1937 and 1940, five military intelligence chiefs had been arrested: Uritsky, Berzin, Nikonov, Gendin, and Alexander G. Orlov; Proskurov would be arrested in 1941. Golikov (b. 1900), a former member of the flying "Red Eagles" of the civil war, had been a commander in the 1939 Polish campaign and Finnish Winter War; in summer 1940 he commanded the Sixth Army, based in Lvov. He had never worked in military intelligence before; no one had spoken with him prior to the announcement of his appointment on July 11, 1940. Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 718 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 19, d. 71, l. 278–9), 719 (op. 15a, d. 496, l. 7; July 26, 1940). Military intelligence—officially the fifth department of the Red Army—was formally transferred to the army general staff, but Stalin had Golikov report directly to him. In 1939–1940, 326 new people were hired, the majority of whom did not know foreign languages and had little or no experience of the outside world. Lota, "Alta" protiv "Barbarossy," 57.

180. DVP SSSR, XXIII/i: 546–7 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 2, pap. 15, d. 156, l. 96–8), 552–3 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 316, d. 2176, l. 180), 553–4 (l. 185–7).

181. Izvestiia, Sept. 3, 1940.

182. Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 109 (Aug. 17, 1940); Lota, Sekretnyi front, 155–6. See also Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 443–5 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 9171, d. 4, l. 61–9; July 20, 1940).

183. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 216–7; Schramm, Kriegstagebuch des Oberkommando, I: 973.

184. Fuehrer Conferences, 1940, II: 17–21, 22–23.

185. Cherkasov, IMEMO, 31–3 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 716, l. 26: facsimile of Stalin's letter). Stalin was encouraging designs for bombers with payloads weighing a ton that could travel 2,000 miles, even 3,000, while the distance from Minsk to Berlin was all of 600 miles, and Vladivostok to Tokyo, 750. These weapons made sense only in terms of attacking far-off British colonies, and possibly the United States.

186. Bismarck, Mysli i vospominaniia. Mikhail Gefter, a professional historian who came upon Stalin's pencil edits, deemed them "reasonable editing, pointing to quite a good taste and an understanding of history." Gefter, Iz etikh i tekhnicheskikh, 261–2. The Central Committee propaganda department was raised at this time to a directorate.

187. Malyshev, "Dnevnik narkoma," 113; Na prieme, 312 (Malyshev wrongly dates it to Sept. 21).

188. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 188–9 (Ribbentrop to Schulenburg, Sept. 16, 1940), 198–9 (Tippelskirch to Ribbentrop, Sept. 26, 1940), 202 (text of German-Finnish diplomatic agreement on transit of German troops and equipment: Sept. 22, 1940), 201–2 (Ribbentrop to Tippelskirch, Oct. 2), 203–4 (Tippelskirch to Ribbentrop, Oct. 4).

189. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 247 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 67, l. 28).

190. Iklé, German-Japanese Relations, 181–2 (citing International Military Tribunal for the Far East, Documents Presented in Evidence, exhibit 1215: privy council, Sept. 26, 1940); Chihiro, "Tripartite Pact 1939–1940," and Ikuhiko, "Japanese-Soviet Confrontation," 191–257.

191. Hosoya Chihiro, "The Tripartite Pact 1939–1940," "Japanese-Soviet Confrontation," 256 (citing Japanese Foreign Ministry archives, "Nichi-Doku-I sangoku jōyaku," 228). In 1940, Japan celebrated the 2,600th anniversary of its empire, traced to mythical origins. Ruoff, Imperial Japan.

192. Trefousse, Germany and American Neutrality, 69.

193. Langer and Gleason, Challenge to Isolation, 24–5, "There is one common element in the ideology of Germany, Italy and the Soviet Union: opposition to the capitalist democracies of the West." Fest, Hitler, 589–90.

194. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 197–9 (Tippelskirch to Ribbentrop, Sept. 26, 1940).

195. Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, 136, citing NG-3074: 1–2 (memorandum).

196. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 129. Moscow did not know but on that very day—the two-year anniversary of the German-Soviet Treaty of Friendship and the Border—Hitler issued a directive to ramp up military outlays. Thomas, Geschichte, 432; Leach, German Strategy, 72. Stalin had begun to talk about disbanding the Comintern as early as spring or summer 1940, when the Soviet Union annexed the Baltic states; he would raise the issue again in April 1941. Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin. The Comintern would be dissolved in May 1943.

197. Bezymenskii, "Vizit V. M. Molotova v Berlin," 126–7 (citing APRF, f. 56, op. 1, d. 1161, l. 3). Molotov also received a clarification on Sept. 26, 1940, from Tippelskirch. DVP SSSR, XXIII/i: 627–30 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, p. 328, d. 2253, l. 144).

198. Elleman, International Competition, 131 (citing Gaimushō, file B100–JR/1, 2.1.00–23).
199. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 466–70 (Sept. 1940), 474–5 (RGVA, f. 29, op. 35, d. 98, l. 149ss–152ss; Oct. 2, 1940); Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/i: 245–6 (TsA FSK). See also van Crefeld, Hitler's Strategy, 69–72; Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 41. Germany was also moving its troops through Finland to other locations, such as Norway.
200. Gafencu, Last Days of Europe, 133–6.
201. DGFP, series D, IX: 40–1 (Ribbentrop to embassy in Moscow, March 28, 1940), VIII: 53–4 (Schulenburg reply, March 30). Fabry, Die Sowjetunion und das Dritte Reich, 227; DBFP, 3rd series, V: 544 (Seeds to Halifax, May 19, 1938); Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 145. Ribbentrop sincerely strove to bring about a Hitler-Stalin meeting, “but this came to nothing because Hitler said that Stalin could not leave Russia and he could not leave Germany.” Ribbentrop, Memoirs, 148; Davidson, Trial of the Germans, 162.
202. Muggerridge, Ciano's Diplomatic Papers, 402. On May 31, 1940, in light of the German successes in the West against France and Britain, Sorge had offered views on the basis of conversations with Germans in Tokyo, including some who had had contact with Ribbentrop. One group, according to Sorge, consisted of “young fascists” who wanted to follow a victory in the West with an immediate settling of scores with the USSR. Another group (“more important people”) sought continued peaceful relations with the USSR, given its political, economic, and military superiority over Germany. Of course, Hitler was the decider. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 433–4 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22425, d. 3, l. 359, 357).
203. Below, Als Hitlers Adjutant, 244.
204. “Iz istorii Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny,” 200.
205. Berling, Wspomnienia, I: 103–13, 168–76; The Katyn Forest Massacre: Hearings, 82nd Cong., 2nd Sess., March–April 1952, Part 3: 431–3, 488–90 (Henryk Szymanski), Part 4: 1233–4 (Józef Czapki). There is some discrepancy over the date of the meeting concerning the list; Berling gives Jan. 1941, Czapki and Szymanski, who heard about it, give fall 1940.
206. Kenez, “Picture of the Enemy,” 104. Other indications of war preparation included a secret inventory of films compiled in Oct. 1940, which listed some 200 titles, including the “particularly recommended” Circus (1936)—seen by more than 40 million Soviet inhabitants—Chapayev (1934), and Lenin in October (1938), to be relied upon for shoring up morale. Fomin, Kino na voine, 60–3. See also Salys, Films of Grigori Aleksandrov, 295 (citing RGASPI, f. 77, op. 1, d. 908: Zhdanov complaints, Sept. 1940).
207. Saraeva-Bondr', Siluetu vremeni, 199; Aleksandrov, Epokha i kino, 220. See the review by Grigory Roshal, “Melodiia i dissonans,” Kino, 1940, no. 44: 1–3. Alexandrov had seen a Soviet version of the Cinderella story, Zolushka, by Viktor Arlov, at the Moscow Satire Theater in 1938. Salys, Films of Grigori Aleksandrov, 281–340.
208. Pravda, June 18 and Oct. 31, 1940; RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1124, l. 147–8 (letter to Bolshakov, Oct. 11, 1940), reprinted in Sochineniia, XVIII: 199–204, 205. See also Artizov and Naumov, Vlast', 460–1 (RGASPI, f. 71, op. 10, d. 127, l. 399–400).
209. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 57 (citing Gafencu, Misiune la Moscova, raport 2384, 69–78; Gafencu to Sturdza, Sept. 21, 1940); Gibson, Ciano Diaries, 299–303 (Oct. 8, 12, 14, and 22, 1940).
210. Pravda, Oct. 16, 1940.
211. New York Times, Oct. 16, 1940.
212. It is said that Stalin disliked The Great Dictator. In any case, it was never released in the USSR. Konchalovsky, Inner Circle, 27.
213. DVP SSSR, XXIII/i: 674–6 (APRE, f. 3, op. 64, d. 341, l. 80–4: Vyshinsky); Dilks, Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan, 331 (brackets).
214. DVP SSSR, XXIII/i: 677–9 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 2, pap. 3, d. 17, l. 50–5).
215. DGFP, series D, XI: 291–7; Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 148 (Oct. 15, 1940); Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 622–6; Fabry, Der Hitler-Stalin Pakt, 343–5.
216. DGFP, series D, XI: 291–7 (Ribbentrop to Stalin, Oct. 13, 1940); Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 207–16; Naumov, 1941 god, I: 302–5 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 2, pap. 15, d. 157, l. 47–51), 305–10 (Russian version, APRE,

f. 45, op. 1., d. 296, l. 9–20), 317–8 (Stalin's reply, APRE, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 1); “‘la pochtu za udovol'stvie vnov' priekhat' v Moskvu': obmen posilaniiami mezhd u I. Ribbentropom i I. V. Stalijm v oktjabre 1940 g.” 21), 141–5 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 296, l. 31–3; Ribbentrop, Oct. 21); DVP SSSR, XXIII/i: 680–2 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 2, pap. 15, d. 1576, l. 47–51; Schulenburg-Molotov conversation); Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, III: 474–5; Hilger and Mayer, Incompatible Allies, 321; Carr, Poland to Pearl Harbor, 120.

217. DGFP, series D, XI: 508–10. Ribbentrop later quoted Hitler to the effect that “Ribbentrop, we have achieved many things together; perhaps we shall also pull this one off together.” Ribbentrop, Memoirs, 151.

218. Santa Olalla, at Himmler's invitation, would lay plans for joint study of Visigoth tombs in Spain. Treglown, Franco's Crypt, 246–7.

219. Van Crefeld, Hitler's Strategy, 41. See also Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 124 (Aug. 3, 1940); Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 538.

220. Preston, Franco, 392–400; DGFP, series D, IX: 311. The account of Hendaie by Paul Schmidt, Hitler's interpreter, is fraudulent: Schmidt was not there. Pike, “Franco and the Axis Stigma,” 377–9.

221. The Germans were put off by the Guardists' indiscipline. Deletant, Hitler's Forgotten Ally, 59–63. Germany had inserted economic (not military) advisers into the Romanian state in spring 1939.

222. Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 154 (Oct. 29, 1940), 158 (Nov. 1, 1940); Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 641–2, 669–71; Fuehrer Conferences, 1940, II: 32–6; Schmidt, Hitler's Interpreter, 185–8, 193–9; van Crefeld, Hitler's Strategy, 47 (citing German Foreign Ministry 1247/337515: H. von Etdorf note, Oct. 28); Corvaja, Hitler and Mussolini, 131–41; Pons, Stalin and the Inevitable War, 199.

223. Corvaja, Hitler and Mussolini, 137 (citing Ciano).

224. Schmidt, Statist, 516–7.

225. Schramm, Kriegstagebuch der Oberkommando, I: 148–9 (Nov. 1, 1940), 150–1 (Nov. 4, 1941), 152, 157, 158 (Nov. 7, 1940), 160 (Nov. 8, 1940), 182 (Nov. 19, 1940); Trevor-Roper, Hitler's War Directives, 39–43.

226. Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 163–4 (Nov. 4, 1940); Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 672–5.

227. Seidl, Die Beziehungen, 239 (Schulenburg to Ribbentrop, Oct. 19, 1940), 243 (Schulenburg to Dörnberg, Oct. 30), 243–4 (Ribbentrop to Schulenburg, Oct. 31), 244–5 (Schulenburg to Ribbentrop, Nov. 1).

228. Rossi, Deux ans, 173n3; Rossi [Tasca], Russo-German Alliance, 163.

229. Van Crefeld, Hitler's Strategy, 62–5. Germany had become the number-one trading partner with southeastern Europe, accounting for between 30 and 60 percent of each country's trade, paying above world market prices for agricultural goods, preferring the stable, long-term market access, which also did not require hard currency (they used clearing accounts). The Yugoslav and Romanian prime ministers understood this dependence on German markets, and refused to listen to French or British political pitches. Despite their racial condescension, the Germans did not view the Balkans through a Lebensraum prism. Gross, Export Empire. On Oct. 25, 1940, NKVD transport secretly reported the construction of border fortifications and a concentration of pontoon bridges on the frontier with Ukraine. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 324–6.

230. Berezkhov would meet Stalin in 1941. He would claim that in Berlin he observed “the same idolization of the ‘leader,’ the same mass rallies and parades . . . Very similar, ostentatious architecture, heroic themes depicted in art much like our socialist realism . . . massive ideological brainwashing,” but that he did not recognize this at the time (1940). Berezkhov, At Stalin's Side, 7, 72.

231. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 311–4 (AVPFR, f. 06, op. 2, pap. 15, d. 157, l. 55–60), 316–7 (l. 61–2), 326–7 (APRE, f. 3, op. 64, d. 686, l. 120–4). Gorodetsky stresses the Balkan dimension: Grand Illusion, 67–75.

232. Bezymenskii, “Vizit V. M. Molotova v Berlin,” 125. Stalin, in the company of Molotov, had spent five full hours with the Turkish foreign minister, Şükrü Saraoğlu, on Oct. 1, 1940, discussing a mutual assistance pact, which Turkey wanted, but only if Ankara was not obliged to act in the event of a Soviet conflict with Britain and France. DVP SSSR, XXII/i: 12, 49–51.

233. All this information emanated from the Latvian journalist Berlings. Internally, Nazi circles had discussed how Hitler would try to push Moscow out of Europe and toward a clash with British interests in India. Sipols, Tainy, 273–4 (citing ADAP, XII/i: 255, XI/i: 212–3).

- 234. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 248 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 7, d. 342, l. 21).
- 235. Stalin also stated, “We are not prepared for the sort of air war being waged between Germany and England.” Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 131–4 (italics and ellipsis in the original). On Stalin feeling alone, especially with the weight of military matters, see also Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 273. See also Genkina, Bor’ba za Tsaritsyn; and Melikov, Geroicheskaiia oborona Tsaritsyna, which was reissued in 1940.
- 236. Nevezhin, Zastol’ia, 291 (no citation); Nevezhin personal communication.
- 237. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 349–51 (APRE; f. 36, op. 1, d. 1161, l. 147–55); Bezymenskii, “Direktivy I. V. Stalina V. M. Molotovu perez poezdki.” See also “Poezdka Molotova v Berlin v noiaбрь 1940 g.”
- 238. Ehrenburg, Post-War Years, 276–8; Fischer, Life and Death of Stalin, 56; Phillips, Between the Revolution and the West, 166–7.
- 239. The rumor had been that Litvinov would be tried as a British-U.S. spy. Vaksberg, Alexandra Kollontai, 407; Gnedin, Katastrofa i vtoroe rozhdenie, 148–51; Vaksberg, Hôtel Lux, 154–7.
- 240. Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 499 (Beria’s Aug. 1953 interrogation).
- 241. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 121 (Nov. 7, 1939).
- 242. Cripps had continued to try to see Molotov and had finally done so on Aug. 7, 1940. But when Cripps had broached the possibility of a British-Soviet nonaggression pact, Molotov made no direct reply. Internally, Cripps continued to urge his own government to recognize Soviet annexations of the Baltic states. Gorodetsky, Stafford Cripps in Moscow, 74–90.
- 243. Churchill, Second World War, I: 353 (Oct. 1, 1939).
- 244. Halifax wrote to A. V. Alexander, the First Sea Lord at this time: “If there were reason to think that immediate recognition would cause an appreciable change in Soviet policy towards us, I might have felt inclined to recommend a derogation in this case from the general principle that political changes produced during this war and as a consequence of the war situation should not be recognized pending the final peace settlement.” Hanak, “Sir Stafford Cripps,” 65.
- 245. Hanak, “Sir Stafford Cripps,” 66 (citing TNA, FO 371/29464 1604: Oct. 22, 1940). “I think we have managed to avoid losing this war,” confided Harold Nicolson in a private letter of Nov. 8, 1940. “But when I think how on earth we are going to win it, my imagination quails.” Overy, Battle of Britain, 113, citing Nicolson, Diaries and Letters, 126 (to Vita Sackville).
- 246. Woodward, British Foreign Policy, I: 492–4.
- 247. Solodovnikov, “My byli molodye togda,” 209. Solodovnikov deemed the Bolshoi’s Yakov Leontyev, who served as impresario at the banquets in the St. George’s Hall for the Ten-Days, “a person of tremendous charm, with vast experience, deeply cultured” (207–8).
- 248. Osborn, Operation Pike, 210 (citing Cripps to Distribution B, nos. 985 and 986, Nov. 12, 1940, N7165/40/38 and N7166/40/38, FO 371/24848); Woodward, British Foreign Policy, I: 495–6; Hanak, “Sir Stafford Cripps,” 66.
- 249. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 329. Berezkhov recalled Amayak Kobulov as “the exact opposite of Bogdan, a repulsive, short, fat, and creepy character. Amayak—a tall, slim, handsome Caucasian, sprouting a well-trimmed little mustache and a shock of black hair, urbane, even charming—was the life of any party.” Berezkhov, At Stalin’s Side, 196.
- 250. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 338–9, 420–1.
- 251. Beria wrote: “I heard that the leadership of intelligence is dissatisfied with Zakhar’s work and has simply washed its hands of him. Perhaps one should not pay attention to this chatter, but when it concerns responsible comrades with whom I personally maintain contact, such corridor conversations must not take place.” Primakov, Ocherki, III: 444.
- 252. Berlings first appeared in Soviet files in Aug. 1940, when Kobulov reported that through the Soviet intelligence operative posing as the TASS correspondent, Ivan Filippov (“the Philosopher”), he had met a young journalist for a Latvian newspaper and proposed paying him a retainer in German marks for secret information. Fitin warned Kobulov that because Berlings had yet to be verified, “we suggest you show reasonable caution in working with him and on no account put him into contact with any operatives of the station.” But Kobulov could bypass Fitin and report straight to Merkulov. Vishlev, “Pochemu zhe,” 74 (citing Bundesarchiv, Abt. Potsdam: Film 14467, Bl. 25091 ff.); Vishlev, Nakanune, 49 (PA AA Bonn: Dienststelle Ribbentrop. UdSSSR-RC, 7/1 (R27168, Bl. 25899–25902), 132. The SS officer Rudolf Likus, who was detailed to the Ribbentrop bureau, recruited and handled Berlings. In 1947, the Soviets would discover as a result of interrogations of the Gestapo officer Siegfried Müller that Berlings had been a plant, passing information that had been reviewed and approved by Hitler personally. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 441–51. See also Roewer, Die Rote Kapelle, 62.

253. Zamoiskii and Nezhnikov, “U rokovoi cherty.”

254. Barros and Gregor, Double Deception, 9 (citing German Foreign Ministry Archives, Rudolf Likus, Confidential Report, November 22, 1940, microfilm T120, serial 36, frames 25933, 25938–9).

255. Stephan, Soviet Far East, 235.

256. Filippov, Zapiski, 142.

257. Schellenberg, Labyrinth, 137–8. Schellenberg—Heinrich Himmler’s personal aide (1939–1942)—was responsible for security and total surveillance over Molotov’s entourage during the Berlin visit.

258. Flannery, Assignment to Berlin, 37.

259. Schmidt, Statist, chapter 21.

260. Berezkhov, At Stalin’s Side, 45.

261. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 356–61 at 357 (APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 21–30); DGFP, series D, XI: 533–41.

262. DGFP, series D, XI: 541–9; Schmidt, Hitler’s Interpreter, 210–1. Schmidt did not speak Russian; he served as notetaker. Before meeting Molotov, recalled another confidant of the Führer, “Hitler totally underestimated him, declaring that he was a cipher, a typical bureaucrat.” Baur, Hitler’s Pilot, 122. The Germans had offered to send Hitler’s Condor to pick up Molotov, but the Soviets said their delegation was too large; they took the train.

263. Vasilevskii, Delo vsei zhizni, 108–9 (citing Molotov aide I. I. Lapshov).

264. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 226–34 (at 232), and DVP SSSR, XXIII/ii: 30–2 (APRF f. 56, op. 1, d. 1161, l. 147–55); Naumov, 1941 god, I: 361–6 (at 365) (APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 31–41). See also Schmidt, Statist, 520–1.

265. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 224–5; Naumov, 1941 god, I: 356–61 (APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 21–30); the German record has also been translated into Russian: Fel’shtinskii, Oglasheniia podlezhit, 251–301. See also Schmidt, Statist, 517–26; Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 15.

266. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 384–5 (Politisches Archiv des Auswärtiges Amtes, Bonn, Bestand Dienststelle Ribbentrop, R 27168, bl. 25933, 25934, 25940); Lota, “Alta” protiv “Barbarossy,” 235 (no citation).

267. Berlings would pass on a supposed internal German assessment of Molotov’s visit to Berlin as marking the onset of “a new era.” Primakov, Ocherki, IV: 447–8 (interrogation of Müller).

268. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 369 (AVPRF, f. 59, op. 1, p. 338, d. 2314, l. 11–8). See also Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 323. On Nov. 12, Molotov had sent Stalin a brief cable after his first meeting with Ribbentrop, a two-hour-plus affair. Stalin replied with a correction of one of Molotov’s formulations. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 366–7 (AVPRF, f. 59, op. 1, p. 338, d. 2314, l. 5–6, 7–9).

269. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 384 (AVPRF, f. 059, op. 1, p. 338, d. 2314, l. 36). Molotov’s talks with Göring: Naumov, 1941 god, I: 370–3 (APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 84–92). Ribbentrop and Himmler were present when Göring received Molotov.

270. Eberle and Uhl, Hitler Book, 36–7.

271. Ullrich, Hitler: Ascent, 386. “I was expecting a thundering Jove in his castle and what I got was a simple, gentle, possibly shy man in his country home,” French ambassador Coulondre wrote of Hitler. “I had heard the rough, screaming, threatening, and demanding voice of the Führer on the radio. Now I became acquainted with a Hitler who had a warm, calm, friendly and understanding voice. Which one is the true Hitler? Or are they both true?”

272. In response to Molotov’s cable after the first meeting with Ribbentrop, Vyshinsky had called the Berlin embassy to read a message for Molotov correcting him—eliciting a Molotov apology—for having implied that the 1939 Pact had ceased to be in force [“ischerpan”]. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 367 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, p. 339. D. 2315, l. 16–7).

273. Schmidt, Hitler’s Interpreter, 217.

274. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, VIII: 417–8 (Nov. 14, 1940).

275. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 234–47; Naumov, 1941 god, I: 375–83 (APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 49–57); DGFP, series D, XI: 550–62. Berezkhov writes: “Perhaps more important—and Molotov informed Stalin about this—Hitler was prepared to meet him face-to-face.” Berezkhov, At Stalin's Side, 48.

276. Schmidt, Hitler's Interpreter, 219; Time, Nov. 20, 1940; TASS (Nov. 13, 1940), printed in Izvestiia, Nov. 14, 1940, and reprinted in Naumov, 1941 god, I: 392–3.

277. Waddington, “Ribbentrop and the Soviet Union,” 21–2.

278. DGFP, series D, XI: 533–41; Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 247–54.

279. Berezkhov, S diplomaticheskoi missiei, 48; Berezkhov, At Stalin's Side, 44–9. The line does not appear in the official record made by Pavlov: Naumov, 1941 god, I: 385–92 (APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 68–83, 92–3). British air raids deliberately coincided with Molotov's visit to Berlin. Churchill, Second World War, II: 586. “How did he put up with you telling him all this?” Molotov recalled Stalin asking of his dealings with Hitler. Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 17.

280. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 394 (AVPRF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 339, d. 2315, l. 38–9), 393–4 (pap. 33, d. 2314, l. 41–4).

281. Pravda, Nov. 15, 1940; Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, III: 476–7.

282. Pravda, Nov. 13, 14, 15, and 16, 1939. See also Werth, Russia at War, 106–9.

283. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 384–5 (Politisches Archiv des Auswärtiges Amtes. Bonn, Bestand Dienststelle Ribbentrop, R 27168, bl. 25933, 25934, 25940); Lota, “Alta” protiv “Barbarossy,” 235.

284. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 508 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 3, l. 6–7; Jan. 4, 1941); Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 125.

285. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 398 (AVPRF, f. 82, op. 23, p. 95, d. 6, l. 141–2).

286. Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 324. Hitler's interpreter would note that “just as the march into Prague on March 15, 1939, signified the decisive turn in the break with the West, so the outbreak of the fateful clash with the East . . . had its prelude in the November 1940 encounter between Hitler and Molotov in Berlin.” Schmidt, Statist, 515; Schmidt, Hitler's Interpreter, 209.

287. The 1982 recollections of Yakov Chadayev have Molotov reporting on his Berlin trip at a meeting of the politburo on Nov. 14—but Molotov had not yet arrived back in Moscow. Chadayev's recollections, moreover, have Stalin understanding at this point that the Pact had become worthless, a conclusion that does not comport in the least with Stalin's actions. Kumanev, Riadam so Stalinym, 399–406 (Chadayev); Sipols, Tainy, 274–5. Molotov first appears again in Stalin's office logbook on Nov. 18, alone, for a mere thirty minutes. Na prieme, 317–8.

288. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 395–6 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, p. 326, d. 2239, l. 113–4). Molotov also denied any agreement had been signed in Berlin.

289. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 76 (citing AMVnR, p. 42, op. 1sh, pop. 315, l. 34; Stamenov, Nov. 16, 1940).

290. News Chronicle, Nov. 16, 1940; The Times, Nov. 18, 1940; Hanak, “Sir Stafford Cripps,” 67n3; Gorodetsky, Mission to Moscow, 83.

291. Simonov, “Zametki k biografii G. K. Zhukova,” 49. See also Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/1: 64, 67.

292. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 357–8.

293. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 77–8, citing DGFP, XI: 606–10, 652n2 (Nov. 19, 1940), 653–4 (Nov. 18); Filov, Dnevnik, 199.

294. Bartlett, “Embodiment of Myth”; Bartlett, Wagner and Russia, 227, 259–57, 271–2, 288–9. “Even now I can still hear the bewilderment with which Sergei Mikhailovich responded to my telephone call when, without any diplomatic ‘approaches,’ I asked him to stage Wagner's ‘Walküre’ at the Bolshoi Theatre,” recalled the head of the Bolshoi (Samuil Samosud). “Wagner!?” Eisenstein told him. “But I've never put on any opera before . . . let alone Wagner.” Iurenev, Eizenshtein v vospominaniakh sovremennikov, 310; Eizenshtein, “Tvorcheskaiia vstrecha s Vagnerom,” 8. During the Wagner rehearsals, in Oct. 1940, Eisenstein had been appointed director of Mosfilm, the country's leading studio.

295. It would, however, enjoy a mere six performances. For contrasting assessments, see Kuznetsov, “‘Val'kirii’ Vagnera v Bol'shom Teatre SSSR,” 76–9; and Iurenev, Eizenshtein v vospominaniakh sovremennikov, 311 (Sergei Prokofyev).

296. Eizenshtein, “Pered prem'eroi ‘Val'kirii,’” 3.3. On Wagner, see also “Voploshchenie mifa” [Oct. 1940], in Eizenshtein, Izbrannye proizvedeniia, Iskusstvo, 1964–71, IV: 23–4.

- 297. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 80–1 (citing AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 331, d. 2272, l. 167–8; Sobolev to Molotov, Nov. 25, 1940).
- 298. Na prieme, 319.
- 299. Dallin and Firsov, Dimitrov and Stalin, 126–34.
- 300. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 136; Lebedeva and Narinskii, Komintern i vtoraja mirovaia voina, 454; Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 81–2 (citing AMVnR, PREII/i/3 pap. 1, op. 2sh, pop. 1, l. 19: anonymous pamphlet, Nov. 27, 1940).
- 301. DVP SSSR, XXXIII/ii: 135–7.
- 302. Berezhkov, At Stalin's Side, 50–1.
- 303. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 415–8 (APRE, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 108–14); Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 217–59; DGFP, XI: 714–5, 1124–5; DVP SSSR, XXIII/ii: 136–7 (APRE, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 108–16); McMurry, Deutschland und die Sowjetunion, 296; Degras, Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, III: 477–8.
- 304. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 79–81 (citing AMVnR, d. 40, p. 34, op. 1sh, pop. 272, l. 246, 248; Stamenov, Nov. 26, 1940; l. 246: AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 331, d. 2272, l. 167–8; Sobolev to Molotov, Nov. 25, 1940).
- 305. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 139. “Consul General in Prague Kulikov came to see me,” Dimitrov also wrote in his diary (Nov. 27). “The Baťa, Škoda, and other plants are working at full capacity for the German army. In the environs of Prague an enormous aviation factory is being built, which is to produce up to a thousand aircraft a month.” Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 138.
- 306. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 342.
- 307. Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 669–71 (Nov. 1, 1940); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 157–9.
- 308. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 69–72.
- 309. Engel, Heeresadjutant bei Hitler, 91 (Nov. 15, 1940), 89–90 (Nov. 4, 1940).
- 310. Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, III: 442.
- 311. Engel, Heeresadjutant bei Hitler, 91 (November 15, 1940).
- 312. Fabry, Die Sowjetunion und das Dritte Reich, 243.
- 313. For Göring’s objections to an attack on the Soviet Union (at least in Nov. 1940) on economic grounds, see Irving, Hitler’s War, 181–2; Irving, Göring, 307–9. “The Führer is still inclined towards a showdown with Russia. The Commander in Chief, Navy, recommends postponing this until after victory over Britain, since demands on German forces would be too great, and an end to hostilities could not be foreseen.” Fuehrer Conferences, 1940, II: 41 (Nov. 14, 1940). “There are serious doubts as to the advisability of operation ‘Barbarossa’ before the overthrow of Britain” [the Navy’s responsibility]. Fuehrer Conferences, II: 70–1 (Dec. 27, 1940).
- 314. Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 691–3 (Nov. 16, 1940); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 182–3. Similar sentiments remained in the foreign ministry (Weizsäcker noted to himself on Nov. 28, “War against Russia is impossible as long as we are busy with England, and afterward it will be unnecessary”). Hill, Die Weizsäcker-Papiere, 227. See also ibid., 226 (Nov. 17, 1940).
- 315. Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 184–8 (Nov. 18, 1940).
- 316. DGFP, series D, XI: 606–10 (Nov. 19, 1940), 63–43 (Nov. 20). Ciano would observe that “I will immediately state that after Molotov’s visit we speak very little of Russia, and in a somewhat different tone than that used by Ribbentrop during my recent visit. . . . Russia is once again a country not to be trusted.” Van Crefeld, Hitler’s Strategy, 213n74 (citing Ciano, L’Europa verso la catastrofe, 616).
- 317. Schramm, Kriegstagebuch der Oberkommando, I: 179.
- 318. DGFP, series D, XI: 632–6 (Nov. 26, 1940).
- 319. Van Crefeld, Hitler’s Strategy, 82. Martin Bormann would later state that, in Feb. 1945, Hitler had told him, “my decision was made immediately after the departure of Molotov . . . I decided . . . to settle accounts with the Russians.” Trevor-Roper, Le Testament politique de Hitler, 95–6.
- 320. The Soviet Union’s modern technology was highly concentrated in just a few sectors. The railways remained steam-powered, not incorporating electricity on a mass scale, and the construction industry still used bricks and timber, not reinforced concrete. Above all, Soviet factories had far more workers, and lower productivity per worker, than their American or German prototypes, suffering from gigantomania and the lack of legal market mechanisms. The Soviets failed to exercise their option to purchase the Ford Co.'s V-8 engine, and Soviet trucks (the GAZ model) remained relatively primitive. Lewis, "Technology and the Transformation of the Soviet Economy," 190. The number of women working outside the home between 1928 and 1940 increased from 2.8 million to 13.2 million and constituted 39 percent of the labor force in 1940. Drobizhev, Industrializatsiia i izmeneniia, 4–5. Nearly 20 million peasants had relocated to towns and industrial construction sites over the past decade.

321. Ganson, "Food Supply, Rationing and Living Standards," 70.

322. Nekrich, Pariabs, 203; Weinberg, World at Arms, 201. Stalin again was privy to the German strategy in bilateral economic negotiations, thanks to Gerhard Kegel ("X"). Naumov, 1941 god, I: 334–9 (APRE, f. 45, op. 1, d. 437, l. 1–12; Nov. 2, 1940).

323. Iakovlev, Tsel' zhizni (6th ed.), 179, 188; Berezkhov, At Stalin's Side, 75–106. See also Sobolev and Khazanov, Nemetskii sled. Goring had again interceded to get Krupp to treat contracts with the Soviet Union as equivalent to those with the German military and to accelerate a Soviet deal for six battleship turrets and 38-cm guns, giving the impression that the overall bilateral relationship could be salvaged. Von Strandmann, "Appeasement and Counter-Appeasement," 168–9 (citing HA Krupp, WA 40, B 381, October 4, 1940; WA 4, 2925, Oct. 8, 1940, Nov. 31, 1940).

324. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 374–5 (AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, p. 339, d. 2315, l. 35, 35 a, 36, 38, 39).

325. This was a far cry from Ribbentrop's statement in the Pact negotiations that Germany was "politically disinterested" in southeastern Europe. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 155–63. See also Ulam, Expansion and Coexistence, 298–9. It must be said that by 1940, some in the Nazi regime feared that the Soviets could not be contained in the role of junior partner because of their leverage in being the key repository of raw materials. Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 20–14.

326. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 252–4; DGFP, series D, XI: 562–70. Hitler appears not to have informed Ribbentrop about his intentions at this point. Ribbentrop, Memoirs, 151–2; Waddington, "Ribbentrop and the Soviet Union," 25–6.

327. "Two things became clear in the discussions: Hitler's intention to push the Soviet Union in the direction of the Persian Gulf, and his unwillingness to acknowledge any Soviet interest in Europe." Hilger and Meyer, Incomparable Allies, 324.

328. Der Prozess gegen die Hauptkriegsverbrecher, XXXIV: 469 (Hitler, Jan. 20, 1941); Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 343. In 1940, Greater Germany produced only a quarter of the oil it consumed. By mid-1941, Germany's oil resources would total 10 million tons; of these, 500,000 were produced by Germany proper, 800,000 by countries occupied by Germany, and 8.7 million tons by Germany's allies, primarily Romania.

329. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 332. Jold evidently told Wehrmacht High Command planners on Dec. 5, 1940, following a "Führer Conference": "The Führer is determined to carry through this operation in the East since the Army will never again be as strong as it is at this moment and Soviet Russia has recently given one more proof that she will always, whenever possible, stand in Germany's path." Warlimont, Inside Hitler's Headquarters, 137.

330. Ribbentrop, Memoirs, 152.

331. Trial of the Major War Criminals, X: 291, 314–5 (Ribbentrop).

332. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 80–1.

333. Nekrich, Pariabs, 229–30 (citing RGASPI, f. 77, op. 1, d. 913, l. 62, 65–6, l. 119). See also Nekrich, "Dynamism of the Past," 232–3.

334. Mueller-Hildebrand, Sukhoputnaia armia Germanii, 596 (Nov. 15, 1940). Reports of heavy German troop concentrations in Romania as of Nov. 1940 turned out to be fictitious, possibly part of a disinformation campaign. The actual stationing order was issued only on Dec. 13, 1940. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 492–4 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 9181, d. 6, l. 17–9).

335. Trial of the Major War Criminals, VII: 254 (Paulus); Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, 137. Between May 1939 and Dec. 1940, Soviet military intelligence received more than two dozen warnings from its agents of German invasion planning; during the same period, military intelligence prepared more than one dozen summaries for the top brass and political leadership (Stalin and Molotov). Lota, Sekretnyi front, 129.

336. Gor'kov, Kremli, 30–5.

337. Similarly, electricity consumption in 1932 badly missed its target—13.4 instead of 22 billion kilowatt-hours—but by 1940 was reported at 48.6 billion. Coal extraction, which had been 35.4 million tons in 1927–28, rose to a reported 140.5 million in 1940. Nove, Economic History of the USSR (1989), 183, 217; Narodnoe khoziaistvo SSSR za 70 let, 161, 163–4; Stone, Hammer and Rifle, 108–9.

338. Mass production of the famed T-34 began in June 1940, but that year the Soviet Union managed to turn out just 115 T-34s, as well as 243 KV tanks.

339. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 137 (Nov. 25, 1940).

340. Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/I: 286–96 (TsA FSK). See also Simonov, Voенno-promyshlennii kompleks SSSR, 100; Ken, Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie, 335. Conscripts' food was irregular, and bathing and laundry infrequent, to put it mildly; housing was the sorest point of all.

341. Staff who had been gathering the statistics went to prison or into unmarked graves. Katz, “Purges and Production.” See also Khlevniuk, “Economic Officials in the Great Terror,” 38–67. Problems in the Great War, such as severe shortages of artillery shells that had undermined the tsarist war effort, were common knowledge in Stalin's time. Manikovskii, Boevoe snabzhenie russkoi armii, 111; Barsukov, Russkaia artilleria, 161.

342. Sokolov, Ot voennogo k VPK, 361–78.

343. In 1940, military outlays represented more than the entire 1934 state budget. Plotnikov, Ocherki istorii biudzheta Sovetskogo gosudarstva, 260–1. The Soviet Union had 218 military factories when the defense industry commissariat was established in 1939 (versus 45 in the late 1920s). Harrison and Davies, “Soviet Military-Economic Effort,” 372, 377 (citing RGAE, f. 2097, op. 1, d. 1051, l. 17–8; Nov. 15, 1929); Simonov, Voенno-promyshlennii kompleks SSSR, 38–41. See also Werner, Military Strength of the Powers. The Soviets had also built in extra capacity for rapid switch in wartime. Davies and Harrison, “Defence Spending,” 90; Harrison, Accounting for War, 110. An earlier scholar calculated the peacetime share of Soviet military spending as 2 percent in 1928, 6 percent in 1937, and 15 percent in 1940. Bergson, Real National Income, 46; Gregory, Russian National Income, 57.

344. Bruce Menning, private communication. See Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 160 (TsA FSB, ASD P-4574, t. 1, l. 53).

345. Abelshauser, “Germany,” 138.

346. Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 271. “Stalin is afraid of Hitler—and not for nothing,” Trotsky had thundered in 1939. Other perspicacious observers, such as Hilger, also recognized that “there is not the slightest doubt that a deep fear of Hitler's Germany was the essential guide to all Soviet foreign policy in the 1930s.” But Hilger, unlike Trotsky, grasped that this fear “made the Kremlin bend every effort and strain every muscle to render the country strong politically, economically, ideologically, and militarily.” Bulleten' oppositsii, no. 79–80, Aug.–Oct. 1939, 14–6. Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 276.

CHAPTER 14. FEAR

1. Molotov continued: “Stalin, as a cold-blooded person, took this matter very seriously when discussing grand strategy.” Chuev, Sto sorok, 45–6; Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 34.

2. Weinberg, Hitler's Table Talk, 9.

3. Chuev, Sto sorok, 28–9.

4. Barros and Gregor, Double Deception, 49 (citing Liudas Dovydenas and J. Edgar Hoover: OSS Papers, RG 266 NA, file 10532: Hoover to Donovan, Jan. 27, 1942); Naumov, 1941 god, I: 455–7 (AVPRF, f. 082, op. 23, pap. 95, d. 6, l. 268–72).

5. Molotov would pass Dekanozov's Dec. 7 report to Stalin only on Dec. 24. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 440–1 (AVFRR, f. 06, op. 3 (dop.), pap. 36, d. 467, l. 1–4); “Nakanune voiny (1936–1940 g.): doklady i zapiski v TsK VKP (b),” 220–2; Voiushin and Gorlov, “Fashistskaia agressiia,” 15–6.

6. Soviet intelligence reports about Hitler's intention to seize Ukraine (“the bread-basket of Europe”) had become more or less regular from early 1939, and continued after the signing of the Pact. Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 25–6.

7. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 449 (TsA FSB: Dec. 14, 1940). Varga sent Stalin a report from his Institute of World Economics and Politics, with detailed tables of “the resources Germany is receiving from its occupied territories,” information that “might be interesting for you.” Cherkasov, MEMO, 33 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 716, l. 28: Dec. 16, 1940).

8. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 455–7; Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 20; Berezkhov, At Stalin's Side, 211–2. Pavlov, not Berezkhov, accompanied Dekanozov on the visit to Hitler. On Dec. 13, 1940, The Siberians, a children's film by Lev Kuleshov, premiered in Moscow. It featured a Buryat hunter who, on New Year's Eve, tells two boys the story of how a hunter had once helped Stalin escape from Siberian exile, and how Stalin had given him his pipe as a memento, but the hunter had died in the civil war and left the pipe to another hunter/red partisan. The two boys decide to try to track down the pipe and return it to Stalin (played by Gelovani).

9. The directive stated that it was “of decisive importance that the intention to attack should not become known.” Hubatsch, Hitlers Weisungen, 84–92; Naumov, 1941 god, I: 452–5; Butler, Grand Strategy, III/i: 540.

10. Fabry, Der Hitler-Stalin Pakt, 365–7.

11. Berghahn, Germany and the Approach of War, 191–2. “Backward Russia constituted a vulnerable yet provocative target for its European competitors,” one scholar argued. “Huge and lumbering, Russia always seemed an immense threat, but one that could be neutralized by a bold stroke aimed at one of its innumerable weak points . . . At the same time, the sharp fluctuations in Russian power, linked to the stop-and-go nature of its efforts to catch up to the West, created strong incentives for preventive war initiated by Russia's foes.” Snyder, “Russian Backwardness.”

12. Photostat: http://ww2db.com/photo.php?source=all&color=all&list=search&for eigntype=D&foreigntype_id=168. “One of the more remarkable facts in the history of the German Supreme Headquarters is that from the end of June to the beginning of December 1940 the highest-level staff of the Wehrmacht and its Supreme Commander played only a very small part in the preparations for the greatest campaign in the Second World War,” wrote Warlimont. “There was no carefully thought-out plan as a basis for action against Russia such as would have been made in the old days by the Prussian-German General Staff.” Warlimont, Inside Hitler's Headquarters, 135, 138–9. In Dec. 1940, Beria's NKVD drafted a decree to get all code and decoding departments—foreign affairs commissariat, foreign trade, defense, and fleet—moved into NKVD state security; Stalin approved. Khaustov, “Deiatel'nost' organov,” 359–60.

13. “Nakanune voiny (1940–1941 gg.),” 219; Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 498–9 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 22424, d. 4, l. 537); Naumov, 1941 god, I: 466; Lota, “Alta” protiv “Barbarossy,” 451 (facsimile). Scholars have access only to what Soviet intelligence archives themselves have published. Frederick Barbarossa, who led the third crusade through Asia Minor, drowned on June 10, 1190, a failure. His corpse was never found.

14. “A large portrait of Marx hung in the office, and in a glass case there was a bust of Lenin,” recalled Mgeladze. “The simplicity and modesty caught one's eye, and, looking around, we could not help but think that the offices of some commissars in the republic had more lavish appointments.” Stalin stood next to the long felt-covered table smoking a cigarette, which surprised Mgeladze (all the portraits had him with a pipe). In front of Stalin sat a glass of tea and a lemon, which during the discussion he squeezed into his tea. Mgeladze recalled the meeting as taking place in Jan. He also remembered the presence of Molotov, Beria, and Voznesensky, all of whom appear in the logbook for the one day that Mgeladze appears (Dec. 23, 1940). Mgeladze, Stalin, kuki a ego znal, 25–9; Na prieme, 321.

15. Shakhurin, Krylia pobedy, 186–7; Na prieme, 321. See also Patolichev, Vospominaniia, 105–7.

16. Mearsheimer, Conventional Deterrence, 46–52.

17. The 1939 field service regulations had stated: “The Red Army will be the most offensive-minded of all the attacking armies that ever existed.” Stalin had told a Central Committee plenum on Jan. 19, 1925: “Our banner remains the banner of peace. But if war breaks out, we will not be able to sit with folded arms—we will have to take action, but we will be the last to do so. And we will do so in order to throw the decisive weight into the scales.” Mel'tiukhov, almost alone, correctly has the arrows moving west on maps illustrating Soviet war plans. Mel'tiukov, Upushchennyi shans, 256–7.

18. One Soviet agent reported that France had expected a number of tactical engagements with Germany, not a surprise knockout blow with massed German forces, and that France compounded this error by forward deployment at the Belgian-German border, rendering those units unable to respond quickly to German flanking maneuvers. Roberts, "Planning for War" (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1302, l. 180, 185–6); RGVA, f. 33988. op. 4, d. 35, l. 287–292; June 3, 1940; Simonov, "Zametki k biografii G. K Zhukova," 53; Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 324. A book published in early 1940 argued that the German experience in Poland had reconfirmed that the only way to defend against a surprise attack by secretly massed, highly mobile mechanized forces was to preempt the enemy by achieving one's strategic deployment first. Krasil'nikov, "Nastupatel'naia armeiskaia operatsiya," 487–96.

19. On May 14, 1938, Yezhov sent Stalin a report laying out an analysis by the incarcerated Vasily Lavrov, who noted that in early 1937, during war games, Tukhachevsky, playing the southern attack variant of the blues (Germany, Poland, Finland, and Balts) on the Lovov-Donetsk axis, had proven that the Germans could deliver a deadly strike against Soviet military industry. The precondition for this outcome was a German occupation of Czechoslovakia (with its military industry) as well as of Romania (with its oil and food). Lavrov put together charts and maps showing the extent of the possible catastrophe. On July 29, 1938, he was executed. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 205 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 343, l. 28–48); Suvениров, Tragediia RKKA, 378. In Dec. 1937, when Stalin received "testimony" from Lavrov implicating Lieutenant General Yakov Smushkevich, the aide for aviation to the chief of the general staff, the despot wrote on it, "He lies, the swine," a rare instance in which he appears to have rejected an interrogation protocol. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 208 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 329, l. 59). See also the call by General Jan Strumis, known as Zhigur, in a denunciation of Alexander Yegorov (July 20, 1937), for reexamination of all war plans to take account of recent war games. He was arrested in Dec. and executed on July 22, 1938. RGVA, f. 33987, f. 3, op. 10, d. 1046, l. 209–29; Samuelson, Plans for Stalin's War Machine, 188; Zakharov, Generalnyi shtab, 125–33.

20. Verkhovskii, Ogon', maneuver, i maskirovka, 131.

21. Tukhachevskii, "O strategicheskikh vzglyadakh Prof. Svechina," 3–16.

22. Timoshenko had asked twenty-eight generals to sketch their views on the future war, and he chose five to report at the meeting, including Zhukov, commander of Kiev military district, on offensive operations; Ivan Tyulenev, head of Moscow military district, on defense; and Dmitri Pavlov, commander of the Western military district, on mechanized warfare. See also Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia Otechestvennaia, XII (I): 13–29 (Meretskoy), 129–51 (Zhukov); Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 99 (citing RGASPI, f. 77, op. 116, d. 97, l. 12; Zhdanov, Nov. 20, 1940).

23. Cynthia Roberts notes that Isserson was not alone. Colonel A. I. Starunin published an article in early 1941 explaining that Germany's victories had undone the theory that the initial period of war would see "armies of incursion" attempting to seize various objectives as the main forces completed mobilization in the rear. Starunin, however, blunted the force of his argument, proposing that the Red Army could attain air superiority and disrupt German rail lines to inhibit the enemy's mobilization, after proving that no such mobilization would be necessary. Starunin, "Operativnaia vnezapnost'."

24. Isserson's text, dated June–July 1940, had not taken up the German campaign in France, but had concluded with an oblique reference: "Only six months later in the West, events transpired that further showed the development of the new military art to a higher level of large-scale modern European war." Isserson, Novye formy bor'by, 28; Anfilov, Doroga k tragedii, 74; Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia Otechestvennaia, XII (I): 15 (Meretskoy), 152–4, 247–9 (Klyonov); Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/i: 56. See also Harrison, Architect of Victory, 228–34. Isserson (b. 1898) had been shown up by the Finnish War (during which he headed the staff of the Seventh Army). He would be arrested on June 7, 1941, and condemned to death, but reprieved to ten years in a camp in northern Kazakhstan.

25. As early as 1936, Soviet military analysts argued that a frontal assault-style war would not work in the East. Erickson, "Threat Identification," 396–8 (citing Krasnaia zvezda, May and June 1936).

26. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia Otechestvennaia, XII (I): 204–5 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 18, d. 57, l. 70–3). Khryunkin had led a bomber squadron that had sunk a Japanese aircraft carrier, been given China's highest military award, and went on to complete the General Staff Academy and lead an army in the Winter War. Timoshenko, in his concluding summary, which was published as a brochure for internal use, giving it the character of a general directive, acknowledged that the leaders of the air force disagreed on the best ways to employ air power and urged them to think more about achieving air supremacy. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia Otechestvennaia, XII (I): 173–82 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 18, d. 57, l. 1–24), 164–7 (d. 56, l. 85–92), 338–72 (op. 15, d. 27, l. 575–607).

27. Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia Otechestvennaia, XII (I): 339–40.
28. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 498n2 (citing APRF, f. 45, op. 1, d. 437); Lota, “Alta protiv “Barbarossy,”” 262. “I read your ‘In the steppes of Ukraine,’” the document-centric despot wrote to Korneychuk (Dec. 28, 1940). “It came out brilliantly—artistic and complete, cheery and joyous. . . . By the way: I also added some words on page 68. That was for greater clarity.” The words he inserted specified that, despite some changes, the collective farm tax would essentially stay the same. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 4674, l. 1–2; Gromov, Stalin, 223–4; Sochineniia, XVIII: 209. In the book Subversive Activity of Foreign Intelligence in the USSR, published in Dec. 1940, the author wrote that “as the main method of masking they chose hypocritical-sham ‘devotion’ to the cause of proletarian revolution and socialist construction.” Loyalty, in other words, was a sign of disloyalty. Minaev, Podryvnaia deiatel’nost’ inostrannykh razvedok v SSSR.
29. Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 111. On Dec. 27, 1940, at a meeting of the high command, Raeder once again insisted on concentrating all forces against Britain, the main enemy, and “expressed the most serious doubts in the possibility of a war against Russia before England was destroyed.” Trial of the Major War Criminals, XXXIV: 714.
30. Golikov circulated this message to List no. 1. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 527 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 3, l. 6–7); Lota, “Alta protiv “Barbarossy,”” 449–50 (facsimile). In early 1941, the NKVD, military intelligence, and naval intelligence were ordered to submit their reports to the ambassador, who would coordinate them and inhibit rivalries. Neither the coordination nor the tamping down of rivalries happened.
31. SD chief of counterintelligence Schellenberger was not officially informed of Barbarossa until late Jan. 1941. Senior German field commanders would only be told that the deployments were a precaution against Soviet massing of forces. Both the high command and the foreign ministry would issue documents with false information. Hitler would oversee three major war conferences between Jan. and March 1941, the first two in Berchtesgaden, the third in Berlin. Warlimont, who had had a hand in drawing up Barbarossa, claims that on Jan. 18, at the Berchtesgaden, he had to ask General Jodl, the principal military adviser in Hitler’s entourage, whether Barbarossa was even still on. Jodl replied affirmatively, adding, “The Russian colossus will prove to be a pig’s bladder; prick it and it will burst.” Warlimont, Inside Hitler’s Headquarters, 140. See also Whaley, Codeword, 133. By the March 30 conference, 250 commanders were in the know. The Wehrmacht had 320,000 officers, including at least 3,000 generals.
32. Lota, “Alta protiv “Barbarossy,”” 275–6; Lota, Sekretnyi front, 42. Tupikov arrived in Berlin on Jan. 8. His appointment reflected the recent report out of Berlin on Dec. 29 (and its follow-up on Jan. 4) about a supersecret war directive against the Soviet Union signed by Hitler. Before Tupikov, Maxim Purkayev (“Marble”), a village-born (1894) ethnic Mordvin on his first assignment abroad, had been in over his head, a circumstance Hitler himself had noticed at their initial meeting (Sept. 1939). On Feb. 14, 1940, German military counterintelligence had made an effort to compromise Purkayev to get him to work for them. He was replaced in Berlin by his deputy for aviation, Skorniyakov, until Tupikov’s arrival. Lota, “Alta protiv “Barbarossy,”” 210–25; Na prieme, 292–3.
33. Sipols, Tainy, 395.
34. Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 1–9; Erickson, “Threat Identification,” 375–423. The immediate pre-Pact war plan, drawn up by Shaposhnikov in March 1938 and approved in Nov. of that year, had assumed a combined German-Polish assault, with Minsk-Smolensk-Moscow as the main axis, although a variant assumed a less likely thrust farther south, toward Kiev. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 557–71; Zakharov, General’nyi Shtab, 1.
35. An Aug. 1940 revised war plan under Shaposhnikov’s supervision, authored by Vasilevsky, who had become deputy chief of the operations department in April 1940, had anticipated that a German attack would most likely come north of the Pripet. It did not rule out enemy targeting of Ukraine (the southern axis), but proposed concentrating 70 percent of the 237 Red Army divisions on the Western frontiers north of the Pripet. Shaposhnikov dutifully wrote of “inflicting defeat on German forces” on their own soil (East Prussia and the Warsaw region), yet indicated that the Red Army would not finish mobilization until thirty days in. He implied that only surpassing intelligence on Germany and prewar covert Soviet mobilization could enable the Red Army to halt a deep German penetration that would preempt any Soviet counterattack and push the fighting entirely onto Soviet territory. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 181–93; Mikhalev, Voennaia strategii, 309–11; Alt, “Die Wehrmacht im Kalkül Stalins,” 107–9. Shaposhnikov was removed before the plan was approved; an update (again authored by Vasilevsky) was submitted by Timoshenko and Meretskov on Sept. 18, 1940. Stalin evidently rejected their supposition, carried over from the previous plan, that the main German thrust would be north of the Pripet, insisting instead that the main German strike would occur to the south, because “Ukrainian grain and Donbass coal have special importance for the Germans.” Stalin had the politburo approve this plan on Oct. 14, 1940. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 236–53; Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/1: 132–5 (citing TsAMO, f. 16, op. 2951, d. 242, l. 84–90); Roberts, “Planning for War,” 1315–6 (citing TsAMO, f. 16, op. 2951, d. 239, l. 197–244); excerpts published in Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1992, no. 1: 24–8; Vasilevskii, Delo vsei zhizni, 102–5. Zakharov unpersuasively attempts to blame Meretskov and not Stalin for the shift toward the southern axis. Zakharov, General'nyi shtab, 219–25. Vasilevsky would recall that Georgy Anisimov had twice in 1940 brought the top secret operational plan (in its only copy) to the Little Corner for discussion. Both times, according to Vasilevsky, the plan was returned without any markings, changes, or an official stamp. The staff officers of the Leningrad, Baltic, Western, and Kiev military districts in the second half of 1940 and first half of 1941 were summoned to Moscow to work on the detailed operational plans for their theaters. Murin, “Nakanune,” 8–9 (memoirs of Vasilevsky).

36. Roberts, “Planning for War,” 1313–4 (citing RGVA, f. 37977, op. 5, d. 563, 564, 565, 568, 569, 570, 577); Bobylev, “Repetitsiia katastrofy”; Bobylev, “K kakoi voine gotovilsia General'nyi shtab RKKA.”; Bobylev, “Tochky v diskussii stavit’ rano.”; Menning, “Soviet Strategy,” I: 224–5.

37. Zhukov was named chief of staff on Jan. 14, 1941. The day before, Stalin and the Main Military Council heard the results of the war games. Meretskov gave the main report, but the date had been moved up a day and the written materials had not been finished, so he extemporized, badly. Stalin rebuked him. Kulik held forth about infantry divisions of 18,000 troops supported only by horses, ignoring mechanization, which infuriated Stalin still more. Shaposhnikov, one witness recalled, “sat there gloomily, glancing from time to time at the people next to him or toward the members of the politburo.” “Nakanune voiny: iz postanovlenii vysshikh partiinykh i gosudarstvennykh organov (Mai 1940 g.—21 iunია 1941 g.),” 197–8; Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 141–5 (M. I. Kazakov), 146–51 (A. I. Eremenko). On Jan. 23 at the Bolshoi, Stalin, spotting Meretskov, said to him in front of others, “You are courageous, capable, but without principles, spineless. You want to be nice, but you should have a plan instead and adhere to it strictly, despite the fact that someone or other is going to be resentful.” Stalin also said: “Voroshilov is a fine fellow, but he is no military man.” Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 145.

38. Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 296. See also Sokolov, Georgii Zhukov, 20 (citing a 1930 assessment).

39. In 1941, Soviet counterintelligence reported that many foreign diplomats in Moscow concluded that the Nazi regime’s need for imports from the Soviet Union excluded a military confrontation. Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 256 (TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 8, d. 5, l. 169).

40. Sipols, “Torgovo-ekonomicheskie otnosheniia mezhdu SSSR,” 37.

41. Ericson, Feeding the German Eagle, 150–3, 160; Ziedler, “German-Soviet Economic Relations,” 108. Stalin also settled a border dispute in Lithuania with Germany on German terms, paying RM 31 million ($7.5 million) for the sparsely inhabited Lithuanian strip abutting East Prussia that the Red Army had unilaterally occupied. The border was formally set between the Igorka River and the Baltic Sea. DGFP, series D, XII: 560–1; Sipols, Tainy, 387; Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 608; Kaslas, “Lithuanian Strip.” See also McSherry, Stalin, Hitler, and Europe, II: 50–66; and Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, 159–63. In Feb. 1941, German paid 22 million marks in gold for cereals from now Soviet Bessarabia.

42. Halder, Halder Diaries, I: 751 (Jan. 16, 1941); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 243–6; Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 57–8 (German Naval Conference, Jan. 8, 1941); Fuehrer Conferences, 1941, I: 1–4. See also Lota, “Alta” protiv “Barbarossy,” 259 (no citation).

43. Kuznetsov, “Voenno-morskoi flot nakanune Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny,” 68; “Iz istorii Velikoi otechestvennoi voiny,” 202.

44. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 144 (Jan. 21, 1939).

45. On Feb. 14, 1941, Samokhin reported Yugoslav general staff estimates of 250 German divisions total, while specifying their locations. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 528–9 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 4, l. 65–6), 532 (l. 106–7). One scholar has argued that revolutionary states end up in war because the revolution exacerbates existing security dilemmas with neighbors, so that one side or the other comes to view offense as a form of self-defense. Walt, "Revolution and War." This was a case of two revolutionary states heightening each other's security dilemma.

46. DVP SSSR, XXIII/ii, 343–5 (AVPRE, f. 06, op. 3, p. 1, d. 4, l. 37–41). On Jan. 21, 1941, the Iron Guard in Romania rebelled against its own government, and lashed out at Jews. "The stunning thing about the Bucharest bloodbath," one observer noted, "is the quite bestial ferocity of it." Ninety-three persons were killed. Friedlander, Years of Extermination, 166.

47. Attendees, besides Zhdanov, Molotov, Beria, Voroshilov, and Kaganovich, included Mikoyan, Voznesensky, Bulganin, Pervukhin, Kosygin, and Malyshev—effectively, the economic group. Na prieme, 323.

48. Malyshev, "Dnevnik narkoma," 114 (APRF, f. 3, op. 62, d. 131, l. 2–91).

49. Malyshev, "Dnevnik narkoma," 114–5 (APRF, f. 3, op. 62, d. 131, l. 2–91).

50. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 146. "The Soviet Union," boasted a Red Army political instruction pamphlet of 1941, "has been transformed into a heavy-duty socialist great power exerting enormous influence on the entire course of international development." Airapetian, Etapy vneshnei politiki SSSR, 93.

51. "My program was to abolish the Treaty of Versailles," Hitler stated in Berlin (Jan. 31, 1941). "It is nonsense for the rest of the world to pretend that I did not reveal this program until 1933, or 1935, or 1937 . . . No human being has declared or recorded what he wanted more often than I." Prange, Hitler's Words, 216.

52. Tooze, Wages of Destruction.

53. Miller, Bankrupting the Enemy.

54. "You are expressly instructed to treat all questions concerning the United States with even more caution than hitherto," Goebbels instructed the press in 1939. "Even statements made by Mrs. Roosevelt are not to be mentioned." Friedlander, Prelude, 50.

55. Gallup polls accurately forecast the outcome, and indicated that without a war in Europe, voters would have preferred the Republican candidate, Wendell Willkie. Katz, "Public Opinion Polls." General Georg Thomas of Germany's high command received directives to prepare for a long war mere days after Roosevelt won re-election. Friedlander, Prelude, 158.

56. Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, IX: 633–44; Sweeting, "Building the Arsenal of Democracy."

57. Tooze, Wages of Destruction, 407, 410, 420. The Soviets noted that the British aviation industry had the capacity to mass produce 60,000 planes annually. Erickson, "Threat Identification," 397, 399. By 1941, some 40 percent of German steel production came from outside the Reich's 1937 borders. Murray, Change in the European Balance of Power, 13.

58. Hillgruber, Hitlers Strategie, 192–397.

59. The "peripheral" strategy in the Mediterranean was never fundamental, and never a substitute for the invasion of the Soviet Union. Leach, German Strategy, 72–3. See also Feubrer Conferences, 1941, I: 1–4.

60. Domarus, Hitler: Reden, II: 1663; Förster and Mawdsley, "Hitler and Stalin in Perspective," 65n8a: Bundesarchiv-Militärarchiv, N 664/2 (Captain Karl Wilhelm Thilo diary).

61. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 169 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 1, d. 3, l. 14). See also Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 112–3.

62. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 181.

63. An excerpted summary report of NKGB foreign intelligence for 1939 through April 1941 appears in Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 130–2 (TsA FSK).

64. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 278 (f. 3, op. 7, d. 1732, l. 156). The Soviets had the Italian cipher codes since 1936. Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 276.

65. Murphy, What Stalin Knew, 102 (no citation); Naylor, Man and an Institution; Cairncross, Enigma Spy, 85–93. On Stalin's knowledge of the German inability to mount "Sea Lion," see Vishlev, Nakanune, 37 (citing Spravka KGB SSSR, 219); and Chuev, Sto sorok, 32.

66. West and Tsarev, Crown Jewels, 214. As Andrew observes, their recruiter, Arnold Deutsch, offered a siren call of liberation that had both sexual and political appeal: "Burgess and Blunt were gay and Maclean bisexual at a time when homosexual relations, even between consenting adults, were illegal. Cairncross, like Philby a committed heterosexual, later wrote a history of polygamy.” Andrew, Defence of the Realm, 35. See also Knightley, Master Spy, 35. In 1940, Krivitsky, the Soviet defector, was invited in by Jane Archer of MI5 and claimed there were sixty-one Soviet agents in Britain, and gave descriptions that fitted Philby and Maclean, but his revelations were not followed up. Blunt gave Gorsky a secret copy of Krivitsky’s debriefing in Jan. 1941. Krivitsky died in mysterious circumstances in a Washington, D.C., hotel on Feb. 9, 1941. Kern, Death in Washington, 264–5; Costello, Mask of Treachery, 351; West and Tsarev, Crown Jewels, 145 (quoting KGB archives, without citation). John King, the cipher clerk in the foreign office, had been exposed as a Soviet spy in fall 1939.

67. Borovik, Philby Files, 167 (quoting KGB archives, without citation). German disinformation (about not attacking the USSR until after Britain’s fall) appears to have started early. Pavlov, “Sovetskaia voennaia razvedka,” 54 (no citation), Jan. 16, 1941.

68. Voskresenskaia, Pod psevdonimom Irina, 48–9.

69. Korotkov was evidently recommended to move up from the maintenance department by Venyamin Gerson, Yagoda’s personal secretary, who had met him in the exercise room at the Dynamo sports club. In 1939 Korotkov was discharged for ties to Gerson, among others, but he fought back and got reinstated. For a time he was returned to Moscow over fears that his cover had been blown. He handled Lehman as well as Schulze-Boysen and Harnack. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 491; Pavlov, Tragediia sovetskoi razvedki, 364; Gladkov, Korotkov. Korotkov might have been involved in assassinations abroad. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 48. The NKVD foreign department had 81 people; in 1940, 225. But central Soviet intelligence lost most of its Latvians, Poles, Jews, and other nationalities, who were replaced in almost every instance by Russians and Russified Ukrainians, with the usual notation “from the peasantry,” “from workers,” but often without foreign languages. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 24; Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 156–7.

70. “If Zakhar [Kobulov] is ever mentioned Sudoplatov and Zhuravlyov simply wave their hands,” read a note in Kobulov’s personnel file. Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 441n30 (TsA SVR, delo “Zakhar,” no. 15952, t. 1., 141); Izvestiia, May 5, 1990.

71. Pavlov, Tragediia Sovetskoi razvedki, 353.

72. Höhne, Kennwort; Primakov, Ocherki, III: 414–32; Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 77–80. Another member of the Soviet spy circle was Martha Dodd, daughter of the U.S. ambassador in Berlin.

73. Lehmann, head of Gestapo counterintelligence for Soviet espionage, was said to have transmitted to his Soviet handler the contents of a report by Himmler (June 10, 1941) that revealed that the Germans did not know the depth and breadth of Soviet spying. This report has not been published. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 340. Hitler supposedly intuited that Soviet intelligence services were “much more thorough and probably much more successful” than those of other states, such as the British. Walter Schellenberg, Labyrinth, 321.

74. The British also noted that Russian speakers were being recruited into the German army and Russian émigrés into German intelligence units. Hinsley, “British Intelligence and Barbarossa,” 52.

75. Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 593–601; Ivanov, Nachal’nyi period voiny, 191–96, 206, 209–13. In 1938, Goebbels’s wife, Magda, kicked up a fuss about his affair with the Czech actress Lida Baarova, and Hitler told Goebbels he would have to choose loyalty to the cause over his mistress. Hitler esteemed Goebbels’s propaganda wizardry, but not his political advice—a sore point for Goebbels, but also a spur for him to prove himself to the Führer. Hitler encouraged the rivalry between Goebbels and Ribbentrop. Longerich, Goebbels.

76. Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, I: 437–8, 446–7.

77. Kuznetsov, Nakanune, 288; Tippelskirch, Geschichte des Zweiten Weltkriegs, 165; Vishlev, Nakanune, 38–40. The Soviets considered as possible the deployment of German troops to Turkey, Iraq, Iran, and a strike at the USSR from the south. Meretskov, Na sluzhbe, 207; Shtemenko, General’nyi shtab, 20. On May 9, TASS denied foreign news reports that the Soviet fleet was being fortified on the Black and Caspian Seas.

78. Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gitlera, 15.

79. Guderian, brought into confidence already in Nov. 1940, shortly after Molotov’s visit to Berlin, would recall surmising that the plan, which he deemed militarily inappropriate, could only be part of a bluff. Guderian, Panzer

Leader, 142.

80. Sipols, Tainy, 393–4. Fitin, commenting on yet another report from Philby about a possible German attack, would write: “German planes are daily bombing London and other cities of Great Britain. Is a German invasion of the Soviet Union possible in these conditions or have England’s secret services deliberately chosen to deceive Moscow through Philby?” Antonov, “Na pol’skom napravlenii.”

81. The German High Command spelled out the disinformation themes in directives of Feb. 15, 1941, and May 12, 1941. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 661–4 (Deutsches Militärarchiv, Potsdam, W. 31.00/5, Bl. 114–7); II: 195–6 (Bl. 256–7); Whaley, Codeword, 247–51. See also Ribbentrop, Memoirs, 152–3.

82. Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 313–16, 342–3, 367, 377. See also Zakharov, Nakanune velikikh ispytani, originally a limited circulation secret work, reprinted in Zakharov, General’nyi shtab, 420. “Recalling how we military men made demands of industry in the last months before the war,” Zhukov would admit, “I see that at times we did not take into account all the real economic possibilities of the country.” He would further note that in Feb. 1941, General Pavlov (head of the Western military district) sent a report to Stalin requesting many defense actions and that Timoshenko was told by Stalin that “notwithstanding the justice of his [Pavlov’s] demands we do not have the possibility today to satisfy his ‘fantastical’ suggestions.” Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 331–2.

83. Shakhurin, Krylia pobedy, 98–100.

84. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 149 (Feb. 20, 1941). Stalin had dressed down Golikov’s predecessor, Proskurov, exactly the same way, warning that a spy “should not believe in anyone.” Rzhnevskii and Vehviläinen, Zimnaia voina, II: 206. German counterintelligence was well aware of the tensions between Soviet civilian and military intelligence. Schellenberg, Labyrinth, 143–4. The 18th party conference also sought to impart renewed impetus to the publishing of Stalin’s Collected Works. Maksimenkov, Bol’shaia tsenzura, 526 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 905, l. 18–9; Mitin, Feb. 20, 1941).

85. Varga would recall Shcherbakov as “one of the worst representatives of the uncurbed bureaucracy.” Varga, “Vskryt’ cherez 25 let,” 157.

86. Beria was named a deputy chairman of the Council of People’s Commissars, with oversight for the NKVD, NKGB, and the commissariats of timber, nonferrous metals, oil, and river fleet. Merkulov’s new first deputy was Ivan Serov; another deputy was M. V. Gribov (for personnel). Fitin headed the new NKGB First Directorate (foreign intelligence), and Fedotov headed the Second (counterintelligence). The guards department (Vlasik) fell under the NKGB. Beria’s new first deputy at the NKVD was Sergei Kruglov; other deputies were Abakumov, Chernyshov, Maslennikov, and B. P. Obruchnikov. The NKVD retained control of the border guards and the Gulag.

87. According to Sándor Radó (“Dora”), a Hungarian Communist and Soviet military intelligence officer in Geneva who posed as the owner of a cartographic enterprise and led an intelligence network encompassing 97 agents, the Swiss general staff estimated the number of German divisions in the East at an astonishing 150. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 676 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24122, d. 1, l. 49). See also Radó, Pod pseudonim “Dora.”

88. The document is only excerpted, and in the form presented shows Soviet military intelligence in a very good light. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 683 (TsAMO, op. 7279, d. 4, l. 30–1); Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 536–7. Stöbe (“Alta”) handed “Aryan” 30,000 German marks. She evidently disliked the aristocratic “Aryan,” because of his laments over his still unrealized grandiose diplomatic career and his thirst for money (she lived exceedingly frugally). “Aryan” informed “Alta” that he would also supply information to the British and the French. Around this time, she became ill and requested re-posting to a German spa town to undergo treatment; her request was denied (she was too valuable in Berlin). But as of Jan. 1941, she had lost her plum job in the German foreign ministry (press bureau), though she kept her six agents there. Lota, “Alta” protiv “Barbarossy,” 277–9, 305 (no citation).

89. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 704 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 4, l. 160–1).

90. Welkisch had joined the German Communist party in 1930, worked at the Breslauer Zeitung from 1934, and been recruited into Soviet military intelligence by Herrnstadt in Warsaw. He married Margarita Welkisch, a photographer, in 1937; she had already been recruited into Soviet military intelligence by Herrnstadt.

91. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 706–8 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 1, l. 296–303). The Geneva Convention legally allowed military attachés to gather information about the armed forces of the country in which they were accredited.

Many other Soviet military attachés also served as military intelligence representatives, such as Major General Ivan Susloparov (“Maro”) in Paris, Nikolai Nikitushev (“Akasto”) in Stockholm, and I. A. Sklyarov (“Brion”) in London. Their reports are omitted here.

92. Iampol’skii et al., Organy, I/i: viii. “Annihilating his own intelligence apparatus, Stalin cut down a bough, on which he sat, and became a victim of the disinformation of German intelligence,” Golikov’s deputy later wrote. Novobranets, “Nakanune voiny,” 171.

93. Vishlev, “Pochemu zhe,” 70–2; Warlimont, Im Hauptquartier der deutschen Wehrmacht, 164;

94. Between Feb. and June 1941, the Soviets fed disinformation to Ivar Lissner, a Baltic German journalist, in Harbin, Manchuria, which purported to be from Russian consulates and embassies, and were designed to impress upon the Germans the costs of deeper involvement in the Balkans. Barros and Gregor, Double Deception, 52–60.

95. Iampol’skii et al., Organy, I/i: 44–5 (TsA FSK); Primakov, Ocherki, III: 472 (TsA FSB).

96. Golikov requested clarification from “Sophocles.” Gavrilov, Voennana razvedka informiruet, 548 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 4, l. 199); “Nakanune voiny (1940–1941 gg.),” at 219. On March 9, “Corsican,” who had seen the German air reconnaissance photos of the USSR, including of Kronstadt, conveyed that he had been told the “military attack on the USSR is an already decided issue.” Bondarenko, Fitin, 195–6 (citing FSB archives). On March 11, “Ramsay” reported out of Tokyo that Germany was still urging Japan to attack British Singapore. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 563–4 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 195–6); Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 113 (March 10, 1941), 114–5 (March 15).

97. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 564–5 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 1, l. 394–5). On March 26, 1941, “Yeshenko” reported that “a German attack against Ukraine will occur in two to three months.” Lota, Sekretnyi front, 40.

98. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 770.

99. Halder, Halder Diaries, II: 91 (April 30, 1941); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 386–8. On April 2, 1941, Hitler informed Rosenberg of the coming invasion, without specifying the date; Rosenberg immediately formed an office that would become the Ministry for the East.

100. Lota, “Alta” protiv “Barbarossy,” 303 (no citation); Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 577 (no archival citation). At the end of March 1941, Germany had about forty divisions on the frontier. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 515.

101. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1304, l. 150–1.

102. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 346. Evidently, complaints against Molotov were reaching Stalin, many a result of Beria intrigues.

103. Friedlander, Prelude, 199.

104. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 607–40, 641–50. See also Zakharov, General’nyi shtab, 226–30. The Red Army had been expanded by creating new divisions, which, by design, were partially manned, rather than by filling out the many existing partially manned divisions. After the onset of a war, all divisions were to be brought to full strength by summoning 5,000 or so reservists for each. But this approach, which had failed under the tsars, did not foresee the constraints that would prevent reservists from reaching their assigned units in time, did not foster unit cohesion in the meantime, and increased the number of required experienced officers, who were in insufficient supply. Reese, Stalin’s Reluctant Soldiers, 36–9.

105. Mawdsley, “Crossing the Rubicon,” 822–3, 831, 863. This was the southern variant of the approved fall 1940 war plan.

106. V. N. Kiselev, “Upriamye fakty nachala voiny,” 18–22; Iampol’skii et al., Organy, I/i: 50–2 (excerpted); Gor’kov, “Gotovil li,” 35; Gor’kov, Kreml’, 61. The plan has not been published in full. See also Vasilevskii, Delo vsei zhizni (6th ed.), Politizdat, 112. See also Gareev, Neodnoznachnye stranitsy, 93, 99.

107. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 731–2 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 273, l. 27–8; March 8, 1941); “Nakanune voiny (1941 g.),” 198; April 26, 1941; Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 307; Gor’kov and Semin, “O kharaktere voenno-operativnykh planov,” 109; Na prieme, 328.

108. MP-41 specified two kinds of mobilization, regular or open and “hidden” under the guise of training. “Mobilization is war, and we cannot understand it in any other way,” Shaposhnikov had written in the 1920s.

Shaposhnikov, Vospominaniia, 558. “There were reasons enough to try to delay the USSR’s entry into the war, and Stalin’s tough line not to permit what Germany might be able to use as a pretext for unleashing war was justified by the historic interests of the socialist motherland,” Vasilevsky would state. “His guilt consists in not seeing, in not catching, the limit beyond which such a policy became not only unnecessary but also dangerous.” Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/ii: 242.

109. Lota, Sekretnyi front, 129.

110. Jervis, “Strategic Intelligence and Effective Policy,” 165–81.

111. Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/i: 125–48. This would be Khrushchev’s self-defense in the secret speech.

112. TsAMO, f. 23, op. 7272, d. 1, l. 693–793 (March 15, 1941); Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 591–6 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 7277, d. 1, l. 140–52); Lota, “Alta protiv ‘Barbarossy’,” 285–93. According to a top defector’s memoir, Tupikov came to the conclusion that about 180 German divisions were being concentrated on the frontier, but Dekanozov dismissed “it airily as a figment of someone’s imagination.” Akhmedov, In and Out of Stalin’s GRU, 145. In fact, Dekanozov reported to Moscow (March 16), 1941: “every day trains are heading east with weaponry (equipment, shells, vehicles and construction materials).” “Kanun voiny: preduprezhdeniia diplomatov,” 71.

113. Golikov noted that the main German thrust would supposedly not be for Moscow but Kiev and the riches of Ukraine. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 776–80 (TsAMO, op. 14750, d. 1, l. 12–21); Pavlov, “Sovetskaia voennaia razvedka,” 56; Sipols, Tainy, 395.

114. One account claims Golikov met with the despot only twice following his appointment in July 1940. Lota, Sekretnyi front, 6, 46–7. Stalin’s office logbook lists five meetings, the last on April 11, 1941. Na prieme, 595. “It is quite true that Golikov was a misinformer—but that is not the point,” Gnedich, who delivered Golikov’s reports to Stalin, would recall. “All the ‘reliable’ parts of Golikov’s regular reports appeared in one form or another in the official press. Stalin, however, on principle, was interested in anything deemed by Golikov as ‘doubtful.’” Erickson, “Threat Identification,” 377 (citing a photostatic copy of the transcript of the discussion in the Institute of Marxism-Leninism, 1966, with Gnedich’s reminiscences); Petrov, “June 22, 1941,” 257; “Sovetskie organy gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti v gody Velikoi otechestvennoi voiny,” 27. In 1965, the historian Viktor Anfilov asked Golikov in the archives about his March 20, 1941, report. Golikov responded: “Did you know Stalin?” Anfilov: “I saw him up on the mausoleum when I stood in the parade columns.” Golikov: “Well, I was subordinated to him, I reported to him and was afraid of him. He had formed the opinion that as long as Germany had not finished its war with England it would not attack us. Knowing his character, we constructed our conclusions to conform to his point of view.” Anfilov, Doroga k tragedii, 193; Naumov, 1941 god, I: 42–3. According to Novobranets, Golikov issued imprecise orders; then later, if something went wrong, he would say, “I did not give such a directive,” or “You misunderstood me.” “We did not respect him.” Novobranets, “Nakanune voiny,” 172.

115. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 776–80 (TsAMO, op. 14750, d. 1, l. 12–21; March 20, 1941); Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 568–71; Lota, Sekretnyi front, 178–84 (citing TsAMO, op. 14750, d. 1, l. 12–21). “ABC” reported (March 26, 1941) that he had spoken with an adviser in the German embassy in Romania, who claimed Mihai “Antonescu told me that his grandfather—the head of state, [Ion] Antonescu—already in January had a meeting with Hitler supposedly devoted by Hitler himself to plans for a war between Germany and the USSR, and that a detailed conversation about this subject also took place during a meeting between Antonescu and Göring in Vienna.” Mihai considered the month of May to be “critical.” Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 573–4 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 1, l. 468–9).

116. Iampol’skii et al., Organizatsiia, II/i: 61–2 (TsA FSK); “Iz istorii Velikoi otechestvennoi voiny,” 207. Also on March 24, “Yeshenko” reported further information from “ABC” about a meeting in Vienna where Göring supposedly told Antonescu to coordinate mobilization of the Romanian army with the German army. Naumov, 1941 god, 788–9 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 1, l. 452–5). That same day Stalin received Japanese foreign minister Matsuoaka (791–3: APRE, f. 45, op. 1, pap. 404, l. 83–8), and Vysheinsky received Schulenburg (793–6: AVP, f. 07, op. 2, pap. 9, d. 22, l. 44–7).

117. Berezkhov, S diplomaticheskoi misiei, 79.

118. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 804 (AVFRE, f. 082, op. 24, pap. 106, d. 8, l. 307). According to a Moscow NKGB summary of a report from Berlin sent by Kobulov on April 2, 1941, “Elder” met with “Corsican,” telling him “about the complete preparation and working out of a plan for an attack on the Soviet Union by his agency.” “Elder” was conveyed numerous details of German targets, German discussions concerning the involvement of Romania and Finland, and the opinion of German air ministry officers that an attack would take place. “Elder” himself is not completely sure that the action will take place.” Kobulov’s report also included conversations with “Lycée-ist.” Naumov, 1941 god, 13–5 (TsA SVR, d. 23078, t. 1, l. 236–41). On March 31, the NKGB reported that “from December 1940 to the present time the movement of German troops to our borders has strengthened.” “Nakanune voiny (1940–1941 gg.),” 208.

119. Sergeienko, Simetskieskii kauchuk; Lewis, “Innovation in the USSR”; Sutton, Western Technology, II: vii.

120. The upshot would be a commissariat for rubber. Patolichev, Isptytanie na zrelost, 84–5; Na prieme, 329. Patolichev had studied at a rabfak, and in 1937 graduated from the newly established Military Academy of Chemical Defense (one of his classmates was Sorge). By Jan. 1939, still only thirty years old, he was named party boss of Yaroslavl province (replacing Shakhurin) and that year earned the Order of Lenin. In 1940, General Khrulyov introduced Patolichev to Stalin—the name clicked: Patolichev’s father, Semyon, had been a friend of Stalin’s and died in the Polish-Soviet War in 1920. The son declined Stalin’s invitation to assume leadership of the Communist Youth League. Patolichev did manage to get a protégé appointed as first secretary of the Communist Youth League in the Karelo-Finish Soviet Socialist Republic formed in March 1940—a young enthusiast by the name of Yuri Andropov (b. 1914), a graduate of the Rybinsk Water Transport School and, like his mentor in Yaroslavl, an orphan.

121. Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, I: 369–70.

122. Stafford, “SOE and British Involvement.” The Soviet role in the coup remains murky. Soviet intelligence had dispatched an NKVD operations group to Belgrade headed by Solomon Milstein and including the ace Vasily Zarubin; they arrived on March 11, 1941. Sudoplatov, Razvedka i kreml’, 136–7. German military intelligence suspected Soviet collusion with Britain in the coup. Vishlev, Nakanune, 25 (PA AA Boon: I. M. Akten betr. Abwehr allgemein, Bd. 12 [R 101997], Bl. Ohne Nummer [April 15, 1941]. Geheim. Aus vertraulicher Quelle. Betr.: Russland-Jugoslawien; betr. Balkan: Politischer Stimmungsbericht; Büro RAM, betr.: Schreiben des V.A.A. beim OKH vom 28.4.41).

123. Churchill, Second World War, III: 144. As in the case of Norway, Britain had helped embroil a neutral country in the war. Unlike Norway, Yugoslavia would be dismembered and descend into civil war. Catherwood, Balkans in World War Two, 157.

124. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 804–5 (TsAMO, op. 7237, d. 2, l. 79–81).

125. This was accompanied by an admission that Barbarossa would be delayed by up to four weeks, which might have happened anyway. DGFP, series D, XII: 372–3; Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 248. See also Dedijer, “Sur l’armistice.” Erwin Rommel, head of Germany’s Afrika Corps, independently launched a desert offensive on March 31, 1941, unaware of Hitler’s Yugoslavia directive, the pending invasion of Greece, or Barbarossa, from which his successful actions drained resources. Higgins, Hitler and Russia, 104, 108–9; Goerlitz, Paulus and Stalingrad, 30–3; Rommel, Rommel Papers, 119.

126. Germany, Hitler added, could not count on its allies: the Finns were too few, the Romanians “cowardly, corrupt, depraved.” Förster and Mawdsley, “Hitler and Stalin in Perspective,” 72–8; Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 335–8 (March 30, 1941); Warlinton, Inside Hitler’s Headquarters, 160–1.

127. Tomasevich, War and Revolution in Yugoslavia, 50–1.

128. The discussions, in which Colonel Dragutin Savić and Bozin Simić, of the air force, also took part, had begun on April 2, with Vyshinsky. On April 3, Vyshinsky denied that the Soviets had ever mentioned a political and military pact. Stalin played the role of meliorator to obtain the signing. Barros and Gregor, Double Deception, 68–9 (citing Bakhtmeteff Archive, Columbia University, Prince Regent Paul papers, box 14: Gavrilović to the foreign ministry, April 4, 1941). Soviet-Yugoslav relations dated from June 24, 1940.

129. Clissold, Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union, 121–2.

130. Gavrilov, Voenmna razvedka informiruet, 578–9 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 4, l. 279–80).

131. Lota, “Alta” protiv “Barbarossy,” 304; Gavrilov, Voenmaia razvedka informiruet, 581 (no archival citation). “Yeshenko” out of Bucharest also confirmed the pending German invasion of Yugoslavia (581–2: TsAMO, f. 23, op.

24119, d. 1, l. 521–4).

132. Clissold, Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union, 122–3. Hilger speculated: “Nothing the Russians did between 1939 and 1941 made Hitler more genuinely angry than the treaty with Yugoslavia; nothing contributed more directly to the final break.” Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 326–7.

133. Gavrilović conveyed the gist of the meetings to Cripps and the American envoy Laurence Steinhardt. Gorodetsky, Stafford Cripps in Moscow, 120 (citing FO 371 29544 N1401/1392/38, Cripps’s telegram April 6, cabinet min. April 7); Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 149–51; FRUS, 1941, I: 302 (Steinhardt to Hull, April 6), 311.

134. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 316–20; Fel’shtinskii, SSSR-Germaniia, II: 156; Clissold, Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union, 123–4.

135. Barros and Gregor, Double Deception, 71 (citing European War 1939/9712, RG 59, NA, file 740.0011: Steinhardt to Sec. of State, no. 703, April 7, 1941; and FO/371/29544: Cripps to Foreign Office, April 6, 1941).

136. This is what Krebs reported from Moscow to Berlin. Teske, General Ernst Köstring, 296. See also Barros and Gregor, Double Deception, 75 (citing National Archives, German foreign ministry archives, microfilm T120, serial 36, frame 26013–14; Rudolf Likus, April 8, 1941; and Dept. of State Special Interrogation Mission, RG 59: interrogation of Gustav Hilger); Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 74–7 (quoting Gavrilović, no citation); and Narochnitskii, “Sovetsko-yugoslavskii dogovor.” The defensive possibilities of the mountains were mentioned in the Pravda editorial (April 6, 1941). Churchill, too, vastly overestimated the Serbs’ fighting capacity. Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, 369.

137. The NKBG operative Sudoplatov recalled: “We didn’t expect such total and rapid military defeat of Yugoslavia. We were shocked.” Sudoplatov added that Gavrilović, presumed by all and sundry to be a Soviet agent, was not fully trusted by the Soviets; he was seen to be meeting with the British every week. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 119. Parts of Yugoslavia were annexed by Italy, Bulgaria (Macedonia), Hungary (the Banat), and Germany, which set up a puppet government in Croatia. King Petar fled into exile, making his way to Britain.

138. Vishnevskii, “‘Sami peredem v napadenie,’” 105, 107–8; Nevezhin, “Sobiralsia li Stalin nastupat’,” 81; Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/i: 127–8. Samuilovich pleaded with Dimitrov (April 12) for instructions on how to characterize the German-Yugoslav war. Dimitrov approached Stalin, who allowed that it was a just war against German aggressors, but at the same time the larger “imperialist” nature of the war held. Lebedeva and Narinskii, Komintern i Vtoraiia mirovaia voina, 524–6 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 73, d. 99, l. 23).

139. Mazower, Inside Hitler’s Greece, 132–3. The Nazi invasion of Greece had been planned for April 1, but was briefly delayed because of the coup in Yugoslavia. Disastrously, Britain sent a force to rescue the Greeks in Feb. 1941: the political authorities in London were moved by what they thought Britain’s Near East military commanders desired, while the latter proffered the advice that they thought the politicians in London wanted. Britain’s Balkan commitment of 1941 would become a commitment, in 1945, to defend Greece, while in parallel Britain would abandon Poland, the country for which it had gone to war in the first place. Lawlor, Churchill and the Politics of War, 165–256, 259.

140. Van Crevel, Hitler’s Strategy. On the limited, essentially defensive nature of German aims in Greece, see also Schramm-von Thadden, Griechenland, 143–4. Göring was among those who wanted to finish off Britain by continued bombing and or seizure of Gibraltar and the Suez. Overy, Göring, x.

141. Through most of the 1930s, German and Soviet ciphers remained essentially impregnable to British cryptanalysts, except for what was sent using only low-grade codes (instructions during training exercises, for ex.). The German-manufactured Enigma machine was a system of electro-mechanical rotor ciphers invented by a German engineer, which had been put on the commercial market in the 1920s, but which the German military had progressively made more secure, including going from three to five wheels, making decryption very labor- and resource-consuming. But the Poles reverse-engineered and reconstituted the Enigma, passing a replica to the British. By Aug. 1939, Britain’s code and cipher school had moved to Bletchley Park, to a secluded country house some fifty miles north of London, which was where the Enigma was brought. Finally, in spring 1940, the British broke German naval Enigma communications. The decryption was called “Ultra Secret” or “Ultra.” Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, I: 53–4, 487–95; Hinsley, British Intelligence, Abridged Version, 14–5; Bertrand, Enigma. See also Winterbotham, Ultra Secret, 10–1.

142. Woodward, British Foreign Policy, I: 604; Churchill, Second World War, III: 320–1. On March 30, the JIC concluded that the Enigma evidence indicated a large-scale operation against the Soviet Union “either for intimidation or for actual attack.” Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, I: 451–2 (citing CX/JQ/S/7).

¹⁴³ Gorodetsky, “Churchill’s Warning”; Gorodetsky, Mission to Moscow, 118–9.

¹⁴⁴ “Nakanune voyny (1940–1941 gg.),” 206–7. On March 24, Cripps advised indirect disclosure to Moscow of the coming German-Soviet war via the Turkish or Chinese ambassadors to the Soviet ambassador in London, Maisky, but his proposal was not immediately acted upon.

¹⁴⁵ According to the Soviet report, Cripps also stated that if faced with possible U.S. entry into the war on Britain’s side, Germany might seek a peace deal with London involving the restoration of France, Belgium, and the Netherlands, in exchange for German capture of the USSR. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 472–3 (TsA FSB).

¹⁴⁶ Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 155–78. Soviet self-isolation was severe: whereas in 1937, Intourist, the Soviet state travel agency, had handled just 13,000 foreign passport holders who came to the USSR and in 1938, 5,000; in 1939–41 it had 3,000 customers, the majority of them from Germany. Dvornichenko, Nekotorye aspekty funktsionirovaniia industrii turizma, 23; Orlov and Kressova, “Inostrannyi turizm v SSSR,” 163. Zhdanov noted at a meeting at Intourist that wherever foreigners could be expected to congregate, such as hotels and restaurants, “the general course of the Central Committee is not to allow Soviet inhabitants [grazhdan] into these places.” Golubev, “Esli mir obrushitsia na nashu Respubliku,” 80 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 125, d. 11, l. 1).

¹⁴⁷ Gorodetsky, Mission to Moscow, 123 (citing FO 371 29479 N1573/78/38 Cripps to London, April 12, 1941).

¹⁴⁸ Cripps was informed by Vyshinsky on April 23 that the message had been passed to Stalin. Gorodetsky, Mission to Moscow, 124 (citing FO 371 29480 N1725/78/38 Cripps to London, April 22, 1941); Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 155–78; Churchill, Second World War, III: 316, 319–23; Woodward, British Foreign Policy, I: 606–7; Zhilin, Kak fashistskaia Germaniia gotovila napadenie, 219.

¹⁴⁹ Cripps did write that “at the moment there is no question whatever if the possibility of such a negotiated peace as far as His Majesty’s Government are concerned.” Still, his frustration-filled unauthorized memo contradicted government policy: Woodward, British Foreign Policy, I: 607–9; Gorodetsky, Mission to Moscow, 126–7 (citing FO 371 29465 N1828/3/38); Naumov, 1941 god, II: 91–6 (AVP RF, f. 07, op. 2, pap. 9, d. 20, l. 34–6); Miner, Between Churchill and Stalin, 119–22. The Soviets, by April 26, had a copy of Eden’s telegram to Cripps (sent April 17, received at the British embassy in Moscow the 18th): Primakov, Ocherki, III: 473–5 (TsA FSB, f. 3 os, op. 8, d. 56, l. 903–6). On May 5, the NKGB sent to Stalin, Molotov, and Beria the April 30, 1941, telegrams from Cripps to the foreign office (obtained in London) in which Cripps alluded to Hitler’s likely forthcoming demands on the Soviet Union.

¹⁵⁰ Gavrilo, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 416–7 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 198–9; March 11, 1941). Matsuoka’s rivals would have seen his trip as reckless grandstanding at a dangerous moment. Such a trip was facilitated by the Trans-Siberian (otherwise a trip by boat, via the Suez, would have lasted many months).

¹⁵¹ Presseisen, Germany and Japan, 291, citing International Military Tribunal, XXIX: 292–3. Hitler did not inform Japan of the timing of Barbarossa and did not consider Japan’s assistance necessary. He would learn from Ott’s reports, partly based on Sorge’s information, that Japan would not fulfill his wishes of attacking Singapore. Menzel, “German-Japanese Relations,” 57; DGFP; series D, XII: 931–2 (May 18, 1941, 967–70 (June 6).

¹⁵² Izvestiia, April 15, 1941; Tisminets, Vneshniaia politika SSSR, IV: 549–51; Chihiro, “Japanese-Soviet Neutrality Pact”; DVP SSSR, XXX/I: 403, XXX/ii: 111–2, 118. Tikhvinskii, “Zakliuchenie sovetso-kaponskogo pakta o neutralitete”; Slavinskii, Pakt o neutralitete mezhdu SSSR i Iaponiei, 91–5; Slavinskii, Japanese-Soviet Neutrality Pact. In the Sino-Soviet nonaggression pact, Moscow had promised not to sign a nonaggression pact with Japan until Sino-Japanese relations were normalized. Ledovskii et al., Rusko-kitaiskie otnosheniia, IV: 583 (AVP RF, f. 3, op. 65, d. 355, l. 42).

¹⁵³ Japan and the USSR had signed a protocol again extending the 1928 fisheries agreement on Jan. 20, 1941, through year’s end, after Japan had made concessions. Izvestiia, Jan. 21, 1941; Tisminets, Vneshniaia politika SSSR IV: 539–42.

¹⁵⁴ Matsuoka, according to information Sorge gleaned from German ambassador Ott, sent a telegram to U.S. secretary of state Hull inquiring about improved bilateral relations. He hoped the United States could be persuaded to cease its support for Chiang Kai-shek, and not be drawn into trade to assist Nazi Germany. The same Soviet intelligence report observed that the new German military attaché in Tokyo “is extremely pessimistic and expects open Japanese treachery, and asked to be released from his post.” Gavrilo, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 425 (TsAMO, f. 23, op.

5840, d. 7, l. 87). On April 22, 1941, Soviet military intelligence reported to Moscow that the chief of staff of the Kwantung Army (Takahashi) told a group of journalists that “the USSR, acknowledging the might of Japan, concluded a neutrality pact in order to concentrate its forces in the West.” He added that “now Japan’s fundamental task is to conclude the Chinese war.” Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 423 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 321: April 26, 1941).

155. The diminutive Japanese ambassador to Moscow, Lieutenant General Yoshitsugu Tatekawa, the former head of Japanese military intelligence for the USSR, waved his handkerchief and was heard to say in Russian, “Spasibo, Spasibo (Thank you, thank you).” DGFP, series D, XII: 537; Teske, General Ernst K sting, 300–1; Sipols, Tainy, 389; Scott, Duel for Europe, 234–7 (an eyewitness); Herwarth, Against Two Evils, 190; Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 198. See also Simonov, Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia, 350–1.

156. Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gitera, 31–2 (TsA FSB, f. 3o, op. 8, d. 56, l. 789–91). The full report from Kobulov also stated, based on another source, that Matsuoka had signed the Neutrality Pact on German orders, to win the later time. He concluded that this showed that “not only was Germany intending a march against the USSR, but also is taking all necessary diplomatic measures for it.” Naumov, 1941 god, 82–4 (TsA SVR, d. 23078, t. 1, l. 236–301: April 16).

157. “Yeshenko” wrote of Welkisch: “‘ABC’ reports: ‘people are speaking openly and without the least doubt about the pending German military actions against the USSR, Antonescu’s meetings more and more concretely concern military preparations against the USSR.’” Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 586–7 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 1, l. 606–9).

158. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 163, d. 1305, l. 79; Pravda followed the activities on its front page (April 19 and 21).

159. Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 259–61 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1125, l. 17–18); Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 155–7. Pravda (April 23) published a short notice about the Kremlin reception and a long essay (April 24), “One Thousand Years of Tajik Literature,” by Iosif Braginsky, the Persian language specialist, stressing that the Tajiks were an Iranian people and culture.

160. Izvestiia, March 15, 1941; Vestnik AN SSSR, no. 4 (1941): 15–6; “Prazdnik sotsialisticheskoi kul’tury,” Iskusstvo, 1941, no. 6: 3–10.

161. Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 266–70 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1124, l. 15–20). The following day (April 23), in the Little Corner, at 7:10 p.m. for fifty minutes, Stalin received the Tajik party boss (Dmitri Protopopov) and government head (M. Kurbanov), as well as Khrapchenko, the head of USSR committee for artistic affairs, evidently to finalize the state wards for the artists. Kalinin, handing out the state awards to the Tajik participants in the Kremlin, quoted Stalin on Tajik culture: “ancient, with a grand reserve among the people, this culture is distinguished by special subtlety.” Pravda, April 26, 1941; Na prieme, 331.

162. Barros and Gregor, Double Deception, 38–9 (citing War Department, Military Intelligence Division, General Staff, report 17,875: Jan. 17, 1941, by Colonel B. R. Peyton, MID file 2016–13267, MID, correspondence, 1917–1941, box 634, RG 165, NA), 40–4; Laquer and Breitman, Breaking the Silence, 282n; Long, War Diary of Breckinridge Long, 182–4; Hull, Memoirs, II: 967–9; Welles, Time for Decision, 170–1; FRUS, 1941, I: 712, 714 (Hull to Steinhardt, March 4, 1941), 723; Damaskin, Stalin i razvedka, 262–3. Whaley has the timing and source a bit crossed. Whaley, Codeword, 37–40, 45, 227–8, 277–8. The U.S. commercial attach , the Texan Sam Woods (b. 1892), mischaracterized as “a genial extrovert whose grasp of world politics and history was not striking,” fooled everyone. Shirer, Rise and Fall, 843n; Dippel, Two Against Hitler.

163. Boyd, Hitler’s Japanese Confidant, 21 (citing NSA, RG 457, SRH-252: 30); Damaskin, Stalin i razvedka, 262–3. See also Shirer, Rise and Fall, chapter 23.  shima had been recalled from Berlin in Sept. 1939, after the unpleasant surprise of the Nazi-Soviet Pact. When Laurence Steinhardt, U.S. ambassador, “very confidentially” told foreign affairs commissariat deputy head Lozovsky (April 15) that “according to trustworthy information received from the embassy in Berlin Germany’s position is getting worse and worse and it is preparing an attack on Ukraine,” Lozovsky said, “I do not think that Germany will attack the USSR . . . In any case the USSR will always be ready and will not allow itself to be captured by enemies.” Lozovsky reported that Steinhardt “pledged that in the event of a German attack on the USSR the USA would provide aid to the USSR.” Naumov, 1941 god, 80–1 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 3, pap. 4, d. 35, l. 173–7); “Kanun voyny: preduprezhdeniia diplomatov,” 80. Welles leaked to Umansky, whose government had him leak to the German ambassador in Washington, that the United States had broken the Japanese codes, and were deciphering Ōshima's communications, on April 28, 1941. DGFP, series D, XII: 661 (Hans Thomsen from D.C. to Berlin). The Americans intercepted and decoded this message.

164. “Kanun voyny: preduprezhdeniia diplomatov,” 71–2.

165. The Germans were still demanding the plane's return as of May 15. Fel'shtinskii, Oglasheniui podlezhit, 330–1 (Ritter to Schulenburg); Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/i: 342; Rokossovskii, Soldatskii dolg, 31–2; Bezymenskii, Osobaia papka “Barbarossa,” 276.

166. Fel'shtinskii, Oglasheniui podlezhit, 344–5 (April 22, 1941).

167. Stalin suddenly began overfulfilling his trade obligations, even though the Germans had fallen way behind in reciprocal deliveries. May 1941 would be the peak month for two-way trade. DGFP, series D, XII: 282–3 (March 12, 1941), 826 (May 15); Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 318–9 (report of Schnurre, April 5, 1941); Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 326. See also Von Strandmann, “Appeasement and Counter-Appeasement,” 164. Stalin also made gestures to Hungary, returning banners and flags from the 1848 revolution (which tsarist troops had put down), and to Romania, with which he settled one border dispute.

168. DVP SSSR, XXIII/ii: 572 (April 15, 1941), 661–3, 714. But Stalin had also jacked up the freight rates for the transshipment of goods to Germany across Soviet territory, pocketing the windfall. Sipols, Tainy, 387; Barros and Gregor, Double Deception, 47 (citing Ministry of Economic Warfare, Trans-Siberian Railway: Freight Rates, April 3, 1941, FO/371/29497). See also Read and Fisher, Deadly Embrace, 608.

169. Soviet capabilities should not be exaggerated. Its advance warning system (VNOS) did not always warn of approaching German aircraft, and Soviet interceptors could not follow them across the frontier so well, while the Red Army lacked sufficient antiaircraft artillery to shoot them out of the sky.

170. Dilks, “We Must Hope for the Best”; DBFP, 3rd series, II: 686 (Chamberlain to Halifax, Aug. 19, 1938); Parker, Chamberlain and Appeasement, 291, 347.

171. Osokina, Za fasadom, 272–7.

172. Sipols, Tainy, 389–90. Between March 21 and April 17, a German delegation was shown the major Soviet aviation factories (Moscow, Rybinsk, Molotov). The Germans had let the Soviets see the Heinkel and Junkers aircraft production facilities in Nov–Dec. 1940, following Molotov's trip to Berlin.

173. Schwendemann, Die Wirtschaftliche Zusammenarbeit, 329; Sudoplatov, Razvedka i Kreml', 135; Vishlev, Nakanune, 30–1.

174. Too many scholars have wrongly interpreted Stalin's behavior in spring 1941 as abject appeasement, without acknowledging the attempted deterrence. Lisann, “Stalin the Appeaser.”

175. Teske, General Ernst Köstring, 297.

176. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 131–2; Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 122, 128. See also Herwarth, Against Two Evils, 187–8.

177. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 117.

178. Below, At Hitler's Side, 92.

179. Rittersporn, Anguish, 56 (citing RGVA, f. 501k, op. 3, d. 534, l. 7ob.–15); Buchheit, Der deutsche Geheimdienst, 253; Plotnikova, “Organy,” 31. The existence of a major Luftwaffe air reconnaissance program had been confirmed out of Berlin by “Elder” as early as Dec. 1940. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 550 (TsA SVR, d. 23078, t. 1, l. 199–201), I: 769–70 (TsA SVR), II: 89–91 (TsA SVR, d. 23078, t. 1, l. 269–74), II: 179–80 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 1, l. 762–3). Stalin was also sending reconnaissance flights over German lines, with German knowledge. Whaley, Codeword, 32; DGFP, series D, XII: 602–3, 1061–3; Weinberg, Germany and the Soviet Union, appendix 3; Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 329.

180. Halder, Halder Diaries, II: 104 (May 7, 1941); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 400–2.

181. Sorge noted: “in Himmler's circles and the general staff there is a strong tendency for launching a war against the USSR, but this tendency is not yet predominant.” Gavrilo, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 585–6 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 300). On April 29, Kegel (“X”), deputy head of the economics section of the German embassy in Moscow, correctly reported that Germany intended to have transferred all the necessary synthetic rubber from Asia by May 15. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 710; Lota, Sekretnyi front, 230–4. In April 1941, Korotkov, having returned from Moscow, discussed with Kobulov setting up ciphered radio communications for “Elder” and “Corsican” in the event of war; the effort got bogged down. Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 394–6.

182. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 100 (TsAMO, op. 24122/1, l. 178), 105–4 (APRE f. 93: April 23, 1941), 506; Mel'tiukhov, Upushchennyi shans Stalina, 330, 362–3; Gareev, Neodnoznachnye stranstvy, 115.

183. Ehrenburg, Liudi, gody, zhizni, II: 228.

184. Baranov, Goluboi razliv, 86–7.

185. In fact, from April 1941, the German deployments shifted to a qualitatively new level. Van Creveld, Hitler's Strategy, 150. Tupikov added: “If it happens that, in laying out these conclusions, I am pushing at an open door, this will in no way discourage me. If it happens that I am mistaken, you will correct me—and I shall be grateful.” Naumov, 1941 god, II: 113–8 (TsAMO, op. 7272, d. 1, l. 140–52); Lota, Sekretnyi front, 44, 189–97. Only on June 3, 1941, did Golikov instruct his subordinate Kuznetsov that it was necessary to answer Tupikov.

186. Schulenburg and his embassy secretary were back at the Hotel Adlon in less than an hour. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 330–2. It seems that Hans “Johnnie” Herwarth, the anti-Nazi who had divulged the Pact's secret protocols to the American ambassador in Moscow, had quit Germany's Moscow embassy to join the Wehrmacht and through contacts had evidently gotten wind of the firm decision for an attack on the USSR. During a military leave in Berlin, he claims to have used the pretext of visiting his wife, Pussi, who was still working in Moscow, to travel back and inform ambassador Schulenburg that plans for an attack on the USSR were well under way. Herwarth, Against Two Evils, 182–4, 191; Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 328; Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 203–17; Hinsley, British Intelligence, Abridged Version, 27–8. Stalin would get word of Schulenburg's cold reception by the Führer from (Kegel) “X,” who pointed out that in 1939 Hitler had similarly lied to his ambassador to Poland, Hans-Adolf von Moltke.

187. Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 349 (Bernard Bracken). In March 1941, Moscow had ordered a secret police operative, Kyrill Novikov, to accompany Maisky to all official meetings. A telegram from Eden to Cripps (April 18, 1941) obtained by Soviet intelligence in London, inquired whether rapprochement with Moscow was still possible, but Soviet annexation of the Baltic states remained a stumbling block. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 474–5 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 8, d. 56, l. 903–6).

188. Stalin was sent the report the next day. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 130 (TsA SVR, d. 23078, t. 1, l. 349–51). “Elder” had asserted (April 17) that two groups existed, one, led by Göring, champing at the bit to attack the USSR, the other, led by Ribbentrop, dead-set against. This was likely true at the time. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 90 (TsA SVR RF, d. 23078, t. 1, l. 269–74). Hitler seems to have taken Ribbentrop into full confidence on Barbarossa only in April 1941. Weizsäcker would claim that he finally got Ribbentrop to admit it to him on April 21, in Vienna. Nonetheless, the foreign minister gave Weizsäcker approval to compose a memorandum, on April 28, stating that delivering a death blow to the Communist system was not in itself a necessary goal. “Only one thing is decisive: whether this undertaking would hasten the fall of England.” The memo further asserted that Britain was already close to collapse. “A German attack on Russia would only give a lift to English morale,” the memo predicted. “It would be evaluated there as German doubt of the success of our war against England. We would in this fashion not only admit that the war would still last a long time, but we could in this way actually lengthen instead of shorten it.” Weizsäcker, Memoirs, 246–7; Davidson, Trial of the Germans, 154–5.

189. Van Creveld, Hitler's Strategy. Hitler would also shift the main thrust, ordering that following the seizure of Belorussia, Army Group Center was to pause to take the Baltics, resuming the advance on Moscow only after Leningrad and Kronstadt had been captured. He argued that it was necessary to cut the Russians off from the Baltic Sea, to deny them imports, but he envisioned the creation of a Greater Finland as well. Warlimont, Inside Hitler's Headquarters, 138.

190. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 129–30 (TsA SVR, d. 23078, t. 1, l. 352–5).

191. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 518.

192. Völkischer Beobachter, May 5, 1941. A Russian translation of Hitler's May 4 Reichstag speech was conveyed to Soviet front line military districts on June 10, 1941. TsAMO, f. 32, op. 11 306, d. 5 (Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 7). Colonel Kuznetsov writes that when he reported to the deputy head of the tank forces in the general staff

(Panfilov) on German force concentration, “Panfilov said to me that we are being subject to disinformation, adding that only a few minutes ago Comrade Stalin had phoned and said, ‘the Germans want to frighten us, at the current time they will not move against us, they themselves are afraid of the USSR.’” Naumov, 1941 god, II: 476 (note to CC department head Silin, Aug. 15, 1941).

193. “Mars” reported out of Budapest (May 1) that German forces were leaving Belgrade for Poland, and that German troops were talking about “the inevitability of war against the USSR in the nearest term.” Naumov, 1941 god, II: 150 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 4, l. 381); Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 613. On May 5, “Yeshenko” from Bucharest reported on conversations by “ABC” that German forces were being relocated from the Balkans to Romania and the Soviet frontier, as well as many other signs of impending war. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 612–4 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 1, l. 737–40, 744–5).

194. DGFP, series D, 723-5 (Ott, May 6). See also Sipols, Tainy, 392. On May 17, Weizsäcker misinformed Japanese ambassador Ōshima that “German-Russian relations were unchanged,” and that it was wrong to characterize them as “in a state of tension.” Sontag and Biddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 342. See also Trial of the Major War Criminals, XII: 165 (“The Ministries’ Case”).

195. In the same dispatch, forwarded by Merkulov to Stalin and Molotov, “Elder” reported that German officers had told him that Hitler had given a speech some days earlier at the Sports Palace during which he said “in the near future events will take place that will seem inexplicable to many. But the measures, which we will launch, are a state necessity, since the Red Menace has reared its ugly head over ‘Europe.’” Naumov, 1941 god, II: 152 (TsA SVR RF); Iampol’skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 292–3 (TsA FSK); Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gitleva, 65–6 (TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 8, d. 56, l. 1157–8). On May 6, Admiral Kuznetsov wrote to Stalin that the Soviet naval attaché in Berlin (Vorontsov) reported that a Soviet inhabitant named Bozer (a Jew from Lithuania) told the naval attaché’s aide that according to one officer in Hitler’s HQ, the Germans were preparing to invade on May 14 through Finland, the Baltics, and Romania, but Kuznetsov added: “I suggest that this information is false and specially directed in this fashion to reach our government in order to test how the USSR would react.” Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 18.

196. Pechenkin, “Sovremennaia armia,” 31n9 (no citation); Muratov, “Shest’ chasov,” 283; Nevezhin, Sindrom, 169–70; Nevezhin, Zastol’ia, 278–9. Sivkov was sacked from the military academy directorship. Nevezhin, Sindrom, 180 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1039, l. 32).

197. Kuzesova, “Nachalo voyiny.”

198. Further, Stalin claimed that each division numbered 15,000 troops (twice the actual number in many cases). Pechenkin, “Sovremennaia armia,” 26. Zhukov would remind Stalin on June 15, 1941, that “even 8,000-men divisions are practically twice weaker than German ones.” Bezymenskii, Gitle i Stalin, 427–33.

199. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 160 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 3808, l. 1–12); Pechenkin, “Sovremennaia armia,” 27–8; Nevezhin, Sindrom, 170 (citing RGALI, f. 1038, op. 1, d. 2079, l. 31). Over the first six months of 1941, the Soviet Union would produce more than 1,100 T-34 medium tanks and 393 KV heavy tanks, not nearly enough to meet the general staff’s professed needs against a German adversary being supplied by all of Europe. In March 1941, Stalin was informed that industry had only enough parts to supply 30 percent of all the army’s tank and armored units. New aircraft models were running at 10 to 20 percent of the military’s needs. Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph, 375–6 (citing TsAMO, f. 15a, op. 2154, d. 4, l. 224–33).

200. Pechenkin, “Sovremennaia armia,” 28–9; Banac, Diary of Geroji Dimitrov, 159–60; Muratov, “Shest’ chasov,” 282.

201. Malyshev, “Dnevnik narkoma,” 116. See also Anfilov, “Razgovor zakonchilsia ugrozoi Stalina,” 41.

202. Bezymenskii, Gitle i Stalin, 437.

203. Muratov, “Shest’ chasov”; Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 291–3. There is no stenographic account of the May 5, 1941, speech and no written notes by Stalin found in his personal papers. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 294n2. Malyshev and Dimitrov wrote accounts for their diaries. Nevezhin, Zastol’nye, 273–93. Pechenkin, “Sovremennaia armia.” This is the so-called “brief record” made by K. V. Semenov, a staff person at the defense commissariat.

204. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 160.

- 205. Pechenkin, “‘Sovremennaia armia,’” 29; Naumov, 1941 god, II; 161–2; Vainrub, Eti stal'nye parnii, 19; Nevezhin, Zastol'nye, 287–8, 290–1.
- 206. Malyshev, “Dnevnik narkoma,” 115, 116–7; Muratov, “‘Shest’ chasov,” 284–5; Pechenkin, “‘Sovremennaia armia,’” 29–30; Nevezhin, Zastol'nye, 279–80.
- 207. Pravda, May 3, 1941.
- 208. Pechenkin, “‘Sovremennaia armia,’” 29–30; Naumov, 1941 god, II; 161–2; Nevezhin, Zastol'nye, 287–9 (at 289); Muratov, “‘Shest’ chasov,” 285; Nevezhin, Sindrom, 174–6.
- 209. Muratov, “‘Shest’ chasov,” 287; Zhipin, Kak fashistskaia Germaniia gotovila napadenie, 224; Liashchenko, “S ognem i krov'iu popolam”; Radzinskii, Stalin, 485 (quoting Chadaev, unpublished ms., “V groznye vremena,” GARF, without detailed citation). Sivkov was sacked a few days later. Nevezhin, Sindrom, 180 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1049, l. 32). Both of Sivkov's brothers, Alexander and Pyotr, also military men, had been executed in 1938.
- 210. Schulenburg would send an account of the speech to Berlin only a month later, suggesting that Stalin seemed “anxious to prepare his followers for a new ‘compromise’ with Germany.” DGFP series D, XII: 964–5 (June 4, 1941).
- 211. Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 111 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 125, d. 60, l. 58–9). The party apparatus held conferences on May 8 and 9, 1941, with editors of the major newspapers and journals and those responsible for the TASS news agency. Zhdanov, addressing a special gathering of fifty-four invited film industry personnel, directors, cameramen, actors, and studio heads, as well as twenty-seven top propaganda functionaries and newspaper editors, on May 14–15, blustered about the Baltics, Western Ukraine, Western Belorussia, and Bessarabia, and how “if circumstances permit, we shall widen the front of socialism still more.” Alexander Zaporozhets, head of propaganda for the army's political directorate, was ordered to revise propaganda for the troops. But draft decrees were not readied until late May or in the case of the military, June, and would not be approved prior to June 22. Nevezhin, Sindrom, 186–251; Nevezhin, “Dve direktivy 1941 g.,” 191–207; Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 105–7 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 121, d. 115, l. 3–7, 124, 162). Kalinin gave a provocative closed speech (May 20, 1941) to a party and Communist Youth League meeting of the Supreme Soviet presidium staff, in which he castigated Britain and France for fighting poorly, noting “if the same thing were happening here, it would be judged a criminal unpreparedness for war.” Kalinin suggested that “the army should think: the sooner the fight starts, the better.” He received a rousing ovation. Nekrich, Pariahs, 231–3 (citing RGASPI, f. 78, op. 1, d. 84, l. 6–7, 20–1, 35–6). In May, Soviet radio broadcasts directed at German soldiers took on an antagonistic tone. Hoffman, “Podgotovka Sovetskogo Soiuza,” 27.
- 212. RGASPI f. 558, op. 11, d. 769, l. 176–176 ob.: April 28, 1941.
- 213. Stalin had the Central Committee approve the politburo recommendation by voice vote. “‘Naznachit’ tov. Stalina I. V.’ postanovleniie politbiuro TsK VKP (b) Mai 1941 g.”; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1039, l. 13; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 155–7 (RGASPI, f. 2, op. 1, d. 1a, l. 1, 3–4); Pravda, May 7, 1939; Izvestiia, May 7, 1939. The decree stated that Molotov was removed “in light of numerous declarations that he has difficulty fulfilling his duties alongside the duties of a people's commissar.” Zhdanov arrived from Leningrad, and was the sole person Stalin received on May 5, for twenty-five minutes. A May 7 meeting in Stalin's office evidently hashed out how a new Council of People's Commissars would operate: present were Voznesensky, Molotov, Bulganin, Kaganovich, Mikoyan, Beria, and Shakhurin. Na prieme, 332.
- 214. Khlevniuk et al., Stalinskoe Politburo, 34–5 (citing APRF f. 3, op. 52, d. 251, l. 58–60); “‘Naznachit’ tov. Stalina I. V.’,” 222.
- 215. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 121. See also Petrov, “June 22, 1941,” 257 (Gnedich).
- 216. Boelcke, Secret Conferences, 158–9 (May 7). Alexander Kerensky told the New York Times that the formalization of Stalin's power signified his active participation in the war on the Nazi side. New York Times, May 7, 1941.
- 217. DGFP, series D, XII: 791. See also Akhmedov, In and Out of Stalin's GRU, 139–40.
- 218. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 151.
- 219. Halder, Halder Diaries, II: 100 (May 5, 1941); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 400–2. Halder also recorded Krebs's opinion that the Russian upper officer corps was “decidedly bad” and that “compared with 1933, picture is strikingly depressing. It will take twenty years to reach her old level.” Krebs was also dubious about Soviet pilots.

220. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 167–9 (APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 158–62). Pavlov composed his record of the breakfast that same day. Voiushin and Gorlov, “Fashistskaia agressiia,” 22– (citing AVP RF, f. 082, op. 23, pap. 96, d. 16a, l. 120–4).

221. Lota, Sekretnyi front, 59. Also in May 1941, the Germans sent a group of Berlin opera soloists to perform in Moscow, and the NKGB operative Zoya Rybkina (b. 1907), posing as a representative of the Society for Cultural Ties Abroad, attended the reception at the German embassy, where she discovered a pile of suitcases, and walls emptied of paintings. Voskresenskaia, Teper' ia mogu skazat' pravdu, 10–16; Voskresenskaia, Pod psevdonimom Irina, 38–44; Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 123. Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gitlera, 166–8, 97–8 (d. 57, l. 1287–8; May 14). (“Rybkina” became a children’s writer under the name Voskresenskaya.) Also on May 7, Tito (“Walter”) sent two coded telegrams to Dimitrov reporting intensive German preparations for an attack. Lebedeva and Narinskii, Komintern i Vtoraia mirovaia voina, 536 (RGASPI, f. 495, op. 184, d. 7 no. 412, l. 112), 537 (no. 423, l. 116).

222. This was forwarded by Merkulov to Stalin, Molotov, and Beria on May 14, and included additional detail about Romania’s preparations for war. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 180–1 (TsA SVR, d. 23078, t. 1, l. 388–90); Primakov, Ocherki, III: 480–1 (TsA FSB, f. 3 os, op. 8, d. 57, l. 1277–80). See also Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 89 (citing FSB archives).

223. Hilger speculated that Hitler perceived Soviet weakness, fear. Hilger and Mayer, Incompatible Allies, 327.

224. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 181–4 (APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 162–8). See also Sipols, Tainy, 403.

225. Khlevniuk, Master of the House, 243–4 (no citation); Khlevniuk, Stalin: Zhizn', 251–2 (citing GARF, vospominaniia Ia. E. Chadaeva). On May 8, Stalin received Khrushchev, alone, for thirty minutes; nearly four hours later, he received Beria, alone, for five minutes. Those were the only people he saw that day. Na prieme, 333. As of May 10, Molotov was back in the customary position, entering the Little Corner before any other visitors. Na prieme, 333.

226. Boberach, Meldungen aus dem Reich, VII: 3374, 2380, 2394.

227. Lota, “Altä” protiv “Barbarossy,” 305.

228. Whether it was noticed in Moscow remains uncertain.

229. DVP SSSR, XXIII/ii: 654–7, 664–7, 675–9; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 193 (APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 174: Molotov instructions to Dekanozov, May 12), II: 193–5 (l. 169–73: Dekanozov notes); DGFP, series D, XII: 734–5 (May 7, 1941); Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 218–21 (citing APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 675, l. 169–73: Dekanozov notes on May 12 breakfast); Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 351. There is nonsense, from Mikoyan and Kumaney, that Schulenburg had warned Dekanozov, in the presence of Hilger and Pavlov, of the forthcoming invasion. Kumaney, “‘22ogo’ na rassvete,” 3. “He didn’t warn,” Molotov stated of Schulenburg, “he just hinted at it.” Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 29.

230. Na prieme, 332–3.

231. Hess’s flight likely was unassisted by German electronic systems. Deighton, “Hess the Aviator,” 121–38. One of the Luftwaffe’s best pilots would claim, after the war, that on May 10, 1941, Göring had called and ordered him to intercept Hess, who was already in the air. Adolph Galland, the pilot, would also claim that he implemented the order only perfunctorily, having no idea how to find Hess’s Messerschmitt Bf 110 amid all the others in the sky at that time. Tolliver and Constable, Fighter General.

232. Fox, “Propaganda,” 88 (citing FO 1093/10: Medical Research Council report); Rees et al., Case of Rudolf Hess, 16; Pick, Pursuit of the Nazi Mind, 42. See also Hess, Prisoner of Peace, 31–8.

233. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 246–9 (citing WO 199/3288/A: May 11, 1941, and FO 1093/11 fols. 152–5).

234. Heiden, “Hitler’s Better Half.”

235. Schellenberg, Schellenberg Memoirs, 201. Churchill would later assert that Hess denied Germany was planning an invasion and asserted that Germany had certain demands the USSR would have to satisfy—i.e., the ultimatum. Churchill, Second World War, II: 46.

236. Engel, Heeresadjutant bei Hitler, 103 (May 11, 1941); Schmidt, Statist, 549; Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 372, citing Heinz Linge, “Kronzeuge Linge: der kammerdiener des ‘Führers,’” Revue, Munich, Nov. 1955–March 1956, 60; Halder, Halder Diaries, II: 117–8 (May 15, 1941); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 412–5. Hess left four letters: the others were for his wife, Ilse, Willy Messerschmitt (whose plane he took), and Helmut Kaden (whose flight suit he took).

237. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 372–3.

238. Fest, Face, 292; Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 375–6.

239. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 372. When Hitler summoned Mussolini on June 2, 1941, to the Brenner Pass they talked, among other matters, about Hess. The Führer was said to have had tears in his eyes. Corvaja, Hitler and Mussolini, 174.

240. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, IX: 309–10 (May 13, 1941). See also Below, Als Hitlers Adjutant, 274. The next day the Germans issued a fuller statement, calling Hess's mission a result of "mental confusion" that would change nothing in German-British relations. Goebbels had objected, to no avail ("It's rightly being asked how such an idiot could be the second man after the Führer"). Domarus, Hitler: Reden, IV: 1716; Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, IX: 311 (May 14). See also Noakes and Pridham, Nazism, IV: 532 (Leipzig SD report, May 17, 1941).

241. Kershaw, Hitler: 1936–1945, 375; Gamm, Der Flüsterwitz, 36; Vassiltchikov, Berlin Diaries, 51 (May 18, 1941).

242. The British interrogator (Ivone Kirkpatrick) concluded: "Hess does not seem . . . to be in the near counsels of the German government as regards operations; and he is not likely to possess more secret information that he could glean in the course of his conversations with Hitler and others." See also Schmidt, "Der Hess-Flug," 14. Goebbels (May 15) intuited that the British had chosen to "let the lies run free" and became gleeful that the British had failed to play this trump card properly, and said the German people were comparing the incident to "a razor cut on the face" that would heal quickly and be forgotten. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, IX: 317–9 (May 17, 1941); Boelcke, Secret Conferences, 165 (May 19).

243. Tsarev, "Poslednii polet," III: 433–40. On May 18, Philby, after a conversation with a foreign office press department contact, reported that Hess had not given away any valuable information, remained loyal to Hitler, and called the German-British war a crime. Tsarev, "Poslednii polet," III: 435–7; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 200–1 (May 14, 1941).

244. Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 272; Khrushchev, Khrushchev Remembers, 116. The Soviets also believed the British secret services had been involved in luring Hess. Andrew and Mitrokhin, Mitrokhin Archive, 157; and Erickson, "Rudolf Hess." Roosevelt doubted the official British story as well, and feared there was substance to the rumors of a substantive peace mission. Kimball, "Hess Distraction"; Kimball, Churchill and Roosevelt, I: 184–6; Pick, Pursuit of the Nazi Mind, 45 (citing PPF3716, letters from John Coar and Ambassador William Dodd). Dekanozov sent Molotov a comprehensive analysis (May 21, 1941) of the Hess mission, based on the German press and hearsay in Berlin, asserting that it proved the existence of divisions within the German leadership and a tendency toward an agreement with Britain. It was forwarded to Stalin on May 26. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 261–6 (APRF, f. 3, op. 64, d. 689, l. 64–74).

245. Cripps, in some desperation back on April 23, 1941, had telegraphed London about Soviet-German negotiations (which did not exist), speculating that Hitler could get what he wanted from Moscow by blackmail without war, and that the Soviets feared a separate deal between Britain and Germany, which could be used by London to prevent a Soviet-German deal. He stressed that only the fear of a separate peace would bring the Soviets around to the British side. This had been intercepted and decrypted, and forwarded by Fitin on May 5 to Stalin, Molotov, and Beria. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 152–3 (Tsa FSB, f. Zos, op. 8, d. 56, l. 1160–3). Cadogan noted in his diary (May 30, 1941), effectively repudiating Cripps, that because of British military weakness, its diplomacy was "completely hamstrung. For instance—Russia. You can't do anything nowadays with any country unless you can a) threaten b) bribe it. Russia has a) no fear of us whatever and b) we have nothing to offer her." Dilks, Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan, 382.

246. Woodward, British Foreign Policy, I: 614–5; Gorodetsky, Mission to Moscow, 134–5.

247. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 262–7 (citing AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 352, d. 2402, l. 174, and The Times, May 27, 1941). See also Görtemaker, "Bizarre Mission," 75–101; Kettenacker, "Mishandling a Spectacular Event," 19–38; and Fox, "Propaganda." On June 5, Maisky insisted to Eden that no German-Soviet negotiations were under way; Eden replied that he knew they were. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 273 (citing AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 352, d. 2402, l. 149–52; Maisky to Moscow); Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 359. Woodward gives the date of this encounter as June 10: British Foreign Policy, I: 620.

248. Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 123. See also Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 221–2. The Japanese ambassador to Moscow complained to Tokyo that Soviet counterintelligence was smothering, adding that “they steal suitcases from military attachés.” Khaustov, “Deiatel’nost’ organov,” 289 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 82, l. 51), 304 (TsA FSB, f. 66, op. 1, d. 391, l. 55). Schulenburg reported to Berlin (May 24, 1941) that he had been received by Molotov with the familiar degree of confidence and in the same office as previously, albeit with the nameplate altered (to deputy chairman), but that Molotov effectively held the same position of power as previously—Stalin’s top deputy. The ambassador added that Soviet policy remained “directed at avoidance of a conflict with Germany,” which was “proved by the attitude taken by the Soviet government in the last few weeks, the tone of the Soviet press, . . . and the observance of the trade agreements concluded with Germany.” Nonetheless, he began to resign himself to having failed in his larger mission. He had finally acquired his dream castle, the Burg Falkenberg in the Upper Palatinate, in the late 1930s, and, after Molotov’s disastrous Nov. 1940 visit to Berlin, Hitler had ordered that the count be given a humongous bribe, 200,000 reichsmarks, which the count had used to renovate it. Herwarth, Against Two Evils, 95–6; Sontag and Biddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 344–5; Fleischhauer, Diplomatischer Widerstand, 312, 404n; DVP SSSR, XXIII/ii: 521 (Soviet assessment of Schulenburg, from the former KGB archive).

249. Fleischhauer, Diplomatischer Widerstand, 194.

250. Some have speculated that the aircraft delivered a letter from Hitler for Stalin, supposedly a response to an earlier Stalin letter requesting an explanation for the German troop build-up. Zhukov, in interviews in 1966, said: “Sometime in early June I decided that I should again try to convince Stalin of the accuracy of the intelligence reports on the approaching danger. . . . Together with Defense Commissar Semyon Konstantinovich Timoshenko we brought along general staff maps with the locations of enemy troops. I reported. Stalin listened attentively but silently. After my report he sent us away without giving us his opinion. . . . A few days passed and Stalin called for me. When I entered he was seated at his desk. I approached. Then he opened the middle drawer and took out several pieces of paper. ‘Read,’ said Stalin. I began to read. It was a letter from Stalin to Hitler in which he briefly outlined his concern over the German deployments, about which I had reported a few days earlier.” Bezymenskii, Hitler i Stalin, 472. Zhukov told Simonov around the same time (1965–6) that at a Jan. 1941 meeting Stalin said he had “turned to Hitler in a personal letter advising him that this was known to us, that it surprised us, and that it created the impression among us that Hitler intended to go to war with us.” Hitler’s supposed reply: Yes, there are large military formations on the frontier, but they “are not directed against the Soviet Union.” Simonov, “Zametki k biografii G. K. Zhukova,” 50–1 (published twenty-one years after the conversation). No such documents have emerged from Soviet or German archives. Hitler did have a secret archive, but in the bunker on April 22, 1945, he would order his adjutant to liquidate the contents of two safes; other such safes were found in Berghof and in his Munich apartment; their contents would be destroyed, including Hitler’s correspondence with heads of state. But even so, copies would be expected to be in Soviet archives.

251. Sontag and Biddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 339–41; Fel’shtinskii, SSSR-Germaniia, II: 164–5. That same evening, Schulenburg received instructions from Berlin to inform the Soviets that the alleged seventy-one border violations by Germans were “being investigated,” and that the investigation would “require some time.” Sontag and Biddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 341–42. According to Zhukov, sometime in May 1941 Stalin told him and Timoshenko that German ambassador Schulenburg had requested that German officers be allowed to reconnoiter the Soviet border in what they presented as a search for the graves of German soldiers who went missing in World War I. Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 346–7; Ivanov, Shtab armetskii, 98–9.

252. Mawdsley, “Crossing the Rubicon,” 849–53. See also Lota, “Alta” protiv “Barbarsosy,” 309–10.

253. The proposed surprise attack of 152 divisions and 3,000–4,000 aircraft against German positions in former southern Poland carried timetables and maps of the theater (one map carried a date, the lone one on the document). Gor’kov, “Gotovil li,” 40–5; Gor’kov, Kreml’, 303–9; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 215–20 (TsAMO, f. 16, op. 2951, d. 237, l. 1–15); Bobylev, “Tochku v diskussii stavit’ rano”; Zakharov, General’nyi shtab, 219–21. A partial, misleading version of the Vasilevsky plan was published: Kiselev, “Upriamye fakty nachala voyny,” 18–22. There has also been misleading commentary: Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, II/i: 136. For an analysis, see Bezymenskii, “O ‘Plane Zhukova.’” Bezymensky was Zhukov’s interpreter during the war. He reproduced a facsimile of some pages of the May 15 war plan (showing the quality penmanship). Bezymenskii, Hitler i Stalin, 478–9. The April 1941 local version of the war plan stated: "The USSR does not contemplate attacking Germany and Italy. These states are probably also not contemplating attacking the USSR in the near future." Solonin, "Tri plana tovarishcha Stalina," 45–49.

254. Anfilov, "Razgovor zakonchilsia ugrozoi Stalina," 40–1; Forster and Mawdsley, "Hitler and Stalin in Perspective," 86. There is a third-hand account of a blow-up between Stalin and Zhukov and Timoshenko. Bezymenskii, "O 'Plane Zhukova,'" 61–2, 62n27 (citing General Nikolai Liashchenko, a major in 1941, who recorded conversations with Timoshenko in the 1960s); Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 299 (citing the same source). A less dramatic version appears in Svetlishin, Krutye stupeni, 57–8 (interviews with Zhukov).

255. Anfilov, "Razgovor zakonchilsia ugrozoi Stalina," 41. Stalin also met with Timoshenko and Zhukov, but not Vatutin, on May 23, for two hours and fifty-five minutes. Na prieme, 333–4.

256. Molotov cautioned in connection to those such as Vasilevsky who claimed to know Stalin's thinking: "Stalin believed this, Stalin thought that." As if anyone knew what Stalin thought about the war." Chuev, Sto sorok, 42, 45.

257. Anfilov, "Razgovor zakonchilsia ugrozoi Stalina," 41; Anfilov, Doroga k tragedii, 166; Svetlishin, Krutye stupeni, 57–8. The document's authenticity is beyond question, but in addition to the lack of signatures, there are no markings by Stalin on it. The document was apparently locked in the personal safe of Vasilevsky until 1948, and not kept in Stalin's archive or Zhukov's. From Vasilevsky's safe it went to the military archives (TsAMO RF, f. 16a, op. 2951, d. 237). Danilov, "Stalinskaia strategii nachala voiny."

258. Gor'kov, "Gotovil li," 40–1. A May 15 special communication by Golikov on the dislocation of German forces estimated 114–19 divisions in the frontier zone, and concluded: "The strengthening of German forces on the border with the USSR continues. The main territories of concentration are the southern part of the General-Gouvernement, Slovakia, and the northern part of Moldavia." Lota, Sekretnyi front, 205–9 (citing TsAMO, op. 7237, d. 2, l. 109–13); Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informuiet, 518. Vasilevsky would later show hindsight appreciation of German force concentrations, which had not been reflected in the May 15 war plan text. Kumanev, Riadom so Staliny, 232–3. See also Anfilov and Golikov, Zagadka 1941 goda, 251; Vasilevskii, Delo vsei zhizni, 310.

259. A special inspection (May 23–June 5, 1941) of western military districts found their combat readiness unsatisfactory. Volkogonov, "German Attack," 80.

260. Gareev, Neodnoznachnye stranitsy, 96. Only at the end of May 1941 had the general staff organized a war game to test the viability of covering plans under conditions of surprise attack. Nothing is known of the game's results. Denisova and Tumash, Nakanune, 391. See also Murin, "Nakanune," 9 (Arkhiv politbiuro TsK KPSS, f. 73, op. 2, d. 3, l. 30–44).

261. Mawdsley, "Crossing the Rubicon," 836–44. Mawdsley, whose analysis is the best in print, notes that the late amendments by Vatutin were defensive, not preemptive, suggesting confusion or compromise even in the drafting, although these changes might have been written in Stalin's presence. The assertion that Hitler's invasion preempted an imminent Soviet attack, a baldfaced German lie circulated to justify their invasion, was shredded by Gabriel Gorodetsky, Mif "Ledokola."

262. Preemption bordered on the preposterous. The May 15 war plan envisioned 196 Soviet divisions concentrated in the West; as of June 22, first and second strategic echelons numbered 56 rifle and cavalry divisions on the western frontier and 52 at a distance of 60–250 miles from the frontier. Many of these divisions were under-strength in personnel and equipment. Moreover, whereas MP-41 stipulated 6.5 million troops in the west, on June 22 there were 3 million. In the Western special military district—"special" meant the district was supposed to be able to battle without added reserves—a significant number of Pavlov's divisions were made up of reservists, who had almost no training; the district had only a single mechanized corps. It relied on the civilian communications network. It was expected to complete its combat preparations in the first half of 1942. Mawdsley, "Crossing the Rubicon," 855; Zolotarev, Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XII (I): 339–40 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 15, d. 27, l. 575–607); Gareev, Neodnoznachnye stranitsy, 12; Murin, "Nakanune," 10 (Vasilevsky); "GKO postanovliaet . . .," 20–1; Nekrich, Pariabs, 242–3. See also Nikulin, Tukhachevskii, 194. Soviet military districts were converted to "fronts" for war. This had happened on Sept. 11, 1939, for Poland (six days in advance); on Jan. 7, 1940, for Finland (in media res, reflecting the change in the war strategy); on June 9, 1940, for Bessarabia (nine days in advance); and in March 1941: northwest, west (central), and southwest. On May 27, Timoshenko would order that field command points be set up for the “fronts.” Vishlev, Nakanune, 29, 42–3; Vasilevskii, Delo vsei zhizni, 119.

263. One goal was to create a second strategic echelon along the Dnieper and Western Dvina Rivers but beyond the range of Luftwaffe aerial reconnaissance. (The first strategic echelon was already deployed within the boundaries of the frontier military districts at sixty or fewer miles from the border.) Gorkov, “Gotovil li,” 40–5; Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 345–6; Ivanov, Nachalnyi period voyny, 211–2; Vasilevskii, Delo vsei zhizni, 114.

264. On the night and early morning of May 14–15, Stalin met with Timoshenko and Zhukov yet again, along with Kaganovich, railways commissar, a crucial aspect of mobilization. Na prieme, 333. Soviet railway capacity limits on mobilization were a long-standing subject of Soviet analysis. Naumov, 1941, god, I: 545–8 (RGAE, f. 1884, op. 49, d. 1247, l. 1–6; Jan. 17, 1941). On these problems in the Imperial Russian Army, see Fuller, Strategy and Power, 303–6. On May 24, Stalin gathered more than twenty military men and other officials in the Little Corner from around 6:00 p.m., for three and a half hours. Na prieme, 334. Almost no information on this meeting has been adduced by Soviet military historians with access to the archives. Even the politburo special files contain no information on what was discussed or decided. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 34–5. Stalin next saw Timoshenko and Zhukov in the Little Corner on June 3, and again on June 6, 7, 9, 11, 18, and 21. The regime sought to get this stance across in the provincial press and the Red Army’s army political-propaganda directorate. Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 110 (citing RGASPI, f. 17, op. 121, d. 128, l. 36). Vishnevsky had attended Stalin’s May 5 speech and the closed door sessions of the army political-propaganda directorate. He wrote in his diary (May 13, 1941): “the struggle against Germany,” . . . “against fascism, against the most dangerous military neighbor, in the name of revolutionizing Europe and, of course, Asia.” Vishnevsky also mentioned Stalin’s words at the Tajik banquet (April 22): “about Lenin, about a new ideology, about the brotherhood of peoples, about the ruinous and dead ideology of racism.” Golubev et al., Rossia i zapad, 118 (citing RGALI, f. 1038, op. 1, d. 2079, l. 31).

265. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 628–9 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 4, l. 435).

266. Meissner, Staatssekretär unter Ebert, Hindenburg, Hitler.

267. Berezkhov, S diplomaticheskoi missiei, 73; Berezkhov, At Stalin’s Side, 53; AVPRF, f. 082, op. 23, p. 95, d. 6, l. 141–2 (Nov. 19, 1940); Barros and Gregor, Double Deception, 150–9.

268. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, IX: 333–5. Werner Wächter, chief of staff in Goebbels propaganda ministry, would later call this “the age of whispering propaganda,” and boast about the flood of rumors, “all of which were equally credible, so that in the end there wasn’t a bugger left who had any idea what was really up.” Boelcke, Secret Conferences, 174 (1942).

269. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 270–1 (PA AA Bonn. Dienststelle Ribbentrop. UdSSR-RC, 7/1 R 27168, BI26041–26043); Vishlev, Nakanune, 153–4. Hilger would later write that “we thought the stories were being circulated deliberately, to exert pressure upon the Soviet Union” for extortion. Hilger and Mayer, Incompatible Allies, 328–9. See also Barros and Gregor, Double Deception, 198, 225.

270. Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gitleira, 124–7 (TsA FSB, f. 03os, op. 8, d. 57, l. 1500–4); Naumov, 1941 god, II: 259–60; Primakov, Ocherki, III: 483–5. On May 27, British forces approached the outskirts of Baghdad, and German personnel prepared to evacuate. That same day the British sank the battleship Bismarck. In East Africa, Italy had capitulated to British forces (on May 18); Rommel, in North Africa, was faring poorly; Germany was suffering high casualties in efforts to seize Crete. (Of course, Germany had vast unused forces coiled to attack the USSR that were not being used against Britain.) All this could be considered to have put a definitive end to the concept of a German “peripheral strategy” attack in the Near East.

271. A Soviet counterintelligence profile (June 1940) noted: “Kösting has perfect command of Russian . . . an experienced and cunning person . . . commands an enormous tactical horizon, undergirded by rich practical experience.” The profile added: “At every occasion Kösting uses personal observations, conversations with the local population to compose wide-ranging overviews, reports and so on about the situation of the population, new construction sites etc.” Pogonii, Lubianka, 2, 225. Hitler had briefed Kösting about his intention to attack the USSR already on Sept. 3, 1940, in the company of Halder, but the specifics of Barbarossa do not appear to have been known to him. Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 86.

272. This account comes from Vasily Rysnoi, a Samarkand-born (1904) ethnic Ukrainian and the head of the German department in Soviet counterintelligence (abruptly inducted in 1937 from party work). Pogonii, Lubianka, 2, 224.

273. Several examples of purported transcripts of eavesdropping in April and May 1941 have been published: Istoriia Sovetskikh organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti, 313 (internal use only); Pronin, "Nevol'nye informatory Stalina," 1–2 (citing unspecified FSB archives); Naumov, 1941 god, I: 598; Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gitlera, 52–5 (TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 8, d. 56, l. 1011–5: April 30), 109–12 (d. 57, l. 1346–51: May 18; a slightly different version with names omitted). NKGB counterintelligence did not know the extent to which Stalin read or extracted useful information from the bugged conversations. Pogonii, Lubianka, 2, 225. erik, op. 45, d. 29, l. 246.

274. Matveev and Merzhliakov, "Akademik kontrarazvedki," 7; Karpov, "Vo glave komiteta informatsii," 53.

275. Moritz, Fall Barbarossa, 160; Halder, Halder Diaries, II: 943 (May 30, 1941); Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 435–6.

276. Military intelligence HQ supposedly responded to Sorge: "We doubt the veracity of your information." Andrew and Gordievsky, KGB, 224 (no citation).

277. Whymant, Stalin's Spy, 184. Soviet military intelligence had evidently sent a military attaché to Tokyo to check into his behavior and work, which exposed Sorge to risk. The young operative who checked him became quickly and utterly convinced of Sorge's reliability. Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 173–5 (Kh. D. Mamsurov).

278. Clausen began to lose faith in Communism, as he would tell Japanese interrogators after his arrest on Oct. 18, 1941. Whymant, Stalin's Spy, 119–22, 292; Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 18. Clausen's radio had no outside aerial, for security purposes, but at night he could still broadcast more than 2,000 miles. (Although Japanese counterintelligence picked up the unauthorized signals, it could not pinpoint their source or decrypt the code.) Normally, the radio operator was not allowed to encrypt or decrypt the messages. But Sorge had had a motorcycle accident on May 13, 1938, and he had had to teach Clausen the cipher code and delegate to him the task of putting the material into code before sending it. Once Clausen (b. 1899) could read the content of Sorge's messages, he was in a position to decide what to transmit (or not).

279. Sipols, Tainy, 397.

280. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 617–8 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 340–1); Naumov, 1941 god, II: 175; Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 116; Whymant, Stalin's Spy, 146–7, citing Obi, Zoruge jiken, I: 248, 274. See also "Tiuremnye zapiski Rikharda Zorge." Sorge's messages via Clausen had not only to be decoded but translated from the German. Evidently, Sorge's raw material, after being received at HQ in Moscow, was not always promptly processed and forwarded to the information (analytical) department.

281. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 627 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 381); Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 117–8; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 252. Golikov wrote on the document: "ask 'Ramsay,' corps or armies?"

282. Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 137–9 (Sudoplatov); Zhukov, "Iz neopublikovannykh vospominanii"; Zhukov, Vospominania, I: 380. At the time, Zhukov recalls, Stalin did not name the suspected double agent to him, but later Zhukov concluded it must have been Sorge. "Sorge's tragedy," Sudoplatov later surmised, "was that with the authorization of Artuzov, Uritsky, Berzin, Karin, and Borovich (his communications officer) he cooperated with German intelligence in Japan. This put him a position of less than full trust." Fesiun, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 137.

283. Zhukov would later claim he was not informed by Stalin about the intelligence the regime was receiving. This was only partially true. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 378, 380. There is a story that during a showing to senior Soviet officers of a Franco-German film, Who Are You, Dr. Sorge? (1961), a retired Zhukov lost his composure, stood up in the cinema, and shouted out in the dark to Golikov, "Why did you at that time, Filipp Ivanovich, hide everything from me? Not report about such a document [Sorge's report on an imminent German attack] to the chief of the general staff?" Golikov was said to have replied, "And what, should I have reported to you if this Sorge was a double, ours and theirs?" Vorob'ev, "Kazhdaia piad' zemli," 165–6. After Khrushchev saw the foreign film about Sorge, the story goes, he asked Mikoyan and then Soviet intelligence whether the USSR had had such an agent. A commission was formed under Kosygin and, posthumously, Sorge was awarded the Hero of the Soviet Union on Nov. 5, 1964; his paramour/wife in Japan, Hanako Ishii, began receiving a Soviet pension.

284. Back in 1937, when Zhukov had been stationed in the Belorussian military district, Golikov had been sent there as a member of its military council, evidently on assignment for Mekhlis to help annihilate the local military elite. Golikov accused Zhukov, among others, of friendship with enemies of the people, interrogated Zhukov over his associations, and built a dossier on him (his wife had had his daughter christened in a church; he treated his subordinates rudely). But one of Zhukov's accusers, it seems, was arrested ("he dug a pit for another, but fell into it himself," in the popular saying, Zhukov wrote). Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKK, 109; Spahr, Zhukov, 22–3.

285. This was partly based on having learned that transport of Far Eastern rubber to Germany via the Trans-Siberian Railroad was to be minimized. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 657–8 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 422); Fesiu, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 119–20; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 303–4.

286. Whymant, citing Sorge's testimony to his Japanese captors, surmises that some or all of the messages were not transmitted to Moscow. For ex., Sorge claims to have told Moscow: "Lieutenant General Scholl conveyed clearly to Ambassador Ott, in total secrecy, that Germany and the USSR were finally to go to war and he should take the necessary measures; and he told me various details about it." Whymant, Stalin's Spy, 164–5, citing Obi, Zoruge jiken, III: 183.

287. Sorge added: "Scholl avers that the most powerful strike will be struck by the left flank of the German army." Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 658 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 424); Fesiu, Delo Rikharda Zorge, 119–20; Novoe vremia, 1990, no. 26: 32 (photocopy of the radiogram). Golikov asked for clarification on the nature of the "tactical mistake" and on Scholl's revelation about a left flank strike. By the time Sorge would be able to reply, it was July 3, 1941. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 714 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 527–9). Scholl had been a deputy military attaché in Tokyo (1938–1940).

288. Vishlev, Nakanune, 53–5 (PA AA Bonn: Büro des Staatssekretar. Aufzeichnungen über Diplomatenbesuche. Bd. 8 [R 29833], Bl. Ohne Nummer; Russland, Bd. 5 [R 29716], Bl. 035 [113439], 091 [113495], Bl. 087 [113491]).

289. Beria wrote: "In many places along the border the Germans have concentrated pontoons, wooden and inflatable boats. The greatest number of them can be found on the Brest-Lvov salient. Work continues on the mounting of defensive installations near the borders, mostly at night. Leaves for soldiers of German army units have been forbidden. Moreover, information has been received about the relocation of German troops from Budapest and Bucharest on an axis toward the borders of the USSR." Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 202–3 (TsA FSK).

290. "Nakanune voiny (1941 g.)," 206; Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 200–1. Romania had accumulated excellent intelligence on Soviet forces in the south of the USSR, material that was passed to the head of German military intelligence Admiral Canaris during his visit in May.

291. Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 206–7 (TsA FSK).

292. Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 208–9 (TsA FSK: June 3, 1941).

293. Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 6 (Blokhin and Samoilovich). Kuznetsov requested more funding in connection with shifting the navy to combat footing from July 1. Solonin, "Tri plana tovarishcha Stalina," 57 (citing GARF, f. R-8418, op. 25, d. 481, l. 32–33: June 4). Further, on June 4, Kaiser Wilhelm II died peacefully in Dutch exile at age eighty-two; the Reich Commissioner for the Occupied Netherlands laid a wreath in Hitler's name. "There is no doubt that the Kaiser had the best intentions," Goebbels instructed the Nazi press, "but . . . the decisive factor in history is not goodwill but great ability." Boelcke, Secret Conferences, 172.

294. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 324–5. Beria (June 5) reported that "between June 1 and 5, the Romanian general staff had ordered all military personnel who are on leave as well as all reservists up to forty years of age on farming duty to report to their units." Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gitleara, 138–9 (TsA FSB, f. 30s, op. 8, d. 9, l. 68–9).

295. Omsk would not get equipment or shelving until late 1944 (around the time some materials would begin to be returned to Moscow). Vinogradov, "Istoriia formirovaniia arkhiva VChK," 37. Large numbers of files are still there.

296. Boelcke, Secret Conferences, 174 (June 5, 1941).

297. Cripps arrived in London on June 11, by way of Stockholm, where the general director of the Swedish foreign ministry, taken aback at Cripps's insistence on secret German-Soviet negotiations, shared details of Swedish intercepts of Wehrmacht orders to troops in Norway for an invasion of the USSR. The Swedish official stressed a coming attack in the week of June 20–25. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 304 (citing FO 371 29482 N2680/78/38, Mallet: June 8, and CAB 65/22/59 (41)2: June 12); Boheman, På Vakt, 154–5.

298. Samuelson, Plans for Stalin's War Machine, 197–8. Also on June 6, Stalin received a report that the USSR had 5.7 million wired radio receiver points, more than 80 percent of all its radio equipment, but that the wires were in disrepair, subject to interruption and breakdown. The other 20 percent, wireless radios, were deemed below international standard. Altogether, whereas the United States had 343 receivers (wireless and wired) for every 1,000 people, and Nazi Germany 159, the Soviet Union had just 36. Lovell, Russia in the Microphone Age, 41 (citing GARF, f. 6093, op. 1, d. 56, l. 10–2, 13–4, 19).

299. Lota, “Alta' protiv 'Barbarossy,” 308. This was her last meeting with Zaitsev (“Bine”), who was recalled to Moscow; she was assigned a new handler, Anatoly Staritsky (“Tal”), a radio specialist, who was to teach her cipher codes and met with her on June 12.

300. Pavlov, “Ot ‘Iunkersa’ 1941 k Tsessne 1987”; Kuznetsov, “Krutye povoroty,” esp. no. 6 (1993): 79; Stepanov, “O mashtabakh repressii,” no. 5: 62; Medvedev, Let History Judge, 473.

301. Stalin arrested the family members of the military men he executed, but when one of his behind-the-lines saboteurs was killed in the line of duty, the despot awarded a 25,000-ruble cash award to the family and a pension to the widow of 500 rubles per month (the salary of the deceased). Khaustov, “Deiatel'nost' organov,” 261–2 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 4, d. 105, l. 205).

302. Timoshenko and Zhukov reported that in the first quarter of 1941, there had been 156 crashes killing 141 crew and destroying 138 aircraft. Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph, 375 (citing TsAMO, f. 75284, op. 1, d. 119, l. 18). From Sept. 1, 1939, through June 22, 1941, the Luftwaffe, in training at flight schools, lost 1,924 killed and another 1,439 injured. Additionally, units in combat in the same period, in accidents and disasters, lost 1,609 killed and 485 injured. On average, this was 248 people a month. Solonin, “Delo aviatorov.”

303. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKa, 135, 381. Kulik had sidetracked the Soviets' own superior F-34 tank gun, whose production had been initiated by others, and even got Stalin to cut production of the versatile 76-mm antitank gun. “Disorganized but with a high opinion of himself, Kulik thought all his actions infallible,” recalled his first deputy. “Holding his subordinates in a state of fear was what he considered to be the best way of working.” Voronov, Na sluzhbe voennoi, 163. See also Pospelov, Istoriia Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny, I: 414–6, 475–6; Zakharov, Nakanune velikikh ispytaniy, reprinted in idem., General'nyi shtab, 391; “Nakanune voiny: iz postanovlenii vysskhkh partiinykh i gosudarstvennykh organov (Mai 1940 g.—21 iunია 1941 g.),” 201–3; Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 367; Vannikov, “Iz zapisok narkoma vooruzheniia”; Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 62–3. When Khrushchev overstepped his writ and questioned Kulik's competence, Stalin exploded: “You don't even know Kulik! I know him from the civil war when he commanded the artillery in Tsaritsyn. He knows artillery!” Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 283–4.

304. Kuznetsov and Dzhoga, Pervye geroi Sovetskogo Soiuz, 54. Rychagov was succeeded by his deputy, the forty-one-year-old Pavel Zhigaryov. Rychagov had proven his mettle in Spain in 1936 and at Lake Khasan in 1938. During the Finnish War, his forces, the 8th Army, had been surrounded and practically annihilated. See also “Beseda s admiralom flota Sovetskogo Soiuz I. S. Isakovym [May 21, 1962],” in Simonov, Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia, 372–9.

305. Gavrilo, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 671–2 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 7237, d. 2, l. 120–1). The Germans were issuing knowingly false military radio reports, overheard by Soviet signals intelligence agents, about the movement of their troops into Romania and Hungary, as if they were preparing to strike Ukraine. Mel'tiukhov, Upushchennyi shans Stalina, 252, 296–7. See also Andrew and Gordievsky, KGB, 174, 178–82, 225–6.

306. The envoy was Anatoly Lavrentyev (b. 1904), who until 1939 had worked in the heavy industry commissariat. Vishlev, “Pochemu zhe” (no. 2), 75: PA AA Bonn: Büro des Staatssekretär, Russland, Bd. 5 (R 29716), Bl. 081 (113485); Vishlev, Nakanune, 50. The Slovak envoy in Moscow, according to the Germans, surmised that Stalin would satisfy German demands for whatever goods its war economy needed, but would not consent to placing Soviet territories under German rule. Nekrich, Pariabs, 229 (citing Bundesarchiw-Militärarchiw. RMII/34: 238: German naval attaché to Berlin, May 21, 1941).

307. An NKGB agent traveled the border on the German side, finding it saturated with troops in full combat gear hiding in the forests, with special weapons depots and oil tanks stuffed, and bridges fortified and heavily guarded. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 276–7 (citing TsA SVR, d. 21616, t. 2, l. 372–5: Kobulov to Timoshenko, June 9, 1941).

308. Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gtitera, 148–50 (TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 8, d. 58, l. 1841–5; June 9, 1941). See also Bezymenskii, Gitler i Stalin, 474.
309. Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 212 (TsA FSK; June 9, 1941). A note with the published document states that “the Japanese shared intelligence about the USSR with the Swedish, Turkish, Bulgarian and other embassies.”
310. Kumanev, “22ogo' na rassvete,” 3 (citing Timoshenko recollections, at the Institute of History, Feb. 19, 1967); Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 296–7; Whymant, Stalin's Spy, 184 (no citation). Timoshenko's recollections came after the Moscow showing of the film about Sorge. The Kremlin meeting could have happened on June 6, 1941. Vatutin evidently was also present. Gordetsky gives the date as June 18.
311. Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gtitera, 151 (TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 8, d. 58, l. 1846; June 11, 1941); “Sovetskies organy gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti v gody Velikoi otechestvennoi voiny.” See also Hilger and Mayer, Incompatible Allies, 334–6.
312. Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 219–20 (TsA FSK); Primakov, Ocherki, III: 486 (TsA FSB, f. 3 os, op. 8, d. 58, l. 1853–55); “Nakanune voiny (1940–1941 gg.),” 216. The NKGB First Directorate summary of Kobulov's report for the leadership altered the paragraph structure slightly, emphasizing the sentence: “Whether there will initially be some kind of demands presented to the Soviet Union is unknown.” Naumov, 1941 god, II: 342–3. Kobulov stressed that the recommendation of “Elder” to preempt the Germans was “straight from the heart,” not a “provocation.” Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 296 (citing TsA SVR, d. 23078, t. 1, l. 430–1). On June 9, 1941, border intelligence reported that as of May 28 the concentration of all troops against the USSR, including on the territory of the former Austria, the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, Greece, Romania, and Germany east of Berlin, reached approximately 4.5 million. “Furthermore, Major Wendel [the source at German HQ] said that this army is fully ready for war with the USSR.” Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 676–80 (TsAMO, f. 127, op. 12915, d. 16, l. 362–8).
313. Moritz, Fall Barbarossa, 192. All the German war updates for the USSR can be found in Whaley, Codeword, 251–6. Hitler had returned from the Berghof to Munich on June 11, 1941, and late the next day left for Berlin, arriving by train near noon on June 13. The next day, he delivered a final all-day briefing to his forty-five most senior commanders at the Reich chancellery. Warlimont, Inside Hitler's Headquarters, 605–6; Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 455 (June 14, 1941), 456 (June 14). On June 17 Hitler and then the High Command confirmed the timetable. Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, VI: 1001; Hillgruber, Hitlers Strategie, 508.
314. Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gtitera, 151–3 (TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 8, d. 58, l. 1857–50). See also Sinitsyn, Resident svidetel'stvo, 117–8 (referring to the agent “Monk,” who does not appear in the published intelligence materials); and Beshanov, Leningradskaia oborona, 28. The Soviet London station had reported on how Finland would join a German invasion of the USSR. TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 8, d. 57, l. 1178–9 (May 4), l. 1220–1 (May 7), l. 1373–4 (May 16); Naumov, 1941 god, II: 177 (TsA SVR, f. 23078, t. 1, l. 366; May 7). The NKGB reported a partial Finnish mobilization on June 13. Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gtitera, 156–7 (TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 8, d. 58, l. 1861–2).
315. Lota, “Alta” protiv “Barbarossy,” 309.
316. Beria added that from Oct. 1940 through June 10, the NKVD recorded 185 planes violating Soviet air space. He further reported that from Jan. 1 through June 10, more than 2,000 border violators from the German side had been detained. Many had grenades and portable radio stations. There were worries of biological warfare terror (vials with epidemic-inducing diseases). Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 220–1 (TsA FSK; June 12, 1941), 228 (TsA FSK).
317. On June 13, Dekanozov telegraphed Molotov about Soviet agents having observed a massive transport of troops and equipment toward the Soviet frontier: heavy artillery, tanks, trucks, planes. “Kanun voiny: preduprezhdeniia diplomatov,” 76. On June 14, Dekanozov added that the Swedish and Danish military attachés in Berlin no longer believed troop concentrations constituted a tactic to force concessions but instead amounted to “genuine preparation for a war against the Soviet Union.” Sipols, Tainy, 398–9. Dekanozov had met “Elder” and “Corsican” and was evidently persuaded by them that this was war, not an ultimatum. Sokolov, “Novye dannye.”
318. Vishlev, Nakanune, 163 (PA AA Bonn: Dienststelle Ribbentrop. Vertrauliche Berichte über Russland [Peter], 2/3 [R 27113], Bl. 462591–462594); Vishlev, “Pochemu zhe,” 94–5. Hitler did not trust Berlings, and on June 18 ordered “close surveillance” on him and, after the onset of hostilities, his arrest. In fact, he would be sent to Sweden. Vishlev, “Pochemu zhe,” 74 (citing ADAP, XII/ii: doc. 639, 645). The Russian press frequently cites a report by Yankel “Jan”

Chernyak ("Jean") on June 12 that the attack would commence on June 22 at 3:30 a.m. This warning, if it occurred, has not been published in the various collections of intelligence documents.

319. "These rumors," the bulletin stated, "are the clumsy product of the propaganda of forces inimical to the USSR and Germany, forces interested in the extension of the war." Also, the Soviet embassy on June 10 had reported word that Simon had begun secret negotiations with Hess on June 10. Rozanov, Stalin-Gitler, 203–4.

320. Izvestiia, June 14, 1941; Tsiminets, Vnesniaia politika SSSR, IV: 555–6. See also Werth, Russia at War, 125–6; Gafencu, Prelude to the Russian Campaign, 207–8. "The affairs of the TASS communique was a last resort," recalled Molotov late in life. "If we had been successful in delaying the war beyond the summer it would have been very difficult to start it in the autumn. So far, diplomacy had been very successful in delaying war, but no one could predict when it would fail." Chuev, Sto sorok, 42–3.

321. Andreas-Friedrich, Berlin Underground, 67–8. Other rumors, however, indicated an impending attack that very month. Boberach, Meldungen aus dem Reich, VII: 3374, 2380, 2394.

322. Herwarth, Against Two Evils, 195.

323. Sontag and Biddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 345–46.

324. Vishlev, "Pochemu zhe," 78 (citing PA AA Bonn: Dienststelle Ribbentrop, Vertaruliche Berichte über Russland [Peter], 2/3 [R 27113], Bl. 462597).

325. Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 455–6 (June 14); Warlimont, Inside Hitler's Headquarters, 147.

326. Vishlev, "Pochemu zhe," 76 (citing PA AA Bonn: Büro des Staatssekretär, Russland, Bd. 5 [R 29716], Bl. 051–054 [113455–113457], 066 [113470], 104–6 [113508–114510], 130–31 [113534–113535]; Jacobsen, Kriegstagebuch, I: 404.

327. Zhukov offers a colorful treatment of the call. Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 383; Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 367. For restrictions on measures to improve military readiness, see also Anflov, Krushenie pokhoda Gitlera, 98ff. Some Soviet commanders viewed the TASS communique as an indication that on high, somehow, they were averting war, despite the colossal buildup. But the general staff was told the TASS bulletin bore no relation to ongoing Soviet military preparations. Ivanov, Shtab armeiskii, 40; Vasilevskii, Delo vsei zhizni, 108.

328. Vasilevskii, Delo vsei zhizni, 43. The western military districts were also ordered to field headquarters. Mobilized units from Eastern Siberia and Mongolia, ordered west on May 22, were due to arrive in Ukraine (Berdichev, Proskurov, Shepetovka) between June 17 and July 10.

329. Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, IX: 376–81; Taylor, Goebbels Diaries, 414–6. See also Vishlev, Nakanune, 26–9, 151. Concerning Hitler's "silence" after the TASS bulletin, Gafencu, the Romanian envoy, telegraphed Bucharest (June 16) that "the war of nerves is at full blast, worsened by the news from Finland and Romania about more and more significant military preparations." Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 307. Köstring wrote to Berlin (June 18) that "gossip and rumors here have reached unfathomable magnitude. To transmit them would take whole volumes." Teske, General Ernst Köstring, 320.

330. Golikov's warnings were more balanced than many critics have asserted. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 87–9 (April 16, 1941), II: 119–20 (April 25, 1941), II: 213–5 (May 15, 1941), II: 324–5 (June 5, 1941), II: 333 (June 7, 1941); "Nakanune voiny (1940–1941 gg.)," 219–20; Iampol'skii et al., Organy. I/ii: 136–7 (May 5, 1941). But Golikov clashed over assessments of German troop concentrations with Novobranets, acting head of the information (analytical) bureau of military intelligence. Golikov was said to have used a derogatory name for the Ukrainian Novobranets (khokhol). Novobranets quotes a document from Beria, supposedly prepared on June 21, 1941: "Lt.-General F. I. Golikov, the head of military intelligence (where the Berzin band recently reigned), complains about his Colonel Novobranets, who also lies, claiming that Hitler has concentrated 170 divisions against us on our western border. But I and my people, Iosif Vissarionovich, firmly remember your wise forecast: Hitler will not attack us in 1941!" Novobranets, "Nakanune voiny," 176–8, 165; Krasnaia zvezda, Feb. 2 1991; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 46–7 (TsAMO, op. 7237, d. 2, l. 84–6; April 4, 1941).

331. Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 88–9; Coox, "Japanese Foreknowledge," 225; McNeal, Stalin, 237.

332. On May 20 Churchill told General Sikorski that a German attack on the USSR "does not seem to enter into consideration." On May 23, a British Joint Intelligence Committee report, which the Soviets obtained, noted: "With her usual thoroughness Germany is making all preparations for an attack so as to make the threat convincing.” Antonov, “Anatolii Gorskii.”

333. On June 13, the British Joint Intelligence Committee concluded that Stalin would make the concessions necessary to escape war. That day, Eden summoned Maisky, telling him to come alone; Maisky had no choice but to bring his minder, Novikov, which irritated Eden. The British foreign secretary explained the intensity of the German buildup, indicating the information came from extremely reliable sources, and pledged British assistance if the USSR were attacked. Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 361; Haslam, Near and Distant Neighbors, 115 (citing JIC [41] 251 [Final]: FO 371/29484). By June 10, Enigma intercepts made clear that attack would not commence until after June 15. Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, I: 472 (citing FO 371/29481, N 2498/78/38), 474 (citing CX/JQ/S11), 477, 479; Woodward, British Foreign Policy, 617, 619–20.

334. Barros and Gregor, Double Deception, 194–6 (citing PRO, PREM3/230/1).

335. Gorchakov, “Nakanune, ili tragediia Kassandry,” 21.

336. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 282–3, 305. Churchill wrote to his counterpart Smuts in South Africa (June 18), “According to all the information I have, Hitler is going to take what he wants from Russia, and the only question is whether Stalin will attempt a vain resistance.”

337. DGFP series D, XII: 1030; Frölich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, IX: 373–76; Vishlev, Nakanune, 58; Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 328, 330, 334; Fel’shtinskii, Oglasheniui podlezhit, 359.

338. Sorge added: “I saw a message to Germany that in the event a war arises between Germany and the Soviet Union, Japan will demand around six weeks before beginning an attack on the Soviet Far East, but the Germans think the Japanese will need more time, because that will be a war on land and sea . . .” Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 692 (TsAMO f. 23, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 454); Naumov, 1941 god, II: 380; Fesiun, Delo Rikhard Zorge, 120–1; Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 161 (photocopy of the original telegram). In a second message transmitted on June 17, Sorge clarified that his earlier message was indeed about nine full armies (150 divisions), not nine army corps. Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 692 (TsAMO f. 23, op. 5840, d. 7, l. 88).

339. Lota, “Alta” protiv “Barbarosy,” 349; Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 691. Military intelligence reported on June 15, that as of June 1 Germany had 286 to 296 total divisions, and had concentrated 120 to 122 of them on the Soviet frontier with Germany and Romania, and that this movement continued. Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 686–90 (June 15, 1941).

340. On June 16, “Corsican” informed Korotkov (“Stepanov”) about Rosenberg’s speech. Peshcherskii, “Krasnaia kapella,” 145.

341. Sinitsyn, Rezident svidetel’stvuet, 132–3; “Vospominaniia nachal’nika razvedki P.M. Fitina,” 18, 20–1; Sharapov, “Za sto chasov do voiny”; Lota, Sekretnyi front, 35–6; Chudodoev, “Chelovek iz ‘gruppy Ya,’” 18–24. See also Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 122–3. Fitin does not appear in Stalin’s office logbook; neither does the GB personnel Sinitsyn, Sudoplatov, or Rybkina-Yartsev. Bondarenko, Fitin, 222–3. On June 17 Merkulov and his two deputies, Bogdan Kobulov and Mikhail Gribov, were summoned to Stalin’s office (Molotov was also present) for some forty minutes (8:20–9:00 p.m.). Kobulov was back on June 18 for five minutes, in the company of Molotov, Timoshenko, Zhukov, and Malenkov. Na prieme, 336–7.

342. Primakov, Ocherki, IV: 17–25 (Fitin’s remembrances, evidently composed in 1970). Another version of Fitin’s recollections appeared in Pravda, May 8, 1989 (A. Baidakov, citing conversations with Fitin). This episode provoked the one systematization of NKGB intelligence: back at HQ, Fitin’s team would produce a “Calendar of Information Obtained through Corsican and Elder,” a chronological summary from the first report (Sept. 6, 1940) through the latest (June 16, 1941), running to eleven typed pages. “We were given all the material from every espionage station,” Rybkina recalled. “We got to work. Zhuravlyov and I did not leave the office. We looked at individual files, we looked at how much a source could be trusted, how their previously supplied information had been confirmed and so on. We did everything to make sure that the information was thoroughly tested and checked.” The Calendar conveyed that there would be a German invasion; only the details and timing were uncertain. Still, the compilers wondered whether Stalin’s skepticism could somehow be right, since he had not just their NKGB reports but also those of military intelligence, embassies, trade representatives, journalists, and who knew what else. Merkulov was in the Little Corner on the evening of June 20 for an hour, but, if the document was completed by then, he evidently shrank from presenting it to the despot. Nor did he sign it. Fitin was said to have returned it to Zhuravlyov with a notation: "You keep this. P[avel] F[itin], June 22." Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 286–96; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 400–7 (TsA FSB); Primakov, Ocherki, III: 431–2, 452, 493n33. Gorodetsky asserts (without citation) that the finalized document only got to Merkulov hours after the German attack, then made its way to the archives. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 297. In parallel to the Calendar [kalendar] compiled by the NKGB, military intelligence put together a List [perechen], which is undated. The list, which was not comprehensive, contained 56 reports of Germany's war preparations, 54 of them received since Jan. 1941. Fully 20 came from one source—Kegel ("X")—and 10 from another: Yeremin ("Yeshenko"). Thirty-seven offered a date for a German attack; some of the dates overlapped, but they varied and several were imprecise. Of the sixteen reports that indicated the principal thrust for a German attack, ten specified Ukraine. There is a high likelihood that the list was compiled after the invasion, in late June, perhaps in connection with Stalin's summons of Golikov, Timoshenko, and Zhukov on June 28, 1941 or shortly thereafter. Gavrilo, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 701–13; Lota, Sekretnyi front, 220–34 (citing TsAMO, op. 7272, d. 1, l. 87–98).

343. The report also said the Germans would target Svir-3 power station, which could be judged to have little military significance. Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gitlena, 161–3 (TsA FSB, f. 3os, op. 8, d. 58, l. 1914–6); "Nakanune voiny (1940–1941 gg)," 221; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 382–3 (APRF, f. 3, op. 50, d. 415, l. 50–2); Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 236–7 (TsA FSK), 237–8; Primakov, Ocherki, III: 487–8 (TsA FSB, f. 3 os, op. 8, d. 58, l. 1914–6). Gorodetsky speculates that Stalin was rattled. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 296–7.

344. The Germans assumed that any British-Soviet negotiations would be leaked, and there were no such leaks (the British press was besotted with predictions of Hitler's blackmail of the USSR). Vishlev, "Pochemu zhe," 76–7 (citing PA AA Bonn: Büro des Staatssekretär, Russland, Bd. 5 [R 29716], Bl. 087 [113491], 146 [113540]; Dienststelle Ribbentrop UdSSSR-RC 7/1 [R 27168], Bl. 26071).

345. Hinsley et al., British Intelligence, I: 480–1 (CAB 65/22, WM [41] 60 CA, June 16).

346. "We argued for a long time, but Cripps clung to his views," Maisky added. Cripps, for his part, noticed that Maisky "seemed much less confident that there would be not be a war" and "now seemed very depressed." The editor of the Times (Geoffrey Dawson) also found Maisky suddenly persuaded that a German invasion was coming. Gorodetsky, Stafford Cripps in Moscow, 111–2; Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 305–6 (citing AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 352, d. 2402, l. 235–6; Maisky to Molotov; and f. 0171: Maisky's diary, June 18; and FO 371 29466 N3099/3/38: Cripps memo, June 19); Times archives, Dawson to Halifax, June 22. After Eden had failed to persuade Maisky that Britain had definitive intelligence showing a coming German invasion, Churchill and the British cabinet had taken the remarkable decision to share the Enigma intelligence. Cadogan had summoned Maisky and on June 16 recited German war preparations, then showed him a map of German troop concentrations on the border, in minute detail. Maisky's dispatch reporting the stages and numbers of Germany's buildup arrived in Moscow amid the silence in Berlin over the TASS bulletin, but the reaction, if any, remains unclear. "Kanun voiny: preduprezhdeniia diplomatov," 77–8; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 374; Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 303 (citing AVP RF, f. 059, op. 1, pap. 352, d. 2402, l. 214–5; Maisky to Molotov, June 16); Gorodetsky, Maisky Diaries, 361–3. The NKGB reported (June 17) on the movement of some German divisions, based on sources inside Britain, mentioning either "an undertaking of great scale, as the Germans maintain, or possibly . . . maximum pressure on the USSR." Naumov, 1941 god, II: 381–2 (TsA SVR, d. 21616, t. 2, l. 411).

347. Nekrich, Patrials, 229 (citing Bundesarchiw-Militärarchiw. RMII/34: 320: Köstring to Matzky).

348. Roberts, "Planning for War," 1320–1. Even Gorodetsky, who writes of "Stalin's failure to prepare for the German onslaught," admits that "even with hindsight, it is hard to devise alternatives which Stalin could have safely pursued. If he had made a preemptive strike, the blow would at best have softened but definitely not averted." Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 323.

CODA. LITTLE CORNER, SATURDAY, JUNE 21, 1941

1. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 306 (citing UD: Arkhiv 1920 ARS, HP/1557/LVIII, June 21, 1941). The citation contains a typo, indicating the Swedish ambassador in Berlin, but this was from Moscow.

2. Bismarck, Bismarck, The Man and the Statesman, II: 301.

3. Stalin might have taken a meal in his apartment in the company of the inner circle that afternoon; alternately, he could have done so later in the evening. Mikoyan would recall many years later that “we, politburo members, gathered in Stalin’s Kremlin apartment. . . . We left around 3:00 a.m.” The timing of Mikoyan’s account does not jibe with the Kremlin office logbook, in which, moreover, Mikoyan does not figure on June 21. Molotov late in life remembered that “on June 21, we stayed until 11 or 12 p.m. at Stalin’s dacha. Maybe we had even watched a movie. We used to do this often, watch a movie.” These times, too, are contradicted by the office logbook. Kumanev, Riadam so Stalinyim, 24; Mikoian, Tak Bylo, 388; Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 36; Na prieme, 337.

4. Anna Alliluyeva, Stalin’s sister-in-law, is the main source for the theory that an infected childhood bruise on his left arm had resulted in a chronically stiff elbow. Alliluyeva, Vospominaniia, 167.

5. Dokuchaev, Moskva, Kreml, Okhrana, 113–6. Stalin hated the black ravens, who shat on the monuments, so the Kremlin commandant fought an all-out war against them, trapping at least 35,000 birds, which were given as feed to the zoo.

6. Molotov recalled: “The tension was palpable in 1939 and 1940. Tensions ran very high.” Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 25.

7. German embassy personnel in Moscow did not know the precise date of the invasion. “I am personally very pessimistic, and although I do not know anything concrete, I think Hitler will launch a war against the USSR,” Schulenburg said at Köstring’s mansion (June 16) in a conversation the NKGB eavesdropped. “At the end of April I saw [Hitler] personally and completely openly I said to him that his plans for a war against the USSR are utter folly, that now is not the time to talk about war with the USSR. Believe me, for my candor I fell out with him and I’m risking my career and, perhaps, soon I’ll be in a concentration camp.” Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gitlera, 169–70 (TsA FSB, f. 30s, op. 8, d. 58, l. 1978–80; June 20, 1941).

8. “From June 10 to 17,” Merkulov wrote (June 18), “thirty-four people left the German embassy to return to Germany; the upper ranks were sending home their families and belongings.” Naumov, 1941 god, II: 384–5 (TsA FSB, f. 30s, op. 8, d. 58, l. 1945–8). That same day, Augusto Rosso, the Italian ambassador, went to see Schulenburg at his residence (the NKGB eavesdropped the conversation). The German ambassador admitted to receiving his own instructions to evacuate embassy staff families and non-essential employees. Rosso telegraphed Rome asking for instructions in the event of war, especially about what to do with documents. Altogether, NKGB counterintelligence, in Moscow and Rome, secured three versions, independent of one another, of the Rosso-Schulenburg exchange, reporting that Rosso noted Schulenburg’s lack of information, but wrote “in strict confidence he [Schulenburg] added that in his personal opinion . . . a military conflict was unavoidable and that it could break out in two or three days, possibly on Sunday [June 22].” Pronin, “Nevo!nye informatory Stalina,” 1–2 (citing FSB archives); Naumov, 1941 god, II: 389 (TsA FS); Iampol’skii et al., Organy. I/ii: 267–8. Sudoplatov commented on the June 19 report from the NKGB Rome station chief, “It appears we are being robustly disinformed.” In other words, a privileged conversation between allies—Germany and Italy—was intended to trick the Soviets into preparing for war and thereby provoke war. Under such reasoning, anything and everything the Germans did could be dismissed. The extraordinary achievement and exertions of total surveillance were in vain. Sharapov, “Za sto chasov do voiny.”

9. Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 693–4 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 24119, d. 2, l. 83).

10. Molotov added: “I will have a talk with I.V. [Stalin]. If anything particular comes of it, I will give a call!” Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 165–6 (June 21, 1941); Naumov, 1941 god, II: 416. Molotov late in life, to a question about anticipated blackmail, replied, “And why not think so? Hitler was an extortionist, to be sure. He could have been extorting concessions. . . . Around each issue there could have been extortion and deception and duplicity and flattery and . . . it’s hard to say really.” Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 30.

11. “Iz perepiska N. V. Valentinova-Vol’skogo s B. I. Nikolaevskim,” in Valentinov, Nasledniki Lenina, 214.

12. Valedinskii, “Organizm Stalina vpolne zdorovyi.” See also, among other important sources, RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 1289, l. 6, 6 ob., 22–3; d. 1482, l. 7 ob., 23.; Ilizarov, Tainaia zhizn’ Stalina, 113.

13. Tiulenev, Cherez tri voiny (2007), 224; Utesov, Spasibo, Serdse!, 249–50.

14. Simonov, Glazami cheloveka mogo pokoleniia, 422–3 (quoting an interview with Isakov in 1962).

15. Bullock understood that Hitler and Stalin possessed dissimilar personalities, but he portrayed them as two similar lower-class malcontents, ambitious yet resentful of the political regimes and social orders they lived under. Still, in his telling, neither represented a mere expression of supposed impersonal forces. On the contrary, he portrays each as uniquely decisive in the creation of their respective regimes and policies. In Overy's follow-up, the infrastructure of rule and systems of domination, rather than the persons, drive the respective systems, which emerged from the destruction of the Great War, sought to realize alternatives to the perceived failures of parliamentary order, and drew upon popular support. Overy understands that the two systems represented very different utopias. Still, he, too, overdoes the similarities. Bullock, Hitler and Stalin, 349, 977; Overy, Dictators.

16. Kumanev, Riadam so Stalinym, 409–10 (Chadayeve); Kuznetsov, Nakanune, 355, 370.

17. Recollections of one of Poskrybyshev's two daughters, Natalya: <http://sloblib.narod.ru/slob/poskreb.htm>. Poskrebyshev's first wife, Jadwiga, a Pole, had died in 1929 of tuberculosis.

18. Tyulenev wrote that he saw Timoshenko and Zhukov that evening at the defense commissariat, evidently before their audience with Stalin, and that he departed the city for his dacha in Serebryanni Bor, where his family was staying. Tyulenev, Cherez tri voiny (2007), 224, 226. This version of his memoirs—purportedly restoring censored parts—does not differ in essence from the earlier version regarding this episode: Tyulenev, Cherez tri voiny (1972), 123–4; Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 200–3. Admiral Kuznetsov recalled that Tyulenev, when giving a lecture, reminisced that he had been phoned by Stalin at 2:00 p.m. Kuznetsov, Nakanune, 357, which also appears in the first edition (1966), 329.

19. That day Cripps had visited Maisky on his own initiative, and sought to ensure cooperation following the German invasion that Cripps knew was coming. Maisky's detailed summary of the conversation was received in Moscow on June 22 at 11:00 a.m. "Iz neopublikovannykh dokumentov (Beseda I. Maiskogo) S. Krippsom 21 iunია 1941g.), 39. See also Vishlev, Nakanune, 51. Gorodetsky (personal communication) notes that Maisky had decided to spend the weekend at the country house of his old friend, Negrín, the last Spanish Republican prime minister, and that the envoy would be genuinely surprised when he heard the news of war. Beyond his fear of crossing Stalin, he could not get out of his head that all the warnings might just be a self-serving British provocation. Supposedly, Major General Susloparov ("Maro"), the military attaché and intelligence chief in Vichy, sent a message on June 21 that the invasion would begin the next morning, and Stalin wrote on it: "This information is an English provocation. Clarify who is the author of this provocation and punish him." This document has not been published. Ivashutin, "Dokladyvala tochno," 57; Krasnaia zvezda, Feb. 2, 1991 (Ivashutin interview). Susloparov had told his French interlocutors (June 18) that Germany would not attack the USSR, that the rumors, being spread out of Germany (not Britain, as he formerly believed), formed part of the "pressure which the German government is expected to exert on Moscow to increase considerably the delivery of grain, oil products, and other raw materials, indispensable for continuing the war." Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 307–8 (citing Quai d'Orsay Archives, 835/Z312/2: 261–4). See also Trepper, Great Game, 127.

20. Later, Dekanozov would be accused of having edited reports to Moscow to downplay the attack warnings, at least through late May, but in June he began to try to reduce Soviet personnel (arrivals kept coming, however, including children and pregnant wives). On June 15, he summoned the courage to telegram Molotov: "The news is that now people do not speak about the concentration as Germany demonstration to compel concessions from the USSR. Now they affirm that this is for genuine preparation for war against the Soviet Union." Berezkhov, History in the Making, 72; "Kanun voyny: preduprezhdeniia diplomatov," Vestnik Ministerstva inostrannykh del SSSR, 76–7. Lehmann ("Breitenbach"), in Gestapo counterintelligence, a Soviet source since 1929, evidently told his handler (now the young, inexperienced Boris Zhuravlyov) at a meeting in the outskirts of Berlin on the evening of June 19 that his Gestapo unit had received an order that Germany would invade the USSR on June 22 at 3:00 a.m. But no such communication has been published. Primakov, Ocherki, III: 348; Kolpakidi and Prokhorov, Vnesniaia razvedka Rossii, 454; Damaskin, Stalin i razvedka, 263–4. Beria supposedly erupted at Dekanozov (his former minion who now reported to Molotov and who sent the Lehmann message), writing to Stalin: "I again insist on the recall and punishment of our ambassador in Berlin, Dekanozov, who keeps on bombarding me with deza about a supposed Hitler attack on the USSR. . . . He reported that the attack commences tomorrow." But this document has not been published. Ivashutin, "Dokladyvala tochno," 57; Krasnaia zvezda, Feb. 2, 1991: 5 (Ivashutin interview); Lota, "Alta" protiv "Barbarossy," 283–4; Lota, Sekretnyi front, 46. See also Krasnaia zvezda, June 16 and 21, 2001; and Nezavisimoe voennoe obozrenie, 2001, no. 22: 7.

21. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 377.
22. Gavrilov, Voennaiia razvedka informiruet, 694 (TsAMO f. 23, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 463); Naumov, 1941 god, II: 398–9 (TsAMO, op. 24127, d. 2, l. 463); Fesiun, Delo Rikhard Zorge, 121.
23. On June 21, Berlings (“Peter”) reported to his German handlers that Filippov, the TASS journalist-intelligence operative, told him: “We are firmly convinced that Hitler has ventured a colossal bluff. We do not believe that the war could begin tomorrow . . . It is clear that the Germans intend to exert pressure on us in the hope of attaining advantages, which Hitler needs for continuation of the war.” Vishlev, Nakanune, 61 (PA SS Bonn: Dienststelle Ribbentrop. Vertrauliche Berichte über Russland [Peter], 2/3 [R 27113], Bl. 462604–62605), 164; Vishlev, “Pochemu zhe,” 96.
24. Hitler had shifted the date of attack (something that could have been expected). There were many contradictions among the reports. Vinogradov et al., Sekrety Gitolera, 11–2, 17; “Predislovie,” in Gavrilov, Voennaiia razvedka informiruet, 6. Molotov complained that as 1941 progressed, he “spent half a day every day reading intelligence reports. What was not in them! What dates did they not name!” He added: “I think you cannot rely on intelligence officers. You have to listen to them, but you have to check up on them. Intelligence operatives can push you into such a dangerous position that you do not know where you are.” Chuev, Sto sorok, 31–2; Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 22. Hitler, according to an interview with Halder on June 19, 1958, had told him in Aug. 1938, “You will never learn what I am thinking. And those who boast most loudly that they know my thoughts, to such people I lie even more.” Deutsch, Conspiracy Against Hitler, 32.
25. Zhukov stated in 1965, “I well remember the words of Stalin, when we reported the suspicious actions of German forces: ‘Hitler and his generals are not such fools that they would fight simultaneously on two fronts, which broke their necks in World War I . . . Hitler does not have the strength to fight on two fronts, and Hitler would not embark on a crazy escapade.’” Zhukov continued: “Who at that time could doubt Stalin, his political prognoses? . . . We all were accustomed to viewing Stalin as a farseeing and cautious state leader, the wise Supreme Leader of the party and Soviet people.” Anflov, “Razgovor zakonchilsia ugrozoi Stalina,” 39–46; Lota, Sekretnyi front, 15 (citing RGVA, f. 41107, op. 1, d. 48, l. 1–58).
26. Hilger got it right: “Everything indicated that he [Stalin] thought that Hitler was preparing for a game of extortion in which threatening military moves would be followed by sudden demands for an economic or even territorial concessions. He seems to have believed that he would be able to negotiate with Hitler over such demands when they were presented.” Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 330.
27. It is a half-truth that Soviet intelligence performed its function and warned of the attack. No document has come forward analyzing the likelihood, let alone the contents, of Germany’s systemic campaign of deception while it was taking place.
28. Dahlerus, Last Attempt.
29. Iampol’skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 266–7; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 383; Primakov, Ocherki, III: 366; Grechko et al., Istoriia vtoroi mirovoi voiny, III: 254, 335–8.
30. NKVD transport had reported on German movements from summer 1940 and, in May and June 1941, produced memos of more than twenty numbered paragraphs. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 135–6, 157, 174–6, 268–9, 324–6, 426–7, 462–5, 541–2, 545–9, 656–8, 681–3, 800–3, II: 279–82, 306–7; Iampol’skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 299, I/ii: 19–21, 56–60, 62–4, 79–80, 82–5, 85–7, 96–7, 108–10.
31. On May 17, 1941, Merkulov had reported to Stalin, Molotov, and Beria on mass arrests and deportations of anti-Soviet elements in the Baltic republics (some 40,000). On June 21, Merkulov reported 24,000 arrests and deportations in western Belarus. GARF, f. 9475, op. 1, d. 87, l. 121, in Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 21. See also container 15.
32. Iampol’skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 297.
33. Gefter, Iz etikh i tekhn let, 262–3.
34. Chuev, Molotov Remembers, 179.
35. The notion of Stalin’s willful blindness to coming war retains the stature of folklore. The accusation, engagingly delivered in Nekrich, 1941, 22 iunია, gained weight when Nekrich was persecuted and his book removed from Soviet libraries. But already by 1939, the Soviets counted more than 10,000 aircraft (versus less than 1,000 in 1931), and nearly 3,000 armored vehicles (from a mere 740 in 1931). From the signing of the Pact through mid-1941, another 18,000 fighter planes and 7,000 armored vehicles and tanks had come off assembly lines. In 1941, the defense share of the state budget was set to exceed 40 percent. Davies et al., Economic Transformation of the Soviet Union, 299; Volkogonov, Triumfi tragediia, II/i: 65–80.

36. Anfilov, Doroga k tragedii, 104.

37. To evaluate Soviet strength, the Nazi regime relied partly on Germans who had been born in the Soviet Union or lived there but were then expelled, and, “like émigrés everywhere, they underestimated the strengths of their former place of residence and overestimated the animosity of the people against their own government.” Herwarth, Against Two Evils, 187.

38. “Stalin was not a cowardly person,” wrote Zhukov, “but he well understood that the country’s leadership, which he headed, had been manifestly tardy with the fundamental preparations for the country’s defense in such a big war against such a powerful and experienced enemy as Germany.” Admiral Kuznetsov noted—in a passage excised from the book version of his memoirs—that Stalin’s “mistake was in miscalculating the date of the conflict. Stalin directed war preparations—extensive and many-sided preparations—on the basis of very distant dates. Hitler disrupted his calculations.” Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 368; Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 198 (Kuznetsov). See also Pospelov, Istoriia Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny, I: 479. “We of course cannot manage to avoid war before 1943,” Stalin was said to have told Meretskov in Jan. 1941. “We are being dragged in against our will. But it is not out of the question that we can stay out of the war until 1942.” Meretskov, Na sluzhbe narodu (1984), 197–8.

39. The Red Army had perhaps 13,000 tanks in western border regions, of which 469 were KV-1s and 832 were T-34s (they had begun to arrive in May–June). The Red Army had a large edge in combat aircraft. Morukov, Velikaia Otechestvennaia, I: 6; Pospelov, Istoriia Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny, I: 415, 475–6.

40. Stepanov, “O masshtabakh repressii.”

41. Only one in fourteen had higher military education. All these percentages were lower than they had been in 1937 for the far smaller officer corps. Another 1 million officers were in the reserves, perhaps a third of whom had some training. The officer corps had grown by more 2.5 times from 1937 to 1940, through the purges. Reese, Stalin’s Reluctant Soldiers; Cherushev, “Nevinovnykh ne byvaet . . .”; Kalashnikov et al., Krasnaia Armiia, 10–1.

42. Kuznetsov added of Stalin: “He brushed facts and arguments aside more and more abruptly.” Kuznetsov, however, has been disingenuous. In his telling, on June 21 he met Rear Admiral Mikhail Vorontsov, the Soviet naval attaché in Berlin, whom he had recalled to report in person and who had managed to travel by train from Berlin to Moscow. Vorontsov was full of details about the deployed German war machine, and Kuznetsov claimed he reportedly this immediately to Stalin. In fact, the naval commissar conveyed it as an example of a likely provocation. Kuznetsov writes in his memoirs that the last time he saw Stalin before the war was “June 13 or 14,” but he is in the logbook for June 21. Kuznetsov, Nakanune, 348–9, 355; Shustov, “No Other Ambassador,” 167; Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 579n5 (citing Der Spiegel, March 20, 1967: 135).

43. Khrushchev, Memoirs, I: 269, 273–4, 287–91. Soviet military journals in 1940–1 presented a frightening picture of German capabilities. Glantz, Stumbling Colossus, 258–9; Kononenko, “Germano-pol’skaia voina 1939 g.”; Kononenko, “Boi v Finlandii”; Kononenko, “Kratkii obzor voennykh deistvii na zapade”; Khorseev, “VVS v germane-pol’skoi voine”; Desiatov, “Operatsii v Norvegii”; Ratner, “Pororyv na Maase”; Belianovskii, “Desitviia tnikovyykh.” Zhukov would later state: “When I asked him [Stalin] to allow bringing the troops of the western frontier districts to full combat readiness . . . he brought me to the map and, pointing to the Near East, said ‘that’s where they [the Germans] will go.’” This could have been perhaps Stalin’s way of blunting Zhukov’s pressure without discussing with him the anticipated ultimatum. In any case, the despot had long abandoned any credence to an attack on British positions in the Near East. Anfilov, Doroga k tragedii, 195.

44. Kuznetsov, Nakanune, 357 (citing a conversation with Pronin) and in the first edition (1966), 329. See also Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 108. The Moscow province party committee was holding a plenum (June 20–1). Pravda, June 22, 1941. Yakov Chadayev, the government notary, was quoted as stating that Stalin “summoned them.” Neither Shcherbakov nor Pronin appear in the office logbook; they could have been received in the apartment, which seems unlikely given their low stature. The prohibition on use of electric lighting applied to residences as well. As of 1941, only 68 families, 239 people, still resided in the Kremlin, most of them widows and pensioners (such as the widows of Sverdlov and Orjonikidze); this was down from 374 people in 1935 (not including service personnel and guards) and 2,100 in 1925.

45. Voronov, Na sluzhbe voennoi, 175; Tiulenev, Cherez tri voiny (1960), 138. As Zhukov wrote, “The Soviet Government did everything possible so as not to give any justification for Germany to start a war. This determined everything.” Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 340.

46. As of June 1, 1941, Golikov estimated German divisions arrayed near the joint frontier at 120–2, along with 122–6 arrayed against Britain in the West, Norway, Italy, Crete, and Africa, plus 44–48 of reserves. He noted that in “transferring significant forces from Yugoslavia, Greece, and Bulgaria to Romania, the Germans are to a great degree strengthening their right flank”—in the direction of Ukraine. Gavrilov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 520, 646–7 (TsAMO, f. 23, op. 7237, d. 2, l. 114–6).

47. These Soviet divisions, to reach full strength, needed more than 1 million reservists to join them. Zolotarev et al., Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XIII (II/i): 7–8, 11, 77, 581; Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 359. Another source gives a figure of 3,900 German aircraft, 60 percent of their air force, plus 1,000 planes of Romania and Finland. Pospelov, Istoriia Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny, II: 9.

48. The totalitarian Soviet state, with its vast armed forces, was the only one not fully mobilized, “an absolutely impossible, improbable situation,” as one analyst noted. Mark Solonin, “Tri plana tovarishcha Stalina,” 71. On June 18, the Soviet Union observed the fifth anniversary of Gorky’s death. Pravda, June 18, 1941; Artizov and Naumov, Vlast’ i khudozhestvennaia intelligentsiia, 474 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1041, l. 8). At the defense commissariat on June 19, Major General Mikhail Kazakov, commander of the staff of the Central Asian military district, who had been summoned to Moscow, and others were shown a German film of the Wehrmacht being greeted warmly in the Balkans by Slavic females bearing wine and flowers. Kazakov would recall that Vasilevsky told him, “We’ll be lucky if it doesn’t begin in the next fifteen to twenty days.” Kazakov, Nad kartoi bylykh srazhenii, 69–70; Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 188–9.

49. The work was supposed to be completed by July 15, 1941. Zolotarev et al., Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XIII (II/i): 280–2 (RGVA, f. 4, op. 11, d. 62, l. 201–3, 204–5).

50. On the many local measures undertaken to bring Soviet forces to combat readiness, especially the initiatives in the Baltic region, and their countermanning under threat, see Sbornik boevykh dokumentov Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny, XXXIV: 7–11 (f. 344, op. 2459ss, d. 11, l. 30–6), 21–4 (f. 221, op. 7833ss, d. 3, l. 17–21); Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 199–200 (Colonel General Kuznetsov); Kuznetsov, “Voenno-Morskoi flot nakanune Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny,” 72–3; Kuznetsov, Nakanune, 343–4; Voronov, Na sluzhbe voennoi, 175–8; Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 386–7; Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 82–3; Anflov, “Razgovor zakonchilsia ugrozoi Stalina,” 42. Zhdanov conspicuously departed Leningrad for holiday in Sochi on June 19; this had to be approved by the politburo.

51. Sudoplatov was not to allow “German provocateurs to stage actions like those against Poland in 1939.” He recalled that, at the office on the night of June 21, “I sensed the danger of military provocation or conflict but not the magnitude of the full-scale invasion that followed.” Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 123–5. See also Possony, “Hitlers Unternehmen ‘Barbarossa.’” Soviet intelligence was reporting that Ukrainian schools in German-occupied Poland were teaching the geography of a forthcoming independent Ukraine and that many Ukrainian nationalists, and even some Poles with eyes on Ukraine’s territory, were keen to stage provocations to provoke a German attack on the Soviet Union. Naumov, 1941 god, I: 135–6, 157, 174–6, 268–9, 324–6, 426–7, 462–5, 545–8, 656–8, 681–3; Iampol’skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 172–87 (May 31, 1941).

52. Iampol’skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 266–7; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 383; Primakov, Ocherki, III: 366; Grechko et al., Istoriia vtoroi mirovoi voiny, III: 254, 335–8.

53. Kumanev, Riadom so Staliny, 23–4 (Mikoyan); Na prieme, 337 (Mikoyan is listed as arriving at 8:15 p.m. and leaving four hours later). The Soviet navy reported that German engineers and specialists working in Leningrad on a battleship acquired from Germany had left, but in response, Molotov told Admiral Kuznetsov, “Only a fool would attack us!” Zhdanov similarly assured Kuznetsov that the Germans were concentrating forces as a means of exerting psychological pressure and would never open a two-front war. Kuznetsov, “Voenno-Morskoi flot nakanune Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny," 73; Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 190–1 (Kuznetsov); Watson, Molotov, 187. Beria is not listed in the logbook for Stalin's Kremlin office between appearances on June 10 and June 20.

54. They would be confiscated as war booty. Pantelev, Morskoi front, 36. By June 1941, Nazi Germany was heavily in debt to the Soviet Union.

55. This was the second time that day that Kegel had risked an in-person meeting with his handler. In June 1941 alone, he met his military intelligence handler Leontyev nine times in person. Separately, Beria was reporting to Stalin from his agents that the smoke from burning documents in German embassy inner courtyard could be seen from great distance; some thought it was a fire. Krasnaia zvezda, June 16 and 21, 2001; Nezavisimoe voennoe obozrenie, 2001, no. 22; 7. Leontyev (b. 1911) had not thought to arrange for contacts with Kegel after the predicted war broke out. Lota, "Alta" protiv "Barbarossy," 443 (V. V. Bochkarev).

56. How Stalin reacted to Kegel's information remains unknown. Gavrillov, Voennaia razvedka informiruet, 711–3; Lota, Sekretnyi front, 58–60; Kegel, V vuriakh nashego veka (the German original was published in 1983). Kegel had spoken directly with Walter Schellenberg, the head of political intelligence for the SS, who had evidently visited the USSR under the cover of a chemical industry representative. Kiknadze, "Gerkhard Kegel," 124; Vasil'evich and Sgibnev, "Podvig v teni eshafota," 106.

57. "The Master in an agitated state just talked to Timoshenko . . . Apparently something is expected . . . you yourself could guess . . . the German attack," Poskryobyshev supposedly said to Chadaev. "A German attack is possible." Kumanev, Riadam so Stalinyim, 410. In a draft decree, written in pencil by Malenkov with many crossouts, dated, in someone else's hand, June 21, and not entered into the approved protocols, Tyulenev was to be appointed commander of the "southern front" with two armies. Meretskov was to be named commander of the northwestern front; Zhukov, of the southwestern front, where the main German attack was expected. Zaporozhets was to become his deputy, and in the latter's place Mekhlis was to be restored to head of the Red Army political directorate. "Nakanune voiny: iz postanovlenii vysshikh partiinykh i gosudarstvennykh organov (Mai 1940 g.–21 iunია 1941 g.)," 209–10 (with facsimile); APRE f. 3, op. 50, d. 125, l. 75–6.

58. Zhukov does not name the defector, and more than one crossed that night into Soviet territory (perhaps as many as four). Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 386–9. See also Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 105–6; and Khrushchev, Vospominaniia, I: 299–301. See also Fediuninskii, Podniatie po trevoge, 10–2; Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 241–2 (Fediunsky). Sevastianov, Neman-Volga-Dunai, 5; and Naumov, 1941 god, II: 279–82 (TsA SVR RF, d. 21616, t. 2, l. 389–97; May 30, 1941).

59. Na prieme, 337. Budyonny had not been in Stalin's office for two months, according to the logbook.

60. On the evening of June 21, Meretskov would later recall, Timoshenko told him, "Gain whatever time we can! A month, a month and a half, another week. It is possible the war will start tomorrow." Meretskov, Na sluzhbe narodu (1984), 205; Meretskov, Na sluzhbe narodu, 209–10.

61. Simonov, "K biografii G. K. Zhukova," 106.

62. Zhukov, Vospominaniia, I: 387. Zhukov recalls that his deputy Vatutin accompanied them. Vatutin does not appear in Stalin's logbook. Timoshenko and Zhukov were in Stalin's office at least nineteen times in the last three months, including six in June, but the despot did not receive them between June 11 and 18. In that interval only Vatutin was in the Little Corner, on June 17 for half an hour (Molotov and Kagnovich were there); on June 18 Stalin received the military men for four hours and thirty-five minutes. Na prieme, 336–7.

63. Goebbels continued: "Should have been made six months ago." (In fact, seven months ago Molotov had been in Berlin.) Goebbels added: "I read a comprehensive report on Russian-Bolshevik radio propaganda. It will give us some real problems, because it is not so stupid as the English material. Probably written by Jews." Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, I, IX: 391–93 (June 21); Taylor, Goebbels Diaries, 420. A request for Molotov to meet Hitler on June 18 was also recorded by Halder, Kriegstagebuch, II: 458–9 (June 20); Halder, Halder Diaries, II: 960.

64. Dekanozov appeared at 6:00 p.m. on June 18, but despite an audience of fifty minutes, managed only to complain about German delays in issuing exit visas for a Soviet consular official in Königsberg, ships at Baltic ports, and the costs of building a bomb shelter. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 386–7 (AVP RF, f. 082, op. 24, pap. 106, d. 7, l. 94–7).

65. Hill, Die Weizsäcker-Papiere, 260 (June 18); DGFP series D, XII: 1050; Weizsäcker, Erinnerungen, 317.

66. The protest listed 260 flight violations between March 27 and June 19. On June 20, the NKVD border guard had reported that just since June 10, there had been 86 more unauthorized reconnaissance flights from Greater Germany, Finland, Hungary, and Romania. Solov'ev and Chugunova, Pogranichnye voiska SSSR, 755–6.

67. The play was a production of the Franko Ukrainian Academic Theater on tour in Moscow. Pravda, June 22, 1941. See also Dallin, Soviet Russia's Foreign Policy, 375. Whether Stalin might have been ready to offer far-reaching concessions remains a matter of speculation. Mastny, Russia's Road to the Cold War, 34.

68. Vishlev, Nakanune, 64–72 (citing Politisches Archiv des Auswärtigen Amts Bonn: Büro des Staatssekretär, Russland, BD. 5 [R 29716], Bl. 049 [113453]–053 [113457], 100 [113504], 103 [113507]–105 [113509], 112 [113516], 125 [113529]–126 [113530], 130 [113653]; Dienststelle Ribbentrop, Vertrauliche Berichte, 2/2 Teil 2 [R 27097], Bl. 30853; Dienststelle Ribbentrop, UdSSR-RC, 7/1 [R 27168], Bl. 26051, 26097–8; Dienststelle Ribbentrop, Vertrauliche Berichte über Russland [Peter], 2/3 [R 27113], Bl. 462607). Some of the information being spread was true: that the Soviet Union was making plans for population, industrial, and government evacuations eastward; that the USSR had refrained from forced collectivization in the Baltic states; that the regime was undertaking measures to stimulate Soviet patriotism. These whisperings about Stalin being Nazi Germany's best hope, and under internal threat for that reason, were advanced “in strictest confidence” by Amayak Kobulov and Ivan Filippov to their German interlocutors in Berlin, by a Soviet intelligence operative in Stockholm, and others elsewhere.

69. Simonov, “Zametki,” 53. According to Zhukov, Stalin was aware of and to a degree accepted the argument of German propaganda that Wehrmacht forces were stationed on the border partly because Soviet forces were there and Germany had no ultimate guarantee that Stalin would not attack preemptively.

70. Zhukov later wrote that Stalin said: “Germany is up to its neck in war in the West, I believe Hitler would never risk creating a second front for himself by attacking the Soviet Union. Hitler is not such a fool that he fails to understand the Soviet Union is not Poland, not France and that it is not even England and all these taken together.” Timoshenko supposedly asked, “What if it does happen?” and requested bringing the frontier troops to a war footing and sending more westward, but Stalin refused, designating their proposal tantamount to “launching a war.” Zhukov, Vospominaniia (1995), I: 383–4; Naumov, 1941 god, II: 500 (RGVA, f. 41107, op. 1, d. 48, l. 1–58).

71. Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 353–4; DGFP, series D, XII: 1059; Taylor, Goebbels Diaries, 423; Berezkhov, S diplomaticheskoi misiei, 78–106; Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 215–6 (Berezkhov).

72. Schulenburg was said to have observed of the Pact: “I gave my all in order to work toward good relations between Germany and the Soviet Union, and in some ways I have achieved my aim. But you know yourself that in reality I have achieved nothing. This treaty will lead us into the second world war and bring ruin upon Germany . . . This war will last for a long, long time, just as did the First World War.” Wegner-Korfes, “Ambassador Count Schulenburg,” 187–204; Fleischhauer, Der Pakt, 400.

73. Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 307 (citing UD:s Arkhiv 1920 ARS, HP/1557/LVII, Swedish ambassador in Moscow, June 16). According to the unpublished memoir of his daughter, American ambassador Steinhardt observed at the Moscow airport how von Walther, in tears, had had to part with his beloved boxer, which was being shipped back to Berlin. Lukes, On the Edge of the Cold War, 75–6 (citing Steinhardt Sherlock, “R.S.V.P.,” 65; interview with Laurene Sherlock and Peter Rosenblatt, Oct. 27, 2007).

74. Schmidt, Statist auf diplomatische Bühne, 214.

75. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 414–5 (AVP RF, f. 06, op. 3, pap. 1, d. 5, l. 8–11), 416 (l. 1: text of the protest); Iampol'skii et al., Organy, I/ii: 370–1; DGFP, XII: 1070–1; Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 355–6 (Schulenburg account); DVP SSSR, XXIII/ii: 751–2; Hilger and Meyer, Incompatible Allies, 335–6; Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 310 (citing AVP RF, f. 06, op. 3, pap. 1, d. 5, l. 6–7). Schulenburg's summary reached the foreign ministry in Berlin at 2:30 a.m. on June 22. See also Vishlev, “Pochemu zhe,” 80; and Fel'shtinskii, Oglasheniuiu podlezhit, 371–6.

76. Molotov's departure to receive Schulenburg was not recorded. Na prieme, 337.

77. Kumanev, Riadom so Stalinym, 409–10 (Chadayevev); Kuznetsov, Nakanune, 355.

78. Zolotarev et al., Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia, XIII (II/i), 282 (TsAMO, f. 48–A, op. 1554, d. 90, l. 257–9); Naumov, 1941 god, II: 423; Pospelov, Istoriia Velikoi Otechestvennoi voyny, II: 11; Zakharov, General'nyi shtab, 224–5; Zhukov, Vospominaniia (1971), 233–4; Zhukov, Vospominia (1995), I: 387. See also Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 110; and Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 311.

79. Beria at some point left and came back, but only his re-arrival was recorded in the logbook. Others present might have come and gone without their movements having been recorded.

80. Erickson, Road to Stalingrad, 114–5; Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 193 (Kuznetsov).

81. DGFP, series D, XII: 1061–3; Sontag and Beddie, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 353–4; Vishlev, “Pochemu zhe,” 80; Taylor, Goebbels Diaries, 423. Precisely when Dekanozov informed Moscow of his failure remains unclear. Berezkhov, the Soviet embassy employee who claimed he had been tasked with phoning the German foreign ministry to obtain the meeting with Ribbentrop, wrongly implied that no meeting had been arranged until the German foreign ministry itself called back at 3:00 a.m. Berlin time (5:00 a.m. Moscow time) with a summons for Dekanozov. Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 215–6 (Berezkhov).

82. “Stalin sought by the condition and behavior of troops in the border military districts to make it clear to Hitler that we had a quiet atmosphere, bordering on carelessness,” recalled army general Semyon Ivanov. He characterized this as a form of criminal self-demobilization. Ivanov, Shtab armeiskii, 104–6.

83. Lieutenant General Nikolai Klich, head of artillery in the Western special military district, told Colonel Ilya Starinov of Pavlov’s phone calls to Moscow about every ominous development: “Always the same reply—‘Don’t panic! Keep calm! ‘The Boss’ knows everything.’” Bialer, Stalin and His Generals, 222–3 (Starinov).

84. The defector was Alfred Liskow. (Nekrich writes that he crossed the border around 11:00 p.m.) The NKGB established that he was a lance corporal, thirty years old, a furniture joiner and Communist (before Hitler’s rise), who said that his unit had been told they would cross the Bug River on boats and pontoons in a few hours. Liskow was still being held by the NKGB when the German attack commenced. Naumov, 1941 god, II: 422; “Nakanune voiny (1940–1941 gg.),” 218; Nekrich, 1941, 22 iuinia, 197.

85. Germany continued to send military equipment to the Soviets in June, with Göring and others reasoning that the Soviets would never be able to make full use in time of the advanced technology that was delivered. Von Strandmann, “Appeasement and Counter-Appeasement,” 171 (citing HA Krupp, WA 40, B, C 381); Schwendemann, Wirtschaftliche Zusammenarbeit, 265–79.

86. Pavlov, in testimony after his arrest, would not mention Timoshenko mentioning Directive No. 1, but he would note that when he hung up the phone, he (Pavlov) had ordered all units to combat readiness. <http://liewar.ru/tragediia-22-iyunya/178-protoko-ly-doprosa-d-g-pavlova.html> (Pavlov testimony, July 7, 1941, with commentary). Pavlov might have spoken with Timoshenko earlier, from the theater, by a special telephone brought in for just such a contingency.

87. “Itinerar Hitlers vom 1.9.1939–31.12.1941,” 691. Hitler had written to Antonescu on June 14. Supposedly, already on June 12 Antonescu was let in on the closely guarded secret of the precise date of attack. Schmidt, Statist auf diplomatische Bühne, 233.

88. Goebbels added: “Feverish activity begins.” Fröhlich, Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, IX: 393–7 (June 22).

89. Pospelov, Istoriia velikoi otechestvennoi voiny, I: 478–9; Sechkin, Granitsa i voina, 54.

90. Zoller, Hitler Privat, 142–3 (Frau Christa Schroeder). Hitler was said to have told Below before retiring: “This will be the hardest struggle that our soldiers have to endure this war.” Below, Als Hitlers Adjutant, 279.

91. Mertsalov and Mertsalova, Stalinizm i voina, 164–7.

92. Gorodetsky, whose account of Stalin’s approach to foreign policy stands above all others in English, overreacted to attributions of Soviet expansionism to ideology. “Stalin was little affected by sentiment or ideology in the pursuit of foreign policy,” Gorodetsky wrongly imagined. “His statesmanship was rooted in Russia’s tsarist legacy, and responded to imperatives deep within its history . . . Stalin’s policy appears to have been rational and level-headed.” Obviously, Sovietization of the Baltic states, eastern Poland, Bessarabia, and Bukovina, or Stalin’s obsession with Trotsky and his terror, had nothing to do with realpolitik or level-headedness. Indeed, Gorodetsky himself writes, two pages on, of the “paranoiac atmosphere in the Kremlin.” Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion, 316, 318.

93. Hillgruber, Hitlers Strategie.

94. Hitler had expected Britain, as he told one of his top military men already back on June 23, 1940, to “knuckle under,” conceding Germany’s free hand on the continent. Förster, “Hitler Turns East,” 117 (citing Notizen des Wehrmachtsführungsamtes, BA-MA, RW 4/v. 581).

95. Hitler had also misunderstood British anti-Communism. The phlegmatic British had always been interested only in containment, not an anti-Bolshevik crusade, since the latter, even if successful, would just bring Nazi domination of the continent, so London took a similar approach to Moscow as to Berlin: engagement to try to “moderate” the regime. Waddington, “Idyllis and Unruffled Atmosphere.”

96. Hubatsch, Hitlers Weisungen, 129–39. See also DGFP series D, XII: 1012–6.

97. Overy, Why the Allies Won, 1–24.

98. To carry the consequences to their conclusion: Hitler would have either gone on to conquer the USSR, or been vanquished by the latter, which could have enveloped all of Europe. Catherwood, Balkans in World War Two, 170.

99. Schramm, Hitler, 125.

100. “The analyst can choose which problem he wishes to study, whereas the statesman’s problems are imposed on him,” Kissinger wrote. “The analyst can allot whatever time is necessary to come to a clear conclusion; the overwhelming challenge to the statesman is the pressure of time. The analyst runs no risk. If his conclusions prove wrong, he can write another treatise. The statesman is permitted only one guess; his mistakes are irretrievable.” Kissinger, Diplomacy, 27.

101. Gerwarth, Bismarck Myth, 128.

102. Speer, Inside the Third Reich, 135–9.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

ADAP: Akten zu Deutschen Auswärtigen Politik, 1918–45, serie B, 1925–1933, 18 vols. (Göttingen: Vandenhueck und Ruprecht.)

APRF: Russian Presidential Archive (former politburo archive)

AVPRF: Foreign Policy Archive of the Russian Federation

DBFP: Documents on British Foreign Policy, 1919–1939. 62 vols. London: H. M. Stationery Office, 1946–

DDF: Documents diplomatiques français, 1932–1939. 1ère Série: 1932–1935. 13 vols. 2ème Série: 1936–1939. 19 vols. Paris: Imprimerie nationale, 1964–81

DGFP: Documents on German Foreign Policy, 1918–1945, series C, series D. 13 vols. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1949

DVP SSSR: Dokumenty vneshnei politiki SSSR. 24 vols. Moscow: Politicheskaya literatura, 1957–92

FRUS: Foreign Relations of the United States Diplomatic Papers. Volumes I–III. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1949–1950

GAÑO: State Archive of Novosibirsk

GARF: State Archive of the Russian Federation

GF IML: Georgian Affiliate of the Communist Party Archive

GIAG: Georgia State Historical Archive

Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University

RGAE: Russian State Economic Archive

RGAKFD: Russian State Archive of Photographs and Film

RGALI: Russian State Archive of Literature and Art

RGASPI: Russian State Archive of Social and Political History (former central party archive)

RGVA: Russian Military Archive

TsAMO: Central Archive of the Ministry of Defense

TsA FSB: Central Archive of the Federal Security Service (former KGB)

Abbas-ogly, Adile. Moia Abkhaziia, moia sud'ba. Moscow: AST, 2009.

———. Ne mogu zabyt'. Moscow: AST, 2005.

Abbé, James E. I Photograph Russia. New York: R. M. McBride & Co., 1934.

Äbdiraïymuly, Serik, et al., eds. Golod v kazakhskoi stepi: pisma trevogi i boli. Alma-Ata: Qazaq Universiteti, 1991.

Abelschauser, Werner. "Germany: Guns, Butter, and Economic Miracles." In The Economics of World War II: Six Great Powers in International Comparison, edited by Mark Harrison. New York: Cambridge University, 1988, 122–76.

Abendroth, Hans-Henning. Hitler in der spanischen Arena: die deutsch-spanischen Beziehungen im Spannungsfeld der europäischen Interessenpolitik vom Ausbruch des Bürgerkrieges bis zum Ausbruch des Weltkrieges 1936–1939. Paderborn: F. Schöningh, 1973.

Abkhazia: dokumenty svidetel'stvuiut, 1937–1953. Sukhumi: Alashara, 1992.

Abkhazskaia oblastnaia organizatsiia kommunisticheskoi partii Gruzii v tsifrakh, 1921–1980. Sukhumi: Alashara, 1980.

Abramov, Ark. O pravoi oppozitsii v partii. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1929.

Abramov, N. A. "Osobaia missiia Davida Kandelaki," Voprosy istorii, 1991, no. 4–5: 144–56.

Abramov, Vadim. Evrei v KGB: palachi i zbertny. Moscow: Iauza/EKSMO, 2005.

Abylkhozhin, Zhuldzbek B., Manash K. Kozybaev, and Maqash B. Tatimov. "Kazakhstanskaia tragediia," Voprosy istorii, 1989, no. 7: 53–71.

Adamthwaite, Anthony. France and the Coming of the Second World War, 1936–1939. London: Frank Cass, 1997.

———. Grandeur and Misery: France's Bid for Power in Europe, 1914–1940. London: Arnold, 1995.

- Adibekov, G. M., and K. M. Anderson. "U menia odna nadezhda na tebia": poslednie pis'ma N. I. Ivanovicha I. V. Stalinu," Istoricheskii arkhiv, 2001, no. 3: 47–85.
- , et al., eds. Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Evropa: resheniia 'osoboi papki', 1923–1939. Moscow: Rosspen, 2001.
- , eds. Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b): povestki dnia zasedanii 1919–1952. 3 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 2001.
- , eds. Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)—VKP (b) i Komintern, 1919–1943: dokumenty. Moscow: Rosspen, 2004.
- Adzhubei, Aleksei. Të desiat' let. Moscow: Sovetskaiia Rossiia, 1989.
- Afanas'ev, A. V., ed. Oni ne molchali. Moscow: Politizdat, 1991.
- Afanas'ev, Iu. N. Inogo ne dano: perestroika—glasnost', demokratiia, sotsializm. Moscow: Progress, 1988.
- , et al., eds. Istoriia stalinskogo Gulaga, konets 1920-x—pervuaia polvina 1950-x godov: sbornik dokumentov. 7 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 2004–5.
- Afinogenov, Aleksandr. Dnevnik i zapisnye knigi. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel, 1960.
- . Izbrannoe. 2 vols. Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1977.
- Agabekov, G. S. ChK za rabotoi. Berlin: Strela, 1931.
- . G.P.U.: zapiski chekista. Berlin: Strela, 1930.
- . OGPU: The Russian Secret Terror. New York: Brentano's, 1931.
- Aganian, Tsatur P. Nersik Stepanian. Yerevan: Aistan, 1967.
- Agenko, K. P., et al., eds. Voennaia pomoshch' SSSR v osvoboditelnoi bor'be kitaiskogo naroda. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1975.
- "Agent angliiskoi razvedki sluchayno vstretil Vas . . .," Istochnik, 1996, no. 3: 161–2.
- Agriba, R. K., ed. Abkhazskaia oblastnaia organizatsiia kompartii Gruzii v tsifrakh, 1921–1980 gg. Sukhumi: Alashara, 1980.
- Agursky, Mikhail. "The Bolshevik Revolution as a Revolution of National Liberation," Journal of Communist Studies, 3/2 (1987): 177–84.
- . "Soviet Disinformation and Forgeries," International Journal on World Peace, 6/1 (1989): 13–30.
- . The Third Rome: National Bolshevism in the USSR. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1987.
- Ahmann, Rolf. Nichtangriffspakte: Entwicklung und operative Nutzung in Europa, 1922–1939. Baden-Baden: Nomos, 1988.
- Airapetian, M. E. Etapy vneshnei politiki SSSR, 1917–1941. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1941.
- Aitiev, T. A., and B. M. Ishmukhamedov. Torzhestvo leninskogo kooperativnogo plana v Kazakhstane. Alma-Ata: Nauka, 1969.
- Aizenberg, Isaac P. Valiutnaia Sistema SSSR. Moscow: Sotsial'no-ekonomicheskaiia literatura, 1962.
- A. K. "Kratkii kurs istorii SSSR," Bol'shevik, 1937, no. 17: 84–96.
- Akhmatova, Anna. "Mandelstham (Listki iz dnevnika)." In Sochineniia. 2 vols. Washington, D.C.: Inter-Language Literary Associates, 1967–8, II: 166–87.
- Akhmedabiev, Aleksandr. "I opiat' o mifakh," Chernovik, March 11, 2015. Available at <http://chernovik.net/content/hronograf/i-opyat-o-mifah>.
- Akhmedov, Ismail. In and Out of Stalin's GRU: A Tatar's Escape from Red Army Intelligence. Frederick, MD: University Publications of America, 1984.
- Albrecht, Richard. "Wer redet heute noch von der Vernichtung der Armenier?" Kommentierte Wiederveröffentlichung der Erstpublikation von Adolf Hitlers Geheimrede am 22. August 1939," Zeitschrift für Weltgeschichte, 9/2 (2008): 115–32.
- Aldanov, Mark. Bol'shaia Lubianka. Moscow: Olma, 2002.
- . Sovremenniki. 2nd ed. Berlin: Slovo, 1932.
- Aldazhumanov, Kaidar. "Krest'ianskoe dvizhenie soprotivleniia." In Deportirovannye v Kazakhstan narody: vremia, sud'by, edited by A. K. Kekilbaev. Almaty: Arys, 1998, 66–93.
- , et al., eds. Nasil'stvennaia kollektivizatsiia i golod v Kazakhstane, 1931–1933 gg.: dokumenty i materialy. Almaty: XXI vek, 1998.

- Aldcroft, Derek. "The Versailles Legacy," History Review, no. 29 (1997): 8–13.
- Aleksandrov, Grigorii. Epokha i kino. Moscow: Politicheskaya literatura, 1976.
- Aleksandrov, Viktor A. Delo Tukhachevskogo. Rostov-na-Donu: Rostovskii universitet, 1990, 163–4.
- Alekseev, M. A., et al. Entsiklopediia voennoi razvedki. Moscow: Kuchkovo pole, 2012.
- Aleksei Ivanovich Rykov: kratkaya biografii. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1927.
- Alexandrovskii, Sergei. "Munich Witness's Account," International Affairs [Moscow], 1988, no. 12: 119–32.
- Alexopoulos, Golfo. "Exposing Illegality and Oneself: Complaint and Risk in Stalin's Russia." In Reforming Justice in Russia, 1864–1996: Power Culture, and the Limits of Legal Order, edited by Peter H. Solomon, Jr. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1997, 167–89.
- Allen, Jr., David E. "The Soviet Union and the Spanish Civil War." PhD diss. Stanford University, 1952.
- Allen, Robert C. Farm to Factory: A Reinterpretation of the Soviet Industrial Revolution. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 2003.
- Alliluev, Vladimir. Khronika odnoi sem'i: Alliluevy-Stalin. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1995.
- Alliluyeva, Svetlana. Dvadsat' pisem k drugu. New York: Harper & Row, 1967.
- . Only One Year. New York: Harper & Row, 1969.
- . Tol'ko odin god. Moscow: Kniga, 1990.
- . Twenty Letters to a Friend. New York: Harper & Row, 1967.
- . Vospominaniia. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1946.
- Alliueva, Anna S. Vospominaniia. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1946.
- Allworth, Edward. The Modern Uzbeks: From the Fourteenth Century to the Present, A Cultural History. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution, 1990.
- Alpert, Michael. A New International History of the Spanish Civil War. 2nd ed. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Alt, K. "Die Wehrmacht im Kalkül Stalins." In Die Wehrmacht: Mythos und Realität, edited by R. D. Müller and H. E. Volkmann. Munich: Oldenbourg, 1999, 105–22.
- Amar, Tarik. "Sovietization as a Civilizing Mission in the West." In The Sovietization of Eastern Europe: New Perspectives on the Postwar Period, edited by Balázs Apor et al. Washington, D.C.: New Academia, 2008, 29–45.
- Ammende, Ewald. Human Life in Russia. London: George Allen and Unwin, 1936.
- Anchbadze, Z. V., et al., eds. Istoriia Abkhazskoi ASSR 1917–1937. Sukhumi: Alashara, 1983.
- Anderson, Kirill M., ed. Voennii sovet pri narodnom komissarii oborony SSSR, 1–4 iunia 1937 g.: dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: Rosspen, 2008.
- , ed. Kremlevskii kinoteatr, 1928–1953: dokumenty. Moscow: Rosspen, 2005.
- Andreas-Friedrich, Ruth. Berlin Underground, 1938–1945. New York: Henry Holt, 1947.
- Andreev, A. A. Vospominaniia, pis'ma. Moscow: Politicheskaya literatura, 1985.
- Andrei Aleksandrovich Zhdanov, 1896–1948. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1948.
- Andrew, Christopher. The Defense of the Realm: The Authorized History of MI5. New York: Knopf, 2009.
- . Secret Service: The Making of the British Intelligence Community. London: Heinemann, 1985.
- , and Julie Elkner. "Stalin and Foreign Intelligence," Totalitarian Movements and Political Religions, 4/1 (2003): 69–94.
- , and Mitrokhin, Vasily. The Mitrokhin Archive: The KGB in Europe and the West. London: Allen Lane, 1999.
- , and Oleg Gordievsky. KGB: The Inside Story. New York: HarperCollins, 1990.
- Anfert'ev, Ivan A. "Osobennosti preodoleniia I. V. Stalinyam krizisnoi situatsii v SSSR v nachale 1930-X gg.," Rossiiskie i slavianskie issledovaniia; nauchnyi sbornik 2010 vyp.: 177–82.
- . "'Delo M. N. Riutina' v sud'be G. E. Zinov'eva i L. B. Kameneva, oktiabr' 1932 g.," Istoricheskii arkhiv, 2006, no. 1: 64–94.
- , ed. Smerch. Moscow: DOSAAF SSSR, 1988.
- Anfilov, Viktor A. Doroga k tragedii sorok pervogo. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1965.
- . Krushenie pokhoda Gitlera na Moskvu 1941. Moscow: Nauka, 1989.

- . “Razgovor zakonchilsia ugrozoi Stalina: desiat’ besed s marshalom G. K. Zhukovym v mae-iune 1965 goda,” Voenno-Istoricheskii zhurnal, 1995, no. 3: 39–46.
- , and F. I. Golikov, Zagadka 1941 goda: o voine pod raznymi resursami. Moscow: Veche, 2005.
- Angelo Rossi [Tasca]. Deux ans d’alliance Germano-Soviétique. Paris: A Fayard, 1949.
- . The Russo-German Alliance: August 1939–June 1941. Boston: Beacon, 1951.
- Anon. “Zametki o pereesechenii biografii Osipa Mandel’shtama i Boris Pasternaka,” Pamiat’: istoricheskii sbornik (Paris), no. 4 (1981).
- Antipina, Valentina. Povsednevnaia zhizn’ sovetskikh pisatelei 1930–1950-e gody. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 2005.
- Antipova, O. A., et al., eds. Golod v SSSR, 1930–1934 gg. Moscow: Federal’noe arkhivnoe agentstvo, 2009.
- Antsiferov, Alexis N., et al. Russian Agriculture During the War: Rural Economy. New Haven, CT: Yale University, for the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1930.
- Antonov, K. V. “Nekotorye itogi konflikta na KVZhD,” Sovetskoe gosudarstvo i revoliutsiia prava, 1930, no. 2: 122–38.
- Antonov, Vladimir. “Anatolii Gorskii na peredovoi vneshnei razvedki,” Nezavisimoe voennoe obozrenie, Dec. 16, 2011.
- . “Kaznen i opravan,” Nezavisimoe voennoe obozrenie, Aug. 31, 2007.
- . “Na pol’skom napravlenii pered’ 22 iunია,” Nezavisimoe voennoe obozrenie, June 3, 2011.
- Antonov-Ovsenko, Anton. Beriia. Moscow: AST, 1999.
- . Portet Tirana. Moscow: Grègori Pejdž, 1994.
- Applebaum, Anne. Gulag: A History. New York: Doubleday, 2003.
- Aptekar’, Pavel. Sovetsko-finskii voiny. Moscow: Yauza-EKPSO, 2004.
- , and I. V. Uspenskii, eds. Marshal M. N. Tukhachevskii (1893–1937): komplet dokumentov iz fondov RGVA. Moscow, 1994.
- Arendt, Hannah. The Origins of Totalitarianism. New York: Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovich, 1973.
- Argun, Aleksei. Stalin i Lakoba. Sukhumi: Alashara, 2002.
- Armstrong, John A. The Politics of Totalitarianism: The Communist Party of the Soviet Union from 1934 to the Present. New York: Random House, 1961.
- . The Soviet Bureaucratic Elite: A Case Study of the Ukrainian Apparatus. New York: Praeger, 1959.
- Arnason, Johann P. “Communism and Modernity,” Daedalus, 129/1 (2000): 61–90.
- Arnold, Arthur. Banks, Credit and Money in Soviet Russia. New York: Columbia University, 1937.
- Aron, Raymond. Mémoires. Paris: Julliard, 1983.
- . The Opium of the Intellectuals. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2001 (originally 1955).
- . Sociologie des sociétés industrielles: esquisse d’une théorie des régimes politiques. Paris: Centre de documentation universitaire, 1958. Translated as Democracy and Totalitarianism. New York: Praeger, 1968.
- Arsenidze, Rajden. “Iz vospominaniia o Staline,” Novyi zhurnal, 72 (1963): 218–36.
- Artamonov, Andrei. Spetsob’ekty Stalina: ekskursiia pod grifom “sekretno”. Moscow: Algoritm, 2013.
- Artizov, Andrei N. “V ugodu vzgliadam vozhdia (Konkurs 1936 g. na uchebnik po istorii SSSR),” Kentavr, 1991, no. 1: 125–35.
- , and Oleg Naumov, eds. Vlast’ i khudozhestvennaia intelligentsiia. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratiia, 1999.
- , et al., eds. Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo: dokumenty Prezidiuma TsK KPSS i drugie materialy. 3 vols. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratiia, 2000–4.
- Artobolevskii, E. E., and A. A. Blagonravov. Ocherki istorii tekhniki v Rossii (1861–1917). Moscow: Nauka, 1975.
- Artsun, Ashot. “Samoubiistvo A. G. Khandzhiana,” Kavkaz, 1936, no. 8 (32): 29–31.
- Aruntunian, Iurii V. Mekhanizatory sel’skogo khoziaistva SSSR v 1929–1957 gg.: formirovanie kadrov massovykh kvalifikatsii. Moscow: AN SSSR, 1960.
- Asada, Sadao. From Mahan to Pearl Harbor: The Imperial Japanese Navy and the United States. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute, 2006.

- Aselius, Gunnar. The Rise and Fall of the Soviet Navy in the Baltic, 1921–1941. New York: Frank Cass, 2005.
- Aster, Sidney. 1939: The Making of the Second World War. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1972.
- Atkinson, Dorothy. The End of the Russian Land Commune, 1905–1930. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 1983.
- Avalishvili, Levan. “The ‘Great Terror’ of 1937–1938 in Georgia: Between the Two Reports of Lavrentiy Beria,” Caucasus Analytical Digest, 22 (2010): 2–6.
- Avdeenko, Aleksandr O. Nakazanie bez prestupleniia. Moscow: Sovetskaia Rossiia, 1991.
- . “Otluchenie,” Znania, 1989, no. 3: 5–73, no. 4: 78–133.
- Averbakh, I. L. Or prestupleniia k trudu. Moscow: Sovetskoe zakonodatel'stvo, 1936.
- Avrich, Paul. “The Short Course and Soviet Historiography,” Political Science Quarterly, 75/4 (1960): 539–63.
- “‘Avtobiograficheskie zametki’ V. N. Pavlova—perevodchika I. V. Stalina,” Noviia i noveishaia istoriia, 2000, no. 4: 94–111.
- Avtorkhanov, Abdurakhman. Stalin and the Soviet Communist Party: A Study in the Technology of Power. New York: Praeger, 1959.
- . Tekhnologiia vlasti. Moscow: Slovo, 1991.
- Azarov, I. I. Osazhdennaiia Odessa. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1962.
- Baabar. Twentieth-Century Mongolia. Cambridge, UK: White Horse, 1999.
- Babrowski, Jörg. Der Feind ist überall: Stalinismus im Kaukasus. Munich: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 2003.
- Babichenko, D. L. Pisateli i tsenzory: sovetskaia literatura 1940–x godov po politicheskim kontrol'm TSK. Moscow: Rossiia Molodaia, 1994.
- . “‘Esl'i aresty budut prodolzhat'sia ne ostanetsia ni odnogo nemtsachlena partii': stalinskie ‘chistki’ nemetskoi politemigratsii v 1937–1938 godach,” Istoricheskii arkhiv, 1992, no 1: 117–23.
- , ed. Literaturnyi front, istoriia politicheskoi tsenzury 1932–1936 gg.: sbornik dokumentov. Moscow: Entsiklopediia rossiiskikh drevn', 1994.
- Babochkin, Boris. Litso sovetskogo kinoaktera. Moscow: Kinofotoizdat, 1935.
- Backlund, Lawrence Sigmund. “Nazi Germany and Finland, 1933–1939: A Waning Relationship,” PhD diss. University of Pennsylvania, 1983.
- Badaev, A. E. “O Staline,” Pravda, Dec. 19, 1939.
- Baehr, Peter. “Dictatorship.” In The Blackwell Dictionary of Modern Social Thought, edited by William Outhwaite and Tom Bottomore. 2nd ed. Malden, MA: Blackwell, 2002.
- Baer, Brian. “Literary Translation and the Construction of the Soviet Intelligentsia,” Massachusetts Review, 47/3 (2006): 437–60.
- Bahne, Siegfried. “Die Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands.” In Das Ende der Parteien, 1933, edited by Erich Matthias and Rudolf Morsey. Königstein: Droste, 1979, 655–739.
- . Die K.P.D. und das Ende von Weimar: das Scheitern einer Politik, 1932–1935. Frankfurt am Main: Campus, 1976.
- , et al., eds. Les Partis communistes et l'Internationale communiste dans les années 1928–1932. Dordrecht, Holland, and Boston, MA: Kluwer, 1988.
- Bailes, Kendall E. Technology and Society under Lenin and Stalin: Origins of the Soviet Technical Intelligentsia, 1917–1941. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1978.
- Baker, Donald N. “The Surveillance of Subversion in Interwar France: The Carnet B in the Seine, 1922–1940,” French Historical Studies, 10/3 (1978): 486–512.
- Baker, Robert K. Rezident: The Espionage Odyssey of Soviet General Vasily Zarubin. Bloomington, IN: iUniverse, 2015.
- Bakhtarov, G. Iu. Zapiski aktera: genii i podletsy. Moscow: Olma, 2002.
- Balandin, R. K. Marshal Shaposhnikov. Moscow: Veche, 2005.
- Balashov, A. P., and Iu. S. Markhashov. “Staraia ploshchad', 4 (20-e gody),” Polis, 1991, no. 4: 182–8.
- Balashov, Evgenii A., ed. Prinimai nas, suomi-krasavitsa! ‘Osvoboditel'nyi’ pokhod v Finlandiiu 1939–1940 gg. 2nd ed. St. Petersburg: Ostrov, 2004.

- Balashov, Evgenii M. Shkola v rossiiskom obshchestve 1917–1927 gg.: stanovlenie "novogo cheloveka." St. Petersburg: D. Bulanin, 2003.
- Ball, Alan. Russia's Last Capitalists: The NEPmen, 1921–1929. Berkeley: University of California, 1987.
- Bamsted, Ernest K. Goebbels and National Socialist Propaganda, 1925–1945. East Lansing: Michigan State University, 1965.
- Banac, Ivo, ed. The Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 1933–1949. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2003.
- Bandinelli, Renuccio Bianchi. Hitler e Mussolini 1938: Il viaggio del Führer in Italia. Rome: Edizioni E/O, 1995.
- Barakhov, V. S. "M. Gor'kii: posledniaia stranitsa zhizni," Voprosy literatury, 1990, no. 6: 182–206.
- Baranov, Iurii. Goluboi razliv: dnevniki, pis'ma, stikhotvoreniia. Yaroslavl: Verkhne-Volzhskoe knizhnoe izd-vo, 1988.
- Baranov, Vadim. Gorky bez grima, taina smerti: roman-issledovanie. 2nd ed. Moscow: Agraf, 2001.
- . "Nado prekoslovit'! M. Gorkii i sozdanie Soiuzu pisatelei," Voprosy literatury, 2003, no. 5: 34–56.
- Barber, John. "Stalin's Letter to the Editors of Proletarskaya Revoliutsiia," Soviet Studies, 38/1 (1976): 21–41.
- Barber, John, and Mark Harrison. The Soviet Home Front, 1941–1945. London: Longman, 1991.
- Barbieri, Pierpaolo. Hitler's Shadow Empire: Nazi Economics and the Spanish Civil War. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 2015.
- Barbusse, Henri. Stalin: chelovek, cherez kotorogo raskryvaetsia novyi mir. Moscow: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1936.
- . Stalin: A New World Seen through One Man. New York: Macmillan, 1935.
- Bardin, I. "Ispolin-mudrets." In Vstrechi s tovarishem Stalinym, edited by A. A. Fadeev. Moscow: Gospolitizdat, 1939.
- Barghoorn, Frederick C. The Soviet Image of the United States: A Study in Distortion. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company, 1950.
- Barmin, V. A. Sovetskii Soiuz i Sintsizian, 1918–1941 gg.: regional'nyi faktor vo vneshnei politike Sovetskogo Soiuz. Barnaul: Barnaul'skii gosudarstvennyi pedagogicheskii universitet, 1999.
- Barmine, Alexander. Memoirs of a Soviet Diplomat: Twenty Years in the Service of the USSR. London: Dickson, 1938.
- . One Who Survived: The Life Story of a Russian Under the Soviets. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1945.
- Barnhart, Michael A. "Japanese Intelligence before the Second World War: 'Best Case' Analysis." In Knowing One's Enemies: Intelligence Assessments before the Two World Wars, edited by Ernest R. May. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1984, 424–55.
- Barros, James, and Richard Gregor. Double Deception: Stalin, Hitler, and the Invasion of Russia. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University, 1995.
- Barsov, A. A. Balans stoimostnykh obmenov mezhdu gorodom i derevnei. Moscow: Nauka, 1969.
- . "NEP i vyравnvanie ekonomicheskikh otnoshenii mezhdu gorodom i derevnei." In Novaia ekonomicheskaiia politika: voprosy teorii i istorii, edited by Maksim P. Kim. Moscow: Nauka, 1974, 93–102.
- Barsova, V. "Nash veilikii drug," In Vstrechi s tovarishchem Stalinym, edited by Aleksandr Fadeev. Moscow: Ogiz, 1939, 57–9.
- Barsukov, Evgenii A. Russkaia artilleriia v mirovuiu voinu. Moscow: Gos. voennoe izd-vo narkomata oborony Soiuz SSSR, 1938.
- Bartel, Heinrich. "Aleksiej Fedorovič Merekalov: Fragmente zur historischen Biographes Sowjetdiplomaten in Berlin 1938/39," Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas, 33/4 (1985): 518–45.
- Bartlett, Rosamund. "The Embodiment of Myth: Eizenshtein's Production of 'Die Walküre,'" Slavonic and East European Review, 70/1 (1992): 53–76.
- . Wagner and Russia. New York: Cambridge University, 1995.
- Baruzdin, Sergei A. "O Kornee Chukovskom: zametki Baruzdin," In Zametki o detskoj literature. Moscow: Detskaia literatura, 1975.
- Baryshnikov, N. I. "Sovetsko-Finliandskaia voina 1939–1940 gg.," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1989, no. 4: 28–41.
- , and B. N. Baryshnikov. "Pravitel'stvo v Terioki." In Zimniaia voina 1939–1940, edited by Oleg A. Rzhvskii and Olli Vehviläinen. 2 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 1998, I: 176–91.

- , and O. Manninen. "V kanun zimnei voyny." In Zimniaia voina 1939–1940, edited by Oleg A. Rzhevskii and Olli Vehviläinen. 2 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 1998, I: 131–41.
- , et al., Istoriia ordena Lenina Lenigradskogo voennogo okruga. 3rd ed. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1988.
- Baryshnikov, V. N. Ot prokladnogo mira k zimnei voine: vostochnaia politika Finliandii v 1930-e gody. St. Petersburg: Izdatel'stvo Sankt Peterburgskogo universiteta, 1997.
- Basseches, Nikolaus. Stalin. London: Staples Press, 1952.
- Batashev, Aleksei. Sovetskii dzhaz: istoricheskii ocherk. Moscow: Muzyka, 1972.
- Barbayer, Tsedenambryn. "Stalin's Strategy in Mongolia, 1932–1936." Mongolian Studies, 22 (1999): 1–17.
- Baumgart, Winfried. "Zur Ansprache Hitlers von den Führen der Wehrmacht am 22. August 1939," Vierteljahreshafte für Zeitgeschichte 16/2 (1968): 120–49; 19/3 (1971): 294–304.
- Baur, Hans. Hitler's Pilot. London: Frederick Muller, 1958.
- Bawden, C. R. The Modern History of Mongolia. 2nd ed. New York: Kegan Paul International, 1989.
- Baxa, Paul. "Capturing the Fascist Moment: Hitler's Visit to Italy in 1938 and the Radicalization of Fascist Italy," Journal of Contemporary History, 42/4 (2007): 227–42.
- Baykov, Alexander. Soviet Foreign Trade. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1946.
- Baynes, N. H., ed. The Speeches of Adolf Hitler. 2 vols. London: Oxford University, 1942.
- Bazhanov, Boris. Bazhanov and the Damnation of Stalin, edited by David W. Doyle. Columbus: Ohio State University, 1990.
- . Vospominaniia byvshego sekretaria Stalina. 2nd ed. Paris and New York: Tre'tia vol'na, 1983.
- Beck, F., and W. Godin, Russian Purge and the Extraction of Confession. New York: Viking, 1951.
- Beck, Józef Przemysławienia, deklaracje, wywiady 1931–1939. Warsaw: Naklad Gebethnera i Wolffa, 1938.
- . Final Report. New York: Robert Speller & Sons, 1957.
- Beckles, Gordon. "Hitler, the Clown Who Wants to Play Statesman," Daily Herald, January 31, 1931.
- Bédarida, François. La Stratégie secrète de la drôle de guerre: le conseil suprême interallié, Septembre 1939–Avril 1940. Paris: CNRS, 1979.
- Bedel', Aleksandr E., and Tatiana. I. Slavko. "Iz istorii raskulachennykh spetspereselentsev na Urale v pervoi polovine 30-kh godov." In Raskulachennye spetspereselentsy na Urale (1930–1936): sbornik dokumentov, edited by V. V. Alekseev, et al. Yekaterinburg: UIF "Nauka," 1993, 10–27.
- Bednyi, Dem'ian. "Shtrikhi," Pravda, December 21, 1929.
- . Sobranie sochinenii. 5 vols. Moscow: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1953–4.
- Béládi, László, and Tamás Krausz. Stalin. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1989.
- Beliaia kniga o deportatsii koreiskogo naseleniia Rossii v 30–40-x godakh. Vol. 1*. Moscow: Interparx, 1992.
- Beliaev, N., ed. Mikhail Koltsov, kakim on byl. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1965.
- Belianovskii, B. S. "Deistviia tankovykh i motorizirovannykh voisk v Pol'she, Bel'gii i Frantsii," Voennaia mysl', 1940, no. 8: 39–58.
- Bell, P. M. H. France and Britain, 1900–1940: Entente and Estrangement. London and New York: Longman, 1996.
- Beloff, Max. The Foreign Policy of Soviet Russia, 1929–1941. 2 vols. London: Oxford University, 1947–49.
- Below, Nicolaus von. Als Hitlers Adjutant 1937–1945. Mainz: Hase & Koehler, 1980.
- . At Hitler's Side: The Memoirs of Hitler's Luftwaffe Adjutant, 1937–1945. Translated by Geoffrey Brooks. London: Greenhill Books, 2001.
- Bennett, E. M. Franklin Roosevelt and the Search for Security: American-Soviet Relations 1933–1939. Wilmington, DE: Scholarly Resources, 1985.
- Bennett, Edward W. German Rearmament and the West, 1932–1933. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1969.
- Benvenuti, Francesco. "Kirov in Soviet Politics, 1933–1934." Soviet Industrialisation Project Series no. 8, University of Birmingham, 1977.
- . "Stakhanovism and Stalinism, 1934–1938." Discussion paper no. 30, Centre for Russian and East European Studies, University of Birmingham, 1989.

- Berelowitch, Alexis, and Viktor Danilov, eds. Sovetskaia derevnia glazami VChK-OGPU-NKVD, 1919–1939: dokumenty i materialy. 4 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 2003.
- Berezhkov, Valentin. S diplomaticheski missiei v Berlin, 1940–1941. Moscow: Izdat. Agentstva Pechati Novosti, 1966.
- . History in the Making: Memoirs of World War II Diplomacy. Moscow: Progress, 1983.
- . At Stalin's Side: His Interpreter's Memoirs from the October Revolution to the Fall of the Dictator's Empire. New York: Birch and Lane, 1994.
- Berezin, F. Ia. "Istorii ordera na arest Berii." In Beria: konets kar'ery, edited by V. F. Nekrasov. Moscow: Politizdat, 1991, 195–201.
- Bergan, Ronald. Sergei Eisenstein: A Life. Woodstock, NY: Overlook, 1997.
- Berge, Paul. The Birth of Tajikistan: National Identity and the Origins of the Republic. London and New York: I. B. Tauris, 2007.
- Berghahn, Volker R. Germany and the Approach of War in 1914. New York: St. Martin's, 1973.
- Bergman, Jay. "Valerii Chkalov: Soviet Pilot as New Soviet Man," Journal of Contemporary History, 33/1 (1998): 135–52.
- Bergmeier, Horst J. P., and Rainer E. Lorz. Hitler's Airwave: The Inside Story of Nazi Radio Broadcasting and Propaganda Swing. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1997.
- Bergson, Abram. The Real National Income of Soviet Russia since 1928. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1961.
- Beria, Sergo. My Father. London: Duckworth, 2001.
- Beriia, Sergo. Moi otets—Lavrentii Beriia. Moscow: Sovremennik, 1994.
- Berkhin, I. B. Voennaia reforma v SSSR, 1924–1925. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1958.
- Berling, Zygmunt. Wspomnienia. 3 vols. Warsaw: Polski Dom Wydawniczy, 1990–91.
- Berman, Sheri. "Civil Society and the Collapse of the Weimar Republic," World Politics, 49/3 (1997): 401–29.
- Bernev, S. K., and A. I. Rupasov, eds. Zimniaia voina 1939–1940 gg.: v dokumentakh NKVD. St. Petersburg: Lik, 2010.
- Bernshtein, Aron. Mikhail Gelovani. Moscow: Kinotsentr, 1991.
- . "V roli Stalina," Ogonek, 1989, no. 50: 18–9.
- Berson, Jan. Kreml na bialo. Warsaw: Rój, 1936.
- . Sowieckie zbrojenia moralne. Warsaw: Główna Księgarnia Wojskowa, 1937.
- Bertram, James. Crisis in China: the Story of the Sian Mutiny. London: Macmillan, 1937.
- Bertrand, Gustave. Enigma ou la plus grand énigme de la guerre 1939–1945. Paris: Plon, 1973.
- Besedovskii, Grigorii Z. Na putiakh k termidoru: iz vospominanii byvshego sovetskogo diplomata. 1st ed. 2 vols. Paris: Mishen, 1930–1; Moscow: Sovremennik, 1997.
- . Im Dienste der Sowjets: Erinnerungen. Leipzig, Zürich, Grethlein & Co., 1930. Translated as Revelations of a Soviet Diplomat. London: Williams & Norgate, 1931.
- Beshanov, Vladimir V. Leningradskaia oborona. Minsk: Kharvest, 2006.
- . "Po svoim artillerii b'et": slepye bogi voyny. Moscow: Iauza, 2013.
- Bessel, Richard. Political Violence and the Rise of Nazism: The Stormtroopers in Eastern Germany, 1925–1934. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1984.
- Bey, Essad [Lev Nussimbaum]. Stalin. Berlin: G. Kiepenheuer, 1931. Translated as Stalin: Career of a Fanatic. New York: Viking, 1932; London: John Lane, 1932.
- Bezymbenskii, Lev A. "Direktivy I. V. Stalina V. M. Molotovu pered poezdnoi v Berlin v noiabre 1940 g.," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1995, no. 4: 76–9.
- . "O 'Plane Zhukova' ot 15 maia 1941 g.," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 2000, no. 3: 58–67.
- . "Sovetsko-Germanskii dogovory 1939 g.: novye dokumenty i starye problem," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1998, no. 3: 3–26.
- . "The Secret Protocols of 1939 as a Problem of Soviet Historiography." In Soviet Foreign Policy, 1917–1991: A Retrospective, edited by Gabriel Gorodetsky. London: Frank Cass, 1994, 75–85.

- . "Vizit V. M. Molotova v Berlin v noiabre 1940 g. v svete novykh dokumentov," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1995, no 6: 121–44.
- . Gitler i Stalin pered skhvatkoi. Moscow: Veche, 2000.
- . Osobaia papka "Barbarossa": dokumental'naia povest'. Moscow: Novosti, 1972.
- . Stalin und Hitler: das Pokerspiel der Diktatoren. Berlin: Aufbau, 2002.
- Bgazbha, Mikhail. Nestor Lakoba. Tbilisi: Sabchota sakartvelo, 1965.
- Bialer, Seweryn, ed. Stalin and His Generals: Soviet Military Memoirs of World War II. London: Souvenir Press, 1970.
- . Stalin's Successors: Leadership, Stability, and Change in the Soviet Union. New York: Cambridge University, 1980.
- Bialik, B. A., ed. Gor'kii i ego epokha: issledovaniia i materialy, 6 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 1989–94.
- Bibineishvili, B. Kamo. Moscow: Staryi Bol'shevik, 1934.
- Biegański, Stanisław, et al., eds. Documents on Polish-Soviet Relations, 1939–1945. 2 vols. London: Heinemann, 1961–7.
- Bilmanis, Alfred, ed. Latvian Russian Relations: Documents. Washington, D.C.: Latvian Legation, 1944.
- Birizov, S. S. "Predislovie." In Izbrannoe proizvedeniia, by M. N. Tukhachevskii. Vol. 1. Moscow: Voennoe Izdatel'stvo Ministerstva Oborony SSSR, 1964.
- . Kogda gremeli pushki. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1961.
- Bishop, Donald. The Roosevelt-Litvinov Agreements: The American View. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University, 1965.
- Bismarck, Otto von. Bismarck, the Man and the Statesman, Being the Reflections and Reminiscences of Otto Prince von Bismarck. 2 vols. London: Smith, Elder, 1898.
- . Mysli i vospominaniia. 3 vols. Moscow: Ogiz, 1940–1.
- Bix, Herbert P. Hirohito and the Making of Modern Japan. New York: HarperCollins, 2000.
- Blaazer, David. "Finance and the End of Appeasement: The National Government, the Bank of England, and the Czech Gold," Journal of Contemporary History, 40/1 (2005): 25–39.
- Blagoveshchenskii, F. "V gostiakh u P.A. Sharii," Minushee, no. 7 (1989): 451–72.
- Blauvelt, Timothy K. "From Words to Action! Nationality Policy in Soviet Abkhazia (1921–38)." In The Making of Modern Georgia, 1918–2012: The First Georgian Republic and Its Successors, edited by Stephen F. Jones. London and New York: Routledge, 2014, 232–62.
- . "Abkhazia Patronage and Power in the Stalin Era," Nationalities Papers, 35/2 (2007): 203–32.
- . "March of the Chekists: Beria's Secret Police Patronage Network and Soviet Crypto-Politics," Communist and Post-Communist Studies, 44/1 (2011): 1–16.
- Blinkhorn, Martin, ed. Fascists and Conservatives: The Radical Right and the Establishment in Twentieth-Century Europe. London: Unwin Hyman, 1990.
- Blinov, A. S. Ivan Akulov. Moscow: Politizdat, 1967.
- Bliskovskii, Z. D., et al., eds. M.I. Ul'ianova: sekretar' Pravdy. Moscow: Pravda, 1965.
- Blitstein, Peter A. "Nation-Building or Russification? Obligatory Russian Instruction in the Soviet Non-Russian School, 1938–1953." In A State of Nations: Empire and Nation-State in the Age of Lenin and Stalin, edited by Ronald Grigor Suny and Terry Martin. New York: Oxford University, 2001, 253–74.
- Blium, Arlen V. Za kulisami "ministerstva pravdy": tainaia istoriia sovetskoi tsenzury 1917–1929. St. Petersburg: Akademicheskii proekt, 1994.
- , ed. Tsenzura v Sovetskom Soiuzie, 1917–1991 gg.: dokumenty. Moscow: Rosspen, 2004.
- Bliznakov, Milka. "International Modernism or Socialist Realism: Soviet Architecture in the Eastern Republics." In New Perspectives on Russian and Soviet Artistic Culture, edited by John O. Norman. New York: St. Martin's, 1993, 112–30.
- Bloch, Marc. Strange Defeat: A Statement of Evidence Written in 1940. London: Oxford University, 1949.
- Bloch, Michael. Ribbentrop. New York: Crown, 1992.
- Blyukher, Glafira. "S Vasil'em Konstantinovichem Bliukherom—shest' let," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1990, no. 1: 79–83.

- . "Vospominania o lichnom," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1989, no. 4: 79–87.
- Boberach, Heinz, ed. Meldungen aus dem Reich: die geheimen Lagerberichte des Sicherheitsdienstes des SS 1938–1945. 7 vols. Herrsching: Pawlag, 1984.
- Bobrenov, V. A., and V. Ia. Riazantsev. Palachi i zbertvy. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1993.
- Bobylev, Pavel N. "K kakoi voine gotovilsia General'nyi shtab RKKA v 1941 godu," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1995, no. 5: 3–20.
- . "Repetsitsiia katastrofy," Voenno-istoricheski zhurnal, 1993, no. 7: 14–21, no. 8: 28–35.
- . "Tochky v diskussii stavit' rano: k voprosu o planirovanii v General'nom shtabe RKKA vozmozhnoi voyny s Germaniei v 1940–1941 godakh," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 2000, no. 1: 47–54.
- , et al., eds. Sovetskie Vooruzhennye Sily: voprosy i otvety, 1918–1988. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1987.
- . Voennyi sovet pri narodnom komissare oborony SSSR, noiabr' 1937 g.: dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: Rosspen, 2006.
- . Voennyi sovet pri narodnom komissare oborony SSSR, 1938, 1940: dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: Rosspen, 2006.
- Bochever, A. M., ed. O Staline: ukazatel' literatury, izdannoi k 60-letiiu I. V. Stalina. Moscow: Vsesoiuznaia knizhnaia palata, 1940.
- Bode, Andreas. "Humor in the Lyrical Stories for Children of Samuel Marshak and Korney Chukovsky," The Lion and the Unicorn, 13/2 (1989): 34–53.
- Boeck, Brian J. "Complicating the National Interpretation of the Famine: Reexamining the Case of Kuban." In After the Holodomor: The Enduring Impact of the Great Famine on Ukraine, edited by Andrea Graziosi et al. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press for the Ukrainian Research Institute, 2013, 31–48.
- Boelcke, Willi A., ed. The Secret Conferences of Dr. Goebbels: The Nazi Propaganda War, 1939–43. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1970.
- Boffa, Giuseppe. The Stalin Phenomenon. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1992.
- Bohlen, Charles E. Witness to History, 1929–1969. New York: W. W. Norton, 1973.
- Boiadzhiev, G. Maretskaia. Moscow: Iskustvo, 1954.
- Boiko, N. V., et al., eds. Ivan Mikhailovich Maiskii: izbrannaia perepiska c inostrannymi korrespondentami, 1916–1975. 2 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 2011.
- Boldyrev, Vasilii G. "Iaponiia i Sovetskii Dal'nii Vostok," Sibirskie ognii, 1925, no. 1: 187–94.
- Bollinger, Dwight L. "Fifth Column Marches On," American Speech, 19/1 (1944): 47–9.
- Bollinger, Martin J. Stalin's Slave Ships: Kolyma, the Gulag Fleet, and the Role of the West. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2003.
- Bolloten, Burnett. The Grand Camouflage: The Communist Conspiracy in the Spanish Civil War. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1961.
- . The Spanish Civil War: Revolution and Counterrevolution. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina, 1991.
- . The Spanish Revolution: The Left and the Struggle for Power during the Civil War. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina, 1979.
- Bonch-Bruevich, V. D. Vospominania. Moscow: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1968.
- Bond, Brian. British Military Policy between the Two World Wars. Oxford: Clarendon, 1980.
- , ed. Chief of Staff: The Diaries of Lieutenant General Sir Henry Pownall. 2 vols. London: Leo Cooper, 1972–74.
- Bondarenko, Aleksandr. Fitin. Moscow: Molodaia gardiia, 2015.
- , and N. N. Efimov. Utaennye stranitsy sovetskoi istorii. Moscow: Kuchkovo Pole, 2007.
- Bor'ba za uprochenie sovetskoi vlasti v Gruzii: sbornik dokumentov i materialov 1921–1925 gg.* Tbilisi: Sabchota Sakartvelo, 1959.
- Bordiugov, Gennadii A., and V. A. Kozlov. "Dialektika teorii i praktiki stsalisticheskogo stroitel'stva: k voprosu o deformatsiakh sotsializma," Istoriia SSSR, 1989, no. 6: 3–21.
- Borev, Iurii. "Staliniada," Pod'em, 1990, no. 1: 42–3.

- . Staliniada: memuary po chuzhim vospominaniiam s istoricheskimi anekdotami i razmysleniiami avtora. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1990.
- Borisov, Aleksandr V. Politsiia i militsiia Rossii: stranitsy istorii. Moscow: Nauka, 1995.
- Borisov, Iu. S. Proizvodstvennye kadry derevni, 1917–1941. Moscow: Nauka, 1991.
- Borisov, Iurii V. Sovetsko-frantsuzskie otnosheniia (1924–1945 gg.). Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1964.
- Borisov, S. B. Andrei Aleksandrovich Zhdanov: opyt politicheskoi biografii. Shadrinsk: Poset, 1998.
- Borisova, Tatiana. "The Digest of Laws of the Russian Empire: The Phenomenon of Autocratic Legality," Law and History Review, 30/3 (2012): 901–25.
- Borkenau, Franz. European Communism. New York: Harper Brothers Publishers, 1953.
- . The Communist International. London: Faber & Faber, 1938.
- . The Spanish Cockpit: An Eyewitness Account of the Political and Social Conflicts of the Spanish Civil War. London: Faber and Faber, 1937.
- . The Totalitarian Enemy. London: Faber and Faber, 1939.
- Bór-Komorowski, Tadeusz. The Secret Army. New York: Macmillan, 1951.
- Borodin, N. M. One Man in His Time: An Autobiography. London: Constable, 1955.
- Borodkin, Leonid, et al. Gulag: ekonomika prinuditel'nogo truda. Moscow: Rosspen, 2005.
- Borodulin, V. I., and V. D. Topolianskii. "Dmitrii Dmitrievich Pletnev," Voprosy istorii, 1989, no. 9: 36–54.
- Borovik, Genrikh. The Philby Files: The Secret Life of Master Spy Kim Philby. Boston: Little, Brown, 1994.
- Borys, Juriy. "Who Ruled the Soviet Ukraine in Stalin's Time? (1917–1939)," Canadian Slavonic Papers, 14/2 (1972): 213–33.
- Bosworth Goldman, Red Road through Asia: A Journey by the Arctic Ocean to Siberia, Central Asia, and Armenia. 2nd ed. London: Methuen, 1934.
- Bosworth, R. J. W. Mussolini. New York: Oxford University, 2002.
- . Mussolini's Italy: Life under the Dictatorship. London: Allen Lane, 2005.
- Bourke-White, Margaret. Eyes on Russia. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1931.
- Bourne, Kenneth, and David Cameron Watt, eds. British Documents on Foreign Affairs: Reports and Papers from the Foreign Office Confidential Print: Part II, Series A, The Soviet Union, 1917–1939. 3 vols. University Publications of America, 1984.
- Bowden, Sue, and Avner Offen. "The Technological Revolution that Never Was: Gender, Class, and the Diffusion of Household Appliances in Interwar England." In The Sex of Things, edited by Victoria de Grazia. Berkeley: University of California, 1996, 244–74.
- Bowers, Robert E. "American Diplomacy, the 1933 Wheat Conference, and Recognition of the Soviet Union," Agricultural History, 40/1 (1966): 39–52.
- Bown, Matthew Cullerne. Socialist Realist Painting. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1998.
- Boyd, Carl. Hitler's Japanese Confidant: General Hiroshi Ōshima and MAGIC Intelligence, 1941–1945. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1993.
- Boyrn, Svetlana. "The Death of the Revolutionary Poet" In Death in Quotation Marks: Cultural Myths of the Modern Poet. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1991.
- Bracher, Karl Dietrich. Die Auflösung der Weimarer Republik: eine Studie zum Problem des Machtverfalls in der Demokratie. 3rd ed. Berlin: Villingen/Schwarzwald, 1960.
- . The German Dictatorship: The Origins, Structure, and Effects of National Socialism. New York: Holt, Rinehart, Winston, 1970.
- Braginskaia, Iu. "Pobeda plana i rekord besplannovosti," Sotsialisticheskii vestnik, Sept. 27, 1930.
- Brainina, B., and A. Dmitrieva, eds. Sovetskie pisateli avtobiografii. 4 vols. Moscow: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1959–1988.
- Brandenberger, David. "Stalin as Symbol: A Case Study in the Personality Cult and its Construction." In Stalin: A New History, edited by Sarah Davies and James Harris. New York: Cambridge University, 2005, 249–70.

- . National Bolshevism: Stalinist Mass Culture and the Formation of Modern Russian National Identity, 1931–1956. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 2002.
- . Propaganda State in Crisis: Soviet Ideology, Indoctrination, and Terror under Stalin, 1927–1941. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2012.
- Brandenberger, D. L., and A. M. Dubrovsky. “‘The People Need a Tsar’: The Emergence of National Bolshevism as Stalinist Ideology,” Europe-Asia Studies, 50/5 (1998): 873–92.
- Braubach, Max. Der Einmarch deutscher Truppen in die entmilitarisierte Zone am Rhein in März 1936. Cologne: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1956.
- Braun, Edward. “Vsevolod Meyerhold: the Final Act.” In Enemies of the People: The Destruction of the Soviet Literary, Theater, and Film Arts in the 1930s, edited by Katherine Bliss Eaton. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University, 2002, 145–62.
- Braun, Otto. A Comintern Agent in China, 1932–1939. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 1982.
- . Kitaiskie zapiski: 1932–1939. Moscow: Politizdat, 1974.
- Brenan, Gerald. The Spanish Labyrinth: An Account of the Social and Political Background of the Civil War. New York: Macmillan, 1943.
- Bridges, Brian. “A Note on the British Monitoring of Soviet Radio, 1930,” Historical Journal of Film, Radio, and Television, 5/2 (1985): 183–9.
- . “Yoshizawa Kenkichi and the Soviet-Japanese Non-Aggression Pact Proposal,” Modern Asian Studies, 14/1 (1980): 111–27.
- Bright-Holmes, John, ed. Like it Was: The Diaries of Malcolm Muggeridge. London: Collins, 1981.
- Briukhanov, B. B., and E. N. Shoshkov. Opravdaniu ne podlezhit: Ezhov i ezhovshchina 1936–1938. St. Petersburg: Petrovskii Fond, 1998.
- Broide, S. O. Vreditel'stvo, shpionazh i belyi terror. Moscow: Gosizrizdat, 1930.
- Brontman, Lazar K. Dnevnik, 1932–1947. Moscow: Zhurnal ‘Samizdat’, 2004.
- Brooke, Caroline. “Soviet Musicians and the Great Terror,” Europe-Asia Studies, 54/3 (2002): 397–413.
- Brooks, Jeffrey. “Thank You, Comrade Stalin!” Soviet Public Culture from Revolution to Cold War. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 2000.
- Brook-Shepherd, Gordon. Anschluss: The Rape of Austria. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1963.
- Broszat, Martin. Der Staat Hitler. Munich: DTV, 1989.
- . Nationalsozialistische Polenpolitik 1939–1945. Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1961.
- . The Hitler State: The Foundation and Development of the Internal Structure of the Third Reich. London and New York: Longman, 1981.
- Broué, Pierre. “Party Opposition to Stalin (1930–32) and the First Moscow Trial.” In Essays on Revolutionary Culture and Stalinism: Selected Papers from the Third World Congress for Soviet and East European Studies, edited by John W. Strong. Columbus, OH: Slavica Publishers, 1990, 98–111.
- . “The Bolshevik-Leninist Faction,” Revolutionary History, 9/4 (2008): 137–60.
- . “Trotsky et la Bloc des oppositions de 1932,” Cahiers Léon Trotsky, no. 5 (Paris, 1980): 5–37.
- . Staline et la révolution: le cas espagnol. Paris: Fayard, 1993.
- . The Revolution and the Civil War in Spain. Chicago: Haymarket, 1988.
- Brovkin, Vladimir N. Russia after Lenin: Politics, Culture, and Society, 1921–1929. London and New York: Routledge, 1998.
- Browder, Robert Paul. Origins of Soviet-American Diplomacy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1953.
- Brown, Archie, and Alec Cairncross. “Alec Nove, 1915–1994: An Appreciation,” Europe-Asia Studies, 49/3 (1997): 627–41.
- Brown, E. J. “The Year of Acquiescence.” In Literature and Revolution in Soviet Russia, 1917–62, edited by Max Hayward and Leo Labeledz. London: Oxford University, 1963, 44–61.
- . Mayakovsky: A Poet in the Revolution. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1973.
- Brügel, J. W., ed. Stalin und Hitler: Pakt gegen Europa. Vienna: Europa Verlag, 1973.

- Bruski, Jan Jacek, ed. Hołodomor 1932–1933: Wielki głód na Ukrainie w dokumentach polskiej dyplomacji i wywiadu. Warsaw: Polski Instytut Spraw Międzynarodowych, 2008.
- Brzezinski, Zbigniew. The Permanent Purge: Politics in Soviet Totalitarianism. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1956.
- Buber-Neumann, Margarete. Under Two Dictators. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1949.
- . Von Potsdam nach Moskau: Station eines Irrweges. Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1957.
- Bubnov, Andrei, et al., eds. Grazhdanskaia voina 1918–21. 3 vols. Moscow: Voennyi vestnik, 1928–30.
- Buchanan, Tom. Britain and the Spanish Civil War. New York: Cambridge University, 1997.
- Buchheim, Christoph, and Jonas Scherner. "The Role of Private Property in the Nazi Economy: The Case of Industry," Journal of Economic History, 66/2 (2002): 390–416.
- Buchheit, Gert. Der deutsche Geheimdienst: Geschichte der militärischen Abwehr. Munich: List, 1966.
- Buck, John Lossing, ed. The 1931 Flood in China: An Economic Survey. Nanking: University of Nanking, 1932.
- Buckley, Mary. Mobilizing Soviet Peasants: Heroines and Heroes of Stalin's Fields. Latham, MD: Roman and Littlefield, 2006.
- Bud, R. "Fil'm o Kirove," Sovetskoe kino, 1935, no. 1: 16–9.
- Budnitskii, Oleg, ed. "Sovershenno lichno i doveritel'no!" B. A. Bakhmetev–V. A. Maklakov: perepiska 1919–1951. 3 vols. Moscow and Stanford: Rosspen and the Hoover Institution Press, 2001–2.
- . Den'gi russkoi emigratsii: kolchakovskoe zoloto 1918–1957. Moscow: Novoe literaturnoe obozrenie, 2008.
- Budurowych, Bohdan B. Polish-Soviet Relations, 1932–1939. New York: Columbia University, 1963.
- Buell, Raymond L. Poland: Key to Europe. New York: Knopf, 1939.
- Bugai, N. F. "Vysyleniye sovetskikh koreitsev s Dal'nego Vostoka," Voprosy istorii, 1994, no. 5: 141–8.
- Bukharin, N. K. "K teorii imperialisticheskogo gosudarstva." In Revolutsiia prava: sbornik pervyi. Moscow: Kommunisticheskaya akademiia, 1925.
- . Problemy teorii i praktiki sotsializma. Moscow: Politizdat, 1989.
- . Tiuremnye rukopisi. 2 vols. Moscow: Airo-XX, 1996.
- Bulgakov, Mikhail, and Elena Bulgakova. Dnevnik Mastera i Margarity. Moscow: Vagrius, 2001.
- Bulgakov, Mikhail A. Dramy i komedii. Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1965.
- . Izbrannaiia proza. Moscow: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1966.
- . The Early Plays of Mikhail Bulgakov, edited by Ellendea Proffer. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1972.
- . Sobranie sochinenii. 8 vols. St. Petersburg: Azbuka-klassika, 2002.
- Bulgakova, Elena S. Dnevnik Eleny Bulgakovoi. Moscow: Knizhnaia palata, 1990.
- . Vospominaniia o Mikhaile Bulgakove. Moscow: Astrel, 2006.
- Bulgakova, Oksana. Sovetskii slukhoglaz: kino i ego organy chuvstv. Moscow: Novoe literaturnoe obozrenie, 2010.
- Bulgakova, Oksana. Sergei Eisenstein: A Biography. Berlin and San Francisco: Potemkin, 2001.
- Bullard, Julian, and Margaret Bullard, eds. Inside Stalin's Russia: The Diaries of Reader Bullard, 1930–1934. Chadbury, Oxfordshire: Day Books, 2000.
- Bullitt, Orville H., ed. For the President, Personal and Secret: Correspondence between Franklin D. Roosevelt and William Bullitt. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1972.
- Bullock, Alan. Hitler and Stalin: Parallel Lives. New York: Knopf, 1991.
- . Hitler: A Study in Tyranny. 2nd ed. New York: Harper & Row, 1962.
- Bunich, Igor. Piatistoletnaia voina v Rossii. 3 vols. St. Petersburg: Oblik, 1996–7.
- Burckhardt, Carl J. Meine Danziger Mission 1937–39. Munich: George D. W. Caliweg, 1960.
- Burkman, Thomas W. Japan and the League of Nations: Empire and World Order, 1914–1938. Honolulu: University of Hawaii, 2008.
- Bury, J. B. The Ancient Greek Historians. New York: Dover, 1958.
- Bushueva, T. S., and Iu. L. D'iakov. "Reikhsver i sovery, tainyi soiuzy: neizvestnye dokumenty sovetskikh arkhivov," Oktiabr', 1991, no. 12: 182–201.

- Butler, Ewan. Mason-Mac, the Life of Lieutenant-General Sir Noel Mason-Macfarlane: A Biography. London: Macmillan, 1972.
- Butler, J. R. M. Grand Strategy. 6 vols. London: H. M. Stationery Off., 1956–76.
- Bykov, Dmitrii. Boris Pasternak. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 2005.
- Cairncross, John. The Enigma Spy: The Story of the Man Who Changed the Course of World War Two. London: Century, 1997.
- Cairns, Andrew. The Soviet Famine of 1932–33: An Eyewitness Account of Conditions in the Spring and Summer of 1932. Edmonton: Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, 1989.
- Cameron, Sarah I. "The Hungry Steppe: Soviet Kazakhstan and the Kazakh Famine, 1921–1934," PhD diss. Yale University, 2010.
- Campbell, Joseph. Hero of a Thousand Faces. New York: Pantheon, 1949.
- Campbell, Thomas D. Russia: Market or Menace? New York: Longmans, Green, 1932.
- Camus, Albert. L'Espagne Libre. Paris: Calmann-Lévy, 1945.
- Canetti, Elias. Crowds and Power. London: Victor Gollancz, 1960.
- Caputi, R. J. Neville Chamberlain and Appeasement. Selinsgrove, PA: Susquehanna University, 2000.
- Carley, Michael J. "A Situation of Delicacy and Danger": Anglo-Soviet, August 1939–March 1940," Contemporary European History Review, 8/2 (1999): 175–208.
- . "Five Kopecks for Five Kopecks: Franco-Soviet Trade Relations, 1928–1939," Cahiers du monde russe et soviétique, 33/1 (1992): 23–58.
- . "Soviet Foreign Policy in the West, 1936–1941: A Review Article," Europe-Asia Studies, 56/7 (2004): 1081–90.
- . 1939: The Alliance that Never Was and the Coming of World War II. Chicago: I. R. Dee, 1999.
- . Silent Conflict: A Hidden History of Early Soviet-Western Relations. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2014.
- Caro, Robert A. The Path to Power: The Years of Lyndon Johnson. New York: Knopf, 1982.
- Carr, Edward Hallett, and R. W. Davies. Foundations of a Planned Economy, 1926–1929. 3 vols. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1969–1978.
- . "Revolution from Above: Some Notes on the Decision to Collectivize Soviet Agriculture." In The Critical Spirit: Essays in Honor of Herbert Marcuse, edited by K. H. Wolff and Barrington Moore, Jr. Boston: Beacon, 1967, 313–27.
- . "Stalin Victorious," Times Literary Supplement, June 10, 1949.
- . German-Soviet Relations between the Two World Wars, 1919–1939. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1983.
- . Socialism in One Country: 1924–1926. 3 vols. New York: Macmillan, 1958.
- . The Comintern and the Spanish Civil War. New York: Pantheon, 1984.
- . The Russian Revolution from Lenin to Stalin, 1917–1929. New York: Macmillan, 1979.
- . The Twenty Years' Crisis, 1919–1939: An Introduction to the Study of International Relations. London: Macmillan, 1939.
- . The Twilight of the Comintern, 1930–1935. New York: Pantheon Books, 1983.
- Carr, Raymond. The Spanish Tragedy: The Civil War in Perspective. London: Phoenix Press, 2001.
- Carr, William. Poland to Pearl Harbor: The Making of the Second World War. London: E. Arnold, 1985.
- Carsten, F. L. The Reichswehr and Politics: 1918–1933. Berkeley, CA: University of California, 1973.
- Carswell, John. The Exile: A Life of Iyū Litvinov. London and Boston: Faber and Faber, 1983.
- Carynnyk, Marco, et al., eds. The Foreign Office and the Famine. Kingston, Ontario, and Vestal, NY: Limestone Press, 1988.
- Castellan, Georges. "Reichswehr et Armée Rouge." In Les relations germano-soviétiques du 1933 à 1939, edited by Jean-Baptiste Duroselle. Paris: Librairie A. Colin, 1954, 137–260.
- . Le réarmement clandestin du Reich, 1930–1935, vu par le 2. Bureau de l'État-major français. Paris: Plon, 1954.

- Catherwood, Christopher. The Balkans in World War Two. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
- Cattell, David T. Communism and the Spanish Civil War. Berkeley: University of California, 1955.
- . Soviet Diplomacy and the Spanish Civil War. Berkeley: University of California, 1957.
- Chalaia, Zinaida. Oboronnaia dramaturgiia: opyt isledovaniia nashei tvorcheskoi raboty v svete zadach sovremennosti. Moscow-Leningrad: Gosizdat Iskusstvo, 1938.
- Chamberlain, Neville. In Search of Peace. London: Hutchinson, 1939.
- . The Struggle for Peace. London: Hutchinson, 1939.
- Chamberlain, William Henry. Japan over Asia. Boston: Little, Brown, 1937.
- . Russia's Iron Age. Boston: Little, Brown, 1934.
- . The Evolution of a Conservative. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1959.
- Chandler, Andrea. Institutions of Isolation: Border Controls in the Soviet Union and its Successor States, 1917–1993. Montreal: McGill Queen's University, 1998.
- Chang, Jung, and Jon Halliday. Mao: The Unknown Story. New York: Knopf, 2005.
- Charkviani, Kandid. Napriki da naazrevi. Tbilisi: Merani, 2004.
- Chase, William J. "Microhistory and Mass Repression: Politics, Personalities, and Revenge in the Fall of Béla Kun," Russian Review, 67/3 (2008): 459–83.
- . Enemies within the Gates? The Comintern and the Stalinist Repression, 1934–1939. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2001.
- Chegodae, A. "Iz vospominanii," Detskaia literatura, 1993, no. 10–11: 8–16.
- Chegodae, Mariia. Dva lika vremeni: 1939 odin god stalinskoi epokhi. Moscow: Agraf, 2001.
- Cheliuskii Odyssey, The* (1934), video, available at Seventeen Moments in Soviet History: An On-line Archive of Primary Sources. <http://soviethistory.msu.edu/1936-2/pilots-and-explorers/pilots-and-explorers-video/the-cheliuskii-odyssey-1934/>. Accessed April 3, 2017.
- Cheremukhin, Anton, et al., "Was Stalin Really Necessary for Russia's Economic Development?" Working Paper 19425, National Bureau of Economic Research, Cambridge, MA, 2013. <http://www.nber.org/papers/w19425.pdf>.
- Cherepanov, A. I. Zapiski voennogo sovernika v Kitae. 2nd ed. Moscow: Nauka, 1976.
- Cherkasov, Petr P. MEMO, Institut mirovoi ekonomiki i mezhdunarodnykh otnoshenii: portret na fone epokhi. Moscow: Ves' mir, 2004.
- "Cherkni . . . desiatok slov," Voenye arkhivy Rossii, 1993, vyp. 1: 404–11.
- Cherniavskii, Georgii. "Fenomenon Litvinova," XX Vek: istoriia Rossii i SSSR, Feb. 4, 2004, <http://kackad.com/kackad/?p=5428>.
- . Lev Trotsky. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 2010.
- Chernobaev, Anatolii A. V vikhre veka. Moscow: Moskovskii rabochii, 1987.
- Chernopitskii, Pavel G. Na velikom perelome: sel'skie sovety Dona v perioda podgotovki i provedeniia massovoi kollektivizatsii, 1928–1931 gg. Rostov: Rostovskii universitet, 1965.
- Chernov, A. A., and M. G. Bialik. O legkoi muzyke, o dzbaze, o khorosem vkuse. Moscow-Leningrad: Muzyka, 1965.
- Chernov, Viktor. "Sotsializatsiia zemli s iuridicheskoi tochki zreniia." In Zemlia i Pravo. Petrograd: Tipografiia Soikina, 1917; first published 1906.
- Chernova, Nina V., and Vasilii Tokarev. "'Pervaia Konnaia,' kinematograficheskii reid v zabven'e: istoricheskie komentarii k sovetскому kinoprotessu 1938–1941 gg.," Kinovedcheskie zapiski, 65 (2003): 280–313.
- Cherushev, Nikolai S. "Nevinovnykh ne byvaet . . .": chekisty protiv voennykh, 1918–1953. Moscow: Veche, 2004.
- . 1937 god: elita Krasnoi Armii na Golgofe. Moscow: Veche, 2003.
- . Komendantsy Kremliia v labirintakh vlasti. Moscow: Veche, 2005.
- . Udar po svoim: Krasnaia Armia, 1938–1941. Moscow: Veche, 2003.
- , ed. "Dorogoi nash tovarishch Stalin!"—i drugie tovarishchi: obrashcheniia rodstvennikov represirovannykh komandirov Krasnoi Armii k rukovoditeliam strany. Moscow: Zvenia, 2001.
- Cherviakov, I. "Pesochnye chasy: istoriia zhizni Iriny Gogua v vos'mi kassetakh, pis'makh i kommentariakh," Druzhba narodov, 1997, no. 4: 59–104, no. 5: 75–119.

- Chew, Allen F. The White Death: The Epic of the Soviet-Finnish Winter War. East Lansing: Michigan State University, 1971.
- Chigirin, I. I. Stalin, bolezni i smert': dokumenty. Moscow: Dostoinstvo, 2016.
- Chihiro, Hosoya. "The Japanese-Soviet Neutrality Pact." In Deterrent Diplomacy: Japan, Germany, and the USSR 1935–1940, edited by James W. Morley. New York: Columbia University, 1976, 129–78.
- . "The Tripartite Pact 1939–1940." In Deterrent Diplomacy: Japan, Germany, and the USSR 1935–1940, edited by James W. Morley. New York: Columbia University, 1976, 191–257.
- Chistiakov, B. "Narkomvoenmor nomen tri," Smena, Feb. 19, 1989.
- Chistka sovetskogo apparata k XVI s'ezdu VKP (b)*. Moscow: Tekhnika upravleniia, 1930.
- Chkalov, V. P. Nash transpoliarnyi reis: Moskva-Severnyi poliis-Severnaia Amerika. Moscow: OGIZ-politicheskaia literatura, 1938.
- Chrezvychainyi VIII Vsesoiuznyi s'ezd Sovetov: stenograficheskii otchet*. Moscow, 1936.
- Christensen, Thomas J., and Jack Snyder. "Chain Gangs and Passed Bucks: Predicting Alliance Patterns in Multipolarity," International Organization, 44/2 (1990): 137–68.
- Christie, Ian. "Making Sense of Early Soviet Sound." In Inside the Film Factory: New Approaches to Russian and Soviet Cinema, edited by Richard Taylor and Ian Christie. London: Routledge, 1991, 208–15.
- Chubarian, A. O., and H. Shukman, eds. Stalin and the Soviet-Finnish War, 1939–1940. London and Portland, OR: Frank Cass, 2002.
- Chudakova, M. "Arkhir Bulgakova," Gosudartsvennaia biblioteka imeni Lenina: zapiski otdela rukopisei, no. 37 (1976): 52–5.
- Chudodееv, Aleksandr. "Chelovek iz 'gruppy Ya,'" Itogi, July 5, 2001.
- Chuev, Feliks. Kaganovich, Shepilov. Moscow: Olma, 2001.
- . Molotov Remembers: Inside Kremlin Politics. Chicago: I. R. Dee, 1993.
- . Molotov: Poludnerzhavnyi vlastelin. Moscow: Olma, 1999.
- . Sto sorok besed s Molotovym. Moscow: Terra, 1991.
- . Tak govoril Kaganovich: ispoved' stalinskogo apostola. Moscow: Otechestvo, 1992.
- Chugunov, A. I. Granitsa nakanune voiny: iz istorii pogranichnykh voisk 1939–22 iunია 1941. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1985.
- Chuiikov, V. "Konflikt na KVZhD," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1976, no. 7: 49–57.
- Chukhin, Ivan. Kanalorameitsy: istoriia stroitel'stva Belomorkanala v dokumentakh, tsifrakh, faktakh, fotografiakh, svidetel'stvakh uchastnikov i ochevidtsev. Petrozavodsk: Kareliia, 1990.
- Chukovskii, Kornei. Dnevnik: 1930–1969. Moscow: Sovremennyi pisatel, 1995.
- Chukovsky, Kornei. Diary, 1901–1969. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2005.
- Churchill, Winston. Step by Step, 1936–39. London: T. Butterworth, 1939.
- . The Second World War. 6 vols. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1948–1953.
- Ciano, Count Galeazzo. Ciano's Hidden Diary 1937–1938. New York: Dutton, 1953.
- . Diary, 1937–1943. New York: Enigma, 2002.
- . L'Europa verso la catastrofe: 184 colloqui. Verona: A. Mondadori, 1948.
- . The Ciano Diaries 1939–1943: The Complete, Unabridged Diaries of Count Galeazzo Ciano Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs, 1936–1943. New York: Doubleday, 1946.
- Cienciala, Anna M. "German Propaganda for the Revision of the Polish-German Frontier in Danzig and the Corridor: its Effects on British Opinion and the British Policy-Making Elite in the Years 1919–1933," Antemurale, 20 (1976): 77–129.
- . "Poland in British and French Policy in 1939: Determination to Fight—or Avoid War?" The Polish Review, 34/3 (1989): 199–226.
- . "Polish Foreign Policy, 1926–1939, 'Equilibrium': Stereotype and Reality." In Poland Between Germany and Russia 1926–1939: The Theory of Two Enemies, edited by Alexander Korczyński and Tadeusz Świętochowski. New York: Pilsudski Institute of America, 1975, 44–59.

- . "The Declaration of Non-Aggression of January 26, 1934 in Polish-German and International Relations: A Reappraisal," East European Quarterly, 1/1 (1967): 1–30.
- . "The Foreign Policy of Józef Piłsudski and Józef Beck, 1926–1939: Misconceptions and Interpretations," Polish Review, 56/1–2 (2011): 111–51.
- . Review of La Décadence, 1932–1939, by Jean Baptiste Duroselle. Paris: Paris Imprimerie Nationale, 1979, Kwartalnik Historyczny, 88/2 (1981).
- , et al., eds. Katyn: A Crime Without Punishment. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2008.
- Ciliga, Ante. The Russian Enigma. London: Scribner's, 1940.
- Citrine, Walter McLennan. A Trade Unionist Looks at Russia. London: Trades Union Congress General Council, 1936.
- Clark, Katerina. "Germanophone Exiles in Stalin's Russia: Diaspora and Cultural Identity in the 1930s," Kritika, 2/3 (2001): 529–51.
- . Moscow: The Fourth Rome: Stalinism, Cosmopolitanism, and the Evolution of Soviet Culture, 1931–1941. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 2011.
- . The Soviet Novel: History as Ritual. 3rd ed. Bloomington: Indiana University, 2000.
- Clarke, Peter. The Cripps Version: The Life of Sir Stafford Cripps, 1889–1952. London: Allen Lane, 2002.
- Clayton, Anthony. The British Empire as Superpower, 1919–1939. London: Macmillan, 1986.
- Clissold, Stephen, ed. Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union, 1939–1973: A Documentary Survey. New York: Oxford University, 1975.
- Coates, William P., and Zelda K. Coates. A History of Anglo-Soviet Relations. 2 vols. London: Lawrence & Wishart, 1944, 1958.
- Cobban, Alfred. Dictatorship: Its Theory and History. New York: Haskell House, 1939.
- Cockburn, Claud. Crossing the Line. London: MacGibbon & Kee, 1958.
- . In Time of Trouble. London: Rupert Hart-Davis, 1957.
- Cohen, Stephen F. Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution: A Political Biography, 1888–1938. New York: Oxford University, 1971.
- Colton, Joel. Léon Blum: Humanist in Politics. New York: Knopf, 1966.
- Colville, John. Footprints in Time. London: Collins, 1976.
- . Communism and the International Situation: Thesis . . . Adopted at the Sixth World Congress of the Communist International, 1928. London: Modern Books, 1929.
- Conquest, Robert. Harvest of Sorrow: Soviet Collectivization and the Terror-Famine. New York: Oxford University, 1986.
- . Inside Stalin's Secret Police: NKVD Politics 1936–1939. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution, 1985.
- . Kolyma: The Arctic Death Camps. New York: Viking, 1978.
- . Stalin and the Kirov Murder. New York: Oxford University, 1989.
- . Stalin: Breaker of Nations. New York: Viking, 1991.
- . The Great Terror: A Reassessment. New York: Oxford University, 1990.
- . The Great Terror: Stalin's Purge of the Thirties. New York: Macmillan, 1968.
- Cooper, Julian. "Defence Production and the Soviet Economy, 1929–1941," University of Birmingham, UK, Centre for Russian and East European Studies, discussion papers, 1976.
- Coox, Alvin D. "Introduction: The Japanese-Soviet Confrontation, 1935–1939." In Deterrent Diplomacy: Japan, Germany, and the USSR 1935–1940, edited by James W. Morley. New York: Columbia University, 1976, 115–27.
- . "Japanese Foreknowledge of the Soviet-German War, 1941," Soviet Studies, 23/4 (1971).
- . "L'Affaire Lyushkov: Anatomy of a Defector," Soviet Studies, 19/3 (1966): 405–20.
- . "The Lesser of Two Hells: NKVD General G.S. Liushkov's Defection to Japan, 1938–1945, Part 1," and "Part II," Journal of Slavic Military Studies, 11/3 (1998): 145–86, 11/4 (1998): 72–110.
- . Nomonhan: Japan against Russia, 1939. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 1985.

- . The Anatomy of a Small War: The Soviet-Japanese Struggle for Changkufeng/Khasan, 1938. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1977.
- Corbett, D. M. "The Rehabilitation of Mykola Skrypnyk." Slavic Review, 22/2 (1963): 304–13.
- Corbett, Julian S. Some Principles of Maritime Strategy. New York: Longman, Green, 1911.
- Corvaja, Santi. Hitler and Mussolini: The Secret Meetings. New York: Enigma, 2008.
- Costello, John. Mask of Treachery. New York: William Morrow, 1988.
- , and Oleg Tsarev. Deadly Illusions: The KGB Orlov Dossier Reveals Stalin's Master Spy. New York: Crown, 1993.
- Costigliola, Frank. Roosevelt's Lost Alliances. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 2011.
- Cot, Pierre. Triumph of Treason. Chicago: Ziff-Davis Publishing Co., 1944.
- Coulondre, Robert. De Staline à Hitler: souvenirs de deux ambassades, 1936–1939. Paris: Hachette, 1950.
- . Course and Phases of the World Economic Depression, The. Geneva: League of Nations, 1931.
- Courtois, Stéphane. "Conclusion: Why?" In The Black Book of Communism: Crimes, Terror, Repression. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 2015.
- Coverdale, John F. Italian Intervention in the Spanish Civil War. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1975.
- Cowley, Malcolm. "H. G. Wells' Interview with Stalin Helped Change the Fundamental Principles of Liberalism," New Republic, April 23, 1935.
- Cox, M., ed. E. H. Carr: A Critical Appraisal. Basingstoke and New York: Macmillan, 2000.
- Craig, Gordon Alexander, and Felix Gilbert, eds. The Diplomats, 1919–1939. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1994.
- Craigie, Sir Robert. Behind the Japanese Mask. London: Hutchinson, 1946.
- Crevel, Martin L. van. Hitler's Strategy, 1940–1941: The Balkan Clue. New York: Cambridge University, 1973.
- Crick, Bernard. In Defence of Politics. Chicago: University of Chicago, 1962.
- Cristiani, Antonella, and Vera M. Mikhaleva, eds. Le repressioni degli anni trenta nell'Armata rossa: racconta di documenti dai Fondi dell'Archivio militare di Stato russo. Naples: Istituto universitario orientale, 1996.
- , et al., eds. Repressii v Krasnoi Armii (30-e gody): sbornik dokumentov. Naples: Istituto universitario orientale, 1996.
- Crossman, Richard, ed. The God that Failed. New York: Columbia University, 1949.
- Crowley, Edward L., ed. The Soviet Diplomat Corps, 1917–1967. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow, 1970.
- Crowley, James B. Japan's Quest for Autonomy: National Security and Foreign Policy 1930–1938. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1966.
- Crozier, Andrew J. The Causes of the Second World War. Oxford, UK, and Malden, MA: Blackwell Publishers, 1997.
- Curtis, J. A. E. Manuscripts Don't Burn: Mikhail Bulgakov, a Life in Letters and Diaries. London: Bloomsbury, 1991.
- D'Agostino, Anthony. "Stalin Old and New," Russian Review, 54/3 (1995): 447–51.
- Dahlerus, Birger. Der letzte Versuch. Munich: Nymphenburger Verlagshandlung, 1948.
- . The Last Attempt. London: Hutchinson, 1948.
- Daines, Vladimir O. "Voennaia strategii mezhdru grazhdanskoi i Velikoi Otechestvennoi voynami." In Istoriia voennoi strategii Rossii, edited by V. A. Zolotarev Moscow: Kuchkovo pole, 2000, 125–90.
- . Zhukov. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 2005.
- Dallin, Alexander, and F. I. Firsov, eds. Dimitrov and Stalin, 1934–1943: Letters from the Soviet Archives. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2000.
- Dallin, David J. Soviet Russia's Foreign Policy, 1939–1942. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1942.
- . The Rise of Russia in Asia. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1949.
- , and Boris I. Nicolaevsky. Forced Labor in Soviet Russia. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1947.
- Dalrymple, Dana G. "Marx and Agriculture: The Soviet Experience," mimeograph, Department of Agricultural Economics, Michigan State University, East Lansing, November 1961.
- . "The Soviet Famine of 1932–1934," Soviet Studies, 15/3 (1964): 250–84.
- Dalton, H. The Fateful Years: Memoirs, 1931–1935. London: Muller, 1957.

- Damaskin, Igor A. Stalin i razvedka. Moscow: Veche, 2004.
- Dan, Lidia. "Bukharin o Staline," Novy zhurnal, no. 75 (1964): 176–84.
- Daniels, Robert V. "Office Holding and Elite Status: The Central Committee of the CPSU." In The Dynamics of Soviet Politics, edited by Paul Cocks et al. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1976, 77–95.
- . "The State and Revolution: A Case Study in the Genesis and Transformation of Communist Ideology," American Slavic and East European Review, 12/1 (1953): 22–43.
- . Conscience of the Revolution: Communist Opposition in Soviet Russia. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1960.
- Danielson, Elena S. "The Elusive Litvinov Memoirs," Slavic Review, 48/3 (1989): 477–83.
- Danilov, S. "K biografii L. Beria," Na rubezhe [Paris], 1952, no. 3–4: 31–2.
- . "Tragediia Abkhazskogo naroda," Vestnik instituta po izucheniiu istorii i kul'tury SSSR [Munich], no. 1 (1951): 2–12.
- Danilov, V. D. "Stalinskaiia strategii nachala voiny: plany i realnost'," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1995, no. 3: 33–8.
- Danilov, Viktor P. "Organizovannyi golod: K 70-letiiu obshchekrest'ianskoi tragedii," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 2004, no. 5: 97–110.
- , and N. A. Ivnitskii, eds. Dokumenty svideatel'stviui: iz istorii derevni nakanune i v khode kollektivizatsii, 1927–1932 gg. Moscow: Politizdat, 1989.
- , and Oleg Khlevniuk, eds. Kak lomali NEP: stenogrammy plenumov TsK VKP(b) 1928–1929 gg. 5 vols. Moscow: Demokratiia, 2000.
- , Lynne Viola, and Robert T. Manning, eds. Tragediia sovetskoi derevni: kollektivizatsiia i raskulachivanie. Dokumenty i materialy, 1927–1939. 5 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 1999–2006.
- , and Sergei Krasil'nikov. Spetspereselentsy v Zapadnoi Sibiri: 1930-vesna 1931 g. Novosibirsk: Nauka, 1992.
- Das Deutsche Reich und der Zweite Weltkrieg*. 9 vols. Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1979–.
- Dashpürev, D., and S. K. Soni. Reign of Terror in Mongolia, 1920–1990. New Delhi: South Asian Publishers, 1992.
- David-Fox, Michael. "Stalinist Westernizer? Aleksandr Arosev's Literary and Political Depictions of Europe," Slavic Review, 62/4 (2003): 733–59.
- . Showcasing the Great Experiment: Cultural Diplomacy and Western Visitors to the Soviet Union, 1921–1941. Oxford & New York: Oxford University, 2014.
- Davidson Eugene. The Trial of the Germans: An Account of the Twenty-two Defendants before the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg. New York: Macmillan, 1967.
- Davidson, J. C. C. Memoirs of a Conservative. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1969.
- Davies, Joseph E. Mission to Moscow. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1941.
- Davies, Robert W. "Making Economic Policy." In Behind the Façade of Stalin's Command Economy, edited by Paul R. Gregory. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institutions, 2013, 64–80.
- . "Soviet Defence Industries during the First Five-Year Plan." Unpublished Discussion Papers, SIPS no. 27. CREES, University of Birmingham, 1987.
- . "Soviet Military Expenditures and the Armaments Industry, 1929–1933: A Reconsideration," Europe-Asia Studies, 45/4 (1993): 577–608.
- . "Stalin as Economic Policy-Maker: Soviet Agriculture, 1931–1936." In Stalin: A New History, edited by Sarah Davies and James Harris. New York: Cambridge University, 2005, 121–39.
- . "The Soviet Economy and the Launching of the Great Terror." In Stalin's Terror Revisited, edited by Melanie Ilić. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006, 1–37.
- . "The Syrtsov-Lominadze Affair," Soviet Studies, 33/1 (1981): 29–50.
- . Introduction to The Russian Revolution from Lenin to Stalin, 1917–1929. Edited by E. H. Carr. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- . The Development of the Soviet Budgetary System. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1958.
- . The Industrialisation of Soviet Russia, Volume 1: The Socialist Offensive: The Collectivization of Soviet Agriculture, 1929–1930. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1980.

- . The Industrialisation of Soviet Russia, Volume 2: The Soviet Collective Farm, 1929–1930. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1980.
- . The Industrialisation of Soviet Russia, Volume 3: The Soviet Economy in Turmoil, 1929–1930. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1989.
- . The Industrialisation of Soviet Russia, Volume 4: Crisis and Progress in the Soviet Economy, 1931–1933. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1996.
- . The Industrialisation of Soviet Russia, Volume 5: The Years of Hunger: Soviet Agriculture, 1931–1933. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 1994.
- , and Mark Harrison. "Defence Spending and Defence Industry in the 1930s." In The Soviet Defence-Industry Complex from Stalin to Khrushchev, edited by John Barber and Mark Harrison. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan, 2000, 70–98.
- , and O. V. Khlevniuk. "Otmena kartochnoi sistemy v SSSR, 1934–1935 gody," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1999, no. 5: 87–107.
- , and O. V. Khlevniuk. "Stakhanovism and the Soviet Economy," Europe-Asia Studies, 54/6 (2002): 867–903.
- , and Stephen G. Wheatcroft. "Stalin and the Soviet Famine of 1932–33: A Reply to Ellman," Europe-Asia Studies, 58/4 (2006): 625–33.
- , et al., eds. The Stalin-Kaganovich Correspondence, 1931–36. New Haven, CT, and London: Yale University, 2003.
- , Mark Harrison, and Stephen G. Wheatcroft, eds. The Economic Transformation of the Soviet Union, 1913–1945. New York: Cambridge University, 1994.
- , Melanie Ilič, and Oleg Khlevniuk, "The Politburo and Economic Decision Making." In The Nature of Stalin's Dictatorship: The Politburo, 1924–1953, edited by E. A. Rees. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, 108–33.
- , Oleg Khlevnyuk, and Stephen G. Wheatcroft. The Industrialisation of Soviet Russia, Volume 6: The Years of Progress, 1934–1936. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2014.
- , Stephen G. Wheatcroft, and M. B. Tauger, "Stalin, Grain Stocks, and the Famine of 1932–33," Slavic Review, 54/3 (1995): 642–57.
- Davies, Sarah. "Stalin and the Making of the Leader Cult in the 1930s." In The Leader Cult in Communist Dictatorships: Stalin and the Eastern Bloc, edited by Balázs Apor et al. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, 29–46.
- . Popular Opinion in Stalin's Russia: Terror, Propaganda and Dissent, 1934–1941. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 2001.
- . "The Crime of 'Anti-Soviet Agitation' in the Soviet Union in the 1930s," Cahiers du monde russe, 39/1–2 (1998): 149–68.
- , and James Harris. Stalin's World: Dictating the Soviet Order. New Haven, CT, and London: Yale University, 2014.
- Davis, Richard. Anglo-French Relations before the Second World War: Appeasement and Crisis. New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Davison, Peter, ed. George Orwell: A Life in Letters. New York: Liveright, 2013.
- Davlekanova, Saniia. Galina Ulanova: Ia ne khotela tansevat'. Moscow: AST Pess SKD, 2005.
- Davydenko, S. S., et al., eds. Put' trudovykh pobed: sbornik dokumentov i materialov. Volgograd: Nizhne-Volzhskoe knizhnoe izd-vo, 1967.
- Dawson, J. H. R. "A King, a Doctor, and a Convenient Medical Death," British Medical Journal, no. 308 (1994).
- d'Encausse, Hélène Carrère. The Great Challenge: Nationalities and the Bolshevik State, 1917–1930. New York: Holmes & Meier, 1992.
- Deborin, A., ed. Na boevom postu: sbornik k shestidesiatiletiu D. B. Riazanova. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1930.
- Dębski, Slavomir. Między Berlinem a Moskwą. Stosunki niemiecko-sowieckie 1939–1941. Warsaw: Polski Instytut Spraw Międzynarodowych, 2003.

- Dederichs, Mario. Heydrich: The Face of Evil. London: Greenhill Books, 2006.
- Dedijer, Vladimir. "Sur l'armistice 'germano-yougoslave' (7 avril 1941): Peut-on dire qu'il y eut réellement un armistice?" Revue d'histoire de la Deuxième Guerre mondiale, 23 (1956): 1–10.
- De Grand, Alexander J. In Stalin's Shadow: Angelo Tasca and the Crisis of the Left in Italy and France, 1910–1945. Dekalb: Northern Illinois University, 1986.
- Dégras, Jane, ed. Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, 1917–1941. 3 vols. London and New York: Oxford University, 1951–53.
- , ed. The Communist International, 1919–1943: Documents. 3 vols. London: Frank Cass, 1971.
- Deighton, Len. "Hess the Aviator." In Flight from Reality: Rudolf Hess and His Mission to Scotland, 1941, edited by David Stafford. London: Pimlico, 2002, 121–38.
- Deist, Wilhelm. The Wehrmacht and German Rearmament. London: Macmillan, 1981.
- Delba, Mikhail. "Besposhchadno boro'sia s vragami naroda," Sovetskaia abkhazia, Aug. 15, 1937, in Abkhazia: dokumenty svideitel'stviu, 1937–1953. Sukhumi: Alashara, 1992.
- Deletant, Dennis. Hitler's Forgotten Ally: Ion Antonescu and His Regime in Romania, 1940–1944. Houndmills, Basingstoke and New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.
- Delmar, D. Sefton. "The Reichstag Fire." In The Mammoth Book of EyeWitness History 2000, edited by Jon E. Lewis. New York: Carroll and Graf, 2000.
- "Delo o tak nazyvaemoi 'antisovetskoj trotskistskoj voennoi organizatsii' v Krasnoi armii," Izvestiia TsK KPSS, 1989, no. 4: 41–62.
- de Madariaga, Maria Rosa. "The Intervention of Moroccan Troops in the Spanish Civil War," European History Quarterly, 22/1 (1992): 67–97.
- de Mayo, Julio Álvarez. The Last Optimist. London: Putnam, 1950.
- Dembksi, S. "Pol'sko-Sovetskie otnosheniia v otsenkakh Berlina v 30-e gody: nekotorye voprosy." In Sovetsko-Pol'skie otnosheniia v politicheskikh usloviakh Evropy 30-x godov XX stoletii: sbornik statei, edited by E. Duraczyński and A. N. Sakharov. Moscow: Nauka, 2001, 191–218.
- Dembksi, S. "Pol'sko-sovetskie otnosheniia v otsenkakh Berlina v 30-e gody: nekotorye voprosy." In Sovetsko-pol'skie otnosheniia, 1918–1945: sbornik statei, edited by I. I. Kostiusko et al. Moscow: Nauka, 1974, 191–218.
- Denikin, A. I. Ocherki russkoi smuty: krushenie vlasti i armii. 5 vols. Paris and Berlin: J. Povolozky & Cie, 1921–26.
- Denisova, N. A., and M. E. Tumash, eds. Nakanune: zapadnyi osobyi voennyi okrug (konets 1939 g.—1941 g.). Minsk: NABR, 2007.
- Denny, Harold, "No 'Formalism' for Soviet," New York Times, Oct. 23, 1938.
- Der bewaffnete Aufstand: Versuch einer theoretischen Darstellung*. Zürich: Meyer, 1928. Translated as Armed Insurrection, by A. Neuberger [false name]. London: NLB, 1970.
- Deriabin, Aleksandr, ed. Letopis' rossijskogo kino, 1930–1945. Moscow: Materik, 2007.
- Der Parteitag der Freiheit vom 10.-16. September 1935: offizieller Bericht über den Verlauf des Reichsparteitags mit sämtlichen Kongressreden*. Munich: Zentralverlag der NSDAP, F. Eher Nachf., 1935.
- Der Prozess gegen die Hauptkriegsverbrecher vor dem Internationalen Militärgerichtshof, Nürnberg, 14. November 1945–1. Oktober 1946*. 42 vols. Cologne: Reichenbach, 1994.
- Desiatov, L. "Operatsii v Norvegii (aprel'–iun' 1940 g.)," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1940, no. 4: 3–12.
- Deutsch, Harold C. Hitler and His Generals: The Hidden Crisis, January-June 1938. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota, 1974.
- . The Conspiracy against Hitler in the Twilight War. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota, 1968.
- Deutscher, Isaac. Stalin: A Political Biography. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University, 1966.
- . The Prophet Armed: Trotsky, 1879–1921. New York: Oxford University, 1954.
- . The Prophet Outcast: Trotsky, 1929–1940. New York: Oxford University, 1963.
- Deutschland-Berichte der Sozialdemokratischen Partei Deutschlands, 1934–1940*. 7 vols. Frankfurt am Main: Zweitausendeins, 1980.
- Development of Finnish-Soviet Relations during the Autumn of 1939*, The. Helsinki: Suomen kirja, 1940.

- Deviatov, Sergei V., and Elena Zhuraveva. Dvortsy Kremliia. Moscow: Slovo, 2001.
- . Kremlevskii senat. Moscow: Ivan i tovarishchestvo, 1999.
- Deviatov, Sergei V., et al. "Gibel' Kirova: fakty i versii," Rodina, 2005, no. 3: 57–65.
- . Blizhnaiia dacha Stalina: opyt istoricheskogo putevoditeli. Moscow: Kremlin Multimedia, 2011.
- . Garazh osobogo naznacheniia: 90 let na sluzhbe Otechstvu, 1921–2011. Moscow: MediaPress, 157.
- Deviaty vseroiuznyi s'ezd professional'nykh soiuзов SSSR: stenograficheskii otchet*. Moscow, 1933.
- DeWitt, N. Soviet Professional Manpower: Its Education, Training and Supply. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1955.
- D'iakov, Iu. L., and T. S. Bushueva, eds. Fashistskii mekh kovalsia v SSSR, Krasnaia Armia i Reikhsver, tainoe sotrudnichestvo 1922–1933: neizvestnye dokumenty. Moscow: Sovetskaiia Rossiia, 1992.
- Die Schulze-Boysen-Harnack Organizations in Antifascistischen Kampf*. East Berlin: Dietz, 1975.
- Dietrich, Otto. The Hitler I Knew. London: Methuen, 1955.
- "Diktatura iazykocheshyshchikh nad rabotaiushchimi': posledniaia sluzhebnaia zapiska Chicherina," Istochnik, 1995, no. 6: 99–116.
- Dilks, David, ed. The Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan, O.M., 1938–1945. London: Cassell, 1971.
- . "'We Must Hope for the Best and Prepare for the Worst': the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, and Hitler's Germany," Proceedings of the British Academy, 73 (1987): 309–52.
- Dima, Nicholas. Bessarabia and Bukovina: The Soviet-Romanian Territorial Dispute. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs, 1982.
- Dimitrov, Georgi. "Nastuplenie fashizma i zadachi Komunnisticheskogo internatsionala v bor'be za edinstvo rabocheho klassa protiv fashizma," In Sed'moi congress i bor'ba protiv fashizma i voiny: sbornik dokumentov, edited by Kirill K. Shirinia. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1975.
- . "Zashchishchat' podlykh terroristov—znachit pomogat' fashizmu," Kommunisticheskii Internatsional, 1936, no. 14, no. 15.
- . Against Fascism and War. Report before the Seventh World Congress of the Communist International, 1935. Sofia: Sofia Press, 1982.
- Dippel, John V. H. Two Against Hitler: Stealing the Nazis' Best-Kept Secrets. New York: Praeger, 1992.
- Dijlas, Milovan, ed. Besedy so Stalinyim. Moscow: Tsentrpoligraph, 2002.
- Dmitriev, Vladimir I. "Stroitel'stvo sovetskogo podvodnogo flota v mezhuvoennyi period," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1974, no. 10: 82–3.
- . Sovetskoe podvodnoe korablestroenie. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1990.
- Dmitriev, Yuri, ed. Pominal'nye spiski Karelii, 1937–1938. Petrozavodsk: [s.n.], 2002.
- Dmitrievskii, Sergei V. Sovetskie portrety. Berlin: Strela, 1932.
- . Stalin. Stockholm: Bonnier and Strela, 1931.
- Dmitrievskii, V. Piatnitskii. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1971.
- Dobrenko, Evgeny. Formovka Sovetskogo chiatelia: sotsial'nye i esteticheskie predposylki retsepsii sovetskoi literatury. St. Petersburg: Akademicheskii proekt, 1997. Translated as The Making of the State Reader: Social and Aesthetic Contexts of the Reception of Soviet Literature. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 1997.
- . Political Economy of Socialist Realism. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2007.
- . Stalinist Cinema and the Production of History: Museum of the Revolution. New Haven, CT, and London: Yale University, 2008.
- Dobry, Michel. "February 1934 and the Discovery of French Society's Allergy to the 'Fascist Revolution.'" In France in the Era of Fascism: Essays on the French Authoritarian Right, edited by Brian Jenkins. Oxford: Berghahn, 2005.
- Documents Concerning German-Polish Relations and the Outbreak of Hostilities between Great Britain and Germany on September 3, 1939*. London: HMSO, 1939.
- Documents of the Fourth International*. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1973.
- Documents on International Affairs, 1939–1946*. 2 vols. London: Oxford University, 1951–54.

- Documents and Materials Relating to the Eve of the Second World War: The Dirksen Papers (1938–1939)*. Moscow: Foreign Languages Publishing House, 1948.
- Dodd, Jr., William E., and Mary Dodd, eds. Ambassador Dodd's Diary, 1933–1938. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1941.
- Doering, Dötre. Deutsche Aussenwirtschaftspolitik 1933–5: die Gleichschaltung der Aussenwirtschaft in der Früh die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Rüstungspolitik zwischen den Weltkrieg. Berlin: [s.n.], 1969.
- Dohan, Michael R. "Soviet Foreign Trade in the NEP Economy and Soviet Industrialization Strategy." PhD diss. Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1969.
- . "The Economic Origins of Soviet Autarky, 1927/8–1934," Slavic Review, 35/4 (1976): 603–35.
- Doise, Jean, and Maurice Vaisse. Diplomatie et outil militaire, 1871–1969. Paris: Impr. nationale, 1987.
- Doklad komisii B. Z. Shumiatskogo po izucheniiu tekhniki i organizatsii amerikanskoi i evropeiskoi kinematografii*. Moscow, 1935.
- Dokuchaev, Mikhail. Moskva, kreml', okhrana. Moscow: Bizness-Press, 1995.
- Dokumenty i materialy kanuna vtoroi mirovoi voyny: 1937–39*. 2 vols. Moscow: Gospolitizdat, 1948.
- Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-chekhoslovatskikh otnoshenii*. 5 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 1973–88.
- Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-pol'skikh otnoshenii*. 12 vols. Moscow: Akademiia nauk SSSR, 1963–1986.
- Dolgoplov, Nikolai. Vartanian. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 2014.
- Dolonskii, L. L. Sovetskaia kinokomediia tridsatyykh godov. 2 vols. Moscow: Vsesoiuznyi gos. institut kinematografii, 1957.
- Dolot, Miron. Execution by Hunger: A Survivor's Account of the Famine of 1932–1933 in Ukraine in which Over Seven Million People Were Deliberately Starved to Death. New York: W. W. Norton, 1985.
- Domarus, Max, ed. Hitler: Reden und Proklamationen 1932–1945. 2 vols. Munich: Suddeutscher Verlag, 1965.
- , ed. Hitler: Speeches and Proclamations 1932–1945: The Chronicle of a Dictatorship. 4 vols. Wauconda, IL: Bolchazy-Carducci, 1990–2004.
- Dongarov, A. G. "Privitel'stvo Kuusinen—epizod sovetsko-finliandskoi voyny 1939–1940 godov," Vestnik Ministerstva inostrannykh del SSSR, 1989, no. 22.
- . "Voina, kotoryi moglo ne byt'," Voprosy istorii, 1990, no. 5: 28–45.
- Dongarov, Aleksandr. "Mezhdu reinom i volgoi," Rodina, 1991, no. 5: 39–40.
- Dorofeev, Boris. "Mat'," Pravda, Oct. 23, 1935.
- Doughty, Robert Allan. The Breaking Point: Sedan and the Fall of France, 1940. Hamden, CT: Archon, 1990.
- Douglas, Susan. Inventing American Broadcasting, 1899–1922. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University, 1987.
- Drabovitch, Wladimir. Les Intellectuels français et le bolchévisme: La Ligue des droits de l'homme; le néo-marxisme universitaire; quelques grands intellectuels: André Gide-Romain Rolland, et certains autres. Paris: Les Libertés françaises, 1938.
- Draitser, Emil. Stalin's Romeo Spy: The Remarkable Rise and Fall of the KGB's Most Daring Operative, the True Life of Dmirii Bystrolyotov. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University, 2010.
- Draskoczy, Julie. Belomor: Criminality and Creativity in Stalin's Gulag. Boston: Academic Studies, 2014.
- Dreifort, John E. "The French Popular Front and the Franco-Soviet Pact, 1936–1937: A Dilemma in Foreign Policy," Journal of Contemporary History, 11/2–3 (1976): 217–36.
- Drzdo, Vera. Nadezhda Konstantinovna Krupskaiia. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1958.
- Drobizhev, V. B. Industrializatsiia i izmeneniia v sotsial'noi strukture sovetskogo obschestva. Moscow: Nauka, 1970.
- Drobizhev, V. Z. Glavnyi shtab sotsialisticheskoi promyshlennosti. Moscow: Mysl, 1966.
- Druzhnikov, Iurii. Informant 001: The Myth of Pavlik Morozov. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 1997.
- Duara, Prasenjit. Sovereignty and Authenticity: Manchukuo and the East Asian Modern. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2003.
- Dubinskaia-Dzhalilova, T., and A. Chernev. "'Zhmu vashu ruku, dorogoi tovarishch!': perepiska Maksima Gor'kogo i Iosifa Stalina," Novyi mir, 1997, no. 9: 167–92.
- Dubinskii, I. V. Osobyi schet. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1989.

- Dubinskii-Mukhadze, Il'ia M. Ordzhonikidze. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1963.
- Dubrovskii, Aleksandr M. "A. A. Zhdanov v rabote nad shkol'nym uchebnikom istorii." In Otechestvennaia kul'tura i istoricheskaia nauka XVIII-XX vekov: sbornik statei. Briansk: BGPU, 1996, 128–43.
- . Istoriik i vlast': istoricheskaia nauka v SSSR i kontsepsiia istorii feodal'noi Rossii v kontekste politiki i ideologii (1930–1950-e gg.). Briansk: BGPU, 2005.
- Dubrovskii, S. M. Krest'ianskoe dvizhenie v revoliutsii 1905–1907 g.g. Moscow: Akademiia nauk SSSR, 1956.
- Dubrovsky, Alexander M. "Chronicle of a Poet's Downfall: Dem'ian Bednyi, Russian History, and The Bogatyri." In Epic Revisionism: Russian History and Literature as Stalinist Propaganda, edited by Kevin Platt and David Brandenberger. Madison: University of Wisconsin, 2006, 77–114.
- Dubynskii, I. I. "Bol'shie kievskie manevry," Moskva, 1967, no. 4.
- Duda, Gerhard. Jenő Varga und die Geschichte des Instituts für Weltwirtschaft und Weltpolitik in Moskau 1921–1970: Zu den Möglichkeiten und Grenzen wissenschaftlicher Auslandsanalyse in der Sowjetunion. Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 1994.
- Dudnik, V., and D. Smirnov. "V'sia zhizn'—nauke," Voenna-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1965, no. 2: 47–57, no. 8: 118–24.
- Duff, William E. A Time for Spies: Theodore Stepanovich Mally and the Era of the Great Illegals. Nashville: Vanderbilt University, 1999.
- Duggan, Christopher. Fascist Voices: An Intimate History of Mussolini's Italy. New York: Oxford University, 2013.
- Duhanovs, M., I. Feldmanis, and A. Stranga. 1939: Latvia and the Year of Fateful Decisions. Riga: Latvian University, 1994.
- Dülffer, Jost. Weimar, Hitler und die Marine: Reichspolitik und Flottenbau 1920 bis 1939. Düsseldorf: Droste, 1973.
- Dullin, Sabine. "How to Wage Warfare without Going to War? Stalin's 1939 War in the Light of other Contemporary Aggressions," Cahiers du monde russe, 53/2–3 (2012): 221–43.
- . "La rôle de l'Allemagne dans le rapprochement franco-soviétique, 1932–1935." In Deutschland-Frankreich-Russland, edited by Ilya Mieck and Pierre Guillen. Munich: R. Oldenbourg, 2000, 245–62.
- . "Understanding Russian and Soviet Foreign Policy from a Geocultural Perspective," Kritika, 12/1 (2011): 161–81.
- . Des hommes d'influence: Les ambassadeurs de Stalin en Europe 1930–1939. Paris: Payot, 2001.
- . La frontière épaisse: aux origines des politiques soviétiques 1920–1940. Paris: Éditions de l'École des hautes études en sciences sociales, 2014.
- . Men of Influence: Stalin's Diplomats in Europe, 1930–1939. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University, 2008.
- Dumbadze, Evgenii. Na sluzhbe cheka i kominterna: lichnye vospominaniia. Paris: Mishen, 1930.
- Dunaevskii, V. A. "Bol'sheviki i germanskii levye na mezhdunarodnoi arene v dorevoliutsionnyi period." In Evropa v novoe i noveishee vremia: sbornik statei. Moscow: Nauka, 1966, 491–513.
- Dunsterville, L. C. The Adventures of Dunsterforce. London: Edwin Arnold, 1920.
- Duraczyński, E., and A. N. Sakharov, eds. Sovetsko-Polskie otnosheniia v politicheskikh usloviakh Evropy 30-x godov XX stoletii: sbornik statei. Moscow: Nauka, 2001.
- Durand, Mortimer. Crazy Campaign: A Personal Narrative of the Italo-Abyssinian. London: Routledge, 1936.
- Duranty, Walter. "Stalin Sees Capitalists Drifting Surely to War: Puzzled by Our Attitude," New York Times, Dec. 1, 1930.
- . "Stalin: Man, Mouthpiece, Machine," New York Times, Jan. 18, 1931.
- . I Write as I Please. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1935.
- . USSR, The Story of Russia. New York: J. B. Lippincott, 1944.
- Duroselle, Jean Baptiste. La décadence, 1932–1939. 2nd ed. Paris: Imprimerie nationale, 1979.
- . France and the Nazi Threat: The Collapse of French Diplomacy, 1932–1939. New York: Enigma, 2004.
- Dushen'kin, Vasilii V. Ot soldata do marshala. 3rd ed. Moscow: Politizdat, 1966.
- . Proletarskii marshal: (o V. K. Blukhere). Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1973.
- . 20 let sovetskoi vlasti: statisticheskii sbornik. Moscow: Partizdat, 1937.
- "Dva ochaga opasnosti: vystupenie komanduiushchego Belorusskim voennym okrugom komandarma 1 ranga I. P. Uborevicha na soveshchanii v Zapadnom obkome VLKSM v 1936 g.," Voenna-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1998, no. 10: 38–

- "Dve besedy s L. M. Kaganovichem," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1999, no. 2: 101–22.
- Dvornichenko, V. V. Nekotorye aspekty funktsionirovaniia industrii turizma. Moscow: Vestnik, 1998.
- Dvoynikh, L. V., and N. E. Elisseva, eds. Konflikt: komplekt dokumentov o sovetskoi-finlandskoi voine (1939–1940 gg.) iz fonda Tsentral'nogo gosudarstvennogo arkhiva sovetskoi armii. Minneapolis, MN: Eastview, 1992.
- Dyck, Harvey L. Weimar Germany and Soviet Russia, 1926–1933: A Study in Diplomatic Instability. New York: Columbia University, 1966.
- Dylykov, S. D. Demokraticheskoe dvizhenie mongol'skogo naroda v Kitae. Moscow: Akademiia nauk, 1953.
- Dzanovich, A. A. Organy gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti i Krasnaia armia. Moscow: Kuckovo pole/lks-Khistorii, 2008.
- Dzhikhashvili, Musto. "Kavkaskie safari Stalina (Vospominaniia rodstvennika Nestora Lakoby)," Batum-Moscow, 2003. http://www.apsuara.ru/lib_d/musto_yad.php.
- Dzhonua, A. N., et al., eds. Sovety Abkhazii, 1922–1937: sbornik dokumentov i materialov. Sukhumi: Alashara, 1976.
- Dzhugashvili, Ekaterina Gavrilovna. Moi syn Iosif Stalin. Moscow: Algoritm, 2013.
- Dzidzaria, G. A., et al., eds. Revolutsionnye komitety Abkhazii: Sbornik dokumentov i materialov. Sukhumi: Abgosizdat, 1961.
- . Efrem Eshba: biograficheskii ocherk. Sukhumi: Alashara, 1967.
- . Ocherki istorii Abkhazii, 1910–1921. Tbilisi: Gosizdat sabchota sakartvelo, 1963.
- Eastman, Max. "Artists in Uniform," The Modern Monthly, 7 (August 1933), 397–404.
- . Artists in Uniform: A Study of Literature and Bureaucratism. New York: Knopf, 1934.
- Eberhardt, Piotr. Ethnic Groups and Population Changes in Twentieth-Century Central-Eastern Europe: History, Data, and Analysis. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 2003.
- Eberle, Henrik, and Matthias Uhl, eds. The Hitler Book: The Secret Dossier Prepared for Stalin from the Interrogations of Hitler's Personal Aides. New York: Public Affairs, 2005.
- Eby, Cecil. Comrades and Commissars: The Lincoln Battalion in the Spanish Civil War. University Park: Pennsylvania State University, 2007.
- Eden, Anthony. Facing the Dictators: The Memoirs of Anthony Eden, Earl of Avon. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1962.
- . Foreign Affairs. London: Faber and Faber, 1939.
- Edgerton, David. Britain's War Machine: Weapons, Resources and Experts in the Second World War. London: Allen Lane, 2011.
- Edwards, Jill. The British Government and the Spanish Civil War, 1936–1939. London: Macmillan, 1979.
- Efimenko, A. R., et al., eds. Vooruzhennyi konflikt v raione reki Khalkhin-Gol, mai—sentjabr' 1939 g.: dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: Novalis, 2014.
- Efimov, Boris. "Vernost' prizvaniu." In Bol' i pamiat', edited by B. S. Burkov and V. A. Miakushkov. Moscow: Respublika, 1993, 17–37.
- . Mikhail Koltsov, kakim on byl: sbornik vospominanii. 2nd ed. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1989.
- Egorov, A. Ia., and V. P. Kliucharev. Grazhdanskaia aviatsiia SSSR. Moscow: [s.n.], 1937.
- Ehrenburg, Ilya. Memoirs: 1921–1941. Cleveland and New York: World, 1963.
- . Men, Years—Life. 6 vols. London: MacGibbon and Kee, 1962–66.
- . Post-War Years, 1945–1954. London: MacGibbon and Kee, 1966.
- Eichengreen, Barry J. Golden Fetters: The Gold Standard and the Great Depression, 1919–1939. New York: Oxford University, 1992.
- Eideman, R. P. "K voprosu o kharaktere nachal'nogo perioda voiny (v poriadke obsuzhdenii)," Voina i revoliutsiia, 1931, no. 8: 111–7.
- Eisenstein, S. M. The Film Sense. New York: Meridian, 1958.
- Eizenshtein, Sergei M. "Pered prem'eroi 'Val'kirii,'" Vechniaia Moskva, Sept. 21, 1940.
- . "Samoe vazhnoe," Izvestiia, January 6, 1935.
- . "Tvorcheskaiia vstrecha s Vagnerom," Ogonek, 1940, no. 29.
- . Izbrannye proizvedeniia. 6 vols. Moscow: Iskustvo, 1964–1971.

- Elagin, Iurii. Ukroshchenie iskusstv. Moscow: Russkii put, 2002.
- Elleman, Bruce A. "The 1925 Secret Soviet- Japanese Agreement on Bessarabia," Diplomacy and Statecraft, 5/2 (1994): 287–95.
- . International Competition in China, 1899–1991: The Rise, Fall, and Restoration of the Open Door Policy. New York: Routledge, 2015.
- . Moscow and the Emergence of Communist Power in China 1925–1930: The Nanchang Rising and the Birth of the Red Army. New York: Routledge, 2009.
- Elliston, H. Finland Fights. Boston: Little, Brown, 1940.
- Ellman, Michael. "Did the Agricultural Surplus Provide Resources for the Increase in Investment during the First Five Year Plan?" Economic Journal, 85 (1975): 844–63.
- . "Regional Influences on the Formulation and Implementation of NKVD Order 00447," Europe-Asia Studies, 62/6 (2010): 915–31.
- . "Soviet Industrialization: A Remarkable Success?" Slavic Review, 63/4 (2004): 841–9.
- . "Soviet Repression Statistics: Some Comments," Europe-Asia Studies, 54/7 (2002): 1151–72.
- . "The Political Economy of Stalinism in the Light of the Archival Revolution," Journal of Institutional Economics, 4/1 (2008): 99–125.
- . "The Role of Leadership Perceptions and of Intent in the Soviet Famine of 1931–1934," Europe-Asia Studies, 57/6 (2005): 823–41.
- . "The Soviet 1937 Provincial Show Trials: Carnival or Terror," Europe-Asia Studies, 53/8 (2001): 1221–33.
- . "The Soviet 1937–1938 Provincial Show Trials Revisited," Europe-Asia Studies, 55/8 (2003): 1305–21.
- . Socialist Planning. 2nd ed. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1989.
- El'-Registan, G. "Neobychainoe puteshestvie," Molodaia gvardiia, 1935, no. 10–12.
- Emel'ianov, V. S. Na poroge voyny. Moscow: Sovetskaiia Rossiia, 1971.
- Emets, Valentin A. "O roli russkoi armii v pervyi period mirovoi voyny, 1914–1918 gg.," Istoricheskie zapiski, 77 (1965): 57–84.
- Emmerson, James T. The Rhineland Crisis, 7 March 1936: A Study in Multicultural Diplomacy. London: Maurice Temple Smith, 1977.
- Engel, Gerhard. Heeresadjutant bei Hitler 1938–1943. Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1974.
- Engelmann, Bernt. In Hitler's Germany: Daily Life in the Third Reich. New York: Pantheon Books, 1986.
- Engels, Friedrich. "The Tactics of Social Democracy." In The Marx-Engels Reader, 2nd ed., edited by Robert C. Tucker. New York: W. W. Norton, 1978, 556–73.
- . Herrn Eugen Dührings Umwälzung der Wissenschaft. Moscow, 1935.
- Ennker, Benno. "Struggling for Stalin's Soul: The Leader Cult and the Balance of Social Power in Stalin's Inner Circle." In Personality Cults in Stalinism, edited by Klaus Heller and Jan Plamper. Göttingen: V&R Unipress, 2004, 161–95.
- Enteen, George. "Intellektual'nye predposylki utverzhdeniia stalinizma v sovetskoi istoriografii," Voprosy istorii, 1995, no. 5–6: 149–55.
- . "Marxist Historians During the Cultural Revolution: A Case Study in Professional Infighting," in Cultural Revolution in Russia, Sheila Fitzpatrick, ed. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1978, 154–79.
- Enukidze, A. S. "Istoriia organizatsii i raboty nelegal'noi tipografii R.S.D.R.P. na Kavkaze za vremia 1900–1906 gg.," Proletarskaia revoliutsiia, 1923, no. 14: 152–66.
- . Bol'shevistskie nelegal'nye tipografii, 3rd ed. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1934.
- . Bol'shevistskie podpol'nye tipografii. 2nd ed. Moscow-Leningrad: Molodaia gvardiia, 1930.
- . Nasbi podpol'nye tipografii Kavkaza. Moscow: Novaia Moskva, 1925.
- Ercoli [Togliatti], M. "Ob osobennostiakh ispankoi revoliutsii," Kommunisticheskii Internatsional, 1936, no. 16: 15–22.
- . "Uroki protsessa trotskistsko-zinov'evskogo terroristicheskogo tsentra," Kommunisticheskii Internatsional, 1936, no. 15.

- Eremenko, A. I. V nachale voiny. Moscow: Nauka, 1964.
- Erenburg, Il'ia. "Iz literaturnogo proshlogo," Oktiabr', 1988, no. 7.
- . "O moem Parizhe: iz vyskazyvaniï Il'i Erenburga," Sovetskoe foto, 1934, no. 4–5.
- . Dumael, Gide, Malraux, Mauriac, Morand, Romain, Unamuno: vus par un écrivain d'U.R.S.S. Paris: Gallimard, 1934.
- . Liudi, gody, zhizn': vospominaniia. 2nd ed. 6 vols. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1990.
- . Moi Parizh. Moscow: Izgiz, 1933.
- . No pasarín! Grazhdanskaia voina i iul'-dekabr' 1936 goda. Moscow: OGIZ-IZOGIZ, 1937.
- . Sobranie sochinenii. 9 vols. Moscow: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1962–7.
- Erickson, John, and Richard E. Simpkin. Deep Battle: The Brainchild of Marshal Tukhachevskii. London: Brassey's Defence, 1986.
- . "Rudolf Hess: A Post-Soviet Postscript." In Flight from Reality: Rudolf Hess and His Mission to Scotland, 1941, edited by David Stafford. London: Pimlico, 2002, 38–60.
- . "The Red Army's March into Poland, September 1939." In The Soviet Takeover of the Polish Eastern Provinces, 1939–1941, edited by Keith Sword. New York: Macmillan, 1991, 1–27.
- . "Threat Identification and Strategic Appraisal by the Soviet Union 1930–1941." In Knowing One's Enemies: Intelligence Assessment before the Two World Wars, edited by Ernest R. May. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1984, 375–423.
- . The Road to Stalingrad. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1975.
- . The Soviet High Command: A Military-Political History, 1918–1941. London: Macmillan, 1962. Note: all references are to this edition unless otherwise indicated.
- . The Soviet High Command: A Military-Political History, 1918–1941. 3rd ed. New York: Frank Cass, 2001.
- Ericson, Edward E., III. Feeding the German Eagle: Soviet Economic Aid to Nazi Germany, 1933–1941. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1999.
- Ermakov, A. F. "A. V. Lurcharskii i politika partii v oblasti iskusstva, 1917–1925 gg." In Obogashchenie metoda sotsialisticheskogo realizma i problema mnogoobrazia sovetskogo iskusstva, edited by Mikhail N. Parkhomenko. Moscow: Mysl', 1967, 340–83.
- Ermilov, Viktor V. Schast'e trudnykh dorog. Moscow: Moskovskii rabochii, 1972.
- Erofeev, V. I. Diplomat: kniga vospominanii. Moscow: Zebra E., 2005.
- Esaiashvili, V. G., ed. Ocherki istorii Kommunisticheskoi partii Gruzii. 2 vols. Tbilisi, Izd-vo TsK KP Gruzii, 1957, 1963.
- Esakov, V. D., ed. Akademii Nauk v resheniiakh Politbiuro TsK RKP (b)-VKP (b), 1922–1952. Moscow: Rosspen, 2000.
- Eudin, Xenia Joukoff, and Robert M. Slusser, eds. Soviet Foreign Policy, 1928–1934: Documents and Materials. 2 vols. University Park: Pennsylvania State University, 1966–7.
- Evans, Richard J. The Third Reich in Power, 1933–1939. New York: Penguin, 2005.
- Evdoshenko, Iu. V. "Delo nefianikov-'vreditel'ei' 1929–1931 gg. i sud by nobelevskikh sluzhashchikh v SSSR: k voprosu o genezise 'ekonomicheskoi kontrevoliutsii.'" In Ekonomicheskaiia istoriia: ezhegodnik 2013, edited by L. I. Borodkin and Iu. A. Petrov. Moscow: Rosspen, 2014.
- Fabry, Philipp W. Der Hitler-Stalin Pakt, 1939–1941: ein Beitrag zur Methode sowjetischer Aussenpolitik. Darmstadt: Fundus, 1966.
- . Die Sowjetunion und das Dritte Reich: eine dokumentierte Geschichte der deutsch-sowjetischen Beziehungen von 1933 bis 1941. Stuttgart: Seewald, 1971.
- Fainsod, Merle. How Russia Is Ruled. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1959.
- . Smolensk under Soviet Rule. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1958.
- Fakel*. 2 vols. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1989–90.
- Falasca-Zamponi, Simonetta. Fascist Spectacle: The Aesthetics of Power in Mussolini's Italy. Berkeley: University of California, 1997.

- Falin, V. M., ed. Soviet Peace Efforts on the Eve of World War II, September 1938–August 1939: Documents and Records. 2 vols. Moscow: Novosti, 1971–73.
- Farnsworth, Beatrice. "Conversing with Stalin, Surviving the Terror: The Diaries of Aleksandra Kollontai and the Internal Life of Politics," Slavic Review, 694 (2010): 944–70.
- . William C. Bullitt and the Soviet Union. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1967.
- Fedenko, I. I., ed. Kanal Moskva-Volga: spravochnik-putevoditel'. Moscow: Vodnyi transport, 1938.
- Fediuninskii, I. I., Podniatie po trevoge. Moscow, Voenizdat, 1961.
- Fedoroff-White, D. The Growth of the Red Army. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1944.
- Fedtko, G. "How Bukharans Turned into Uzbeks and Tajiks: Soviet Nationalities Policy in the Light of a Personal Rivalry." In Patterns of Transformation in and around Uzbekistan, edited by P. Sartori and T. Trevisani. Reggio Emilia: Diabasis, 2007, 19–50.
- Felice, Renzo de. Mussolini. 4 vols. Turin: Einaudi, 1965–97.
- Fel'shtinskii, Iurii G. "Dva epizoda iz istorii vnutripartiinoi bor'by: konfidentsial'nye besedy Bukharina," Voprosy istorii, 1991, no. 2–3: 182–203.
- . Oglasheniia podlezhit: SSSR-Germaniia, 1939–1941. Moscow: Terra-Knizhny klub, 2004.
- . Razgovory s Bukharinym. New York: Telex: 1991.
- , ed. SSSR-Germaniia, 1939–1941 gg.: sbornik dokumentov. 2 vols. Vilnius: Mokslas, 1989.
- , ed. VChK-GPU: dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: Izdatel'stvo Gumanitarnoi Literatury, 1995.
- Ferarra, Marcello, and Maurizio Ferarra. Conversando con Togliatti: Note Biografiche. Rome: Edizioni di cultura sociale, 1953.
- Ferran, Carlos Jerez, and Samuel Amago. Unearthing Franco's Legacy: Mass Graves and the Recovery of Historical Legacy in Spain. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame, 2010.
- Fesun, A. G., ed. Delo Rikharda Zorge: neizvestnye dokumenty. Moscow: Letnii sad, 2000.
- Fest, Joachim C. Hitler. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1974.
- . The Face of the Third Reich: Portraits of the Nazi Leadership. New York: Ace Books, 1963.
- Feuchtwanger, Lion. Moscow 1937: My Visit Described for My Friends. London: V. Gollancz, 1937.
- . Moskva 1937: otchet o poezdke dlia moikh друзей. Moscow: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1937.
- Field, Frank. Three French Writers and the Great War. New York: Cambridge University, 1975.
- Figes, Orlando. A People's Tragedy: The Russian Revolution, 1891–1924. London: Jonathan Cape, 1996.
- Figgis, J. N., and R. V. Laurence, eds. Historical Essays and Studies. London: Macmillan, 1907.
- Filippov, I. F. Zapiski o "tret'em reikhe". Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1966.
- Filov, Bogdan. Dnevnik. Sofia: Izdatelstvo na OF, 1986.
- Filtzer, Donald. Soviet Workers and Stalinist Industrialization: The Formation of Modern Soviet Production Relations, 1928–1941. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1986.
- Finney, Patrick, ed. The Origins of the Second World War. London: Arnold, 1997.
- Firsov, F. I. "Arkhivy Komintern a i vnesniaia politika SSSR v 1939–1941 gg.," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1992, no. 6: 12–35.
- . "Komintern: opyt, traditsii, uroki—nereshenye zadachi issledovaniia." In Komintern: opyt, traditsii, uroki. Moscow, 1989.
- . "Stalin i Komintern," Voprosy istorii, 1989, no. 8: 3–23, no. 9: 3–19.
- Fischer, Ernst. Le grande rêve socialiste: Souvenirs et réflexions. Paris: Denoël, 1974.
- Fischer, Louis. "Heart's Russian 'Famine,'" The Nation, March 19, 1935.
- . Men and Politics: An Autobiography. New York: Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, 1941.
- . Russia's Road from Peace to War: Soviet Foreign Relations, 1917–1941. New York: Harper & Row, 1969.
- . The Life and Death of Stalin. New York: Harper & Row, 1952.
- . The Nation, Aug. 9, 1933: 154.
- Fischer, Ruth. Stalin and German Communism: A Study in the Origins of the State Party. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1948.

- Fisher, Ralph Talcott. Pattern for Soviet Youth: A Study of the Congresses of the Komsomol, 1918–1954. New York: Columbia University, 1959.
- Fitch, Stephen D. "The Harriman Manganese Concession in the Soviet Union: Lessons for Today," International Tax and Business Law, 9/1 (1991).
- Fitzpatrick, Sheila. "After NEP: The Fate of NEP Entrepreneurs, Small Traders, and Artisans in the 'Socialist Russia' of the 1930s," Russian History/Histoire Russe, 13/2–3 (1986): 187–234.
- . "Ordzhonikidze's Takeover of VSNKh: A Study of Soviet Bureaucratic Politics," Soviet Studies, 37/2 (1985): 153–72.
- . "Stalin and the Making of a New Elite, 1928–1939," Slavic Review, 38/3 (1979): 377–402.
- . Everyday Stalinism: Ordinary Life in Extraordinary Times: Soviet Russia in the 1930s. New York: Oxford University, 1999.
- . Stalin's Peasants: Resistance and Survival in the Russian Village after Collectivization. New York: Oxford University, 1996.
- . The Cultural Front: Power and Culture in Revolutionary Russia. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1992.
- Flannery, Henry W. Assignment to Berlin. New York: Knopf, 1942.
- Fleischhauer, Ingeborg. "Der deutsch-sowjetische Grenz- und Freundschaftsvertrag vom 28. September 1939. Die deutschen Aufzeichnungen über die Verhandlungen zwischen Stalin, Molotov und Ribbentrop in Moskau," Vierteljahreshefte für Zeitgeschichte, 39/3 (1991): 447–70.
- . "The Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact: The German Version," International Affairs (August 1991): 114–29.
- , and Benajmin Pinkus. The Soviet Germans: Past and Present. London: C. Hurst & Co., 1986.
- . Der Pakt: Hitler, Stalin und die Initiative der Deutsche Diplomatie, 1938–1939. Berlin: Ullstein, 1990.
- . Diplomatischer Widerstand gegen "Unternehmen Barbarossa": die Friedensbemühungen der Deutschen Botschaft Moskau 1939–1941. Berlin: Ullstein, 1991.
- Fleishman, L. Lazar'. "O gibeli maiakovskogo kak 'literaturnom fakte': postskriptum k stat'e B. M. Gasparova," Slavica Hierosolymitana, 1979, no. 4: 126–30.
- . Boris Pasternak v tridsatye gody. Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 1984.
- Flores, Marcello. L'immaginare dell'URSS. Milan: Mondadori, 1990.
- Fomin, Valerii, and Aleksandr Deriabin, eds. Letopis' rossiiskogo kino. 4 vols. Moscow: Materik, 2004–2015.
- . Kino na voine: dokumenty i svidetel'stva. Moscow: Materik, 2005.
- Forbes, Andrew D. W. Warlords and Muslims in Chinese Central Asia: A Political History of Republican Sinkiang 1911–1949. New York: Cambridge University, 1986.
- Forcade, Olivier. "Le Renseignement face à l'Allemagne au printemps 1940 et au début de la champagne de France." In La champagne de 1940: Actes du colloque, 16 au 18 novembre 2000, edited by Christine Levisse-Touzé. Paris: Tallandier, 2001, 126–55.
- Ford, Franklin L., and Carl E. Schorske. "The Voice in the Wilderness: Robert Coulandre." In The Diplomats, 1919–1939, edited by Gordon A. Craig and Felix Gilbert. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1953, 555–78.
- Förster, Jürgen, and Ewan Mawdsley. "Hitler and Stalin in Perspective: Secret Speeches on the Eve of Barbarossa," War in History, 11/1 (2004): 61–103.
- . "Hitler Turns East: German War Policy in 1940 and 1941." In From Peace to War: Germany, Soviet Russia, and the World, 1939–1941, edited by Bernd Wegner. Providence, RI, and Oxford, UK: Berghahn, 1997, 115–33.
- . "The Dynamics of Volksgemeinschaft: The Effectiveness of the German Military Establishment in the Second World War." In Military Effectiveness, edited by Allan R. Millett and Williamson Murray. 3 vols. Boston: Allen, Unwin, 1988, III: 180–220.
- . "The German Military's Image of Russia." In Russia: War, Peace and Diplomacy: Essays in Honour of John Erickson, edited by L. Erikson and M. Erickson. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 2004, 117–29.
- Fowler, Mayhill. "Yiddish Theater in Soviet Ukraine: Reevaluating Ukrainian-Jewish Relations in the Arts," Ab Imperio, 3 (2011): 167–88.
- Fox, Jo. "Propaganda and the Flight of Rudolf Hess, 1941–1945," Journal of Modern History, 83/1 (2011): 78–110.

- "Fragmenty stenogrammy dekabri'skogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1936 goda," Voprosy istorii, 1995, no. 1: 3–22.
- François-Poncet, André. Souvenirs d'une ambassade à Berlin, Septembre 1931—Octobre 1938. Paris: Flammarion, 1946.
- Frankenstein, Robert. Le prix du réarmement français, 1935–1939. Paris: Publications de la Sorbonne, 1982.
- Frei, Norbert. National Socialist Rule in Germany: The Führer State 1933–1945. Oxford: Blackwell, 1993.
- Freiling, Keith. Life of Neville Chamberlain. London: Macmillan, 1946.
- French Yellow Book: Diplomatic Documents (1938–1939)*. London: Hutchinson, 1940.
- Freud, Sigmund. Why War? The Correspondence between Albert Einstein and Sigmund Freud. Chicago: Chicago Institute for Psychoanalysis, 1933.
- Fridberg, I. Ia. "Gosudarstvennye zagotovki i obrazovanie khlebynykh fondov v SSSR (1920–1940-e gg.)." PhD diss. Moscow Financial Institute, 1973.
- Fridenson, Patrick. "The Coming of the Assembly Line to Europe." In The Dynamics of Science and Technology: Social Values, Technical Norms, and Scientific Criteria in the Development of Knowledge, edited by W. Krohn et al. Dordrecht, Holland and Boston: D. Reidel, 1978.
- Friedberg, Maurice. Literary Translation in Russia: A Cultural History. University Park: Pennsylvania State University, 1997.
- Friedlander, Saul. "The Path that Led into the Abyss," TLS, Oct. 2, 1998.
- . Prelude to Downfall: Hitler and the United States, 1939–41. New York: Knopf, 1967.
- Friedman, Elisha M. Russia in Transition: A Business Man's Appraisal. New York: Viking, 1933.
- Friedman, Milton, and Anna Schwartz. A Monetary History of the United States, 1867–1960. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1963.
- Frieser, Karl-Heinz, with John T. Greenwood. The Blitzkrieg Legend: the 1940 Campaign in the West. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute, 2005.
- . Blitzkrieg-Legende: der Westfeldzug 1940. Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996.
- Friters, Gerard M. Outer Mongolia and Its International Position. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University, 1949.
- Fritzsche, Peter. Germans into Nazis. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1998.
- . Life and Death in the Third Reich. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University, 2008.
- Fröhlich, Elke, ed. Die Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels, Teil I: Aufzeichnungen 1923–1941. 9 vols. Munich: K. G. Saur, 1998–2005.
- . Teil 2: Diktate. 15 vols. Munich: K. G. Saur, 1993–96.
- Fromkin, David. In the Time of the Americans: FDR, Truman, Eisenhower, Marshall, MacArthur—The Generation that Changed America's Role in the World. New York: Knopf, 1995.
- FRUS, 1934. Volume III: The Far East, 1950.
- FRUS, 1937. Volume III: The Far East, 1954.
- FRUS, 1938. Volume III: The Far East, 1955.
- FRUS, 1939. General, Volume I, 1956.
- FRUS, 1933. Volume II: The British Commonwealth, Europe, Near East and Africa, 1949.
- FRUS, 1941. Volume I: General, The Soviet Union, 1959.
- FRUS, The Soviet Union, 1933–1939, 1952.
- FRUS, Japan, 1931–1941: Volume II, 1943.
- Fry, Michael Graham. "Agents and Structures: The British Dominions and the Munich Crisis, September 1938," Diplomacy and Statecraft, 10/2–3 (1999): 293–341.
- Frye, Roland Mushat. "Hitler, Stalin, and Shakespeare's Macbeth: Modern Totalitarianism and Ancient Tyranny," Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society, 142/1 (1998): 81–109.
- Fuehrer Conferences on Matters Dealing with the German Navy, 1939 to 1945*. 9 vols. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Navy Department, 1946–7.
- Fuglestad, Finn. "La grande famine de 1931 dans l'Ouest Nigérien," Revue française d'Outre Mer, no. 61 (1974): 18–33.

- Fuller, William C., Jr. Strategy and Power in Russia 1600–1914. New York: Free Press, 1992.
- Furer, Veniamin. Novaia Gorlovka: zapiski partrabotnika. Moscow: Partizdat, 1935.
- Fusi, Juan Pablo. Franco: A Biography. New York: Harper & Row, 1987.
- Gaevskii, D. "Kolkhoznoe stroitel'stvo v sisteme oborony SSSR," Voina i revoliutsiia, 1930, no. 3: 38–39.
- Gafencu, Grigore. Prelude to the Russian Campaign. London: Frederick Muller, 1945.
- . The Last Days of Europe: A Diplomatic Journey in 1939. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1948.
- Gaister, A., and A. Levin. "O sostave sel'partorganizatsii," Bo/shevik, 1930, no. 9–10: 75–90.
- Gal'ianov, V. N. [V. Potemkin]. "Kuda idet Pol'sha," Bo/shevik, 1938, no. 8: 61–8.
- Galumov, Erast. Neizvestnye "Izvestiia". Moscow: Izvestiia, 2009.
- Gamelin, Maurice. Servir. 3 vols. Paris: Plon, 1946–47.
- Gamm, Hans-Joachim. Der Flüsterwitz im Dritten Reich. Munich: List, 1972.
- Ganson, Nicholas. "Food Supply, Rationing and Living Standards." In The Soviet Union at War, 1941–1945, edited by David R. Stone. Barnsley: Pen and Sword, 2010, 69–92.
- Ganzha, I. F., et al. "Ukrainskoe selo na puti k sotsializmu." In Ocherki istorii kollektivizatsii v soiuzykh respublikakh, edited by Viktor P. Danilov. Moscow: Gospolitizdat, 1963, 151–223.
- Gareev, Makhmut A. "Ob opyte boevoi podgotovki voisk," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1983, no. 4: 11–20.
- . Neodnoznachnye strannitsy voiny: ocherki problemnykh voprosakh istorii Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny. Moscow: RFM, 1995.
- Garrard, John Gordon. Inside the Soviet Writers' Union. New York: Free Press, 1990.
- Garros, Veronique, et al., eds. Intimacy and Terror: Soviet Diaries of the 1930s. New York: Free Press, 1998.
- Garver, John W. "Chiang Kai-shek's Quest for Soviet Entry into the Sino-Japanese War," Political Science Quarterly, 102/2 (1987): 295–316.
- . "The Origins of the Second United Front: The Comintern and the Chinese Communist Party," China Quarterly, 123 (1988): 29–59.
- . "The Soviet Union and the Xi'an Incident," Australian Journal of Chinese Affairs, 26 (1991): 145–75.
- Gasiorowski, Zygmunt J. "The German-Polish Nonaggression Pact of 1934," Journal of Central European Affairs, 15/1 (1955): 3–29.
- Galagova, Liudmila S., ed. Sovetskaia etnopolitika 1930–1940-e gody: sbornik dokumentov. Moscow: Institut rossiiskoi istorii RAN, 2012.
- , et al., eds. TsK RKP(b)—VKP(b) i natsional'nyi vopros. 2 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 2005.
- Gates, Eleanor M. End of the Affair: The Collapse of the Anglo-French Alliance, 1939–1940. Berkeley: University of California, 1981.
- Gates, Robert A. "German Socialism and the Crisis of 1929–33," Central European History, 7/4 (1974): 332–59.
- Gavrilov, V. A., ed. Voennaia razvedka informiruet: dokumenty razvedupravleniia Krasnoi Armii, ianvar' 1939—iun' 1941 g. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratsiia, 2008.
- Gazarian, Suren. "Erno ne dolzhno povtorit'sia," Zvezda, 1989, no. 1: 3–79, no. 2: 7–77.
- . "O Berii i sude nad Beriievtsami v Gruzii," SSSR: vnutrennye protivorechiia, no. 6 (1982): 109–46.
- Gazur, E. Secret Assignment: The FBI's KGB General. London: St. Ermin's, 2001.
- Geduld, Harry M., and Ronald Gottesman. Sergei Eisenstein and Upton Sinclair: The Making and Unmaking of Que Viva Mexico! Bloomington: Indiana University, 1970.
- Geftir, Mikhail A. Iz etikh i tekhn. let. Moscow: Progress, 1991.
- Gehl, Jürgen. Austria, Germany, and the Anschluss, 1931–1938. New York: Oxford University, 1963.
- Gelb, Michael. "An Early Soviet Ethnic Deportation: the Far Eastern Koreans," Russian Review, 54/3 (1995): 389–412.
- . "Mass Politics under Stalin: Party Purges and Labor Productivity Campaigns in Leningrad, 1928–1941," PhD diss. University of California, Los Angeles, 1987.
- Gelman, S. "Zalozhnik OGPU: snokha Maksima Gor'kogo, posledniaia liubov' Genrikha Iagody," Nezaisimaia gazeta, January 17, 1997.

- Genis, V. L. "G. Ia. Sokol'nikov," Voprosy istorii, 1988, no. 12: 59–86.
- . "Upriamyi narkom s Il'inki." In Otkryvaia novye stranstsy, Mezhdunarodnye voprosy: sobytiia i liudi, edited by A. A. Iskenderov. Moscow: Politizdat, 1989, 213–43.
- Genkina, Esfir' B. Bor'ba za Tsaritsyn v 1918 godu. Moscow: Politizdat pri TsK VKP (b), 1940.
- Genoud, Francois, ed. The Testament of Adolf Hitler: The Hitler-Bormann Documents, February–April 1945. London: Cassell, 1961.
- Gentile, Giovanni. "The Philosophic Basis of Fascism," Foreign Affairs, 6/1 (1928): 290–304.
- Geoffrey Roberts, Stalin's Wars: From World War to Cold War, 1939–1953. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2006.
- Gerrard, Craig. The Foreign Office and Finland: Diplomatic Sideshow. London: Frank Cass, 2005.
- Gerschenkron, Alexander. "On Dictatorship," New York Review of Books, June 19, 1969.
- Gert Meyer, Sozialstruktur sowjetischer Industriearbeiter Ende der zwanziger Jahre: Ergebnisse der Gewerkschaftsumfrage unter Metall-, Textil- und Bergarbeitern 1929. Marburg: Verl. Arbeiterbewegung u. Gesellschaftswiss, 1981.
- Gerwarth, Robert. The Bismarck Myth: Weimar Germany and the Legacy of the Iron Chancellor. Oxford: Clarendon, 2005.
- Getty, J. Arch. "'Excesses are not permitted': Mass Terror and Stalinist Governance in the Late 1930s," Russian Review, 61/1 (2002): 113–38.
- . "Stalin as Prime Minister." In Stalin: A New History, edited by Sarah Davies and James Harris. New York: Cambridge University, 2005, 83–107.
- . "State and Society under Stalin: Constitutions and Elections in the 1930s," Slavic Review, 50/1 (1991): 18–35.
- . Origins of the Great Purges: The Soviet Communist Party Reconsidered, 1933–1938. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1985.
- , and Oleg V. Naumov. The Road to Terror: Stalin and the Self-Destruction of the Bolsheviks, 1932–1939. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1999.
- . Yezhov: The Rise of Stalin's "Iron Fist". New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2008.
- , and Roberta T. Manning, eds. Stalinist Terror: New Perspectives. New York: Cambridge University, 1993.
- Geyer, Michael. "Études in Political History: Reichswehr, NSDAP and the Seizure of Power." In The Nazi Machtergreifung, edited by Peter D. Stachura. London: Allen & Unwin, 1983, 101–23.
- . "Restorative Elites, German Society, and the Nazi Pursuit of War." In Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany: Comparisons and Contrasts, edited by Richard Bessel. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1996, 134–64.
- G. G. "Pis'ma iz SSSR: vnutri pravo-tsentristskogo bloka [March 20, 1929]," Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 1–2 (1929): 15–7.
- Gibbs, N. H. Grand Strategy. 6 vols. London: HMSO, 1956–76.
- Gibbs, Philip. Ordeal in England. London: Heinemann, 1938.
- Gibson, Hugh, ed. The Ciano Diaries. New York: Doubleday, 1946.
- Gibson, Michael. "Chiang Kai-shek's Central Army, 1924–1938." PhD diss. George Washington University, 1985.
- Gilbert, Martin. Churchill and America. New York: Free Press, 2005.
- Gill, Graeme J. "Stalinism and Industrialization: The Nature of Stalin's Regional Support." In Essays on Revolutionary Culture and Stalinism, edited by John W. Strong. Columbus, OH: Slavica, 1990.
- . The Origins of the Stalinist Political System. New York: Cambridge University, 1990.
- Gintsburg, L. I. "Massovy golod v sochetanii s eksportom khleba v nachale 30-kh godov: po materialam 'osobykh papok' politbiuro TsK VKP(b)," Voprosy istorii, 1999, no. 10: 119–26.
- Ginzburg, Evgeniia. Into the Whirlwind. London: Collins, Harvill, 1967.
- . Within the Whirlwind. New York: Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovich, 1981.
- Ginzburg, I. S. Vneshniaia torgovlia SSSR. Moscow: Gos. sotsial'no-ekonomicheskoe izdatel'stvo, 1937.
- Ginzburg, S. Z. "O gibeli Sergo Ordzhonikidze," Voprosy istorii KPSS, 1991, no. 3: 88–98.
- . O proslom—dlia budushchego. Moscow: Politizdat, 1984.
- Girard de Charbonnières, Guy de. La plus evitable de toutes les guerres. Paris: Albatros, 1985.

- Girgor'ev, A. "Pavel Mif (1901–1938)," Vidnye sovetskie kommunisty-uchastniki kitaiskoi revoliutsii, edited by G. V. Astaf'ev. Moscow: Nauka, 1970.
- "GKO postanovliaet . . .," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1992, no. 4–5: 19–23.
- Glad, Betty. "Why Tyrants Go Too Far: Malignant Narcissism and Absolute Power," Political Psychology, 23/1 (2002): 1–37.
- Gladkov, Teodor K. Korotkov. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 2005.
- . Kuznetsov: legenda sovetskoi razvedki. Moscow: Veche, 2004.
- . Nagrada za vernost'—kazn'. Moscow: Tsentrpoligraf, 2000.
- , and Mikhail A. Smirnov. Menzhinskii. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1969.
- Gladwyn, Lord [Gladwyn Jebb]. The Memoirs of Lord Gladwyn. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1972.
- Glan, B. N. Iakov Il'in: vospominaniia sovremennikov. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1967.
- Glantz, David M. Stumbling Colossus: The Red Army on the Eve of World War. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1998.
- Glassheim, Eagle. Noble Nationalists: The Transformation of the Bohemian Aristocracy. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 2005.
- Glavnyi voennyi soviet RKKA, 1 marta 1938 g.—20 iuni 1941 g.: dokumenty i materialy*. Moscow: Rossen, 2004.
- Glazami inostrantsev, 1917–1932*. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1932.
- Gleason, Abbott. Totalitarianism: The Inner History of the Cold War. New York: Oxford University, 1995.
- Glibert, Martin. The Roots of Appeasement. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1966.
- Glikman, Isaak D. Pisna k drugu: Dmitrii Shostakovich-Isaaku Glikmanu. Moscow: DSCH, Kompozitor, 1993.
- Glотова, Olesia A. "Andrei Aleksandrovich Zhdanov: ideologicheskaiа deiatel'nost' v 1920–1940-e gg." PhD diss. Rossiiskaia akdemiia gosudarstvennoi sluzhby pri prezidente RF, 2004.
- Gnedin, Evgenii. Iz istorii otnoshenii mezhdru SSSR i fashistkoi Germaniei. New York: Khronika Press, 1977.
- . Katastrofa i vtoroe rozhdenie: Memuarnye zapiski. Amsterdam: Fond im. Gertsena, 1977.
- . Vykhod iz labirinta. New York: Chaldizc, 1982.
- God krizisa, 1938–1939: dokumenty i materialy*, 2 vols. Moscow: Politizdat, 1990.
- Goebbels, Joseph. Kommunismus ohne Maske. Munich: Eher, 1935.
- Goerlitz, Walter. Paulus and Stalingrad: A Life of Field Marshal Friedrich Paulus. New York: Citadel, 1963.
- Gogua, Irina. "Semeinye istorii: otryvok iz dokumental'noi povesti 'Pesochnye chasy'," Ogonek, April 13, 1997.
- Goldman, Stuart D. "The Spy Who Saved the Soviets," HistoryNet, July 30, 2010. <http://www.historynet.com/the-spy-who-saved-the-soviets.htm>.
- . Nomonhan, 1939: The Red Army's Victory that Shaped World War II. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 2012.
- Goldman, Wendy Z. Terror and Democracy in the Age of Stalin: The Social Dynamics of Repression. New York: Cambridge University, 2007.
- . Women, the State and Revolution: Soviet Family Policy and Social Life, 1917–1930. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1993.
- Gol'dshtein, Pavel. Tochka opory. 2 vols. Jerusalem: Graff-Press, 1978, 1982.
- Goliaikov, I. T., ed. Sbornik dokumentov po istorii ugovnogo zakonodatel'stva SSSR i RSFSR 1917–1952 gg. Moscow: Iuridicheskaiа literatura, 1953.
- Gol'man, M. I., and G. I. Slesarchuk, eds. Sovetsko-mongol'skie otnosheniia: sbornik dokumentov, 1921–1966. Moscow: Nauka, 1966, doc. 46–47.
- "Golod 1932–1933 godov na Ukraine: svidetel'stvuiut arkhivnye dokumenty," Pod znamenem leninizma, 1990, no. 8: 64–86.
- Golovanov, A. E. Svoimi glazami: Zapiski komanduiushchego. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1994.
- Golovanov, I. "1,367 dnei iz zhizni Andreia Tupoleva," Literaturna gazeta, November 9, 1988.
- Golovkova, Lidiia, ed. Butovskii Poligon, 1937–1938: kniga pamiati zhertv politicheskikh represii. 8 vols. Moscow: Alzo, 1997–2004.

- . Sukhanovskiaia tiur'ma: spetsobekt 110. Moscow: Vozrashchenie, 2009.
- Gol'tsman, A. Z. Upravlenie promyshlennost'iu v Germanii i v SSSR. Moscow-Leningrad: Gosizdat, 1930.
- Golubev, A. V. "Esl' mir obrushitsia na nashu Respubliku": sovetskoe obshchestvo i vneshniaia ugroza. Moscow: Kuchkovo pole, 2008.
- , et al. Rossia i zapad: formirovanie vneshnepoliticheskikh stereotipov v soznanii rossiiskogo obshchestva pervoi poloviny XX veka. Moscow: RAN, Institut Rossiiskoi Istorii, 1998.
- Golubev, Sergei. "Nash tovarishch: Kim Filbi," Krasnaia zvezda, Aug. 9–11, 2006.
- Golunskii, A. S., ed. Istoriia zakonodatel'stva SSSR i RSFSR po ugovornomu protsesu i organizatsii suda. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1955.
- Gorbatov, A. V. "Shkola Iakira." In Komandarm Iakir: vospominaniia družei i sotratnikov, edited by Petr I. Iakir. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1963.
- . Gody i voiny. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1965.
- Gorbutov, Evgenii. "Voennaia razvedka v 1934–1939 godakh," Svobodnaia mysl', 1998, no. 2: 98–109, no. 3: 54–61, no 8: 93.
- . Stalin i GRU. Moscow: Yauza/Eksmo, 2010.
- Gorchakov, N. A. Istoriia sovetskogo teatra. New York: Chekhov Publishing House, 1956.
- . Theater in Soviet Russia, translated by E. Lehrman. New York: Columbia University, 1957.
- Gorchakov, Ovidii A. "Nakanune, ili tragediia Kassandry: povest' v dokumentakh," Nedelia, 1998, no. 42–44.
- . Ian Berzin—komandarm GRU. St. Petersburg: Neva, 2004.
- Gorelik, S. M., and A. I. Malkis. Sovetskaia torgovlia: ocherki teorii i praktiki torgovlii v SSSR. Moscow and Leningrad: Gos. Sots.-ekonomicheskoe izdatel'stvo, 1933.
- Gorelov, Ignat E. Nikolai Bukharin. Moscow: Moskovskii rabochii, 1988.
- Gorelov, O. I. Tsugsvang Mikhail Tom'skogo. Moscow: Rosspen, 2001.
- Goriaeva, T. M. "Zhurnalistika i tsenzura, po materialam sovetskogo radioveshchaniia 20–30-kh godov: istochnikovedcheskii aspekt," Istoriia SSSR, 1990, no. 4: 113–23.
- . Istoriia sovetskoi politicheskoi tsenzury: dokumenty i kommentarii. Moscow: Rosspen, 1997.
- . Radio Rossii: politicheskii kontrol' sovetskogo radioveshchaniia v 1920–1930-x godakh: dokumentirovaniia istoriia. Moscow: Rosspen, 2000.
- , ed. "Velikaia kniga dnia": radio v SSSR, dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: Rosspen, 2007.
- Gorkii, Maxim, et al., eds. Krakh germanskoi okkupatsii na Ukraine (po dokumentam okkupantov). Moscow: Ogiz, Gos. Izd-vo Istoriia grazhdanskoi voiny, 1936.
- Go'r'kii, M., L. L. Averbakh, and S. G. Firin. Belomorsko-Baltiiskii kanal imeni Stalina: istoriia stroitel'stva. Moscow: Istoriia fabrik i zavodov, 1934.
- Gorkov, Iu. A. "Gotovil li Stalin uprezhdaushchii udar protiv Gitlera v 1941 g.," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1993, no. 3: 29–45.
- . Kreml', genshtab, stavka. Tver: TOO TK ANTEK, 1995.
- , and Iu. N. Semin. "O kharaktere voenno-operativnykh planov SSSR nakanune Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny: novye arkhivnye dokumenty," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1997, no. 5: 108–25.
- Gorky, Maksim, et al. Belomor: An Account of the Construction of the New Canal between the White Sea and the Baltic Sea. New York: H. Smith and R. Haas, 1935.
- . The White Sea Canal: Being an Account of the Construction of the New Canal between the White Sea and the Baltic Sea. London: The National Centre for Marxist and "Left" Literature, 1935.
- . Letters of Gorky and Andreev, 1899–1912. New York: Columbia University, 1958.
- Görlitz, Walter. History of the German General Staff, 1657–1945. New York: Praeger, 1953.
- Gorlov, Seregi A. Sovershenno sekretno, Moskva-Berlin 1920–1933: voenno-politicheskie otnosheniia mezhdu SSSR i Germaniei. Moscow: IVI RAN, 1999.
- Gorodetsky, Gabriel, ed. Stafford Cripps in Moscow 1940–1942: Diaries and Papers. London and Portland, OR: Valentine Mitchell, 2007.

- , ed. The Maisky Diaries: Red Ambassador to the Court of St James's 1932–1943. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2015.
- . “Churchill's Warning to Stalin: a Reappraisal,” Historical Journal, 29/4 (1986): 979–90.
- . Grand Delusion: Stalin and the German Invasion of Russia. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1999.
- . Mif “Ledkola”: nakanune voiny. Moscow: Progress-Akademii, 1995.
- . Stafford Cripps' Mission to Moscow, 1940–42. New York: Cambridge University, 1984.
- Gorsuch, Anne. Youth in Revolutionary Russia: Enthusiasts, Bohemians, Delinquents. Bloomington: Indiana University, 2000.
- Görtemaker, Heike B. Eva Braun: Life with Hitler. New York: Knopf, 2011.
- Görtemaker, Manfred. “The Bizarre Mission: Rudolf Hess in Britain.” In Britain and Germany in the 20th Century, edited by Görtemaker. New York: Berg, 2006, 75–100.
- Gosudarstvennaia okhrana Rossii, 1881–2006: katalog vystavki*. Moscow: Petronius, 2006.
- Goutard, Adolphe. The Battle of France, 1940. New York: I. Washburn, 1959.
- Grabar', I. “Stalin i liudi soverskoi strane v izobrazitel'nom iskusstve,” Prawda, Dec. 26, 1939.
- Graham, Loren. The Soviet Academy of Sciences and the Communist Party, 1927–1932. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1967.
- Graziosi, Andrea. “Stalin's Anti-Worker ‘Workerism’ 1924–1931,” International Review of Social History, 40/2 (1995): 223–58.
- . “The New Soviet Archival Sources: Hypotheses for a Critical Assessment,” Cahiers du monde russe, 40/1–2 (1999): 13–64.
- . Stalinism, Collectivization, and the Great Famine. Cambridge, MA: Ukrainian Studies Fund, 2009.
- . The Great Soviet Peasant War: Bolsheviks and Peasants 1917–1933. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1996.
- Grdzeldze, R. K. Mezhdunarodnoe obshchestvo v razvitiu sotsialisticheskogo obshchestva. Tbilisi: Izdatel'stvo Tbilisskogo gosudarstvennogo universiteta, 1980.
- Grebennik, K. E. Khasanskii dnevnik. Vladivostok: Dal'nevost. kn. izd-vo, 1978.
- Grebing, Helga. Geschichte der deutschen Arbeiterbewegung: eine Überblick. Munich: Nymphenburger Verlags, 1966.
- Grechko, Andrei A., et al., eds. Istoriia mirovoi voiny 1939–1945. 12 vols. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1973–82.
- Gregory, Paul R., ed. Behind the Façade of Stalin's Command Economy: Evidence from Soviet State and Party Archives. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution, 2001.
- . Politics, Murder, and Love in Stalin's Kremlin: The Story of Nikolai Bukharin and Anna Larina. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution, 2010.
- . Restructuring the Soviet Economic Bureaucracy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1990.
- . Russian National Income, 1885–1913. New York: Cambridge University, 1982.
- . Terror by Quota: State Security from Lenin to Stalin, an Archival Study. New Haven, CT, and Stanford, CA: Yale University and Hoover Institution, 2009.
- . The Political Economy of Stalinism. New York: Cambridge University, 2004.
- , and Andrei Markevich. “Creating Soviet Industry: The House that Stalin Built,” Slavic Review 61/4 (2002): 787–814.
- , and Mark Harrison. “Allocation under Dictatorship: Research in Stalin's Archives,” Journal of Economic Literature, 43/3 (2005): 721–61.
- Grew, Joseph C. Ten Years in Japan: A Contemporary Record Drawn from the Diaries and Private and Official Papers of Joseph C. Grew, United States Ambassador to Japan, 1932–1942. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1944.
- Grigolia, A. L. “Kratkaia istoriia kurortov Abkhazii, sovremennoe ikh sostoianie k 15-letiiu sovetizatsii Abkhazii.” Unpublished manuscript, 1937.
- . Kurortnye bogatsva Abkhazii. Leningrad, 1934.
- Grigorian, Vladimir. “Neubitie liudi.” <http://www.rusvera.mrezha.ru/708/10.htm>.
- Grigorii Kaminskii: sbornik vospominanii*. Tula: Priokskoe knizhnoe izd-vo, 1965.”

- "Grigorii Naumovich Kaminskii," Voprosy istorii KPSS, 1965, no. 11: 124–8.
- Grin'ko, G. F. The Five-Year Plan of the Soviet Union: A Political Interpretation. London: Martin Lawrence, 1930.
- Gritschneider, Otto. "Der Führer hat Sie zum Tode verurteilt . . ." Hitlers "Röhm-Putsch": Morde vor Gericht. Munich: C. H. Beck, 1993.
- Gritsenko, Iakov I. "Chto eto bylo? K sobytiyam v Smol'ns'koi v 1933–1934 gg.," Problemy Dal'nego Vostoka, 1990, no. 5: 79–84.
- Gromov, Evgenii S. Stalin: Iskustvo i vlast'. Moscow: Eksmo Algoritm, 2003.
- Gromov, F. N., ed. Tri veka Rossiiskogo Flota 1696–1996, 3 vols. St. Petersburg: Logos, 1996.
- Gromtseva, Ol'ga. Teni izchezaiut v smol'nom: ubiistvo Kirova. St. Petersburg: Evropeiskii dom, 2001.
- Gromyko, Andrei A., and B. N. Ponomarev, eds. Istoriia vneshnei politiki SSSR, 1917–1985. 5th ed. 2 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 1986.
- . Memories: From Stalin to Gorbachev. London: Hutchinson, 1989.
- . Pamiatnoe. Moscow: Politizdat, 1988.
- , et al., eds. SSSR v bor'be za mir nakanune vtoroi mirovoi voiny (sentiaabr' 1938—avgust 1939 g.): dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: Politizdat, 1971.
- Gronskii, Ivan. Iz proshlogo. Vospominaniia. Moscow: Izvestiia, 1991.
- Gross, Babette. Willi Münzenberg: A Political Biography. East Lansing: Michigan State University, 1974.
- Gross, Jan T. "A Note on the Nature of Soviet Totalitarianism," Soviet Studies, 34/3 (1982): 367–76.
- . Revolution from Abroad: The Soviet Conquest of Poland's Western Ukraine and Western Belorussia. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1988.
- Gross, Stephen G. Export Empire: German Soft Power in Southeastern Europe, 1890–1945. New York: Cambridge University, 2015.
- Grossman, Gregory. Review of Was Stalin Really Necessary? Some Problems of Soviet Political Economy, by Alec Nove. Europe-Asia Studies, 17/2 (1965): 256–60.
- Groys, Boris. The Total Art of Stalinism: Avant-Garde, Aesthetic Dictatorship, and Beyond. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1992.
- Groza, I. R., and P. S. Dubenskii, eds. Slavnym zavoievateliam Artiki. Moscow: Sotssekgiz, 1934.
- Grylev, A. N. "Nakanune i v dni Miunkhena." In Sovetsko-chechoslovatskie otnosheniia mezhdu dvumia voynami, 1918–1939: iz istorii gosudarstvennykh, diplomaticheskikh, ekonomicheskikh i kul'turnykh svyazei, edited by S. I. Prasolov and P. I. Rezonov. Moscow: Nauka, 1968, 220–7.
- Guderian, Heinz. Panzer Leader. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1952.
- . Vospominaniia soldata. Rostov-na-Donu: Feniks, 1998.
- Guliev, Dzhamil, ed. Azerbaidzhanskaia respublika: dokumenty i materialy 1918–1920 gg. Baku: Elm, 1998.
- Gunsburg, Jeffrey A. Divided and Conquered: The French High Command and the Defeat of the West. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1979.
- Guotao, Zhang. Rise of the Chinese Communist Party. 2 vols. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1971–72.
- Gupta, Sobhanlal Datta, ed. The Ryutin Platform: Stalin and the Crisis of Proletarian Dictatorship: Platform of the "Union of Marxists-Leninists". Parganas, India: Seribaana, 2010.
- Gurian, Waldemar. Bolshevism: Theory and Practice. New York: Macmillan, 1932.
- Gur'ianov, Aleksandr E., ed. Repressii protiv poliakov i pol'skikh grazhdan. Moscow: Zvenia, 1997.
- . Ubity v Katyni. Moscow: Zvenia, 2015.
- Guruli, Vakhtang, and Omar Tushurashvili, eds. Correspondence between Lavrenty Beria and Joseph Stalin (1937). Appendix to The Archival Bulletin (Tbilisi), 2008, no. 3.
- Gurvich, Abram S. "Vtoroe rozhdenie." In V poiskakh gerioa: literaturno-kriticheskie stat'i. Moscow-Leningrad: Iskustvo, 1938: 310–49.
- Guseinov, E. "Ves'ma neodnoznachnyi N.M. Shvernik," Sovetskie profsoiuzy, 1990, no. 13–4.
- Gusterin, P. V. Sovetskaiia razvedka na Blizhnem Vostoke v 1920–30-x godakh. Saarbrücken: Lap Lambert Academic Publishing, 2014.

- Gutinov, Dmitrii. "'Unichtozhit' vragov, predvaritel'no ikh obmanuv': materialy doprosa byvshego pomoshchnika General'nogo Sekretaria TsK VKP (b) Borisa Bazhanova frantsuzskimi spetsluzhbnami," Istochnik, 2001, no. 6: 31–41.
- Haas, Mark L. The Ideological Origins of Great Power Politics, 1789–1989. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 2005.
- Habeck, Mary R. Storm of Steel: The Development of Armor Doctrine in Germany and the Soviet Union, 1919–1939. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 2003.
- Haffner, Sebastian. The Meaning of Hitler. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1979.
- Hagenloh, Paul. "'Socially Harmful Elements' and the Great Terror." In Stalinism: New Directions, edited by Sheila Fitzpatrick. London: Routledge, 2000, 286–308.
- Haight, J. McVicker. American Aid to France. New York: Atheneum, 1970.
- Halder, Generalobst. Kriegstagebuch. 3 vols. Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer Verlag, 1961–64.
- . The Halder Diaries: The Private War Journals of Colonel General Franz Halder, edited by Hans-Adolf Jacobsen. 2 vols. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1976.
- Hanak, H. "Sir Stafford Cripps as British Ambassador in Moscow May 1940 to June 1941," English Historical Review, 94/1 (1979): 48–70.
- Hancock, Eleanor. "The Purge of the SA Reconsidered: 'An Old Putschist Trick?'" Central European History, 44/4 (2011): 669–83.
- Hanfstaengl, Ernst. Zwischen Weissem und Braunem Haus: Memoiren eines politischen Aussenseiters. Munich: Piper Verlag, 1970.
- Hardie, Frank. The Abyssinian Crisis. London: Batsford, 1974.
- Harding, Neil. "Authority, Power and the State, 1916–1920," In Authority, Power and Policy in the USSR: Essays Dedicated to Leonard Schapiro, edited by T. H. Rigby et al. New York: St. Martin's, 1980, 32–56.
- Harlow, John. "Harpo Marx Smuggled Stalin's Secrets in His Socks," Sunday Times (UK), December 22, 2001.
- Harper, Glenn. German Economic Policy in the Spanish Civil War, 1936–1939. Paris: Mouton, 1967.
- Harriman, Averell W., and Elie Abel. Special Envoy to Churchill and Stalin. New York: Random House, 1975.
- Harris, James. "Encircled by Enemies, Stalin's Perceptions of the Capitalist World, 1918–1941," Journal of Strategic Studies, 30/3 (2007): 513–45.
- . "Was Stalin a Weak Dictator?" Europe-Asia Studies, 75/2 (2003): 375–86.
- . The Great Urals: Regionalism and the Evolution of the Soviet System. Ithaca, NY, and London: Cornell University, 1999.
- Harris, Jonathan. "The Origins of the Conflict between Malenkov and Zhdanov, 1939–1941," Slavic Review, 35/2 (1976): 287–303.
- Harrison, Mark, ed. Guns and Rubles: The Defense Industry in the Stalinist State. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2008.
- . "National Income." In The Economic Transformation of the Soviet Union, 1913–1945, edited by Robert W. Davies et al. New York: Cambridge University, 1994, 38–56.
- . "Why Was NEP Abandoned?" In The Soviet Rural Economy, edited by Robert C. Stuart. Totowa, NJ: Rowman & Allanheld, 1984, 63–78.
- . Accounting for War: Soviet Production, Employment, and the Defence Burden, 1940–1945. New York: Cambridge University, 1996.
- , and N. S. Simonov. "Voenpriemka: Prices, Costs, and Quality Assurance in Defence industry." In The Soviet Defence-Industry Complex from Stalin to Khrushchev, edited by John Barber and Mark Harrison. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan, 2000, 223–45.
- , and Robert W. Davies. "The Soviet Military-Economic Effort during the Second Five Year Plan (1933–1937)," Europe-Asia Studies 49/3 (1997): 369–406.
- Harrison, Richard W. Architect of Victory: The Life and Theories of G. S. Isserson. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2010.
- . The Russian Way of War: Operational Art, 1904–1940. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2001.
- Harshav, Benjamin. The Moscow Yiddish Theater: Art on Stage in a Time of Revolution. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2008.

- Hartmann, Christian. Halder: Generalstabchef Hitlers 1939–1942. Paderborn: F. Schöningh, 1991.
- Hasiotis, Jr., Arthur C. Soviet Political, Economic, and Military Involvement in Sinkiang from 1928 to 1949. New York: Garland, 1987.
- Haslam, Jonathan. Russia's Cold War: From the October Revolution to the Fall of the Wall. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2011.
- . "Political Opposition to Stalin and the Origins of the Terror in Russia, 1932–1936," Historical Journal, 29/2 (1986).
- . "Soviet Foreign Policy, 1939–1941: Isolation and Expansion," Soviet Union/Union Soviétique, 18/1–3 (1991): 103–21.
- . "Soviet Russia and the Spanish Problem." In The Origins of World War Two: The Debate Continues, edited by Robert Boyce and Joseph A. Maiolo. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003, 70–85.
- . "Soviet-German Relations and the Origin of the Second World War: The Jury Is Still Out," Journal of Modern History, 69/4 (December 1997): 785–97.
- . "Stalin and the German Invasion of Russia 1941: A Failure of Reasons of State?" International Journal, 76/1 (2000): 133–9.
- . "We Need a Faith: E. H. Carr, 1892–1982," History Today, 33/8 (1983): 36–9.
- . Soviet Foreign Policy, 1930–33: The Impact of the Depression. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1983.
- . The Soviet Union and the Struggle for Collective Security in Europe, 1933–1939. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1984.
- . The Soviet Union and the Threat from the East, 1933–41: Moscow, Tokyo, and the Prelude of the Pacific War. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1992.
- Hass, Gerhart. 23 August 1939, der Hitler-Stalin Pakt: Dokumentation. Berlin: Dietz, 1990.
- Hassel, U. von. Die Hasseltagebücher 1938–1944: Aufzeichnungen vom andern Deutschlands. Berlin: Siedler, 1989.
- Hastings, Max. Inferno: The World at War, 1939–1945. New York: Knopf, 2011.
- . The Secret War: Spies, Codes and Guerrillas, 1939–45. New York: HarperCollins, 2015.
- . Winston's War: Churchill, 1940–1945. New York: Knopf, 2010.
- Haugen, Arne. The Establishment of National Republics in Soviet Central Asia. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
- Hauner, Milan L. "Czechoslovakia as a Military Factor in British Considerations of 1938," Journal of Strategic Studies, 1/2 (1978): 194–223.
- . "Stalin's Big-Fleet Program," Naval War College Review, 57/2 (2004): 97–120.
- Hayes, Peter. "Polycracy and Policy in the Third Reich: The Case of the Economy." In Reevaluating the Third Reich, edited by Thomas Childers and Jane Caplan. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1993, 190–210.
- Hedeler, Wladislaw. "Ezhov's Scenario for the Great Terror and the Falsified Record of the Third Moscow Show Trial." In Stalin's Terror, edited by Barry McLoughlin and Kevin McDermott. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002, 34–55.
- Hedin, Sven Anders. History of the Expedition in Asia, 1917–1935. 3 vols. Stockholm: [s.n.], 1943–45.
- Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich. Lectures on the Philosophy of History. London: H. G. Bohn, 1857.
- Hegner, H. S. Die Reichskanzlei, 1933–1945: Anfang und Ende des Dritten Reiches. Frankfurt am Main: Societas, 1959.
- Heiden, Konrad. "Hitler's Better Half," Foreign Affairs, 20/1 (1941): 73–86.
- . Adolf Hitler: eine Biographie. Das Zeitalter der Verantwortungslosigkeit. Vol. 1. Zurich: Europaverlag, 1936.
- . Adolf Hitler: eine Biographie. Ein Mann gegen Europa. Vol. 2. Zurich: Europaverlag, 1937.
- . Die Geschichte des Nationalsozialismus bis Herbst 1933: Geburt des dritten Reiches. Zurich: Europa, 1934.
- Heilbrunn, Jacob. "The New York Times and the Moscow Show Trials," World Affairs, 153/3 (1991): 87–101.
- Heimann, Mary. Czechoslovakia: The State that Failed. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2009.
- Heineman, John L. Hitler's First Foreign Minister: Constantin Freiherr von Neurath. Berkeley: University of California, 1979.

- Heizer, James L. "The Cult of Stalin, 1929–1939." PhD diss. University of Kentucky, 1977.
- Hellbeck, Jochen. "Laboratories of the Soviet Self: Diaries of the Stalin Era," PhD diss. Columbia University, 1998.
- . "Writing the Self in the Time of Terror: Alexander Afinogenov's Diary of 1937." In Self and Story in Russian History, edited by Laura Engelstein and Stephanie Sandler. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 2000, 69–93.
- Heller, Celia Stopnicka. On the Edge of Destruction: Jews of Poland Between the Two World Wars. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University, 1993.
- Henderson, Neville. Failure of a Mission: Berlin 1937–1939. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1940.
- Henke, Josef. England in Hitlers politischem Kalkül, 1935–1939. Boppard am Rhein: H. Boldt, 1973.
- Herbert, James D. Paris 1937, Worlds on Exhibition. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1998.
- Hernández, Jesus. La grande trahison. Paris: Fasquelle, 1953.
- Herrick, R. V. Soviet Naval Strategy: 50 Years of Theory and Practice. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1968.
- Herriot, Édouard. Jadis. 2 vols. Paris: Flammarion, 1948–52.
- Herwarth, Hans von. Against Two Evils. New York: Rawson and Wade, 1981.
- Hess, Ilse. Prisoner of Peace. London: Britons Publishing Co., 1954.
- Hessler, Julie. A Social History of Soviet Trade. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 2004.
- Higgins, Trumbull. Hitler and Russia: The Third Reich in a Two-Front War, 1937–1943. New York: Macmillan, 1960.
- Hildebrand, Klaus. "Hitlers Mein Kampf, Propaganda oder Programm? zur Frühgeschichte der nationalsozialistischen Bewegung," Neue Politische Literatur, 14/1 (1969): 72–82.
- . The Foreign Policy of the Third Reich. Berkeley: University of California, 1973.
- Hilferding, Rudolf. "Gosudarstvennyi kapitalizm ili totalitarnoe gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo?" Sotsialisticheskii vetsnik, April 25, 1940.
- Hilger, Gustav, and Meyer, A. G. The Incompatible Allies: A Memoir-History of German-Soviet Relations, 1918–1941. New York: Macmillan, 1953.
- Hill, Leonidas E., ed. Die Weizsäcker-Papiere, 1933–1950. Frankfurt am Main and Berlin: Propyläen, 1974.
- Hillgruber, Andreas. "Das Russlandbild der führenden deutschen Militärs vor Beginn des Angriffs auf die Sowjetunion." In Russland, Deutschland, Amerika, edited by Alexander Fischer et al. Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1978, 296–310.
- . Die Zerstörung Europas: Beiträge zur Weltkriegsepoche, 1914 bis 1945. Frankfurt am Main and Berlin: Propyläen, 1988.
- . Hitlers Strategie unter Kriegsführung, 1940–1941. Frankfurt am Main: Bernard und Graefe Verlag für Wehrwesen, 1965.
- Hindus, Maurice. Crisis in the Kremlin. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1953.
- . Humanity Uprooted. New York: Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith, 1930.
- . Red Bread. London: Jonathan Cape, 1931.
- Hinsley, F. H., et al. British Intelligence in the Second World War: its Influence on Strategy and Operations. 5 vols. New York: Cambridge University, 1979–90.
- . "British Intelligence and Barbarossa." In Barbarossa: the Axis and the Allies, edited by John Erickson and David Dilks. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University, 1994, 43–75.
- . British Intelligence in the Second World War: Abridged Version. New York: Cambridge University, 1993.
- Hirsch, Francine. Empire of Nations: Ethnographic Knowledge and the Making of the Soviet Union. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 2005.
- History of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (Bolsheviks), Short Course*. Toronto: Francis White, 1939.
- Hitler, Adolf. Untitled speech. Berlin. January 30, 1939, http://www.ushmm.org/wlc/en/media_fi.php?ModuleId=10005175&MediaId=3108.
- . Mein Kampf. Munich: Zentralverlag der NSDAP, 1938.
- Hlevnjuk, Oleg. "Les mécanismes de la 'Grande Terreur' des années 1937–1938 au Turkménistan," Cahiers du monde russe, 39/1–2 (1998): 197–208.
- Hochman, Jiří. The Soviet Union and the Failure of Collective Security, 1934–1938. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1984.

- Hofer, Walter. Die Entstehung des Zweiten Weltkriegs: eine Studie über die internationalen Beziehungen im Sommer 1939. 3rd ed. Frankfurt am Main: Fischer, 1964.
- Hoffman, I. "Podgotovka Sovetskogo Soiuzu k nastupatel'noi voine," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1993, no. 4 : 19–31.
- Hoffmann, David L. Peasant Metropolis Social Identities in Moscow, 1929–1941. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1994.
- . Stalinist Values : The Cultural Norms of Soviet Modernity, 1917–1941. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 2003.
- Hoffmann, Heinrich, ed. Hitler in seinem Bergen. Berlin: Zeitgeschichte, 1935.
- . Hitler Was My Friend. London: Burke, 1955.
- Hoffmann, Peter. Hitler's Personal Security. New York: Da Capo Press, 2000.
- Hofman, George F. "The United States' Contribution to Soviet Tank Technology," Journal of the Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies, 125/1 (1980): 63–8.
- Höhne, Heinz. Die Zeit der Illusionen: Hitler und die Anfänge des Dritten Reiches, 1933–1936. Düsseldorf: ECONVerlag, 1991.
- . Kennwort: Direktor: die Geschichte der Roten Kapelle. Frankfurt am Main: S. Fischer, 1970.
- . Mordsache Röhm: Hitlers Durchbruch zur Alleinherrschaft 1933–1934. Reinbek: Rowohlt, 1984.
- Høidal, Oddvar K. Trotsky in Norway: Exile, 1935–1937. Dekalb: Northern Illinois University, 2013.
- Holloway, David. "Barbarossa and the Bomb: Two Cases of Soviet Intelligence in World War II." In Secret Intelligence in the European States System, 1918–1989, edited by Jonathan A. Haslam and Karina Urbach. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 2014, 36–80.
- Holman, Brett. "The Air Panic of 1935: British Press Opinion between Disarmament and Rearmament," Journal of Contemporary History, 46/2 (2011): 288–307.
- Holmes, Larry. Stalin's School: Model School No. 25, 1931–1937. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh, 1999.
- . The Kremlin and the Schoolhouse: Reforming Education in Soviet Russia, 1917–1931. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1991.
- Homze, Edward L. Arming the Luftwaffe: the Reich Air Ministry and the German Aircraft Industry, 1919–1939. Lincoln: University of Nebraska, 1976.
- Honig, Jan Willem. "Totalitarianism and Realism: Hans Morgenthau's German Years," Security Studies, 5/2 (1995): 283–313.
- Hooten, Edward R. Luftwaffe at War: Blitzkrieg in the West, 1939–1940. Vol. 2. Hersham, Surrey: Midland, 2007.
- Horvath, Robert. "The Poet of the Terror: Dem'ian Bedny and Stalinist Culture," Russian Review, 65/1 (2006): 53–71.
- Hosking, Geoffrey. The First Socialist Society: A History of the Soviet Union from Within. 2nd ed. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1992.
- Hossbach, Friedrich. Zwischen Wehrmacht und Hitler, 1934–1938. Wolfenbüttel: Wolfenbütteler Verlagsanstalt, 1949.
- Hörtl, Wilhelm. The Secret Front: The Story of Nazi Political Espionage. New York: Praeger, 1954.
- Hounshell, D. H. From the American System to Mass Production 1800–1932. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University, 1984.
- Howson, Gerald. Arms for Spain: The Untold Story of the Spanish Civil War. London and New York: John Murray, 1998.
- Hubatsch, Walther, ed. Hitlers Weisungen für die Kriegsführung. Frankfurt: Bernard und Graefe, 1962.
- Hughes, James. "Capturing the Russian Peasantry: Stalinist Grain Procurement Policy and the Ural-Siberian Method," Slavic Review, 53/1 (1994): 76–103.
- . Stalinism in a Russian Province: A Study of Collectivization and Dekulakization in Siberia. London: Macmillan, 1996.
- Hull, Cordell. The Memoirs of Cordell Hull. 2 vols. New York: Macmillan, 1948.
- Humbert-Droz, Jules. De Lénine à Stalin: dix ans au service de l'internationale communiste, 1921–1931. Neuchâtel: La Baccionière, 1971.

- Hunter, Holland. "Optimal Tautness in Development Planning," Economic Development and Cultural Change, 9/4 (1961): 561–72.
- . "Soviet Agriculture with and without Collectivization, 1928–1940," Slavic Review, 47/2 (1988): 203–26.
- . "The Over-Ambitious First Soviet Five-Year Plan," Slavic Review, 32/2 (1973): 237–57.
- Hüttenberger, Peter. Die Gauleiter: Studie zum Wandel des Machtgefüges in der NSDAP. Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1969.
- Iablonskaia, Dina, and Mikhail Shul'man. "Odesa-Tel-Aviv" i "Radio—liubov' moia." Tel-Aviv: [s.n.], 1985.
- Iakir, Petr I., and I. A. Geller, eds. Komandarm Iakir: vospominaniia družei i sotratnikov. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1963.
- Iakov, Sergei V. V. K. Triandafillov i voenno-politicheskoe myshlenie 1920-kh godov. St. Petersburg: Institut material'noi kul'tur RAN, 1992.
- Iakovenko, Mira M. Agnessa: Ustnye rasskazy Agnessy Ivanovny Mironovoi-Korol'. Moscow: Zvenia, 1997.
- Iakovlev, A. N., et al., eds. Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy 30–50-x godov. Moscow: Politizdat, 1991.
- Iakovlev, A. S. Tsel' zhizni: zapiski aviakonstruktora. 2nd ed. Moscow: Politizdat, 1969.
- . Tsel' zhizni: zapiski aviakonstruktora. 6th ed. Moscow: Respublika, 2000.
- Iakovlev, Georgii N. Nikita Izotov. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1989.
- Iakovlev, M. M. "Soiuz kompozitorov SSSR." In Muzykal'naia entsiklopediia, edited by Iu. V. Keldysh. 6 vols. Moscow: Sovetskaia entsiklopediia, 1973–82, V: 232–3.
- Iakupov, N. M. "Stalin i Krasnaia Armiia," Istoriia SSSR, 1991, no. 5, 170–5.
- Iakushev, V. N. et al., eds. Stalinskie nastrel'nye spiski. Moscow: Zvenia, 2002.
- Iampol'skii, V. P., et al., eds. Organy gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti SSSR v Velikoi Otechestvennoi voine: sbornik dokumentov. 5 vols. Moscow: Kngia i biznes, 1995–2003.
- Ianvarskii o'bediennyi plenum MK i MKK, 6–10 invaria 1930 g.* Moscow, 1930.
- "Ia pochtu za udovol'stvie vnov' priekhat' v Moskvu": obmen poslaniiami mezhdu I. Ribbentropom i I. V. Stalim v oktiabre 1940 g." 21), Istchnik, 1999, no. 1: 140–6.
- Iaroslavskii, E. M. Chego trebuet ot kommunisty. Moscow: Partizdat, 1935.
- . "K chistke partii," Bol'shevik, 1933, no. 7–8: 13–31.
- . "O chistke partii," Bol'shevik, 1933, no. 9: 1–8.
- . "Tri vstrechi," Pravda, Dec. 23, 1939.
- Iasenskii, B. "O dvukh neudachnykh popytkakh," Literaturnaia gazeta, March 6, 1935.
- Ierusalimskii, A. "Anglo-Germanskie protivorechiia nakanune voiny 1914–1918 godov," Bol'shevik, 1938, no. 15: 18–30.
- Igmen, Ali. Speaking Soviet with an Accent: Culture and Power in Kyrgyzstan. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh, 2012.
- Iklé, Frank William. German-Japanese Relations, 1935–1940: A Study of Totalitarian Diplomacy. New York: Bookman Associates, 1956.
- Ikonnikov, Sergei N. Sozdanie i deiatel'nost' ob"edinennykh organov TSKK-RKI v 1923–1934 gg. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1971.
- Ikuhiko, Hata. "The Japanese-Soviet Confrontation, 1935–1939." In Deterrent Diplomacy: Japan, Germany, and the USSR 1935–1940, edited by James W. Morley. New York: Columbia University, 1976, 129–78.
- Il'f, Il'ia, and Evgenii Petrov. Odnootazhaia Amerika. Moscow: Gospolitizdat, 1937.
- . "Amerikanskie fotografii," Ogonek, 1936, no. 11–17, no. 19–23.
- . "Slavnyi gorod Gollivud," Pravda, Sept. 5, 1936.
- Ilić, Melanie. "The Forgotten Five Percent: Women, Political Repressions, and the Purges." In Stalin's Terror Revisited. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006, 116–39.
- . Women Workers in the Soviet Interwar Economy: From "Protection" to "Equality". New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- Il'in, I. A. "Zapiski o politicheskom polozenii: oktiabr' 1923 g. adresovana P. Vrangeliu," Russkoe proshloe: istoriko-dokumental'nyi al'manakh. St. Petersburg, 1996, vyp. 6.

- Il'in, Iakov N. Bol'sheviki dolzhny ovladet' tekhnikai (chemu ucit' opyt stalingradskego traktornogo). Moscow, 1931.
- . Bolshoi konveier. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1934.
- . Liudi stalingradskego traktornogo. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1932.
- Il'in, Nikolas, and Natal'ia Semenova. Prodannye sokrovishcha Rossii. Moscow: Trilistnik, 2000.
- Il'inskii, Mikhail. Narkom lagoda. Moscow: Veche, 2002.
- Ilizarov, Boris S. "Stalin, Strikhi k portretu na fone ego biblioteki i arkhiva," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 2000, no. 3: 182–205, no. 4: 152–66.
- . Tainaia zhizn' Stalina: po materialam ego biblioteki i arkhiva. K istoriosofii Stalinizma. Moscow: Veche, 2003.
- Ilmjärvi, M. Silent Submission: Formation of Foreign Policy of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania: Period from Mid-1920s to Annexation in 1940. Stockholm: Almqvist & Wicksell International 2004.
- Impression of Russia, An*. London: The Economist, 1930.
- "Impressions of Boris Pasternak," New Reasoner, 4 (1958): 86–90.
- Inkeles, Alex. Public Opinion in Soviet Russia: A Study in Mass Persuasion. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1950.
- Insnarov, A. S. Baltiisko-Belomorskii vodnyi put'. Moscow: Gostranzitizdat, 1934.
- International Military Tribunal for the Far East (Tokyo: 1946–48), exhibit 193.
- International Solidarity with the Spanish Republic, 1936–1939*. Academy of Sciences of the USSR, 1972.
- Investigation of the Ukrainian Famine 1932–1933: Report to Congress*. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1988.
- Iofan, Boris. "Dvoret's s' ez dov SSSR," Planovoe khoziaistvo, 1933, no. 7–9: 169–76.
- Ioffe, A. E. Vnesniaia politika Sovetskogo Soiuza, 1928–1932. Moscow: Nauka, 1968.
- Ioffe, Mariia. Odna noch': povest' o pravde. New York: Khronika, 1978.
- Iremashvili, Joseph. Stalin und die Tragödie Georgiens: Erinnerungen. Berlin: Verfasser, 1932.
- Iriye, Akira. After Imperialism: The Search for a New Order in the Far East, 1921–1931. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1965.
- Irving, David. Göring: A Biography. New York: Morrow, 1989.
- . Hitler's War. New York: Viking, 1977.
- Isaev, S. "Meropriatie KPSS po ukrepleniiu dal'nevostochnykh rubezhei v 1931–1941," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1981, no. 9: 64–9.
- Iskanderov, M. S. Ocherki istorii kommunisticheskoi partii Azerbaidzhana. Baku: Azerbaidzhanskoe gosizdat, 1963.
- . Iz istorii bor'by kommunisticheskoi partii Azerbaidzhana za pobedu sovetskoi vlasti. Baku: Azerbaijanskii gosizdat, 1958.
- Ismailov, Eldar. "1937: 'Great Terror' in Azerbaijan," Caucasus Analytical Digest, no. 22 (2010): 9–12.
- . Istoria "bol'shogo terora" v Azerbaidzhane. Moscow: Rosspen, 2015.
- Isserson, Georgii S. "Sud'ba polkovodtsa," Druzhba narodov, 1988, no. 5: 179–92.
- . "Zapiski sovremennika o M. N. Tukhachevskom," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1963, no. 4: 64–78.
- . Novye formy bor'by: opyt issledovaniia sovremennykh vojn. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1940.
- . The Evolution of Operational Art. Fort Leavenworth, KS: Combat Studies Institute, 2013.
- Istoria industrializatsii SSSR, 1926–1941 gg.: dokumenty i materialy*. Moscow: Nauka, 1969.
- Istoria Kazakhskoi SSR*, 2 vols. Alma-Ata: Akademiia nauk KSSR, 1957–1959.
- Istoria Kommunisticheskoi partii Sovetskogo Soiuza*. 4 vols. Moscow: Politizdat, 1971.
- Istoria Sovetskikh organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti*. Moscow: Vysshiaia krasnoznamennaia shkola KGB, 1977, 234–5.
- Istoria voyny na Tikhom okeane*. 5 vols. Moscow: Inostrannaia literatura, 1957–8.
- Istoria Vsesoiuznoi Kommunisticheskoi partii (bol'shevikov): kratkii kurs*. Moscow: Pravda, 1938.
- Istoria zakonodatel'stva SSSR i RSFSR po ugovnomu protsessu i organizatsii suda i portkurnatry: sbornik dokumentov*. Moscow: [s.n.], 1955.
- Iubashian, K. N. Akademik Isif Orbeli, 1887–1961. 2nd ed. Moscow: Nauka, 1986.

- Iurenev, Rostislav N. Introduction to Ivan Pyr'ev v zbitni i na ekrane: stranitsy vospominanii, edited by G. B. Ma'iamov. Moscow: Kinotsentr, 1994.
- , ed. Eizenshtein v vospominaniakh sovremennikov. Moscow: Iskustvo, 1974.
- Iurganov, Andrei. Russkoe natsional'noe gosudarstvo: zhiznennyi mir istorikov epokhi stalinizma. Moscow: RGGU, 2011.
- Iurkevich, Lev. U vorot Indostana. Moscow: Federatsiia, 1932.
- Iusif-Zade, Z. M., ed. Chekisty Azerbaidzhana: dokumenty, ocherki, rasskazy. Naku: Azerneshr, 1981.
- Ivanov, Aleksei. Aleksei Ivanov—bogaty' opernoi sseny: dnevniki, zapiski, vospominaniia, edited by Zoi N. Shliakhova and G. N. Gorbenko. Moscow: Golos-Press, 2004.
- Ivanov, Iu. V. Ocherki istorii rossiisko (sovetsko)-pol'skikh otnoshenii v dokumentakh 1914–1945. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 2014.
- Ivanov, L. Morskoe sopernichestvo imperialisticheskikh derzhav. Moscow: Gosstatsekiz, 1936.
- Ivanov, S. P. Shab armeiskii, shtab frontovoi. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1990.
- , ed. Nachal'nyi period voiny. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1974.
- Ivanov, V. A. "Operatsiia 'Byvshe liudi' v Leningrade (fevral'-mart 1935 g.)," Novyi chasovoi [St. Petersburg], 1997, no. 6–7: 118–20.
- Ivanov, V. V. Dnevnik. Moscow: IMLI RAN, Nasledie, 2001.
- Ivanov, Vladimir. Neizvestnyi Polikarpov. Moscow: Iauza-EKSMO, 2009.
- Ivanova, G. M. Gulag v sisteme totalitarnogo gosudarstva. Moscow: Moskovskii obshchestvennyi nauchnyi fond, 1997.
- Ivanov-Razumnik, R. V. Memoirs. New York: Oxford University, 1965.
- . Neizdannyy Shchedrin. Leningrad: Izd-vo pisatelei v Lenugrade, 1931.
- Ivashutin, Petr I. "Dokladyvala tochno (Vospominaniia o minuvshei voine)," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1990, no. 5: 55–59.
- Ivinskaya, Olga. A Captive of Time: My Years with Pasternak. New York: Doubleday, 1978.
- Ivkin, V. I., ed. Gosudarstvennaia vlast' SSSR: vyshie organy vlasti upravleniia ikh rukovoditeli, 1923–1991 gg., Istoro-biograficheskii spravochnik. Moscow: Rosspen, 1999.
- Ivniatskii, N. A. "Golod 1932–1933 gg.: kto vinovat? (po dokumentam 'Kremlevskogo arkhiva')." In Holodomor 1932–1933 rr. v Ukrainy: prychny i naslidky, edited by Stanislav V. Kul'chyts'kyi. Kiev: Instytut istorii Ukrainy NAN Ukrainy, 1995, 43–66.
- . "Golod 1932–1933 godov: kto vinovat?" In Golod 1932–1933 godov, edited by Iu. N. Afanas'ev. Moscow: RGGU, 1995, 35–44.
- . "Istoriia podgotovki postanovleniia TsK VKP(b) o tempakh kollektivizatsii sel'skogo khoziaistva ot 5 ianvaria 1930 g." Istochnikovedenie istorii sovetskogo obshchestva, vyp. 1. Moscow: Nauka, 1964, 265–88.
- . Golod 1932–1933 godov v SSSR: Ukraina, Kazakhstan, Severnyi Kavkaz, Povolzh'e, Tsentral'no-Chernozemnaia oblast', Zapadnaia Sibir', Ural. Moscow: Sobranie, 2009.
- . Kollektivizatsiia i naskulachivanie (nachalo 30-x godov). Moscow: Magistr, 1996.
- . Repressivnaia politika sovetskoi vlasti v derevne, 1928–1933 gg. Moscow: Institut rossiiskoi istorii RAN, 2000.
- , and D. M. Ezerskii, eds. "Dvadsatipiatitsyachniki i ikh rol' v kollektivizatsii sel'skogo khoziaistva v 1930 g.," Materialy po istorii SSSR: dokumenty po istorii sovetskogo obshchestva, vyp. 1. istorii RAN, Moscow: AN SSSR, 1955.
- . Sud'ba naskulachennykh v SSSR. Moscow: Sobranie, 2004.
- IX Vsesoiuznyi s'ezd VLKSM: stenograficheski otechet*. Moscow, 1931.
- "Izdanie proizvedenii I. V. Stalina v Sovetskom Soiuzie c 7 noiabria 1917 goda na 5 marta 1953: statisticheskoe tablitsii," Sovetskaiia bibliografiia: sbornik statei i materialov, vyp. 1. Moscow: Vsesoiuznaia knizhnaia palata, 1953.
- Izmokiz, Vallden S. Zhendarmy Rosii. St. Petersburg: Neva, 2002, 466–8.
- Izotov, Nikita. Moia zbitn', moia rabota. Kharkov: Ukrainiskii rabochii, 1934.

- "Iz neopublikovannykh dokumentov (Beseda I. Maiskogo s S. Krippsom 21 iunia 1941 g.)," Rossiiskaia assotsiatsiia istorikov vtoroi mirovoi voyny: informatsionnyi biulleten', 1993, no. 1: 38–40.
- "Iz vospominani: vstrecha Stalina s sovetскими pisateliami v 1933 godu," Istochnik, 2003, no. 5: 55–62.
- Jackel, Eberhard. Hitler's Worldview: A Blueprint for Power. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1981.
- Jackson, Angela. British Women and the Spanish Civil War. London: Routledge, 2002.
- Jackson, Gabriel. The Spanish Republic and the Civil War, 1931–1939. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1965.
- Jackson, Julian. The Popular Front in France: Defending Democracy, 1934–38. New York: Cambridge University, 1988.
- Jackson, Peter. "French Intelligence and Hitler's Rise to Power," Historical Journal, 41/3 (1998): 795–824.
- . "French Military Intelligence and Czechoslovakia, 1938," Diplomacy and Statecraft, 5/1 (1994): 81–106.
- . "French Strategy and the Spanish Civil War." In Spain in an International Context, edited by Christian Leitz and David J. Dunthorn. New York: Berghahn, 1999, 55–80.
- . "Intelligence and the End of Appeasement." In French Foreign and Defence Policy, 1918–1940: The Decline and Fall of a Great Power, 1918–1940, edited by Robert Boyce. New York: Routledge, 1998, 234–60.
- . France and the Nazi Menace: Intelligence and Policy Making, 1933–1939. New York: Oxford University, 2000.
- Jacobsen, Hans-Adolf, ed. Dokumente zum Westfeldzug 1940. Goettingen: Musterschmidt, 1960.
- . Fall Gelb: Der Kampf um den deutschen Operationsplan zur Westoffensive 1940. Wiesbaden: Franz Steiner, 1957.
- . Nationalsozialistische Aussenpolitik, 1933–1938. Frankfurt am Main: Alfred Metzner, 1968.
- Jacobson, Jon. When the Soviet Union Entered World Politics. Berkeley: University of California, 1994.
- Jaffe, Philipp J. The Rise and Fall of American Communism. New York: Horizon, 1975.
- Jakobson, Max. The Diplomacy of the Winter War: An Account of the Russo-Finnish War, 1939–1940. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1961.
- Jakobson, Michael. Origins of the Gulag: The Soviet Prison Camp System, 1917–1934. Lexington: University of Kentucky, 1993.
- Jansen, Marc, and Nikita Petrov. "Mass Terror and the Court: The Military Collegium of the USSR," Europe-Asia Studies, 58/4 (2006): 589–602.
- . Stalin's Loyal Executioner: People's Commissar Nikolai Ezhov, 1893–1940. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution, 2002.
- Jansen, Marius. Japan and China: From War to Peace, 1894–1972. Chicago: Rand McNally, 1975.
- . The Making of Modern Japan. Cambridge, MA: Belknap, 2000.
- Jasiewicz, Krzysztof. Zagłada polskich Kresów: ziemiaństwo polskie na Kresach Północno-Wschodnich Rzeczypospolitej pod okupacją sowiecką 1939–1941: studium z dziejów zagłady dawnego narodu politycznego. Warsaw: Volumen, 1998.
- Jasny, Naum. Soviet Industrialization, 1928–1952. Chicago: University of Chicago, 1961.
- . The Socialized Agriculture of the USSR. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 1949.
- . The Soviet Economy during the Plan Era. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 1951.
- Jaurusch, Konrad. The Four Power Pact, 1933. Madison: State Historical Society of Wisconsin, 1966.
- Jedrzejewicz, Wacław, ed. Diplomat in Berlin, 1933–1939: Papers and Memoirs of Józef Lipski, Ambassador of Poland. New York: Columbia University, 1968.
- Jeffrey, Keith. MIG: The History of the Secret Intelligence Service 1909–1949. London: Bloomsbury, 2010.
- Jelagin, Juri. The Taming of the Arts. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1951.
- Jenkins, Brian, and Chris Millington. France and Fascism: February 1934 and the Dynamics of Political Crisis. London: Routledge, 2015.
- Jervis, Robert. "Hypotheses on Misconceptions," World Politics, 20/3 (1968): 454–79.
- . "Strategic Intelligence and Effective Policy." In Security and Intelligence: New Perspectives for the 1990s, edited by Stuart Faron et al. London: Frank Cass, 1991, 165–81.
- Joachimsthaler, Anton. Hitlers Liste: ein Dokument persönlicher Beziehungen. Munich: Herbig Verlag, 2003.

- Joffe, Nadezhda. Back in Time: My Life, My Fate, My Epoch. Oak Park, MI: Labor Publications, 1995.
- Johnson, Oliver. "Alternative Histories of Soviet Visual Culture," Kritika, 11/3 (2010), 581–608.
- Johnston, Robert Harold. New Mecca, New Babylon: Paris and the Russian Exiles, 1920–1945. Kingston, Ontario: McGill-Queen's University, 1988.
- Jonas, Michael. Wipert von Blücher und Finnland: Alternativpolitik und Diplomatie im 'Dritten Reich'. Dissertation. Helsinki, 2009.
- Jones, David William. The Lost Debate: German Socialist Intellectuals and Totalitarianism. Champaign, IL: University of Chicago, 1999.
- Jones, F. C. Japan's New Order in East Asia, 1937–1945. London: Oxford University, 1954.
- Jones, Larry Eugene. "Hindenburg and the Conservative Dilemma in the 1932 Presidential Elections," German Studies Review, 20/2 (1997): 235–59.
- . "Nazis, Conservatives, and the Establishment of the Third Reich," Tel Aviver Jahrbuch für Deutsche Geschichte, 23 (1994): 41–64.
- Jones, Thomas, Lloyd George. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1951.
- . A Diary with Letters, 1931–1950. New York: Oxford University, 1954.
- Jones, William David. "Toward a Theory of Totalitarianism: Franz Borkenau's Pareto," Journal of the History of Ideas, 53/3 (1992): 455–66.
- Jordan, Nicole. The Popular Front and Central Europe: The Dilemmas of French Impotence, 1918–1940. New York: Cambridge University, 1992.
- Joyce, Christopher. "The Soviet Penal System and the Great Terror." In Stalin's Terror Revisited, edited by Melanie Ilić. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.
- Judson, Pieter. Guardians of the Nation: Activists on the Language Frontiers of Imperial Austria. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 2006.
- Jukes, Geoffrey. "The Red Army and the Munich Crisis," Journal of Contemporary History, 26/2 (1991): 195–214.
- Junge, Marc, and Rolf Binner. Kak terror stal "bol'shym": sekretnyi prikaz No. 00447 i tekhnologiya ego ispol'neniia. Moscow: AIRO-XX, 2003.
- Junge, Mark, and Bernd Bonwetsch, eds. Bolshevistskii poriadok v Gruzii. 2 vols. Moscow: AIRO-XXI, 2015.
- , et al. "Operativnyi prikaz no. 00447: vyplonenie v provintsii." In Stalinizm v sovetskoi provintsii: 1937–1938 gg.: massovaya operatsiia na osnove prikaza no. 00447, edited by Mark Junge et al. Moscow: Rosspen, 2009.
- , Gennadii Bordiugov, and Rolf Binner. Vertikal' bol'shogo terrora: isoiia operatsii po prikazu NKVD no. 00447. Moscow: Novyi khronograf, 2008.
- Jurkiewicz, Jaroslaw. Pakt wschodni: z historii stosunków międzynarodowych w latach 1934–1935. Warsaw: Ministerstwo Obrony Narodowej, 1963.
- Kabanen, P. "Dvoinaia igra: Sovetsko-Finliandskie peregovory 1938–1939 gg." Rodina, 1995, no. 12: 44–8.
- Kabanov, P. A. Stal'nye perefony. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1973.
- Kabytov, P. S. "Valerian Kuibyshev: mify i real'nost," In Golos zemli Samarskoi: literaturno-publistitscheskie stat'i, Andrei Kuchma. Kuibyshev: Kuibyshevskoe knizhnoe izd-vo, 1990.
- Kaganovich, L. M. "Tseli i zadachi politicheskikh otdelov MTS i sovkhovov," Bol'shevik, 1933, no. 1–2: 12–35.
- Kahn, David. The Codebreakers. Rev. ed. New York: Scribner, 1996.
- Kaiser, David E. Economic Diplomacy and the Origins of the Second World War: Germany, Britain, France, and Eastern Europe, 1930–1939. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1980.
- Kai-shek, Chiang. "A Fortnight." In Sian: Extracts from a Diary. Shanghai: China Publishing Company, 1937, 58–63.
- . Soviet Russia in China: A Summing Up at Seventy. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1965.
- Kalashnikov, Iu. S., ed. Ocherki istorii sovetskogo kino. 3 vols. Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1956–61.
- Kalashnikov, K. A., et al., eds. Krasnaia Armiia v iunie 1941 goda: statisticheski sbornik. Novosibirsk: Sibirskii khronograf, 2003.
- Kale, Verna. "The Fifth Column: A Play by Ernest Hemingway," The Hemingway Review, 27/2 (2008): 131–4.

- Kaliagin, A. Ia. Po neznakomym dorogam: zapiski voennogo sovetnika v Kitae. 2nd ed. Moscow: Nauka, 1979.
- Kalinin, M. I. Sotsialisticheskaia rekonstruktsiia sel'skogo khoziaistva. Moscow: Partizdat, 1934.
- Kamenev, Lev B. "Predislovie." In Sochineniia, edited by N. Makiavelli. Moscow-Leningrad: Academia, 1934.
- . Chernyshevskii. Moscow: Zhurnal'no-gazetnoe ob"edinenie, 1933.
- Kamov, Boris. "Smert' Nikolaia Ezhova," Iunost', 1993, no. 8: 41–3.
- Kanel', Nadezhda V. "Vstrecha na lubianke," In Dodnes' tiagoteet, edited by S. S. Vilenskii. Vyp. 1. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1989, 495–9.
- Kangas, Roger. "Faizulla Khodzhaev: National Communism in Bukhara and Soviet Uzbekistan, 1896–1938," PhD diss. Indiana University, 1991.
- Kanivez, Muza V. "Moia zhizn' s Raskol'nikovym," Minushee, vyp. 7, 1992, 58–111.
- Kantor, Iulia. Voina i mir Mikhaila Tukhachevskogo. Moscow: Vremia, 2005.
- . Zakliataia drzhuba: sekretnoe sotrudnichestvo SSSR i Germanii v 1920–1930-e gody. Moscow: Piter, 2009.
- Kaplan, Temma. Red City, Blue Period: Social Movements in Picasso's Barcelona. Berkeley: University of California, 1992.
- Kaplonski, Christopher. "Prelude to Violence: Show Trials and State Power in 1930s Mongolia," American Ethnologist, 35/2 (2008): 321–37.
- Karaev, Ali G. Is nedavnego proshlogo: materialy k istorii Azerbaidzhanskoi kommunisticheskoi partii (b). Baku: Bakinskii rabochii, 1926.
- Karmen, Roman. No Pasaran! Moscow: Sovetskaia Rossiia, 1972.
- Karnitskii, Dmitrii A. Ugolovnyi kodeks RSFSR. Moscow: Sovetskoe zakonodatel'stvo, 1934.
- Karpov, I. Aviatsiia strany sotsializma. Leningrad: Gazetno-zhurnal'noe i knizhnoe izd-vo Leningradskogo Soveta PK i KD, 1939.
- Karpov, V. "Vo glave komiteta informatsii," Voiskoe bratstvo, special edition, 2005.
- Karski, Jan. The Great Powers and Poland: From Versailles to Yalta. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2014.
- Kartunova, Anastasia I. V. K. Bliukher v Kitae, 1924–1927: dokumentirovannyi ocherk, dokumenty. Moscow: Nauka, 1979.
- Kaslas, B. J. "The Lithuanian Strip in Soviet-German Secret Diplomacy, 1939–1941," Journal of Baltic Studies, 4/3 (1973): 204–19.
- Kassow, Samuel. "Trotsky and the Bulletin of the Opposition," Studies in Comparative Communism, 10/1–2 (1977): 184–97.
- Kassymbekova, Botakoz, and Christian Teichman, "The Red Man's Burden: Soviet European Officials in Central Asia in the 1920s and 30s." In Helpless Imperialists: Imperial Failure, Fear, and Radicalization, edited by Maurus Reinkowski and Gregor Thum. Gottingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2013.
- Kasza, Gregory. The Conscripted Society: Administered Mass Organizations. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1995.
- Kataev, Valentin. "Lenin v 1918 godu," Pravda, March 3, 1939.
- . "Mariia Demchenko." In V budniakh velikikh stroek: zhenshchiny-kommunistki geroini pervykh piatiletok, edited by L. I. Strishova. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1986.
- . "Sobytie nebyvaloe," Novyi mir, 1984, no. 5.
- Katanian, V. A. "Ne tol'ko vospominaniia: k istorii izdaniia Maikovskogo," Druzhiba narodov, 1989, no. 3: 220–7.
- Katsman, R. "Cheliuskin," Sovetskoe kino, 1935, no. 8–9: 35–46.
- Katz, Barbara G. "Purges and Production: Soviet Economic Growth, 1928–1940," Journal of Economic History, 35/3 (1975): 567–90.
- Katz, Daniel. "The Public Opinion Polls and the 1940 Election," Public Opinion Quarterly, 5/1 (1941): 52–78.
- Katzenellenbaum, S. S. Russian Currency and Banking, 1914–1924. London: P. S. King, 1925.
- Kaufman, Peter B. "Soviet Attitudes towards Collective Security in Europe, 1936–38," Russian History, 15/2–4 (1988): 427–44.
- Kazakov, M. I. Nad kartoi bylykh srazhenii. 2nd ed. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1971.
- Kazemzadeh, Firuz. The Struggle for Transcaucasia, 1917–1921. New York: Philosophical Library, 1951.

- Kebbel, T. E., ed. Selected Speeches of the Late Right Honorable the Earl of Beaconsfield. London: Longmans, Green and Co., 1889.
- Kedrov, Nikolai. Lapti Stalinizma: politicheskoe soznanie krest'ianstva russkogo Severa v 1930-e gody. Moscow: Rosspen, 2013.
- Kegel, Gerhard. V buriakh nashego veka: zapiski razvedchika-antifashista. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1987.
- Keldysh, V. A., ed. Neizvestnyi Gor'kii (k 125- letiiu so dnia rozhdeniia). Moscow: Nasledie, 1994.
- Kelly, Catriona. Comrade Pavlik: The Rise and Fall of a Soviet Boy Hero. London: Granta Books, 2005.
- Kemp-Welch, A. Stalin and the Literary Intelligentsia, 1918–1939. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1991.
- Ken, Oleg. “‘Moia otsenka byla slyshkom rezkoi’. I. V. Stalin i rekonstruktsii RKKA, 1930–1932 gg.,” Istoricheskie arkhiv, 1998, no. 5–6: 147–52.
- . “‘Rabota po istorii’ i strategii avtoritarizma, 1935–1937 gg.” In Lichnost’ i vlast v istorii Rossii v XIX–XX vv., edited by A. N. Tsamutali. St. Petersburg: Nestor, 1997, 108–16.
- . “Karl Radek i Biuro Mezhdunarodnoi Informatsii TsK VKP(b), 1932–1934 gg.,” Cahiers du monde russe, 44/1 (2003): 135–78.
- . Collective Security or Isolation: Soviet Foreign Policy and Poland, 1930–1935. St. Petersburg: Evropeiskii dom, 1996.
- . Mobilizatsionnoe planirovanie i politicheskie resheniia: konets 1920-serdina 1930-x gg. St. Petersburg: Evropeiskii universitet, 2002.
- . Moskva i pakt o nenapadenii s Pol'shei, 1930–1932 gg. St. Petersburg: PIIAF RAN, 2003.
- , and Aleksandr Rusapov. Politbiuro TsK VKP (b) i otnosheniia SSSR s zapadnymi sosednimi gosudarstvami (konets 1920–1930-kh gg.): problemy, dokumenty, opyt kommentariia. St. Petersburg: Evropeiskii dom, 2000.
- . Zapadnoe prigranich'e: politbiuro TsK VKP (b) i otnoshenie SSSSR s zapadnymi sosednimi gosudarstvami, 1928–1934. Moscow: Algoritm, 2014.
- , et al. Shvetsiia v politike Moskvy 1930–1950e gody. Moscow: Rosspen, 2005.
- Kenez, Peter. “The Picture of the Enemy in Stalinist Films.” In Insiders and Outsiders in Russian Cinema, edited by Stephen M. Norris and Zara M. Torlone. Bloomington: Indiana University, 2008, 96–112.
- . Cinema and Soviet Society from the Revolution to the Death of Stalin. London and New York: I. B. Tauris, 2001.
- . The Birth of the Propaganda State: Social Methods of Mass Mobilization, 1917–1929. New York: Cambridge University, 1985.
- Kennan, George F. At a Century's Ending: Reflections, 1982–1995. New York: W. W. Norton, 1996.
- . “The War Problem of the Soviet Union” (1935), in The Soviet Union and the Failure of Collective Security, 1934–1938, by Jiří Hochman, 176–83.
- . From Prague after Munich: Diplomatic Papers, 1938–1940. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1968.
- . Memoirs, 1925–1950. Boston: Little, Brown, 1967.
- . Memoirs, 1950–1963. Boston: Little, Brown, 1972.
- . Russia and the West under Lenin and Stalin. Boston: Little, Brown, 1961.
- Kennedy, A. L. Old Diplomacy and New, 1876–1922, From Salisbury to Lloyd George. London: John Murray, 1922.
- Kennedy, David. “The Move to Institutions,” Cardozo Law Review, 8/5 (1987): 841–988.
- Kennedy, Paul M. “The Tradition of Appeasement in British Foreign Policy, 1865–1939,” British Journal of International Studies, 2/3 (1976): 195–215.
- Kennel, Ruth. “The New Innocents Abroad,” American Mercury, XVII (May 1929): 10–8.
- Keohane, R. O. “Lilliputians’ Dilemmas: Small States in International Politics,” International Organization, 23/2 (1969): 291–310.
- Kepley, Jr., Vance. “The First Perestroika: Soviet Cinema under the First Five-Year Plan,” Cinema Journal, no. 35 (1996): 31–53.
- Kern, Gary. A Death in Washington: Walter G. Krivitsky and the Stalin Terror. New York: Enigma Books, 2004.
- Kerrl, Hanss, ed. Nürnberg 1936: Der Parteitag der Ehre. Berlin: C. A. Weller, 1936.

- Kershaw, Ian. "'Working Toward the Führer': Reflections on the Nature of the Hitler Dictatorship," Contemporary European History, 2/2 (1993): 103–18.
- . "Hitler and the Uniqueness of Nazism," Journal of Contemporary History, 39/2 (2004): 239–54.
- . Fateful Choices: Ten Decisions that Changed the World, 1940–1941. London: Allen Lane, 2007.
- . Hitler: 1889–1936: Hubris. New York: Longman, 1998.
- . Hitler: 1936–1945: Nemesis. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.
- . Making Friends with Hitler: Lord Londonderry, the Nazis, and the Road to War. London: Allen Lane, 2004.
- . The "Hitler Myth": Image and Reality in the Third Reich. New York: Oxford University, 1987.
- . The Nazi Dictatorship: Problems and Perspectives of Interpretation. 4th ed. New York: Oxford University, 2000.
- . The Nazi Dictatorship: Problems and Perspectives. London and Baltimore, MD: Edward Arnold, 1985.
- . "Working towards the Führer." In Stalinism and Nazism: Dictatorships in Comparison, edited by Ian Kershaw and Moshe Lewin. New York: Cambridge University, 1997, 88–106.
- Kessler, Gijis. "The Passport System and State Controls over Population Flows in the Soviet Union, 1932–1940," Cahiers du monde russe, 42/2–4 (2001): 477–504.
- Kessler, Harry Graf. Tagebücher, 1918–1937. Frankfurt: Insel-Verlag, 1961.
- Kettenacker, Lothar. "Mishandling a Spectacular Event: the Rudolf Hess Affair." In Flight from Reality: Rudolf Hess and His Mission to Scotland, 1941, edited by David Stafford. London: Pimlico, 2002, 19–38.
- Khalkhin Gol: piat'desiat let spustia (Materialy 'kruglogo stola' istorikov Sovetskogo Soiuza, Mongolii i Iaponii)*. Moscow: Institut voennoi istorii Ministerstva oborony SSSR, 1989.
- Khanin, G. I. Ekonomicheskaiia istoriia Rossii v noveishee vremia. 2 vols. Novosibirsk: NGTU, 2003.
- Khaustov, Vladimir N. "Deiatel'nost' organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti NKVD SSSR, 1934–1941 gg." PhD diss. Akademiia federal'noi sluzhby bezopasnosti, 1997.
- . "Razvitie sovetskikh organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti: 1917–1953 gg." Cahiers du monde russe, 42/2–4 (2001): 357–74.
- , et al., eds. Glazami razvedki, SSSR i Evropa 1919–1938: sbornik dokumentov. Moscow: Istoricheskaia literatura, 2015.
- , eds. Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti NKVD, 1937–1938. Moscow: Materik, 2004.
- , eds. Lubianka: Stalin i NKVD-NKGB-GUKR 'Smersh', 1939—mart 1946. Moscow: Materik, 2006.
- , eds. Lubianka: Stalin i VChK-GPU-OGPU-NKVD, ianvar' 1922–dekabr' 1936. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokraciia, 2003.
- , and Lennart Samuelson. Stalin, NKVD i represii 1936–1938 gg. Moscow: Rosspen, 2009.
- Khisamutdinov, Amir. The Russian Far East: Historical Essays. Honolulu: Center for Russia in Asia, 1993.
- Khlevniuk, Oleg V. "26 iunია 1940 goda: Illiuzii i real'nosti administrirovaniia," Kommunist, 1989, no. 9: 86–96.
- . "Economic Officials in the Great Terror, 1939–1938." In Stalin's Terror Revisited, edited by Melanie Ilić. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006, 38–67.
- . "Les mécanismes de la Grande Terreur au Turkménistan," Cahiers du monde russe, 39/1–2 (1998): 197–208.
- . "Letters to Stalin: Practices of Selection and Reaction," Cahiers du monde russe, 56/2–3 (2015): 327–44.
- . "Party and NKVD: Power Relationships in the Years of the Great Terror." In Stalin's Terror, edited by Barry McLoughlin and Kevin McDermott. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002, 21–33.
- . "Prichiny 'bol'shogo terrora': Vneshnepoliticheskii aspekt." Unpublished manuscript delivered at a conference at Cortona, Italy, 1997.
- . "Stalin as Dictator: The Personalization of Power." In Stalin: A New History, edited by Sarah Davies and James Harris. New York: Cambridge University, 2005.
- . "Stalin, Syrtsov, Lominadze: Preparations for the 'Second Great Breakthrough'." In The Lost Politburo Transcripts: From Collective Rule to Stalin's Dictatorship, edited by Paul R. Gregory and Norman Naimark. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2008, 78–96.

———. “The Objectives of the Great Terror, 1937–1938.” In Soviet History, 1917–1953: Essays in Honour of R. W. Davies, edited by Julian Cooper et al. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995, 158–76.

———. “The Reasons for the ‘Great Terror’: The Foreign Policy Aspect.” In Russia in the Age of Wars, 1914–1945, edited by Silvio Pons and A. Romano. Milan: Feltrinelli, 2000, 159–69.

———. “The Stalinist ‘Party Generals’.” In Centre-Local Relations in the Stalinist State, 1928–1941, edited by E. A. Rees. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002, 37–64.

———. 1937–i: Stalin, NKVD, i sovetskoe obshchestvo. Moscow: Respublika, 1992.

———. In Stalin's Shadow: The Career of “Sergo” Ordzhonikidze. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1995.

———. Khoziain: Stalin i utverzhdenie stalinskoi diktatury. Moscow: Rosspen, 2010.

———. Master of the House: Stalin and His Inner Circle. New Haven, CT, and Stanford, CA: Yale University and the Hoover Institution, 2009.

———. Politbiuro: mekhanizmy politicheskoi vlasti v 30-e gody. Moscow: Rosspen, 1996.

———. Stalin i Ordzhonikidze: konflikti v politbiuro v 30-e gody. Moscow: Izdatel'skii tsentr Rossiia molodaia, 1993.

———. Stalin: zhizn' onogo vozhdia: biografiia. Moscow: Corpus, 2015.

———. The History of the Gulag: From Collectivization to the Great Terror. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2004.

———, et al., eds. Stalin i Kaganovich: perepiska, 1931–1936. Moscow: Rosspen, 2001.

———, eds. Stalinskoe politbiuro v 30-e gody: sbornik dokumentov. Moscow: AIRO-XX, 1995.

———, Paul Gregory, and Aleksandr Vatlin, eds. Stenogrammy zasedanii politbiuro TsK RKP (b), 1923–1938. 3 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 2007.

———, and R. W. Davis, “The End of Rationing in the Soviet Union, 1934–1935,” Europe-Asia Studies, 51/4 (1999): 557–609.

Khlusov, M. I., ed. Ekonomika gulaga i ee rol' v razvitií strany, 1930-e gody: sbornik dokumentov. Moscow: Institut rossiiskoi istorii RAN, 1998.

“Khochetsia proklias' den' i chas moego znakomstva s Beriia,” Istoknik, 2002, no. 4: 90–109.

Khodasevich, Valentina. Portrety slovami: ocherki. Moscow: Galart, 1995.

Khodorov, I. “Natsional'noe razmezhevanie Srednei Azii,” Novyi Vostok, 1926, no. 8–9.

Khorseev, K. I. “VVS v germane-pol'skoi voine,” Voennaia mysl', 1940, no. 7: 28–44.

Khristoforov, Igor A. Aristokraticheskaia oppozitsiia Veilkim reformam (konets 1850—serdenia 1870-kh gg. Moscow: Russkoe slovo, 2002.

Khristoforov, V. S., et al., eds. Zimniaia voina 1939–1940 gg. issledovaniia, dokumenty, kommentarii. Moscow: Akademkniga, 2009.

Khromov, S. S. Po stranisam lichnogo arkhiva Stalina. Moscow: Moskovskii gos. Universitet, 2009.

Khrushchev, Nikita. “O kul'te lichnosti i ego posledstviakh,” Izvestiia TsK KPSS, 1989, no. 3: 128–70.

———. “Vospominaniia,” Ogonek, 1989, no. 36.

———. Khrushchev Remembers. Boston: Little, Brown, 1970.

———. Memoirs of Nikita Khrushchev. 4 vols. University Park: Pennsylvania State University, 2004–7.

———. Vospominaniia: izbrannye fragmenty. Moscow: Vagrius, 1997.

———. Vremia, liudi, vlast': vospominaniia. 4 vols. Moscow: Novosti, 1999.

Kiaer, Christina. “Was Socialist Realism Forced Labor? The Case of Aleksandr Deneika in the 1930s,” Oxford Art Journal, 28/3 (2005): 321–45.

———. Imagine No Possessions: The Socialist Objects of Russian Constructivism. Cambridge, MA: MIT, 2005.

Kievskii Krasnoznamennyi: istoriia Krasnoznamenskogo kievskogo voennogo okruga, 1991–1972. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1974.

Kiknadze, A. “Gerikhard Kegel'.” In Liudi molchalivogo podviga: Sbornik ocherkov. Vol 2. Moscow: Politizdat, 1987, 111–27.

Kimball, Warren E. “The Hess Distraction: A Footnote from America.” In Flight From Reality: Rudolf Hess and His Mission to Scotland, 1941, edited by David Stafford. London: Pimlico, 2002, 61–77.

- , ed. Churchill and Roosevelt: The Complete Correspondence. 3 vols. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1984.
- Kinch, Nils. "The Road from Dreams of Mass Production to Flexible Specialization: American Influences on the Development of the Swedish Automobile Industry, 1920–1939." In Fordism Transformed: The Development of Production Methods in the Automobile Industry, edited by Haruhito Shiomi and Kazuo Wada. Oxford: Oxford University, 1995, 107–36.
- Kindleberger, Charles P. The World in Depression, 1929–1939. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California, 1973.
- King, F., and G. Matthews, eds. About Turn: The British Communist Party and the Second World War. London: Lawrence Wishart, 1990.
- Kington-Mann, Esther. In Search of the True West: Culture, Economics, and Problems of Russian Development. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1999.
- Kirby, David. "The Baltic States, 1940–1950." In Communist Power in Europe, 1944–1949, edited by Martin McCauley. London: Macmillan, 1977, 22–35.
- . A Concise History of Finland. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 2006.
- Kirchmayer, Jerzy. 1939 i 1944 Kilka Zagadnień Polskich. Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1956.
- Kir'ianov, E. A. "Kollektivizatsiia tsentra Rossii (1929–1937 gg.)," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 2006, no. 5: 74–85.
- Kirilina, Alla A. "Vstrely v Smol'nom," Rodina, 1989, no. 1.
- . Neizvestnyi Kirov. Moscow: Olma, 2001.
- . Rikoshet, ili, Skol'ko chelovek bylo ubito vystrelom v Smol'nom. St. Petersburg: Ob-vo "Znanie" Rossii, Sankt-Peterburgskaia organizatsiia, 1993.
- Kirov, Sergei M. Lebrannye stat'i rechi, 1912–1934. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1957.
- Kirpichenko, V. A. Razvedka: litsa i lichnosti. Moscow: Geia, 1998.
- Kirpotin, V. Ia. Rovesnik zheleznoogo veka: memuarnaia kniga. Moscow: Zakharov, 2006.
- Kirschenbaum, Lisa A. "Exile, Gender, and Communist Self-Fashioning: Dolores Ibárruri (La Pasionaria) in the Soviet Union," Slavic Review, 71/3 (2012): 566–89.
- Kirsher, L. A., and N. K. Novikov. Kanun i nachalo voiny: dokumenty i materialy. Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1991.
- Kiselev, A. F., and E. M. Shchagin, eds. Khrestomatiia po otechestvennoi istorii, 1914–1945 gg. Moscow: Gumanitarnyi izdatel'skii tsentr VLADOS, 1996.
- Kiselev, A. S., ed. Admiral Kuznetsov: Moskva v zblizni i sud'be flotvodtsa. Moscow: Mosgorarkhiv, 2000.
- Kiselev, V. N. "Upriamye fakty nachala voiny," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1992, no. 2: 14–22.
- Kissinger, Henry. Diplomacy. New York: Touchstone, 1994.
- Klebanov, I. I., et al., eds. Istoriia sozdaniia oborono-promyshlennogo kompleksa Rossii i SSSR, 1900–1963: dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: Novyi kronograf, 2004.
- Klein, Wolfgang, ed. Paris 1935: erster Internationaler Schriftstellerkongress zur Verteidigung der Kultur, Reden und Dokumente. Berlin: Akademie, 1982.
- Klid, Bohdan, and Alexander J. Motyl, eds. The Holodomor Reader: A Sourcebook on the Famine of 1932–1933 in Ukraine. Edmonton and Toronto: Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, 2012.
- Klukowski, Zygmunt. Diary from the Years of Occupation, 1939–1944. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois, 1993.
- Kniaz'kov, A. S., et al., eds. Voennyi sovet pri narodnom komissare oborony SSSR, dekabr' 1934 g.: dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: Rosspen, 2007.
- Knickelbocker, H. R. "Stalin Mystery Man Even to His Mother," New York Evening Post, Dec. 1, 1930.
- Knight, Amy. Beria: Stalin's First Lieutenant. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1993.
- . Who Killed Kirov? The Kremlin's Greatest Mystery. New York: Hill and Wang, 1999.
- Knightley, Phillip. The Master Spy: The Story of Kim Philby. New York: Knopf, 1988.
- Knox, Alfred. "General Kuropatkin," Slavonic Review, 4/1 (1925): 164–8.
- Koch, Stephen. Double Lives: Stalin, Willi Muenzenberg and the Seduction of the Intellectuals. Rev. ed. New York: Enigma, 2004.

- Kochan, Lionel. Russia and the Weimar Republic. Cambridge, UK: Bowes and Bowes, 1954.
- Kochik, Valerii. "Sovetskaia voennaia razvedka: struktura i kadry," Svobodnaia mysl', 1998, no. 5: 94–104, no. 6: 88–103, no. 7: 97–109, no. 8: 68–94, no. 9–12: 98–117.
- Kochin, Nikolai. Spelye kolos'ia: nizhegorodskie byli. Nizhny Novgorod: Knigi, 2001.
- Koenker, Diane, and Ronald D. Bachman. Revelations from the Russian Archives. Washington, D.C.: Library of Congress, 1997.
- , et al., eds. Revelations from the Russian Archives: Documents in English Translation. Washington, D.C.: Library of Congress, 1997.
- Koestler, Arthur. Darkness at Noon. New York: Macmillan, 1941.
- . Spanish Testament. London: Viktor Gollancz, 1937.
- . The Invisible Writing. New York: Macmillan, 1954.
- Kokoshin, Andrei A. "A. A. Svechin: o voine i politike," Mezhdunarodnaia zhizn', 1988, no. 10: 133–42.
- . Armiia i politika: sovetskaia voenno-politicheskaia i voenno-stratigicheskaia mysl', 1918–1991. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1995.
- Kokurin, Aleksandr I., and Nikita V. Petrov. Lubianka, 1917–1960: spravochnik. Moscow: Demokratiia, 1997.
- , eds. GULAG: glavnoe upravlenie lagerei, 1918–1960. Moscow: Materik, 2000.
- . "Gulag: struktura i kadry," Svobodnaia mysl', 2000, no. 2: 110–25.
- . "OGPU, 1929–1934 gg.," Svobodnaia mysl', 1998, no. 8: 95–114.
- . Lubianka, organy VChK-OGPU-NKVD-NKGB-MGB-MVD-KGB, 1917–1991: spravochnik. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratiia, 2003.
- Kolakowski, Leszek. "Communism as a Cultural Formation," Survey, 29/2 (1985): 136–48.
- . Main Currents of Marxism: The Founders, the Golden Age, the Breakdown. 3 vols., in 1 ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 2005.
- Kolarz, Walter. The Peoples of the Soviet Far East. New York: Prager, 1954.
- Kolesnik, Aleksandr. Khronika zhizni sem'i Stalina. Moscow: IKRA, 1990.
- Koliazin, Vladimir F., and Vladimir Goncharov, eds. "Vernite mne svobodu!" deiateli literatury i iskusstv Rossii i Germanii, zherty stalin'skogo terrora. Moscow: Medium, 1997.
- Kolkhozy vo vtoroi stalin'skoi piatiletki: statisticheskii sbornik. Moscow-Leningrad: Gosplanizdat, 1939.
- "Kollektivizatsiia: istoki, suchnost', posledstviia." Istoriia SSSR, 1989, no. 3: 3–62.
- Kollektivizatsiia sel'skogo khoziaistva: vazhneishe postanovleniia Kommunisticheskoi partii Sovetskogo Soiuz, 1927–1935*. Moscow: Akademiia nauk, 1957.
- Kollontai, A. M. "Seven Shots' in the Winter War of 1939," International Affairs, 1990, no. 1: 185–6.
- . Diplomaticheskie dnevniki, 1922–40. 2 vols. Moscow: Academia, 2001.
- Kolman, Ernst. My ne dolzhyi byli tak zhi'. New York: Chaldize, 1982.
- Kolomiets, Maksim. Legkie tanki BT: 'letaiushchii tank' 1930-kh. Moscow: Eksmo, 2007.
- Kolpakidi, A. I., ed. Ensiklopediia sekretnykh sluzhb Rossii. Moscow: Tranzitkniga, 2004.
- , and M. L. Seriaikov. Shehit i mek. Moscow: Olma, 2002.
- , and D. Prokhorov. Imperiia GRU: Ocherki istorii rossiiskoi voennoi razvedki. Moscow: Olma, 2000.
- . Vnesniaia razvedka Rossii. Moscow: Olma, 2001.
- Kol'tsov, Mikhail. "Agentura trotskistov v Ispanii," Pravda, January 22, 1937.
- . "Fashistsko-shpionskaia rabota ispanskikh trotskistov," Pravda, June 19, 1937.
- . "Podlye manevery ispanskikh trotskistov," Pravda, December 14, 1936.
- . Ispaniia v ogne. 2 vols. Moscow: Politizdat, 1987.
- . Ispanskii dnevnik. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1958.
- . Izbrannye proizvedeniia v trekh tomakh. Moscow: Gospolitizdat, 1957.
- . Khochu letat'. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1931.
- . Pisatel' v gazete: vstupleniia, stat'i, zametki. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1961.
- , and Andrei Lezhava. Sovetskie subtropiki. Moscow: Zhurnal'no-gazetnoe ob'edinenie, 1934.

- Komandnyi i nachal'stviushchii sostav Krasnoi Armii v 1940–1941 gg. Struktura i kadry tseŋtral'nogo apparat NKO SSSR, voennykh okrugov i obshchevoiskovykh armii: dokumenty i materialy.* Moscow-St. Petersburg: Letnii sad, 2005.
- Komolova, N. P., ed. Komintern protiv fashizma: dokumenty. Moscow: Nauka, 1999.
- Komshukov, Afanasii Arsen'evich. "Natsional'no-revoliutsionnaia voina ispanskogo naroda 1936–1939 gg. i sovetskaia obshchestvennost'." PhD diss. Kharkov, 1979.
- Konchalovsky, Andrei. The Inner Circle: An Inside View of Soviet Life Under Stalin. New York: Newmarket Press, 1991.
- Kondrashin, Viktor V., et al., eds. Golod v SSSR 1929–1934: dokumenty. 3 vols. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratsiia, 2011.
- , and D'Ann Penner. Golod 1932–1933 gody v sovetskoi derevne (na materialakh Povolzh'ia, Dona i Kubani). Samara-Penza: Samarskii gos. Universitet, Penzenskii gos. universitet, 2002.
- Kondrat'ev, Nikolai D. Marshal Bliukher. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1965.
- Konenenko, A. "Germano-pol'skaia voina 1939 g.," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1940, no. 11: 49–67.
- . "Kratkii obzor voennykh deistvii na zapade," Voennaia mysl', 1940, no. 7: 3–12.
- . Boi v Finlandii (mai 1940 g.), Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1941, no. 3: 3–25.
- Koniushka, R. "Iz vosponinaniĭ ob izdaniĭ sochinenii I.V. Stalina i ego kratkoi biografii," Edinstvo, January 19, 1995.
- Kononenko, V. P. "Ubit, no esche opasen," Sovetskaia kul'tura, October 4, 2003.
- . "Pavlik Morozov: pravda i vymysel," Komsomolskaia pravda, April 5, 1989.
- Konstantinov, Aleksandr P. F. F. Il'in- Rasol'nikov. Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1964.
- Konstantinov, Kirill. Rokossovskii: pobeda ne ljuboi tsenoi. Moscow: Yauza-Eksmo, 2006.
- Kontorovich, Vladimir. "The Military Origins of Soviet Industrialization," Comparative Economic Studies, 57/4 (2015): 1–24.
- Kopelev, Lev. "Last Grain Collections (1933)." In Education of a True Believer. New York: Harper & Row, 1980, 224–86.
- . Education of a True Believer. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.
- . I sotvoril sebe kumira. Ann Arbor, MI: Ardis, 1978.
- Kordt, Erich. Nicht aus Akten: die Wilhelmstrasse in Frieden und Krieg, 1928–1945. Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1950.
- . Wahn und Wirklichkeit. Stuttgart: Union deutsche Verlagsgesellschaft, 1948.
- Korets, L. B. Kurorty Abkhazii—Sukhum—Gagry. Moscow: Glavnoe kurortnoe upravlenie, 1925.
- Koritskii, N. I., et al., eds. Marshal Tukhachevskii: vospominaniia друзей i sotratnikov. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1965.
- Kornat, Marek. "Anna Maria Cienciala as a Historian of Polish Diplomacy," Polish Review, 61/1 (2016): 29–45.
- . "The Polish Idea of 'The Third Europe' (1937–1938): A Realistic Concept or an Ex-Post Vision?" Acta Poloniae Historica, 103 (2011): 101–26.
- Korneev, V. E., and O. N. Kopylova. "Arkhivy na sluzhbe totalitarnogo gosudarstva," Otechestvennye arkhivy, 1992, no. 3: 13–24.
- Korol'kov, Iu. Chelovek, dlia kotorogo ne bylo tain (Rikhard Zorge). Moscow: Politizdat, 1965.
- Kortunova, A. I. "1938–i: poslednii god zhizni i deiatel'nosti marshala V.K. Bliukhera," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 2004, no. 1: 164–83.
- Kosheleva, L. P., et al. Pisma I. V. Stalina V. M. Molotovu, 1925–1936 gg.: sbornik dokumentov. Moscow: Rossiia molodaia, 1995.
- Kostiuk, Hryhory. Stalinist Rule in the Ukraine: A Study of the Decade of Mass Terror (1929–1939). New York: Praeger, 1960.
- Kostrychenko, G. V. Tainaia politika Stalina: vlast' i antisemitizm. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 2001.
- Kostrychenko, G. V., and B. Ia. Khazanov, "Konets kar'ery N. I. Ezhova," Istoricheskii arkhiv 1992, no. 1: 123–31.
- Kotkin, Stephen. "A Conspiracy So Immense," The New Republic (February 13, 2006).
- . "Modern Times: The Soviet Union and the Interwar Conjunction," Kritika, 2/1 (2001): 111–65.

- . "The State—Is It Us? Memoirs, Archives, and Kremlinology," Russian Review, 61/1 (2002), 35–51.
- . Magnetic Mountain: Stalinism as a Civilization. Berkeley: University of California, 1995.
- Kotliar, E. "Faust v ITL." In Tear Gulaga: vospominaniia, ocherki, edited by M. M. Korallov. Moscow: Memorial, 1995.
- Kovaleva, N. V., et al., eds. Molotov, Malenkov, Kaganovich, 1957: stenogramma iun'skogo plenuma TsK KPSS i drugie dokumenty. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond demokratiia, 1998.
- . "Posledniaia 'antipartiinaiia' gruppy: stenograficheskii otchet iun'skogo (1957 g.) plenuma TsK KPSS," Istoricheskie arkhivy, 1993, no. 3: 4–94.
- Kovalevskii, Pavel I. Psikhiatricheskie eskizy iz istorii. 3 vols. Kharkov: Zil'berberg, 1893.
- Kowalsky, Daniel. "The Soviet Cinematic Offensive in the Spanish Civil War," Film History, 19/1 (2007): 7–19.
- . Stalin and the Spanish Civil War. New York: Columbia University, 2008.
- Koyré, Alexandre. La philosophie et le problème éternel en Russie au début du XIX siècle. Paris: Vrin, 1929.
- Kozlov, A. G. "Pervyi direktor: perechityvaia stranitsy istorii," Politicheskaiia agitatsiia [Magadan], 1988, no. 17: 28–31, no. 18: 27–32.
- Kozlov, Aleksandr. "Pokozateli po trudu, 1932–1942," Magadanskaia pravda, March 26, 1992.
- Kozlov, V. A., ed. Neizvestnaia Rossiia: XX vek. 4 vols. Moscow: Istoricheskoe nasledie, 1992–1993.
- Kozlov, V. P., et al., eds. Katyn' mart 1940–sent'iabr 2000 g.: dokumenty. Moscow: Ves mir, 2001.
- Kozlova, N. N. Sovetskie liudi: stseny iz istorii. Moscow: Evropa, 2005.
- Kozybaev, M. K., et al. Kollektivizatsiia v Kazakhstane: tragediia krest'iansva. Alma-Ata, 1992.
- KPSS v rezoliutsiakh i resheniakh s"ezdov, konferentsii i plenumov TsK*. 7th ed. 4 vols. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1954–60.
- . 8th ed. 8 vols. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1970–1982.
- KPSS v rezoliutsiakh i resheniakh s"ezdov, konferentsii i plenumov TsK*. 9th ed. 15 vols. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1983–1989.
- KPSS o vooruzhennykh silakh Sovetskogo Soiuza: sbornik dokumentov*. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1958.
- Kraminov, D. F. V orbite voyny: zapiski sovetskogo korrespondenta za rubezhom, 1939–1945 gody. Moscow: Sovetskaia Rossiia, 1980.
- Krasil'nikov, Sergei A. Serp i molokh: krest'ianskaia sylka v Zapadnoi Sibiri v 1930-e gody. Moscow: Rosspen, 2003.
- Krasil'nikov, S. N. "Nastupatel'naia armeiskaia operatsiia." In Voprosy strategii: i operativnogo iskustva v sovetskikh voennykh trudakh: 1917–1940 gg., edited by A. B. Kadishev et al. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1965, 487–96.
- Krasnikov, Stepan. S. M. Kirov v Leningrade. Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1966.
- Krasnov, Valerii. Neizvestnyi Zhukov: lavry i ternii polkovoditsa. Dokumenty, mneniia, razmyshleniia. Moscow: Olma, 2000.
- Krasnoznamennyi Dal'nevostochnyi: istoriia Krasnoznamennogo dal'nevostochnogo voennogo okruga*. Moscow: Ministerstva oborony SSSR, 1971.
- Kravchenko, Ksenia S. Stalin v izobrazitel'nom iskusstve. Moscow: Gosizdat Iskusstvo, 1939.
- Kravchenko, Victor. I Chose Freedom: The Personal and Political Life of a Soviet Official. New York: Scribner's, 1947.
- Kremlev, Sergei. Beriia: luchshii menedzher XX veka. Moscow: Iauza, 2011.
- Krenkel', Ernst T. RAEM—moi pozymnye. Moscow: Sovetskaia Rossiia, 1973.
- Krivenko, S. "Belomoro-Baltiiskii ITL (Belomorsko-Baltiiskii ITL, Belbaltlag, BBL)." In Sistema ispravitel'no-trudovykh lagerei v SSSR, edited by N. G. Okhotin and A. B. Roginskii. Moscow: Zvenia, 1998.
- . "Karagandinskii ITL." In Sistema ispravitel'no-trudovykh lagerei v SSSR, edited by N. G. Okhotin and A. B. Roginskii. Moscow: Zvenia, 1998.
- . "Solovetskii ITL OGPU (Solovetskii lageria osobogo naznacheniia, Solovetskii lager' prinuditel'nykh rabot osobogo naznacheniia OGPU, SLON, CLAG, Solovetskii i Karelo-Murmanskii lageria, SKMITL)." In Sistema ispravitel'no-trudovykh lagerei v SSSR, edited by N. G. Okhotin and A. B. Roginskii. Moscow: Zvenia, 1998.
- Krivitskii, Valter. "Iz vospominanii sovetskogo kommunisty," Sotsialisticheskii vestnik, April 15, 1938.
- Krivitsky, Walter G. I Was Stalin's Agent. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1940.

- . In Stalin's Secret Service: An Exposé of Russia's Secret Policies by the Former Chief of the Soviet Intelligence in Western Europe. 2nd ed. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1939.
- . MIS Debriefing and other Documents on Soviet Intelligence. Riverside, CA: Xenos Books, 2004.
- Krivoshchev, G. F. Soviet Casualties and Combat Losses in the Twentieth Century. London: Greenhill Book, 1997.
- , ed. Grif sekretnosti sniat: poteri Vooruzhennykh Sil SSSR v voynakh, boevykh deistviakh i voennykh konfliktakh: statisticheskoe issledovanie. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1993.
- . Kniga pamiati. 10 vols. Moscow: Patriot, 1998.
- Krivoshchein, Semen. Mezhdubur'e. 2nd ed. Voronezh: Tsentral'noe chernozemnoe, 1968.
- Krylov, S. M., ed. Puti razvitiia teatra: stenograficheskii otchet i resheniia partiinogo soveshchaniia po voprosam teatra pri agitprope TSK VKP(b) v mae 1927 g. Moscow: Kinopechat', 1927.
- Krymov, A. "Istoricheskie portrety: Manfred Shtern—General Kleber," Narody Azii i Afriki, 1978, no. 1.
- Krymov, A. G. [Kuo Shao-tang], Istoriko-memuarnye zapiski kitaitskogo revoliutsionera. Moscow: Nauka, 1990.
- K shesidesiatiletiiu so dnia rozhdeniia I.V. Stalina*. Moscow: Pravda, 1940.
- Kubeev, M. "Obrechennyi na kazn': dokumental'nyi rasskaz o Rikharde Zorge i ego sosratnikakh," Dal'nii Vostok, 1990, no. 2.
- Kublanov, A. "Razгром fashistskoi trotskistsko-bukharinskoi 'piatoi kolonii' v SSSR." PhD diss. Leningrad, 1946.
- Kudriachenko, A. I., ed. Holodomor v Ukraini 1932–1933 rokiv za dokumentamy politychnoho arkhivu Ministerstva zakordonnykh sprav Federativnoi Respubliky Nimechchyna. Kiev: Natsional'nyi instytut stratehichykh doslidzhen', 2008.
- Kudriashov, Sergei, ed. Krasnaia armia v 1920-e gody. Moscow: Vetsnik arkhiza prezidenta Rossiiskoi Federatsii, 2007.
- , ed. SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii: 1936–1939 gody. Moscow: Vestnik arkhiva prezidenta RF, 2013.
- Kuibyshev, Valerian V. Stat'i i rechi. Moscow: Partizdat, 1937.
- Kul'chyts'kyi, Stanislav V. "Skil'ky nas zahynulo pid holodomoru 1933 roku?" Dzerkalo tyzhnia, November 23, 2002.
- Kuleshova, N. Iu. "Bol'shoi den': griadushchaia voina v literature 1930-x godov," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 2002, no. 1: 181–91.
- Kul'turnaia zhizn' v SSSR, 1928–1941 gg.: khronika*. Moscow: Nauka, 1976.
- Kumanev, Georgii A. "'22ogo' na rassvete," Pravda, June 22, 1989.
- . Riadom so Stalynym: Otkrovennye svidetel'stva. Vstrechi, besedy, interv'iu, dokumenty. Moscow: Bylina, 1999.
- Kumanev, Viktor, and I. S. Kulikova. Protivostoianie: Krupskaia-Stalin. Moscow: Nauka, 1994.
- Kun, Béla, ed. Kommunisticheskii internatsional v dokumentakh: resheniia, tezisy i vozzvaniia kongressa Komintern a plenumov IKKI, 1918–1932. Moscow: Partizdat, 1933.
- Kun, Miklos. Bukharin: ego druž'ia i vragi. Moscow: Respublika, 1992.
- . Stalin: An Unknown Portrait. Budapest: Central European University, 2003.
- Kuramysov, I. Na putiakh sotsialisticheskogo pereustroistva kazakskogo ayla. Moscow: Alma-Ata, 1932.
- Kurdiukov, I. F., et al., eds. Sovetsko-kitaiskie otnosheniia: sbornik dokumentov 1917–1957. Moscow: Izd-vo vostochnoi literatury, 1959.
- Kuritsyn, V. M. Istoriia gosudarstva i prava Rossii, 1929–1940 gg. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1998.
- Kurliandskii, Igor A. Stalin, vlast', religiia. Moscow: Kuchkovo pole, 2011.
- Kuromiya, Hiroaki. "Accounting for the Great Terror," Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas, 53/1 (2005): 86–101.
- . "Edinonachalie and the Soviet Industrial Manager, 1928–1937," Europe-Asia Studies, 36/2 (1984): 185–204.
- . "Stalin in the Politburo Transcripts." In The Lost Politburo Transcripts: From Collective Rule to Stalin's Dictatorships, edited by Paul R. Gregory and Norman Naimark. Stanford, CA, and New Haven, CT: Hoover Institution and Yale University, 2008, 41–56.
- . "Stalin's Great Terror and Espionage," NCEEER paper, September 2009.
- . "The Commander and the Rank and File: Managing the Soviet Coal-Mining Industry, 1928–1933." In Social Dimensions of Soviet Industrialization, edited by William G. Rosenberg and Lewis H. Siegelbaum. Bloomington:

Indiana University, 1993.

———. "The Crisis of Proletarian Identity in the Soviet Factory, 1928–1929," Slavic Review, 44/2 (1985): 280–97.

———. "The Soviet Famine of 1932–1933 Reconsidered," Europe-Asia Studies, 60/4 (2008): 663–75.

———. Freedom and Terror in the Donbas: A Ukrainian-Russian Borderland, 1870–1990s. New York: Cambridge University, 1998.

———. Stalin. New York: Pearson/Longman, 2005.

———. Stalin's Industrial Revolution: Politics and Workers, 1928–1932. New York: Cambridge University, 1988.

———. The Voices of the Dead: Stalin's Great Terror in the 1930s. New Haven, CT, and London: Yale University, 2007.

———, and Andrzej Pełkoński, "Stalin und die Spionage," Transit, 2009, no. 38.

———. "The Great Terror: Polish-Japanese Connections," Cahiers du monde russe, 50/4 (2009): 647–70.

Kuropatkin, A. N. Dnevnik A. N. Kuropatkina. Nizhny Novgorod: Nizhpoligraf, 1924.

Kushnirov, Mark. Svetlyi put', ili Charli i Spenser. Moscow: Terra-knizhnyi klub, 1998.

Kuskova, E. "Na rubezhe dvuh epoch: pamiat A.M. Gor'kogo," Poslednie novosti [Paris], June 26, 1936.

Kutskii, E. A. "A. V. Shestakov," Istoriia SSSR, 1967, no. 3: 134–41.

Kuusinen, Aino. The Rings of Destiny: Inside Soviet Russia from Lenin to Brezhnev. New York: William Morrow, 1974.

Kuz'micheva, T. M. "Resheniia osobykh troek privodit' nemedlenno," Istochnik, 1999, no. 5: 81–5.

Kuz'min, Mikhail A. Dnevnik 1934 g. St. Petersburg: Ivan Limbakh, 1998.

Kuznetskii metallurgicheskii kombinat: ocherki po istorii. Novokuznetsk: Kuznetskaia krepost', 1997.

Kuznetsov, I. I., and I. M. Dzhoga. Pervye geroi Sovetskogo Soiuza. Irkutsk: Irkutsk University, 1983.

Kuznetsov, K. "'Val'kiriiia' Vagnera v Bol'shom Teatre SSSR," Sovetskaia muzyka, 1941, no. 2: 76–79.

Kuznetsov, Nikolai G. "Krutyie povoroty: iz zapisok Admirała Kuznetsova," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1992, no. 12, 1993, no. 1, no. 3, no. 4, no. 6, no. 7, no. 10.

———. "S ispanskimi moriakami v natsional'no-revoliutsionnoi voine." In Pod znamenem ispanской respubliki: vospominaniia sovetskikh dobrovol'tsev-uchastnikov. Moscow: Nauka, 1965.

———. "Voenno-morskoi flot nakanune Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1965, no. 9: 59–76.

———. Krutyie povoroty: iz zapisok admiral. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1995.

———. Na dalekom meridiane: vospominaniia uchastnika natsional'no-revoliutsionnoi voiny v Ispanii. Moscow: Nauka, 1988.

———. Nakanune: kursom k pobede. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1991.

———. Nakanune. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1966, 1969.

Kuznetsova, M. V. "Esli zavtra voina: oboronnye fil'my 1930-x godov," Istoriia i khudozhnik, 2005, no. 2: 17–26.

Kuznetsova, P. "Nachalo voiny he bylo 'gromoi s iasnogo neba': iz zapisok Admirała flota Sovetskogo Soiuza Kuznetsova N. G.," Pravda, July 20, 1991.

Kvashonkin, A. V., ed. Bol'shevitskoe rukovodstvo: perepiska, 1912–1927. Moscow: Rosspen, 1996.

———. Sovetskoe rukovodstvo: perepiska, 1928–1941. Moscow: Rosspen, 1999.

Lacouture, Jean. Léon Blum. Paris: Seuil, 1977.

Lakoba, Nestor A. Stalin i Khashim. Sukhum: Abpartizdat, 1934.

———. Or VI k VII s'ezdu sovetov ASSR Abkhazii. Sukhum: Abpartizdat, 1935.

Lakoba, Stanislav "History: 1917–1989." In The Abkhazians, edited by George Hewitt. Richmond, UK: Curzon, 1999.

———. "Ia Koba, a ty Lakoba." In Moe serdse v gorakh: ocherki o sovremennoi Abkhazii, edited by Fasil Iskander. Ypskhar Ol: Izd-vo Mariiskogo poligrafkombinata, 2001, 50–78.

Lammers, Donald N. "The Second Labour Government and the Decision and the Restoration of Relations with Soviet Russia (1929)," Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research, 37 (1964): 60–72.

Landau, Zbigniew, and Jerzy Tomaszewski, eds. Monachium 1938: polskie dokumenty dyplomatyczne. Warsaw: Państwowe Wydawn. Naukowe, 1985.

- Land of Socialism Today and Tomorrow: Reports and Speeches at the Eighteenth Congress . . . March 10–21, 1939. The Moscow: Foreign Language Publishing House, 1939.
- Laney, Frank M. "The Military Implementation of the Franco-Russian Alliance, 1890–1914." PhD diss. University of Virginia, 1954.
- Lang, David Marshall. A Modern History of Soviet Georgia. New York: Grove Press, 1962.
- Lang, Lucy Roberts. Tomorrow Is Beautiful. New York: Macmillan, 1948.
- Langer, William L. The Undeclared War, 1940–1941. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953.
- , and S. Everett Gleason. The Challenge to Isolation, 1937–1940. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953.
- Laquer, Walter, and Richard Breitman. Breaking the Silence. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1986.
- Larina, Anna. Nezabyvaemoe. Moscow: APN, 1989.
- . This I Cannot Forget: The Memoirs of Nikolai Bukharin's Widow. New York: W. W. Norton, 1993.
- Laroche, Jules. La Pologne de Pilsudski: Souvenirs d'un ambassade 1926–1935. Paris: Flammarion, 1953.
- Larson, Erik. In the Garden of Beasts: Love, Terror, and an American Family in Hitler's Berlin. New York: Crown, 2011.
- Lasky, Melvin. "The Hitler-Stalin Pact: Secret Documents from Nuremberg Give New Light on Agreement," New Leader, Nov. 30, 1946.
- Lassner, Alexander N. "The Invasion of Austria in March 1938: Blitzkrieg or Pfusch?" In Contemporary Austrian Studies, vol. 8, edited by Günter Bischof et al. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction, 2000, 447–86.
- Latyshhev, Anatolii G. "I eshche odin tost 'vozhdia narodov,'" Iskusstvo kino, 1991, no. 5: 141–2.
- . "Riadom so Stalinym," Sovershenno sekretno, 1990, no. 12.
- . "Stalin i kino." In Surovaia drama narodov: uchenye i publitsisty o prirode stalinizma, edited by Iu. P. Senokosov. Moscow: Politizdat, 1989.
- Lauchlan, Iain. Russian Hide-and-Seek: The Tsarist Secret Police in St. Petersburg, 1906–1914. Helsinki: Suomalainen Kirjallisuuden Seura/Finnish Literature Society, 2002.
- Lawford, Valentine. Bound for Diplomacy. London: John Murray, 1963.
- Lawlor, Sheila. Churchill and the Politics of War 1940–1941. New York: Cambridge University, 1994.
- Layne, Christopher. "Security Studies and the Use of History: Neville Chamberlain's Grand Strategy Revisited," Security Studies, 17/3 (2008): 397–437.
- Lazitch, Branko. "Stalin's Massacre of the Foreign Communist Leaders." In The Comintern, Historical Highlights: Essays, Recollections, Historical Documents, edited by M. N. Drachkovitch and Branko Lazitch. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution, 1996, 139–74.
- L. B., "'Tain kremliia' bol'she ne budet?" Novoe vremia, 1994, no. 50.
- Leach, Barry A. German Strategy against Russia, 1939–1941. Oxford: Clarendon, 1973.
- Lebedev, N. A. Shchukin—akter kino. Moscow: Goskinoizdat, 1944.
- Lebedev, V. "Praviashchaia partiia ostavalas' podpol'noi," Istchnik, 1993, no. 5–6: 88–95.
- Lebedev, V. A. "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" Voenno-istoricheskii arkhiv, 1997, vyp. 1: 149–55, 1998, vyp. 2: 3–81.
- Lebedeva, Natalia S., and M. M. Narinskii, eds. Komintern i vtoraiia mirovaia voina. Moscow: Pamiatniki istoricheskoi mysli, 1994.
- , et al., eds. Katyn': plenniki neob'iavlennoi voiny. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratia, 1997.
- Lebedeva, Natal'ia S. Katyn': prestuplenie protiv chelovechestva. Moscow: Progress/Kul'tura, 1994.
- Lebedeva, V. "O snose khrama Khrista Spasitelia," Literaturnaia Rossiia, Nov. 27, 1932.
- Lebina, Natalia B. Povsednevnaia zhizn' sovetskogo goroda: normy i anomalii 1920–1930 gody. St. Petersburg: Letnyi sad, 1999.
- , and M. V. Shkarovskii. Prostitutsiia v Peterburge. Moscow: Progress-Akademiia, 1994.
- Lec, Stanisław Jerzy. Unkempt Thoughts. New York: St. Martin's, 1962.
- Lechik, M. "'Vo frantsuzsko-pol'sko-rossiiskom treugol'nike, 1922–1934." In Sovetsko-pol'skie otnosheniia v politicheskikh usloviakh 30-kh godov XX stoletia, edited by E. Durachinskii and A. N. Sakharov. Moscow: Nauka, 2001, Ledovskii, Andrei. M. SSSR i Stalin v sud'bach Kitaia: dokumenty i svдетельstva uchastnika sobytii, 1937–1952. Moscow: Pamiatniki istoricheskoi mysli, 1999.

———. “Zapiski diplomata,” Problemy Dal'nego Vostoka, 1991, no. 1: 108–18.

———, R. Mirovitskaia, and V. Miasnikov, eds. Russko-kitaiskie otnosheniia v XX veke. 5 vols. Moscow: Rossiiskaia akademiia nauk, 2000.

Lee, Chong-Sik. Revolutionary Struggle in Manchuria. Berkeley: University of California, 1983.

Leggett, George. Cheka, Lenin's Secret Police: The All-Russian Extraordinary Commission for Combating Counter-Revolution and Sabotage, December 1917 to February 1922. Oxford: Clarendon, 1981.

Leibovich, O. L., ed. “Vkliuchen v operatsiiu”: Massovyi terror v prikam'e 1937–38 gg. Perm': Permskii gosudarstvennyi tekhnicheskii universitet, 2006.

Leibovich, Oleg, et al. “Vkliuchen v operatsiiu”: massovyi terror v Prikam'e v 1937–1938 gg., 2nd ed. Moscow: Rossen, 2009.

Leibzon, Boris M., and Kirill K. Shirinia. Povorot v politike kominterna: istoricheskoe znachenie VII kongressa Komintern. 2nd ed. Moscow: Mysl', 1975.

Leitz, Christian. “Nazi Germany Intervention in the Spanish Civil War and the Foundation of HISMA/ROWAK.” In The Republic Besieged: Civil War in Spain, 1936–1939, edited by Paul Preston and Ann L. Mackenzie. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University, 1996, 53–85.

———. Economic Relations between Nazi Germany and Franco's Spain 1936–1945. Oxford: Oxford University, 1996.

Leksin, Iu. “Khochetsia dumat', chto ia ne obryval sviaz' vremeni,” Znanie-sila, Feb. 1988.

Le'l'chuk, Vitalii S. “Beseda I. V. Stalina s angliiskim pisatelem G. Uellsom: dokumenty, interpretatsiia, razmyshleniia.” In Istoricheskaia nauka na rubezhe vekov, edited by A. A. Fursenko. Moscow: Nauka, 2001, 326–52.

———, and Efim I. Pivovarov. “Mentalitet sovetskogo obshchestva i ‘kholodnaia voina,’” Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1993, no. 6: 63–78.

Lemin, I. “Novyi etap voyny v Evrope,” Mirovoe khoziaistvo i mirovaia politika, 1940, no. 4–5.

Lenin, V. I. Pol'noe sobranie sochinenii [PSS]. 5th ed. 55 vols. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1958–65. Cited as PSS (author understood).

———. Polnoe sobranie sochinenii. 19 vols. Moscow-Leningrad, 1925–1933.

Leningradskii martirolog, 1937–1938. 5 vols. St. Petersburg: Rossiiskaia natsional'naia biblioteka, 1995–.

Lenoe, Matthew E. The Kirov Murder and Soviet History. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2010.

Lensen, George A. Japanese Recognition of the USSR: Japanese Recognition of the USSR 1921–1930. Tallahassee, FL: Diplomatic Press, 1970.

———. The Damned Inheritance: The Soviet Union and the Manchurian Crises, 1924–1935. Tallahassee, FL: Diplomatic Press, 1974.

Leonard, Royal. I Flew for China: Chiang Kai-shek's Personal Pilot. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1942.

Leonhard, Wolfgang. Betrayal: The Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939. New York: St. Martin's, 1989.

Leonov, Nikolai S. Likholete. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1995.

Lerner, Warren. Karl Radek: The Last Internationalist. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 1970.

Les Evénements survenus en France de 1933 à 1945: Témoignages et documents. 9 vols. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1951–2.

Leskov, Valentin. Stalin i zagovor Tukhachevskogo. Moscow: Veche, 2003.

“Letopis' stroitel'stva sovetskikh vooruzhennykh sil 1931 god (mai–iiul’),” Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1977, no. 4: 122–3.

Letopis' zhizni i tvorchestva A. M. Gor'kogo. 4 vols. Moscow: Izdatel'stvo Akademii Nauk SSSR, 1958–60.

Letter of an Old Bolshevik. New York: Rand School, 1937.

Leushin, Maksim E. “Staliniada,” Istochnik, 2002, no. 1: 103–6.

———. “Ia davno uzhe ostavil sei greshnyi mir': pis'ma Stalina s togo sveta,” Istochnik, 2003, no. 2: 33–5.

- . “Schitaiu nizhe svoego dostoinstva . . .”: fragment zapisi besedy I. V. Stalina s E. Liudigom, Istoricheski arkhiv, 1998, no. 3: 216–17.
- Levgur, M. Obliazannosti komсомolsta. Moscow: Novaia Moskva, 1924.
- Levine, Herbert S. “The Mediator: Carl J. Burckhardt’s Efforts to Avert a Second World War,” Journal of Modern History, 45/3 (1973): 439–55.
- Levushin, M. A. “Dokumenty VKP (b) kak istochnik po istorii istoricheskoi nauki v SSSR: 1945–1955 gg.” PhD diss. Moscow, 2000.
- Levy, James P. Appeasement and Rearmament: Britain, 1936–1939. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2006.
- Lewin, Moshe. “Bureaucracy and the Stalinist State.” In Stalinism and Nazism: Dictatorships in Comparison, edited by Ian Kershaw and Moshe Lewin. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1997, 53–74.
- . “Grappling with Stalinism.” In The Making of the Soviet System: Essays in the Social History of Interwar Russia. New York: Pantheon/New Press, 1985, 1994, 286–314.
- . “Stalin in the Mirror of the Other.” In Stalinism and Nazism: Dictatorships in Comparison, edited by Ian Kershaw and Lewin. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1997, 107–34.
- . “The Disappearance of Planning in the Plan,” Slavic Review, 32/3 (1973): 271–87.
- . Russia/USSR/Russia: The Drive and Drift of a Super State. New York: The New Press, 1995.
- . Russian Peasants and Soviet Power: A Study of Collectivization. New York: W. W. Norton, 1968.
- . The Making of the Soviet System: Essays in the Social History of Interwar Russia. New York: Pantheon/New Press, 1985, 1994.
- Lewis, R. A. “Innovation in the USSR: The Case of Synthetic Rubber,” Slavic Review, 38/1 (1979): 48–59.
- Lewis, Robert. “Foreign Economic Relations.” In The Economic Transformation of the Soviet Union, 1913–1945, edited by Robert W. Davies et al. New York: Cambridge University, 1994, 198–215.
- . “Technology and the Transformation of the Soviet Economy.” In The Economic Transformation of the Soviet Union, 1913–1945, edited by Robert W. Davies et al. New York: Cambridge University, 1994, 182–97.
- Leyda, Jay. Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film. London and New York: Macmillan, 1960.
- , and Zina Voynow. Eisenstein at Work. New York: Pantheon, 1982.
- Liachenko, B. P. “Tak proletelo sorok let . . .” In Iurii Levitan: 50 let u mikroфона, edited by V. M. Vozchikov. Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1987.
- Liaschenko, P. N. “S ognem i krov’iu popolam,” Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1995, no. 2: 22–8.
- Liddell-Hart, B. This Expanding War. London: Faber and Faber, 1942.
- Liebich, André. “I Am the Last—Memories of Bukharin in Paris,” Slavic Review, 51/4 (1992): 767–81.
- . From the Other Shore: Russian Social Democracy after 1921. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1997.
- Li-fu, Chen. The Storm Clouds Clear Over China: The Memoir of Ch’en Li-fu, 1900–1992. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution, 1994.
- Lih, Lars T. “Melodrama and the Myth of the Soviet Union.” In Imitations of Life: Two Centuries of Melodrama in Russia, edited by Louise McReynolds and Joan Neuberger. Durham, NC: Duke University, 2002, 178–207.
- , Oleg V. Maumov, and Oleg V. Khlevniuk, eds. Stalin’s Letters to Molotov, 1925–1936. New Haven, CT, and London: Yale University, 1995.
- Likhachev, D. S. Reflections on the Russian Soul: A Memoir. Budapest and New York: Central European University, 2000.
- Likholobova, Z. G. Stalinskii totalitarnyi rezhym ta politychni represii kintsia 30-kh rokiv v Ukraïni: perevazhno na materialakh Donbasu. Donetsk: DonDU, 1996.
- . Totalitarnyi rezhym ta politychni represii v Ukraïni u druhii polovyni 1930-kh rokiv: perevazhno na materialakh Donetskoho rehionu. Donetsk: Donetskyy natsional’nyi universytet, 2006.
- Linz, Juan, and Alfred Stepan, eds. The Breakdown of Democratic Regimes. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University, 1978.
- Lipinsky, Jan. Das geheime Zusatzprotokoll zum deutsch-sowjetischen Nichtangriffsvertrag vom 23. August 1939 und seine Entstehungs- und Rezeptionsgeschichte von 1939 bis 1989. Frankfurt am Main and New York: Lang, 2004.

- Lisann, Maury. "Stalin the Appeaser," Survey, 76 (1970): 57–60.
- Lisovskii, P. A. SSSR i kapitalisticheskoe okruzenie. Moscow: Politcheskaiia literatura, 1939.
- Liszewski, K. Polsko-sowiecka wojna 1939 g. London: Polski fundusz kultury, 1986.
- Litovskii, O. "Korol' Lir," Pravda, Feb. 27, 1935.
- . "Zhivoi Shekspir," Sovetskii teatr, 1935, no. 4.
- Little, Douglas. Malevolent Neutrality: The United States, Great Britain, and the Origins of the Spanish Civil War. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1985.
- Litvin, Alter L. Bez prava na mysl': istorik v epokhu bol'shogo terrora—oчерk sudeb. Kazan: Tatarskoe knizhnoe izdatel'stvo, 1994.
- , ed. Men'shevistskii protsess 1931 goda: sbornik dokumentov. 2 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 1999.
- Litvin, E. Iu. "Chto zhe nam delat'?" (Pis'ma k A.N. Tol'stomu—deputatu Verkhovnomu Sovetu SSSR)." In Zvenia: Istoricheskie al'manakh. 2 vols. Moscow: Progress/Feniks/Atheneum, 1991, 505–27.
- Litvinov, Maxim M. Notes for a Journal. New York: William Morrow, 1955.
- Livi-Bacci, Massimo. "On the Human Costs of Collectivization in the Soviet Union," Population and Development Review, 19/4 (1993): 743–66.
- Lkhamsuren, B., ed. Oчерki istorii Mongol'skoi narodno-revolutsionnoi partii, 3rd ed. Moscow: Politizdat, 1971.
- Loginov, Vladimir. Teni Stalina: General Vlasik i ego soratniki. Moscow: Sovremennik, 2000.
- Long, Breckinridge. The War Diary of Breckinridge Long: Selections from the Years 1939–1944. Lincoln: University of Nebraska, 1966.
- Longerich, Peter. Die braunen Battallione: die Geschichte der SA. Munich: C. H. Beck, 1989.
- . Goebbels: A Biography. New York: Random House, 2015.
- Lopatin, P. I. Volga idet v Moskvu. Moscow: Partizdat, 1937.
- Lordkipanidze, V. "Ubiistvo Kirova," Argumenty i fakty, 1989, no. 6: 5–6.
- Losev, Viktor, and Lidia Ianovskaia, eds. Dnevnik Eleny Bulgakovoi. Moscow: Knizhnaia palata, 1990.
- Lota, Vladimir. "Alia" protiv "Barbarossy": kak byli dobyty svedeniia o podgotovke Germanii k napadeniiu na SSSR. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 2004.
- . Sekretnyi front General'nogo shtaba: kniga o voennoi razvedke, 1940–1942. Moscow: Molodaia Gvardiia, 2005.
- Lovell, Stephen. Russia in the Microphone Age: A History of Soviet Radio 1919–1970. New York: Oxford University, 2015.
- . Summerfolk. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 2003.
- Low, Alfred D. The Anschluss Movement, 1931–1938, and the Great Powers. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs, 1985.
- Low, David. Years of Wrath. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1946.
- Lozhechko, A. B. Grigorii Kaminskii. Moscow: Politizdat, 1966.
- Luckyj, George S. N. Literary Politics in the Soviet Ukraine, 1917–1934. Durham, NC: Duke University, 1990.
- Ludendorff, Erich. Kriegsführung und Politik. Berlin: Mittler und Sohn, 1922.
- Lugovskaia, Nina. The Diary of a Soviet Schoolgirl, 1932–1937. Moscow: Glas, 2003.
- Lukačs, Gyorgy. "Roman kak burzhuaznaia epopeia." In Literaturnaia entsiklopediia, edited by A. V. Lunacharskii. 11 vols. Moscow: Kommunisticheskaiia akademiia, 1929–91.
- Lukacs, John. Five Days in London, May 1940. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1999.
- . The Duel, 10 May–31 July 1940: The Eighty-Day Struggle between Churchill and Hitler. New York: Ticknor & Fields, 1991.
- . The Hitler of History. New York: Knopf, 1997.
- Lukes, Igor. "Stalin and Beneš at the End of September 1938: New Evidence from the Prague Archives," Slavic Review, 52/1 (1993): 28–48.
- . "Stalin and Czechoslovakia in 1938–39: an Autopsy of a Myth," Diplomacy and Statecraft, 10/2–3 (1999): 13–47.

- . “The Czechoslovak Partial Mobilization in May 1938: a Mystery (almost) Solved,” Journal of Contemporary History, 31/4 (1996): 699–720.
- . Czechoslovakia between Hitler and Stalin: The Diplomacy of Edvard Beneš in the 1930s. New York: Oxford University, 1996.
- . On the Edge of the Cold War: American Diplomats and Spies in Postwar Prague. New York: Oxford University, 2012.
- Luk'ianov, A., ed. “Massovye repressii opravdany byt' ne mogut,” Istochnik, 1995, no. 1: 117–32.
- Luk'ianova, Irina. Kornei Chukovskii. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 2006.
- Lunacharskaia-Rozenel', Natal'ia. Pamiat' serdtsa. Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1962, 1965, 1975.
- Lunacharskii, Anatolii V. Osvobozhdenyi Don Kikhot. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1922.
- . Sobranie sochinenii: literaturavedenie, kritika, estetika. 8 vols. Moscow: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1963–67.
- Lungu, Dov B. “Nicolae Titulescu and the 1932 Crisis Concerning the Soviet-Romanian Pact of Non-Aggression,” East European Quarterly, 18/2 (1984): 185–213.
- Lurie, V. M., and V. Ia. Kochik. GRU: dela i liudi. Moscow: Olma, 2003.
- Luzianin, S. G. “Rossiia-Mongoliia-Kitai: vneshnepoliticheskie otnosheniia v 1911–1946 gg.,” PhD diss. Moscow, 1997.
- Lyandres, S. “Russkii pisatel' ne mozhet zhit' bez rodiny,” Voprosy literatury, 1966, no. 9: 134–9.
- Lyons, Eugene, ed. Six Soviet Plays. London: V. Gollancz, 1935.
- . “Stalin Laughs!” Time, December 1, 1930.
- . “Stalin Urges U.S. Trade with Soviet in His Only Interview in Four Years,” New York Herald Tribune, Nov. 24, 1930.
- . “Stalin, Autocrat of all the Russias,” American Mercury, 48 (Oct. 1939): 238–43.
- . Assignment in Utopia. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1937.
- . Moscow Carrousel. New York: Knopf, 1935.
- . Stalin: Czar of All the Russias. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1940.
- MacDonald, C. A. “Economic Appeasement and the German ‘Moderates,’ 1937–1939: an Introductory Essay,” Past and Present, 56 (1972): 105–31.
- Mace, James E. “The Man-made Famine of 1933 in the Soviet Ukraine: What Happened and Why?” In Famine in Ukraine, 1932–1933, edited by Roman Serbyn and Bohdan Krawchenko. Edmonton: Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, 1986, 67–83.
- Machiavelli, Niccolò. Gosudar'. St. Petersburg: Tiplen, 1869.
- . The Discourses of Niccolò Machiavelli. London and New York: Routledge, 1975.
- MacKiewicz, Stanisław. Colonel Beck and His Policy. London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1944.
- MacKinnon, Stephen R. “The Tragedy of Wuhan, 1938,” Modern Asian Studies, 30/4 (1996): 931–43.
- . Wuhan, 1938: War, Refugees, and the Making of Modern China. Berkeley: University of California, 2008.
- Maclean, Fitzroy. Escape to Adventure. Boston: Little, Brown, 1950.
- MacNeal, Robert H. “Stalin's Family: A Commentary on Svetlana Alliluyeva's Memoirs,” Russian Review, 27/1 (1968), 78–86.
- . “Trotskyist Interpretations of Stalinism.” In Stalinism: Essays in Historical Interpretation, edited by Robert C. Tucker. New York: W. W. Norton, 1977, 30–52.
- . Stalin: Man and Ruler. Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1988.
- Madajczyk, Czesław. Die Okkupationspolitik Nazi-Deutschlands in Polen, 1939–1945. Cologne: Pahl-Rugenstein Verlag, 1989.
- Maddux, Thomas R. Years of Estrangement: American Relations with the Soviet Union, 1933–1941. Tallahassee: University Presses of Florida, 1980.
- Magerovsky, Eugene. “The People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs, 1917–1946.” 2 vols. PhD diss. New York: Columbia University, 1975.

- Mahoney, Barbara S. Dispatches and Dictators: Ralph Barnes for the Herald Tribune. Corvallis: Oregon State University, 2002.
- Main, Steven. The Red Army and the Future War in Europe, 1925–1940. Camberley, Surrey: Conflict Studies Research Centre, 1997.
- Maiolo, Joseph A. “Anglo-Soviet Naval Armaments Diplomacy before the Second World War,” English Historical Review, 123/501 (2008): 351–78.
- . “Armaments Competition.” In The Origins of World War Two: The Debate Continues, edited by R. Boyce and Maiolo. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003, 286–307.
- . Cry Havoc: How the Arms Race Drove the World to War, 1931–1941. New York: Basic Books, 2010.
- . The Royal Navy and Nazi Germany, 1933–39: A Study in Appeasement and the Origins of the Second World War. New York: St. Martin’s, 1998.
- Maiskii, Ivan M. Bernard Shou i drugie: vospominaniia. Moscow: Iskustvo, 1967.
- . Dnevnik diplomata: London, 1934–1943. 2 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 2006–9.
- . Iz vospominanii o Bernarde Shou i Gerberte Uellshe. Moscow: Idz-vo “Pravda,” 1973.
- . Vospominaniia soetskogo diplomata 1925–1945. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1971.
- Maitsky, Ivan M. Memoirs of a Soviet Ambassador: The War, 1939–43. New York: Scribner, 1967.
- . Spanish Notebooks. London: Hutchinson, 1966.
- Makarova, N. N. “Stalin i ‘blizhnyi krug’: printsipy rotatsii erzats-elity (1934–1939).” In Problemy Rossiiskoi istorii, Moscow-Magnitogorsk, 2007, 294–314.
- Makaseev, Boris. “Iz khroniki geroicheskoi respubliki.” In My internatsionalisty: vospominaniia soetskikh dobrovol'tsev-uchastnikov natsional'no-revoliutsionnoi voiny v Ispanii. 2nd ed. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1986, 158–64.
- Maksimenkov, Leonid. “Kul’t: zametki o slovakh v soetskoi politicheskoi kul’ture,” Svobodnaia mysl’, 1993, no. 11: 28–9.
- , ed. Bol’shaia tsenzura: pisateli i zhurnalisty v Srrane Sovetov 1917–1956. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratiiia-Materik, 2005.
- . “Ocherki nomenklaturnoi istorii soetskoi literatury, 1932–1946: Stalin, Bukharin, Zhdanov, Shcherbakov i drugie,” Voprosy literatury, 2003, no. 4: 212–58.
- . Sumbur vmesto muzyki: stalinskaia kul’turnaia revoliutsiia, 1936–1938. Moscow: Iuridicheskaiia kniga, 1997.
- Maksimovskii, V. N. “Ideia diktatury u Makiavelli,” Istoriik Marksist, 1929, no. 13: 55–94.
- Maksudov, M. “Geografiia goloda 1933 goda,” in SSSR: vnutrennie protivorechiia. 22 vols. New York and Benson, VT: Chaldize, 1981–8, VII: 5–17.
- . “Ukraine’s Demographic Losses, 1927–1938.” In Famine in Ukraine, 1932–1933, edited by Roman Serbyn and Bohdan Krawchenko. Edmonton: Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, 1986, 27–43.
- Maksudov, Sergei. “Migratsii v SSSR v 1926–1939 godakh,” Cahiers du monde russe, 40/4 (1999): 770–96.
- Malefakis, E. E. “La revolución social.” In La guerra de España, 1936–1939. Madrid: Taurus, 1996.
- Malenkov, Andrei G. O moem otse Georgii Malenkov. Moscow: Technoekos, 1992.
- Malkov, N. “Charlie Chaplin i Dunaevskii,” Rabochii i teatr, 1936, no. 16: 18–29.
- Mallett, Robert. “Fascist Foreign Policy and Official Italian Views of Anthony Eden in the 1930s,” The Historical Journal, 43/1 (2000): 157–87.
- . Mussolini and the Origins of the Second World War. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 2003.
- Malnick, Bertha. Everyday Life in Russia. London: George G. Harrap, 1938.
- Malyshev, V. A. “Dnevnik narkoma. ‘Proidet desiatok let, i eti vstrechi ne vosstanovish’ uzhe v pamiati,” Istcchnik, 1997, no. 5: 103–47.
- Mamaeva, Tat’iana. “Vasily Stalin, ‘ia zhiv, poka zhiv otets,’” Business online, Oct. 29, 2013.
- Mandelstam, Nadezhda. Hope against Hope: A Memoir. New York: Atheneum, 1970.

- Manfred Zeidler, "German-Soviet Economic Relations during the Hitler-Stalin Pact." In From Peace to War, edited by Bernd Wegner. Oxford, UK: Berghahn, 1997.
- Manikovskii, Aleksei A. Boevoe snabzhenie russkoi armii v mirovuiu voinu. Moscow: Gos. voennoe izd-vo narkomata oborony Soiuz SSSR, 1937.
- Mannerheim, Carl G. The Memoirs of Marshal Mannerheim. London: Cassell, 1953.
- Manninen, O. "Moshchnoe sovetское nastuplenie." In Zimnaia voina 1939–1940, edited by Oleg A. Rzhevskii and Olli Vehviläinen. 2 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 1998, I: 324–35.
- . "Vystreli byli," Rodina, 1995, no. 12: 56–7.
- , and N. I. Baryshnikov, "Peregovory osen'iu 1939 goda." In Zimnaia voina 1939–1940, edited by Oleg A. Rzhevskii and Olli Vehviläinen. 2 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 1998, I: 113–30.
- Manning, Roberta T. "Government in the Soviet Countryside in the Stalinist Thirties: The Case of Belyi Raion in 1937," Carl Beck Papers, University of Pittsburgh, Center for Russian and East European Studies, no. 301 (1984).
- . "The Rise and Fall of 'the Extraordinary Measures,' January-June 1928: Towards a Reexamination of the Onset of the Stalin Revolution." Carl Beck Papers, University of Pittsburgh, Center for Russian and East European Studies, no. 1504 (2001).
- Manuel, Caballero. Latin America and the Comintern, 1919–1943. New York: Cambridge University, 1986.
- Manuilsky, D. Z. The Communist Parties and the Crisis of Capitalism. London: Modern Books, 1931.
- Margolin, Victor. "Stalin and Wheat: Collective Farms and Composite Portraits," Gastronomica: the Journal of Food and Culture, 3/2 (2003): 14–6.
- Mar'iamov, Grigorii B. Kremlevskii tsenzor: Stalin smotrit kino. Moscow: Kinoteatr, 1992.
- Markevich, Andrei. "How Much Control is Enough? Monitoring and Interventions in the Stalinist Command Economy," Europe-Asia Studies, 63/8 (2011): 1449–68.
- , and Andrei Sokolov. "Magnitka bliz Sadovogo kol'tsa": stimuli k rabote na moskovskom zavode 'Serp i Molot,' 1883–2001. Moscow: Rosspen, 2005.
- Markova, Liliana. "Litso vraga." In Kino: politika i liudi, 30-e gody, edited by L. Mamatova. Moscow: Materik, 1995, 79–99.
- Markovich, R. M. O Staline: kratkii ukazatel' literatury. Moscow, 1939.
- Marshkova, Tat'iana. Bol'shoi teatr: zolotyie golosa. Moscow: Algoritm, 2011.
- Martel, Giffard. The Russian Outlook. London: M. Joseph, 1947.
- Martel, Gordon, ed. The Times and Appeasement: The Journals of A. L. Kennedy, 1932–1939. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 2000.
- Martelli, George. Italy Against the World. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Co., 1938.
- Martin, Bemd. Friedensinitiativen und Machtpolitik im Zweiten Weltkrieg, 1939–42. Dusseldorf: Droste, 1974.
- Martin, Terry. The Affirmative Action Empire: Nations and Nationalism in the Soviet Union, 1923–1939. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 2001.
- Marwick, Arthur. "Problems and Consequences of Organizing Society for Total War." In Mobilization for Total War: the Canadian, American, and British Experience, 1914–1918, 1939–1945, edited by Nándor F. Dreisziger. Waterloo, Ontario: Wilfrid Laurier University, 1981.
- Marx, Harpo, with Rowland Barber. Harpo Speaks! New York: B. Geis Associates, 1961.
- Marx, Karl, and Friedrich Engels. The Russian Menace to Europe. Glencoe, IL: The Free Press, 1952.
- . The Civil War in France. Chicago: Kerr, 1998. Originally published London: E. Trulove, 1871.
- . The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Napoleon. New York: International Publishers, 1926.
- Marykhuba, Igor', ed. Moskovskie arkhivnye dokumenty ob Abkhazii XX veka. Sukhumi: Akua, 2008.
- Maser, Werner. Der Wortbruch: Hitler, Stalin und der Zweite Weltkrieg. 4th ed. Munich: Heyne, 1997.
- . Hitlers Mein Kampf: Entstehung, Aufbau, Stil, Änderungen, Quellen, Quellenwert, kommentierte Auszüge. Munich, Bechtle, 1966.
- Maslov, M. A. Rokovoi istrebitel' Chkalova: samaia strashnaia aviakatastrofa Stalinskoi epokhi. Moscow: Iauza-EKSMO, 2010.

- Maslov, N. N. "'Kratkii kurs istorii VKP (b)'—Entsiklopediia kul'ta lichnosti," Voprosy istorii KPSS, 1988, no. 11: 51–67.
- . "I. V. Stalin o 'Kratkom kurse istorii VKP (b),' " Istoricheskie arkhivy, 1994, no. 5: 4–32.
- Maslov, Sergei. Kolkhoznaia Rossiia. Berlin: Krestianskaia Rossiia, 1937.
- Maslov, Vasilii, and Nikolai Chistiakov. "Stalinskie repressii i sovskaia iutitsiia," Kommunist, 1990, no. 10: 102–12.
- Mason, Timothy W. Arbeiterklasse und Volksgemeinschaft: Dokumente und Materialien zur deutschen Arbeiterpolitik, 1936–1939. Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1975.
- . Nazism, Fascism, and the Working Class: Essays by Tim Mason. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1995.
- Massell, Gregory J. The Surrogate Proletariat: Moslem Women and Revolutionary Strategies in Soviet Central Asia, 1919–1929. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1974.
- Massing, Hede. This Deception. New York: Duell, Sloan and Pearce, 1951.
- Mastenitsa, E. N. "Iz istorii muzeinoi pushkiniany, 1937 g." In Peterburgskaia pushkiniana, edited by Pavel A. Podbolotov. St. Petersburg: SpbGUKI, 2000, 113–20.
- Mastny, Vojtech. Russia's Road to the Cold War: Diplomacy, Warfare, and the Politics of Communism, 1941–1945. New York: Columbia University, 1979.
- "Materialy marto-fevral'skogo plenuma TsK VKP (b) 1937 goda," Voprosy istorii, 1992, no. 2–3: 3–44, no. 4–5: 3–36, no. 6–7: 3–29, 8–9: 3–29, no. 3–36, 11–12: 3–19; 1993, no. 2: 3–33, no. 5: 3–23, no. 6: 3–30, no. 7: 3–24, no. 8: 3–26, no. 9: 3–32, no. 10: 3–27; 1994, no. 1: 12–28, no. 2: 3–23, no. 8: 3–29, no. 10: 3–27, no. 12: 3–29; 1995, no. 1: 3–22, no. 2: 3–26, no. 3: 3–15, no. 4: 3–18, no. 5–6: 3–24, no. 7: 3–25, no. 8: 3–25, no. 10: 3–28, no. 11–12: 3–23; in slightly fuller form, on the Internet: www.memo.ru/history/1937/feb_mart_1937/index.html.
- Materialy ob'edinenного plenuma TsK i TsKK VKP (b), 7–12 ianvaria, 1933 g.* Moscow: Partizdat, 1933.
- Matossian, Mary Kilbourne. The Impact of Soviet Policies on Armenia. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 1962.
- Matveev, Oleg, and Vladimir Merzhliakov. "Akademik kontrrazvedki," Nezavisimoe voennoe obozrenie, 2001, no. 15.
- Mawdsley, Evan. "An Elite within an Elite: Politburo/Presidium Membership under Stalin, 1927–1953." In The Nature of Stalin's Dictatorship: The Politburo, 1924–1953, edited by E. A. Rees. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- . "Crossing the Rubicon: Soviet Plans for Offensive War, 1940–41," International History Review, 25/4 (2003): 818–65.
- May, Ernest R. Strange Victory: Hitler's Conquest of France. New York: Hill and Wang, 2001.
- Mayling, Soong. Sian: A Coup D'etat. Shanghai: Chine Publishing Company, 1937.
- Mazower, Mark. Inside Hitler's Greece: The Experience of Occupation, 1941–44. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2001.
- McCannon, John. Red Arctic: Polar Exploration and the Myth of the North in the Soviet Union, 1932–1939. New York: Oxford University, 1998.
- McDermott, Kevin. "Stalinist Terror in the Comintern: New Perspectives," Journal of Contemporary History, 30/1 (1995): 111–30.
- . Stalin: Revolutionary in an Era of War. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.
- , and Jeremy Agnew. The Comintern: A History of International Communism from Lenin to Stalin. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1996.
- McDonogh, Giles. 1938: Hitler's Gamble. New York: Basic, 2009.
- McDonough, Frank. Neville Chamberlain, Appeasement and the British Road to War. New York: Manchester University, 1998.
- McKee, Ilse. Tomorrow the World. London: Dent, 1960.
- McKercher, B. J. C. "Deterrence and the European Balance of Power: The Field Force and British Grand Strategy, 1934–1938," English Historical Review, 123/500 (2008): 98–131.
- McLellan, David, ed. Karl Marx: Interviews and Recollections. New York: Macmillan, 1981.

- McMurry, Dean Scott. Deutschland und die Sowjetunion, 1933–1936: Ideologie, Machtpolitik und Wirtschaftsbeziehungen. Cologne-Vienna: Böhlau, 1979.
- McNeal, Robert H. Stalin: Man and Ruler. New York: New York University, 1988.
- McNeill, William H. Arnold J. Toynbee: A Life. New York: Oxford University, 1989.
- McSherry, James E. Stalin, Hitler, and Europe. 2 vols. Cleveland, OH: World Publishing Co., 1968–70.
- McSmith, Andy. Fear and the Muse Kept Watch. New York: New Press, 2015.
- Mearsheimer, John J. Conventional Deterrence. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1983.
- . The Tragedy of Great Power Politics. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.
- Medlicott, W. N. Britain and Germany: The Search for Agreement 1930–1937. London: Athlone, 1969.
- Medvedev, Roi, and Zhores Medvedev. Neizvestnyi Stalin. Moscow: Vremia, 2007.
- . “O lichnoi otvestvennosti Stalina za terror 1937–1938 gg.” In Vozhd', khoziain, diktator, edited by A. M. Razumikhin. Moscow: Patriot, 1990, 289–330.
- . “O Staline i stalinizme,” Znania, 1989, no. 1: 159–209, no. 2: 174–222, no. 3: 144–92, no. 4: 166–2024.
- . “Smert' Nadezhdy Alliluevoi,” Leninskoe znanie, June 28, 1991.
- . Blizhnyi krug Stalina: sotratniki vozhdia. Moscow: Eskmo, 2005.
- . K sudu istorii: Genezis i posledstviia stalinizma. New York: Knopf, 1974.
- Medvedev, Roy. “How the Short Course Was Created,” Russian Politics and Law, 43/3 (2005): 69–95.
- . All Stalin's Men. Oxford: Blackwell, 1986.
- . Let History Judge: The Origins and Consequences of Stalinism. New York: Columbia University, 1989.
- . Nikolai Bukharin: The Last Years. New York: W. W. Norton, 1980.
- . On Stalin and Stalinism. Oxford and New York: Oxford University, 1979.
- Medvedeva, Irina. “‘Chornoye leto’ 1939 goda.” In Sergei Prokof'ev: vospominaniia, pisma, stat'i, edited by M. P. Rakhmanova. Moscow: Deka-VS, 2004, 318–66.
- Meehan, Patricia. The Unnecessary War: Whitehall and the German Resistance to Hitler. London: Sinclair-Stevenson, 1992.
- Meerovich, A. “V narkomindele, 1922–1939: interv'iu s E. A. Gnedinyam,” Pamiat': istoricheskii sbornik, 1981–82, vyp. 5: 357–93.
- Megrelidze, I. V. Isif Orbeli, 2nd ed. Tbilisi: Metsniereba, 1987.
- Mehring, Hans. Die NSDAP als politische Auslese Organisation. Munich: Deutscher Volksverlag, 1938.
- Meissner, Otto. Staatssekretär unter Ebert, Hindenburg, Hitler: der Schicksalsweg des deutschen Volkes von 1918–1945, wie ich ihn erlebte. Hamburg: Hiffman und Kampe, 1950.
- Melikov, Vladimir A. Geroicheskaiia oborona Tsaritsyna. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1938.
- Melkonian, Eduard. “Repressions in 1930s Soviet Armenia,” Caucasus Analytical Digest, no. 22 (2010): 6–9.
- Mel'tiukhov, Mikhail I. “‘Narodnyi front’ dlia Finliandii? K voprosu o tseliakh sovetskogo rukovodstva v voine s Finliandiei 1939–1940 gg.,” Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1993, no. 3: 95–101.
- . 17 September 1939: Sovetsko-pol'skie konflikt, 1918–1939. Moscow: Veche, 2009.
- . Sovetsko-pol'skie voiny: voenno-politicheskoe protivostoianie 1918–1939 gg. Moscow: Veche, 2001, and Moscow: Eksmo, 2004.
- . Upushchennyi shans Stalina: Sovetskii Soiuz i bor'ba za Evropu, 1939–1941: dokumenty, fakty, suzheniia. Moscow: Veche, 2000.
- Melzer, Emanuel. No Way Out: The Politics of Polish Jewry, 1935–1939. Cincinnati, OH: Hebrew Union College, 1997.
- Memuary freiliny imperatritsy: tsarskaia sem'ia, Stalin, Beria, Cherkhill' i drugie v semeinykh dnevnikhakh trekh pokolenii*. Moscow: Artel', 2013.
- Menning, Bruce W. “Sovetskie zheleznye dorogi i planirovanie voennykh desitvii: 1941 god.” In Voina i politika, 1939–1941, edited by A. O. Chubar'ian. Moscow: Nauka, 1999.
- . “Soviet Railroads and War Planning,” unpublished manuscript.

- . "Soviet Strategy," In The Cambridge History of the Second World War, edited by Ewan Mawdsley et al. 3 vols. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 2015, I: 213–44.
- . Bayonets before Bullets: The Imperial Russian Army, 1861–1914. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1992.
- Menshevik Trial: The Text of the Indictment of the Counter-Revolutionary Menshevik Organization: The Trial of the All-Union Bureau of the Central Committee of the Counter-Revolutionary Menshevik Party*. The. Workers Library Publishers, 1931.
- Menzel, J. M. "German-Japanese Relations during the War, 1939–1945." PhD diss. University of Chicago, 1957.
- Meretskoy, Kirill A. "Ukrepnenie severo-zapadnykh granits SSSR," Voprosy istorii, 1968, no. 9: 120–9.
- . Na sluzhbe narodu: stranitsy vospominanii. 4th ed. Moscow: Vysshaya shkola, 1984.
- . Na sluzhbe narodu: stranitsy vospominanii. Moscow: Politizdat, 1968.
- . Serving the People: A Memoir. Moscow: Progress, 1971.
- Merl, Stephan. "Entfachte Stalin die Hungersnot von 1932–1933 zur Auslöschung des ukrainischen Nationalismus?" Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas, 37/4 (1989): 569–90.
- . Bauern unter Stalin: die Formierung des sowjetischen Kolchosystems 1930–1941. Berlin: Duncker und Humblot, 1990.
- Merridale, Catherine. "The 1937 Census and the Limits of Stalinist Rule," Historical Journal, 39/1 (1996): 225–40.
- . "The Reluctant Opposition: The Right 'Deviation' in Moscow, 1928," Soviet Studies, 41/3 (1989): 382–400.
- . Moscow Politics and the Rise of Stalin: The Communist Party in the Capital, 1925–32. New York: St. Martin's, 1990.
- Merritt, Steven Edward. "The Great Purges in the Soviet Far East, 1937–1938." PhD diss. University of California, Riverside, 2000.
- Mertsalov, A. N., and L. A. Mertsalova. Stalinizm i voina: iz neprochitannykh stranits istorii (1930–1990-e). Moscow: Rodnik, 1994.
- Meshcheriakov, M. T. "Sovetskii Soiuz i antifashistskaia voina ispanskogo naroda 1936–1939," Istoriia SSSR, 1988, no. 1: 22–40.
- . "SSSR i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1993, no. 3: 83–95.
- Metzmacher, Helmuth. "Deutsch-Englische Ausgleichbemühungen in Sommer 1939," Verteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte, 14/4 (1956): 369–412.
- Meyer, Georg, ed. Generalfeldmarschall Wilhelm Ritter von Leeb: Tagebuchaufzeichnungen und Lagebeurteilungen aus zwei Weltkriegen. Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1976.
- Meysztowicz, Jan. Czas przeszły dokonany: wspomnienia ze służby w Ministerstwie Spraw Zagranicznych w latach 1932–1939. Warsaw: Instytut Prasy i Wydawn Novum, 1989.
- Mezhdunarodnaia vstrecha, posviashchennaia 30-letiiu VIII kongressa Koninterny, Praga, 21–23 oktiabria 1965 g.* Moscow: Mir i sotsializm, 1966.
- Mezhdunarodnoe polozhenie i ugroza novoi voiny*. Rostov-na-Donu: Literatura, 1931.
- Mezhdunarodnyi kongress pisatelei v zaschitu kul'tury, Parizh, 1935*. Moscow: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1936.
- Mgeladze, Akaki. Stalin, kakim ia ego znal: stranitsy nedavnogo proshlogo. Tbilisi: [s.n.], 2001.
- Michalka, Wolfgang. Ribbentrop und die deutsche Weltpolitik, 1933–1940: Aussenpolitische Konzeptionen und Entscheidungsprozesse im Dritten Reich. Munich: W. Fink, 1980.
- Middlemas, Keith, and John Barnes. Baldwin: A Biography. New York: Macmillan, 1969.
- Mif, Pavel. "Tol'ko Sovety moguy spasti Kitai," Bol'shevik, 1934, no. 7: 56–69.
- Mikhailov, A. D. Gor'kii i R. Rollan: perepiska 1916–1936. Moscow: Nasledie, 1995.
- Mikhailov, N., and Vladimir Naumov. "Skol'ko delegatov XVII s'ezda partii goslovalo protiv Stalina?" Izvestiia TsK KPSS, 1989, no. 7: 114–21.
- Mikhalev, S. N. Voennaia strategii: podgotovka i vedenie voyn novogo i noveishego vremeni. Moscow: Kuchkovo pole, 2003.

- Mikhoels, Solomon. "Moia rabota nad 'Korolem Lirom.'" In Mikhoels: stat'i, besedy, rechi. Moscow: Iskustvo, 1964, 94–123.
- Mikhutina, Irina V. "SSSR glazami pol'skikh diplomatov, 1926–1931 gg.," Voprosy istorii, 1993, no. 9: 45–58.
- . Sovetsko-pol'skie otnosheniia, 1931–1935. Moscow: Nauka, 1977.
- Mikoian, A. I. "V pervyi raz bez Lenina," Ogonek, Dec. 12–9, 1989.
- . Feliks Dzerzhinskii. Moscow: Partizdat, 1936.
- . Pishchevaia promyshlennost' Sovetskogo Soiuza: vtoraiia sessia TsIK Soiuza SSSR, VII sozyva. Moscow: TsIK, 1936.
- . Problema snabzheniia strany i rekonstruktsiia narodnogo khoziaistva: rechi' na III plenumе MK VKP (b). Moscow: Moskovskii rabochii, 1929.
- . Tak bylo: razmysleniia o minuvshem. Moscow: Vargrius, 1999.
- . V polose velikogo pod'ema: rechi' na pervom Vsesoiuznogo soveshchaniі rabochikh i rabotnits stakhanovtsev. Voronezh, 1935.
- Mikoian, Nami. S liubov'iu i pechal'iu: vospominaniia. Moscow: Terra, 1998.
- . Svoimi glazami. Moscow: Kukushka, 2003.
- Mikulicz, Sergiusz. Prometeizm w polityce II Rzeczypospolitej. Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1971.
- Miličević, Vladeta. A King Dies in Marseilles: The Crime and Its Background. Bad Godesberg, Germany: Hohwacht, 1959.
- Millar, James R. "Mass Collectivization and the Contribution of Agriculture to the First Five Year Plan," Slavic Review, 33/4 (1974): 750–66.
- , and Alec Nove. "A Debate on Collectivization: Was Stalin Really Necessary?" Problems of Communism, 25/4 (1976): 49–62.
- Miller, Edward S. Bankrupting the Enemy: The U.S. Financial Siege of Japan before Pearl Harbor. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute, 2007.
- Miller, Jamie. Soviet Cinema: Politics and Persuasion under Stalin. London: I. B. Tauris, 2010.
- Miller, Margaret S. The Economic Development of Russia, 1905–1914. London: P. S. King and Son, 1926.
- Miller, Robert F. One Hundred Thousand Tractors: The MTS and the Development of Controls in Soviet Agriculture. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1970.
- Millman, Brock. "Toward War with Russia: British Naval and Air Planning for Conflict in the Near East, 1939–1940," Journal of Contemporary History, 29/2 (1994): 261–84.
- Mills, W. C. "The Chamberlain-Grandi Conversations of July–August 1937 and the Appeasement of Italy," International History Review, 19/3 (1997): 594–619.
- Millward, James A. Eurasian Crossroads: A History of Xinjiang. New York: Columbia University, 2007.
- Milne, Leslie. Mikhail Bulgakov: A Critical Biography. New York: Cambridge University, 1990.
- Milosz, Czeslaw. Native Realm: A Search for Self-Definition. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1968.
- Milovidov, A. "Velikii grazhdanin," Pravda, Feb. 17, 1938.
- Milson, John. Russian Tanks, 1900–1970: The Complete Illustrated History of Soviet Armoured Theory and Design. Harrisburg, PA: Stackpole, 1971.
- Milton, Sybil. "The Expulsion of Polish Jews from Germany, October 1938 to July 1939: a Documentation," Leo Baeck Institute Yearbook, 29 (1984): 169–99.
- Minaev, V. Podryvnaia deiatel'nost' inostrannykh razvedok v SSSR. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1940.
- Minakov, S. T. 1937: zagovor byl! Moscow: Iauza-Press, 2012.
- . Sovetskaia voennaia elita 20-kh godov: sostav, evoliutsiia, sotsiokul'turnye, osobennosti i politicheskaia rol'. Orel: Orelizdat, 2000.
- . Voennaia elita 20–30-kh godov XX veka. Moscow: Russkoe slovo, 2004.
- . Za otvoroim marshal'skoi shineli. Orel: Orelizdat, 1999.
- Minchenok, Dimitri. Isaak Dunaevskii: bol'shoi konsert. Moscow: Olimp, 1998.
- . "Nestor i ten'," Ogonek, November 23, 2003.

- Mindlin, Emilii L. Neobyknovennye sobesedniki: kniga vospominanii. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1968.
- Miner, Steven Merritt. Between Churchill and Stalin: The Soviet Union, Great Britain, and the Origins of the Grand Alliance. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina, 1998.
- Mirkina, A. D., and V. S. Iarovikov, eds. Marshal Zhukov: polkovodets i chelovek. 2 vols. Moscow: APN, 1988.
- Mironenko, S. V., et al., eds. Moskovskii Kreml': tsitadel' Rossii. Moscow: VVP, 2008.
- Mironov, N. P. "Vosstanovlenie i razvitie Leninskikh printsipov sotsialisticheskoi zakonnosti (1953–1963 gg.)." Voprosy istorii KPSS, 1964, no. 2: 17–41.
- Mirskii, D. S. Istoriia russkoi literatury s drevneishikh vremen po 1925 god. London: Overseas Publications Interchange Ltd., 1992.
- Mishima, Yasuo, and Tomio Goto. A Japanese View of Outer Mongolia. New York: Institute of Pacific Relations, 1942.
- Mitzner, Piotr. "Widmo POW," Karta, 1993, no. 11: 21–3.
- Mlechin, Leonid. KGB, predsedateli organov bezopasnosti: rassekrechenye sud'by. 3rd ed. Moscow: Tsentrpoligraf, 2005.
- "Moe poslednee slovo na sude, veroiatno, budet moim poslednim solovom voobshche': kto i kak pravil rech' N. I. Bukahrina," Istochnik, 1996, no. 4: 78–92.
- Moiseev, Igor' A. Ia vospominaiu: gastroi' dlinnoiu v zhizni'. 2nd ed. Moscow: Soglasie, 1996.
- Molok, Iu. A. Pushkin v 1937 g.: materialy i issledovaniia po ikonografii. Moscow: NLO, 2000.
- Molotov, V. M. O pod'eme sel'skogo khoziaistva i kolhoznom stroitel'stve: rech' na III Vseukrainskoi konferentsii K.P.(b)U, 8 iuliia 1932 g. Moscow: Partizdat, 1932.
- . Stat' i rechi, 1935–1936. Moscow: Partizdat, 1937.
- . V bor'be za sotsializm: rechi i stat'i. Moscow: Partizdat, 1934, 2nd ed, 1935.
- . Velikaia druzhba narodov SSSR. Moscow: Partizdat, 1936.
- Mommen, André. Stalin's Economist: The Economic Contributions of Jenő Varga. London and New York: Routledge, 2011.
- Mommsen, Hans. "Der Reichstagbrand und sein politischen Folgen," Vierteljahreshefte für Zeitgeschichte, 12/4 (1964): 350–413.
- . "Hitler's Position in the Nazi System." In From Weimar to Auschwitz. New York: Oxford University, 1991, 163–88.
- . "Hitler's Reichstag Speech of 30 January 1939," History and Memory, 9/1–2 (1997): 147–61.
- . "The Reichstag Fire and Its Political Consequences." In Republic to Reich: The Making of the Nazi Revolution, edited by Hajo Holborn. New York: Pantheon, 1972, 129–222.
- Monakov, Mikhail. "Zachem Stalin stroil okeanskii flot?" Morskoi sbornik, 1998, no. 12: 74–9.
- Montefiore, Simon Sebag. Stalin: Court of the Red Tsar. London: Weidenfeld, 2003.
- Moore, Barrington. Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy: Lord and Peasant in the Making of the Modern World. Boston: Beacon Press, 1966.
- . Soviet Politics—the Dilemma of Power: The Role of Ideas in Social Change. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1950.
- Moorhouse, Roger. Killing Hitler: The Plots, The Assassins, and the Dictator Who Cheated Death. New York: Bantam, 2006.
- Moradiellos, Enrique. "The British Government and General Franco during the Spanish Civil War." In Spain in an International Context, edited by Christian Leitz and David J. Dunthorn. New York: Berghahn, 1999, 41–53.
- . "The Origins of British Non-Intervention in the Spanish Civil War: Anglo-Spanish Relations in Early 1936," European History Quarterly, 21/3 (1991): 339–64.
- Moravec, František. Master of Spies: The Memoirs of General František Moravec. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1975.
- Moritz, Erhard, ed. Fall Barbarossa: Dokumente zur Vorbereitung der faschistischen Wehrmacht auf die Aggression gegen die Sowjetunion (1940/41). Berlin: Deutscher Militärverlag, 1970.
- Morley, James W., ed. Deterrent Diplomacy: Japan, Germany, and the USSR 1935–1940. New York: Columbia University, 1976.

- Morozov, Stanislav V. Pol'sko-Chekhoslovatskie otnosheniia, 1933–1939: chto skryvalos' za politikai "ravnoudalennosti" ministra Iu. Beka. Moscow: Moskovskii universitet, 2004.
- Morrell, Gordon W. Britain Confronts the Stalin Revolution: Anglo-Soviet Relations and the Metro-Vickers Crisis. Waterloo: Wilfrid Laurier University, 1995.
- Morrison, Simon, ed. Sergey Prokofiev and His World. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 2008.
- . The People's Artist: Prokofiev's Soviet Years. New York: Oxford University, 2009.
- Morukov, Iu. N., ed. Velikaia Otechestvennaia voina 1941–1945 gg. kampanii i strategicheskie operatsii v tsifrakh. 2 vols. Moscow: Obedinennaia redaktsiia MVD Rossii, 2010.
- “Moskovskii dnevnik Romena Rollanda,” Voprosy literatury, 1989, no. 3: 190–246.
- Mosley, Leonard. On Borrowed Time: How World War II Began. New York: Random House, 1969.
- Mosse, George L. The Nationalization of the Masses: Political Symbolism and Mass Movements in Germany from the Napoleonic Wars through the Third Reich. New York: New American Library, 1975.
- Mozokhin, O. B. Pravo na represii. Moscow: Kuchkovo pole, 2006.
- Mozokhin, Oleg. VChK-OGPU: na zaschite ekonomicheskoi bezopasnosti gosudarstva i v bor'be s terrorizmom. Moscow: Eksmo, 2004.
- , and Teodor Gladkov. Menzhinskii: intelligent s Lubianki. Moscow: Iauza, 2005.
- Mueller, K. J. Das Heer und Hitler: Armee und nationalsozialistisches Regime 1933–1940. Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1969.
- Mueller-Hildebrand, Burkhart. Sukhoputnaia armiiia Germanii 1933–1945 gg. Moscow: Eksmo, 2002.
- Muggeridge, Malcolm, ed. Ciano's Diplomatic Papers. London: Odhams Press, 1948.
- . Chronicles of Wasted Time. London: Collins, 1972.
- . Ciano's Diary: 1939–1943. London: Heinemann, 1947.
- Mugleston, W. F. “Hindus, Maurice Gerschon (1891–1969),” Dictionary of American Biography, supplement 8, edited by John A. Garraty. New York: Scribner's, 1988, 260–1.
- Mukhin, Iurii. “Amtorg: amerikanskii sled v sovetskoi oborone,” Poligon, 2000, no. 3: 34–41, no. 4: 37–53.
- Müller, Rolf-Dieter. Das Tor zur Weltmacht: die Bedeutung der Sowjetunion für die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Rüstungspolitik zwischen den Weltkriegen. Boppard am Rhein: Harald Boldt, 1984.
- Muratov, V. “Shest' chasov s I.V. Stalinyim v Kremle,” Neva, 1993, no. 7: 280–8.
- , and Iu. Gorodetskaia. Komandarm Lukin: povest'. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1990.
- Murin, Iurii G. “Kak fal'sifitsirovalos' ‘delo Bukharina,’” Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1995, no. 1: 61–70.
- . “‘Prosti, menia, Koba . . .’: neizvestnoe pis'mo N. Bukharina,” Istochnik, 1993, no. 0: 23–5.
- . “Nakanune 22 iunია 1941 g.: neopublikovannoe interv'iu marshala Sovetskogo Soiuza A. M. Vasilevskogo” [Dec. 6, 1965], Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1992, no. 6: 3–11.
- . Iosif Stalin v ob"iatiakh sem'i: iz lichnogo arkhiva. Moscow: Rodina, 1993.
- , ed. Pisatel' i vozhda', perepiska M.A. Sholokhova s I.V. Stalinyim: sbornik dokumentov iz lichnogo arkhiva I.V. Stalina. Moscow: Raritet, 1997.
- Murphy, David E. What Stalin Knew: The Enigma of Barbarossa. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2005.
- Murray, John. Politics and Place Names: Changing Names in the Late Soviet Period. Birmingham, UK: Department of Russian University of Birmingham, 2000.
- Murray, Nora. I Spied for Stalin. New York: W. Funk, 1951.
- Murray, Williamson. The Change in the European Balance of Power, 1938–1939. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1984.
- Musial, Bogdan. Stalins Beutezug: die Plünderung Deutschlands und der Aufstieg der Sowjetunion zur Weltmacht. Berlin: Propyläen, 2010.
- Mussolini, Benito. Opera Omnia. 35 vols. Edited by Edoardo Susmel and Duilio Susmel. Florence: La Fenice, 1951–1962.
- . Scritti e discorsi. 12 vols. Milan: Hoepli, 1934–1939.

- Muza, Anna. "The Tragedy of a Russian Woman: Anna Karenina in the Moscow Art Theater, 1937," Russian Literature, 65/4 (2009): 467–506.
- Mydans, Carl. More than Meets the Eye. New York: Harper, 1959.
- Nabokov, Vladimir. "Russian Writers, Censors, Readers." In Nabokov: Lectures on Russian Literature, edited by Fredson Bowers. New York: HBJ, 1981, 12–8.
- . Tyrants Destroyed and Other Stories. New York: McGraw Hill, 1975.
- . "Nachalo razgroma profdvizheniia: dnevnik B. G. Kozoleva, 1927–1930 gg.," Istoricheskii arkhiv, 1997, no. 1: 115–51.
- Naida, Sergei F. Bor'ba finskogo naroda za svoe osvobodzhenie. Moscow-Leningrad: Voenno-morskoe izdatel'stvo, 1939.
- Nair, A. M. An Indian Freedom Fighter in Japan. New Delhi: Vikas, 1985.
- Nakamura, Yasushi. "Did the Soviet Command Economy Command Money? A Quantitative Analysis," Europe-Asia Studies, 63/7 (2011): 1133–56.
- Namier, Lewis. "From Vienna to Versailles." In Conflicts: Studies in Contemporary History. London: Macmillan, 1942, 1–18.
- . In the Nazi Era. London: Macmillan, 1952.
- Naporko, Aleksandr G., et al., eds. Zheleznodorozhnyi transport v gody industrializatsii SSSR, 1926–1941. Moscow: Transport, 1970.
- Na prieme u Stalina: tetradi (zhurnaly) zapisei lits, priniatykh I.V. Staliny: 1924–1953 gg.* Moscow: Novyi khronograf, 2008.
- Narkiewicz, Olga A. The Making of the Soviet State Apparatus. Manchester: Manchester University, 1970.
- Narochnitskii, A. L. "Sovetsko-ugoslavskii dogovor 5 aprilia 1941 g. o družbe i nenapadenii (po arkhivnym materialam)," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1989, no. 1: 3–19.
- Narodnoe khoziaistvo SSSR za 70 let*. Moscow: Finansy i statistika, 1987.
- Narodno-khoziaistvennyi plan 1936: chetvertyi god vtoroi piatiletki*. 2nd ed. Moscow: Gosplan SSSR, 1936.
- Naszkowski, Marian. Nesпокоinye dni: vospominaniia o tridsatykh godakh. Moscow: Inostrannaia literatura, 1962.
- Naumov, Leonid A. Bor'ba v rukovodstve NKVD, 1936–1938 gg.: oprichnyi dvor Iosifa Gрозnogo. Moscow: Sputnik, 2004.
- . Stalin i NKVD. Moscow: Yauza-Eksmo, 2007.
- Naumov, V. P. Laurentii Beriia, 1953: dokumenty. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratii, 1999.
- . 1941 god: uroki i vyvody. 2 vols. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratii, 1998.
- , et al., eds. Georgii Zhukov: stenogramma oktiabrskogo (1957 g.) plenuma TsK KPSS i drugie dokumenty. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratii, 2001.
- Naylor, John F. A Man and an Institution: Sir Maurice Hankey, the Cabinet Secretariat and the Custody of Cabinet Secrecy. New York: Cambridge University, 2009.
- Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression*. 8 vols., with 2 suppl. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946–48.
- "'Naznachit' revoliutsiiu v Germanii na 9 noiabria'," Istochnik, 1995, no. 5: 115–39.
- Nechkina, M. V., ed. Istoriia SSSR. 2 vols. Moscow: Gosudarstvennoe sotsial'no-Ekonomicheskoe izdatel'stvo, 1940.
- "'Ne chuvstvovat' za soboiu topot': M. M. Litvinov o svoei okhrane," Istochnik, 1996, no. 5: 123–4.
- Neilson, Keith. Britain and the Last Tsar: British Policy towards Russia, 1894–1917. Oxford: Clarendon, 1995.
- . Britain, Soviet Russia, and the Collapse of the Versailles Order, 1919–1939. New York: Cambridge University, 2006.
- "'Neizmennyi drug'—eto obiazvaet . . . : pis'ma O. I. Sobalevoi-Mikhail'tsevoi," Istochnik, 1998, no. 3: 113–8.
- Nekrasov, V. F., ed. Beria: konets kar'ery. Moscow: Politizdat, 1991.
- Nekrich, Alexander M. "The Dynamism of the Past." In Operation Barbarossa, edited by Joseph L. Wiczynski. Salt Lake City: Charles Schlacks Jr., 1993, 228–40.
- . "The Soviet German Treaty of August 1939," Russian Research Center, Harvard University, May 18, 1977.

- . 1941, 22 iuinia. 2nd ed. Moscow: Pamyatniki istoricheskoi mysli, 1995.
- . "June 22, 1941": Soviet Historians and the German Invasion. Columbia: University of South Carolina, 1968.
- . Patriahs, Partners, Predators: German-Soviet Relations 1922–1941. New York: Columbia University, 1997.
- Neumann, Franz L. Behemoth: The Structure and Practice of National Socialism. London: Victor Gollancz, 1942.
- Nevakivi, Jukka. "The Soviet Union and Finland after the War, 1944–1953." In The Soviet Union and Europe in the Cold War, 1943–1953, edited by Francesca Gori and Silvio Pons. London: Macmillan, 1996, 89–105.
- Nevezhin, Vladimir A. "Bol'shie Kremlevskie priemy Stalina (1930–c—nachalo 1940-x gg.)." Otechestvennaia istoriia, 2005, no. 3: 56–70, no. 4: 123–39.
- . "Dve direktivy 1941 g.: o propagandistskoi podgotovke SSSR k voine." In Arkheograficheskii ezhegodnik za 1995 god. Moscow: Nauka, 1997, 191–207.
- . "Pol'sha v sovetskoi propagande 19389–1945 gg." In Rossiia i vneshnyi mir: dialog kul'tur, edited by Iurii S. Borisov et al. Moscow: Akademiiia nauk SSSR, 1997, 69–88.
- . "Sobiralsia li Stalin nastupat' v 1941 g. (Zametki na poliakh 'Ledokola' V. Suvorova)." Kentavr, 1995, no. 1: 76–85.
- . "Sovetskaia politika i kul'turnye sviazi s Germaniei, 1939–1941 gg." Otechestvennaia istoriia, no. 1 (1993): 18–34.
- . Sindrom nastupatel'noi voyny: sovetskakia propaganda v preddverii 'sviaschennykh boev', 1939–1941 gg. Moscow: AIRO-XX, 1997.
- . Zastol'ia iostifa Stalina: bol'shie kremlevskie priemy 1930–1940-x gg. Moscow: Novyi khronograf, 2011.
- . Zastol'nye rechi Stalina: dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: AIRO-XX, 2003.
- Neville, Peter. "A Prophet Scorned? Ralph Wigram, the Foreign Office and the German Threat, 1933–36." Journal of Contemporary History, 40/1 (2005): 41–54.
- . "Nevol'niki v rukakh germanskogo reiskhvera": rech' I. V. Stalina v Narkomate oborony." Istochnik, 1994, no. 3: 72–88.
- Newman, Simon. March 1939: The British Guarantee to Poland. Oxford: Clarendon, 1976.
- Niclauss, Karlheinz. Die Sowjetunion und Hitlers Machtergreifung: eine Studie über die deutsch-russischen Beziehungen der Jahre 1929 bis 1935. Bonn: Röhrscheid, 1966.
- Nicolaevsky, Boris. "The Kirov Assassination." The New Leader, August 23, 1941.
- . Power and the Soviet Elite. New York: Praeger, 1965.
- Nielsen, Jens Petter. Miliukov i Stalin: o politicheskoi evoliutsii P.V. Miliukova v emigratsii (1918–1943). Oslo: Universitetet i Oslo, Slavisk-Baltisk Institutt, 1983.
- Nikolaevich, S. "Poslednii seans, ili sud'ba beloi zhenshchiny v SSSR," Ogonek, 1992, no. 4.
- Nikolaevskii, Boris. "Dal'stroi: sovetskaia katorga v Kolymskom krae." Sotsialisticheskii vestnik, Dec. 10, 1945.
- . Tainnye stranitsy istorii. Moscow: Izdatel'stvo gumanitarnoi literatury, 1995.
- Nikulin, Lev. Tukhachevskii: biograficheskii ocherk. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1963.
- . Tukhachevskii: biograficheskii ocherk. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1964.
- Noakes, Jeremy, and Jeffrey Pridham, eds. Nazism, 1919–1945: A Documentary Reader. 4 vols. Exeter: University of Exeter, 1983–98.
- . "No ia to znaiu, chto ty prav": pis'mo N. I. Bukharina I. V. Stalinu iz vnutrennei tiur'my NKVD." Istochnik, 2000, no. 3: 46–58.
- Nolte, Ernst. "Diktatur." In Geschichtliche Grundbegriffe: historisches Lexikon zur politisch-sozialen Sprache in Deutschland, edited by Otto Brunner et al. 8 vols. Stuttgart: E. Klett, 1972–97.
- . Der europäische Bürgerkrieg 1917–1945: Nationalsozialismus und Bolschewismus. Frankfurt-am-Main: Ullstein, 1987.
- Nord, Lidiia A. "Marshal Tukhachevskii," Vozrozhdenie, 66 (1957).
- . Marshal Tukhachevsky. Paris: Lef, 1978.
- Nord, Philip G. France 1940. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2015.

- Nordlander, David J. "Magadan and the Evolution of the Dal'stroi Bosses in the 1930s," Cahiers du monde russe, 42/2–3–4 (2001): 649–65.
- . "Magadan and the Economic History of Dal'stroi in the 1930s." In The Economics of Forced Labor: The Soviet Gulag, edited by Paul R. Gregory and Valery Lazarev. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution, 2003.
- Norling, Nicklas. "Myth and Reality: Politics in Soviet Uzbekistan." PhD diss. Johns Hopkins University, 2014.
- Novak, George, ed. The Case of Leon Trotsky: Reports of Hearings on the Charges Made against Him in the Moscow Trials. New York: Merit, 1968.
- Nove, Alec. "The Peasants, Collectivization, and Mr. Carr," Soviet Studies, 10/4 (1958–9): 384–9.
- . "Was Stalin Really Necessary?" Encounter, April 1962: 86–92.
- . An Economic History of the USSR, 1917–1991. 3rd ed. London and New York: Penguin Books, 1992.
- . An Economic History of the USSR. 2nd ed. London: Penguin Books, 1989.
- . An Economic History of the USSR. London: Allen Lane, 1969.
- . Stalinism and After: The Road to Gorbachev. 3rd ed. London: Allen, Unwin, 1989.
- . Was Stalin Really Necessary? Some Problems of Soviet Political Economy. New York: Praeger, 1964.
- Novikov, M. V. SSSR, Komintern i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii: 1936—1939 gg. 2 vols. Iaroslavl: Iaroslavskii pedagogicheskii universiteta, 1997.
- Novikov, Nikolai V. Vospominaniia diplomata: zapiski 1938–1947. Moscow: Politizdat, 1989.
- Novikova, Lidiia. "Obruchennyi s bogom." In Ivan Kozlovskii: vospominaniia, stat'i. Moscow: Natalis, Ripol Klassik, 2005.
- Novobranets, Vasily Andreevich. "Nakanune voiny," Znamia, 1990, no. 6: 165–92.
- Nowak, Robert. "Von der Karpatenukraine zum Karpatenland," Zeitschrift für Geopolitik, 16/5 (1939): 313–32.
- "Nuzhen li nam ermitazh," Istochnik, 1999, no. 1: 106–10.
- Obi, Toshito. Zoruge jiken. 4 vols. Tokyo: Misuzu shobō, 1962–71.
- "Ochen' vysoko tsenit t. Beria," Istochnik, 1996, no. 3: 163–5.
- Ocherki istorii kommunisticheskoi partii Armenii*. Yerevan: Aiasan, 1967.
- Ocherki istorii kommunisticheskoi partii Azerbaidzhana*. Baku: Azerbaidzhanskoe gosizdat, 1963.
- Ocherki istorii kommunisticheskoi partii Latvi*. 2 vols. Riga: Latviiskoe gosizdat, 1965.
- O'Connor, Timothy E. Diplomacy and Revolution: G. V. Chicherin and Soviet Foreign Affairs 1918–1930. Ames: Iowa University, 1988.
- "O dele tak nazyvaemom 'Moskovskom tsentre,'" Izvestiia TsK KPSS, 1989, no. 7: 65–85.
- Odom, Anne, and Wendy Salmond, eds. Treasures into Tractors: The Selling of Russia's Cultural Heritage, 1918–1938. Washington, D.C.: Hillwood Estate, 2009.
- Official Documents Concerning Polish-German and Polish-Soviet Relations, 1933–1939*. London: Hutchinson, 1940.
- Ogata, Sadako N. Defiance in Manchuria: The Making of Japanese Foreign Policy, 1931–1932. Berkeley: University of California, 1964.
- Ohayon, Isabelle. La sedentarisation des Kazakhs dans l'URSS de Staline. Paris: Maisonneuve et Larose, 2006.
- Oja, Matt F. "From Krestianka to Udarnitsa: Rural Women and the Vydvizhenie Campaign, 1933–1941," Carl Beck Papers, University of Pittsburgh, Center for Russian and East European Studies, no. 1203 (1996).
- Okhotin, N. G., and A. Roginskii. "Iz istorii 'nemetskoj operatsii' NKVD 1937–1938 gg." In Nakazannyi narod: represii protiv rossiiskikh nemtsev, edited by I. L. Shcherbakova. Moscow: Zvenia, 1999, 35–75.
- Oleinikov, S. "Chetvertoe maia," Pravda, November 7, 1935.
- "O nakoplenii nachal'stvuiushchego sostava Raboche-Krest'ianskoi Krasnoi Armii," Izvestiia TsK KPSS, 1990, no. 1: 177–89.
- Oppenheim, Samuel A. The Practical Bolshevik: A. I. Rykov and Russian Communism, 1881–1938. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution, 1979.
- Oprishchenko, A. L. Istoriografiia sotsialisticheskogo sorenovaniia rabocheho klassa SSSR. Kharkov: Vishcha shkola, 1975.
- Ordzhonikidze, G. K. Stat'i i rechi. 2 vols. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1956–7.

- Ordzhonikidze, Z. G. O Sergo Ordzhonikidze: vospominaniia, ocherki, stat'i sovremennikov. Moscow: Politizdat, 1981.
- Orlov, Alexander. Tainaia istoriia stalinskikh prestuplenii. New York: Vremia i my, 1983.
- . The Secret History of Stalin's Crimes. New York: Random House, 1953.
- Orlov, B. M. "V poiskakh soiznukov: komandovanie Krasnoi Armii i problemy vneshnei politiki SSSR v 30-x godakh," Voprosy istorii, 1990, no. 4: 40–53.
- Orlov, I. B., and M. D. Kressova. "Inostrannyi turizm v SSSR v kontse 1920–x-nachale 1930–x godov: problemy stanovleniia 'Freemen Industry.'" In Problemy istorii servisa: zdoravookhranenie, kul'tura, dosug, edited by Iu. A. Poliakov. Moscow: Moskovskii universitet servisa, 2004, 159–69.
- Orlov, V. M. "Rech' tov V. M. Orlova na Chrezvychainom VIII Vsesiuiznom S"ezde Sovetov (28 noiabria 1936 g.)," Morskoi sbornik, 1936, no. 12: 8–9.
- Orlov, Vladimir. "Prokofiev and the Myth of the Father of Nations: The Cantata Zdravitsa," Journal of Musicology, 30/4 (2013): 577–620.
- Orlova, Raisa D. Memoirs. New York: Random House, 1983.
- . Vospominaniia o neprosbedshem vremeni. Moscow: Slovo, 1993.
- Orlovsky, Daniel T. The Limits of Reform: The Ministry of Internal Affairs in Imperial Russia, 1802–1881. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1981.
- Orlov, Dietrich. The History of the Nazi Party. 2 vols. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh, 1969, 1973.
- Orwell, George. Homage to Catalonia. Reprint ed. London: Martin Secker & Warburg, 1984.
- Orynianskii, A. A. Sovetskaia Abkhazii: putevoditel' po Abkhazii. Sukhumi: Izdanie ekskursionnogo biuro pri glavpolitprosvete A.S.S.R. Abkhazii, 1930, 1932, 1935.
- Osborn, Patrick R. Operation Pike: Britain versus the Soviet Union, 1939–1941. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2000.
- Oskolkov, Evgenii N. Golod 1932/1933: khlebozagotovki i golod 932/1933 g. v Severo-Kavkavskom krae. Rostov-na-Donu: Rostovskii universitet, 1991.
- . "Osnovnaia tsel' ego priezda: otchetny sotrudnikov VOKSa o prebyvanii v SSSR deiateli nauk i kultury Velikobritanii, 1934–1936 gg.," Istoricheskii arkhiv, 1996, no. 3: 134–35.
- . Osnovnoi zakon (konstitutsiia) Sovetskoi Sotsialisticheskoi Respubliki Gruzii. Tiflis: NKIU SSRG, 1926.
- Osokina, Elena A. "Economic Disobedience under Stalin." In Contending with Stalinism, edited by Lynne Viola. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 2002, 170–200.
- . Ierarkhiia potrebleniia: o zhizni liudei v usloviakh stalinskogo snabzheniia, 1928–1935 gg. Moscow: Izdatel'stvo MGU, 1993.
- . Za fasadom "stalinskogo izobilii": raspredelenie i rynek v snabzhenii naseleniia v gody industrializatsii 1927–1941. Moscow: Rosspen, 1997.
- . Zoloto dlia industrializatsii: Torgsin. Moscow: Rosspen, 2009.
- Ostrovskii, Aleksandr V. Kto stoial za spinoi Stalina? Moscow: Tsentropoligraf-Mim Delta, 2004.
- "O tak nazyvaemom 'antisovetskom ob'edinennom trotskistsko-zinov'evskom tsentre,'" Izvestiia TsK KPSS, 1989, no. 8: 78–115.
- "O tak nazyvaemom 'parallel'nom antisovetskom trotskistskom tsentre,'" Izvestiia TsK KPSS, 1989, no. 9: 30–50.
- Ovchinnikov, A. G., et al., eds. Krasnoznamennyi belorusskii voennii okrug. Minsk: Belarus, 1973.
- Overly, Richard J. "Germany and the Munich Crisis: A Mutilated Victory?" Diplomacy and Statecraft, 10/2–3 (1999): 191–215.
- . "Strategic Intelligence and the Outbreak of the Second World War," War in History, 5/4 (1998): 451–80.
- . 1939: Countdown to War. London: Allen Lane, 2009.
- . Göring: Hitler's Iron Knight. London and New York: I. B. Tauris, 2012.
- . The Battle of Britain: the Myth and the Reality. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.
- . The Dictators: Hitler's Germany, Stalin's Russia. New York: W. W. Norton, 2004.
- . The Road to War: The Origins of World War II. rev. ed. New York: Penguin, 1999.
- . The Twilight Years: The Paradox of Britain between the Wars. New York: Viking, 2009.

- . Why the Allies Won. New York: W. W. Norton 1996.
- Paasikivi, Juho K. Meine Moskauer Mission 1939–1941. Hamburg: Holsten, 1966.
- Paine, S. C. M. The Wars for Asia, 1911–1949. New York: Cambridge University, 2012.
- Paletskis, Iustas. V dvukh mirakh. Moscow: Politizdat, 1974.
- Palme-Dutt, Rajani. “Britanskii imperialism, fashizm i antisovetskaia kompaniia,” Kommunisticheskii internacional, July 20, 1933: 46–54.
- Pankov, D. V. Komkor Eideman. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1965.
- Pankrashova, M., and Vilnos Ia. Sipols, eds. “Soviet-British-French Talks in Moscow in 1939: A Documentary Survey,” International Affairs, 1969, no. 7: 74–83, no. 8: 87–95, no. 9: 62–6, no. 10: 61–8.
- Panné, Jean-Louis. Souvarine: le premier désenchanté du communisme. Paris: R. Laffont, 1993.
- Pantelev, Iu. A. Morskoi front. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1965.
- Pantsov, Aleksandr, and Steven Levine. Mao: The Real Story. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2012.
- Papchinskii, Aleksander, and Mikhail Tumshis. Shchit, naskoloty mechom: NKVD protiv VChK. Moscow: Sovremennik, 2001.
- Paperny, Vladimir. Architecture in the Age of Stalin: Culture Two. New York: Cambridge University, 2002.
- Papkov, S. A. Stalinskii terror v Sibiri, 1928–1941. Novosibirsk: Sibirskoe otdeleniie RAN, 1997.
- Parker, Robert A. C. Chamberlain and Appeasement: British Policy and the Coming of the Second World War. New York: St. Martin's, 1993.
- . Churchill and Appeasement: Could Churchill Have Prevented the Second World War? New York: Macmillan, 2000.
- Parnov, Ereimei. Skelety v seife. 2 vols. Moscow: Terra, 2000.
- Parssinen, Terry. The Oster Conspiracy of 1938: The Unknown Story of the Military Plot to Kill Hitler and Avert World War II. New York: HarperCollins, 2003.
- Pasternak, Boris. An Essay in Autobiography. Translated by Manya Harari. London: Collins & Harvill, 1959.
- . Izbrannnye perevody. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1940.
- Patolichev, Nikolai S. Isputanie na zrelost'. Moscow: Politizdat, 1977.
- . Vospominaniia. Moscow: Ob-vo sokhraneniia literaturnogo naslediia, 2008.
- Patrikeef, Felix. Russian Politics in Exile: The Northeast Asian Balance of Power, 1924–1931. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- Pätzold, Kurt, ed. Verfolgung, Vertreibung, Vernichtung: Dokumente des faschistischen Antisemitismus 1933 bis 1942. Leipzig: Reclam, 1983.
- Paul-Boncour, Joseph. Entre deux guerres: souvenirs sur la IIIe république. 3 vols. Paris: Plon, 1945–46.
- Paustovsky, Konstantin. Story of a Life, VI: The Restless Years. London: Harvill, 1974.
- Pavliukov, A. Ezhov: Biografia. Moscow: Zaharov, 2007.
- Pavlov, A. G. “Sovetskaia voennaia razvedka nakanun Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny,” Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1995, no. 1: 49–60.
- Pavlov, A. P. Kommunisticheskaia partiia v bor'be za zavershenie sotsialisticheskoi rekonstruktsii narodnogo khoziaistva: pobeda sotsializma v SSSR (1933–1937 gg.). Moscow: VPSH, 1959.
- Pavlov, Dmitrii. “Dve poslednie vstrechi s V.M. Molotovym,” Literaturnaia gazeta, April 18, 1990.
- . “Iz zapisok narkoma,” Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1988, no. 6: 106–27.
- Pavlov, Ivan. 1920-e: revoliutsiia i biurokrattiia: zapiski oppozitsionera. St. Petersburg: Peterburg—XXI vek, 2001.
- Pavlov, L. G. “Ot ‘lunkersa’ 1941 k Tsessne 1987,” Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1990, no. 6: 43–6.
- Pavlov, M. Iu. Anastas Mikoian: politicheskii portret na fone sovetskoii epokhi. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 2010.
- Pavlov, M. V., et al. Sovetskie srednie tanki dovoennogo perioda (1924–1941). Moscow, 2000.
- . Tanki BT Chast' I. Moscow: Armada, 1999.
- Pavlov, Vitalii. Tragediia sovetskoii razvedki. Moscow: Tsentrpoligraf, 2000.
- Pavlova, Irina V. “1937: Vybory kak mistifikatsiia, terror kak real'nost',” Voprosy Istorii, 2003, no. 10: 19–37.

- . Stalinizm: Stanovlenie mekhanizma vlasti. Novosibirsk: Sibirskii khronograf, 1993.
- Paxton, Robert O. Vichy France: Old Guard and New Order, 1940–1944. New York: Knopf, 1972.
- Payne, Matthew J. Stalin's Railroad: Turksib and the Building of Socialism. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh, 2001.
- Payne, Robert. The Life and Death of Adolf Hitler. New York: Praeger, 1973.
- Payne, Stanley G. A History of Fascism, 1914–1945. Madison: University of Wisconsin, 1995.
- . Falange: A History of Spanish Fascism. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 1961.
- . Fascism in Spain, 1923–1977. Madison: University of Wisconsin, 1999.
- . Spain's First Democracy: The Second Republic, 1931–1936. Madison: University of Wisconsin, 1993.
- . The Collapse of the Spanish Republic, 1933–1936: Origins of the Civil War. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2006.
- . The Franco Regime, 1936–1975. Madison: University of Wisconsin, 1987.
- . The Spanish Civil War, the Soviet Union, and Communism. New Haven, CT, and London: Yale University, 2004.
- . The Spanish Revolution. New York: W. W. Norton, 1970.
- Pazi, A. N. Nash Mironych: vospominania o zbizni i deiatel'nosti S.M. Kirova v Leningrade. Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1969.
- Peace and War—United States Foreign Policy, 1931–1941*. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1943.
- Peake, Hayden. The Private Life of Kim Philby: The Moscow Years. London: Fromm International, 1999.
- Pearson, Maurice. Oil and the Romanian State. Oxford: Clarendon, 1971.
- Pechenkin, A. A. "Sovremennaiia armiiia—armiiia nastupatel'naia," Istoricheskii arkhiv, 1995, no. 2: 23–31.
- . "1937 god: Stalin i voennii sovet," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 2003, no. 1: 35–53.
- Peden, G. C. Arms, Economics, and British Strategy: from Dreadnoughts to Hydrogen Bombs. New York: Cambridge University, 2007.
- Pegov, N. M. Dalekoe-blizkoe: vospominaniia. Moscow: Politizdat, 1982.
- Penner, D'Ann R. "Stalin and the Ital'ianka of 1932–1933 in the Don Region," Cahiers du monde russe, 39/1–2 (1998): 27–67.
- Peplonski, Andrzej. Wywiad Polski na ZSSR, 1921–1939. Warsaw: Gryf, 1996.
- Peris, Daniel. Storming the Heavens: The Soviet League of the Militant Godless. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1998.
- Perkhin, V. V., ed. Deiateli russkogo iskusstva i M.B. Khrapchenko, predsedatel' Vsesiuznogo komiteta po delam iskusstva, april' 1939—ianvar' 1948: svod pisem. Moscow: Nauka, 2007.
- Pertsov, V. V., ed. Voina i revoliutsiia v Ispanii, 1936–1939. 4 vols. Moscow: Progress, 1968.
- Pervua moskovskaia konferentsiia VKP (b): stenograficheskii otchet*. Moscow: Moskovskii oblastnoi komitet VKP b, 1929.
- Pervua sessia Verkhovnogo Soveta SSSR, 12–19 ianvaria 1938 g. (sozvy I): stenograficheskii otchet*. Moscow: Verkhovnyi Sovet SSSR, 1938.
- Pervua vsesoiuznaia konferentsiia rabotnikov sotsialisticheskoi promyshlennosti: stenograficheskii otchet s 30 ianvaria po 5 fevralia 1931*. Moscow: Gos. sots-ekonomicheskoe izdatel'stvo, 1931.
- Pervoe soveshchanie rabochikh i rabotnits—stakhanovtsev 1935*. Moscow: Partizdat, 1935.
- Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd kolkhoznikov-udarnikov, 15–19 fevralia 1933 g.: stenograficheskii otchet*. Moscow, Leningrad: Selkhozgiz, 1933.
- Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd sovetских pisatelei: stenograficheskii otchet*. Moscow: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1934.
- Pervyi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd udarnykh brigad: sbornik dokumentov i materialov*. Moscow: Profizdat, 1959.
- Peschanski, Denis, ed. Marcel Cachin: Carnets 1906–1947. 4 vols. Paris: CNRS Editions, 1993–8.
- Peshcherskii, V. L. "Krasnaia kapella": sovet'skaia razvedka protiv gestapo. Moscow: Tsentrpoligraf, 2000.
- . "Kak I. V. Stalina pytalsia predotvarit' voinu s Finliandiei," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1998, no. 1: 54–63.
- Peshekhonov, Alexei. Pravo na zemliu (natsionalizatsiia i sotsializatsiia). Petrograd: Zadruga, 1917.
- Petacci, Claretta. Mussolini segreto: Diari 1932–1938. Milan: Rizzoli, 2009.

- Petrement, Simone. Simone Weil: A Life. New York: Schocken, 1988.
- Petrone, Karen. Life Has Become More Joyous, Comrades: Celebrations in the Time of Stalin. Bloomington: Indiana University, 2000.
- Petrov, G. E., ed. Ukrepim sovety DVK. Khabarovsk: Dalgiza, 1934.
- Petrov, Iurii P. Partiinoe stroitel'stvo v sovetskoï armii i flote: deiatel'nost' KPSS po sozdaniiu i ukrepleniiu politorganov, partiinykh i komсомосkikh organizatsii v vooruzhennykh silakh, 1918–1961 gg. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1964.
- . Sroitel'stvo politorganov, partiinykh i komсомосkikh organizatsii armii i flota. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1968.
- Petrov, Nikita. "Rodos: ostrov arhipelaga Gulaga." Novaia gazeta, September 22, 2010.
- , and Marc Jansen. Stalinskii pitomets—Nikolai Ezhov. Moscow: Rosspen 2008.
- Petrov, N. V., and A. B. Roginskii. "'Pol'skaia operatsiia' NKVD, 1937–1938 gg." In Represii protiv poliakov i pol'skikh grazhdan, edited by A. E. Gur'ianov. Moscow: Zvenia, 1997, 22–43.
- , and K. V. Skorkin, eds. Kto rukovodil NKVD, 1934–1941: spravochnik. Moscow: Zvenia, 1999.
- Petrov, Vladimir, and Evdokia Petrov. Empire of Fear. London: Andre Deutsch, 1956.
- Petrovskii, L. P. "Poslednii rot front." In Oni ne molchali, edited by A. V. Afanas'ev. Moscow: Politizdat, 1991, 179–91.
- Petukhov, N., and V. Khomchik, "Delo o 'Leningradskom tsentre,'" Vestnik Verkhovnogo suda SSSR, 1991, no. 5: 15–18, no. 6: 19–21.
- Pfaff, Ivan. Die Sowjetunion und die Verteidigung der Tschechoslowakei: Versuch einer revision einer Legende. Cologne: Böhlau, 1996.
- Pflanze, Otto. Bismarck and the Development of Germany. 2nd ed. 3 vols. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1990.
- Philbin, III, Tobias R. The Lure of Neptune: German-Soviet Naval Collaboration and Ambitions, 1919–1941. Columbia: University of South Carolina, 1994.
- Phillips, Hugh D. Between the Revolution and the West: A Political Biography of Maxim M. Litvinov. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1992.
- Pianciola, Niccolò. "Famine in the Steppe: The Collectivization of Agriculture and the Kazak Herdsmen, 1928–1934," Cahiers du monde russe, 45/1–2 (2004): 137–92.
- . "The Collectivization Famine in Kazakhstan, 1931–1933," Harvard Ukrainian Studies, 25/3–4 (2001): 237–51.
- . Stalinismo di frontiera: Colonizzazione agricola, sterminio dei nomadi e costruzione statale in Asia centrale (1905–1936). Rome: Viella, 2009.
- Piatiletnyi plan narodnokhoziaistvennogo stroitel'stva SSSR*. 2nd ed. 2 vols. Moscow, 1929.
- Piatnitskii, Vladimir. Zagovor protiv Sialina. Moscow: Sovremennik, 1998.
- Pick, Daniel. The Pursuit of the Nazi Mind: Hitler, Hess, and the Analysts. New York: Oxford University, 2012.
- Picker, Henry, ed. Hitlers Tischgespräche im Führerhauptquartier, 1941–1942. Bonn: Athenum, 1951.
- Pike, David Wingate. "Franco and the Axis Stigma," Journal of Contemporary History, 17/3 (1982): 369–407.
- Pikhova, Rudolf' G., ed. I. V. Stalin: istoricheskaia ideologiia v SSSR v 1920–1950-e gody. St. Petersburg: Nauka, 2006.
- , and Aleksander Gieysztor, eds. Katyn': plenniki neob'iaulennoi voiny. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratiia, 1997.
- Piliatskin, B. "'Vrag naroda': Ezhov ostaetsia vragom naroda," Izvestiia, June 4, 5, 1998.
- Pil'niak, Boris. Rasplesnutoe vremia: rasskazy, povesti, romany. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1990.
- Pinter, Walter M. "The Social Characteristics of the Early Nineteenth-Century Russian Bureaucracy," Slavic Review, 29/3 (1970): 429–43.
- Pipes, Richard. Struve, Liberal on the Right, 1905–1944. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1980.
- . The Formation of the Soviet Union: Communism and Nationalism, 1917–1923. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1953.
- . The Russian Revolution. New York: Knopf, 1990.
- Pirogov, O. A. S otsom: vospominaniia o A. S. Pirogove. Riazan: Uzorch'e, 2004.

- Pirozhkova, Antonina N. At His Side: The Last Years of Isaac Babel. South Royalton, VT: Steerforth Press, 1998.
- Pis'mennyi, A. "Ia iskrenne veril Stalinu . . ." Knizhnoe obozrenie, October 6, 1989.
- Plamper, Jan. "Georgian Koba or Soviet 'Father of Peoples'" in The Leader Cult in Communist Dictatorships: Stalin and the Eastern Bloc, edited by Balázs Apor, et al. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, 123–40.
- . The Stalin Cult. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2012.
- Plekhanov, A. A., and A. M. Plekhanov, eds. F. E. Dzerzhinskii—predsetel' VChK-OGPU: sbornik dokumentov, 1917–1926. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratii, 2007.
- Plekhanov, A. M. VChK-OGPU v gody novoi ekonomicheskoi politiki 1921–1928. Moscow: Kuchkovo pole, 2006.
- Plimak, E Evgenii G., and V Vadim S. Antonov. "1 dekabria 1934—go: tragediia Kirova i tragediia sovetsskoi Rossii," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 2004, no. 6: 31–45.
- . "Nakanune strashnoi dani," Oktiabr, 1997, no. 2: 149–60.
- Plisetskaiia, Maya. Chitaia zhizni' svoiu. Moscow: AST-Astrel', 2010.
- Plotnikov, K. N. Ocherki istorii biudzheta Sovetskogo gosudarstva. Moscow: Gosfinizdat, 1954.
- Plotnikova, Nadezhda S. "Organy OGPU-NKVD-NKGB SSSR v bor'be so spetssluzhbamii Germanii, 1933–1941 gg." PhD diss. Moscow: Akademiia FSB, 2002.
- Pobol', N. L., and P. M. Polian, eds. Stalinskie deportatsii, 1928–1953. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratii —Materik, 2005.
- . Pod znamenem Leninizma, 1990, no. 8.
- Pogonii, Iakov F., et al., Lubianka, 2: iz istorii otechestvennoi kontrrazvedki. Moscow: Mosarkhiv, 1999.
- Pogranichnye voiska SSSR, 1939–iun' 1941: sbornik dokumentov i materialov*. Moscow: Nauka, 1970.
- Pohl, Otto. Ethnic Cleansing in the USSR, 1937–1949. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1999.
- Pohle, Heinz. Der Rundfunk als Instrument der Politik. Hamburg: Hans Bredow-Institut, 1955.
- "Pokazaniia marshala Tukhachevskogo," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1989, no. 8: 44–54, no. 9: 55–63.
- Pokrovskii, M. N. Ocherki po istorii oktiabr'skoi revoliutsii. 2 vols. Moscow and Leningrad: Gosizdat, 1927.
- , ed. Politbiuro i krest'ianstvo: vysylka, spetspereselenie 1930–1940. 2 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 2005.
- Poletae, Vladimir E., ed. Industrializatsiia SSSR, 1929–1932. Moscow: Nauka, 1970.
- Poliakov, Iu. A. Sovetskaia strana posle okonchaniia grazhdanskoi voiny: territoriia i naseleniie. Moscow: Nauka, 1986.
- Polian, Pavel. Against Their Will: the History and Geography of Forced Migration in the USSR. Budapest: CEU, 2004.
- Polianskii, Aleksei. Ezbov: istoriia 'zhelezno'go stalinskogo narkoma. Moscow: Veche, 2001.
- Polianskii, Viktor V. 10 let s Vasil'em Staliny'm. Tver: IPP Vikant, 1995.
- Polišenská, Milada, and Robert Kvaček. "Archivní dokumenty hoví: Beneš a 'případ Tučačevskij,'" Mezinárodní politika, 1991, no. 8: 28–30.
- Polishchuk, K. E. "Zasedanie RVS 1–3 iunია 1937 goda: svidetel'stvo ochevidtsa," Znanie-sila, 1990, no. 5: 26–32.
- Polonsky, Antony. Politics in Independent Poland 1921–1939. London: Oxford University, 1972.
- "Polozhenie ego deistvitel'no bezyskhodnoe": dokumenty o pe'sakh M. A. Bulgakova," Istochnik, 1996, no. 5: 108–22.
- Polpredy soobshchaliut: sbornik dokumentov ob otnosheniakh SSSR s Latviei, Litvoi i Estoniei, avgust 1939–avgust 1940*. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1990.
- Poluvedko, K., D. V. Videnieiev, and H. S. Bystrukhin, Mech i tryzub: rozvidka i kontrozvidka rukbu ukrains'kykh natsionalistiv ta UPA (1920–1945). Kiev: Heneza, 2006.
- Pomper, Philip. "Historians and Individual Agency," History and Theory, 35/3 (1996): 281–308.
- Ponomarev, Aleksandr N. Aleksandr Shcherbakov: stranitsy biografii. Moscow: Glavarkhiv, 2004.
- . "Nikita Khrushchev: nachalo kar'ery." In Neizvestnaia Rossiia XX vek, edited by V. A. Kozlov. Moscow: Istorieskoe nasledie, 1993, III: 119–42.
- . Pokoriteli neba. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1980.
- Pons, Silvio. "The Papers on Foreign and International Policy in the Russian Archives," Cahiers du monde russe, 40/1–2 (1999): 235–49.

- . Stalin e la guerra inevitabile: 1936–1941. Turin: G. Einaudi, 1995. Translated as Stalin and the Inevitable War, 1936–1941. London and Portland, OR: Frank Cass, 2002.
- . The Global Revolution: A History of International Communism, 1917–1991. Oxford: Oxford University, 2014.
- Popov, B. S., and V. G. Oppokov. “Berievshchina,” Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1989, no. 5: 38–41, no. 7: 82–7; 1990, no. 1: 68–78, no. 3: 81–90, no. 5: 85–9; 1991, no. 1: 44–57.
- Popov, K. “Partiia i vozhd,” Partiinoe stroitel'stvo, 1930, no. 1(3)/2: 5–9.
- Popov, N. N. Ocherk istorii Vsesoiuznoi kommunisticheskoi partii (bol'shevikov). 15th ed. Moscow: Partizdat, 1932.
- Popov, N. V. “Byl i ostaius' kommunistom (O.N.N. Krestinskoi).” In Otkryvaia novye stranitsy—mezhdunarodnye voprosy: sobytia i liudi, edited by Akhmed A. Iskenderov. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1989, 244–51.
- Popov, V. P. “Gosudarstvennyi terror v Sovetskoii Rossii, 1923–1953 gg.: istochniki i ikh interpretatsiia,” Otechestvennye arkhivy, 1992, no. 2: 20–32.
- Porecky, Elizabeth K. Our Own People: A Memoir of 'Ignace Reiss' and His Friends. London: Oxford University, 1969.
- Posen, Barry R. “Competing Images of the Soviet Union,” World Politics, 39/4 (1987): 579–97.
- . Sources of Military Doctrine: France, Britain, and Germany between the World Wars. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1984.
- “Poslednee slovo Nikolai Ezhova,” Moskovskie novosti, Jan.–Feb. 6, 1994.
- Pospelov, P. N. Istoriia Velikoi Otechestvennoi voiny Sovetskogo Soiuza, 1941–1945 gg. 6 vols. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1960–65.
- Possony, Stefan T. “Hitlers Unternehmen ‘Barbarossa’ und die Rolle der sowjetischen Geheimdienstchefs Berija,” Beiträge zur Konfliktforschung, 5/3 (1975): 99–114.
- Potemkin, V. P., ed. Istoriia diplomatii. 3 vols. Moscow: Gossotskiz, 1941–5.
- Potocki, Alfred. Master of Lancut. London: W. H. Allen, 1959.
- Potocki, Robert. Polityka państwa polskiego wobec zagadnienia ukraińskiego w latach 1930–1939. Lublin: IEŚW, 2003.
- Povarov, S. N. Prichina smerti rastrel: khrinika poslednikh dnei I. Babelia. Moscow: Terra, 1996.
- Pozharskaia, S. P., and A. I. Saplin, eds. Komintern i grazhdanskaia voina v Ispanii: dokumenty. Moscow: Nauka, 2001.
- Prange, Gordon W. Hitler's Words. Washington, D.C.: American Council on Public Affairs, 1944.
- Prażmowska, Anita J. Britain, Poland, and the Eastern Front, 1939. New York: Cambridge University, 1987.
- . Eastern Europe and the Origins of the Second World War. New York: St. Martin's, 2000.
- Presseisen, Ernst Leopold. Germany and Japan: A Study in Totalitarian Diplomacy, 1933–1941. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1958.
- Preston, Paul. “Explosive Experiment,” TLS, Dec. 17, 1993.
- . A Concise History of the Spanish Civil War. London: Fontana, 1986, 1996.
- . Franco: A Biography. London: HarperCollins, 1993.
- . The Coming of the Spanish Civil War: Reform, Reaction, and Revolution in the Second Republic. 2nd ed. New York: Routledge, 1994.
- . The Last Stalinist: The Life of Santiago Carillo. London: William Collins, 2014.
- . The Spanish Holocaust: Inquisition and Extermination in Twentieth-Century Spain. New York: W. W. Norton, 2012.
- . We Saw Spain Die: Foreign Correspondents in the Spanish Civil War. London: Constable, 2008.
- Price, G. Ward. Year of Reckoning. London: Cassell, 1939.
- Pridvorov, Dmitrii. “Ob otse.” In Vospominaniia o Dem'iane Bednom. Moscow: Sovetskaii pisatel', 1966.
- Priestland, David. Stalinism and the Politics of Mobilization: Ideas, Power and Terror in Inter-War Russia. New York: Oxford University, 2007.
- “Prikaz narodnogo komissara oborony Soiuza SSR no. 0040 (4 sentiabria 1938),” Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1990, no. 1: 84–7.

- "Prikaz narodnogo komissara oborony Soiuzu SSR no. 072 (7 iunია 1937 g.)," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1990, no. 5: 45–6.
- Primakov, E. M., ed. Ocherki istorii rossiiskoi vneshnei razvedki. 6 vols. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1996–2007.
- I Salone Internazionale Aeronautico: catalogo ufficiale*. Milano: Fiera di Milano, 1935.
- Pringle, Heather. The Master Plan: Himmler's Scholars and the Holocaust. New York: Hyperion, 2006.
- "Priniat' srochnnye mery k ozdorovleniiu: o krizisnoi situatsii vo MKhATE," Istochnik, 1997, no. 6: 122–36.
- Prishvin, Mikhail M. Dnevnik. 11 vols. Moscow: Moskovskii rabochii, 1991–2012.
- Pritsker, Lazar M. Istoriia kurortov Abkhazskoi SSR, 1921–1945 gg. Tbilisi: Metsniereba, 1987.
- Pritt, Denis N. Must the War Spread? Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1940.
- Proctor, Raymond L. Hitler's Luftwaffe in the Spanish Civil War. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1983.
- Proffer, Ellendea. Bulgakov: Life and Work. Ann Arbor, MI: Ardis, 1984.
- Prokofiev, Sergey. Autobiography, Articles, Reminiscences. Moscow: Foreign Languages Publishing House, 1959.
- Pronin, Aleksandr. "Nevoľnye informatory Stalina," Nezavisimoe voennoe obozrenie, 2001, no. 45: 1–2.
- Prot'ko, V. S. V bor'be za trezvosť: stranitsy istorii. Minsk: Nauka i tekhnika, 1988.
- Protsess kontrevoliutsionnoi organizatsii men'shevikov (1 marta–9 marta 1931): stenogramma sudebnogo protsessa*. Moscow: Sovetskoe zakonodatel'stvo, 1931.
- Prudnikova, Elena, and A. Kolpakidi. Dvoimoi zagovor: tainy stalinskikh repressii. Moscow: Olma, 2006.
- Prychodko, Nicholas. One of Fifteen Million. Boston: Little, Brown, 1952.
- Prystaiko, Volodymyr, and Iurii Shapoval, eds. Sprava "Spilky Vyzvolennia Ukrainy": nevidomi dokumenty i fakty. Kiev: INTEL, 1995.
- Psurtsev, N. D. ed., Razvitie sviazi v SSSR. Moscow: Sviaz', 1967.
- Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt*. 13 vols. New York: Random House/Harper & Brothers, 1938–50.
- Putnam, Robert. Bowling Alone: The Collapse and Revival of Community in America. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2000.
- Pykhov, V. G. Ekonomika, organizatsiia i planirovanie spirtnogo proizvodstva. Moscow: Pishchevaia promyshlennost', 1966.
- Pyř'ev, Ivan. Izbrannnye proizvedeniia. 2 vols. Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1978.
- Pyrih, Ruslan Ia., et al., eds. Holodomor 1932–1933 in Ukraine: Documents and Materials. Kiev: Kyiv Mohyla Academy, 2008.
- Raack, R. C. "His Question Asked and Answered: Stalin on 'Whither Poland?'" Polish Review, 55/2 (2010): 195–216.
- Rabinbach, Anson. "The Reader, the Popular Novel and the Imperative to Participate: Reflections on Public and Private Experience in the Third Reich," History and Memory, 3/2 (1991): 5–44.
- Rabinovich, I. S. "Obraz vozhdia v proizvedeniiakh zhivopisi i kul'tury," Arkhitektura SSSR, 1939, no. 12: 11–21.
- Rabishchev, N. "Gnilaia i opasnaia teoriia prevrashcheniia klassovykh vragov v ruchnykh," Bol'shevik, 1937, no. 7.
- Radek, Karl. "Dikhanie voiny," Izvestiia, Aug. 1, 1936.
- . "The War in the Far East: A Soviet View," Foreign Affairs, 10/4 (July 1932): 541–57.
- Radó, Sándor. Pod pseudonim "Dora". Moscow: Voenizdat, 1973.
- Radosh, Ronald, Mary Habeck, and Grigory Sevostianov, eds. Spain Betrayed: The Soviet Union in the Spanish Civil War. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2001.
- Radzinskii, Edvard. Stalin. Moscow: Vagrius, 1997.
- Ragsdale, Hugh. "The Munich Crisis and the Issue of Red Army Transit across Romania," Russian Review, 57/4 (1998): 614–7.
- . "The Soviet Position at Munich Reappraised: the Romanian Enigma." In Extending the Borders of Russian History, edited by Marsha Seifert. Budapest: CEU, 2003.

- . The Soviet Union, the Munich Crisis, and the Coming of World War II. New York: Cambridge University, 2004.
- Raikin, Arkadii. Vospominaniia. St. Petersburg: Kul't-Inform, 1993.
- Rakovski, Cristian. "Na s"ezde i v strane [July 27–Aug. 7, 1930]," Biulleten' oppositsii, no. 25–26 (Nov.–Dec. 1931): 9–32.
- Ramzin, Leonid K., et al., eds. Protsses "Prompartii," 25 noiabria–7 dekabria 1930 g.: stenogramma sudebnogo protssesa i materialy, priobshchennye k delu. Moscow: Sovetskoe zakonodatel'stvo, 1931.
- Rancour-Laffiere, Daniel. The Mind of Stalin: A Psychoanalytic Study. Ann Arbor, MI: Ardis, 1988.
- Randall, Amy E. The Soviet Dream World of Retail Trade and Consumption in the 1930s. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2008.
- Rapoport, Vitalii, and Iurii Geller. Izmena rodine. Moscow: Strelets, 1995.
- Rapoport, Vitaly, and Yuri Alexeev. High Treason: Essays on the History of the Red Army, 1918–1938. Durham, NC: Duke University, 1985.
- Raskol'nikov, Fedor. "Otkrytoe pis'mo Stalinu," Novaia Rossiia [Paris], October 1, 1939.
- . O vremeni i o sebe: vospominaniia, pis'ma, dokumenty. Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1989.
- Rasskazy o Staline*. Moscow: Detskaia literatura, 1939.
- Rassweiler, Anne D. The Generation of Power: The History of Dneprostroi. New York: Oxford University, 1988.
- Ratner, I. "Proryv na Maase (na uchastke Divan-Sedan, mai 1940 g.)," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1940, no. 5: 3–22.
- Rayfield, Donald. "Pasternak and the Georgians," Irish Slavonic Studies, 3 (1982): 39–46.
- . "The Death of Paolo Iashvili," Slavonic and East European Review, 68/4 (1990): 631–64.
- . Literature of Georgia: A History. 2nd ed. Richmond, Surrey: Curzon, 2000.
- . Stalin and His Hangmen: An Authoritative Portrait of a Tyrant and Those Who Served Him. New York: Viking, 2004.
- Raymond, P. D. "Witness and Chronicler of Nazi-Soviet Relations: The Testimony of Evgeny Gnedin (Parvus)," Russian Review 44/4 (1985): 379–95.
- Razgon, Lev. Plen v svoem otechestve. Moscow: Knizhnyi Sad, 1994.
- Read, Anthony. The Devil's Disciples: The Lives and Times of Hitler's Inner Circle. London: Jonathan Cape, 2003.
- , and David Fisher. The Deadly Embrace: Hitler, Stalin, and the Nazi-Soviet Pact, 1939–1941. London: Michael Joseph, 1988.
- Rebentisch, Dieter. Führerstaat und Verwaltung im zweiten Weltkrieg. Stuttgart: Franz Steiner, 1989.
- Redvaldsen, David. "'Today is the Dawn': The Labour Party and the 1929 General Election," Parliamentary History, 29/3 (2010): 395–415.
- Rees, E. A. "Iron Lazar": A Political Biography of Lazar Kaganovich. London and New York: Anthem Press, 2012.
- . "Leader Cults: Varieties, Preconditions and Functions." In The Leader Cult in Communist Dictatorships: Stalin and the Eastern Bloc, edited by Balász Apor et al. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, 3–25.
- . "Stalin and Russian Nationalism." In Russian Nationalism Past and Present, edited by Geoffrey Hosking and Robert Service. New York: St. Martin's, 1998, 77–106.
- . "Stalin as Leader, 1924–1937: From Oligarch to Dictator." In The Nature of Stalin's Dictatorship: The Politburo 1924–1953, edited by E. A. Rees. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, 19–57.
- . "Stalin as Leader, 1937–1953: From Dictator to Despot." In The Nature of Stalin's Dictatorship: The Politburo 1924–1953, edited by E. A. Rees. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, 200–39.
- . "The Great Purges and the XVIII Party Congress of 1939." In Centre-Local Relations in the Stalinist State, 1928–1941, edited by E. A. Rees. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002, 191–211.
- . "The People's Commissariat of Water Transport." In Decision-making in the Stalinist Command Economy, 1932–37, edited by E. A. Rees. New York: St. Martin's, 1997, 235–61.
- , ed. Centre-Local Relations in the Stalinist State, 1928–1941. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.

- , ed. Decision-making in the Stalinist Command Economy, 1932–37. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 1997.
- . Political Thought from Machiavelli to Stalin: Revolutionary Machiavellism. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- . Stalinism and Soviet Rail Transport, 1928–41. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 1995.
- . State Control in Soviet Russia: The Rise and Fall of the Workers' and Peasants' Inspectorate, 1920–34. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 1987.
- , and D. Watson. "Politburo and Sovnarkom." In Decision-making in the Stalinist Command Economy, 1932–37, edited by E. A. Rees. New York: St. Martin's, 1997, 9–32.
- Rees, John Rawlings, et al. The Case of Rudolf Hess: A Problem in Diagnosis and Forensic Psychiatry. London: Heinemann, 1947.
- Rees, Laurence. The Nazis: A Warning from History. London: BBC Books, 1997.
- . World War II behind Closed Doors: Stalin, the Nazis and the West. New York: Pantheon, 2008.
- Rees, Tim. "The Highpoint of Comintern Influence? The Communist Party and the Civil War in Spain." In International Communism and the Communist International, 1919–1943, edited by Tim Rees and Andrew Thorpe. Manchester, England: University of Manchester, 1998, 143–68.
- Reese, Roger R. "Lessons of the Winter War: A Study in the Military Effectiveness of the Red Army, 1939–1940," Journal of Military History, 72/3 (2008): 825–52.
- . "Red Army Opposition to Forced Collectivization, 1929–1930: The Army Wavers," Slavic Review, 55/1 (1996): 24–45.
- . Stalin's Reluctant Soldiers: A Social History of the Red Army, 1925–1941. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1996.
- Rei, August. Sotsialisticheskie revoliutsii v Estonii 1917–1940 i ego vkhozhdeniie v sostav SSSR: dokumenty i materialy. Tallinn: Periodika, 1987.
- . The Drama of the Baltic Peoples. Stockholm: Kirjastus Vaba Eesti, 1970.
- Reid, Susan. "In the Name of the People: The Manege Affair Revisited," Kritika, 6/4 (2005), 673–716.
- . "Socialist Realism in the Stalinist Terror: The Industry of Socialism Art Exhibition, 1935–41," Russian Review, 60/2 (2001), 153–84.
- Reinhart, Carmen M., and Kenneth S. Rogoff. This Time Is Different: Eight Centuries of Financial Folly. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 2009.
- Reiss, Tom. The Orientalist: Solving the Mystery of as a Strange and Dangerous Life. New York: Random House, 2005.
- Reitlinger, Gerald. The SS: Alibi of a Nation. New York: Viking, 1957.
- Reizen, Mark, et al. Mark Reizen, Avtobiograficheskie zapiski: stat'i i vospominaniia. 2nd ed. Moscow: Sov. kompozitor, 1986.
- Rentola, Kimmo. "Intelligence and Stalin's Two Crucial Decisions in the Winter War, 1939–40," International History Review, 35/5 (2013): 1089–1112.
- . "The Finnish Communists and the Winter War," Journal of Contemporary History, 33/4 (1998): 591–607.
- Report of Court Proceedings, Case of the Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Center, January 23–30, Moscow, 1937*. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R., 1937.
- Resis, A. "The Fall of Litvinov: Harbinger of the German-Soviet Non-Aggression Pact," Europe-Asia Studies, 52/1 (2000): 36–47.
- Reswick, William. I Dreamt Revolution. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1952.
- Revyakin, Aleksandr R. "Poland and the Soviet Union in the Late 1920s and Early 1930s." In White Spots, Black Spots: Difficult Matters in Polish-Russian Relations, 1918–2008, edited by Adam Daniel Rotfeld and Anatoly V. Torkunov. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh, 2015, 79–101.
- Reynolds, David. "1940: Fulcrum of the Twentieth Century?" International Affairs, 66/2 (1990): 325–50.
- . "Churchill and the British 'Decision' to Fight in 1940: Right Policy, Wrong Reasons." In Diplomacy and Intelligence during the Second World War, edited by R. Langhorne. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1985, 147–

———. In Command of History: Churchill Fighting and Writing the Second World War. New York: Random House, 2005.

Rezoliutsii i postanovlenii pervogo Vsesoiuznogo s"ezda udarnykh brigad. Moscow, 1930.

Ribbentrop, Joachim von. The Ribbentrop Memoirs. London: Weidenfeld and Nicholson, 1954.

———. Zwischen London und Moskau: Erinnerungen und letzte Aufzeichnungen. Leoni: Druffel-Verlag, 1953.

Richardson, Charles O. "French Plans for Allied Attacks on the Caucasian Oil Fields, January-April 1940," French Historical Studies, 8/1 (1973): 130–56.

Richardson, R. Dan. Comintern Army: The International Brigades and the Spanish Civil War. Lexington: University of Kentucky, 1982.

Richardson, Rosamond. The Long Shadow: Inside Stalin's Family. New York: St. Martin's, 1993.

Richter, Stanislav. "On Prokofiev." In Sergei Prokofiev: Materials, Articles, Interviews, edited by Vladimir Blok. Moscow: Progress, 1978.

Rieber, Alfred J. "Fun with My Buddy," TLS, August 17, 2007.

———. "Persistent Factors in Russian Foreign Policy: An Interpretive Essay." In Imperial Russian Foreign Policy, edited by Hugh Ragsdale. Washington, D.C.: Wilson Center Press, 1993, 315–59.

———. "Stalin as Foreign Policy Maker." In Stalin: A New History, edited by Sarah Davies and James Harris. New York: Cambridge University, 2005, 140–58.

———. Stalin and the Struggle for Supremacy in Eurasia. New York: Cambridge University, 2015.

Riekhoff, Harald von. German-Polish Relations, 1918–1933. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University, 1971.

Rigby, T. H. "Was Stalin a Disloyal Patron?" Soviet Studies, 38/3 (1986): 311–24.

———. Communist Party Membership in the USSR, 1917–1967. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1968.

———. The Stalin Dictatorship. Sydney: Sydney University, 1968.

Rikhter, Zinaida. Kavkaz nashikh dnei, 1923–1924. Moscow: Zhizn' i znanie, 1924.

Rimmel, Leslie Ann. "Another Kind of Fear: The Kirov Murder and the End of Bread Rationing in Leningrad," Slavic Review, 56/3 (1997): 481–99.

———. "The Kirov Murder and Soviet Society: Propaganda and Popular Opinion in Leningrad, 1934–1935." PhD diss. University of Pennsylvania, 1995.

Rintala, Marvin. Three Generations: The Extreme Right Wing in Finnish Politics. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1962.

Rittersporn, Gábor Tamás. "'Vrednye element,' 'opasnye menshinstva' i bol'shevistskie trevogi: massovye operatsii 1937–1938 gg. i etnicheskii vopros v SSSR." In V sem'e edinoi: natsional'naiia politika partii bol'shevikov i ee osuschestvlenie na Severno-Zapadnye Rossii v 1920–1950e gody, edited by Timo Vikhavainen and Irina Takala. Petrozavodsk: Izdatel'stvo Petrozavodskogo universiteta, 1998, 99–122.

———. "From Working Class to Urban Laboring Mass." In Making Workers Soviet: Power, Class, and Identity, edited by Lewis H. Siegelbaum and Ronald G. Suny. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1994, 253–73.

———. "The Omnipresent Conspiracy: On Soviet Imagery of Politics and Social Relations in the 1930s." In Stalinism: Its Nature and Aftermath, edited by Nick Lampert and Gábor Rittersporn. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1992, 101–20.

———. Anguish, Anger, Folkways in Soviet Russia. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh, 2014.

———. Stalinist Simplifications and Soviet Complications: Social Tensions and Political Conflicts in the USSR 1933–1953. Philadelphia: Harwood, 1991.

Robbins, Richard G. Famine in Russia, 1891–1892. New York: Columbia University, 1975.

Roberts, Andrew. The Holy Fox: A Biography of Lord Halifax. London: Weidenfeld and Nicholson, 1991.

Roberts, Cynthia. "Planning for War: The Red Army and the Catastrophe of 1941," Europe-Asia Studies, 47/8 (1995): 1293–1326.

Roberts, Geoffrey. "A Soviet Bid for Coexistence with Nazi Germany, 1935–1937: The Kandelaki Affair," International History Review, 16/3 (1994): 466–90.

- . "Soviet Foreign Policy and the Spanish Civil War, 1936–1939." In Spain in an International Context, edited by Christian Leitz and David J. Dunthorn. New York: Berghahn, 1999, 81–103.
- . "Soviet Policy and the Baltic States, 1939 and 1940: A Reappraisal," Diplomacy & Statecraft, 6/3 (1995), 672–700.
- . "Stalin, the Pact with Nazi Germany, and the Origins of Postwar Soviet Diplomatic Historiography," Journal of Cold War Studies, 4/4 (1995): 93–103.
- . "The Infamous Encounter? The Merekalov-Weizsäcker Meeting of 17 April 1939," Historical Journal, 35/4 (1992): 921–4.
- . Stalin's General: The Life of Georgy Zhukov. New York: Random House, 2012.
- . The Soviet Union and the Origins of the Second World War: Russo-German Relations and the Road to War, 1933–1941. New York: St. Martin's, 1995.
- . Unholy Alliance: Stalin's Pact with Hitler. London: Tauris, 1989.
- Roberts, Henry L. "The Diplomacy of Colonel Beck." In The Diplomats, 1919–1939, edited by Gordon A. Craig and Felix Gilbert. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1953, 578–614.
- Robertson, Esmonde M. "Hitler and Sanctions: Mussolini and the Rhineland," European Studies Review, 7/2 (1977): 409–35.
- . Mussolini as Empire Builder: Europe and Africa 1932–1936. London: Macmillan, 1977.
- Robertson, Jake A. "Captive Audiences." Senior thesis. Princeton University, 2015.
- Robinson, Robert, with Jonathan Slavin. Black on Red: My 44 Years Inside the Soviet Union. Washington, D.C.: Acropolis Books, 1988.
- Rodchenko, Aleksandr. "Amerikanskii fotograia II'ia II'fa," Sovetskoe foto, 1936, no. 8: 26–7.
- Rodos, Valerii. Ia syn palacha: vospominaniia. Moscow: OGI, 2008.
- Roder, Philip G. Red Sunset: The Failure of Soviet Politics. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1993.
- Roewer, Helmut. Die Rote Kapelle und andere Geheimdienst Mythen: Spionage zwischen Deutschland und Russland im Zweiten Weltkrieg 1941–1945. Graz: Ares, 2010.
- Rogachevskaiia, Liudmila S. Iz istorii rabochego klassa SSSR v pervye gody industrializatsii, 1926–1927. Moscow: Akademii nauk SSSR, 1959.
- . Rabochii klass SSSR, 1926–1929 gg. Moscow: Znanie, 1960.
- . Sotsialisticheskoe soremovanie v SSSR: istoricheskie ocherki 1917–1930 gg. Moscow: Nauka, 1977.
- Rogovin, Vadim Z. 1937: Stalin's Year of Terror. Oak Park, MI: Mehring, 1998.
- . Partiia rassreliannykh. Moscow: Rogovin, 1997.
- . Stalin's Terror of 1937–1938: Political Genocide in the USSR. Oak Park, MI: Mehring, 2009.
- Rohwer, Jürgen, and Mikhail S. Monakov. "The Soviet Union's Ocean-Going Fleet," International History Review, 18/4 (1996): 837–68.
- . Stalin's Ocean-Going Fleet: Soviet Naval Strategy and Shipbuilding Programmes 1935–1953. London: Frank Cass, 2001.
- Rokossovskii, K. K. Soldatskii dolg. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1997.
- Rolland, Romain. Voyage à Moscou (juin-juillet 1935). Paris: Albin Michel, 1992.
- Rölling, B. V. A., and C. F. Rüter, eds. The Tokyo Judgment: The International Military Tribunal for the Far East. Amsterdam: APA University, 1977.
- Romano, Andrea, and Nonna S. Tarchova, eds. L'Armata Rossa e la collettivizzazione delle campagne nell'URSS, 1928–1933: raccolta di documenti dai Fondi dell'Archivio militare di Stato Russo. Naples: Istituto universitario orientale, 1996.
- Romerstein, Herbert, and Eric Breindel. The Venona Secrets: Exposing Soviet Espionage and America's Traitors. Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 2001.
- Rommel, Erwin. The Rommel Papers. Edited by B. H. Liddell Hart. New York: Da Capo Press, 1953.
- Roos, Hans. Polen und Europa: Studien zur politischen Aussenpolitik, 1931–1939. Tübingen: Moor, 1957.
- Rose, Kenneth. King George V. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1983.
- Rosenberg, Alfred. Blut und Ehre. Munich: Zentralverlag der NSDAP, 1938.

- Rosenfeldt, Niels Erik. "The Consistory of the Communist Church: The Origins and Development of Stalin's Secret Chancellery," Russian History, 9/2–3 (1982): 308–24.
- . Knowledge and Power: The Role of the Secret Chancellery in Stalin's System of Government. Copenhagen: Rosenkilde and Bagger, 1978.
- . Stalin's Secret Chancellery and the Comintern: Evidence about the Organizational Patterns. Copenhagen: Reitzel, 1991.
- . Stalin's Special Departments: A Comparative Analysis of Key Sources. Copenhagen: University of Copenhagen, 1989.
- . The "Special" World: Stalin's Power Apparatus and the Soviet System's Secret Structures of Communication. 2 vols. Copenhagen: Museum Tusculanum, 2008.
- Rosenhaft, Eve. Beating the Fascists? The German Communists and Political Violence, 1929–1933. New York: Cambridge University, 1983.
- Roshchin, Aleksei A. "V narkomindele v predvoennye gody," Otkryvaia novye stranitsy, mezhdunarodnye voprosy: sobytia i liudi. Moscow: Politicheskaya literatura, 1989, 41–9.
- . "People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs before World War II," International Affairs (May 1988), 108–14.
- Roshchin, Sergei K. Politicheskaya istoriya Mongolii, 1921–1940 gg. Moscow: Institut Vostokovedeniia RAN, 1999.
- Rosliakov, Mikhail V. Ubiystvo Kirova: politicheskie i ugolovnye prestupleniia v 30-kh godakh. Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1991.
- . Rossii i SSSR v voynakh XX veka: statisticheskoe issledovanie. Moscow: Olma, 2001.
- Rossman, Jeffrey J. Worker Resistance under Stalin: Class and Revolution on the Shop Floor. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 2005.
- Rote Kapelle: The CIA's History of Soviet Intelligence and Espionage Networks in Western Europe, 1936–1945. The Washington, D.C.: University Publications of America, 1979.
- Rothstein, Andrew, ed. Wreckers on Trial: A Record of the Trial of the Industrial Party Held in Moscow, November–December, 1930. New York: Workers' Library, 1931.
- Rozanov, German L. Stalin-Gitler: dokumental'nyi ocherk sovetsko-germanskikh diplomaticheskikh otnoshenii, 1939–1941 gg. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1991.
- Rozenfel'd, V. Ia. Dvadsatipiatitsiachniki. Moscow: Sel'khozgiz, 1957.
- Rubashkin, Aleksandr. Mikhail Kol'tsov: kritiko-biograficheskii ocherk. Leningrad: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1971.
- Rubenstein, Joshua. Tangled Loyalties: The Life and Times of Ilya Ehrenburg. New York: Basic Books, 1996.
- Rubin, Nikolai Lavrentii Bertiia: mif i real'nost'. Moscow: Olimp, 1998.
- Rubinstein, Grigorii L. Razvitiie vnutrennei torgovli v SSSR. Leningrad: Leningradskii universitet, 1964.
- Rubl'ov, Oleksandr, and Vladimir Reprinstev. "Repressii protiv poliaktiv v Ukraini u 30-ti roki," Z arkhiviv VUChK-HPU-NKVD-KHB, 1, 1995, no. 2.
- Rubtsov, Iurii. Alter ego Stalina: stranitsy politicheskoi biografii L. V. Mekhlisa. Moscow: Zvonitsa-MG, 1999.
- . Iz-za spiny vozhdia: politicheskaya i voennaia deiatel'nost' L. V. Mekhlisa. Moscow: Kompaniia Ritm Esteit, 2003.
- . Marshaly Stalina. Moscow: Feniks, 2002.
- . Teni vozhdia. Moscow: Yauza-EKSMO, 2007, 81–2.
- Ruder, Cynthia A. Making History for Stalin: The Story of the Belomor Canal. Gainesville: University of Florida, 1998.
- Rudich, Feliks M., and Ruslan Ia. Pyrih, eds. Holod 1932–33 rokiv na Ukraini: ochima istoriykiv, movuiu dokumentuv. Kiev: Vyd-vo politychnoi literatury Ukrainy, 1990.
- Rudman, Stella. Lloyd George and the Appeasement of Germany, 1919–1945. Newcastle upon Tyne, UK: Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2011.
- Rudomino, Adrian V. Legendarnaia Barvikha. Moscow: Tonchou, 2009.
- Rukeysner, Walter A. Working for the Soviets: An American Engineer in Russia. New York: Covisi-Friede, 1932.

- Ruoff, Kenneth J. Imperial Japan at its Zenith: The Wartime Celebration of the Empire's 2600th. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 2010.
- Ruotsila, Markku. "The Churchill-Mannerheim Collaboration in the Russian Intervention, 1919–1920," Slavonic and East European Review, 80/1 (2002): 1–20.
- Ryback, Timothy W. Hitler's Private Library: The Books that Shaped His Life. New York: Knopf, 2008.
- Rybalkin, Iurii E. "Voennaia pomoshch' Sovetskogo Soiuza ispanskomu narodu v natsional'no-revoliutsionnoi voine 1936–1939," PhD diss. Institute of Military History, Moscow, 1992.
- . Operatsiia "X": Sovetskaia voennaia pomoshch' respublikanskoi Ispanii (1936–1939). Moscow: AIRO-XX, 2000.
- Rybin, A. T. Kto otravil Stalina? Zapiski telokhranitelia. Moscow: Izdatel'stvo Veteran, 1995.
- . Next to Stalin: Notes of a Bodyguard. Toronto: Northstar Compass Journal, 1996.
- . Riadom so Stalinym v Bol'shom teatre: zapiski voennogo komendanta. Moscow: [s.n.], 1995.
- . Stalin na fronte: zapiski telokhranitelia. Moscow: [s.n.], 1995.
- . Stalin v oktobre 1941 g.: zapiski telokhranitelia. Moscow: [s.n.], 1995.
- Ryōichi, Tobe. "The Japanese Eleventh Army in Central China, 1938–1941." In The Battle for China: Essays on the Military History of the Sino-Japanese War of 1937–1945, edited by Mark Peattie et al. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 2011, 207–36.
- Ryskulov, Turar R. Sobranie sochinenii v trekh tomakh. 3 vols. Almaty: Kazakhstan, 1997–8.
- Ryzhkov, Nikolai. Perestroika: istoriia predatel'stv. Moscow: Novosti, 1992.
- Rzheshevskii, Oleg A., and Olli Vehviläinen, eds. Zimnaia voina 1939–1940: I. V. Stalin i finskaia kampaniia. Stenogramma soveshchaniia pri TsK VKP (b). 2 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 1998.
- Rzeshevsky, Oleg A., ed. War and Diplomacy: The Making of the Grand Alliance. Documents from Stalin's Archives. Amsterdam: Harwood Academic, 1996.
- S'ezdy sovetov Soiuza SSR, soiuznykh i avtonomnykh sovetskikh socialisticheskikh respublik: sbornik dokumentov*. 7 vols. Moscow: Institut prava, Akademiia nauk SSSR, 1960.
- Sabaliunas, Leonas. Lithuania in Crisis: Nationalism to Communism, 1939–1940. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1972.
- Sadovskii, A. "Lenin v 1918 godu," Leningradskaia Pravda, April 2, 1939.
- Safronov, V. P. SSSR, SShA i iaponskaia agresiiia na Dal'nem Vostoke i Tikhom okeane, 1931–1945 gg. Moscow: Institut istorii RAN, 2001.
- . SSSR, SShA i iaponskaia agresiiia na Dal'nem Vostoke i Tikhom okeane, 1931–1945 gg. Moscow: Institut istorii RAN, 2001.
- Sagariia, Badzhgur E. Natsional'noe stroitel'stvo v Abkhazii, 1921–1931 gg. Sukhumi: Alashara, 1970.
- Sagariia, V. "K istorii obrazovaniia Abkhazskoi avtonomnoi respublikii." In Trudy Sukhumskogo gosudarstvennogo pedinstituta im. A. M. Gor'kogo. Sukhumi: Alashara, 1962.
- Sakharov, A. N. Zimniaia voina 1939–1940 gg. v rassekrechennykh dokumentakh. Moscow: Akademkniga, 2009.
- Sakharov, Valentin A. "Politicheskoe zaveshechanie" Lenina: real'nost' istorii i mify politiki. Moscow: Moskovskii universitet, 2003.
- Sakharov, Vsevolod. Mikhail Bulgakov: pisatel' i vlast'. Moscow: Olma, 2000.
- Sakwa, George. "The Polish Ultimatum to Lithuania in March 1938," Slavonic and East European Review, 55/2 (1977): 204–26.
- Salter, Arthur. Personality in Politics: Studies of Contemporary Statesmen. London: Faber and Faber, 1947.
- Salys, Rimgaila. The Musical Comedy Films of Grigorii Aleksandrov: Laughing Matters. Chicago: University of Chicago, 2009.
- Salzman, Neil V. Reform and Revolution: The Life and Times of Raymond Robins. Kent, OH: Kent State University, 1991.
- Samsonov, F. P. "Smysl ego zhizni." In Komandarm Uborevich: vospominaniia друзей i sotratnikov. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1964, 207–23.

Samuelson, Lennart. "Wartime Perspectives and Economic Planning: Tukhachevsky and the Military-Industrial Complex, 1925–1937." In Russia in the Age of Wars, 1914–1945, edited by Silvio Pons and Andrea Romano. Milan: Feltrinelli, 2000, 187–214.

———. Plans for Stalin's War Machine: Tukhachevskii and Military Planning, 1925–1941. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan, 2000.

———. Soviet Defense Industry Planning: Tukhachevskii and Military-Industrial Mobilization, 1926–1937. Stockholm: Institute of East European Economies, 1996.

Samygin, M. M. "Prompartia," n.d., Columbia University Archive of Russian History and Culture.

Sandag, Shagdarin, and Harry H. Kendall. Poisoned Arrows: The Stalin-Choibalsan Mongolian Massacres, 1921–1941. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2000.

Sandler, Stephanie. Commemorating Pushkin: Russia's Myth of a National Poet. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 2004.

Sanina, I. I. "R. I. Eikhe," Voprosy istorii KPSS, 1965, no. 7: 92–7.

Sarava-Bondar', Avgusta Mikhailovna. Siluet vremeni. St. Petersburg: Istoricheskaia illustratsiia, 1993.

Sarin, Oleg, and Lev Dvoretzky. Alien Wars: The Soviet Union's Aggressions against the World, 1919 to 1989. Novato, CA: Presidio, 1996.

Sarnov, Benedikt. Stalin i pisateli. 4 vols. Moscow: Eksmo: 2008–2001.

Sartakova, T. "Nash pisatel'skii les," Chitaiushchaia Rossiia, 1994, no. 2.

Sats, Natalia. Sketches from My Life. Moscow: Raduga Publishers, 1985.

Saul Friedlander, Nazi Germany and the Jews. 2 vols. New York: HarperCollins, 1997.

Savchenko, Viktor A. Avantiuristy grazhdanskoi voyny: istoricheskoe rassledovanie. Moscow: AST, 2000.

Savel'ev, Maximilian, and Aleksandr Poskrebyshev, eds. Direktivy VKP (b) po khoziaistvennym voprosam. Moscow-Leningrad: Gos. sotsial'no-ekonomicheskoe izd-vo, 1931.

Savin, A. S. "O podgotovke Iaponii k napadeniiu na SSSR: iaponskie istoriki svidetel'stvuiut," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1991, no. 7: 88–9.

Savushkin, R. A. "K voprosu o zarozhdenii teorii posledovatel'nykh nastupatel'nykh operatsii," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1983, no. 5: 77–83.

———. Razvitiie sovetskikh vooruzhennykh sil i voennogo iskusstva v mezhuvoennyi period (1921–1941 gg.). Moscow: Voenno-Politicheskaiia Akademiia, 1989.

Sbornik boevykh dokumentov Velikoi Otechestvennoi voyny. 43 vols. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1947–1953.

Sbornik materialov v sviazi s "Pismom c Kavkaza" tot. Stalina. Baku: Azerneshp, 1932.

Scammell, Michael. Koestler: The Literary and Political Odyssey of a Twentieth-Century Skeptic. New York: Random House, 2009.

Schacht, Hjalmar. My First Seventy-Six Years. London: Wingate, 1955.

Schäfer, Hans Dieter. Das gespaltene Bewusstsein: deutsche Kultur und Lebenswirklichkeit 1933–1945. Munich: Carl Hanser Verlag, 1981.

Schapiro, Leonard. Totalitarianism. New York: Praeger, 1972.

———. The Communist Party of the Soviet Union. New York: Random House, 1960; 2nd ed., 1971.

Schauff, Frank. Der verspielte Sieg: Sowjetunion, Kommunistische Internationale und Spanischer Bürgerkrieg 1936–1939. Frankfurt: Campus, 2004.

Schellenberg, Walter. The Labyrinth. New York: Harper, 1956.

———. The Schellenberg Memoirs: A Record of the Nazi Secret Service. London: Andre Deutsch, 1956.

Schlögel, Karl. Terror und Traum: Moskau 1937. Munich: Karl Hanser, 2008. Translated as Moscow, 1937. Cambridge, UK: Polity, 2012.

Schmidt, Paul Otto. Hitler's Interpreter. New York: Macmillan, 1951.

———. Statist auf diplomatischer Bühne: Erlebnisse des Chefdolmetschers im Auswärtigen Amt mit den Staatsmännern Europas. Bonn: Athenäum, 1949.

- Schmidt, Rainer F. "Der Hess-Flug und das Kabinet Churchill," Vierteljahreshefte für Zeitgeschichte, 42/1 (1994): 1–38.
- Schmidt-Scheeder, Georg. Reporter der Hölle: deutscher Propaganda-Kompanien im 2. Weltkrieg, Erlebnis und Dokumentation. Stuttgart: Motorbuch Verlag, 1977.
- Schmitt, Carl. Die Diktatur: von den Anfängen des modernen Souveränitätsgedankens bis zum proletarischen Klassenkampf. Munich and Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot, 1921; 2nd ed., 1928.
- Schorske, Carl. "Two German Diplomats: Dirksen and Schulenburg." In The Diplomats, 1919–1939, edited by Gordon A. Craig and Felix Gilbert. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1953, 477–511.
- Schrader, Fred E. Der Moskauer Prozess 1936: zur Sozialgeschichte eines politische Feindbilder. Frankfurt and New York: Campus Verlag, 1995.
- , ed. Kriegstagebuch der Oberkommando der Wehrmacht (Wehrmachtführungsstab) 1940–1945. 4 vols. Frankfurt am Main: Bernard & Graefe, 1961–5.
- Schram, Stuart R., ed. Mao's Road to Power: Revolutionary Writings 1912–1949. 5 vols. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1989–1997.
- Schramm-von Thadden, Ehrengard. Griechenland und die Grossmächte im zweiten Weltkrieg. Wiesbaden: F. Steiner, 1955.
- Schroeder, Christa. Er War Mein Chef: aus dem Nachlass der Sekretärin von Adolf Hitler. Munich: Langen Müller, 1985.
- Schroeder, Paul W. "Alliances 1815–1945: Weapons of Power or Tools of Management." In Systems, Stability, and Statecraft: Essays in the International History of Modern Europe. New York: Palgrave, 2004, 195–222.
- . "Munich and the British Tradition," Historical Journal, 19/1 (1976): 223–43.
- Schroeder, Ralf, ed. Mit der Menschheit auf Du und Du: Schriftsteller der Welt über Gorkij. Berlin: Verlag Kultur und Fortschritt, 1969.
- Shuker, Stephen A. "Seeking a Scapegoat: Intelligence and Grand Strategy in France, 1919–1940." In Secret Intelligence in the European States System, 1918–1989, edited by Jonathan A. Haslam and Karina Urbach. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 2014, 81–127.
- Schuschnigg, Kurt von. Austrian Requiem. London: Victor Gollancz, 1947.
- . The Brutal Takeover: The Austrian ex-Chancellor's Account of the Anschluss of Austria by Hitler. New York: Atheneum, 1971.
- Schuster-Winkelhof, Karl. Adolf Hitlers Wahlheimat. Munich: Münchener, 1933.
- Schwendemann, Heinrich. Die Wirtschaftliche Zusammenarbeit zwischen dem Deutschen Reich unter der Sowjetunion von 1939 bis 1941: Alternative zu Hitlers Orsprogramm? Berlin: Akademie, 1993.
- Scott, James. Seeing Like a State: How Certain Schemes to Improve the Human Condition Have Failed. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1998.
- Scott, John. Behind the Urals: An American Worker in Russia's City of Steel. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1989.
- . Duel for Europe: Stalin versus Hitler. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1942.
- Scott, William Evans. Alliance against Hitler: The Origins of the Franco-Soviet Pact. Durham, NC: Duke University, 1962.
- Sdviigi v sel'skom khoziaistve SSSR mezhdu XV i XVI partiinymi s'ezdami: statisticheskie svedeniia po sel'skomu khoziaistvu za 1927–1930 gg.* 2nd ed. Moscow-Leningrad: Gos. sotsial'no-ekonomicheskoe izd-vo, 1931.
- Seabury, Paul. The Wilhelmstrasse: A Study of German Diplomats under the Nazi Regime. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California, 1955.
- Seaton, Albert. The Russo-German War 1914–1945. New York: Praeger, 1970.
- Sechkin, Georgy. Granitsa i voina: pogrannichnye voiska v Velikoi Otechestvennoi voine sovet'skogo naroda, 1941–1945. Moscow: Granitsa, 1993.
- Sedov, I., N. V. Kulish, and A. Ia. Valetov. "Spravka rabotnikov prokuratury SSSR i sledstvennogo otdela KGB SSSR po povodu zapiski A. N. Iakovleva 'Nekotorye soobrazheniia po itogam izucheniiia obstoiatel'stv ubiistva S. M. Kirova,'"

- (June 14, 1990), 459–507. In Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo: dokumenty Prezidiuma TsK KPSS i drugie materialy, vol. 3, edited by Andrei N. Artizov et al. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratsiia, 2003.
- Segrè, Claudio G. Italo Balbo: A Fascist Life. Berkeley: University of California, 1987.
- Seidl, Alfred, ed. Die Beziehungen zwischen Deutschland under der Sowjetunion, 1939–1941: Dokumente des Auswärtigen Amtes. Tübingen: H. Laupp'sche, 1949.
- Seiranian, F. G. Nadezhneshii voennii rabotnik: ocherk o voenno-organizatorskoi deiatel'nosti G. K. Ordzhonikidze. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1989.
- Seleznnev, Ivan A. Tainy rossiiskoi politiki XX veka. Krasnodar: Sovetskaiia kuban', 1997.
- Self, Robert. Neville Chamberlain: A Biography. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2006.
- Selle, Earl Albert. Donald of China. New York: Harpers, 1948.
- Sel'skoe khoziaistvo SSSR: ezhegodnik 1935. Moscow: Sel'khozgiz, 1936.
- Selunskaiia, V. M. Rabochie-dvadsatipiatitsiachniki. Moscow: Moskovskii universitet, 1964.
- Semashkina, M. A., and L. A. Evstigneeva, eds. Perepiska Gor'kogo. 2 vols. Moscow: Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1986.
- Semiriaga, Mikhail I. "17 sentiabria 1939 g.," Sovetskoe slavianovedenie, 1990, no. 5: 3–18.
- . Tainy stalinskoii diplomatii, 1939–1941, Moscow: Vysshiaia shkola, 1992.
- Semiraya, Mikhail. The Winter War: Looking Back after Fifty Years. Moscow: Novosti, 1990.
- Senin, A. S. A. I. Rykov: stranitsy zhizni. Moscow: Rosvuznauka, 1993.
- Senn, Alfred Erich. Lithuania 1940: Revolution from Above. Amsterdam and New York: Rodopi, 2007.
- Seraphim, Hans-Guenther. Das politische Tagebuch Alfred Rosenbergs 1934–35 und 1939–40. Goettingen: Musterschmidt-Verlag, 1956.
- Serebriakova, Galina. "Iz vospominanii." In Smerch, edited by Ivan A. Anfert'ev. Moscow: DOSAAF SSSR, 1988, 230–49.
- . "Smerch." In Smerch, edited by Ivan A. Anfert'ev. Moscow: DOSAAF SSSR, 1988, 250–338.
- Serge, Victor. "Leon Sedov," La Révolution prolétarienne, February 21, 1938. Translated in The Serge-Trotsky Papers, edited by David Cotterill. London: Pluto Press, 1994.
- . "Litvinov," Esprit, June 1939.
- . Memoirs of a Revolutionary. 1901–1941. New York: Oxford University, 1963.
- . Portrait de Staline. Paris: Bernard Grasset, 1940.
- , and Natalya Sedova Trotsky. The Life and Death of Leon Trotsky. New York: Basic Books, 1975.
- Sergeev, F. "Istoriia odnogo politicheskogo podloga: o 'dele' Tukhachevskogo," Politicheskoe obrazovanie, 1989, no. 5: 48–56.
- Sergeev, A. F., and E. F. Glushik. Besedy o Staline. Moscow: Krymskii most, 2006.
- Sergeienko, S. P. Sinteticheskii kauchuk: istoricheskii ocherk. Moscow: Gos. nauchno-tekhnicheskoe izd-vo khimicheskoi lit-ry, 1940.
- Sergutov, S. V. "Organizatsionnye aspekty deiatel'nosti vneshnei razvedki NKVD-NKGB SSSR v 1934–1941 gg." In Trudy Obshchestva izucheniia istorii otechestvennykh spetsluzhb, vol. 3. Moscow: Kuchkovo pole, 2007, 234–53.
- Service, Robert. Stalin: A Biography. Cambridge, MA: Harvard Belknap, 2005.
- Sevast'ianov, Petr V. Neman-Volga-Dunai. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1961.
- Sever, Aleksandr, and Aleksandr Kolpakidi. GRU: unikal'naia entsiklopediia. Moscow: Eksmo, 2009.
- . Volkodav Stalina: Pravedivaia istoriia Pavla Sudoplatova. Moscow: Algoritm, 2015.
- Sevast'ianov, Grigorii N. "Obostreniie sovetsko-amerikanskikh otnoshenii letom 1935 g.: prichiny i posledstviia," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1998, no. 6: 19–35.
- . "Sud'ba soglasheniia Ruzvel't—Litvinov o dolgakh i kreditakh, 1934–1935 gg: novye dolumenty," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1995, no. 2: 115–34, no. 3: 118–44.
- . "Voennoe i diplomaticheskoe porazhenie iaponii v periode sobytiia u reki Khalkhin-Gol," Voprosy istorii, 1957, no. 8: 63–84.
- , ed. Moskva-Rim, politika i diplomatiia Kremliia 1920–1939: sbornik dokumentov. Moscow: Nauka, 2002.

- , et al., eds. "Sovershenno sekretno": Lubianka—Stalinu o polozhenii v strane (1922–1934 gg.). 10 vols. Moscow: Institut rossiiskoi istorii RAN, 2001–13.
- Seyed-Gohrab, A. A. The Great Umar Khayyam: A Global Reception of the Rubaiyat. Leiden: Leiden University, 2012.
- Shai, Aron. "Was There a Far Eastern Munich?" Journal of Contemporary History, 9/3 (1974): 161–9.
- . Zhang Xueliang: The General Who Never Fought. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2010.
- Shakhurin, A. I. Krylia pobedy. Moscow: Politizdat, 1985.
- Shalamov, Varlan. Kolyma Tales. New York: Penguin, 1994.
- Shamina, Lidiia. "Igor Moiseev: Nachalo puti, dnevniki khoreografa," Kul'tura, 2008, no. 9.
- Shaposhnikov, Boris M. Vospominaniia: voenno-nauchnye trudy. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1974.
- Shapoval, Iurii I. "Oni chuvstvuiut sebia, kak gosti . . ." (nad storinkamy stenohramy zustrichi Stalina z ukrains'kymy pys'mennykamy 12 liutoho 1929 roku)." In Ukraina XX stolittia: osoby ta podii v konteksti vazbkoj istorii. Kiev: Heneza, 2001, 93–130.
- . Lazar Kaganovich. Kiev: Znannia, 1994.
- , and Vadim Zolotar'ov. Vsevolod Balytskyi: osoba, chas, otchennia. Kiev: Stylos, 2002.
- , et al. ChK-GPU-NKVD v Ukraini: osoby, fakty, dokumenty. Kiev: Abrys, 1997.
- Sharapov, Eduard. "Za sto chasov do voiny," Krasnaia zvezda, June 22, 1994.
- . Dve zhizni. In Taina Zoi Voskresenskoj, edited by Z. I. Voskresenskaia. Moscow: Olma, 1998, 345–51.
- Sharapov, Iu. "Piat'sot stranit v den'," Moskovskie novosti, Sept. 18, 1988.
- Sharapov, Z. P. Natum Eitingon—karaiushchii mech Stalina. St. Petersburg: Neva, 2003.
- Sharlet, Robert, and Piers Beirne. "In Search of Vyshinsky: the Paradox of Law and Terror," International Journal of the Sociology of Law, 12/2 (1984): 153–77.
- Shatunovskaia, Lidiia. Zhizni' v kremle. New York: Chalidze Publications, 1982.
- Shaumian, Lev. "Stoiki bol'shevik," Pravda, May 19, 1962.
- Shaw, Louise Grace. The British Political Elite and the Soviet Union, 1937–1939. Portland, OR: Frank Cass, 2003.
- Shchelokov, Nikolai A. Istoriia sovetskoi militsii. 2 vols. Moscow: Akademiia nauk SSSR, 1977.
- Shchukin, Boris. Boris Vasil'evich Shchukin: stat'i, vospominaniia, materialy. Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1965.
- Shearer, David. "Crime and Social Disorder in Stalin's Russia: A Reassessment of the Great Retreat and the Origins of Mass Repression," Cahiers du monde russe, 39/1–2 (1998): 119–48.
- . "Social Disorder, Mass Repression and the NKVD during the 1930s," Cahiers du monde russe, 42/2–4 (2001): 505–34.
- . Industry, State, and Society in Stalin's Russia, 1926–1934. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1997.
- . Policing Stalin's Socialism: Repression and Social Order in the Soviet Union, 1924–1953. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2009.
- Sheboldaev, B. P. Doklad na pervoi kraevoi Azovo-Chernomorskoj part-konferentsii, 19 ianvaria 1934 g. Roston-na-Donu, 1934.
- Sheffer, Paul. "Stalin's Power," Foreign Affairs, (July 1930): 549–68.
- Shefov, Aleksandr N. "Dve vstrechi." In I k nim primknushii Shepilov: pravda o cheloveke, uchenom, voine, politike, edited by Tamara Tolchanova and Mikhail Lozhnikov. Moscow: Zvonitsa-MG, 1998.
- Shein, K. I., ed. Kanal Moskva-Volga: spravochnik-putevoditel'. Moscow: Narkomvod, 1937.
- Sheinis, Zinovii S. "Polpred B. E. Shtein: strikhi k biografii," Novata i noveishaia istoriia, 1991, no. 1: 101–16.
- . "Sud'ba diplomata: strikhi k portretu Borisa Shteina." In Arkhivy raskryvuiut tainy . . . Mezhdunarodnye voprosy: sobytia i liudi, edited by V. N. Popov. Moscow: Politizdat, 1991, 286–311.
- . Maksim Maksimovich Litvinov: revoliutsioner, diplomat, chlovek. Moscow: Politizdat, 1989.
- Shelestov, Dmitrii. Vremia Alekseia Rykova. Moscow: Progress, 1990.
- Sheng, Michael M., and John W. Garver. "New Light on the Second United Front: An Exchange," China Quarterly, 129 (1992): 148–93.
- Shentalinskii, Vitalii. "Proshu menia vyslushat' . . . (poslednie dni Babelia)." Vozvrashchenie, 1991, no. 1.
- . Ruby svobody v literaturnykh arkhivakh KGB. Moscow: Parus, 1995, 430–43.

- Shentalinsky, Vitaly. Arrested Voices: Resurrecting the Disappeared Writers of the Soviet Regime. New York: Martin Kessler, 1996.
- . The KGB's Literary Archive. Translated by John Crowfoot. London: Harvill, 1995.
- Shepilov, Dmitrii. The Kremlin's Scholar: A Memoir of Soviet Politics under Stalin and Khrushchev. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2007.
- Shestakov, Andrei V. "Ob izuchenii istorii SSSR." In Ob izuchenii istorii SSSR. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1938, 22–39.
- . Kratkii kurs istorii SSSR: uchebnik dlia 3-go i 4-go klassov. Moscow: Gosudarstvennoe uchebno-pedagogicheskoe izd-vo, 1937.
- , ed. A Short History of the USSR: Textbook for 3rd and 4th classes. Moscow: Cooperative Publishing Society of Foreign Workers in the USSR, 1938.
- Shevelev, M. I. Arktika—sud'ba moia: vospominaniia pervogo nachal'nika poliarnoi aviacii. Voronezh: Modek, 1999.
- Shikshin, V. "Sovetskie nemtsy: U istokov tragedii," Nauka v Sibiri, 1992, no. 28: 5–6.
- Shillony, Ben-Ami. Revolt in Japan: The Young Officers and the February 26, 1936, Incident. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1973.
- Shimotomai, Nabuo. "Springtime for the Politotdel: Local Party Organizations in Crisis," Acta Slavica Iaponica, 4 (1986): 1–34.
- . "A Note on the Kuban Affair (1932–1933): The Crisis of Kolkhoz Agriculture in the North Caucasus," Acta Slavica Iaponica, 1 (1983): 39–56.
- Shirer, William. Berlin Diary: The Journal of a Foreign Correspondent, 1934–1941. New York: Knopf, 1941.
- . The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1960.
- Shirinia, Kirill K. Komintern v 1933 godu. Moscow: Eks libris, 2006.
- Shirokorad, Aleksandr B. Velikii antrakt. Moscow: AST, 2009.
- Shirokov, Anatolii. Dal'stro v sotsial'no-ekonomicheskoe razvitiie severo-vostoka SSSR (1930–1950-e gg.). Moscow: Rosspen, 2014.
- Shishov, Aleksei V. Rossia i Iaponiia: istoriia voennykh konfliktov. Moscow: Veche, 2001.
- Shitts, Ivan I. Dnevnik "velikogo perloma" mart 1928–avust 1931. Paris: YMCA-Press, 1991.
- Shlifshstein, Semen. "Semyon Kotko," Sovetskoe iskustvo, June 29, 1940.
- Shmidt, Sigurd O. "Priemy v Kremle v chest' poliarnikov." In Istoriia Moskv i problemy moskvovedeniia. Moscow: Russkii put', 2004, 272–82.
- Shoemaker, Merle Wesley. "Russo-German Economic Relations, 1850–1914," PhD diss. Syracuse University, 1979.
- "Sholokhov i Stalin: perepiska nachala 30-x godov," Voprosy istorii, 1994, no. 3: 3–25.
- Shore, Zachary. "Hitler's Opening Gambit: Intelligence, Encirclement, and the Decision to Ally with Poland," Intelligence and National Security, 14/3 (1999): 103–22.
- . What Hitler Knew: The Battle for Information in Nazi Foreign Policy. New York: Oxford University, 2003.
- Short, Ken R. M., and Richard Taylor. "Soviet Cinema and the International Menace, 1928–1939," Historical Journal of Film, Radio, and Television, 6/2 (1986): 131–59.
- Short, Philip. Mao: A Life. New York: Henry Holt, 2000.
- Shpanov, Nikolai. "Pervyi udar: povest' o budushchei voine," Znamia, 1939, no. 1: 36–119.
- . Pervyi udar: povest' o budushchei voine. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1939.
- Shreider, Mikhail NKVD iznutri: zapiski cheskista. Moscow: Vozvrashchenie, 1995.
- Shtemenko, S. M. General'nyi shtab v gody voiny. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1968.
- Shubin, A. V. Vozbdi i zagovorshchiki. Moscow: Veche, 2004.
- Shul'gina, N. I. "Teoretiko-metodologicheskie osnovy deiatel'nosti muzeev V. I. Lenina," PhD diss. Moscow, 1989.
- Shumiatskii, Boris Z. "Tvorcheskoe zadachi templana," Sovetskoe kino, 1933, no. 12: 1–15.
- . Kinematografiia millionov: opyt analiza. Moscow: Kinofotoizdat, 1935.
- Shustov, V. "No Other Ambassador Served in So Many Countries," International Affairs, 51/1 (2005): 166–74.
- Shuyun, Sun. The Long March: The True History of Communist China's Founding Myth. New York: Anchor, 2008.

- Shvarts, Anatolii. "Zhizn' i smert' Mikhaila Bulgakova," Kontinent, no. 53 (1987): 10–97, no. 54 (1987): 60–142.
- Shvede, E. E. Voennyy flot Iaponii. Leningrad: ONTI NKTP SSSR, 1936.
- Sibirskaiia Sovetskaiia Entsiklopediia*. 3 vols. Novosibirsk: Sibirskoe kraevoe izd-vo, 1929–32.
- Sibley, Katherine. "Soviet Industrial Espionage against American Military Technology and the US Response, 1930–1945," Intelligence and National Security, 14/2 (1999): 94–123.
- Sidorov, Nikolai. "Veselye rebata"—komediia kontrrevoliutsionnaia," Istochnik, 1995, no. 3: 72–8.
- Siegelbaum, Lewis, and Andrei Sokolov. Stalinism as a Way of Life. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2009.
- . Saakhanovism and the Politics of Productivity in the USSR, 1935–1941. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1988.
- Sigachev, S. "Glavnoe upravlenie stroitel'stva Dal'nego Severa." In Sistema ispravitel'no-trudovykh lagerei v SSSR, edited by N. G. Okhotin and A. B. Roginskii. Moscow: Zvenia, 1998.
- Simmons, Beth A. Who Adjusts? Domestic Sources of Foreign Economic Policy during the Interwar Years. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1994.
- Simms, J. Y. "Economic Impact of the Russian Famine of 1891–92," Slavonic and East European Review, 60/1 (1982): 63–74.
- . "The Crop Failure of 1891: Soil Exhaustion, Technological Backwardness, and Russia's 'Agrarian Crisis,'" Slavic Review, 41/2 (1982): 236–50.
- Simon, John Allsebrook, Viscount. Retrospect: The Memoirs of the Rt Hon. Viscount Simon. London: Hutchinson, 1952.
- Simonov, Konstantin M. "Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia: besedy s marshalom Sovetskogo Soiuzu A.M. Vasilevskim," Znamia, 1998, no. 5.
- . "K biografii G. K. Zhukova." In Marshal Zhukov: Kakim my ego pomnim. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1988.
- . "Zametki k biografii G.K. Zhukova," Voennno-Istoricheskii zhurnal, 1987, no. 9: 48–56.
- . Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia. Moscow: Novosti, 1989.
- Simonov, N. S. Voennno-promyshlennyy kompleks SSSR v 1920–1950-e gody: tempy ekonomicheskogo rosta, struktura, organizatsiia proizvodstva i upravlenie. Moscow: Rosspen, 1996.
- Sinel'nikov, A. Kirov. Moscow: Molodaia gvardiia, 1964.
- Sinitsyn, Elisei T. Rezident svidetel'stvoet. Moscow: Geia, 1996.
- Sinyavsky, Andrei. Soviet Civilization: A Cultural History. New York: Arcade, 1990.
- Sipols, Vilnos Ia. "SSSR i problema mira i bezopasnosti v vostochnoi Evrope (1931–1938 gg.)." In SSSR v bor'be protiv fashistskoi agressii 1933–1945 gg., edited by A. L. Narochitskii et al. Moscow: Nauka, 1976, 8–72.
- . "Torgovo-ekonomicheskie otnosheniia mezhdu SSSR i Germaniei v 1939–1941 gg. v svetle novykh arkhivnykh dokumentov," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1997, no. 2: 29–41.
- . Tainy diplomaticheskii: kanun velikoi otechestvennoi voiny, 1939–1941. Moscow: Institut Rossiiskoi istorii, RAN, 1997.
- Skorokhodov, Gleb A. Mikhail Kol'tsov: kritiko-istoricheskii ocherk. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1959.
- . V poiskakh utrachennogo. Moscow: Rutena, 2000.
- Sladkovskii, M. I. Znakomstvo s Kitaem i kitaisami. Moscow: Mysl', 1984.
- Slavinskii, Boris N. Pakt o neutralitete mezhdu SSSR i Iaponiei: diplomaticheskaiia istoriia 1941–1945 gg. Moscow: Novina, 1995.
- . Vnesniaia politika na Dal'nem vostoce. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1988.
- Slavinskii, Dmitrii B. Sovetskii Soiuiz i Kita: istoriia diplomaticheskikh otnoshenii, 1917–1937 gg. Moscow: Iaponiia segodnia, 2003.
- Slavinsky, Boris N. The Japanese-Soviet Neutrality Pact: A Diplomatic History 1941–1945. London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2003.
- Slezkine, Yuri. "The USSR as a Communal Apartment, or How a Socialist State Promoted Ethnic Particularism," Slavic Review, 53/2 (1994): 414–52.

- Sluch, Sergei Z. "‘Delo Tukhachevskogo’: Veilka li zaslugi SD? (po povodu novoi knigi nemetskogo istorika)," Sovetskoe slavianovedenie, 1992, no. 1: 27–9.
- . "Germano-sovetskie otnosheniia v 1918–1941 gg.: motivy i posledstviia vneshnepoliticheskikh reshenii," Slavianovedenie, 1996, no. 3: 101–13.
- . "Pol'sha v politike Sovetskogo Soiuzi 1938–1939." In Sovetsko-Pol'skie otnosheniia v politicheskikh usloviakh Evropy 30–kh godov XX stoletii: sbornik statei, edited by E. Duraczynski and A. N. Sakharov. Moscow: Nauka, 2001, 156–90.
- . "Rech' Stalina, kotoroi ne bylo," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 2004, no. 1: 113–39.
- Slutskii, A. G. "Bol'sheviiki o germanskoi sotsial-demokratii v period ee predvoennogo krizisa," Proletarskaia revoliutsiia, 1930, no. 6: 38–73.
- Smeliansky, Anatoly. "The Destroyers: Lunacharsky's Letter to Stalin on Censorship at the Moscow Art Theater," Comparative Criticism, 16 (1994): 33–7.
- . Is Comrade Bulgakov Dead? Mikhail Bulgakov at the Moscow Art Theater. New York: Routledge, 1993.
- Smirnov, German V., ed. Krovavyyi marshal: Mikhail Tukhachevskii. St. Petersburg: Korona print, 1997.
- Smith, Edward Ellis. The Young Stalin: The Early Years of an Elusive Revolutionary. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1967.
- Smrž, Jiří. Symphonic Stalinism: Claiming Russian Musical Classics for the New Soviet Listener, 1932–1953. Berlin: Lit, 2011.
- Smyr, G. V. Islam v Abkhazii i puti preodeoleniia ego perezhitkov v sovremennykh usloviakh. Tbilisi: Metsniereba, 1972.
- Smyth, Denis. "Soviet Policy towards Republican Spain: 1936–1939." In The Republic Besieged: The Civil War in Spain, 1936–1939, edited by Paul Preston and Ann L. Mackenzie. Edinburgh: University of Glasgow, 1996, 87–105.
- Snesarev, A. E. Filosofia voyny. Moscow: Lomonosov, 2013.
- Snow, Edgar. Random Notes on China (1936–1945). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1957.
- . Red Star over China. London: Victor Gollancz, 1937.
- Snyder, Jack. "Russian Backwardness and the Future of Europe," Daedalus, 123/2 (1994): 179–201.
- Snyder, Louis. Encyclopedia of the Third Reich. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976.
- Snyder, Timothy. Sketches from a Secret War: A Polish Artist's Mission to Liberate Soviet Ukraine. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2005.
- Sobolev, A. I., ed. Georgii Dimitrov—vydaishchiia deiatel' kommunisticheskogo dvizheniia. Moscow: Politizdat, 1972.
- Sobolev, D. A., and D. B. Khazanov. Nemetskii sled v istorii otechestvennoi aviatsii. Moscow: Rusavia, 2000.
- Sobranie zakonov i rasporiazhenii SSSR*. Moscow: Upravlenie delami Soveta Narodnykh Komissarov SSSR, 1924–1950.
- Sochineniia*. See Stalin, I. V., Sochineniia.
- Sokolov, A. K. Obshchestvo i vlast' v 1930-e gody: povestvovanie v dokumentakh. Moscow: Rosspen, 1998.
- . Ot voenproma k VPK: sovetskaia voennaia promyshlennost' 1917–1941 gg. Moscow: Novyi khronograf, 2012.
- Sokolov, Boris V. Bertiia: sud'ba vsesil'nogo narkoma. Moscow: AST, 2008.
- . Georgii Zhukov. Moscow: AST, 2003.
- . Istreblennye marshaly. Smolensk: Rusich, 2000.
- . Mikhail Tukhachevskii: zhizn' i smert' "Krasnogo marshala". Smolensk: Rusich, 1999.
- . Narkomyi strakha: lagoda, Ezbov, Bertiia, Abakumov. Moscow: AST, 2001.
- . Neizvestnyi Zhukov: portret bez retushi v zerkale epokhi. Minsk: Rodiola-plus, 2000.
- . Tukhachevskii: zhizn' i smert' krasnogo marshala. Moscow: Veche, 2003.
- . Vasilii Stalin. Smolensk: Rusich, 2000.
- Sokolov, V. V. "N. N. Krestinski—revoliutsioner, diplomat," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1989, no. 5: 120–42.
- . "Neizvestnyi G. V. Chicherin: iz rassekrechennykh arkhivov MIID RF," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1994, no. 2: 3–18.

- . "Novye dannye o podgotovke Germanskogo vtorozheniia v SSSR," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 2000, no. 1: 86–9.
- . "Zabytyi diplomat: D. V. Bogomolov (1890–1938)," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 2004, no. 3: 165–95.
- . "Zamestitel' narkoma inostrannykh del B. Stomoniakov." In Otkryvaia novye stranitsy . . . Mezhdunarodnye voprosy: sobytia i liudi, edited by N. V. Popov. Moscow: Politizdat, 1989, 257–93.
- . Na boevykh postakh diplomaticheskogo fronta: zhizn' i deiatel'nost' L.M. Karakhana. Moscow: Politizdat, 1983.
- Soldatenkov, L. D. Politicheskie i natsvestvennye posledstviia usileniia vlasti VKP (b), 1928–1941. St. Petersburg: Otdanie izdatel'stva Prosveshchenie, 1994.
- Solodovnikov, A. V. "My byli molodye togda: vospominaniia." In Teatral'nye stranitsy: sbornik statei. Moscow: Iskustvo, 1979, 186–223.
- Solomon, Jr., Peter H. Soviet Criminal Justice under Stalin. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1996.
- . Soviet Criminologists and Criminal Policy: Specialists in Policy-Making. New York: Columbia University, 1978.
- , ed. Reforming Justice in Russia, 1864–1996: Power, Culture, and the Limits of Legal Order. Armonk, NY, and London: M. E. Sharpe, 1997.
- Solomon, Susan Gross. "Rural Scholars and the Cultural Revolution." In Cultural Revolution in Russia, 1928–1931, edited by Sheila Fitzpatrick. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1978, 129–53.
- Solonin, Mark. "Delo aviatorov," Voenno-promyshlennyi kur'er, June 9, 2010.
- . "Tri plana tovarishcha Stalina." In Pravda Viktora Suvorova: okonchatel'noe reshenie, edited by D. S. Khmlenitsii. Moscow: Iauza, 2009, 31–89.
- Solonitsyn, G. "Nachal'nik soverskoi razvedki," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1979, no. 11: 92–4.
- Solovev, Mikhail. My Nine Lives in the Red Army. New York: D. McKay, 1955.
- Solov'ev, A. G. "Tetradi krasnogo professora, 1912–1941 gg." In Neizvestnaia Rossiia, XX vek, edited by V. A. Kozlov, 4 vols. Moscow: Istoricheskoe nasledie, 1992–3, IV: 140–228.
- Solov'ev, E. D., and A. I. Chugunov, eds. Pogranichnye voiska SSSR, 1929–1938: sbornik dokumentov i materialov. Moscow: Nauka, 1973.
- Solzhenitsyn, Aleksandr. The Gulag Archipelago, 1918–1956: An Experiment in Literary Investigation. 3 vols. New York: Harper & Row, 1974–79.
- Sommer, Erich F. Botschafter Graf Schulenburg: der letzte Vertreter des Deutschen Reiches in Moskau. Asendorf: MUT-Verlag, 1987.
- . Das Memorandum: Wie der Sowjetunion der Krieg erklärt wurde. Munich: Herbig, 1981.
- Sommer, Theo. Deutschland und Japan zwischen den Mächten 1935–1940. Tübingen: Mohr, 1962.
- Sontag, Raymond J. "The Last Months of Peace, 1939," Foreign Affairs, 35/3 (1957): 507–24.
- , and James S. Beddie, eds. Nazi-Soviet Relations, 1939–1941: Documents from the Archives of the German Foreign Office. Washington, D.C.: Department of State, 1948.
- Sorel, Georges. Réflexions sur la violence. Paris: Librairie de pages libres, 1908.
- Sostav rukovodiaschikh rabotnikov i spetsialistov Soiuz SSR*. Moscow: Soiuzorguchet, 1936.
- Sotsialisticheskoe stroitel'stvo v SSSR: statisticheskii ezhegodnik*. Moscow: Soiuzorguchet, 1934.
- Sotskov, Lev F. Neizvestnyi separatizm: na sluzhbe SD i Abvera (Iz sekretnykh dos'e razvedki). Moscow: Ripol klassik, 2003.
- , ed. Pribaltika i geopolitika: sbornik dokumentov. Moscow: SVR, 2006.
- Southworth, Herbert Rutledge. Guernica, Guernica: A Study of Journalism, Diplomacy, Propaganda, and History. Berkeley: University of California, 1997.
- Souvarine, Boris. Staline: Aperçu historique de bolchévisme. Paris: Plon, 1935. Reissued Paris: Editions Champ Libre, 1977. Translated as Stalin: A Critical Survey of Bolshevism. London: Secker and Warburg, 1939.
- Sovetskaiia kul'tura v rekonstruktivnyi period, 1928–1941*. Moscow: Institut istorii SSSR, 1988.
- "Sovetskaiia razvedka i russkaiia voennaia emigratsiia 20–40x gg.: interv'iu s polkovnikom V. N. Karpovym," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1998, no. 3: 119–24.

- Sovetskaia voennaia entsiklopediia*. 8 vols. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1976–80.
- Sovetsko-kitaiskii konflikt 1929: sbornik dokumentov*. Moscow: Litizdat NKID, 1930.
- So Wai Chor. “The Making of the Guomindang’s Japan Policy, 1932–1937: the Roles of Chiang Kai-Shek and Wang Jingwei,” Modern China, 28/2 (2002): 213–51.
- Spáčil, D., and V. F. Mal'tsev, eds. Dokumenty po istorii miunhkhenskogo sgovora 1937–1939. Moscow: Politizdat, 1979.
- Spahr, William J. Zhukov: The Rise and Fall of a Great Captain. Novato, CA: Presidio, 1993.
- Spalcke, Karl. “Der Fall Tuchatschewski: die Wehrmacht, die rote Armee under ‘die grosse Säuberung,’” Die Gegenwart, 13 (1958): 45–8.
- Spaso, Liudmil Iordanovich. Bulgariia i SSSR 1917–1944: politiko-diplomaticeskii otnosheniia. Veliko Turnovo: Faber, 2008.
- Speer, Albert. Erinnerungen. Berlin: Propyläen, 1969.
- . Inside the Third Reich: Memoirs. New York: Macmillan, 1970.
- . Spandauer Tagebücher. Franklin am Main: Propyläen, 1975.
- Spitzzy, Reinhard. So haben wir das Reich verspielt: Bekenntnisse eines Illegalen. 4th ed. Munich: Langen Müller, 1994.
- Spravochnik partiinogo rabotnika*. 9 vols. Moscow: Partizdat, 1921–1935.
- Spring, D. W. “The Soviet Decision for War against Finland, 30 November 1939,” Soviet Studies, 38/2 (1986): 207–26.
- SSSR i Litva v gody vtoroi mirovoi voiny: sbornik dokumentov*. 2 vols. Vilnius: Institut istorii Litvy, 2006.
- Stafford, David A. T. “SOE and British Involvement in the Belgrade Coup d’État of March 1941,” Slavic Review, 36/3 (1977): 399–419.
- Stakhanov, Aleksei G. Rasskaz o moei zhizni. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1937.
- Stalin, I. V. Sochineniia, 13 vols. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1946–51. Vols. 14–16, Robert H. MacNeal, ed. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution, 1967. Cited as Sochineniia (author understood).
- . Voprosy Leninizma. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1939.
- Stalin, Joseph. Leninism. Moscow: Cooperative Publishing Society of Foreign Workers in the USSR, 1933.
- Stalin: k shestidesiatiletiu so dnia rozhdeniia*. Moscow: Pravda, 1940.
- Stalin: sbornik statei k piatidesiatiletiu so dnia rozhdeniia*. Moscow-Leningrad: Gosizdat, 1929.
- Stalin i liudi sovetsskoi strany v izobrazitel'nom iskusstve: katalog vystavki*. Moscow: Tre't'iakovskaia galeriia, 1939.
- Starinov, I. T. Miny zhdut svoego chasa. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1964.
- Starkov, Boris A. “Ar'ergardnye boi staroi partiinoi gvardii.” In Oni ne molchali, edited by A. V. Afanas'ev. Moskva: Politizdat, 1991, 215–25.
- . “Delo Riutina.” In Oni ne molchali, edited by A. V. Afanas'ev. Moskva: Politizdat, 1991, 145–78.
- . “Kak Moskva chut' ne stala Stalinodarem,” Izvestiia TsK KPSS, 1990, no. 12: 126–7.
- . “Narkom Ezhov.” In Stalinist Terror: New Perspectives, edited by J. Arch Getty and Roberta T. Manning. New York: Cambridge University, 1993, 21–39.
- . “The Trial that Was Not Held,” Europe-Asia Studies, 46/8 (1994): 1297–1315.
- . “Trotsky and Ryutin: From the History of the Anti-Stalin Resistance in the 1930s.” In The Trotsky Reappraisal, edited by Terry Brotherstone and Paul Dukes. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University, 1992, 70–83.
- , ed. Martem'ian Riutin: na koleni ne vstanu. Moscow: Politizdat, 1992.
- Starunin, A. I. “Operativnaya vnezapnost',” Voennaia mysl', 1941, no. 3: 7–35.
- Stavinskii, Ervin. Zarubiny: semeinaia rezidenty. Moscow: Olma, 2003.
- Stehlin, Paul. Témoignage pour l'histoire. Paris: Robert Laffant, 1966.
- Steiner, Zara S. “The Soviet Commissariat of Foreign Affairs and the Czechoslovakian Crisis in 1938: New Material from the Soviet Archives,” Historical Journal, 42/3 (1999): 751–9.
- . The Lights that Failed: European International History 1919–1933. Oxford: Oxford University, 2005.
- . The Triumph of the Dark: European International History, 1933–1939. New York: Oxford University, 2011.

- Stepanov, A. F. Rassrel po limitu: iz istorii politicheskikh repressa v TASSR v gody "ezbovshchiny." Kazan: Novoe znanie, 1999.
- Stepanov, A. S. "O masshtabakh repressii v Krasnoi Armii v predvoennye gody," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1993, no. 1: 56–63, no. 2: 71–80, no. 3: 25–34, no. 5: 59–67.
- Stepanov, I. Parizhskaia kommuna 1871 goda i voprosy taktiki proletarskoi revoliutsii. 6th ed. Moscow: Partizdat, 1937.
- Stephan, John J. "'Cleansing' the Soviet Far East, 1937–1938," Acta Slavica Iaponica, 10 (1992): 43–64.
- . The Russian Far East: A History. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 1994.
- Stercho, Peter G. Diplomacy of Double Morality: Europe's Crossroads in Carpatho-Ukraine, 1919–1939. New York: Carpathian Research Center, 1971.
- Stern, Fritz. "National Socialism as Temptation." In Dreams and Delusions: The Drama of German History. New York: Knopf, 1987, 147–91.
- Stern, Ludmila. Western Intellectuals and the Soviet Union, 1920–40: From Red Square to the Left Bank. New York: Routledge, 2007.
- Stikh, M. Zavod griadushchikh urozhav: rostovskii krasnoznamenskii sel'mash. Moscow: Gos. nauchno-tekhnicheskoe izd-vo, 1931.
- Stites, Richard. Russian Popular Culture: Entertainment and Society since 1900. New York: Cambridge University, 1992.
- Stoecker, Sally. Forging Stalin's Army: Marshal Tukhachevsky and the Politics of Military Innovation. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1998.
- Stoletov, V. "Zamechatel'nye knigi o velikikh pobedakh kolkhozov," Sotsialisticheskaya rekonstruktsiia sel'skogo khoziaistva, 1935, no. 6: 180–3.
- Stolfi, R. H. "Equipment for Victory in France in 1940," History, 55/183 (1970): 1–20.
- Stone, David R. "Misreading Svechin: Attrition, Annihilation, and Historicism," Journal of Military History, 76/3 (2012): 673–93.
- . "Tukhachevskii in Leningrad: Military Politics and Exile, 1928–1931," Europe-Asia Studies, 48/8 (1996): 1365–86.
- . Hammer and Rifle: The Militarization of the Soviet Union, 1926–1933. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.
- Storella, Carmine J., and A. K. Sokolov, eds. The Voice of the People: Letters from the Soviet Village, 1918–1932. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2013.
- Stover, William J. "Finnish Military Politics between the Two World Wars," Journal of Contemporary History, 12/4 (1977): 741–5.
- Strang, G. Bruce, ed. Collision of Empires: Italy's invasion of Ethiopia and its International Impact. Burlington, VT: Ashgate, 2013.
- . "Once More unto the Breach: Britain's Guarantee to Poland, March 1939," Journal of Contemporary History, 31/4 (1996): 721–52.
- Strang, William. Home and Abroad. London: Andre Deutsch, 1956.
- Stratigakos, Despina. Hitler at Home. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2015.
- Straus, Kenneth M. Factory and Community in Stalin's Russia: the Making of an Industrial Working Class. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh, 1997.
- Striedter, Jurij. "Journeys through Utopia: Introductory Remarks to the Post-Revolutionary Russian Utopian Novel," Poetics Today, 3/1 (1982): 33–60.
- Strong, Anna Louise. The Stalin Era. New York: Mainstream Publishers, 1956.
- Strong, Kenneth, Major General. Intelligence at the Top: The Recollections of an Intelligence Officer. London: Cassell, 1968.
- Stronski, Stanislaw. "Soviet Russia's Common Cause with Nazi Germany, 1939," Eastern Quarterly, 2/2 (1949): 28–37.

- Struve, Gleb. "The Pan-Soviet Literary Congress," Slavonic and East European Review, 13/39 (1935): 641–3.
- Stuchka, Petr. Kurs Sovetskogo grazhdanskogo prava. 3 vols. Moscow-Leningrad: Gosudarstvennoe sotsialno-ekonomicheskoe izdatelstvo, 1931.
- Sudoplatov, A. P. Tainaia zhizn' generala Sudoplatova: pravda i vymysel o moem otse. 2 vols. Moscow: Soveremennik, Olma, 1998.
- Sudoplatov, Pavel. Razvedka i kreml': zapiski nezbelatel' nogo svidetelia. Moscow: Geja, 1996.
- . Spetsoperatsii: Lubianka i kreml', 1930–1950 gody. Moscow: Olma, 1997.
- , et al. Special Tasks: The Memoirs of an Unwanted Witness, a Soviet Spymaster. Boston: Little, Brown, 1994.
- Sukhanov, Nikolai. Zapiski. 7 vols. Berlin: Z. I. Grzhebin, 1922–23.
- Sukharev, S. V. "Litsedeistvo na poprishche istorii (Beria—apologet kul'ta lichnosti Stalina)," Voprosy istorii KPSS, 1990, no. 3: 102–18.
- Sukharnikova, Tat'iana. "My nagnali takoi velichaiishii, podobaiushchii strakh revoliutsii." Interviewed by Iuliia Kantor. Vremia, Nov. 29, 2007.
- Sukiennicki, Wiktor. "The Establishment of the Soviet Regime in Eastern Poland in 1939," Journal of Central European Affairs, 23/2 (1963): 191–218.
- Sullivan, Brian R. "Fascist Italy's Military Involvement in the Spanish Civil War," Journal of Military History, 59/4 (1995): 697–727.
- Sullivan, Rosemary. Stalin's Daughter: The Extraordinary and Tumultuous Life of Svetlana Alliluyeva. New York: HarperCollins, 2015.
- Sultanbekov, Bulat. "Nikolai Ezhov: Palach i zhertva," Tatarstan, 1992, no. 2.
- Sundaram, Chantal. "Manufacturing Culture: The Soviet State and the Mayakovsky Legend 1930–1993." PhD diss. University of Toronto, 2000.
- Suny, Ronald Grigor, ed. The Structure of Soviet History: Essays and Documents. Oxford: Oxford University, 2003.
- . The Making of the Georgian Nation. 2nd ed. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1994.
- Suslov, Andrei B. "'Revolution from Above': 'Dekulakization' as a Part of Stalin's Social Revolution (The Case of the Perm Region)." Unpublished manuscript.
- Sutton, Anthony C. Western Technology and Soviet Economic Development 1930–1945. 3 vols. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution, 1968–73.
- Suvenirov, Oleg F. "Klim, Koba skazal," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1988, no. 12: 51–60.
- . "Narkomat oborony i NKVD v predvoennye gody," Voprosy istorii, 1991, no. 6: 26–35.
- . "Za chest' i dostoinstvo voinov RKKa." In Oni ne molchali, edited by A. V. Afanas'ev. Moscow: Politizdat, 1991, 372–87.
- . Tragediia RKKa 1937–1938. Moscow: Terra, 1998.
- Suyin, Han. Eldes Son: Zhou Enlai and the Making of Modern China. New York: Hill and Wang, 1994.
- Svechin, A. A. Srategiia. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1927.
- Svetlanin, Andrei [Nikolai Likhachev]. Dal'nevostochnyi zagovor. Frankfurt am Main: Posev, 1953.
- Svetlitshin, N. A. Krutye stupeni sud'by: zhizn' i ratnye podvigi marshala G. K. Zhukova. Khabarovsk: Khabarovskoe knizhnoe izd-vo, 1992.
- Svirin, M. N. Bronia krepka: istoriia sovetskogo tanka 1919–1937. Moscow: Eksmo, 2006.
- Svolik, Milan W. The Politics of Authoritarian Rule. New York: Cambridge University, 2012.
- Sweeting, George Vincent. "Building the Arsenal of Democracy: The Government's Role in Expansion of Industrial Capacity, 1940 to 1945." PhD diss. Columbia University, 1994.
- Swianiewicz, Stanislaw. Forced Labor and Economic Development: An Enquiry into the Experience of Soviet Industrialization. New York: Oxford University, 1965.
- Syrtsov, Sergei. O nashikh uspekhakh, nedostatkakh i zadachakh. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1930.
- Szamuely, Tibor. "The Elimination of Opposition between the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Congresses of the CPSU," Soviet Studies, 17/3 (1966): 318–38.

- Szikalai, Laszlo. After the Revolution: Georg Lukács's Marxist Development, 1930–1945. Budapest: Akademia Kiado, 1992.
- Tabouis, Geneviève. They Called Me Cassandra. New York: Scribner, 1942.
- Táiny diplomatii Tret'ego Reikka: germanskíe diplomaty, rukovoditeli zarubezhnykh voennykh misií, voennye i politické attaché v sovetskom plenu. Dokumenty iz sledstvennykh del. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratii, 2011.
- Takala, I. "Natsional'nye operatsii OGPU/NKVD v Karelii." In V sem'e edinói: natsional'naia politika partii bol'shevikov i ee osushchestvlenie na Severo-Zapade Rossii v 1920–1950-e gody, edited by V. Vikavainen and Takala. Petrozavosk: Izd-vo petrozavodskogo universiteta, 1998, 161–206.
- Táng, Peter S. H. Russian Policy in Manchuria and Outer Mongolia, 1911–1931. Durham, NC: Duke University, 1959.
- Tanin, O., and E. Kogan. Voennno-fashistskoe dvizhenie v Iaponii. Moscow: Partizdat, 1933.
- Taniuchi, Yuzuru. The Village Gathering in Russia in the Mid-1920s. Birmingham, UK: University of Birmingham, 1968.
- Tanner, Väinö. The Winter War: Finland against Russia, 1939–1940. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 1957.
- Taranova, Alla. Golos Stalina. St. Petersburg: Partner SPb, 2010.
- Taranovsky, Theodore K. "Osobennosti rossiiskoi samoderzhavnoi monarkhii v XIX stoletii." In Rossiiskaia monarkhiia: voprosy istorii i teorii, edited by M. D. Karpachev. Voronezh: Istoki, 1998, 157–71.
- Taraskov, A. "Pasternak: chernovye zapisi 1934–1939," Voprosy literatury, 1990, no. 4: 96–101.
- Tardy, L. "The Caucasus Peoples and their Neighbours in 1404." In Acta Orientalia Academiae Scientiarum Hung. XXXII/1 (1978): 83–111.
- Tarkhanov, Alexei, and Sergeo Kavaradze. Architecture of the Stalin Era. New York: Rizzoli, 1992.
- Tarkhova, N. S. "Krasnaia armia i kollektivizatsiia sovetskoi derevni, 1928–1933: avtoreferat dissertatsii doktora istoricheskikh nauk," Saratov, 2006.
- . Krasnaia armia i stalinskaia kollektivizatsiia, 1928–1933 gg. Moscow: Rosspen, 2010.
- , et al., eds. "Zimniaia voina": Rabota nad osibkami, april'–mai 1940 g. Materialy komisii Glavnogo voennogo soveta Krasnoi Armii po obobshcheniiu opyta Finskoi kampanii. Moscow: Letnii sad, 2004.
- Taruskin, Richard. "The Opera and the Dictator: the Peculiar Martyrdom of Dmitri Shostakovich," New Republic, March 20, 1989.
- Tatimov, Maqash B. Sotsial'naia obuslovlennost' demograficheskikh protsessov. Alma-Ata: Nauka Kazakhskoi SSR, 1989.
- Taubman, William. Nikita Khrushchev. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 2000.
- Tauger, Mark B. "Natural Disaster and Human Actions, 1931–1933," Carl Beck Papers, University of Pittsburgh, Center for Russian and East European Studies, no. 1506 (2001).
- . "Soviet Peasants and Collectivization: Resistance and Adaptation," Journal of Peasant Studies, 31/3–4 (2004): 427–56.
- . "Stalin, Soviet Agriculture, and Collectivization." In Food and Conflict in Europe in the Age of the Two World Wars, edited by Frank Trentmann and Flemming Just. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006, 109–42.
- . "The 1932 Harvest and the Famine of 1933," Slavic Review, 50/1 (1991): 70–89.
- . "The People's Commissariat of Agriculture." In Decision-making in the Stalinist Command Economy, 1932–37, edited by E. A. Rees. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 1997, 150–75.
- Taunton, Matthew. "Russia and the British Intellectuals: The Significance of the Stalin-Wells Talk." In Russia in Britain: Melodrama to Modernism, edited by Rebecca Beasley and Philip Bullock. New York: Oxford University, 2013, 209–24.
- Taylor, A. J. P. The Origins of the Second World War. 2nd ed. Greenwich, CT: Fawcett, 1965.
- Taylor, Frederick, ed. The Goebbels Diaries 1939–1941. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1983.
- Taylor, Jay. The Generalissimó: Chiang Kai-shek and the Struggle for Modern China. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University, 2009.

- Taylor, Richard, and Ian Christie, eds. The Film Factory: Russian and Soviet Cinema in Documents, 1896–1939. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1988.
- . "Ideology as Mass Entertainment: Boris Shumyatsky and Soviet Cinema in the 1930s." In Inside the Film Factory: New Approaches to Russian and Soviet Cinema, edited by Richard Taylor and Ian Christie. London: Routledge, 1991, 193–216.
- . "Singing on the Steppes for Stalin: Ivan Pyr'ev and the Kolkhoz Musical in Soviet Cinema," Slavic Review 58/1 (1999): 143–59.
- . "The Illusion of Happiness and the Happiness of Illusion: Grigorii Aleksandrov's The Circus," Slavonic and East European Review, 74/4 (1996): 601–20.
- Taylor, Sally J. Stalin's Apologist: Walter Duranty, the New York Times Man in Moscow. New York: Oxford University, 1990.
- Taylor, Telford. Sword and Swastika: Generals and Nazis in the Third Reich. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1952.
- Teichman, Christian. "Canals, Cotton, and the Limits of De-Colonization in Soviet Uzbekistan, 1924–1941," Central Asia Survey, 26/4 (2007): 499–519.
- "Telegramma I. F. Dergacheva I. I. Proskurovu," Izvestiia TsK KPSS, 1990, no. 3: 220.
- Telitsyn, V. L., et al., eds. Stalin: diktator v "zerkale" inostrannoï pressy. Moscow: Olma, 2006.
- Tel'man, Josef. "Riutin protiv Stalina," Sekret, Jan. 15, 2012.
- Teodor, Gladkov. Nagrada za vernost'—kazn'. Moscow: Tsentrpoligraf, 2000.
- Tepliakov, Aleksei G. "Personal i povsednevnost' Novosibirskogo UNKVD v 1936–1946," Minushee: istoricheskii al'manakh, no. 21 (1997): 240–93.
- . "Sibir': protsedura ispolneniia smertnykh prigovorov 1920–1930-x godov," Golos Sibiri, 2004.
- . Mashina Terrora: OGPU-NKVD Sibiri v 1929–1941 gg. Moskva: Novyi Khronograf; AIRO-XXI, 2008.
- Terayama, Kyosuke. "Soviet Policies toward Mongolia after the Manchurian Incident, 1931–34." In Facets of Transformation of the Northeast Asian Countries, edited by Yoshida Tadashi and Hiroki Oka. 2 vols. Sendai, Japan: CNEAS Tohoku University, 1998, 37–66.
- Teroni, Sandra, and Wolfgang Klein, eds. Pour le défense de la culture: les textes du Congrès international des écrivains, Paris, juin 1935. Dijon: Éditions universitaire du Dijon, 2005.
- Terras, Victor. Vladimir Mayakovsky. Boston: Twayne, 1983.
- Teske, Hermann, ed. General Ernst Köstring: Der militärische Mittler zwischen dem Deutschen Reich und der Sowjeunion 1921–1941. Frankfurt am Main: E. S. Mittler & Sohn, 1965.
- Thayer, Charles W. Bears in the Caviar. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1951.
- Theses and Decisions, Thirteenth Plenum of the ECCL*. Moscow: Co-operative Publishing Society of Foreign Workers in the USSR, 1934.
- Thies, Jochen. Architekt der Weltherrschaft: die "Endziele" Hitlers. Düsseldorf: Droste, 1976.
- Thomas, Georg. Geschichte der deutschen Wehr- und Rüstungswirtschaft (1918–1943/45). Boppard am Rhein: Harald Boldt Verlag, 1966.
- Thomas, Hugh. The Spanish Civil War. New York: Modern Library, 2001.
- Thomas, Martin. "France and the Czechoslovak Crisis," Diplomacy and Statecraft, 10/2–3 (1999): 122–59.
- Thompson, Neville. The Anti-Appeasers: Conservative Opposition to Appeasement in the 1930s. Oxford: Clarendon, 1971.
- Thorndike, Anneli, Andrew Thorndike, and Karl Raddatz. Unternehmen Teutonenschwert: die grosse Karriere eines kleinen Spions. Berlin: Ministerium für Nationale Verteidigung, 1959. Translated as Operatsiia "Tevtonskii mekh": bol'shaia kar'era melkogo shpiona. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1960.
- Thorne, Christopher. The Limits of Foreign Policy: The West, the League, and the Far Eastern Crisis of 1931–1933. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1972.
- Thorniley, Daniel. The Rise and Fall of the Soviet Rural Communist Party, 1927–1939. New York: Macmillan, 1988.
- Thurston, Robert W. Life and Terror in Stalin's Russia, 1934–1941. New Haven, CT, and London: Yale University, 1996.

- Tichanova, Valentina. Rastrel'nye spiski, no. 2: Vaganskoe kladbishche, 1926–1936. Moscow: Tekst, 1995.
- Tien-Wei Wu. The Sian Incident: A Pivotal Point in Modern Chinese History. Ann Arbor: Center for Chinese Studies, University of Michigan, 1976.
- Tikhonov, Galin. The Master and the Slave: Lukács, Bakhtin, and the Ideas of their Time. Oxford: Clarendon, 2000.
- Tikhomirov, G. A. Viacheslav Mikhailovich Molotov: kratkaia biografiia. Moscow: politicheskaia literatura, 1940.
- Tikhomirov, V. A. Promyslovaia kooperatsiia na sovremennom etape. Moscow: [s.n.], 1931.
- Tikhvinskii, S. L. "Zakliuchenie sovetско-іaponskogo pakta o neitralitete 1941 g.," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1990, no. 1: 21–4.
- Tillotson, H. M. Finland at Peace and War, 1918–1993. Rev. ed. Welby, Norwich: Michael Russell, 1996.
- Tinchenko, Iaroslav. Golgofo ruskogo ofitserova v SSSR: 1930–1931 gody. Moscow: Moskovskii obshchestvennyi nauch. fond, 2000.
- Tippelskirch, Kurt von. Geschichte des Zweiten Weltkriegs. 2nd ed. Bonn: Athenäum, 1956.
- Tisminets, A. S., ed. Vneshniaia politika SSSR, 1917–1946 gg.: sbornik dokumentov. 4 vols. Moscow: OGIZ, 1944–46.
- Titarenko, Mikhail L. Kommuunisticheskii internacional i kitaiskaia revoliutsii: dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: Nauka, 1986.
- . VKP (b), Komintern i Kitai, 1920–1943: dokumenty. 8 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 1996–2007.
- Tiulenev, I. V. Cherez tri voiny: vospomniania komanduiushchego iuzhnykh i zakavkazskimi frontami. Moscow: Tsentrpoligraf, 2007. Previously published by Voenizdat, 1960, 1972.
- "Tiuremnye zapiski Rikharda Zorge," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1994, no. 4–5: 141–76, no. 6: 91–116, 1995, no. 2: 79–100.
- Tkhorzhevskii, Iv. "Cherez sto let," Vozrozhdenie, February 6, 1937.
- Tocqueville, Alexis de. The Old Regime and the French Revolution. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1955.
- Tokaev, Grigory A. Betrayal of an Ideal. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1955.
- . S大林 Means War. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1951.
- Tokarev, V. A. "Kará panam! Kará: Pol'skaia tema v predvoennom kino (1939–1941 gg.)," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 2003, no. 6: 47–59.
- Tokushirō, Ōhata. "The Anti-Comintern Pact, 1935–1939." In Deterrent Diplomacy: Japan, Germany, and the USSR 1935–1940, edited by James W. Morley. New York: Columbia University, 1976, 9–111.
- Tolliver, Col. Raymond F., and Trevor J. Constable. Fighter General: The Life of Adolph Galland. Atglen, PA: Schiffer Publishing, 1999.
- Tolmachaev, V. A. "Sovetskii Soiuz i Ispaniia: opyt i uroki internacional'noi pomoshchi (1936–1939)." PhD diss. Leningrad, 1991.
- Tolstoi, Aleksei, and Vsevolod Vishnevskii. "Ob avtorskom prave," Pravda, June 26, 1937.
- Tolstova, Natalya A. Vnimanie, vkluchaiu mikrofon! Moscow: Iskustvo, 1972.
- Tolstoy, Leo. The Kingdom of God Is within You: Christianity not as a Mystic Religion but as a New Theory of Life. New York: Castell, 1894.
- Tolstoy, Nikolai. The Tolstoy: Twenty-Four Generations of Russian History. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1983.
- Tomasevich, Jozo. War and Revolution in Yugoslavia, 1941–1945: Occupation and Collaboration. Stanford, CA: Stanford University, 1975.
- Tooze, J. Adam. The Deluge: The Great War and the Remaking of the Global Order, 1916–1931. New York: Viking, 2014.
- . Wages of Destruction: The Making and Breaking of the Nazi Economy. New York: Viking, 2006.
- Toptygin, Aleksei. Laurentii Beriia: Neizvestnyi marshal gosbezopasnosti. Moscow: Iauza-EKSMO, 2005.
- . Neizvestnyi Beriia. Moscow: Olma, 2002.
- Toscano, Mario. Origins of the Pact of Steel. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University, 1964.
- Toshihiko, Shimada. "The Extension of Hostilities, 1931–1932." In Japan Erupts: The London Naval Conference and the Manchurian Incident, 1928–1932, edited by James William Morley. New York: Columbia University, 1984: 241–

Tottle, Douglas. Fraud, Famine and Fascism: The Ukrainian Genocide Myth from Hitler to Harvard. Toronto: Progress Press, 1987.

Tournier, Michael, ed. Les archives secrètes de la Wilhelmstrasse, 6 vols. Vol. III. Paris: Librairie Plon, 1950.

“‘Tovarishch neznakomaia’: iz perepiski I. V. Stalina,” Istochnik, 2001, no. 2: 51–2.

Toynbee, A. J. Acquaintances. London: Oxford University, 1967.

———, ed. Survey of International Affairs, 1936. Oxford: Oxford University, 1937.

Tracy, Michael. Agriculture in Western Europe: Challenge and Response, 1880–1980. 2nd ed. New York: Granada, 1982.

Tranchel, Kate. Under the Influence: Working-class Drinking, Temperance, and Cultural Revolution in Russia, 1895–1932. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh, 2006.

Trapeznikov, Sergei P. Istoricheskii opyt KPSS v sotsialisticheskom preobrazovanii sel'skogo khoziaistva. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1959.

———. Kommunisticheskaia partiia v period nastupleniia sotsializma po vsemu frontu: pobeda kol'khoznogo stroia v derevne, 1929–1932 gg. Moscow: VPSH, 1961.

Trauberg, Il. “Proizvedenie mysli i strasti: Lenin v 1918 godu,” Iskusstvo kino, 1939, no. 3.

———. “Rasskaz o velikom vozhdie: o stsenarii ‘Lenin,’” Iskusstvo kino, 1939, no. 1.

Trefousse, H. L. Germany and American Neutrality, 1939–1941: An Analysis of Axis Diplomacy. New York: Bookman Associates, 1951.

Treglown, Jeremy. Franco's Crypt: Spanish Culture and Memory since 1936. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2013.

Trembitskii, A. A. Po zapadnomu okrugu: Fili, Kuntsevo, opisanie zhizni rodnoi zemli. Moscow: Sputnik, 1999.

Trepper, Léopold. Bol'shaia igra: gody ucheniia “Krasnyi orkestr” vozvrashchenie, vospominaniia sovetskogo razvedchika. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1990.

———. The Great Game: Memoirs of the Spy Hitler Couldn't Silence. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1977.

Tret'ia sessiia Verkhovnogo Soveta SSSR, 25–31 maiia 1939 g: stenograficheskii otchet. Moscow: Verkhovnyi Sovet SSSR, 1939.

Trevor-Roper, Hugh, ed. Le Testament politique de Hitler: Notes recueillies par Martin Bormann. Paris: Hachette, 1959.

———. Hitler's War Directives, 1939–1945. London: Sidgwick & Jackson, 1964.

———. Last Days of Hitler. 2nd ed. London: Macmillan, 1962.

Trial of the Anti-Soviet “Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites.” Moscow: Moscow News, 1938.

Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal. 42 vols. Nuremberg, Germany: International Military Tribunal, 1947–49.

Triandafilov, Vladimir. Kharakter operatsii sovremennoi armii. Moscow: Gosizdat, otdel voennoi literatury, 1929. 2nd ed. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1937.

Trotskii, Leon. “Nuzhno chestnoe vnutripartiinoe soglasenie [March 30, 1933],” Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 34 (May 1933): 29–30.

———. “Otkrytoe pis'ma prezidiumu TsIKa Soiuzu SSR,” Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 27 (March 1932): 1–6.

———. “Stalinskaia burokratiia i ubiistvo Kirova: otvet amerikanskim druž'am,” Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 41 (1935): 1–10.

———. Chto i kak proizoshlo: shest' statei dlia mirovoi burzhuaznoi pechati. Paris: Navarre, 1929.

———. Dnevnik i pisma. Tenafly, NJ: Ermitage, 1986, 1990.

———. Literatura i revoliutsiia. Moscow: Krasnaia nov', 1923.

———. Moia zhizn': opyt avtobiografii. 2 vols. Berlin: Granit, 1930.

———. Portrety revoliutsionerov, edited by Iu. Fel'shtinskii. Benson, VT: Chalidze, 1984.

———. Sochineniia. 21 vols. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1920–27.

———. “Stalin—Intendant Gitlera,” Biulleten' Oppozitsii, 79–80 (August–October, 1939).

Trotsky, Leon. Stalin: An Appraisal of the Man and His Influence. New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1941.

- . Stalin: An Appraisal of the Man and His Influence. Revised edition. London: Wellred, 2016.
- . Stalins Verbrechen. Zürich: Jean Christophe-Verlag, 1937. Translated as Prestupleniia Stalina. Moscow: Gumanitarnaia literatura, 1994.
- . “Balance Sheet of the Finnish Events” [April 25, 1940], The Fourth International, 1/2 (1940): 41–4.
- . “Preliminary Comments on the Sixteenth Congress.” In Writings of Leon Trotsky (1930–1931), edited by George Breitman and Sarah Lovell. New York: Pathfinder, 1973.
- . “The Lesson of Spain,” Socialist Appeal [Chicago] 2/8 (Sept. 1936).
- . “The Lessons of Spain: The Last Warning,” Socialist Appeal [New York], Jan. 8 and Jan. 15, 1938.
- . “The New Constitution of the USSR,” The New Militant [New York], May 9, 1936.
- . In Defense of Marxism (against the petty-bourgeois opposition). New York: Pioneer, 1942.
- . Literature and Revolution. Translated by Rose Strunsky. New York: International Publishers, 1925.
- . Portraits: Political and Personal. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1977.
- . The Revolution Betrayed: What Is the Soviet Union and Where Is It Going? London: Faber, 1937.
- . The Spanish Revolution, 1931–1939. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1973.
- . The Writings of Leon Trotsky, 1929. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1975.
- . The Writings of Leon Trotsky, 1935–1936. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1977.
- . The Writings of Leon Trotsky, 1936–1937. 2nd ed. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1978.
- . The Writings of Leon Trotsky, 1938–1939. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1974.
- Trotter, William F. A Frozen Hell: The Russo-Finnish War of 1939–1940. Chapel Hill, NC: Algonquin Books, 1992.
- Troyat, Henri. Gorky. New York: Crown, 1989.
- Tsarev, Oleg. “Poslednii polet ‘Chernoi Berty.’” In Ocherki istorii rossiiskoi vneshnei razvedki, edited by E. M. Primakov. 6 vols. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1996–2007, III: 433–40.
- , and Nigel West. KGB v Anglii. Moscow: Zentrpoligraf, 1999.
- Tsimbal, S. “Obraz Lenina v kino,” Iskusstvo kino, 1938, no. 1, 13–17.
- Tucker, Robert C. “Stalin and Stalinism: Sources and Outcomes,” in Stalinismus vor dem zweiten Weltkrieg: neue Wege der Forschung, edited by Manfred Hildermeier and E. Müller-Luckner. Munich: R. Oldenbourg Verlag, 1998.
- . “Stalinism as Revolution from Above.” In Stalinism: Essays in Historical Interpretation, edited by Robert C. Tucker. New York: W. W. Norton, 1977, 77–110.
- . “The Emergence of Stalin’s Foreign Policy,” Slavic Review, 36/4 (1977): 563–89.
- . “The Rise of Stalin’s Personality Cult,” American Historical Review, 84/2 (1979): 347–66.
- . Political Culture and Leadership in Soviet Russia. New York: W. W. Norton, 1987.
- . Stalin as Revolutionary, 1879–1929: A Study in History and Personality. New York: W. W. Norton, 1973.
- . Stalin in Power: The Revolution from Above, 1929–1941. New York: W. W. Norton, 1990.
- . The Marx-Engels Reader. 2nd ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 1978.
- , and Stephen F. Cohen, eds. The Great Purge Trial. New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1965.
- Tukhachevskii, Mikhail N. “O strategicheskikh vzgliadakh Prof. Svechina.” In Protiv reaktsionnykh teorii na voenno-nauchnom fronte. Moscow: Gosvoenizdat, 1931, 3–16.
- . Budushchaia voina. Moscow: Klub realisty, 1928.
- . Izbrannye proizvedeniia. 2 vols. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1964.
- . Zadachi oborony SSSR: rech’ 15 ianvaria 1936 g. Moscow: Partizdat, 1936.
- Tulumdzian, A. O., ed. S’ezdy sovetov Abkhazii: sbornik dokumentov i materialov (1922–1923). Sukhumi: Abgosizdat, 1959.
- Tumkina-Perfil’eva, L. M. Russkii etiket ot Vladimira Monomakhha do nashikh dnei. Moscow: Russkie idei, 2010.
- Tumshis, Mikhail A. “Eshche raz o kadrakh chekistov 30-x godov,” Voprosy istorii, 1993, no. 6: 190–1.
- . VChK, voina klanov: Lubianka bez retushi. Moscow: Eksmo, 2004.
- , and Aleksander Papchinskii. 1937, bol’shaia chistka: NKVD protiv ChK. Moscow: Yauza-EKSMO, 2009.
- Tuominen, Arvo. The Bells of the Kremlin: An Experience of Communism. Hanover: University of New England, 1983.

- Tupitsyn, Margarita. The Soviet Photograph, 1924–1937. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1996.
- Tupper, S. M. "The Red Army and the Defence Industry, 1934–1941." PhD diss. University of Birmingham, UK, 1982.
- Turchenko, Sergei. "Zhenshiny diktatora," Trud, October 2, 1999.
- Turkan, G. A. Ian Rudzutak. Moscow: Academy of Sciences, 1963.
- Turner, Henry Ashby, Jr. Hitler's Thirty Days to Power. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1996.
- Turovskaiia, Maia. "I. A. Pyr'ev i ego musikal'nye komedii: k problem zhanra," Kionvedcheskie zapiski, 1988, no. 1: 111–46.
- . "Volga-Volga i ego vremia," Iskusstvo kino, 1998, no. 3: 59–64.
- Tursunbaev, A. B. "Torzhestvo kolkhoznogo stroia v Kazakhstane." In Ocherki istorii kollektivizatsii, edited by Victor P. Danilov. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1963, 259–308.
- Turzhanskii, A. A. "Vo glave Sovetskoii aviatsii." In Revvoensoviet nas v boi zovet, edited by N. V. Ivushkin. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1967, 183–9.
- Tynchenko, Iaroslav. Golgofa russkogo ofitserstva v SSSR, 1930–1931 gody. Moscow: Moskovskii obshchestvennyi nauchnyi fond, 2000.
- 1933 god: sbornik ocherkov i statei. Moscow: Sovetskaia literatura, 1934.
- Tzitzernak, K. "Aghassi Khanjian," Armenian Review, 3/2 (1950): 58–9.
- Ubiria, Grigol. Soviet Nation-Building in Central Asia: The Making of the Kazakh and Uzbek Nations. London and New York: Routledge, 2016.
- Uimanov, V. N., and Iu. A. Petrukhin, eds. Bol' liudskaia: kniga pamiati tolichei, represiovannykh v 30–40-e i nachale 50-x. 5 vols. Tomsk: Upr. KGB SSSR po Tomskoi oblasti, 1991–5, V: 102–11.
- Ulam, Adam B. "The Price of Sanity." In Stalinism: Its Impact on Russia and the World, edited by G. R. Urban. London: Maurice Temple Smith, 1982.
- . Expansion and Coexistence: Soviet Foreign Policy, 1917–1973. New York: Praeger, 1974.
- . Stalin: The Man and His Era. New York: Viking, 1973.
- Ulanovskaia, Nadezhda, and Maia Ulanovskaia. Istoriia odnoi sem'i. New York: Chalidze, 1982.
- Uldricks, Teddy J. "The Impact of the Great Purges on the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs," Slavic Review, 36/2 (1977): 187–204.
- Ullman, Richard. "The Davies Mission and United States-Soviet Relations, 1937–1941," World Politics, 9/2 (1957): 220–39.
- Ullrich, Volker. Hitler: Ascent 1889–1939. New York: Knopf, 2016.
- "U nas malo rassstreivaiut': beseda I. V. Stalina s A. Babiusom," Istochnik, 1999, no. 1: 101–5.
- Unger, Aryeh L. "Stalin's Renewal of the Leading Cadres: A Note on the Great Purge," Soviet Studies, 20/3 (1969): 321–30.
- . Constitutional Development in the USSR: A Guide to the Soviet Constitutions. London: Methuen, 1981.
- Upadyshev, N. V. "Ot Solovkov k Gulagu: zarochdenie sovetsoi lagernoi sistemy," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 2006, no. 6: 85–94.
- Upton, A. F. Finland, 1939–40. Newark: University of Delaware, 1974.
- Uralov, Alexander [A. Avtorkhnov]. The Reign of Stalin. Westport, CT: Hyperion Press, 1953.
- Urushadze, N. Sandro Akhmeteli. Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1990.
- Ushakov, S. Iu., and A. A. Stukalov. Front voennykh prokurorov. Moscow: Vyatka, 2000.
- Ustinov, D. F. Vo imia pobedy. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1988.
- Utesov, Leonid. Spasibo, Serdse! Moscow: Vagrius, 1999.
- Utley, Freda. "Germany and Japan," Political Quarterly, 8/1 (1937): 51–65.
- Utzitz, Friedrich. Zeugen der Revolution: Mitkämpfer Lenins und Stalins berihcten. Cologne: Bund-Verlag, 1984.
- Vaganov, F. M. Pravyi uklon v VKP (b) i ego razgrom, 1928–1930. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1970.
- Vagts, Alfred. "Capitalist Encirclement: a Russian Obsession—Genuine or Feigned?" Journal of Politics, 18/3 (1956): 499–519.

- Vainrub, M. G. Eti stal'nye parnii: povesti o perezhitom. Kiev: Modol', 1972.
- Vaiskopf, Mikhail Ia. Pisatel' Stalin. Moscow: Novoe literaturnoe obozrenie, 2001.
- Vakar, Nicholas. Byelorussia: The Making of a Nation. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1956.
- Vakar, Nikolai. "Stalin: po vospominaniiam N.N. Zhordaniia," Posledni novosti, Dec. 16, 1936.
- . "P. N. Milukov v izgnan'e," Novyi zhurnal, no. 6 (1943): 369–78.
- Vaksberg, Arkadi. Alexandra Kollontai. Paris: Fayard, 1996.
- . Hôtel Luc: les partis frères au service de l'Internationale communiste. Paris: Fayard, 1993.
- . Neraskrytye тайны. Moscow: Novosti, 1993.
- Valedinskii, Ivan Aleksandrovich. "Organizm Stalina vpolne zdorovyi," Istochnik, 1998, no. 2: 68–73.
- Valentinov, N. V. "Sut' bolshevizma v izobrazhenii Iu. Piatakova," Novy Zhurnal, no. 52 (1958): 146–9.
- . Nasledniki Lenina. Benson, VT: Chalidze, 1990.
- van Atta, Don. "The USSR as a 'Weak State': Agrarian Origins of Resistance to Perestroika," World Politics, 42/1 (1989): 129–49.
- van Dyke, Carl. "Legko otdelalis'," Rodina, 1995, no. 12: 113–6.
- . The Soviet Invasion of Finland, 1939–40. London and Portland, OR: Frank Cass, 1997.
- van Ree, Erik. "Stalin and the National Question," Revolutionary Russia, 7/2 (1994): 214–38.
- . "Stalin as Marxist: the Western Roots of Stalin's Russification of Marxism." In Stalin: A New History, edited by Sarah Davies and James Harris. New York: Cambridge University, 2005, 159–80.
- . The Political Thought of Joseph Stalin: A Study in Twentieth-Century Revolutionary Patriotism. New York: RoutledgeCurzon, 2002.
- van Slyke, Lyman. Enemies and Friends. Stanford, CA: Stanford: University, 1964.
- Vannikov, Boris L. "Iz zapisok narkoma vooruzheniia," Voenno-Istoricheskii zhurnal, 1962, no. 2: 78–86.
- Vansittart, Lord Robert. The Mist Procession. London: Hutchinson, 1958.
- . "Vskryt' cherez 25 let," Polis, 1991, no. 3: 148–63.
- Varga, Jenő. "Mezhdunarodnoe polozhenie (na konets iunია)," Mirovoe khoziaistvo i mirovaia politika, 1940, no. 6: 15–6.
- . "Konets Locarno," Mirovoe khoziaistvo i mirovaia politika, 1936, no. 4: 5–15.
- Vasil'ev, Valerii. "30-e gody na Ukraine," Kommunist, 1990, no. 17: 77–82.
- . "Krest'iane vosstaniia na Ukraine, 1929–1930 gg.," Svobodnaia mysl', 1992, no. 9: 70–8.
- . "Tsena golodnogo khleba: politika rukovodstva SSSR i USSSR v 1932–1933 gg." In Komandiri velikogo golodu: poizdki V. Molotova i L. Kaganovicha v Ukrainu ta na Pivnichnii Kavkaz, 1932–1933 rr, edited by Valerii Vasil'ev and Iu. Shapoval. Kiev: Heneza, 2001.
- , and Lynne Viola, eds. Kollektivizatsiia i krest'ianskoe soprotivlenie na Ukraine, noiabr' 1929–mart 1930 gg. Vinnitsa: Lohos, 1997.
- Vasileva, Larisa. Kremlin Wives. New York: Arcade, 1994.
- Vasil'eva, Larisa. Kremlevskie zheny. Moscow: Vagrius, 2001.
- Vasil'evich, I., and A. Sgibnev. "Podvig v teni eshafota," Pogranichnik, 1988, no. 11.
- Vasilevskii, A. M. Delo vsei zhizni. 7th ed. 2 vols. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1990.
- . A Lifelong Cause. Moscow: Progress Publishers, 1981. Originally published in Russian as Delo vsei zhizni. Moscow: Politizdat, 1974.
- Vasiliev, Valerii. "The Great Terror in the Ukraine, 1936–38." In Stalin's Terror Revisited, edited by Melanie Ilić. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.
- Vassiltchikov, Marie. The Berlin Diaries of Marie "Misie" Vassiltchikov. London: Methuen, 1985.
- Vatlin, A. Iu., and L. N. Malashenko, eds. Istoriia VKP (b) v portretakh i karikaturakh ee vozhdiei. Moscow: Rosspen, 2007.
- Vauhnik, Vladimir. Memoiren eines Militärattachés. Buenos Aires: Editorial Palabra Elsovena, 1967.
- Vedenin, A. Ia. Gody i liudi: vospominaniia. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1964.

Vehviläinen, Olli. "Trudnaia doroga k miru." In Zimnaia voina 1939–1940, edited by Oleg A. Rzhevskii and Olli Vehviläinen. 2 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 1998, 228–59.

———. Finland in the Second World War: Between Germany and Russia. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.

Velikii letchik nashego vremeni. Moscow: OGIZ, politicheskaiia literatura, 1939.

Vereshchak, Maksim I. "Rol' inostrannogo tekhnicheskoi pomoshchi v sozdanii i razvitií sovetskoi bronetankovoi promyshlennosti (1925–1935)." in Ekonomicheskaiia istoriia: ezhegodnik 2013, edited by Leonid I. Borodkin and Iurii A. Petrov. Moscow: Rosspen, 2014, 226–50.

Verevkin-Rakhal'skii, N. A. Moi 90 let: vospominaniia. Moscow: Triada, 2000.

Verkhovskii, A. I. Ogon', manevr, i maskirovka. Moscow: Voennyi vestnik, 1928.

Vernadskii, V. I. "Dnevnik 1940 goda." Druzhba narodov, 1993, no. 9: 173–94.

———. Dnevnik, 1926–1934. Moscow: Nauka, 2001.

———. Dnevnik, 1935–1941. Moscow: Nauka, 2008.

Vespa, Amleto. Secret Agent of Japan: A Handbook to Japanese Imperialism. Boston: Little, Brown, 1938.

Vidal, Georges. Une alliance improbable: l'armée française et la Russie soviétique, 1917–1939. Rennes: Presses universitaires de Rennes, 2015.

VII Congress of the Communist International: Abridged Stenographic Report of the Proceedings. Moscow: Foreign Languages Publishing House, 1939.

VII Kongress Kommunisticheskogo internatsionala i bor'ba protiv fashizma i voiny: sbornik dokumentov. Moscow: Politizdat, 1975.

VII s'ezd Kommunisticheskikh organizatsii Zakavkaz'ia: stenograficheskii otchet. Tiflis, 1934.

VIII Vsekazakhstanskaia kraevaiia konferentsiia VKP (b), 8–16 ianvaria 1934 g.: stenograficheskii otchet. Alma-Ata: Kazkraikom VKP (b) 1935.

Viktorov, Boris A. Bez grifa "sekretno": zapiski voennogo prokurora. Moscow: Iuridicheskaiia literatura, 1990.

Viktorov, Ivan V. Popol'shchik, voin, chekist. Moscow: Politizdat, 1963.

Vilenskii, Semen S., ed. Dodnes' tiagotet. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1989.

Viñas, Oro. "Financing the Spanish Civil War." In Revolution and War in Spain, 1931–1939, edited by Paul Preston. London: Methuen, 1984, 266–83.

Vinogradov, V. K. "1937: pokazaniia marshala Tukhachevskogo." Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1991, no. 8: 44–53, no. 9: 55–63.

———. "Istoriia formirovaniia arkhiva VChK." In Arkhiv VChK: Sbornik dokumentov. Moscow: Kuchkovo Pole, 2007.

———. "Tret'ia reforma organov bezopasnosti (1934–1941)." In Trudy obshchestva izucheniia istorii otechestvennykh spetssluzhb. Moscow: Kuchkovo pole, 2006, 76–96.

———, ed. Genrikh Iagoda, narkom vnutrennykh del SSSR, General'nyi kommissar gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti: sbornik dokumentov. Kazan: [no publisher listed], 1997.

———, et al., eds. Sekrety Gitlera na stole u Stalina: razvedka i kontrrazvedka o podgotovke germanskoi agresii protiv SSSR, mart–iiun' 1941 g., dokumenty iz Tsentral'nogo arkhiva FSB Rossii. Moscow: Mosgosarkhiv, 1995.

Viola, Lynne. "Collectivization in the Soviet Union: Specificities and Modalities." In The Collectivization of Agriculture in Communist Eastern Europe, edited by Constantin Iordachi and Arnd Bauerkämper. Budapest: CEU, 2014, 49–77.

———. "The Peasant Nightmare: Visions of Apocalypse in the Soviet Countryside." Journal of Modern History, 62/4 (1990): 747–70.

———. "The Role of the OGPU in Dekulakization, Mass Deportations, and Special Resettlement in 1930." Carl Beck Papers, University of Pittsburgh, Center for Russian and East European Studies, no. 1406 (2000).

———. Peasant Rebels under Stalin: Collectivization and the Culture of Peasant Resistance. New York: Oxford University, 1996.

- . The Best Sons of the Fatherland: Workers in the Vanguard of Soviet Collectivization. New York: Oxford University, 1989.
- . The Unknown Gulag: The Lost World of Stalin's Special Settlements. New York: Oxford University, 2007.
- Virmarita, J. "Karl Gustaf Emil' Mannerheim," Voprosy istorii, 1994, no. 1: 56–74.
- Vishlev, Oleg V. "Pochemu zhe medlil Stalin v 1941 g.? (iz germanskikh arkhivov)," Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1992, no. 1: 86–100, no. 2: 70–96.
- . Nakanune 22 iunია 1941 goda: Dokumental'nye ocherki. Moscow: Nauka, 2001.
- Vishnevskii, Vsevolod. "Samī peredem v napadenie": iz dnevnikov 1939–1941 godov," Moskva, 1995, no. 5: 103–10.
- . "Kniga o budushchei voine," Bol'shevik, 1939, no. 11–12: 119–23.
- . "Pervaia konnaia," Iskusstvo kino, 1970, no. 12.
- . "Stalin na XVIII s'ezde partii." In Vstrechi s tovarishchem Stalinym, edited by Aleksandr Fadeev. Moscow: OGIZ, 1939, 73–83.
- . Sobranie sochinenii. 6 vols. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1961.
- . Stat'i, dnevniki, pis'ma. Moscow: Sovetskii pistael', 1961.
- VKP (b) v rezolutsiakh i resheniakh. 4th ed. Moscow: Partizdat, 1933. 5th ed. Moscow: Partizdat, 1936.
- "V Madride ia rukovodil gruppoi ktoroī polzovalsia dlia samykh vaznykh del'," Latinskaiia Amerika, 1993, no. 3: 63–9.
- Vneshniaia torgovlia SSSR za 20 let, 1918–1937 gg.: statisticheskii spravochnik*. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnaia kniga, 1939.
- Vneshniaia torgovlia SSSR za 1918–1940 gg.: statisticheskii obzor*. Moscow: Vneshtorgizdat, 1960.
- Vneshniaia torgovlia SSSR, 1918–1966: statisticheskii sbornik*. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia, 1967.
- Vodop'ianov, Mikhail V. Leitch Valerii Chkalov. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1959.
- Voennye arkhivy Rossii*, 1993, vyp. 1.
- Voennyi sovet pri narodnom kosmmissare oborony SSSR, 1938, 1940: dokumenty i materialy*. Moscow: Rosspen, 2006.
- Voitsekhovskii, Sergei L. Trest: vospominaniia i dokumenty. Ontario, Canada: Zaria: 1974.
- Voitushin, V. A., and S. A. Gorlov. "Fashistskaia agressiia: o chem soobshchali diplomaty," Voенно-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1991, no. 6: 13–23.
- "Vokrug Menia vse eshche pletut chernuiu Pautinu . . .": pis'ma M. A. Sholokhova I. V. Stalinu (1937–1950)," Istochnik, 1993, no. 4: 4–19.
- Volin, Lazar. "Agrarian Collectivism in the Soviet Union: I," Journal of Political Economy, 45/5 (1937): 606–33.
- Volkogonov, Dmitrii. "Kliment Efremovich Voroshilov." In Stalin's Generals, edited by Harold Shukman. London: Weidenfeld and Nicholson, 1993, 313–24.
- . "Marshal Voroshilov," Oktiabr', 1996, no. 4: 158–67.
- . "The Drama of the Decisions of 1939," Soviet Studies in History, 29 (1990–91): 10–42.
- . "The German Attack, the Soviet Response, Sunday 22 June 1941." In Barbarossa: The Axis and the Allies, edited by John Erickson and David Dilks. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University, 1994.
- . Lenin: Life and Legacy. London: HarperCollins, 1994.
- . Stalin: politicheskii portret. 4th ed. 2 vols. Moscow: Novosti, 1996.
- . Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy. New York: Grove Weidenfeld, 1991.
- . Triumf i tragediia: politicheskii portret I. V. Stalina. 2 vols. Moscow: Novosti, 1989.
- . Trotskii: politicheskii portret. 2 vols. Moscow: Novosti, 1992.
- . Trotsky: The Eternal Revolutionary. New York: The Free Press, 1996.
- Volkov, F. D. "Legendy i deistvitel'nost' o Rikharde Zorge," Voенно-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1996, no. 12: 96–102.
- . Podvиг Rikharda Zorge. Moscow: Znanie, 1976.
- Volkov, V. K. Germano-iugoslavskie otnosheniia i razval Maloi Antenty, 1933–1938. Moscow: Nauka, 1966.
- . Operatsiia "Tevtonskii mekh". Moscow: Mysl', 1966.

- Volkovskii, N. L., ed. Tainy i uroki zimnei voyny, 1939–1940: po dokumentam rassekrechennykh arkhivov. St. Petersburg: Poligon, 2000.
- Volobuev, O., and S. Kuleshov. Ochishchenie: Istoriia i perestroika. Moscow: Novosti, 1989.
- . “Istoriia ne terpit polupravdy,” Sotsialisticheskaia industriia, June 25, 1988.
- Volodarsky, Boris. “Soviet Intelligence Services in the Spanish Civil War, 1936–1939.” PhD diss. London School of Economics, 2010.
- . Stalin's Agent: the Life and Death of Alexander Orlov. Oxford: Clarendon, 2015.
- . The KGB Orlov File: The Greatest Deception of All Time. New York: Enigma, 2009.
- Voloshin, S. D., et al. Spravochnik po khlebnomu delu. 2nd ed. Leningrad: Snabkoopiz, 1932.
- Volski [Valentinov], Nicholas, and Boris Souvarine, “Un Caligula à Moscou: Le cas pathologique de Staline,” Bulletin de l'Association d'études et d'informations politiques internationales, 98 suppl. (1953): 1–24.
- Volubuev, Oleg V., and Sergei V. Kuleshov. Ochishchenie, istoria i perestroika: publitsistiske zametki. Moscow: Izd-vo Agentstva pechaty Novosti, 1989.
- von Bedrow, Klaus. Hitler rast: der 30. Juni, Ablauf, Vorgeschichte und Hintergründe. Saarbrücken: [s.n.], 1934.
- von Dewitz, Bodo, and Brooks Johnson, eds. Shooting Stalin: The “Wonderful” Years of Photographer James Abbe (1883–1973). Göttingen: Steidl, 2004.
- von Dirksen, Herbert. Moscow, Tokyo, London: Twenty Years of German Foreign Policy. Norman: University of Oklahoma, 1952.
- von Fallois, Immo. Kalkül und Illusion: der Machtkampf zwischen Reichswehr und SA während der Röhm-Krise 1934. Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1994.
- von Hagen, Mark. Soldiers in the Proletarian Dictatorship: The Red Army and the Soviet Socialist State, 1917–1930. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1990.
- von Lang, Joseph. Eichman Interrogated: Transcripts from the Archives of the Israeli Police. Toronto: Lester and Orpen Denny, 1983.
- von Laue, Theodore H. “Stalin in Focus,” Slavic Review, 42/3 (1983): 373–89.
- von Mayenburg, Ruth. Hotel Luc: Mit Dimitroff, Ernst Fischer, Ho Tshi Minh, Pieck, Rakosi, Slansky, Dr. Sorge, Tito, Togliatti, Tschou En-lai, Ulbricht und Wehner im Moskauer Quartier der Kommunistischen Internationale. Munich: Bertelsmann, 1978.
- von Papen, Franz. Memoirs. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc., 1953.
- von Rauch, Georg. “Stalin und die Machtergreifung Hitlers.” In Deutsch-russische Beziehungen von Bismarck bis zur Gegenwart, edited by Werner Markert. Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1964, 117–40.
- von Riekhoff, Harald. German-Polish Relations, 1918–1933. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins, 1971.
- von Strandmann, H. Pogge. “Appeasement and Counter-Appeasement: Nazi-Soviet Collaboration 1939–1941.” In Conflict, Catastrophe, and Continuity: Essays on Modern German History, edited by Frank Biess et al. New York: Berghahn, 2007, 157–76.
- . “Grossindustrie und Rapallopolitik: deutsch-sowjetische Handelsbeziehungen in der Weimarer Republik,” Historische Zeitschrift, no. 222/2 (1976): 265–341.
- Vorob'ev, Evgenii. “Kazhdaia piad' zemli.” In Marshal Zhukov: kakim my ego pomnim. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1988, 157–75.
- Voronetskaia, A. A., ed. Industrializatsiia SSSR 1926–1928 gg.: dokumenty i materialy. Moscow: Nauka, 1969.
- Voronov, L. Abkhazia—ne Gruziiia. Moscow: [s.n.], 1907.
- Voronov, N. N. Na sluzhbe voennoi. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1963.
- Voronov, Vladimir. “Palach v kozhanom fartuke,” Sovershenno sekretno, March 1, 2010.
- Voroshilov, Kliment E. “Uroki voyny s Finliandiei: neopublikovannyi doklad narkoma oborony SSSR K. E. Voroshilova na plenum TSK VKP (b) 28 marta 1940 goda,” Novaia i noveishaia istoriia, 1993, no. 4: 104–22.
- . Lenin, Stalin, i krasnaia armii: stat'i i rechi. Moscow: Partizdat, 1934.
- . Stat'i i materialy k 50-letiiu. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1931.
- . Stat'i i rechi. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1936.

- Vorozheikin, Arsenii V. Istrebiteli. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1961.
- Voskresenskaia, Zoia. Pod pseudonym Irina. Moscow: Sovremennik, 1997.
- . Teper' ia mogu skazat' pravdu: iz vospominanii razvedchitsy. Moscow: Respublika, 1993.
- Voslensky, Michael. Nomenklatura: The Soviet Ruling Class. New York: Doubleday, 1984. Originally published as La nomenklatura, les privilégiés en URSS. Paris: Pierre Belfond, 1980.
- “Vospominaia Velikiu Otechstvenniui.” Otechstvennaia istoriia, 2003, no. 3: 49–70.
- “Vospominanii: memury Nikity Sergeevicha Khrushcheva.” Voprosy istorii, 1990, no. 4: 62–82; 1992, no. 2: 75–102.
- Vostryshev, Mikhail. Moskva Sialinskaia: bol'shaia illustrirovannia letapis'. Moscow: Algoritm, 2008.
- “Vot gde Pravda, Nikita Sergeevich!” Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1990, no. 1: 9–18.
- “Vse, chto govorit Radek—eto absolutno zlostnaia kleвета . . .”: ochnaia stavka K. Radeka i N. Bukharina v TsK VKP (b) 13 ianvaria 1937 g.,” Istochnik, 2001, no. 1: 63–77.
- Vtoroi vsesoiuznyi s'ezd kolkhoznikov-udarnikov, 11–17 fevralia 1935 g.: stenograficheskii otchet*. Moscow: Sel'khozgiz, 1935.
- Vyltsan, Mikhail A. Zavershchaischii etap sozdaniia kolkholznogo stroia, 1935–1937 gg. Moscow: Nauka, 1978.
- , et al. “Nekotorye voprosy istorii kollektivizatsii v SSSR,” Voprosy istorii, 1965, no. 3: 3–25.
- Vyshinskii, Andrey. Sudebnye rechi. 4th ed. Moscow: Gosizdat, 1955.
- Waddington, Geoffrey T. “An Idyllic and Unruffled Atmosphere of Complete Anglo-German Misunderstanding: Aspects of the Operations of the Dienststelle Ribbentrop in Great Britain, 1934–1938,” History, 82 (1997): 44–72.
- . “Ribbentrop and the Soviet Union, 1937–1941” In Barbarossa: The Axis and the Allies, edited by John Erickson and David Dilks. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University, 1994, 7–32.
- Waddington, Lorna L. “The Anti-Komintern and Nazi Anti-Bolshevik Propaganda in the 1930s,” Journal of Contemporary History, 42/4 (2007): 573–94.
- . Hitler's Crusade: Bolshevism and the Myth of the International Jewish Conspiracy. London and New York: I. B. Tauris, 2007.
- Wagener, Otto. Memoirs of a Confidant. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1985.
- Wager, Elisabeth, ed. Der Generalquartiermeister: Briefe unter Tagebuchaufzeichnungen des Generalquartiermeisters des Heeres der Artillerie Eduard Wagner. Munich: Günter Olzog, 1963.
- Waldenegg, Georg Christoph Berger. “Hitler, Göring, Mussolini und der 'Anschluss' Österreichs an das Deutsche Reich,” Vierteljahreshefte für Zeitgeschichte, 51/2 (2003): 147–82.
- Walker, Michael W. The War Nobody Knew: Chinese Nationalism and the 1929 Sino-Soviet Conflict. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2016.
- Walker, Thomas. “Children Starve among the Soviet Dead,” New York Evening Journal, Feb. 19, 1935.
- Walt, Stephen. “Revolution and War,” World Politics, 44/3 (1992): 321–68.
- Walters, F. P. A History of the League of Nations. 2 vols. New York: Oxford University, 1952.
- Waltz, Kenneth N. Theory of International Relations. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1979.
- Wandycz, Piotr S. “Polish Foreign Policy: An Overview,” In Poland between the Wars: 1918–1939, edited by Timothy Wiles. Bloomington: Indiana University Polish Studies Centre, 1989, 65–73.
- . “Polish Foreign Policy: Some Observations,” Polish Review, 20/1 (1975): 58–63.
- . The Twilight of French Eastern Alliances, 1926–1936: French-Czechoslovak-Polish Relations from Locarno to the Remilitarization of the Rhineland. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1988.
- Wańkowicz, Melchior. Po klęsce: Prószyński i Spółka. Warsaw, 2009.
- Wark, Wesley K. The Ultimate Enemy: British Intelligence and Nazi Germany, 1933–1939. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1985.
- Warlimont, Walter. Im Hauptquartier der deutschen Wehrmacht 1939–1945. Frankfurt am Main: Bernard & Graef, 1962.
- . Inside Hitler's Headquarters, 1939–45. London: Weidenfeld and Nicholson, 1964.

- Watson, Derek. "Molotov's Apprenticeship in Foreign Policy: The Triple Alliance Negotiations in 1939," Europe-Asia Studies 52/4 (2000): 695–722.
- . Molotov: A Biography. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005.
- . "The Politburo and Foreign Policy in the 1930s." In The Nature of Stalin's Dictatorship: The Politburo, 1924–1953, edited by E. A. Rees. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, 134–67.
- Watt, Donald Cameron. "British Intelligence and the Coming of the Second World War in Europe." In Knowing One's Enemies: Intelligence Assessment before the Two World Wars, edited by Ernest R. May. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1984, 237–70.
- . "The Initiation of the Negotiations Leading to the Nazi-Soviet Pact: a Historical Problem." In Essays in Honour of E. H. Carr, edited by C. Abramsky. London: Archer, 1974, 152–70.
- . "Who Plotted against Whom? Stalin's Purge of the Soviet High Command," Journal of Soviet Military Studies, 3/1 (1990): 46–65.
- . How War Came: The Immediate Origins of the Second World War, 1938–1939. London: Heinemann, 1989.
- Watts, Larry. Romanian Cassandra: Ion Antonescu and the Struggle for Reform, 1916–1941. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs, 1993.
- Weber, H. "Weisse Flecken" in der Geschichte: Die KPD—Opfer der Stalinschen Säuberungen und ihre Rehabilitierung. Frankfurt am Main: Isp-Verlag, 1989.
- Wegner-Korfes, Siegfried. "Ambassador Count Schulenburg and the Preparations for 'Barbarossa.'" In From Peace to War: Germany, Soviet Russia, and the World, 1939–1941, edited by Bernd Wegner. Providence, RI, and Oxford, UK: Berghahn, 1997, 187–204.
- Weinberg, Gerhard L. "A Proposed Compromise over Danzig in 1939?" Journal of Central European Affairs, 14/4 (1955): 334–8.
- . "German Foreign Policy and Poland, 1937–38," Polish Review, 20/1 (1975): 5–23.
- . "Germany, Munich, and Appeasement." In Germany, Hitler, and World War II: Essays in Modern Germany and World History. New York: Cambridge University, 1995, 109–20.
- . "Hitler and England, 1933–1945." In Germany, Hitler, and World War II: Essays in Modern Germany and World History. New York: Cambridge University, 1995, 85–94.
- . "The Nazi-Soviet Pacts: A Half-Century Later," Foreign Affairs, 68/4 (1989): 175–89.
- . A World at Arms: A Global History of World War II. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University, 1995.
- . Germany and the Soviet Union, 1939–1941. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1954.
- . Hitler's Foreign Policy: The Road to World War II, 1933–1939. New York: Enigma, 2005.
- . The Foreign Policy of Hitler's Germany, 2 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago, 1970, 1980.
- , ed. Hitler's Table Talk, 1941–1944: His Private Conversations. New York: Enigma, 2008.
- Weissberg-Cybulski, Alexander. The Accused. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1951.
- Weissman, Susan. Victor Serge: The Course Is Set on Hope. New York: Verso, 2001.
- Weizsäcker, Ernst von. Erinnerungen. Munich: List, 1950.
- . Memoirs. London: Victor Gallancz, 1951.
- Welles, Sumner. The Time for Decision. New York: Harper, 1944.
- Wells, H. G. Experiment in Autobiography: Discoveries and Conclusions of a Very Ordinary Brain (Since 1866). London: Viktor Gollancz, 1934.
- Wendt, B. J. Grossdeutschland: Aussenpolitik und Kriegsvorbereitung des Hitlers Regime. Munich: Deutscher Taschenbuch Verlag, 1987.
- Werner, Max. The Military Strength of the Powers: A Soldier's Forecast for Citizens. New York: Modern Age, 1939.
- Werth, Alexander. Russia at War, 1941–1945. London: Barrie and Rockliff, 1964.
- Werth, Nicolas. "La famine au Kazakhstan 1931–1933. Le rapport à Staline du 9 mars 1933," Communisme, 74–5 (2003): 9–41.
- . "Stalin's System during the 1930s." In Stalinism and Nazism: History and Memory Compared, edited by Henry Rousso. Lincoln: University of Nebraska, 1999, 29–55.

- , and Gaël Moullec. Rapports secrets soviétiques: la société russe dans les rapports confidentiels, 1921–1991. Paris: Gallimard, 1995.
- , and Sergei Mironenko, eds. Istoriia stalinskogo gulaga: konets 20-x-pervaia polovina 50-kh godov. 7 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 2004.
- , et al., eds. The Black Book of Communism: Crimes, Terror, Repression. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1999.
- West, Nigel. M16: British Secret Intelligence Operations, 1909–1945. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1983.
- , and Oleg Tsarev. The Crown Jewels: The British Secrets at the Heart of the KGB Archives. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1999.
- Westermann, Edward B. Hitler's Police Battalions: Enforcing Racial War in the East. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2005.
- Westwood, J. N. Soviet Locomotive Technology during Industrialization, 1928–1952. London: Macmillan, 1982.
- Whaley, Barton. Codeword Barbarossa. Cambridge, MA: MIT, 1973.
- Wheatcroft, Stephen G. "Agency and Terror: Evdokimov and Mass Killing in Stalin's Great Terror," Australian Journal of Politics and History, 53/1 (2007): 20–44.
- . "From Team-Stalin to Degenerate Tyranny." In The Nature of Stalin's Dictatorship: The Politburo, 1924–1953, edited by E. A. Rees. Houndmills, Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, 79–107.
- . "On Assessing the Size of Forced Concentration Camp Forced Labour in the Soviet Union, 1929–1956," Soviet Studies, 33/2 (1982): 265–95.
- . "Victims of Stalinism and the Soviet Secret Police: The Comparability and Reliability of Archival Data," Europe-Asia Studies 51, no. 2 (1999): 315–45.
- , and R. W. Davies. "Agriculture." In The Economic Transformation of the Soviet Union, 1913–1945, edited by Robert W. Davies, et al. New York: Cambridge University, 1994, 106–30.
- . "Population." In The Economic Transformation of the Soviet Union, 1913–1945, edited by Robert W. Davies, et al. New York: Cambridge University, 1994, 57–80.
- Wheatley, Robert H. Hitler and Spain: The Nazi Role in the Spanish Civil War, 1936–1939. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2015.
- Wheatley, Ronald. Operation Sea Lion: German Plans for the Invasion of England 1939–1942. Oxford: Clarendon, 1958.
- Wheeler-Bennet, John W. The Nemesis of Power: The German Army in Politics, 1918–1945. New York: St. Martin's, 1953.
- . "From Brest-Litovsk to Brest-Litovsk." Foreign Affairs, 18/2 (1940): 196–210.
- , ed. Documents on International Affairs, 1931. London: Milford, 1932.
- , ed. Documents on International Affairs, 1935. London: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1936.
- Whitewood, Peter. "The Purge of the Red Army and the Soviet Mass Operations, 1937–38," Slavonic and East European Review, 93/2 (2015): 286–314.
- . The Red Army and the Great Terror: Stalin's Purge of the Soviet Military. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2015.
- Whiting, Allen S., and General Sheng Shih-ts'acai. Sinkiang: Pawn or Pivot? East Lansing: Michigan State University, 1958.
- Whitman, John T. "The Kolkhoz Market," Soviet Studies, 7/4 (1956): 384–408.
- Whymant, Robert. Stalin's Spy: Richard Sorge and the Tokyo Espionage Ring. London and New York: I. B. Tauris, 1996.
- Wiedemann, Fritz. Der Mann, der Feldherr werden wollte. Vellbert/Kettwig, 1964.
- Williams, Andrew J. Trading with the Bolsheviks: The Politics of East-West Trade 1920–1939. Manchester, UK: Manchester University, 1992.
- Williams, Karel, Colin Haslam, and John Williams, "Ford versus 'Fordism': The Beginning of Mass Production?" Work, Employment and Society, 6/4 (1992): 517–55.

- Williams, Raymond. Communications. 2nd ed. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1967.
- Wilson, Dick. The Long March, 1935: The Epic of Chinese Communism's Survival. New York: Penguin Press, 1971.
- . When Tigers Fight: The Story of the Sino-Japanese War, 1937–1945. New York: Viking, 1982.
- Wilson, Edmund. "Stalin as Ikon," New Republic, April 15, 1936.
- Wilson, Peter H. Heart of Europe. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University, 2016.
- Winch, Michael. Republic for a Day: An Eye-Witness Account of the Carpatho-Ukraine Incident. London: R. Hale, 1939.
- Winkler, Heinrich August. Der Weg in die Katastrophe: Arbeiter und Arbeitsbewegung in der Weimarer Republik, 1930 bis 1933. Berlin: J. H. W. Weitz, 1987.
- . Weimar, 1918–1933: die Geschichte der ersten Deutschen Demokratie. Munich: Beck, 1993.
- Winterbotham, Frederick W. The Nazi Connection. New York: Harper & Row, 1978.
- . The Ultra Secret. New York: Harper & Row, 1974.
- Wintrobe, Ronald. The Political Economy of Dictatorship. New York: Cambridge University, 1998.
- Włodarkiewicz, Wojciech. Lwów. Warsaw: Bellona, 2003.
- . Przed 17 września 1939 roku: Radzieckie zagrożenie Rzeczypospolitej w ocenach polskich naczelnych władz wojskowych 1921–1939. Warsaw: Wydawn. Neriton, 2002.
- Wohlforth, William C. "The Russian-Soviet Empire: A Test of Neorealism," Review of International Studies, 27/5 (2001): 213–35.
- Wojciechowski, Marian. Stosunki polsko-niemieckie, 1933–1938. Poznań: Instytut Zachodni, 1965.
- Wolf, Erika, ed. Ilf and Petrov's Road Trip. New York: Architectural Press, 2007.
- Wolfe, Bertram. "Adventures in Forged Sovietica," New Leader, Aug. 11, 1955.
- . "The Case of the Litvinov Diary," Encounter, 6/1 (1956): 339–47.
- . Strange Communists I Have Known. New York: Stein and Day, 1965.
- Wolfer, Arnold. Britain and France between the Two Wars: Conflicting Strategies of Peace since Versailles. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1940.
- Wollenberg, Erich. The Red Army. London: Secker & Warburg, 1938.
- Womack, J. P., D. I. Jones, and D. Roos. The Machine that Changed the World. New York: Rawson Associates, 1990.
- Woodruff, Nan Elizabeth. As Rare as Rain: Federal Relief in the Great Southern Drought of 1930–31. Urbana: University of Illinois, 1985.
- Woodward, E. L. British Foreign Policy in the Second World War. 5 vols. London: H.M.S.O., 1970.
- , and Rohan Butler, eds. Documents on British Foreign Policy, 1919–1939, 62 vols. Second series. London: H. M. Stationery Office, 1947–1984. Cited as DBFP, 2nd series.
- , eds. Documents on British Foreign Policy, 1919–1939, 62 vols. Third series. London: H. M. Stationery Office, 1947–1984. Cited as DBFP, 3rd series.
- World Situation and Economic Struggle: Theses of the Tenth Plenum E.C.C.I., The*. London: CPGB, 1929.
- Woroszyński, Wiktor. The Life of Mayakovsky. New York: Orion, 1970.
- Wynn, Charters. "The 'Right Opposition' and the 'Smirnov-Eismont-Tolmachev Affair.'" In The Lost Politburo Transcripts: From Collective Rule to Stalin's Dictatorship, edited by Paul R. Gregory and Norman Naimark. New Haven: Yale University, 2008, 97–117.
- XII s'ezd RKP (b): stenograficheskii otchet*. Moscow: Krasnaia nov', 1923.
- XVI konferentsiia VKP (b), april' 1929 goda: stenograficheskii otchet*. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1962.
- XVI s'ezd VKP (b), 26 iunია–13 iulia 1930 g.: stenograficheskii otchet*. 2 vols. Moscow: Partizdat, 1935.
- XVI s'ezd VKP (b): stenograficheski otchet*. 2nd ed. Moscow and Leningrad: Gosizdat, 1931.
- XVI s'ezd VKP (b): stenograficheski otchet*. Moscow and Leningrad: Gosizdat, 1930. All citations refer to this edition unless otherwise indicated.
- XVII konferentsiia VKP (b): stenograficheskii otchet, 30 ianvaria–4 fevralia 1932*. Moscow, 1932.
- XVII s'ezd VKP (b), 26 ianvaria–10 fevralia 1934 g.: stenograficheskii otchet*. Moscow: Partizdat, 1934.
- XVIII s'ezd VKP (b), 10–21 marta 1939 goda: stenograficheskioi otchet*. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura 1939.

- XX let Sovetskoi Abkhazii: politiko-ekonomicheskii ocherk*. Sukhumi, 1941.
- XXII s'ezd KPSS: stenograficheskii otchet*. 2 vols. Moscow: Politizdat, 1961.
- Yancey, George L. "Some Aspects of the Imperial Russian Government on the Eve of the First World War," Slavonic and East European Review, 43/1 (1964): 68–90.
- . "War and the Evolution of Russian Government," South Atlantic Quarterly, 66/2 (1967): 291–306.
- . The Systematization of Russian Government: Social Evolution in the Domestic Administration of Imperial Russia 1711–1905. Urbana: University of Illinois, 1973.
- Yang, Benjamin. From Revolution to Politics: Chinese Communists on the Long March. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1990.
- Yaroslavskii, E. M. "Etot son knochen," Izvestiia, May 30, 1929.
- Yaroslavsky, Yemelyan. The Meaning of the Soviet Trials. New York: Workers Library, 1938.
- Yedlin, Tovah. Maxim Gorky: A Political Biography. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1999.
- Yoshihashi, Takehiko. Conspiracy at Mukden: The Rise of the Japanese Military. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1963.
- Young, Kenneth, ed. The Diaries of Sir Robert Bruce Lockhart, 1915–1938. 2 vols. London: Macmillan, 1973.
- Young, Louise. Total Empire: Manchuria and the Culture of Wartime Imperialism. Berkeley: University of California, 1998.
- Young, Robert J. "French Military Intelligence and Nazi Germany, 1938–1939." In Knowing One's Enemies: Intelligence Assessment before the Two World Wars, edited by Ernest F. May. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1984, 271–309.
- . In Command of France: France's Foreign Policy and Military Planning, 1933–1940. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1978.
- Z. "Sovremennaiia artilleriia i modernizatsiia," Voina i tekhnika, 1929, no. 4: 9–14.
- Zagoria, Janet D., ed. Power and the Soviet Elite: "The Letter of an Old Bolshevik" and Other Essays by Boris I. Nicolaevsky. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan, 1975.
- Zaitsev, A. "Krasnaia armii," Chasovoi, 1931, no. 54.
- Zaitsev, E. A. Sbornik zakonodatel'nykh i normativnykh aktov o repressiakh i reabilitatsii zhertv politicheskikh repressii. Moscow: Respublika, 1993.
- Zakharov, M. V. General'nyi shtab v predvoennye gody. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1989.
- . Nakanune velikikh ispytanií. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1968.
- , et al. 50 let Vooruzhenykh Sil SSSR. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1968.
- Zakharov, S. "Krasnoznamennomu Tikhookeanskomu flotu—50 let," Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1982, no. 4: 93–6.
- Zaleski, Eugene. Planning for Economic Growth in the Soviet Union, 1918–1932. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina, 1971.
- . Stalinist Planning for Economic Growth, 1933–1952. London: MacMillan, 1980.
- Zaloga, Steven J. "Soviet Tank Operations in the Spanish Civil War," Journal of Slavic Military Studies, 123 (1999).
- , and James Grandsen. Soviet Tanks and Combat Vehicles of World War Two. London: Arms and Armour Press, 1984.
- , and Victor Madej. The Polish Campaign, 1939. New York: Hippocrene, 1985.
- "Zamenit' Vas nekem: pi's'ma M. Gor'kogo I. V. Stalinu," Istochnik, 1999, no. 5: 115–7.
- Zamoiskii, L., and Iu. Nezhnikov. "U u rokovoi cherty: sovskaia razvedka nakanune voiny," Izvestiia, May 5, 1990.
- Zaporozhets, Natal'ia. "Iz vospominaniia." In Dodnes' tiagoteet, edited by Semen S. Vilenskii. Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1989, 532–8.
- Zatonskii, V. P. "Otryvki vospominanii ob Ukrainskoi revoliutsii," Letopis' revoliutsii, 1929, no. 5–6: 128–41.
- Zdanovich, A. A. Organy gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti i Krasnaia armii: deiatel'nost' organov VChK-OGPU po obespecheniiu bezopasnosti RKKA, 1921–1934. Moscow: Kuchkovo pole/Iks-Khistori, 2008.
- Zdanovich, Semen F. Karl Bauman. Moscow: Politizdat, 1967.

- Zeidler, Manfred. Reichswehr und Rote Armee, 1920–1933: Wege und Stationen einer ungewöhnlichen Zusammenarbeit. 2nd ed. Munich: Oldenbourg, 1994. Originally published 1993.
- Zel'dovich, G. Liubov' Orlova. Moscow: Goskinoizdat, 1939.
- Zelenin, Il'ia E. "Byl li 'kolkhoznii neopene'?" Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1994, no. 2: 105–21.
- . "Kolkhoznoe stroitel'stvo v SSSR v 1931–1932 gg.: k itogam sploshnoi kollektivizatsii sel'skogo khoziaistva." Istoriia SSSR, 1990, no. 6: 19–39.
- . "O nekotorykh 'belykh piatnakh' zavershaiushchego etapa sploshnoi kollektivizatsii," Istoriia SSSR, 1989, no. 2: 3–19.
- . "Osushchestvlenie politiki 'likvidatsii kulachestva kak klassa' (osen' 1930–1932 gg.)," Istoriia SSSR, 1990, no. 6: 31–49.
- . "Politotdely MTS (1933–1934 gg.)," Istoricheskie zapiski, no. 76 (1965): 2–56.
- . Stalinskaiia 'revoliutsiia sverkh' posle 'velikogo pereloma,' 1930–1939: politika, osushchestvlenie, rezul'taty. Moscow: Nauka, 2006.
- , et al., eds. Istoriia sovetskogo krest'iansva. 4 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 1986–8.
- Zelenov, M. V. "Partiinyi kontrol' za izdaniem sochinenii Lenina i literature o nem v 1924–1937," Voprosy istorii, 2004, no. 11: 3–28.
- . "I. V. Stalin v rabote nad 'Kratkim kursom istorii VKP (b),' " Voprosy istorii, 2001, no. 11: 3–29.
- , ed. I. V. Stalin, Istoricheskaia ideologiia v SSSR v 1920–1950-e gody: perepiska s istorikami, stat'i i zametki po istorii, stenogrammy vystuplenii. Sbornik dokumentov i materialov. St. Petersburg: Nauka-Piter, 2006.
- , and David Brandenberger. "Kratkii kurs istorii VKP (b)": tekst i ego istoriia. 2 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 2014–.
- Zelinski, Kornelii. "Oдна vstrecha u A. M. Go'kogo," Voprosy literatury, 1991, no. 5: 144–70.
- . "V iune 1954 goda," Minushee, no. 5 (1988): 54–103.
- Zemskov, I. N., ed. Norve dokumenty iz istorii Miunkbena. Moscow: Politicheskaiia literatura, 1958.
- Zemskov, V. N. "Kulaktskaia ssylka v 30-e gody." In Naselenie Rossii v XX veke: istoricheskie ocherki, edited by Iuri A. Poliakov. 3 vols. Moscow: Rosspen, 2000–12, I: 277–310.
- . "GULAG: isoriko-sotsiologicheskii aspekt," Sotsiologicheskie issledovaniia, 1991, no. 6: 10–27, no. 7: 3–16.
- . "Zakliuchennye v 1930-e gody: sotsial'no-demograficheskie problemy," Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1997, no. 4: 54–79.
- Zen'kovich, Nikolai A. Marshaly i genseki: intrigi, vrazhda, zagovory. Moscow: Olma, 2000.
- . Samye sekretnye rodstvenniki: entsiklopediia biografii. Moscow: Olma, 2005.
- Zenzinov, Vladimir M. Vstrecha s Rossiei, kak i chem zhivut v Sovetskom Soiuze: pis'ma v Krasnuiu armiiu, 1939–1940. New York: [s.n.], 1944.
- Zhavaronkov, G. N. "I snitsia noch'iu den'," Sintaksis, 1992, no. 32: 46–65.
- , and V. I. Pariiskii, "Skazvashii budet uslyshan." In Oni ne molchali, edited by A. V. Afanas'ev. Moscow: Politizdat, 1991, 199–215.
- Zhdanko, T. "Natsional'no-gosudarstvennoye razmezhevaniye i protsessy etnicheskogo razvitiia u narodov Srednei Azii," Sovetskaiia etnografiia, 1972, no. 5: 13–29.
- Zhgenti, Beso. "S'ezd velikogo edineniia," Literaturnaia Gruzii, 1974, no. 9.
- Zhilin, P. A. Kak fashistskaia Germaniia gotovila napadenie na Sovetskii Soiuz. Moscow: Mysl', 1965.
- . Kak fashistskaia Germaniia gotovila napadenie na Sovetskii Soiuz. 2nd ed. Moscow: Mysl', 1966.
- . O voine i voennoi istorii. Moscow: Nauka, 1984.
- , ed. Pobeda na reke Khalkhin-gol. Moscow: Nauka, 1981.
- Zhirnov, Evgenii. "NKVD pod kolpakom u Miullera," Kommersant vlasti, June 20, 1940.
- Zhiromskaia, V. B., ed. Naselenie Rossii v XX veke: istoricheskie ocherki v 3-kh t. Vol. 1, 1900–1939. Moscow: Rosspen, 2000.
- , I. N. Kisleva, and Iu. A. Poliakov. Polveka pod grifom "sekretno": vsesoiuznaia perepis' naseleniia 1937 goda. Moscow: Nauka, 1996.

- Zhukov, E. M., ed. Vsesoiuznoe soveshchanie o merakh uluchsheniia podgotovki nauchno-pedagogicheskikh kadrov po istoricheskim naukam, 18–21 dekabria 1962 g. Moscow: Nauka, 1964.
- Zhukov, G. K. "Iz neopublikovannykh vospominanii," Kommunist, 1988, no. 14: 97–9.
- . Vospominaniia i razmysleniia. 3 vols. 13th ed. Moscow: Olma, 2002.
- . Vospominaniia i razmysleniia. 3 vols. 12th ed. Moscow: Novosti, 1995.
- . Vospominaniia i razmysleniia. 3 vols. Moscow: Novosti, 1969.
- Zhukov, Iurii N. "Sledstvie i sudebnye protsessy po delu ob ubistvie Kirova," Voprosy istorii, 2000, no. 2: 33–51.
- . "Tak, byl li 'zagovor' Tukhachevskogo?" Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1999, no. 1: 176–81.
- . Inoi Stalin: Politicheskie reform v SSSR v 1933–1937 gg. Moscow: Vagrius, 2003.
- Zhukovskaia, Tat'iana Iu. "SSSR i liga natsii." PhD diss. Rostov-na-Donu, 2005.
- Zhukovskii, V. S. Lubianskaia imperiia NKVD. 1937–1939 gg. Moscow: Veche, 2001.
- Zhukunov, E. V., ed. 1941g.—Uroki i vyvody. Moscow: Voenizdat, 1992.
- Zhuravlev, S. V., ed. Obshchestvo i vlast', 1930-e gody: povestvovanie v dokumentakh. Moscow: Rosspen, 1998.
- , and V. S. Tiazhel'nikova, "Inostrannye kolonii v sovetskoi Rossii v 1920–1930 gody," Istoricheskie zapiski, 1994, no. 1: 179–89.
- Ziemke, Earl F. The Red Army, 1918–1941: From Vanguard of World Revolution to US Ally. London: Frank Cass, 2004.
- Zil'ver, E. Za bol'shoe kinoiskusstvo. Moscow: Kinofotoizdat, 1935.
- Zipperstein, Steven J. "Underground Man: The Curious Case of Mark Zborowski and the Writing of a Modern Jewish Classic," Jewish Review of Books, 2 (2010): 38–42.
- Zoller, Albert, ed. Hitler Privat: Erlebnisbericht seiner Geheimsekretuerin. Dusseldorf: Droste Verlag, 1949.
- Zolotarev, Vladimir A., ed. Istoriia voennoi strategii Rossii. Moscow: Kuchkovo Pole, 2000.
- , ed. Russkii arkhiv: Velikaia otechestvennaia. Prikazy narodnogo kommissara oborony SSSR. 14 vols. Moscow: Terra, 1993–2002.
- , et al., eds. Velikaia Otechestvennaia voina 1941–1945 gg.: voenno-istoricheskie ocherki. 4 vols. Moscow: Nauka, 1998–9.
- Zonin, S. A. Admiral L.M. Galler. Moscow, Voenizdat, 1991.
- Zoshchenko, Mikhail. Sobranie sochinenii. 2 vols. Leningrad: khudozhestvennaia literatura, 1986.
- Zubkova, E. Iu. Pribaltika i kremli', 1940–1953. Moscow: Rosspen, 2008.
- Zuehlike, Mark. The Gallant Cause: Canadians in the Spanish Civil War, 1936–1939. Vancouver and Toronto: Whitecap, 1996.
- Zveriaikov, T. A. Ot kochev'ia k sotsializmu. Alma-Ata, 1934.
- Zychowicz, Piotr. Pakt Ribbentrop-Beck, czyli, Jak Polacy mogli u boku III Rzeszy pokonać Związek Sowiecki. Poznań: Rebis, 2012.

CREDITS

RGAKFD: Russian State Archive of Photographs and Film

RGASPI: Russian State Archive of Social and Political History (former central party archive)

INSERT 1:

Here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here: RGAKFD

Here: Central State Archive of Film, Photographs, and Sound Recordings of the Republic of Kazakhstan

Here, here, here, here, here, here: RGASPI

Here: Photo 12 / Universal Images Group / Getty Images

Here: Author's personal collection

Here: Stalin Museum, Gori

Here: Bettmann / Getty Images; here: Keystone-France / Gamma-Keystone / Getty Images

INSERT 2:

Here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here: RGAKFD

Here: Alinari Archives / Getty Images; here: Central Press / Hulton Archive / Getty Images

Here: Popperfoto / Getty Images

Here, here, here: RGASPI

Here: Hoover Institution Archives

Here: Corbis Historical / Getty Images; here, here, here: ullstein bild / Getty Images

Here: SVF2 / Universal Images Group / Getty Images

Here: Galerie Bilderwelt / Hulton Archive / Getty Images

Here: Topical Press Agency / Hulton Archive / Getty Images

Here: Sueddeutsche Zeitung Photo / Alamy Stock Photo; here: The Asahi Shimbun / Getty Images

Here: Author's personal collection

INDEX

The page numbers in this index refer to the printed version of this book. The link provided will take you to the beginning of that print page. You may need to scroll forward from that location to find the corresponding reference on your e-reader.

- Abkhazia, 136–39, 231, 505, 506–7, 513–14, 516–18
- Abrikosov, Andrei, 294
- Abulyan, Armenak, 502
- Abwehr (German military intelligence), 485, 798
- Abyssinia (Ethiopia), Italian invasion of, 269, 287, 292, 318
- Academy of Fine Arts, Vienna, xiii
- Academy of Sciences, arrests in, 405
- Adzhubei, Alexei, 379
- Afanashev, Boris (Atanasov), 322
- Afinogenov, Alexander, 152, 544–45, 595
- Africa, European “scramble” for, 591
- Agranov, Yakov (Yankel Sorenson), 176, 196, 207, 212, 264, 319, 394
- Kirov murder and, 210, 211, 213, 228, 236
- Agrba, Alexei, 505, 507, 516
- agricultural commissariat, arrests in, 405
- agriculture, Soviet, 131
- droughts and, 75–76, 87
- improved harvests in, 47–48, 70, 87, 130, 132, 180, 226, 263
- poor harvests in, 16, 47–48, 75, 87, 100, 103, 106, 112, 305, 405, 514, 606
- see also* collectives; collectivization
- aircraft, 425
- British, 794
- German, 764, 794, 827
- Soviet, 820, 824, 839, 861, 893
- U.S., 834
- see also* bombers; fighters
- Ajaria, Ajarians, 513–14, 518
- Akhmatova, Anna (Gorenko), 181, 186
- Akulov, Ivan, 79, 212, 232
- Albania, 665, 812
- Alexander I, king of Yugoslavia, assassination of, 189, 751
- Alexander II, emperor of Russia, assassination of, 199
- “Alexander III Receiving Rural District Elders in the Courtyard of Petrovsky Palace” (Repin), 246–47

Alexander Nevsky (film), 671, 812, 853
 Alexandrov, Grigory, 215, 216, 217, 293, 593, 795, 853, 854
 Alexandrovsky, Mikhail, 413, 455
 Alexandrovsky, Sergei, 252, 403, 560, 561, 565, 568, 572
 Alexei, tsarevich of Russia, xi
 Alfonso XIII, king of Spain, 312, 314
 Alighieri, Dante, vii
 Alliluyev, Pavel, 46, 108, 111, 191, 210
 Alliluyev, Sergei, 108, 214
 Alliluyeva, Anna, 108, 742
 Alliluyeva, Nadezhda “Nadya,” 3, 46–47, 103, 108, 109–10, 163, 212, 214, 272, 388
 funeral of, 111–12
 Stalin’s correspondence with, 25, 26, 43, 45, 54–55, 82–83
 Stalin’s fights with, 109, 110
 suicide of, 110–11, 134, 228, 232, 250, 491
 Alliluyeva, Svetlana, 3, 103, 108, 109, 111, 187, 209, 234, 263, 271, 281, 388, 464, 526 on mother’s suicide, 112 schooling of, 165
 Stalin’s correspondence with, 135
 on Stalin’s darkening mind-set, 492
 Stalin’s doting on, 166, 600 on Stalin’s film watching, 192 in visit with grandmother, 270
 Alliluyeva, Yevgeniya “Zhenya,” 191, 388 all-Union Congresses of Collective Farm Shock Workers, 120, 226–27
 All-Union Congress of Shock Brigades (1929), 31–32 all-Union Creative Conference of Workers in Soviet Cinema, 217–18
 Alma-Ata, Kazakhstan, 12, 497
 “Alta,” see Stöbe, Ilse
 Amatouni, Amatouni, 504, 516
 Amur River, 456–57, 536, 805 anarchists, in Spanish civil war, 316, 321, 334, 338, 339, 351, 364, 400–401, 406, 408, 718
 Andreyev, Andrei, 57, 237, 295, 308
 as Central Committee secretary, 225, 500, 606
 Kirov murder and, 205
 regional party arrests and, 444
 Stalin’s mealtime meetings with, 225
 Anti-Comintern Pact, 355–57, 539, 557, 581–82, 596, 655, 665, 667, 677, 687–88 anti-intellectualism, Stalin’s denunciation of, 571 anti-Semitism, 238, 266–67, 307, 430, 557, 559, 582, 589, 597–98
 Antonescu, Ion, 788, 798, 853, 876, 889

Antonov-Ovseyenko, Vladimir, 334, 380, 467
 “Appeal to All Members of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks)” (Ryutin), 104
 Aragon, Louis, 255
 Aral Sea, 692
 “Architect of Socialist Society, The” (Radek), 155
 Arctic Sea, 711
 Ardennes, 766, 767
 Arkhangelsk, 739, 740
 armaments commissariat, 727
 Armenia, 138, 354, 502, 504, 516, 517, 542, 773 army, German, see Reichswehr; Wehrmacht army, Soviet, see Red Army Aron, Raymond, 760
artels, 35–36
Art of War, The (Sun Tzu), 262
 Artuzov, Artur, 24, 91, 158, 222, 377, 378 appointed deputy chief of military intelligence, 172
 arrest of, 413
 Uritsky’s rivalry with, 252–53
 “Aryan,” see Scheliha, Rudolf von
 Association of Proletarian Writers, 152, 153
 Astakhov, Georgy, 631–32, 646, 654, 655, 664 Austria:
 German annexation of, 240–41, 292, 558–60, 598, 888
 1937 putsch in, 556
 Austria-Hungary, xv aviation commissariat, 737–38
 Axis pact, 809–10, 811
 Bulgaria in, 847
 Germany, Japan, and Italy in formation of, 792–93
 Hungary in, 811–12, 829, 847 proposed Soviet inclusion in, 797, 799, 808–9, 813, 815–16, 817–19, 820, 831, 835
 Romania in, 812, 829, 847
 Slovakia in, 812, 829, 847
 Stalin’s conditions for joining, 813, 818, 820, 831
 Yugoslavia in, 847, 850
 Azerbaijan, 138, 190, 354, 502, 518, 773
 Babel, Isaac, 181, 255, 635, 740, 788
 Bagirov, Mircafar, 139, 502, 503, 504, 520
 Baikal, Lake, 644
 Baku, 504, 739–40, 762

Baldwin, Stanley, 255, 317
 Balkans, 796, 798, 799, 837, 840
 Churchill's concern about, 777
 conflicting Soviet and German interests in, 814–15, 816, 831
 German invasion of, 889
 Baltic Fleet, Soviet, 703, 710, 711
 Baltic Sea, 703, 707, 876
 Baltic special military district, 779
 Baltic states, 92, 614
 anti-Soviet fifth column in, 774–75
 British relations with, 655 denunciations encouraged in, 772
 deportations in, 772
 German-Soviet Pact and, 651, 652, 654, 659
 pro-German sentiment in, 655
 single-candidate elections in, 772
 Soviet annexation of, 772, 776, 819, 829
 Soviet demand for guarantees of territorial integrity of, 634, 647–48
 Soviet demand for mutual assistance pact with, 693 in Soviet war planning, 290
 Stalin's fear of invasion from, 27, 50, 54, 84, 613, 647
 Triple Alliance proposal and, 633, 634, 638, 639, 647–48
 Balytsky, Vsevolod, 39, 77, 78, 79, 103, 162, 168, 344, 431–32, 449
 Balzac, Honoré, 231
 Bank of England, 616
 banks, failures of, 85–86
 Barbarossa, Operation, see Germany, Nazi, Soviet invasion preparations of Barbusse, Henri, 1, 155, 263
 Stalin as depicted by, 225–26
 Barcelona, Spain, 408
 Basques, 312, 407, 411
 Bavarian Soviet Republic, xiii
 Baidukov, Georgy, 425, 451
 Beck, Józef, 568, 596–97, 615, 620, 634, 638
 Beck, Ludwig, 168, 222, 257, 287, 291, 559, 567
 Bedny, Demyan (Yefim Pridvoroy), 169, 332
 Stalin's relationship with, 150–51
 survived the terror, 545–46
 Belgium, 678, 766
 German invasion of, 763
see also Low Countries

Belgrade, 847
Belorussia, 180, 772–73
anti-Soviet fifth column in, 774–75
ethnic Poles in, 211
famine in, 98
Polish territory annexed by, 689, 716
Belyakov, Alexander, 425, 451
Beneš, Edvard, 61–62, 252, 561, 562, 565, 567, 572
Berezhkov, Valentin, 799, 872
Berezina River, 340
Berghof, 585, 633, 642, 661, 664, 666
Beria, Lavrenti:
accusations against, 541, 589
arrests and executions ordered by, 502, 508–9, 513, 515 Blyukher's death and, 549–50, 578
charisma of, 502
civil-war-era career of, 510–11
cruelty of, 549, 889 dachas of, 502, 605–6 elevated to Central Committee, 162
Georgian artists and writers controlled by, 511–12 and German invasion plans, 795, 876, 880, 894
Gulag labor as responsibility of, 692 industrial output and, 231
as inner circle member, 501, 526, 548
Khrushchev's relationship with, 501, 520–21
Lakoba's rivalry with, 139, 141, 142, 237, 504–6, 508 and Litvinov investigation, 626 lobbying for resources to Georgia by, 513–14 loyalty cultivated by, 549
Mekhlis's criticisms of, 508, 509
Molotov's rivalry with, 550, 692
and murder of Radek, 637 as NKVD deputy head, 541–42, 543, 547–48
as NKVD head, 588–89, 595, 605
NKVD powerbase of, 550, 588–89
in NKVD arrests, 588
Polish POWs and, 744–45 and rebuilding of Soviet intelligence, 589
Red Army reports of, 731 rise of, 139–41

showcase trials staged by, 515–16
 South Caucasus controlled by, 501–4, 505, 506, 507, 512
 Stalin biography project of, 154, 214, 260, 301
 Stalin's correspondence with, 513–14, 515–16, 518
 Stalin's relationship with, 511, 512–13, 546, 548, 550, 605–6
 Stalin's similarities to, 501
 Trotsky assassination and, 610–12, 617, 764, 787
 Vlasik's rivalry with, 526
 Winter War and, 725, 735, 739 and Yezhov investigation, 618–20
 Yezhov's power struggle with, 509, 542 Berlin:
 bombing of, 791, 808, 809, 811, 818
 Chancellery complex in, 585
 Molotov's visit to, 805–9, 811, 815, 818
 1936 Olympics in, 326
 Stalin's 1907 visit to, xv
 Berling, Zygmunt, 795, 838
 Berlings, Orests ("Lycée-ist"), 804, 807, 823, 852, 873, 876, 880 Berzin, Jan Pēter Kuzis, 172, 338, 382, 405, 454 reappointed head of military intelligence, 423
 Stalin's correspondence with, 406
 Bessarabia, 17, 563, 694, 773, 786, 853
 Soviet nonaggression pact with, 93
 Soviet occupation of, 773–74, 776, 777
 Bessonov, Sergei, 246, 275, 291
 Bismarck, Otto von, 61, 339, 558–59, 598, 643, 791–92, 814, 886, 906
Bismarck (battleship), 255, 598, 703, 764
 Black Sea, 311, 702, 703, 794, 796, 813, 819, 831
 Black Sea Fleet, Soviet, 702–3 blitzkrieg, 767, 894, 904
 Blokhin, Vasily, 424, 742
 Blomberg, Werner von, 49, 473, 474, 475
 Blum, Léon, 317, 318, 320, 329, 357, 363, 458
 Blunt, Anthony, 222, 656, 800, 836
 Blyukher, Vasily, 30–31, 420, 424, 456, 531, 533
 accusations against, 527, 529, 537, 547 arrest and fatal beating of, 549–50, 578, 893 drinking by, 529
 as Red Army marshal, 272
 relieved of Far Eastern command, 547 and Soviet incursion in Manchukuo, 535–36, 537–38, 540, 547

 Voroshilov's dislike of, 412–13
 Bodenschatz, Karl, 631, 675
 Bogdanov, L. T., 141–42
 Bohlen, Charles, 480–81, 666
 Bolshakov, Ivan, 789, 795
 Bolshevik Revolution, xi, 174, 489, 522 twentieth anniversary of, 467–69, 470
 Bolsheviks, Bolshevism, see Communism bombers:
 German, 351, 678, 755
 Soviet, 99, 101, 265, 338, 346, 351, 567, 820, 856
 Boris III, king of Bulgaria, 811, 812, 889
 Borisov, Mikhail, 201, 205, 207, 220, 235
 Bormann, Martin, 585, 867
 Brauchitsch, Walther von, 567, 677
 Braun, Eva, 584, 642
 Brest-Litovsk, Poland, 469, 695, 704, 722
 German withdrawal from, 686–87
 Brest-Litovsk, Treaty of, xv, 4, 121, 363, 370, 685, 903
 Brezhnev, Leonid, 603
 Brik, Lily, 276–77
 British empire, xv, 591, 783, 833
 British intelligence, 222, 242, 614, 656, 675
 Enigma intercepts of, 850, 857, 882, 884, 890, 891
 German military capabilities overestimated by, 591 on German military capability, 652–53 and Germany's planned Soviet invasion, 882–83
 Red Army capability underestimated by, 591
 Soviet agents in, 836
 Yugoslav coup and, 847
 Bucharest, 872
 Budyonny, Semyon, 37, 44, 46, 213, 272, 421, 424, 545
 Bug River, 695
 Bukhara, 138
 Bukharin, Nikolai:
 arrest of, 443
 Central Committee expulsion of, 387 conspiracy accusations against, 357–58, 379, 386, 397, 437, 476 in counterattack on collectivization, 15 eulogy for Nadya delivered by, 112

execution of, 479, 526, 560, 602
expelled from politburo, 29
at February 1937 Central Committee plenum, 386–87
imprisonment of, 477–78
interrogations of, 336, 387
as Izvestiya editor, 349, 359
Kamenev's meeting with, 12
Kirov murder and, 205
press slander of, 359
at 17th Party Congress, 156
Stalin's correspondence with, 64–65, 336, 387, 478
Stalin's demonization of, 11–12, 14–15, 24, 26, 56, 57, 68
Stalin's friendship with, 11, 526
Stalin's psychological torture of, 349, 368
trial of, 478, 560
Bukovina, 786, 808, 819
northern, Soviet occupation of, 774, 776 Bulgakov, Mikhail, 151, 184, 186, 230, 635
death of, 746
Kerzhentsev's criticism of, 284–85
Stalin's relationship with, 148–50
Bulgaria, 274, 788, 811, 812, 889
in Axis pact, 847
failed Communist coup in, 17
fascist coup in, 171–72
Soviet relations with, 813–14
Soviet spies in, 794
Wehrmacht in, 831, 872
Bulletin of the Opposition (Leninist-Bolsheviks), 13–14, 24, 68, 91, 94, 105, 294, 323, 328
Bullitt, William, 144–45, 263, 292
as U.S. ambassador to Soviet Union, 145–46, 167
Bullock, Alan, xv
Burgess, Guy, 222, 656, 661, 836
Buryat-Mongol autonomous republic, 281, 803
Butovo killing field, 479, 619
Butyrka prison, 438, 649
Bychkova, Alexandra, 108, 166
Cadogan, Alexander, 622–23, 642, 868 cadres:
arrests of, 577
Stalin on education of, 571–72

Stalin on importance of, 250, 462–64, 468, 495, 576–77, 603, 604–5, 832, 902
 Cairncross, John, 656, 836
 Cajander, Aimo, 706, 718
 Campbell, Joseph, 301
 Campbell, Thomas, 114–15
 Canaris, Wilhelm, 485, 647, 661, 798 capitalist encirclement, 5–6, 11, 44, 124, 303, 305, 428, 429, 553
 Carol II, king of Romania, 563, 613, 788
 Catalonia, in Spanish civil war, 312, 316, 321, 364, 380, 408
 Catherine II, “the Great,” empress of Russia, 888 censors, censorship, 282, 308, 422
 ubiquity of, 422
 “Center of Centers” conspiracy, 434, 437, 450
 Central Asia, 190
 Central Black Earth region:
 collectivization in, 39, 41, 70
 famine in, 122
 grain procurement in, 128
 Central Committee, 45, 64, 126, 160, 161, 500, 602, 788, 839, 907 accusations against sitting members of, 383 Andreyev as secretary of, 225, 500, 606
 arrests of, 443, 603
 February–March 1937 plenum of, 383–84, 386–91, 394, 396–97, 418, 483, 488, 508, 509 joint plenums of Central Control Commission and, 15–16, 58, 65, 107, 115–17
 June 1937 plenum of, 433–34, 443, 450, 510
 Lominadze’s expulsion from, 59
 Molotov elevated to, 605
 new members of, 162
 1933 purge by, 114
 Syrtssov’s expulsion from, 59
 Yezhov as secretary of, 224, 225, 437, 498, 587
 Central Control Commission, 12, 57, 113, 383, 603, 907 joint plenums of Central Committee and, 15–16, 58, 65, 107, 115–17
 Yezhov as chairman of, 225, 437, 587
 Cervantes, Miguel de, 231
 Chahar province, Inner Mongolia, 233–34
 Chamberlain, Neville, 555, 559, 579, 582, 590, 591, 613, 657, 679, 762, 856 appeasement policy of, 565–66, 591, 652–53, 662, 674, 677 and choice between alliance with Hitler or Stalin, 674–75, 698
 death of, 802
 and German-Soviet Pact, 673, 675

Hitler misread by, 653
 Hitler's manipulation of, 698–99
 Munich Pact and, 564, 565–66, 575
 and negotiations with Germany, 652, 653
 Polish independence guaranteed by, 614–15, 616, 617, 653, 654, 662, 674, 676
 Red Army underestimated by, 675
 resignation of, 763
 Romanian independence guaranteed by, 616
 Triple Alliance proposal and, 648, 649, 662 war preparations and, 782
Chapayev (film), 192, 193, 210, 215, 217, 230, 285, 466
 Chaplin, Charlie, 217, 796
 Charkviani, Candide, 166, 547
 Chavchavadze, Ilya, 511, 512
 Cheka, Chekists, 23, 79, 176, 181, 229, 345, 415, 449 in Azerbaijan, 139, 339, 908
see also NKVD
 Chekhov, Anton, 2, 148
 Chelyabinsk, 32, 190, 343 chemical commissariat, 846–47
 Chiang Ching-kuo, 366, 367
 Chiang Kai-shek, 30, 83, 114, 125, 167, 262, 321, 330, 374, 379, 457, 530, 533, 539, 557, 574, 744, 793, 887
 in civil war with Communists, 277 legality of Communists recognized by, 459 proposed Sino-Japanese alliance and, 233
 Soviet-Japanese pact feared by, 459 united front reaffirmed by, 366, 367 united front with Communists rejected by, 360 in war with Japan, 460, 470–71
 Zhang's capture of, 360–61, 366–67
 Chicherin, Georgy, 26–27, 89
 Chilston, Viscount, 242, 481
 China:
 civil war in, 262, 277, 321, 359–60, 367, 379
 Communists in, see Communist Party, Chinese Japanese-Soviet negotiations on, 793–94
 Japanese war with, 229, 321, 330, 359, 364, 457–59, 460, 470–71, 530, 533, 536, 539, 557, 597, 667, 677, 743–44, 793, 805
 Japan's designs on, 88
 Soviet aid to, 321, 459, 470, 471, 530, 535, 744, 852

Soviet policy on, 29–30, 321
 Trotskyites in, 469
 U.S. aid to, 843
see also Manchuria
 Chinese, in USSR, deportations and imprisonment of, 528
 Chinese Eastern Railway, 30, 83, 84, 144 sale to Manchukuo of, 233, 243
 Chita, Siberia, 644, 667
 Chkalov, Valery, 425, 451
 Choibalsan, Khorloogiin, 196, 280, 287, 461–62, 482, 737
 Christie, J. Walter, 91–92
 Chubar, Vlas, 100, 102, 103, 180, 225, 308, 540
 Chudov, Mikhail, 201, 202, 205
 Churchill, Winston, 61, 557, 719, 740, 775, 794, 903 and Anglo-Soviet trade talks, 777 in attempt to provoke Soviet attack on Germany, 850–51 on imminent German invasion of USSR, 882 Maisky and, 709–10
 negotiations with Hitler rejected by, 778 as prime minister, 763 in refusal to negotiate with Hitler, 764
 scuttling of French navy ordered by, 777–78
 Ciano, Galeazzo, 318, 355, 632–33, 647, 816
Cinema for the Millions (Shumyatsky), 218 Circus (film), 293 cities:
 food rationing in, 128
 influx of migrants into, 72 civil defense service, arrests in, 414
 Civil War in France, The (Marx), 494 class struggle, 5, 7, 11 culture and, 132 seen as inevitable by Marxists, 6, 553
 sharpening of, 6, 29, 38, 59, 114, 116, 309, 389
 Stalin's view of, 143–44, 190, 389
 Clausen, Max, 874–75, 890
 Clausewitz, Carl von, 2, 730 collectives, 909 attempts to force peasants back into, 115 compared with Gulags, 227 household plots and livestock in, 226, 639

Kazakhs' flight from, 106 maternity leave approved for, 227
 mechanization of, 226
 1936 constitution and, 352, 353 peasants' flight from, 23, 29, 101, 117, 129, 405 population of, 606
 stabilization of, 226, 305 collectivization, xii, 11, 53, 84, 87, 103, 120, 137, 138, 299, 308, 439, 485, 902 artels in, 35–36 assassination of rural officials in, 38 as cause of famine of 1931–33, 71, 128–29 forced implementation of, 10, 27, 29, 35, 39, 70, 71, 106, 127–28, 302, 448, 477, 547, 638– 39
 human cost of, 131
 industrialization and, 10–11 inflated claims for, 28–29, 31 kommunas in, 35–36
 kulaks in, see dekulakization
 Marxist ideology and, 132, 576–77 mass resistance to, 27, 29, 38–39, 41–42, 68
 1928–29 harvest and, 16
 OGPU and, 38, 39
 opposition to, 12, 14, 38, 39, 52, 53, 77, 219, 301, 303, 309, 469, 470, 477, 484, 495 regime concessions in, 42–43
 17th Party Congress's celebration of, 160 as Stalin's great gamble, 9, 17, 705
 success of, 369
 urban workers recruited for, 36–38, 42, 43
 Comintern (Communist International), 119, 121, 143, 168, 171, 313, 328, 675, 909
 Chiang's capture condemned by, 362
 China policy of, 321, 330
 Dimitrov appointed general secretary of, 262–63
 German-Japanese pact against, 355–56
 German-Soviet Pact as blow to, 670–71
 mass arrests in, 446–47
 7th Congress of, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263
 6th Congress of, 19–20
 Social Democrats and, 171, 173, 175, 189
 Spanish civil war and, 320, 460
 tenth plenum of, 19–20 “united front” policy of, 259, 262, 277, 299, 320, 330, 359, 362, 367

commissariats, 908 see also specific commissariats
Communism:
British fear of, 590, 591
conspiratorial worldview of, 5–6, 308, 378, 422, 429, 439, 447, 483, 490
as enabler of terror, 307–8
German-Soviet Pact as betrayal of, 670–72 lofty vision of, 6, 7 mass violence justified by, 6–7
as revolt against Social Democracy, 19
Communist International, The, 344
Communist Manifesto, The (Marx and Engels), 573
Communist Party, Austrian, 222
Communist Party, British, 222, 446
Communist Party, Bulgarian, 813–14
Communist Party, Chinese, 121, 262, 277, 330, 374, 446, 793 in civil war with Nationalists, 262, 277, 321, 359–60, 367, 805 as dependent on Soviet weapons and supplies, 366 in Long March, 262, 277, 321, 471
Nationalist massacre of, 30 ordered to release Chiang, 363–64
Soviet aid requested by, 321, 744
Stalin's orders to, 371, 813
Trotskyites in, 371
in united front with Nationalists, 29–30, 362, 364, 379, 458, 459, 470
Communist Party, Czechoslovak, 20, 121, 446
Communist Party, Finnish, 713, 723
Communist Party, French, 121, 251, 261, 298, 328, 329, 446
Communist Party, German, 19, 53, 86, 118, 119, 121, 143, 220, 259, 307, 401, 446
Communist Party, Lithuanian, 770–71
Communist Party, Polish, 446
Communist Party, Spanish, 320, 321–22, 329, 335, 338, 364, 400, 408, 670 in attacks on leftist groups, 364 possibility of coup by, 401, 405, 406
Communist Party, Ukraine, 102
Communist Party, U.S., 145, 146, 446
Communist Party, USSR: all aspects of society controlled by, 73, 697, 907
arrests of, 434, 438–39, 443–44, 475 conferences of, 907 congresses of, 907

18th Congress of, 601–5, 606–9, 610, 624, 698, 839–40, 862 infighting in, 48–49, 57 mass expulsions from, 278
 Nazi Party, USSR compared with, 697 party card verification campaign in, 253, 278, 294, 348, 443 purges of, 43, 112, 114, 117, 124, 126, 438–39, 443, 475 reinstatement of expelled members of, 475 rightists in, see rightists secret department of, see Stalin, Iosif, dictatorship of 17th conference of, 91
 16th Congress of, 17, 43–46, 160, 355
 Stalin as general secretary of, xi–xii, 10, 863, 907–8
 Stalin's micromanagement of, xii
 Communist Party, USSR, apparatus of, 907 dysfunction in, 430, 440–42, 705
 Kaganovich as head of, 325, 518–19
 mass arrests in, 307, 442–45, 520
 regional mass arrests in, 434, 443–44, 518, 551, 603
 Communist Party, USSR, 17th Congress of, 155–56, 159–60, 168, 190, 206, 355, 358, 517
 Bukharin at, 156
 Kamenev at, 156
 Kirov at, 160
 Stalin's keynote speech at, 156–57
 Stalin's report to, 159, 160
 Communist Party, Yugoslav, 849
 Communist Youth League, 10th Congress of, 289–90
 Congress, U.S., repayment of pre-Soviet Russia debt demanded by, 16
 Congress of Soviets, 297, 908
 7th, 223
 Supreme Soviet as replacement for, 354, 471
 Congress of Soviets, 8th, 355, 356, 359, 505
 Stalin's speech at, 352, 353, 354, 355, 372, 483
 Conquest, Robert, 306
 conspiracies, imagined and trumped-up:
 Stalin's obsession with, 54, 113, 313, 332–33, 377, 469–70, 475
 as tool of Stalin dictatorship, 306, 428 see also specific conspiracies constitution, Soviet (1924), 105, 352
 constitution, Soviet (1936), 352, 353–54, 370, 546 consumer goods:
 access to, 208, 268

shortages of, 781, 856
 “Corsican,” see Harnack, Arvid
 Coudondre, Robert, 481, 530, 631, 638, 677
 Council of People’s Commissars, 10, 29, 53, 55, 82, 84, 283, 286, 344, 354, 462, 542, 757, 831, 832, 865, 908
 “bureau” of, 843
 Molotov replaced by Stalin as head of, 863
 Rykov replaced by Molotov as head of, 65
 Stalin’s decimation of, 445
Course on Political Economy, A (Bogdanov), 691
Course of Russian History (Klyuchevsky), 493
 Coyoacán, Mexico, 612
Crash of the German Occupation in Ukraine, 342
 Creditanstalt, failure of, 79
 Crete, German capture of, 905
 Crimea, grain procurement in, 128
 Cripps, Stafford, 810–11, 836, 890, 903 in British-Soviet talks, 775–76, 778–79, 796, 802
 German invasion of USSR predicted by, 850, 884 and Hess’s flight to Britain, 868 possibility of British-German peace suggested by, 851 in recall to London, 877, 880, 884
 Stalin’s meeting with, 777
 Croatia, 889 culture, Soviet, 908–9 anti-“formalist” campaign in, 284 censors and, 282 class struggles and, 132 proletarianism, 132–33
 socialist realism in, 183–84
 Stalin’s engagement with, 132–33, 148, 153, 186–87, 248, 282–83, 298, 594, 789–90, 795, 853
 Stalin’s mass arrests in, 434
 Stalin’s opposition to rigid ideology in, 133, 148–49, 152 see also literature; music; painting
 Czechoslovakia, 61–62, 340, 557, 558 ethnic minorities in, 558
 French alliance with, 251–52, 299, 558, 559, 560, 561, 563, 565, 567, 568, 592, 612
 German invasion of, 609, 612, 616, 617, 679, 747, 888
 Hungarian seizure of territory in, 609
 Munich Pact and, 565–66

in negotiations for Soviet alliance, 191
 Polish seizure of territory in, 609
 Silesian territory added to Poland by, 574
 Soviet failure to support, 572, 574
 Soviet mutual assistance pact with, 191, 251–52, 299, 341, 413, 560, 561, 563, 565, 567, 568
 Stalin's disgust with, 413–14
 Sudetenland in, see Sudetenland
 USSR recognized by, 173
 d'Abernon, Lord, xiv
 Dachau concentration camp, 560
 Dagin, Israel, 415, 526, 541
 Daladier, Édouard, 378, 565, 566, 592, 658, 673, 679, 762
 Dalstroï (Far Northern Construction Trust), 133, 220, 598–99
 Danton, Georges, 3
 Danube, 794, 796
 Danzig, 158, 596, 597, 613, 614, 615, 616, 652, 655, 658, 677, 895
 Hitler's trip to, 684–85
Darkness at Noon (Koestler), 435
 Davies, Joseph, 480–81
Days of the Turbins, The (Bulgakov), 148–49, 230 defense commissariat:
 arrests in, 405
 Kremlin as responsibility of, 228, 229
 see also Voroshilov, Klim E.
 de Gaulle, Charles, 765
 Deich, Yakov, 415, 499
 Dekanozov, Vladimir, 541, 588, 610–11, 627, 772, 805, 807 as ambassador to Germany, 822, 823, 846, 855, 863–66, 872, 880, 890, 896, 899 dekulakization, 35–39, 53, 58, 70, 74, 84, 103, 127–28, 137, 227, 299, 439, 448, 450, 483, 606
 human cost of, 131
 internal deportations in, 36, 70, 74–75, 76, 117, 286 mass executions in, 75, 452
 Demchenko, Maria, 226, 227
 Demetradze, Davit, 512, 513
 Demid, Gelegdorjiin, 197, 279, 287, 461
 Denmark, 252, 774, 800
 German occupation of, 762–63, 889 depression, global, 63, 79
see also Great Depression Derevyansky, Vladimir, 707, 710

dialectical materialism, 570, 576 Dimitrov, Georgi: appointed Comintern general secretary, 262–63
 on Axis pact, 793
 Bulgaria and, 813–14
 on capture of Chiang, 361
 Chinese Communists and, 330, 373, 744, 813 illnesses of, 176
 Spanish civil war and, 347, 406
 Stalin's relationship with, 171, 189–90, 362, 446, 812–13 united front policy and, 175, 189, 259, 320, 362, 470–71
Diplomacy (Kissinger), 579
 Dirksen, Herbert von, 144, 221, 609, 652, 676
Divine Comedy, The (Alighieri), vii
 Dneprostroy, 41, 95
 Dnieper River, 84
 Doi, Akio, 650, 653, 713
 Donbass, 161, 206, 253, 273, 550 decimation of party apparatus in, 445
 Don River valley, 124
 Donskoi Monastery, mass burials at, 479–80
 Doumenc, Joseph, 657–58, 673
 Draule, Milda, 199, 200 Kirov's murder and, see Kirov, Sergei, murder of marriage of Nikolayev and, 197–98
 Drax, Reginald, 656–58, 659, 661, 664, 673
 Dreitser, Yefim, 313, 320, 324
 Drohobycz oilfields, 685, 686, 696 drought of 1931, 75–76, 87
 Dubinsky, Ilya, 427–28
 Dunayevsky, Isaac, 216, 293, 795, 853
 Dunkirk, evacuation of, 765
 Duranty, Walter, 63, 146
 Dvinsky, Boris, 162, 499, 681, 682, 734
 Dzierżyński, Felix, 229, 345, 419, 438, 471
 Eastern Pact (proposed), 173, 183–84, 191, 222 collapsed negotiations for, 239
 Hitler's rejection of, 189
 Eastern Siberia, 70, 75, 90, 97, 128, 198, 460, 779
 East Prussia, 596, 613, 614, 679 economy, Soviet, 831

barter in, 39
 black markets in, 781–82 and difficulty of obtaining foreign financing, 17–18
 Five-Year Plans in, see Five-Year Plans foreign debt in, 86–87 growth rate drop in, 821
 Gulag labor and, 692
 inflation in, 39–40, 46, 48
 Marxist doctrine and, 691–92 per capita consumption in, 404–5
 Eden, Anthony, 242, 280, 288, 292, 398, 648, 836, 868 on Hitler's harping on Soviet threat, 242–43, 244 joint communiqué of Stalin and, 245
 in meeting with Hitler, 240–41, 254
 Stalin's meetings with, 243–44, 251, 254, 255
 on Stalin's personality, 245–46 education, Stalin's belief in power of, 464
 Ehrenburg, Ilya, 170, 255, 256, 334, 339, 481, 497, 517, 545, 635, 670, 858
 Eideman, Roberts (Eidemanis), 414, 422–23
 Eihe, Roberts, 40, 48–49, 58, 190, 225, 453–54, 549
 Eisenstein, Sergei, 215, 217, 218, 230, 284, 417, 635, 671, 770, 812, 853
 Eismont, Nikolai, 113, 114
 Eitingon, Naum "Leonid," 610, 611–12
 "Elder," see Schulze-Boysen, Harro elites, Soviet, 5, 76, 272, 304 access to consumer goods of, 208 terror campaign and, 308, 544
 widespread resentment of, 308, 439, 544
 Elser, Georg, 700–701, 720
 émigré groups, anti-Soviet, 34, 48, 62, 65–66, 106, 349, 352–53, 378, 385, 437
 Soviet penetration of, 12, 76, 322, 349, 437
 Engels, Friedrich, 261, 573
 Enigma machine, 850, 857, 882, 884, 890, 891 enlightenment commissariat, arrests in, 405
 Erkkö, Eljas, 704, 707, 710, 718–19
 Ermler, Friedrich, 372–73
Espionage and Counter-Espionage, M.I.-4 (Russell), 423
Essays on the History of the Roman Empire (Vipper), 493
 Estonia, 17, 50, 89, 485, 596, 634, 664, 703, 786
 failed Communist coup in, 17
 German nonaggression pact with, 647

Red Army troops in, 770–71
Soviet annexation of, 772
Soviet bases in, 714
Soviet pacts with, 93, 693, 694, 708, 715
standing army of, 112
Estonians, in USSR, 476
Ethiopia, see Abyssinia
Europe, failed Communist revolutions and coups in, 17
“Everything Higher: Aviation March” (song), 186
Face of the Day, The (Wasilewska), 789
Fadeyev, Alexander, 151, 153, 424, 437, 512–13, 789
Fall of Paris, The (Ehrenburg), 858 famine of 1891–92, 127
famine of 1921–23, 129
famine of 1931–33, 81, 87–88, 106–7, 112–13, 135, 169, 302
cannibalism in, 122 collectivization and dekulakization as causes of, 128–29 crowd seizures of grain warehouses in, 94 death and disease in, 122, 124, 127, 129 end of, 305
flight from collectives in, 41, 75, 76, 93, 99, 101, 106, 117 household gardens in, 125–26
1933 harvest in, 130
official explanations of, 128–29
OGPU and, 122, 129–30 policy concessions in, 95–98, 99, 100 politburo relief measures for, 123 rationing in, 72, 76, 85, 93–94, 98 reported theft of grain in, 101–2 Stalin’s blaming of peasants for, 128, 129
workers’ strikes and, 95
Farinacci, Roberto, 398–99 fascism, 156, 302
Italian, 19 popular front struggle against, 370
Stalin on, 157, 287
Fear (Afinogenov), 152
Fedotov, Pyotr, 873–74
Feldman, Boris, 412, 423–24
Ferdinand, Franz, archduke of Austria, 88, 558
Feuchtwanger, Lion, 363

on 1937 Trotskyite trial, 371
Stalin's meetings with, 368–70, 416–17
fifth column:
in lead-up to German invasion of USSR, 774–75
Mola's coining of term, 351
Nazi recruiting of, 891 as rationale for mass arrests, 428–29 fighters:
British, 782–83
German, 351, 407, 755–56, 783
Soviet, 78, 346, 351, 567, 668, 756, 820, 839 film industry, Soviet, 192
budget of, 193
musical comedies in, 215–16
newsreels in, 215 proposed Cinema City in, 285–86
Stalin's involvement in, 193, 215–16, 217–18 films, Stalin's private screenings of, 192–93, 210
Filov, Bogdan, 812, 813
Finance Capital (Hilferding), 760
Finland, 17, 89, 485, 596, 664, 702, 703, 889
British relations with, 708, 709
German alliance with, 748
German relations with, 703–4, 709, 713, 717 mobilization of, 710, 712, 713, 714, 879, 894
neutrality of, 712
“People's Government” of, 724–25, 729, 730
pro-German sentiment in, 647
Soviet desire for base in, 710, 711, 716
Soviet invasion of, see Winter War
Soviet negotiations with, 705–7, 708–9, 710, 713–14, 715–20, 721
Soviet nonaggression pact with, 93, 703, 722
Soviet relations with, 722–23
Stalin's fear of invasion from, 27, 50, 703, 704, 707–8, 712
Stalin's territorial demands on, 710–15, 716, 718, 719, 746
standing army of, 112
Swedish relations with, 711, 717 territory ceded to USSR by, 747–48
Wehrmacht in, 792, 808, 813, 829
Finland, Gulf of, 702, 707, 711, 714, 716, 725, 740
Finnish intelligence, 721–22

Finns, in USSR, 476
 Firin-Pupko, Semyon, 413
First Blow, The (Shpanov), 581, 699
First Cavalry Army, The (film), 690
 Fischer, Louis, 339, 380
 Fitin, Pavel, 627, 804, 836–37, 845, 852, 878, 879, 883–84
 Five-Year Plans, 892
 first (1928–32), 17, 20–21, 28, 43, 48, 70, 75, 126, 129, 131, 132, 606 second, 115, 132, 159, 190, 402, 606 shortfalls in, 781 third, 402–3, 606–7, 804–5
Flight (Bulgakov), 148
 Fomin, Fyodor, 202, 204, 207, 208, 220 food commissariat, arrests in, 405 food rationing, 72, 76, 85, 93–94, 95, 98, 128
 end of, 197, 235, 268, 305 food shortages, 16, 41, 404–5 forced labor, Gulag complexes for, see Gulag
 Ford, Henry, 71
 Ford Motor Company, 32 foreign affairs commissariat, 624
 arrests in, 447, 495–96, 582, 625 arrest and torture of Litvinovites in, 626–27
 Litvinov's dismissal from, 625, 632
 Molotov as head of, 625 removal of Jews from, 628
 Foreign Legion, Spanish, 316 foreign policy, Stalin's micromanaging of, 624–25 forestry commissariat, arrests in, 405
 “former people,” 61, 74–75, 148, 177, 229, 236, 352, 383
 Fourth International, 610, 787
 France, 317, 340 accused of anti-Soviet plotting, 61–62
 avoidance of new war as policy of, 556, 559, 563, 566, 568, 592
 British relations with, 242, 298, 592, 612
 Czech alliance with, 251–52, 299, 558, 559, 560, 561, 563, 565, 567, 568, 592, 612
 in declaration of war on Germany, 679
 German occupation of, 760–61, 765–66, 767, 769, 773, 826, 827, 861, 889
 German relations with, 272, 357, 374
 and German remilitarization of Rhineland, 288, 592
 Germany viewed as threat by, 238, 298, 591–92

Hitler's view of, as main enemy, 474
 in minimal response to German invasion of Poland, 679–80
 Munich Pact and, 565–66
 in negotiations for Soviet alliance, 173, 188–89, 191, 246
 Polish alliance with, 158, 592, 597, 612, 634, 677, 680
 Polish independence guaranteed by, 676
 political upheaval in, 559
 Popular Front government of, 328, 357 and possible Japanese-Soviet war, 89 proposed pact between Britain and, 251
 Soviet military talks with, 656–58, 661
 Soviet mutual assistance pact with, 248, 249, 255, 266, 272, 275–76, 288, 298, 299, 357, 560, 561, 592, 601, 624, 649
 Soviet nonaggression pact with, 93, 146, 251
 Soviet relations with, 146, 318–19, 320, 341, 582, 593, 637
 Spanish civil war nonintervention policy of, 317
 Stalin's distrust of, 762
 Stalin's gamble on fighting capabilities of, 668–69
 Triple Alliance proposal and, 621, 638, 639, 649, 653, 810
 France, Vichy, 766, 798, 889
 Franco, Francisco, 343, 350, 556, 582, 889 civil war victory of, 615 in failed assault on Madrid, 350–52, 376, 398, 406–7 gradualist strategy favored by, 399
 Hitler's meeting with, 797–98, 815
 in Morocco, 314–15
 NKVD assassination attempts against, 409 post-civil-war massacres by, 797 right-based coalition built by, 400
 rise of, 315–16
 Stalin's view of, 401
 as war criminal, 615–16
 Frank, Hans, 745, 867
 French intelligence, 766
 Frinovsky, Mikhail, 342, 391, 413, 415–16, 447, 448, 450, 453, 460, 472, 499, 523, 541
 arrest and interrogation of, 617, 618, 620
 execution of, 742
 and Mongolia mass arrests, 461–62
 as naval commissar, 543, 547
 in Soviet Far East, 531–32, 534
 and Soviet incursion in Manchukuo, 535–36, 537

as Yezhov's deputy in terror campaign, 452, 497, 500, 528–29, 540
 Fritsch, Werner von, 473, 474
 “From Factionalism to Open Counterrevolution” (Yezhov), 433
 “From the Odessa Jail” (song), 452
 Furer, Veniamin, 161, 358
 Gagra, 145, 311 shooting incident at, 142
 Stalin's holidays in, 136, 141, 142, 188
 Gai, Mark (Stokland), 222, 393
 Gaikis, Leonid, 334, 381, 405
 Gamarnik, Jan, 58, 90, 350, 418, 423, 424, 443, 527
 Gamelin, Maurice, 280, 767
 Gamsakhurdia, Konstantin, 512, 513
 Gavrilović, Milan, 779, 847–48
 Geladze, Keke, 63–64, 109
 death of, 421–22
 grandchildren's visit with, 270
 Stalin's correspondence with, 108, 270
 Stalin's visit with, 270–71
 Gelovani, Mikhail, 548, 617–18, 745, 854
 Genden, Peljidiin, 196, 277, 461
 Stalin's meetings with, 147–48, 195, 278–79
 Stalin's pipe smashed by, 279
 George V, king of England, 280
 George VI, king of England, 404, 566
 Georgia, 138, 354, 547
 Beria's lobbying for aid to, 513–14
 Beria's supreme power in, 501, 506, 512–13
 famine in, 81
 mass terror in, 502, 508–9, 513, 515–16, 517
 nationalism in, 138
 1937 harvest in, 514
 NKVD in, 508
 10th Party Congress in, 509, 512, 517
 Gerasimov, Alexander, 395, 436, 733, 854
 German embassy, Moscow, evacuation of, 879, 887
 German intelligence, 485
 Anglo-Soviet trade talks and, 779 in USSR, 775 see also Abwehr; SD Germans, in USSR, 476

mass arrests and executions of, 356, 453
German-Soviet nonaggression pact, see Hitler-Stalin Pact German Workers' Party, xiii
Germany, Imperial, in World War I, xv
Germany, interwar, 17
Communists in, 19 depression in, 79–80, 86, 118
failed Communist coup in, 17
1930 elections in, 53
1932 elections in, 118, 119
Reichstag fire in, 120, 142 reparations owed by, 79 rise of Nazism in, 118–19, 129 in secret military cooperation with Soviets, 21
Soviet relations with, 86, 89, 93
unemployment in, 72
Germany, Nazi, 583
in Anti-Comintern Pact, 355–57, 539, 557, 581–82, 596, 655, 667, 677
anti-Communism in, 593 anti-Semitism in, 266–67, 307, 430, 559, 589, 736–37 armaments and machinery supplied to USSR by, 769
Austria annexed by, 292, 558–60, 598
Britain's naval limitation pact with, 288, 630
Britain's need for accommodation with, 169, 591
British lack of knowledge about, 242
British relations with, 355, 357, 590, 609, 617, 652, 653, 904
as common enemy of Britain and USSR, 168
Czechoslovakia invaded by, 609, 612, 616, 617, 679, 747, 888 declining reliance on Soviet materials of, 774 Estonia's nonaggression pact with, 647 in exit from League of Nations, 240 expansionism of, 556, 609, 675
in failure to ship contracted material to USSR, 753, 756
Finnish relations with, 703–4, 709, 713, 717, 748
Four-Year Plan of, 348, 366
France's fear of, 298, 591–92
French relations with, 272, 357, 374
grain shortages in, 852–53
Italian "Pact of Steel" with, 632–34, 639
Italy's relations with, 292
Japanese relations with, 650
Japan's sharing of intelligence with, 485, 533

Kristallnacht in, 598
 Latvia's nonaggression pact with, 647 military buildup of, 143, 191, 592
 Molotov's visit to, 805–9, 811, 815, 818
 national debt of, 598
 Nuremberg laws passed by, 266
 Nuremberg rallies in, 266, 342, 564
 Poland invaded by, 678–79, 682, 684–85, 691, 826
 Poland's rejection of alliance with, 634, 638
 Polish invasion plans of, 620–21, 636–37, 646, 651, 659–60, 661–62, 664, 675, 676–77
 Polish nonaggression declaration with, 157–58, 159, 222, 630, 631, 861
 Polish POWs slaughtered by, 745
 Polish relations with, 291–92, 562, 596–97, 613–14
 as possible Japanese ally in attack on USSR, 534 private companies in, 697–98 and proposed Japanese military pact, 539, 632, 633–34, 639–40, 646, 653 rearmament of, 240, 242–43, 342, 556, 598, 612, 821
 Red Army arrests as viewed in, 431
 Red Army underestimated by, 748–49
 Reichstag fire trial in, 142–43
 Rhineland remilitarized by, 288, 592
 Romanian alliance with, 774 shortages of raw materials in, 329, 350, 474, 833, 838, 859, 890
 Soviet accusations of espionage by, 487
 Soviet armaments openly revealed to, 856–57
 Soviet distrust of, 673
 Soviet extradition of political refugees to, 695
 Soviet grain exports to, 661, 743, 756–57, 769, 816
 Soviet imports of material and technology from, 816–17
 Soviet invasion of Poland sought by, 679, 680
 Soviet loan from, 246, 259, 264, 291
 Soviet planning for war with, 779, 843–44, 869–71
 Soviet relations with, 121, 144, 211, 222, 275, 289, 298, 342, 356, 402–3, 609, 622, 623, 631–32, 633, 637
 Soviet shipments of raw materials to, 769, 856, 869
 Soviet spies in, 252, 699, 722, 800, 803–4, 810, 822, 836
 Soviet trade negotiations with, 246, 257, 271–72, 291, 347–48, 366, 598, 621–22, 643, 651, 654, 659, 660, 694
 Soviet trade pacts with, 661, 696, 731, 743, 752, 756–57, 764, 769, 779, 786, 799, 817, 830–31, 856, 869
 Spanish civil war intervention of, 317–18, 323, 328–29, 339, 350, 407, 431, 556, 582

Stalin dictatorship compared with, 696–97
 Stalin on war plans of, 245
 Stalin's desire for rapprochement with, 169, 299, 579, 582–83, 601, 637, 643, 661, 675
 Stalin's fear of British alliance with, 590
 Stalin's growing concerns about, 167–68, 239–40, 242, 414, 533
 in Tripartite Pact, see Axis pact as USSR's principal foe, 581 war plan of, 613, 620
 Winter War and, 730
 Germany, Nazi, Soviet invasion preparations of, 783–86, 815, 820, 822–23, 835 disinformation campaign in, 837–38, 840, 842, 860, 865–66, 869, 872–73, 874, 877, 878, 885, 890–91
 eastern buildups of Wehrmacht in, 783–84, 785, 787, 790, 791, 794, 795, 818, 820, 825, 828, 838, 857, 858, 859, 864, 875, 877, 878, 881, 891, 894
 fifth column recruiting in, 891
 Hitler's June 14 conference on, 881
 Hitler's justification of, 847
 Luftwaffe redeployment in, 857 perceived as blackmail, 859, 882, 883–84, 886, 891
 Romania in, 876, 877
 Soviet airspace violations by, 846, 855–56, 857, 869, 878, 880, 898
 Soviet intelligence and, 824, 828–29, 836–38, 840, 841–43, 845, 846, 858–59, 864, 865–66, 876, 880, 883, 890, 894–95
 Stalin's discounting of, 841–42, 856, 868, 875, 880–81, 883–84, 885, 890–91, 897 and Stalin's fear of provoking attack, 841, 870, 871, 894, 895, 898 three-pronged attack in, 840, 845, 879 Tukhachevsky on, 245
 U.S. warnings of, 854–55 widespread rumors of, 863–64
 Germany, Nazi, in World War II:
 in Battle of Britain, 780, 784, 785, 793, 794
 British and French declaration of war on, 679
 British bombing of, 791, 794, 808, 809, 811, 818
 British invasion plans of, 782–83, 784, 794
 France occupied by, 760–61, 765–66, 767, 769, 773, 826, 827, 861, 889
 Greece invaded by, 849, 852, 859
 Hess's flight to Britain from, 866–68, 871
 Japanese attack on British territory as goal of, 784
 Low Countries invaded by, 760, 763, 766
 Norway and Denmark occupied by, 762–63
 “peripheral strategy” of, 784, 791, 798, 815, 835, 838, 849, 896, 905

Romania occupied by, 796, 797, 798, 808
 USSR invaded by, 899–900
 Yugoslavia invaded by, 848–49, 850, 852, 859
 Gestapo, 174, 221, 331, 332, 336, 560
 Gibraltar, 315, 784
 Gide, André, 255, 256, 295, 326, 416
 Gladun, Yevgeniya, 225, 635
 Goebbels, Joseph, 118, 143, 173, 266, 318, 356, 432, 474, 585, 608–9, 630, 642, 677, 678, 762, 805, 808, 872, 877, 882, 891, 896, 900
 Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von, 231
 Goglidze, Sergo, 142, 503, 588, 722, 876
 Gogoberidze, Levan, 348, 508
 Gogol, Nikolai, 2
 gold:
 international flow of, 79
 mining of, 133, 497
 Goldstab, Semyon, 467, 548 gold standard, Britain's abandonment of, 85
 Golikov, Filipp, 790, 828–29, 839, 847, 877, 894
 German invasion plans and, 845–46, 858, 875, 876–77, 878, 882
 Goloshchokin, Filipp, 113, 620
 Gorev, Vladimir, 338, 346, 349, 350, 351, 382
 Göring, Herbert, 291, 402
 Göring, Hermann, 143, 175, 240, 244, 252, 287, 402, 473, 474, 574, 583, 642, 661, 662, 663, 677, 678, 700, 752–53, 785, 807, 815, 837, 842, 891 and German trade with USSR, 291–92, 365 as head of Four-Year Plan implementation, 348
 Polish trip of, 222–23
 Gorky, Maxim, 25, 60, 155, 230, 255–56, 261, 442, 478
 death of, 295
 honors heaped on, 151–52
 Moscow mansion of, 152
 in return to Russia, 151 rumored poisoning of, 296 and son's death, 177, 296
 Stalin's relationship with, 9, 27, 34, 36, 64, 148, 153, 233
 state seizure of archives of, 296 in writers' union founding, 151–52, 153, 177–78, 181, 183, 185 Gorky (Nizhny Novgorod), 32, 135, 151, 162 auto factory at, 94
 Gorsky, Anatoly, 656, 661, 740, 741, 800, 836 government bonds, reduced interest rates on, 294–95 grain:

- imports of, 97, 98, 128
- reported theft of, 101–2
- reserves of, 85, 263–64
- grain exports, 43, 49–50, 68, 85, 87, 94, 99, 107, 129, 269
- to Germany, 661, 743, 756–57, 769, 816
- industrialization and, 131
- reductions in, 126, 128
- in tsarist Russia, 127 grain procurements, 10, 16–17, 27, 34–35, 68, 87–88, 102, 115, 123, 131

1934 lag in, 180

1935 harvest and, 263–64

quotas for, 106–7, 113, 128, 227

reductions in, 87, 93–94, 95–96, 100, 106–7, 113, 117, 128

Stalin's renewed demands for, 112–13, 114

Grand Kremlin Palace, 1939 New Year's banquet at, 593–94, 595

Great Britain:

- accommodation with Nazis needed by, 169, 591
- avoidance of new war as policy of, 240, 242, 556, 562, 563, 566, 568, 590–91, 616, 662, 674
- Baltic states' relations with, 655
- in Battle of Britain, 780, 784, 785, 793, 794
- Communism feared by, 590, 591
- in declaration of war on Germany, 679
- empire of, xv, 591, 783, 833
- Finnish relations with, 708, 709
- French navy scuttled by, 777–78
- French relations with, 242, 251, 298, 592, 612
- German relations with, 355, 357, 590, 609, 617, 652, 653, 904
- Germany and Japan as common enemies of USSR and, 168
- Germany's naval limitation pact with, 255, 288, 630
- gold standard abandoned by, 85
- Great Depression in, 591
- Hitler as concern of, 238
- Hitler's view of, as main enemy, 474
- Italian relations with, 374
- and Japanese invasion of China, 364
- Japanese relations with, 653
- in military talks with Soviets, 656–58, 661
- in minimal response to German invasion of Poland, 679–80
- Munich Pact and, 565–66

Polish independence guaranteed by, 614–15, 616, 617, 653, 654, 662, 674, 676
 Polish mutual assistance treaty with, 677, 679–80
 Polish relations with, 597
 Soviet negotiations with, 775–76, 778–79, 796, 810–11, 818, 819–20
 Soviet relations with, 24–25, 26, 28, 168, 188–89, 243–44, 276, 364, 582, 593, 616, 632, 637, 719, 903–4
 Soviet spy network in, 221–22, 241, 656, 740, 741, 800, 836
 Spanish civil war and, 317, 356–57, 374, 398, 582
 Stalin's antipathy and distrust toward, xv, 24–25, 142–43, 168, 255, 292, 298, 675, 699, 762, 764, 765, 777, 780, 786, 819–20, 850, 884, 890, 903
 Stalin's fear of German alliance with, 590
 Triple Alliance proposal and, 621, 622–23, 625, 630, 632, 638, 639, 646, 647–49, 652, 653, 674, 777, 810
 unemployment in, 72
 U.S. aid to, 791, 793, 833–35, 843, 904
 Winter War and, 739, 777
Great Citizen, A (film script; Ermiler), 372–73, 476
 Great Depression, 85–86, 118, 155, 176, 297, 305, 591
Great Dictator, The (film), 796
 Great Fergana Canal, 692 great power, USSR as, 238, 298
 industrialization and, 131
 Stalin's obsession with building, 5, 8, 240, 249–50 great powers:
 Britain as, xv democratic vs. authoritarian, 296, 298
 mass-based modernity mastered by, 296–97
 Russia's sense of insecurity vis-à-vis, 297
Great Terror, The (Conquest), 306
 Great Wall of China, 125, 366
 Greece:
 German invasion of, 849, 852, 859
 Italian invasion of, 798, 812, 847, 849
 Grigulevich, Josifas "Juzik" (Grigulevičius) 409–10
 Gromyko, Andrei, 628
 Gronskey, Ivan, 151, 152
 Grzybowski, Waclav, 634, 683
 Gubin, Alexander, 199, 220
 Guderian, Heinz, 686, 767, 768
 Guernica, bombing of, 407
Guernica (Picasso), 411

Gulag (forced labor camps), 133, 220, 227, 319, 404, 413 death rate in, 599
 escapees from, 497
 Polish POWs in, 687
 population of, 598–99, 692
 reforms of, 286 release of Red Army officers from, 759
 Guomindang, see Nationalists, Chinese
 Habsburg empire, xv, 557, 558, 598
 Haile Selassie, emperor of Abyssinia, 292
 Halder, Franz, 567, 647, 676, 680, 687, 700, 704, 708, 779, 784, 814, 815–16, 841–42, 854, 864, 874, 881
 Halha River, Japanese-Soviet clash at, 644–45, 650–51, 667, 668, 669, 716, 726, 882
 Halifax, Edward Wood, earl of, 559, 621, 622, 633, 638, 648, 652, 653, 658, 675, 679, 763,
775, 784
Hamlet (Shostakovich film score), 283
 Hanko Cape, 707, 710, 711, 714, 716, 719, 725
 Harbin, China, 30, 92, 172, 597
 Harnack, Arvid (“Corsican”), 221, 836, 837, 859, 860, 861, 878 heavy industry commissariat, 371, 514, 606 accusations of wrecking in, 384
 arrests in, 348, 405
 Hebei province, China, 233
 Hegel, G.W.F., 302
 Heiden, Konrad, 589–90, 682
 Henderson, Nevile, 583, 654–55, 661, 662, 664, 676
Hero with a Thousand Faces (Campbell), 301
 Herriot, Édouard, 146, 147
 Herrnstadt, Rudolf (“Arbin”), 220, 659, 699–700
 Hess, Rudolf, xiv, 318, 369, 807
 in flight to Britain, 866–68, 871
 Heydrich, Reinhard, 174, 175, 377, 474
 “hidden enemies,” 336, 389, 429, 439
 Malenkov’s inventories of, 383, 391
 Stalin’s call for ramped-up hunt for, 389–90, 391
 Hilger, Gustav, 633, 654, 663, 864, 865
 Himmler, Heinrich, 174, 175, 688, 694, 713, 797, 805, 823
 Hindenburg, Paul von, 118, 119, 120, 174, 175
 Hirohito, emperor of Japan, 458, 536
 Hirota, Kōki, 90, 93, 196 history:

ancient, Stalin's study of, 493
 Russian, Stalin's view of, 465–66, 468
History of National Socialism, A (Heiden), 682
History of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks), The: Short Course, see Short Course
History of the Russian Revolution (Trotsky), 62
 Hitler, Adolf, 158, 218, 237, 298, 329, 350, 473 annihilation of Jews as goal of, 835 anti-Communist hysteria promoted by, 120, 121, 248, 557, 582 anti-Semitism of, 238, 266, 307, 342, 430, 557, 582, 597–98 anti-Slav worldview of, 817
 Antonescu's meeting with, 798 appointed chancellor, 118, 120
 assassination attempts against, 700–701, 720
 Austrian annexation plan denied by, 240–41 in Beer Hall Putsch, xiv, 559, 867
 Britain and France viewed as main enemies by, 474
 British concerns about, 238
 British empire envied by, 833 and British-German relations, 355, 904–5
 British invasion plans of, 782–83, 784, 794
 Chamberlain manipulated by, 698–99
 Chamberlain's appeasement of, 565–66, 591, 652–53, 662, 674, 677
 Chancellery offices of, 585
 charisma of, 304, 557
 coup plots against, 563–64, 567
 Czechoslovak democracy undermined by, 558 daily routine of, 585–86
 Danzig trip of, 684–85 dictatorial powers of, 120–21, 698 diplomatic maneuvering by, 286–87
 Eastern Pact rejected by, 189
 European conquest as goal of, 652, 814, 817, 888–89 fiftieth birthday celebration of, 629–30
 Four-Year Plan of, 329
 French-Soviet alliance denounced by, 252, 275–76, 288–89
 Franco's meeting with, 797–98, 815
 as gambler, 675, 705
 general European war anticipated by, 474 and German-Soviet negotiations, 403, 660, 661, 664–65 inner circle of, 585, 586
Lebensraum policy of, 238, 342, 474, 556, 562, 682, 783, 785, 834, 904

Lithuania ceded to Soviet sphere of influence by, 694–95
Lvov withdrawal ordered by, 686
as master improviser, xiv–xv meeting of Simon and Eden with, 240–41, 254
Molotov's meetings with, 806, 807–8, 823
Munich Pact and, 564, 565–66
Mussolini's relationship with, 555–56, 559, 561, 798 in 1933 visit to Soviet Union, 146–47 nonaggression pacts and, 157–58, 252 in Paris tour, 769–70 personality and interests of, 583–85
Pétain's meeting with, 798, 815
Polish invasion and, 636, 639, 651, 657, 661–62, 675–77 on possibility of war with USSR, 241 on possible Soviet Pact, 650 in prison, xiv
rearmament pushed by, 143, 238, 556
Rhineland remilitarized by, 288 rise of, xii–xiv, 129
SA arrests ordered by, 174–75 as self-proclaimed defender of civilization, 641 and Soviet annexation of Baltic states, 773 Soviet invasion plans of, see Germany, Nazi, Soviet invasion preparations of Soviet pact desired by, 631, 639, 640, 646–47
Soviet policy of, 143, 617, 623
Soviet threat as fixation of, 242–43, 244, 248, 255, 257, 276, 292, 299, 329, 340, 342 and Spanish civil war, 317, 318, 398
on Stalin, 822
Stalin compared with, xiv–xv, 888
Stalin's accusations of Trotskyite collusion with, 386–87
Stalin's birthday greeting from, 734–35
Stalin's misreading of, 119, 239, 583, 838, 859, 864–65, 869, 878, 891, 896, 897
Stalin's relationship with, 579, 905–6
Stalin's view of, 432, 822
and start of German invasion of USSR, 900
Triple Alliance proposal and, 655, 662
U.S. power envied by, 833–34
Versailles Treaty injustices decried by, 240, 254, 612, 630, 675 war ministry abolished by, 475
Western offensive planned by, 700, 720, 735 world conquest as goal of, 904–5

World War I army service of, xiii zero-sum geopolitics of, 904
Hitler Rearms (Woodman), 681
Hitler-Stalin Pact, xii, xv, 631, 646, 699, 702, 708, 774, 775, 793, 880, 889, 903
Baltic states as issue in, 651, 652, 654, 659
British and French reaction to, 673–74, 676, 730 division of Poland in, 664, 679, 680
German violations of, 787–88, 790, 792, 799, 808 hard-line Nazis' dismay at, 673
Japan and, 670
Lithuania and, 692–93 negotiations leading to, 650, 651, 654, 655, 657, 659–60, 662–65 new Soviet demands for, 799–800 revision of, 692–94, 695–96
Ribbentrop and, 678 seen as betrayal of Communist ideals, 670–72 signing of, 665–66
Soviet war planning and, 829 spheres-of-influence protocol of, 664, 666, 684, 685, 773, 806, 808, 831
Stalin on, 671, 768
Hoffmann, Heinrich, 584, 673
Hohenzollern dynasty, xv
Homage to Catalonia (Orwell), 410–11
Hoover, Herbert, 61, 79
Horthy, Miklós, 889
House of Commons, British, 28, 582, 614, 679 housing, scarcity of, 405
Howard, Roy, 287–88, 298, 621
“How Could This Happen?” (Trotsky), 13
How It All Began (Bukharin), 478
“How to Organize Competition?” (Lenin), 18
Hungarian Soviet Republic, 545
Hungary, 17, 557, 787, 791, 889
in Axis pact, 811–12, 829, 847
Czech territory seized by, 609
mobilization of, 894
I Am the Son of the Working People (Katayev), 770
Ilf, Ilya, 285, 404
Ilyushin, Sergei, 853
In an Old Urals Factory (Yoganson), 607
Indochina, 794

Industrial Academy, 25, 26, 109, 110 industrialization, Soviet, 16, 41, 53, 87, 131–32, 308, 821 accidents and waste in, 73 armament production in, 20–21, 84–85, 727, 760, 820 capital investment in, 257–58, 273 collectivization and, 10–11
 first Five-Year Plan and, 17, 20–21, 28, 48 grain exports and, 43, 49–50, 68, 94, 131 growth of work force and, 72, 73, 85 importing of Western skills and technology in, 32, 45, 71–72, 297 mass arrests and, 445, 551, 603 1934 boom in, 155, 168–69 overoptimistic goals for, 70–71, 606–7 poor quality and underproduction in, 48, 513–14, 606 poor working conditions in, 60 productivity in, 445, 551, 781, 782 shortage of consumer goods in, 781
 Soviet great-power status as dependent on, 238
 success of, 305
 wreckers in, see wreckers, wrecking
 “Industrial Party,” 54, 56, 60, 77
Industry of Socialism (art exhibition), 607 intelligentsia, Soviet, 464, 481, 570, 571, 604–5 education of, 573–74
see also cadres
 International Brigades, 338, 350, 399, 406, 460
 International Congress of Writers for the Defense of Culture, 255–56
In the Steppes of Ukraine (Korniychuk), 896
 Ionescu, Gheorghe Ștefan, 555
 Iran, 17, 872
 Iraq, 872
 Irkutsk, 461
 Italy:
 Abyssinia invaded by, 269, 287, 292, 318
 Albania and, 665
 in Anti-Comintern Pact, 557
 British relations with, 374
 France invaded by, 767–68
 German “Pact of Steel” with, 632–34, 639
 German relations with, 292
 Greece invaded by, 798, 812, 847, 849

Munich Pact and, 565–66
 Soviet spies in, 241
 Spanish civil war intervention of, 318, 323, 328–29, 330, 339, 350, 406, 407, 431, 556, 582
 in Tripartite Pact, see Axis Pact
 Ivan IV, “the Terrible,” tsar of Russia, 246, 282, 466
 Ivanovo, 95, 444
Ivan the Terrible Killing His Son (Repin), 465
Ivan Vasilevich (Bulgakov), 284–85
 Japan:
 in Anti-Comintern Pact, 355–57, 539, 557, 581–82, 667, 677
 in border clashes with Soviets, 456–57, 535–40, 547, 557, 562, 597, 644, 650, 667–70, 677, 683, 726, 755, 902
 British relations with, 653
 China war of, 321, 330, 359, 364, 457–59, 460, 530, 533, 536, 539, 557, 597, 667, 677, 743–44, 793, 805
 as common enemy of Britain and USSR, 168
 expansionism of, 88, 129, 145, 168, 239, 277, 298–99, 581, 675
 German relations with, 650
 Germany’s sharing of intelligence with, 485
 limited resources of, 833
 Manchuria occupied by, 83–84, 88; see also Manchukuo Poland’s offers of cooperation with, 93, 597 as possible German ally in attack on USSR, 534 proposed Chinese alliance with, 233 and proposed German military pact, 539, 632, 633–34, 639–40, 646, 653 in search for allies, 196
 Soviet accusations of espionage by, 487
 Soviet Far East seizure as goal of, 90, 92, 501 in Soviet neutrality pact, 852
 Soviet offers of nonaggression pact rebuffed by, 90, 114
 Soviet relations with, 83, 239–40, 243, 650, 665, 793–94, 796–97, 811, 851–52
 Soviet war seen as inevitable by, 89–90, 91, 92, 98, 125, 597
 Stalin’s avoidance of provocations of, 530
 Stalin’s expectation of war with, 125, 143, 287, 456, 536
 Stalin’s military buildup provoked by, 91
 in Tripartite Pact, see Axis pact
 Japan, Sea of, 702
 Japanese Army: failed putsch in, 287
 Munich Pact and, 574
 troop strength of, 112

see also Kwantung Army, Japanese Japanese intelligence, 597 anti-Soviet operations of, 526–27
 German attack on USSR discounted by, 882
 Germany's sharing of intelligence with, 485, 533
 Lyushkov defection and, 532, 533–34
 Red Army underestimated by, 668
 Stalin's antispy campaign as windfall for, 527, 532–33
 Japanese Korean Army, 531, 536
 Javakhishvili, Mikheil, 512, 513, 517
 Jelagin, Juri, 422, 472, 476, 593
 Jews: alleged international conspiracy of, 430, 589, 597
 expelled from NKVD, 522 forced to wear Star of David, 736
 Hitler's desire for annihilation of, 835
 Kristallnacht attacks on, 598
 Polish, 687–88
 Ukrainian pogroms against, 690 in Vienna, 560
see also anti-Semitism
 Jodl, Alfred, 685, 784, 785, 791, 815, 824, 838, 900
 Johnson Act (1934), 167
Jolly Fellows (film), 215–16, 217, 230, 273, 284, 293, 452
 Jughashvili, Besarion “Beso,” 3, 154
 Jughashvili, Galina, 523
 Jughashvili, Yakov, 3, 108, 270, 272–73, 388, 523, 526, 860 attempted suicide of, 250
 Jughashvili, Yevgeny, 523
July 11 (film), 690
 justice system, Soviet, 176, 190
 Kaganovich, Lazar: appointed transport commissar, 225
 as Central Committee secretary, 500
 eulogy for Nadya delivered by, 112
 famine and, 100, 122–23
 at February 1937 plenum, 388, 394
 grain procurements and, 180
 “hidden enemies” campaign resisted by, 324, 325
 as inner circle member, 180, 205, 215, 386, 393, 500, 526
 as key to survival of Stalin dictatorship, 69

Kirov murder and, 205, 206
 Molotov's rivalry with, 66, 262
 NKVD mass arrests sabotaged by, 500
 Orjonikidze's friendship with, 386, 500 party apparatus run by, 325, 518–19 and proposed replacement of Rykov, 55
 regional party arrests and, 444
 Stalin's breaking of, 386, 709
 Stalin's correspondence with, 81, 82, 84, 98, 100, 102–3, 136, 140–41, 178, 180, 182, 184, 189, 263, 264, 266–67, 268–69, 313, 324, 332, 333, 338, 342
 on Stalin's darkening mind-set, 491
 Stalin's mealtime meetings with, 211, 225
 Stalin's relationship with, 237
 Stalin's toast to, 694
 as Stalin's top party deputy, 65–66, 82
 Trotskyite-Zinovievite trial and, 331
 Tukhachevsky trial and, 423
 workers' strikes and, 95
 on Yezhov's appointment as NKVD head, 345
 Kalinin, Mikhail, 7, 49, 75, 145, 193, 205, 227, 269, 292, 308, 563, 801, 908 Kamenev, Lev, 22, 104, 105, 229, 253, 387, 437, 467 alleged involvement in Kirov murder of, 210–11, 212, 213, 232–33, 236–37
 Bukharin's meeting with, 12 as defendant in Trotskyite-Zinovievite trial, 331
 execution of, 333, 376, 602
 imprisonment of, 325
 internal exile of, 107
 interrogation of, 332
 Kaganovich's denunciation of, 324
 in Kirov murder trial, 219, 532
 Kremlin Affair sentence of, 260
 at 17th Party Congress, 156
 Stalin's mercurial relationship with, 228, 236–37, 332–33
 Trotskyite-Zinovievite Center testimony of, 319
 Kamenev, Sergei, 420
 Kaminsky, Grigory (Gofman), 510–11
 Kandelaki, David, 246, 366, 414, 515
 execution of, 700
 German rapprochement sought by, 271–72 and German-Soviet political negotiations, 373, 402 in German trade negotiations, 208, 246, 257, 259, 264, 271–72, 279, 291

Stalin's meetings with, 208–9, 257, 271, 414
Kangxi, emperor of China, 457
Kapitsa, Pyotr, 853
Karaganda camp complex, 497
Karakhan, Lev, 89, 93, 419, 447
Karelia, Soviet, 711, 712, 724, 725, 746, 772
Karelian Isthmus, 710–12, 714, 718, 725, 727, 746, 753
Karelo-Finnish Soviet Socialist Republic, 753
Kartvelishvili, Lavrenti (Lavrentyev), 81, 82
Kasahara, Yukio, 78, 89–90, 92
Katyn Forest, slaughter of Polish officers in, 745, 795
Kayurov, Vasily, 103–4
Kazakh autonomous republic, 117
death toll in, 127
deported kulaks in, 76
famine in, 76, 106, 122, 127, 129
forced settlement of nomads in, 76, 128
grain procurement in, 113, 128, 180 livestock losses in, 127 starvation in, 41
Kazakhs, 106, 127
Kazakhstan, Republic of, 354, 449, 453 mass arrests of party machine in, 444
Kegel, Gerhard (“X”), 220, 699, 700, 775, 864, 895
Keitel, Wilhelm, 475, 633, 685, 785, 805, 824, 900
Kennan, George, 335, 481, 674
Kerensky, Alexander, xi, 336, 485
Kerzhentsev, Platon (Lebedev), 283, 284–85, 476
Khachatryan, Aram, 853
Khanjyan, Aghasi, 502–4
Kharkov, 32, 122, 146–47, 370
Khasan, Lake, 535, 536, 539, 547, 557, 562, 644, 650, 726
Khatayevich, Mendel, 106–7
Khrushchev, Nikita, 109, 110, 162, 235, 358, 373, 426, 497, 510, 768 arrests and executions overseen by, 520
background of, 206
on Beria's appointment as NKVD deputy head, 541–42 Beria's relationship with, 501, 520–21
elevated to Central Committee, 162 on German invasion of Poland, 682–83
as inner circle member, 501

as Kaganovich protégé, 518–19
 Kirov murder and, 206
 on mass terror, 433 on Mein Kampf, 682 on Molotov, 625–26
 as Moscow party boss, 225, 504, 519, 520 in politburo, 521
 on Stalin's fear of German attack, 893
 Stalin's relationship with, 519–20, 546, 550, 605, 662–63
 Trotsky association of, 519–20 as Ukraine party boss, 504, 520, 522–23, 542
 Khryunkin, Timofei, 826–27
 Kiev, 41, 146, 370, 844
 Kiev special military district, 779
 German invasion of, 900
King Lear (Shakespeare), 231
 Kirov, Sergei, 46, 109, 196, 197
 as Central Committee secretary, 161–62
 documentary film about, 209, 218, 219 extramarital affairs of, 194
 funeral of, 209
 as inner circle member, 107, 161–62, 526
 Leningrad film industry and, 193
 as Leningrad party boss, 46, 55, 107, 134, 161–62, 194
 personality of, 134
 at 17th Party Congress, 160
 in Sochi, 179–80
 Stalin's friendship with, 111, 133–34, 191–92, 193, 210, 311
 as unlikely possible replacement for Stalin, 160–61
 Kirov, Sergei, assassination of, 201–13, 216, 372, 469, 476, 478, 485, 491–92, 526
 Agranov and, 211 alleged Zinovievite conspiracy in, 210–12, 219, 232, 236
 Borisov's death and, 207, 220 conspiracy theories about, 235–36
 Draule and, 202, 203, 206, 210, 218–19, 232 first trial and executions in, 213
 Kamenev and, 232–33, 236–37, 532
 mass arrests in, 305
 Medved and, 235
 Nikolayev as solely responsible for, 235
 Nikolayev's confession in, 202, 204, 210, 211

Nikolayev's execution for, 213
 Nikolayev's stalking of Kirov in, 199, 200, 235
 NKVD and, 202, 206, 228
 NKVD investigation of, 208, 228, 232, 236, 369–70, 527, 532
 NKVD negligence in, 201, 205, 219, 220, 235, 236 public viewing of body in, 208, 209 radio announcement of, 206 reopened investigation into, 313, 323 rumored liaison of Kirov and Draule as motive for, 203 second trial in, 218–19
 Stalin and, 205, 206–7, 209, 235, 236–37
 2004 forensic analysis of, 202–3 witness accounts of, 202, 203
 Yagoda and, 235
 Yezhov and, 224
 Zinoviev and, 210–11, 212, 213, 229, 232–33, 236–37, 532
 Kleist, Peter, 636, 646, 651–52
 Knickerbocker, H. R., 63–64
Knight in the Panthers Skin, The (Rustaveli), 516–17
 Knorin, Wilhelm, 171, 172, 189, 446
 Kobulov, Amayak (“Zakhar”), 803–4, 809, 823, 836, 838, 840, 873, 880, 883
 Kobulov, Bogdan “Bakhcho,” 501, 508, 588, 626, 804, 840, 878, 879
 Koestler, Arthur, 435
 Kola Peninsula, 133
 Kollontai, Alexandra, 179, 301, 427, 627, 715, 741
 Kolotilov, Nikolai, 57–58
 Koltsov, Mikhail, 71, 154, 255, 376, 416, 545
 accusations against, 409
 death sentence of, 740 journalism career of, 334
 1938 showcase trial reports of, 479 as Pravda correspondent in Spain, 334–35, 339, 351, 352, 364, 406, 408–9, 459–60
 as Soviet agent, 364, 382
 Stalin's mocking of, 408–9
 Kolya River region, 133
 labor camps in, 133, 286, 497, 598
 Kommunarka killing field, 455, 479, 480
kommunas, 35
 Komsomolsk shipyard, 703, 805
 Konar, Fyodor (Polashchuk), 435–36
 Konoe, Fumimaro, 457, 793, 851

Konovalets, Yevhen, 610, 611
 Kopelev, Lev, 123–24
 Korean Peninsula, Japanese annexation of, 92
 Koreans, in USSR, deportations of, 453, 528
 Kork, August, 411–12, 422–23
 Korniychuk, Oleksandr, 274, 896
 Korotkov, Alexander, 836, 837
 Korzhenko, Vasily, 447, 626
 Kosior, Stanisław, 29, 94, 100, 102, 103, 125, 129, 211, 308, 520
 Köstring, Ernst, 414, 455, 633, 647, 663, 673, 684, 685–86, 784, 873, 884
 Kosygin, Alexei, 603, 757
 Kotolynov, Ivan, 210, 211, 212
 Kozlovsky, Ivan, 594–95, 853–54
 Krebs, Hans, 852, 856–57, 864
 Krejčí, Ludvik, 558, 561, 562
 Kremlin:
 alleged conspiracy of cleaning personnel in, see Kremlin Affair defense commissariat oversight of, 228, 229 as government headquarters, 66
 as secret headquarters of Stalin dictatorship, 57, 66–67
 Stalin's apartment in, 108, 111, 163, 165, 191, 234, 388, 600
 Kremlin Affair, 227–28, 253–54
 NKVD investigation in, 228–29, 231–32 sentences in, 259–60
 Yenukidze and, 231–32, 233
 Krestinsky, Nikolai, 5, 144, 263, 327, 328–29, 333–34, 347, 447, 478
 Kristallnacht, 598
 Krivitsky, Walter, 583, 675, 696
 Krivoshein, Semyon, 382, 405, 686
 Kruglov, Sergei, 541, 589
 Krupskaya, Nadezhda, 387, 425, 602
 Kuibyshev, Nikolai, 473, 478
 Kuibyshev, Valerian, 32, 55, 98, 101, 113, 190, 220 kulaks (rich peasants), 12, 14 classification of, 74 grain procurements from, 16–17 mass executions and internal deportations of, see dekulakization Kulik, Grigory, 397, 414–15, 561, 651, 741, 752, 878 marriages of, 758, 795 mechanized units disparaged by, 755
 promoted to marshal, 758

Kun, Béla, 172, 189, 446, 545
 Kuril Islands, 811, 851
 Kursk, 180
 Kursky, Vladimir, 415, 526
 Kutuzov, Mikhail, 751–52
 Kutyakov, Ivan, 395–96
 Kuusinen, Otto, 171, 189, 446, 723–25, 753
 Kuzmina, Yulia, 411, 412
 Kuznetsk, 32
 Kuznetsov, Nikolai, 380, 427, 684, 899
 as naval commissar, 702 promoted to admiral, 759
 on Stalin's fear of German attack, 893
 Kwantung Army, Japanese, 31, 84, 125, 531, 597, 645 in Amur confrontation with Soviet gunboats, 456 in border clashes with Soviets, 535–40, 547, 557, 562, 597, 644, 650, 667–70, 677, 683, 726, 755, 902 massacre of Chinese soldiers by, 83
 Kyrgyzstan, 354, 773
 Labour party, British, 24
 Ladoga, Lake, 711
Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk (Shostakovich), 283
 Lakoba, Nestor, 136–37, 144, 165 agricultural reports of, 231
 background of, 137–38
 Beria's campaign against relatives and associates of, 515
 Beria's rivalry with, 139, 141, 142, 237, 504–6, 508
 death of, 506, 526
 Orjonikidze's friendship with, 137
 popularity of, 137, 140
 Stalin biography and, 214
 Stalin's friendship with, 137, 138, 140, 237, 506
 Lakoba, Sarie, 505, 506
Land Under the Yoke (Wasilewska), 789
 Lapin, Albert, 532–33
 Largo Caballero, Francisco, 338, 343, 346, 380–81, 406
 resignation of, 408
 Stalin and, 347, 365, 381, 405
 Larina, Anna, 45, 349
Last Billionaire, The (film), 230
 Latvia, 17, 50, 62–63, 89, 485, 596, 634, 664, 786

German nonaggression pact with, 647
Red Army troops in, 770–71
Soviet annexation of, 772
Soviet bases in, 714
Soviet pacts with, 93, 708, 715
standing army of, 112
Latvians, in USSR, 476, 454
Laval, Pierre, 242, 246, 252
German rapprochement sought by, 272
Stalin's meeting with, 251
in trip to Moscow, 251
Law of Life, The (film), 788–89, 790 leadership, Stalin's view of, 441–42
League of Nations, 83, 125, 144, 145, 146, 158, 218, 240, 242, 245, 269, 280, 288, 292, 608
Germany's exit from, 173, 240
USSR expelled from, 729
USSR's joining of, 189, 190, 237, 239, 248, 299
Lefortovo prison, 438
Lehmann, Wilhelm "Willy," 221, 804
Lemeshev, Sergei, 595
Lend-Lease Act, 843
Lenin, Vladimir, 2, 18, 64, 65, 129, 173, 219, 249, 336, 494, 573, 903
death of, 387
documentary films on, 219–20 ideology of, 493–94, 691
New Economic Policy of, 9–10, 15 in 1917 return to Russia, xi purported Testament of, 5, 12, 15, 67, 105, 160, 212, 228, 262, 299, 303, 336, 337, 372, 602
secret protocols condemned by, 666 Stalin's rereading of, 691 stroke of, xii
Leningrad, 16, 32, 84
famine in, 112
security of, 711, 718, 747, 748 vulnerability to attack of, 703
Leningrad Film Studio, 218
Leningrad military district, 779
Lenin in 1918 (film), 617–18
Lenin in October (film), 467, 469, 617, 853
Leninism, see Marxism-Leninism
Leonhard, Wolfgang, 671–72

Leontyev, Konstantin ("Petrov"), 864, 895
 Levin, Usher Leib "Lev," 47, 264, 385
 Levitan, Yuri, 210, 295, 424
Life of Stalin (Koltsov), 154
 Lifshitz, Boris, see Souvarine, Boris light industry commissariat, 514
 arrests in, 405
 Literary Fund, 178 literature, Soviet:
 socialist realism in, 183
 translation of foreign writers in, 231
 Union of Soviet Writers and, see Union of Soviet Writers see also culture, Soviet Lithuania, 17, 252, 276, 562, 596, 613, 634, 664, 687, 786, 819
 ceded to Soviet sphere of influence, 694–95
 German-Soviet Pact and, 692–93
 pro-German sentiment in, 647
 Red Army troops in, 770–71
 Soviet annexation of, 772
 Soviet bases in, 714
 Soviet pacts with, 87–89, 710, 715
 Little Entente, 62, 173
Little Golden Calf; The (Ilf and Petrov), 285
Little Peter and the Wolf (Prokofyev), 292–93 Litvin, Mikhail, 416, 540, 543
 suicide of, 578
 Litvinov, Maxim, 24, 173, 251, 269, 280, 327, 329, 337, 342, 343, 448, 458, 538, 582, 590
 anti-Nazism of, 275
 Baltic states and, 614 dismissed as foreign affairs commissar, 625, 632 and French-Soviet relations, 357
 German-Soviet political negotiations and, 373, 402, 403
 as inner circle member, 500
 investigation of, 626
 Molotov's antipathy toward, 623, 624, 625 multipower conference proposed by, 612 promoted to foreign affairs commissar, 89
 Spanish civil war and, 320, 347
 on threat of Nazi aggression, 242–43
 Triple Alliance proposal of, 621, 623, 625
 U.S. diplomatic recognition negotiated by, 145 war with Germany predicted by, 751 Zhdanov's enmity toward, 624 livestock:

 collectivization and, 29, 35, 43, 94, 96
 imports of, 95, 126, 128
 losses of, 38, 44, 48, 59, 101, 106, 127, 131, 159
 Livshits, Yakov, 348, 358
 Lloyd George, David, 614, 776
 Loizeau, Lucien, 265–66
 Lominadze, Vissarion "Beso," 56, 57, 58, 64, 69 expelled from Central Committee, 59
 suicide of, 358
 Long March, 262, 277, 321, 471
 Lordkipanidze, Zekeri, 515, 528–29
 Low, David, 556, 642
 Low Countries, German invasion of, 760, 766, 889
 Lozovsky, Solomon, 172, 446
 Luftwaffe, 221, 473, 566, 766, 794
 in Battle of Britain, 780, 783, 784, 785, 793, 794 bombers of, 351, 678, 755
 creation of, 240 fighters of, 351, 407, 755–56, 783
 losses of, 780
 order of battle of, 882
 in Polish invasion, 679
 Soviet airspace violations by, 846, 855–56, 857, 869, 878, 880, 898
 in Spanish civil war, 323, 351, 407
 in transfer to Soviet border, 857, 880
 in Yugoslavia invasion, 848
 Luxembourg:
 German invasion of, 763
 see also Low Countries
 Lvov (Lwów, Lviv, Lemberg), 685–86, 774
 German withdrawal from, 686
 Lyakhterov, Nikolai ("Mars"), 840, 842, 872
 "Lycée-ist," see Berlings, Orests
 Lyons, Eugene, 63, 71, 780–81
 Lyushkov, Genrikh, 228
 accusations against, 528–29, 531
 defection of, 530–31, 533–35, 536, 540, 668
 as NKVD head for Far East, 528, 530

Stalin's mass arrests denounced by, 532–33
Macbeth (Shakespeare), 422
 MacDonald, Ramsay, 24–25, 80
 Machiavelli, Niccolò, vii, 4–5, 297–98, 493
 Maclean, Donald, 222, 636, 836
 Madrid: air attacks on, 323, 350, 351
 fall of, 615
 Franco's failed assault on, 350–52, 376, 398, 406–7
 Magadan, 133, 599
 Maginot Line, 592, 766, 827
 Magnitogorsk Metallurgical Combine, 32, 75, 94, 96
 Main Military Council, Soviet, 473, 547, 562, 564–65, 726, 736, 757
 Main Military Council, Soviet, June 1937 session of, 417–18, 435 arrests of members of, 420–21
 Blyukher's report to, 420 interrogation reports presented to, 418
 Stalin's address to, 418–19
 Voroshilov's reports to, 418
 Maisky, Ivan, 242, 280, 339, 614, 621, 622, 623, 627, 633, 648, 652, 656, 663, 719, 739, 740, 775, 776, 778, 780, 858, 868, 884, 890
 Churchill and, 709–10
 Triple Alliance proposal and, 638
 Makhatadze, Nikolai, 81–82
 Maksimovsky, Vladimir, 4–5
 Malenkov, Georgy, 280, 839 inventories of "former people" drawn up by, 383, 391 on justification for mass terror, 483 list of candidates for NKVD head compiled by, 540–41 mass arrests overseen by, 350, 516
 regional party arrests and, 444, 518
 Stalin's correspondence with, 383
 Yezhov denounced by, 542
 Yezhov's file on, 619
 Malraux, André, 181–82, 255, 256, 417, 635
 Maly, Tivadar "Theodore," 222, 409, 546–47
 Malyshev, Vyacheslav, 603, 757, 832 managerial class, arrests of, 434, 444, 445, 599, 821
 Manchukuo, 125, 277, 299, 527, 531, 852
 Chinese Eastern Railway sold to, 233, 243
 Japanese troops in, 536, 730; see also Kwantung Army, Japanese

Soviet border clashes with, 456–57, 535–40, 547, 557, 562, 597, 644–45, 650, 667–70, 677, 683, 726, 755, 902
 Soviet relations with, 144
 Manchuria, 29–30
 Japanese occupation of, 83–84, 88
 Japanese puppet state in, see Manchukuo
 Soviet invasion of, 30–31
 Mandelstam, Nadezhda, 169–70, 544, 635
 Mandelstam, Osip, 404 arrest and internal exile of, 169–70, 186 Mannerheim, Gustaf, 708–9, 717–18, 739, 747 on Red Army capabilities, 749–50
 Mannerheim Line, 727, 743, 753
 Manuilsky, Dmytro, 168, 171, 189, 361, 362, 446
Man with a Gun (Pogodin), 476
Man with the Gun, The (film), 548
 Mao Zedong, 360, 367, 370, 373, 458, 471, 539, 744, 805, 813 and capture of Chiang, 361, 363–64 negotiation with Nationalists offered by, 330
 rise of, 277
 Marco Polo Bridge, 457
 Marmara, Sea of, 13
 Martel, Giffard, 340
 Marty, André, 338, 405, 406
 Marx, Harpo, 145
 Marx, Karl, 2–3, 302, 493–94, 573
 Marx-Engels-Lenin Institute, 154, 734
 Marxism, 131
 capitalism as viewed by, 6
 Hegel's influence on, 302
 idealism of, 6
 Stalin's dedication to, 10, 573, 576–77, 691
 Marxism-Leninism, 3, 6, 49, 304, 494, 901
 Stalin's role in synthesis of, 8
 Stalin's view of, 10, 570–71
 Maryasin, Lev, 436
 Mason-MacFarlane, Noel, 629
 mass violence:
 Communism's justification of, 6–7
 Stalin's use of, see terror campaign
Master and Margarita, The (Bulgakov), 635, 746

Materialism and Empirio-Criticism (Lenin), 691
 Matsesta sulfur baths, 4, 47, 98, 264, 311
 Matsuoka, Yōsuke, 851–52, 855, 860
 Mayakovsky, Vladimir, 149, 181–82, 276
 Mdivani, Polikarp “Budui,” 337, 509, 515, 542
 Mediterranean, German “peripheral strategy” in, 784, 791, 798, 815, 835, 837, 838, 849, 905
 Medved, Filipp, 79, 201, 235
 Kirov murder and, 202, 204–5, 206, 208, 220
 as Leningrad NKVD head, 193–94
 Stalin’s lack of confidence in, 194
Mein Kampf (Hitler), xiv, 158, 238, 245, 630, 681–82, 845, 867
 Meissner, Otto, 810, 872
 Mekhlis, Lev, 57, 193, 230, 390, 496, 698, 699, 719, 749 and arrests of Red Army officer corps, 426 Beria criticized by, 508, 509 as deputy defense commissar, 530
 elevated to Central Committee, 162
 Kirov murder and, 205
 as Pravda editor, 425
 in Soviet Far East, 530, 531, 533, 534, 535–36, 537
 in Winter War, 731, 735, 751, 753
 Meltzer, Judith “Yulia,” 272–73, 388
Member of the Government, A (film), 745–46
 Mensheviks, 40, 50, 99, 116, 176, 233, 254, 467 as émigrés, 34, 48, 62, 65–66, 106, 349, 352–53, 378, 385, 437; see also émigré groups, anti-Soviet Mercader, Ramón, 611–12, 787
 Merekalov, Aleksei, 621–22, 623, 631
 Meretskov, Kirill, 380, 417, 707–8, 723
 as army chief of staff, 758, 779
 promoted to general, 759
 Red Army shortcomings reported by, 825
 Winter War and, 726, 727, 729, 735, 736, 743, 753
 Merkulov, Vsevolod, 260, 508, 542, 588, 606, 619, 717, 805, 807, 852, 874, 883
 Meshcherino, 540, 542–43, 619
 Messing, Stanisław, 23, 24, 35, 78
 Metekhi fortress prison, 509
 Mexico, Trotsky in, 368, 610, 787, 892
 Meyerhold, Vsevolod, 284, 476, 649–50, 740, 770
 Meżyński, Władysław, 14, 22, 23, 50, 51, 52, 54, 56, 64, 77, 79, 103, 134, 345, 478
 Mikhailov, Maxim, 594–95

Mikhoels, Solomon, 231, 635
 Mikoyan, Anastas, 16, 41, 43, 55, 64, 96, 114, 176, 180, 209, 225, 262, 278, 308, 314, 385, 428–29, 471, 516, 843
 on cult of Stalin, 7 and German trade negotiations, 598, 696, 756, 786
 as inner circle member, 262, 386, 500, 526
 Kirov murder and, 205
 and proposed replacement of Rykov, 55
 Stalin's breaking of, 386
 on Stalin's darkening mind-set, 491 on Stalin's eating habits, 165
 Stalin's mealtime meetings with, 225
 Mikulina, Yelena, 18–19
 military, Soviet:
 budget of, 223, 278, 821
 December 1940 conference of, 824–27 forward defense doctrine of, 824–25, 830, 844, 871, 881, 885 intelligence department of, see Soviet military intelligence preemptive strike against Germany envisioned by, 869–71
 Stalin's refusal to order full war footing for, 869–70
 Stalin's rejection of preemptive strikes by, 870 war plans of, 779, 843–44, 869–71 see also navy, Soviet; Red Air Force; Red Army; Soviet Far Eastern Army military academy graduations, Stalin's speeches at, 249–50, 860–61
 Miliukov, Paul, 746–47
 Mironov, Sergei (Miron Korol), 415, 461, 471, 482 as NKVD head in Western Siberia, 449–50, 451 secret police career of, 448–49
 Mironova, Agnessa, 449, 461 modernity, mass-based, 296–97
 Mogilevsky, Solomon, 139–40
 Moiseyev, Igor, 593, 648
 Mola, Emilio, 315–16, 318, 351, 407, 428
 Molchanov, Georgy, 228, 389
 Moldavia, Moldavians, 138, 786
 Molière, 231
Molière (Bulgakov), 284–85
 Molotov, Vyacheslav: on Anti-Comintern Pact, 357, 655 antipathy toward Litvinov of, 623, 624, 625 appointed head of government, 65 on arrests of staff, 581

on Axis pact, 793
background of, 65
Beria's rivalry with, 550, 692
Berlin visit of, 794, 797, 798–99, 803, 805–9, 811, 815, 818
Bessarabia ultimatum of, 773
Britain viewed as main enemy by, 274 and British trade talks, 776, 777 on Bukharin's relationship with Stalin, 433 as Central Committee member, 605 economic policy and, 257, 258 on famine of 1931–33, 127
at February 1937 Central Committee plenum, 386, 388, 389, 396–97
Finnish negotiations and, 708–9, 710, 711, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718–19, 720
as foreign affairs commissar, 625, 863
as Germanophile, 643, 780 and German violations of the Pact, 790–91, 799 on German-Soviet relations, 356
grain procurements and, 180
as head of government, 605, 843
Hitler's meetings with, 806, 807–8, 823
Hitler-Stalin Pact and, 637, 650, 659, 660, 666, 672–73, 685, 695 industrial sabotage report of, 388
as inner circle member, 161–62, 205, 262, 393, 500, 526, 623
Kaganovich's rivalry with, 66, 262
as key to survival of Stalin dictatorship, 69
Kirov murder and, 205, 209
letters to wife from, 786
mass executions authorized by, 542
Mongolian border clashes and, 644
on Nikolayev, 207
Orjonikidze's eulogy delivered by, 385
as proposed replacement for Rykov, 53, 56, 64 and proposed Soviet inclusion in Axis powers, 813, 831 replaced as head of government, 863
Schulenburg's meetings with, 898 self-assurance of, 625–26 and severing of Finnish relations, 722 and Soviet invasion of Poland, 681, 683–84
Spanish civil war and, 381

Stalin's correspondence with, 24, 25–26, 31, 32, 47, 48–49, 50, 53, 58, 84, 100, 189, 262, 266–67, 268–69
 Stalin's criticisms of, 863, 865 on Stalin's drive for self-improvement, 495 on Stalin's friendship with Kirov, 134
 Stalin's mealtime meetings with, 211, 225
 Stalin's relationship with, 237, 624, 625–26
 on Stalin's view of Hitler, 822 on Stalin's work ethic, 892
 terror campaign and, 429, 624
 on third Five-Year plan goals, 606–7 and Triple Alliance proposal, 633, 634, 639, 647–49, 653, 656
 Winter War and, 746
 Yezhov's threatening of, 500
 Yugoslavia and, 848
 Molotov, Zhemchuzhina, 193, 274, 593, 692
 Molotovsk shipyard, 703
 Moltke, Count Helmuth von (the Elder), xiv
 Moltke, Hans-Adolf von, 221, 596
 Mongolia, Inner, 125, 233–34
 Mongolia, Outer (Mongolia People's Republic), 83, 88, 98, 125, 234, 287, 366, 456, 458–59, 485, 557, 737, 852
 army of, 196
 in border clashes with Manchukuo, 455–56, 535–40, 547, 557, 562, 597, 644–45, 650, 667–70, 677, 683, 726, 755, 902
 Japanese attack on frontier post of, 277 lamas in, 147, 195, 277, 278, 309, 462 mass arrests and executions in, 482 military budget of, 277, 278, 280
 NEPmen in, 147
 Red Army troops in, 197, 280, 461, 644, 650–51, 653, 667–68
 reversal of party policy in, 97 showcase trials in, 461, 462
 Soviet nonaggression pact with, 196–97
 as Soviet puppet state, 147–48, 195, 289
 Stalin's concerns about, 147–48, 195
 Stalin's forgiveness of debt of, 196
 Stalin's mass arrests in, 460–61
 uprisings in, 97
 Mongolian People's Party, 147, 737
 Moravia, 774

Morocco, Franco in, 314–15
 Moscow:
 antiaircraft defenses of, 889
 famine in, 112
 food rationing in, 16
 mass terror in, 520
 May 1 celebrations in, 246–48, 290
 Napoleon's occupation of, 888
 Moscow, 1937 (Feuchtwanger), 416–17
 Moscow Artists' Union, 284
 Moscow Art Theater, 148, 150, 151, 284, 404, 552
 Moscow International Film Festival (1975), 230
 Moscow metro, Stalin's ride on, 234–35, 250–51
 Moscow-Volga Canal, Gulag labor force of, 404
 Mosfilm, 422
 Moskvín, Ivan, 224, 593
 Motherland (Wasilewska), 789
 Mukden, Manchuria, 30, 83, 457
 Mukhina, Vera, 411, 853
 Munich, 597
 Munich Beer Hall:
 attempted assassination of Hitler in, 700–701, 720
 failed putsch in, xiv, 559, 867
 Munich Pact, 565–66, 567, 572, 574–75, 592, 609, 674, 699, 763
 Stalin and, 578, 579
 Murmansk, 133, 739, 740, 748
 Musavar counterintelligence, 510, 511, 589 music, 283
 socialist realism and, 183–84
 Stalin's interest in, 594
 Mussolini, Benito, 189, 210, 285, 292, 298, 317, 318, 329, 350, 525, 565, 767, 814, 816, 838, 849, 889
 and German invasion of Poland, 676–77, 678
 Hitler's relationship with, 555–56, 559, 561, 798
 and Spanish civil war, 398–99, 406
 My Life: An Attempt at an Autobiography (Trotsky), 62, 540
 Myussera, Abkhazia, Stalin's dacha in, 505
 Mzechabuki (ballet), 506
 Nabokov, Vladimir, 550
 Naggiar, Paul-Émile, 633, 649
 Nakhichevan, 518

Nanking (Nanjing), 321, 359, 360, 367
 Japanese capture and massacre of, 470
 Napoleon I, emperor of France, 690, 888
 Narew River, 684, 686
 Nasedkin, Alexei, 453–54
 Nationalists, Chinese, 17, 29, 83
 in civil war with Communists, 262, 277, 321, 359–60, 367, 805
 Mao's offer of negotiations with, 330 massacre of Communists by, 30 northern China abandoned by, 743 proposed Japanese alliance with, 233
 Soviet aid to, 459, 470, 471, 530, 535
 Soviet relations with, 29–30, 114, 557
 in united front with Communists, 277, 362, 364, 379, 458, 459, 470, 539 in war with Japan, see China, Japanese war with nationalities:
 mass terror campaign against, 453–54, 476
 Stalin's view of, 7
 National People's Party, German, 120
 National Unity Camp, 688 navy, German, 473, 876
 navy, Soviet, 702–3, 704
 Nazis, Nazism, xiii anti-Bolshevism of, 175, 473
 Communist Party compared with, 287, 697 as dismayed by German-Soviet Pact, 673 in 1930 election, 53
 rise of, 118–19, 129
 Stalin's misunderstanding of, 557
 Near Dacha:
 accommodations at, 165, 524–25
 secrecy of, 164–65
 Stalin's fifty-sixth birthday celebration at, 277–78 as Stalin's principal residence, 163
 Near East, 752, 796, 800, 808
 German “peripheral strategy” for, 784, 791, 798, 802, 815, 835, 837–38, 849, 872, 896, 905
 Negrín, Juan, 347, 380
 Nemirovich-Danchenko, Vladimir, 148, 404 NEPmen (private traders), 12
 in Mongolia, 147
 Stalin's suppression of, 72

Netherlands, 766
general mobilization of, 678
German invasion of, 763
see also Low Countries
Neurath, Konstantin von, 292, 402, 473, 628
Nevsky, Alexander, 751
New Economic Policy (NEP), 9–10, 14, 15, 17
New Forms of Combat (Isserson), 826
New Moscow (Pimenov), 607
New York Stock Exchange, 32
Nicholas I, tsar of Russia, 246
Nicholas II, tsar of Russia, 267, 436, 485 abdication of, xi, 301
Night of the Long Knives, 174–75, 221
Nikolayev, Leonid: childhood of, 197
diary of, 199–200, 203
Draule's marriage to, 197–98
Kirov murdered by, see Kirov, Sergei, murder of party expulsion of, 198, 204, 206, 236
quarrelsome nature of, 198
Stalin's interrogation of, 207–8 workplace problems of, 198, 204
Nikolayev shipyard, 702–3
Nikonov, Alexander, 413, 454–55
Nin, Andreu, 335, 364 assassination of, 410, 425, 534
Nizhny Novgorod, see Gorky
NKGB (state security commissariat), 840, 846, 850, 891, 908 analytical department lacked by, 841 counterintelligence of, 873–74
evacuation of German and Italian embassies reported by, 887
German disinformation campaign and, 878
NKVD (internal affairs commissariat):
arrests in, 376, 379, 393–94, 405, 415–16, 434, 450, 471, 522, 528, 588–89, 595, 603
awards and pay raises for, 451, 472
Beria as head of, 550, 588–89, 595, 605 decline in mass arrests by, 190, 286
at February 1937 Central Committee plenum, 386, 389 foreign intelligence operations of, see intelligence, Soviet Franco assassination attempts by, 409

Georgians in, 588
German agents captured by, 857 given co-oversight of Kremlin investigation, 229 and hunt for “hidden enemies,” 325, 391
introduction of formal ranks in, 272
investigation of excessive arrests by, 578
Jews and minorities expelled from, 522, 588
Kirov murder and, see Kirov, Sergei, murder of Kremlin personnel investigated by, see Kremlin Affair
Leningrad branch of, 202, 203–4, 207, 219, 220, 229, 236, 540 mass arrests and executions by, 294, 319, 452–53, 486, 487, 488 mass arrests of foreign agents of, 497, 498–500
Medved as head of Leningrad branch of, 193–94
NKGB separated from, 840
OGPU replaced by, 176–77
Operational Order No. 00447 of, 452 party terror and, 475
Red Army investigated by, 222, 357
in release of prisoners from Yezhov-era roundups, 618 and Sedov’s death, 476
Siberia branch of, 194
in Spanish civil war, 339, 408, 410, 425
spying charges against, 528 “spy mania” arrests by, 486, 487, 488 supposed coup plot in, 391 swollen ranks of, 497–98 torture employed by, 190, 595
Trotsky assassination attempts by, 368
Trotskyites arrested by, 279–80, 294, 319
Trotsky surveilled by, 322–23
twentieth anniversary of, 471 writers’ union surveilled by, 182, 185
Yagoda as head of, 176, 272, 436, 523, 527
Yagodaiteles eliminated from, 415
Yezhov as head of, 344–45, 392, 415, 437, 449, 451, 471, 498, 521–22, 540–42, 618
Yezhovites eliminated from, 578, 588, 619
Yezhov loyalists in, 499
Yezhov’s resignation as head of, 587
Yezhov’s review of, 229
Nomonhan, 644 battles at, 645, 650–51, 683

nonaggression pacts:
 Stalin's desire for, 88–89
see also specific pacts
 Non-Intervention Agreement, 327, 329, 330, 337, 342, 346, 347
 Non-Intervention Committee, 339, 347
 North Caucasus, 107, 112–13, 122, 128
 party purges in, 112, 114
 Northern Fleet, Soviet, 133, 703
 Norway, 763
 German occupation of, 762–63, 889
 Trotsky in, 327, 368, 610
 Novokuznetsk, 190
 Nuremberg, Nazi Party Congress in, 266–67
 Nuremberg laws, 266
 Odessa, 13, 146, 774
 Odessa military district, 779
 OGPU, 35, 50, 51, 54, 89, 94, 95, 97, 117, 908 Beria's career in, 140
 collectivization and, 38, 39, 41–42
 dekulakization and, 36, 37, 74–75
 famine and, 122, 130
 foreign directorate of, 172
 1931 shakeup in, 79, 80 peasant deportations and, 125 power struggles in, 22–24, 78–79, 80
 Red Army investigated by, 76–77, 84
 replaced by NKVD, 176
 Trotsky smuggled out of Russia by, 12–13
 wrecking investigations of, 57
 Okhotsk, Sea of, 133
okhranka, 436
 Olberg, Valentin, 279–80
 Olsky, Jan (Kulikowski), 56, 78
 Olympics of 1936 (Berlin), 326
 “On Anti-Soviet Elements” resolution, 450
 “On Certain Cunning Techniques of Recruitment by Foreign Intelligence” (Pravda article), 486
One-Story America (Ilf and Petrov), 285–86, 404
 “On the Hills of Manchuria” (Shatrov), 209
On the History of the Bolshevik Organization in the South Caucasus (Beria), 503
On the Nature of Absolutism (Vorovsky), 493
On the Road to Thermidor (Besedovsky), 294

Open Letter to Members of the Bolshevik Party, An (Trotsky), 787 opera, Stalin's love of, 594
oprichnina, 465–66
Orakhelashvili, Mamiya, 140, 141, 264, 358, 508, 515
Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN), 437, 610 orgburo, 66, 162, 224, 225, 507, 907
Orjonikidze, Papuliya, 348, 504
Orjonikidze, Sergo, 12, 20, 26, 29, 36, 39, 46, 49, 55, 57, 58, 65, 73, 86, 136, 140, 141, 159, 162, 209, 212, 231, 264, 273, 278, 308, 314, 345, 362, 373, 386, 396 appointed head of Supreme Council of the Economy, 66
funeral of, 385
as heavy industry commissar, 262, 278, 314, 320, 323–24, 325, 348, 371, 383–84
“hidden enemies” campaign resisted by, 323–24, 325 illnesses and failing health of, 123, 197, 324, 348, 350
as inner circle member, 162, 197, 262, 386, 526, 548
Kaganovich's friendship with, 386, 500
as key to survival of Stalin dictatorship, 69
Kirov murder and, 205, 206, 209
Lakoba's friendship with, 137 military budget cuts and, 101
popularity of, 325–26, 501 posthumous vilification of, 508–9
and proposed replacement of Rykov, 56
Stalin's correspondence with, 54, 82, 98, 337
Stalin's friendship with, 111, 133, 237
Stalin's meetings with, 211, 384
Stalin's plenum attack on, 358
suicide of, 384–86, 428, 443, 526
torture and confession of, 371
Orjonikidze, Zinaida, 324, 384, 506
Orlov, Alexander (Leiba Feldbein), 339, 347, 349, 351, 382, 410, 524, 534
Orlova, Lyubov, 216, 217, 293, 593, 795, 853, 854
Orwell, George, 410–11
Ōshima, Hiroshi, 485, 640, 855
Oslo, Trotsky in, 322
Osten, Maria, 363, 460
Ott, Eugen, 221, 356, 640, 650, 791, 874–76, 890
Ozaki, Hotsumi, 667–68, 851, 874
Paasikivi, Juho Kusti, 710–11, 712, 713, 715, 717, 718, 719, 723, 747
Paasonen, Aladár, 710, 711
Pacific Fleet, Soviet, 703

Packard automobiles, Stalin's preference for, 164 Pact of Steel, 632–34, 639 painting:
 foreign sale of “bourgeois” artworks in, 184
Industry of Socialism exhibition of, 607 socialist realism in, 184
see also culture, Soviet Paris:
 German occupation of, 765
 Hitler's tour of, 769–70
 1937 International Exhibition in, 411
Party Card (film), 293–94
Party Construction, 34
 Pascua, Marcelino, 381
 Passov, Zelman, 575–76
 passports, internal system of, 115
 Pasternak, Boris, 169, 181–82, 183, 184, 186, 255, 277, 326, 416, 481
 Stalin's call to, 170
 Patolichev, Nikolai, 846–47
 Pauker, Karl, 109, 165, 228, 344–45, 526, 618
 arrest of, 393
 in fabricated coup plots, 397
 Kirov murder and, 205
 Paulus, Friedrich von, 21, 820
 Paustovsky, Konstantin, 289–90
 Pavlov, Dmitry, 757, 877
 Pavlov, Karp, 598–99
 Pavlov, Vladimir, 628, 864
 Pavlunovsky, Ivan, 140, 511 peasant revolution, 9, 10
 peasants:
 anticollectivization protests by, 27, 29, 38–39, 41–42, 68 dekulakization of, see dekulakization executions of, 131
 in flight from collectives, 93, 99, 101, 117 grain procurements from, see grain procurements internal incarceration and deportation of, 131 suspension of mass deportations of, 125 working class and, 369
see also collectives; collectivization
Peculiar Penguins (cartoon), 230

Pegov, Nikolai, 541
 Peking (Beijing), 125, 233, 457–58
 Peredelkino dacha colony, 177, 178
Permanent Revolution (Trotsky), 540
 Persian Gulf, 813
 Peshkov, Maxim, 177, 296
 Pétain, Philippe, 315, 767, 889
 Hitler's meeting with, 798, 815
 Peter I, “the Great,” tsar of Russia, 465, 466, 751
Peter the First (Tolstoy), 185
Peter the Great (Tolstoy), 853
 Peterson, Rudolf, 205, 228, 397
Peter the First (film), 466
Petropavlovsk (cruiser), 764
 Petrovsky, Hryhory, 99, 605
 Petsamo, Finland, 710, 711, 714, 718
 Philby, Harold “Kim,” 221–22, 656, 725, 800, 836 and attempted assassination of Franco, 409
 Phipps, Eric, 167–68
 Hitler's meeting with, 275–76
 Picasso, Pablo, 411
 Pieck, Wilhelm, 189, 259, 401–2
 Pike, Operation, 762
 Pikel, Richard, 313, 320, 324
 Piłsudski, Józef, 89, 102, 158, 159, 173, 223, 239, 252, 257, 590, 689
Platon Krechet (Korniychuk), 274
 Ploiești oilfields, 796, 817
 Pogodin, Nikolai, 476, 788
 Poincaré, Raymond, 61
 Poland, 17, 92, 168, 275, 485, 557, 685
 Belorussians and Ukrainians in, 569, 574, 689
 British and French “guarantee” of independence of, 614–15, 616, 617, 653, 654, 662, 674, 676
 British mutual assistance treaty with, 677, 679–80
 British relations with, 597
 Czechoslovak territory annexed by, 574, 609 discrimination against Jews in, 736–37
 Eastern Pact rejected by, 189
 in efforts to destabilize Ukraine, 89, 93
 French military alliance with, 158, 592, 597, 612, 634, 677, 680
 German alliance rejected by, 634, 638
 German invasion of, 678–79, 682, 684–85, 691, 736, 826

German relations with, 291–92, 562, 596–97, 613–14
 German-Soviet division of, 664, 684–87
 Germany's planned invasion of, 620–21, 636–37, 646, 651, 659–60, 661–62, 664, 675, 676– interwar dictatorship of, 430
 Japanese-Soviet war as goal of, 597
 Japan's sharing of intelligence with, 597
 lack of planning for German war by, 679
 Nazi nonaggression declaration with, 157–58, 159, 222–23, 630, 631 in offers of cooperation with Japan, 93, 597 possible Soviet preemptive attack on, 245
 Radek's secret negotiations with, 158, 159
 Romanian alliance of, 158
 Soviet accusations of espionage by, 487
 Soviet intelligence network in, 220–21
 Soviet invasion of, 681, 683–91, 775
 Soviet mutual assistance pact rejected by, 634
 Soviet nonaggression pact with, 93, 102, 168, 683
 Soviet occupation of, 688–89
 Soviet relations with, 211, 292, 298, 574, 597
 Stalin's desire for nonaggression pact with, 89
 Stalin's fear of invasion by, 27, 50, 54, 84, 143, 239, 568, 578
 standing army of, 112
 Triple Alliance proposal and, 647
 Ukrainians in, 689, 693
 Poland, Nazi-occupied, German troops in, 820
 Poland, Soviet-occupied, 773
 denunciations encouraged in, 771
 deportations to labor camps in, 771
 single-candidate elections in, 772
 Poles, as slave labor in Germany, 688
 Poles, in USSR, 476
 mass arrests and executions of, 453
 Polish army:
 casualties of, 687
 Gulag internment of, 687
 slaughter of officers of, 795
 Soviet internment of officers of, 687
 Polish Corridor, 596, 597, 615, 616, 652, 655, 677, 679
 Polish intelligence, 413, 597
 Japan's intelligence sharing with, 527

Soviet agents of, 691
 Polish POWs, 687, 744–45
 Soviet and German slaughter of, 745
 Polish-Soviet War (1919–20), 51, 687, 690 politburo, 64, 113, 191, 403, 768, 831, 839, 863, 907 Bukharin expelled from, 29
 as bypassed by Stalin dictatorship, 56–57, 58–59, 586 expulsion of Syrtsov from, 64 famine relief measures approved by, 123
 Kirov murder and, 205
 1936 capital budget of, 258 party history commission of, 179
 Rykov's expulsion from, 65, 68
 Spanish civil war and, 338
 Stalin's dictating of decisions of, 162
 Stalin's holidays and, 136 telephone voting by, 162 voting members of, 308 workload of, 440
 wrecking investigations of, 57
 Polonsky, Ruven "Vladimir," 56–57
 Port Arthur, China, 30, 70
 Portsmouth, Treaty of (1905), 83
 Poskryobyshev, Alexander, 46, 162, 205, 274, 526, 594, 663, 734, 738, 889–90
 Postyshev, Pavel, 124, 209–10, 278, 323, 370, 385, 387
 Potyomkin, Grigory, 246, 357, 530, 560, 562, 565, 568, 578, 623, 634, 663, 683, 710, 716, 722
 POUM (Workers Party of Marxist Unification, Spanish), 339, 400–401, 406, 408
 Koltsov's attack on, 364–65
 mass arrests of, 425, 431
 NKVD infiltration of, 408
 outlawing of, 410–11
 Soviet showcase trials condemned by, 343–44
 Spanish Communist attacks on, 364
 Stalin dictatorship attacked by, 368
 Stalin's condemnation of, 368
Pravda:
 articles on Keke in, 271
 Beria criticized in, 508, 509–10
 Beria's articles in, 504
 Kirov murder and, 208, 209

Koltsov as Spanish war correspondent for, 334–35, 339, 351, 352, 364, 406, 408–9, 459–60
 mass arrests at, 408
 Mekhlis as editor of, 425
 Nadya's death announced in, 111–12
 Stalin biography published in, 734
 Stalin's criticism of, 356
 Stalin's fiftieth birthday celebrated in, 32–33 presidium, Supreme Soviet, 475, 543, 908 press, Soviet, fanning of mass hysteria by, 439
 Primakov, Vitali, 331, 411, 423–24
Prince, The (Machiavelli), vii, 493
 Princip, Gavriilo, 88
 Prinkipo (Prince's Isle), Trotsky's exile to, 13, 28, 62, 130 prisons, population of, 598
 Prokofyev, Sergei, 292–93, 671, 733, 770
Proletarian Revolution, 178 proletariat, "dictatorship" of, 14, 37, 51, 114, 320, 335, 353 propaganda, propagandists, Soviet:
 anti-British, 780
 1938 meeting of, 570–74
 Proskurov, Ivan, 636, 651, 753
 Provisional Government, Russian, 301, 467
 Pushkin, Alexander, 379
 Putna, Vitovt, 331, 423–24
 Pu-Yi, Henry, 92
 Pyatakov, Georgy "Yuri," 33, 46, 50, 320, 330, 370, 371, 384, 437
 arrest of, 443
 execution of, 373, 376
 party expulsion of, 337
 Pyatnitsky, Osip, 171, 172, 189, 446, 447
 Pyryev, Ivan, 293–94
Quiet Flows the Don (Dzerzhinsky), 283
Quiet Flows the Don (Sholokhov), 283
 Quisling, Vidkun, 368, 762
 Rachmaninov, Sergei, 292
 Raczynski, Edward, 575, 622
 Radek, Karl, 121, 155, 181, 326, 370, 373 on alleged Trotskyite-Zinovievite conspiracy, 331–32 murder of, 637
 in secret negotiations with Poland, 158, 159 Radiant Path, The (film), 795 radio, Soviet:

 cable (wired) as dominant technology of, 216–17
 Stalin's speeches broadcast on, 352 tight government control of, 217
 Radio Comintern, 217
 Radio Moscow, 217
 Radó, Sándor ("Dora"), 858, 872
 Raeder, Erich, 473, 783, 784, 791, 815, 838, 900
 Raikin, Arkady, 732–33 railroads, Soviet:
 accidents on, 325
 as weak point in military capability, 260–61, 290
 Ramzin, Leonid, 60–61, 62
 Raskolnikov, Fyodor (Ilin), 274–75, 627 mass terror condemned by, 709
 Red Air Force, 824, 839, 861, 893
 arrests and executions in, 472
 bombers of, 99, 101, 265, 338, 346, 351, 567, 820, 856
 fighters of, 78, 346, 351, 567, 668, 756, 820, 839 Red Army:
 alleged conspiracies in, 77–78, 331, 350, 378, 391, 411–12, 419, 428, 454
 armament buildup of, 20–21, 84–85, 727, 760, 820 Baltic states occupied by, 770–71 dearth of well-trained officers in, 291, 340, 430 decimation of officer corps in, 376–77, 378, 379, 395, 397–98, 407, 414–15, 420–21, 426–27, 428, 430, 434, 473, 495, 521, 536, 537, 551, 562, 563, 578, 592, 603, 754, 757, 781, 893
 dysfunctional command structure of, 749 expansion of, 781 in Finnish border mobilization, 721
 food rationing in, 98
 foreign underestimation of, 591, 592, 675, 748–49, 875, 892–93 former Gulag prisoners returned to duty in, 759 former tsarist officers in, 76–77 forward deployment of, 825
 German-Poland, war plan of, 239, 244–45 increased tank production for, 91–92
 introduction of formal ranks in, 272
 low morale of, 84
 in Lvov clash with Wehrmacht, 685–86 in Manchurian invasion, 30–31 maneuvers of, 188, 265–66, 340–41

mechanized units of, 727, 755, 758, 860–61 modernization of, 20–21, 95, 99, 100–101, 131, 188, 223, 265–66, 270, 290, 297, 299, 352, 860–61, 862–63, 892
 in Mongolia, 197, 644, 650–51, 653, 667–68
 1938 partial mobilization of, 567, 568–69, 578
 1941 war games of, 829–30
 NKVD investigation of, 222, 357
 NKVD troops deployed to block retreat of, 731, 749
 OGPU investigation of, 76–77, 84 outdated and inadequate equipment of, 21, 101 paratroopers in, 265–66 preemptive attack on Poland considered by, 245 promotions in, 759 purge of party members in, 411 scale of, 391, 437–38, 603 reinstatement of officers in, 781 reorganization of, 820
 September 1939 mobilization of, 681
 Stalin's order for buildup of, 91–92, 98 supposed Trotskyite-Zinovievite conspiracy in, 396 supposed wreckers in, 21–22, 51, 64 tanks and armored vehicles of, 188, 265–66, 290, 755, 839, 857, 861, 893 Timoshenko's reform of, 758–59
 troop strength of, 188, 223, 251, 290, 820, 843–44, 892
 Trotsky as head of, 397
 Tukhachevsky's plan and, 91
 Tukhachevsky trial and, 422–24
 weaknesses of, 534, 563, 871, 893
 Western border buildup of, 842–43, 871, 881–82, 894
 Winter War casualties of, 748–49 see also military, Soviet; Soviet Far Eastern Army
 Red Army, Chinese, 458
 Redens, Stanisław, 79, 102, 108, 140, 272–73, 742
 Red Guards, 704
 Red International of Labor Unions, 335
 Reichstag fire, 120, 142–43
 Reichswehr, 21, 93, 119, 174
see also Wehrmacht
 Reizen, Mark, 595, 853
 religion, Stalin's loathing for, 3, 87
 Repin, Ilya, 246–47, 465

Respondek, Erwin, 854–55
Return from the U.S.S.R. (Gide), 416
Revolution Betrayed, The (Trotsky), 328, 335, 787
 Reznikov, Boris, 57–58
 Ribbentrop, Joachim von, 255, 355, 569, 584, 613, 628, 629, 632–33, 636, 639, 640, 650, 673, 676, 677, 731, 752, 805, 838, 842
 as Anglophobe, 643
 on Axis pact, 793
 and evacuation of German embassy in Moscow, 879 and German invasion of USSR, 858, 859 German-Soviet Pact favored by, 642–43, 647, 651, 654 in German-Soviet Pact negotiations, 659, 660–61, 662–65 and Hitler-Stalin Pact, 678, 679, 680, 685–86
 Molotov invited to Berlin by, 794, 797, 798–99, 803 and Molotov's Berlin visit, 806, 808–9 and revision of German-Soviet Pact, 693–94, 695
 Soviet inclusion in Axis pact proposed by, 797, 799, 808–9, 817–18, 820, 835
 Stalin's meeting with, 664
 Riefenstahl, Leni, 266
 Riga, Treaty of (1920), 689 rightists, right deviation, 22, 24, 39, 52, 57, 64, 79, 103, 156, 387, 389, 394, 413, 420, 429, 430, 478, 515
 accused of plotting coup, 253, 254
 in Communist Party, 14, 28–29, 43–44, 46, 50, 54, 61 mass arrests and torture of, 391 and supposed Trotskyite conspiracies, 253, 254, 309, 331, 357, 476, 480 “Rise and Development of Bolshevik Organization in the South Caucasus, The” (Beria), 260
 Rivera, Diego, 368
 Rodos, Boris, 548–49
 Röhm, Ernst, 175
 Rokossowski, Konstanty, 759–60
 Rolland, Romain, 295
 Stalin's meeting with, 256–57
 Romania, 17, 62, 89, 92, 93, 168, 485, 557, 563, 687, 694, 791, 802, 889
 Antonescu coup in, 788
 in Axis pact, 812, 829, 847
 Bessarabia in, see Bessarabia
 Chamberlain's guarantee of independence of, 616
 German alliance with, 774
 German occupation of, 796, 797, 798, 808
 German troops in, 820

interwar dictatorship of, 430
mobilization of, 894
oil fields in, 774, 786, 796, 817 in plans for Soviet invasion, 876, 877
Polish alliance with, 158
as pro-German, 596, 613 proposed Triple Alliance as concern to, 622
Soviet relations with, 613
Stalin's fear of invasion by, 50, 54, 84, 239
standing army of, 112 territory ceded by, 787–88
USSR recognized by, 173
war preparations in, 735
Wehrmacht in, 828, 837, 853
Rome, Soviet spies in, 241
Romm, Mikhail, 467, 617, 853
Roosevelt, Franklin D., 146, 263, 630, 778, 833, 834, 882 and Congress's blocking of Soviet loans, 167
Lend-Lease agreement and, 843
Nazi attacks on Jews criticized by, 598
Soviet rapprochement sought by, 144–45
Rosenberg, Alfred, 158, 168, 673, 883
Rosenberg, Marcel, 334, 347, 380–81
Rosenholz, Arkady (Rozengolts), 56, 259
Rostov, 499
Rostov Agricultural Engineering Works, 41
Royal Air Force, 591, 794
losses of, 780
Royal Navy, 591, 653, 783
Rozenfeld, Nina, 228, 232, 253
Rudzutaks, Jānis, 49, 113, 116, 419
Ruslan and Lyudmila (Glinka), 404
Russia, tsarist:
famine of 1891–92 in, 127
grain exports by, 127
pogroms in, 267
Stalin's selective embrace of culture of, 282
Stalin's views on, 73–74, 468 weak central government of, 297
in World War I, xv
Russian All-Military Union, 322, 437

Russian Association of Proletarian Writers, 132, 151
 Russian civil war, 594, 627, 703, 718, 726, 754–55
 Russian language, teaching of, 467
 Russians, ethnic, as first among equals in USSR, 281–82
 Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party, 447
 Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic (RSFSR), 113, 138, 354 criminal code of, 176
 Russo-Japanese War (1904–5), 70, 261
 Rustaveli, Shota, 511, 516–17
 Rustaveli Theater, 511–12
 Rybachy Peninsula, 711, 714, 725
 Rykov, Alexei, 12, 15–16, 20, 22, 26, 29, 45, 162, 331, 344, 389, 430, 437, 515 accusation of treason against, 386, 387, 476
 arrest of, 443
 dismissed as head of government, 65
 expelled from politburo, 65, 68
 at February 1937 Central Committee plenum, 387
 interrogations of, 336, 387
 press slander of, 359
 proposed replacement of, 53–54, 55, 64 Stalin's enmity toward, 53–54, 59, 68
 trial of, 478
 Ryskulov, Turar, 122, 387
 Ryutin, Martemyan, 70, 192, 464
 arrest of, 105
 in call for Stalin's removal, 212
 execution of, 477
 prison sentence of, 107
 Stalin dictatorship attacked by, 103–5, 107, 303, 308, 477–78
 SA (Sturmabteilung; Brownshirts), 119, 174
 Saakadze, Giorgi, 795–96
 Sakhalin, 805, 811, 813, 851
 Salazar, António de Oliveira, 315–16
 Samarkand, 138
 Samokhin, Alexander, 831, 842
 Sanjurjo, José, 315–16
 San River, 684, 686, 693
 Sats, Natalya, 292, 412, 445
 Schacht, Hjalmar, 246, 257, 259, 271–72, 275, 279, 291, 366, 373, 402
 Scheliha, Rudolf von ("Aryan"), 220, 646, 651, 659, 699, 700, 735, 810, 828–29, 836, 837, 840, 842, 848, 880, 883

Schnurre, Karl, 631, 633, 654, 660, 830, 869
 Scholl, Erwin, 875–76
 Schulenburg, Werner von der, 251, 272, 347, 481, 609, 637, 639, 640, 647, 664, 681, 695, 717, 720, 724, 731, 752, 763, 790, 794, 799, 848
 in attempts to avoid German-Soviet war, 794, 858, 864, 865, 866, 868–69, 872, 880, 897–98
 and German invasion of Poland, 684
 and German-Soviet Pact, 655, 659, 660, 661, 663–64, 679, 685
 Molotov's meetings with, 898
 and planned invasion of USSR, 863–64
 and proposed Soviet inclusion in Axis powers, 813, 831 on Soviet distrust of Germany, 673
 and Soviet invasion of Poland, 683
 Schulze-Boysen, Harro ("Elder"), 221, 837, 846, 856, 859, 864, 878, 879, 883 Schweiguth, Victor-Henri, 340–41, 357 scientists, accused of wrecking, 60
 Scramble for Africa, 591
 SD (Sicherheitsdienst), 174, 837–38
Seagull, The (Chekhov), 148
 Sea Lion, Operation, 785, 794, 837
Second Book (Hitler), 833 secretariat, 162, 442, 522, 907 of Stalin's "secret department," 11, 442, 499, 839
 Sedov, Lev, 13, 105–6, 322–23, 328, 333, 336, 476, 496
 Seeds, William, 612, 625, 632, 633, 648–49 self-criticism, 22–23, 24, 26
 Stalin's emphasis on, 261
Semyon Kotko (Prokofyev), 770
 Serge, Victor, 335, 628
 Sergeyev, Artyom, 110, 112, 135, 137, 165, 179, 192, 212, 230, 526
 on Kirov, 134 and Nadya's death, 111, 112
 on Stalin, 1, 2
 Shaanxi, 360
 Shakespeare, William, 231, 422
 Shakhry Affair, 60, 61, 77, 485
 Shakhurin, Alexei, 737, 756, 839
 Shanghai, 262, 458
 Japanese capture of, 458, 470
 Shaposhnikov, Boris M., 21, 51–52, 77, 96, 168, 415, 421, 424, 460, 658, 681
 as army chief of staff, 567, 645, 651, 656, 664, 693, 726, 758, 779
 promoted to marshal, 758

Winter War and, 726, 735, 750
 Shatsky, Nikolai, 210, 211
 Shcherbakov, Alexander, 282–83, 284, 893 appointed writers' union secretary, 184–85
 as Moscow party boss, 550
 Shchukin, Boris, 467, 617
 Sheboldayev, Boris, 103, 370
 Shestakov, Andrei, 464–65
 Shirer, William, 355, 676
 Shkiryatov, Matvei, 444, 603
 Shkvartsev, Alexei, 680, 731, 791
 Shlyonsky, A. B., 571–72
 Shneiderovich, Miron, 264–65
 Sholokhov, Mikhail, 124–25, 283, 853
Short Course, The History of the all-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks), 155, 569–74, 575, 576, 577–78, 579, 605, 902
Short Course on the History of the USSR, A (Shestakov), 465–66
 Shostakovich, Dmitry, 283, 293, 732, 853
 Fifth Symphony premiered by, 472
 Kerzhentsev's criticism of, 284 showcase trials, 51, 77, 311, 313, 417 in August 1936, see Trotskyite-Zinovievite conspiracy, showcase trial of Beria's staging of, 515–16 of engineers, 60–61
 in January 1937, 371–72, 373, 376 in March 1938, 478–79, 480
 Stalin's urging of, 477
 Shreider, Israel (Mikhail), 481–82
 Shumyatsky, Boris, 192, 193, 197, 209, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219–20, 230, 284, 293, 372
 Cinema City proposal of, 285–86
 Shvernik, Nikolai, 373, 696
 Siberia, 180
 arrests and executions in, 190
 collectivization in, 16, 39, 40, 41, 48, 70
 famine in, 75, 76, 97
 grain procurement in, 87, 128, 180, 198
 Japanese plans for takeover of, 90, 92, 156, 460
 labor camps in, 220
 mass arrests and executions in, 450–51, 452, 517
 Stalin's exiles to, xi, 67, 90, 133
 Zinovievites exiled to, 220

Siegfried Line, 567
 Silesia, 774
 Simon, John, 242, 665
 in meeting with Hitler, 240–41, 254
 Simonov, Konstantin, 303–4, 481
 Singapore, 784, 811
 Sinitsyn, Yelisei, 718–19, 721, 722
 Sino-Japanese War (1894–95), 83
 Sivkov, Arkady, 860, 862
 Škoda Works, 609, 621–22, 631, 704
 Skornyakov, Nikolai, 822, 828–29
 Slovakia, 609, 612, 613, 687, 889
 in Axis pact, 812, 829, 847
 mobilization of, 894
 Slutsky, Abram, 252, 339, 342, 413, 523–24, 528, 627
 Smagin, Vasily, 172–73
 Smirnov, Alexander, 113–14, 116, 372, 460
 Smolny (Leningrad office complex), 199, 200
 Kirov's office at, 201, 207
 Smorodin, Pyotr, 543–44
 Smushkevich, Yakov, 472, 878
 Snow, Edgar, 363
 Sobolev, Arkady, 812, 813, 814
 Sochi, 253
 Stalin's holidays in, 24, 25–26, 46–47, 54–55, 80–83, 98–99, 101–2, 135–36, 141, 145, 178, 179–80, 182, 184, 185, 188, 263–65, 267, 269, 308, 311, 313–14, 330, 344–45, 358, 505, 888
 Voroshilov in, 187
 Social Democrats, 19–20, 302 in antifascist front with Comintern, 262
 Comintern and, 171, 173, 175, 189
 German, xiii, 19, 53, 118, 119, 121, 179, 307
 Stalin's opposition to cooperation with, 121, 172, 175 socialism, building of, 7 idealistic appeal of, 11, 37, 38, 304–5 as justification for terror campaign, 308
 as Stalin's crusade, 6, 11, 88, 309, 439, 579
 “Socialist Competition of the Masses” (Mikulina), 18–19
 Socialist Party, German, 220 socialist realism, 151 evolving definition of, 183–84 public embrace of, 186

socialists, socialism:
 non-Leninist, 302
 Socialist Workers' Party, Spanish, 338, 401, 405, 408, 460 society, Soviet, Stalin's class-based analysis of, 353
 Sofia, 872
 Sokolnikov, Grigory, 147, 320, 637
 interrogations of, 332, 336, 363
 Solodovnikov, Alexander, 748, 803
 "Song of the Motherland," 293
 Sorge, Richard ("Ramsay"), 221, 356, 533, 534, 539, 564, 597, 632, 646, 650, 653, 667, 670, 730, 791, 851, 857–58
 and Soviet invasion of Manchukuo, 537, 538
 Stalin's distrust of, 875, 879
 in warnings of German attack on USSR, 827–28, 874–76, 883, 890
 South Caucasus Federation, 138, 154
 Beria's control of, 502–4 dissolution of, 354, 508, 516 political infighting in, 140–41
 South Manchurian Railway, 83
 Souvarine, Boris, 261–62
 Soviet Far East, 501, 522, 562, 644, 650, 779, 804–5
 terror campaign in, 517, 528, 534
 Japanese espionage in, 527
 Soviet Far Eastern Army, 30, 31, 84, 455, 527, 535, 547, 549 in border clash with Japanese, 537–40
 decimation of officer corps in, 529, 531, 534, 540, 562
 Stalin's arrests of officer corps of, 432 troop buildup of, 530
 troop strength of, 536
 weakness of, 533
 Soviet Far Eastern Fleet, 92
 Soviet intelligence, 485, 523, 537, 657
 arrests in, 496, 575, 589
 Beria and, 589
 in Britain, 836
 British network of, 221–22, 241, 656, 740, 741, 800 counterintelligence operatives of, 222
 in Finland, 705–6, 712–13
 and German invasion plans, 883, 890, 895
 German network of, 699–700, 722, 800, 803–4, 836
 German plans for Polish invasion uncovered by, 636–37 on German troop movements, 794

 and Hess's flight to Britain, 868 lack of central clearinghouse in, 909 rebuilt networks of, 636, 835–37 and rumored French-German rapprochement, 239 in slanted report to Stalin on Hitler's meeting with Britain, 241–42 in Tokyo, see Sorge, Richard Warsaw networks of, 220–21
see also NKVD
 Soviet military intelligence, 341, 659, 735, 775, 836, 841
 Artuzov appointed deputy chief of, 172
 European alliance negotiations monitored by, 640
 German invasion plan reports of, 786, 790, 824, 828–29, 840, 841–42, 845, 846, 858–59, 864, 865–66, 876, 880, 894–95
 German network of, 810, 822, 828
 and German troop movements, 820
 mass arrests in, 413–14, 419, 434, 454–55, 589
 Proskurov as head of, 636 tradecraft failures of, 172, 252
 Trotskyites in, 377
 Uritsky as head of, 252
 Wehrmacht buildup in Poland reported by, 877
 Winter War and, 753
Soviet Ukraine (battleship), 702–3
Soviet Union (battleship), 703
 Spain, Republican:
 army of, 406
 gold reserves transferred to USSR by, 347, 349, 398, 476 political instability in, 312
 Popular Front government of, 312, 315, 317, 321, 323, 334–35, 338, 364, 405, 476–77
 possibility of Communist coup in, 401, 405, 406
 Soviet arms sold to, 347, 398, 476–77
 Soviet military aid requested by, 320, 342
 Soviet relations with, 333–34, 337, 379–81
 Spanish civil war, 312, 330, 343, 377, 561 assault on Madrid in, 350–51 atrocities in, 312–13, 316, 351
 Basques in, 312, 407
 Britain and, 317, 356–57, 374, 398, 582
 Catalonia in, 312, 316, 321, 364, 380, 408 cautious initial Soviet response to, 320 civilian deaths in, 312–13 consequences of, 616–17 fall of Madrid in, 615 as fight between fascism and Communism, 317, 326

 Franco's failed assault on Madrid in, 350–51, 406–7
 French-Soviet relations and, 318–19, 320
 German military intervention in, 317–18, 323, 328–29, 339, 350, 407, 431, 556, 582
 International Brigades in, 338, 350, 399, 460
 Italian military intervention in, 318, 323, 328–29, 330, 339, 398–99, 406, 407, 431, 556, 582
 Koltsov's reports on, 334–35, 364, 459–60 leftist infighting in, 364, 400–401, 405, 408, 410–11, 425 newsreel coverage of, 337–38
 NKVD operations in, 339, 346–47, 408, 410, 425
 Non-Intervention Agreement in, 327, 329, 330, 337, 342, 346, 347
 as public rationale for mass arrests, 429–30
 Republican army in, 399–400
 Soviet advisers in, 338–39, 346, 350, 380–82
 Soviet military intervention in, 311, 313–14, 342–43, 344, 345–46, 351–52, 376, 379, 381, 409, 431, 459, 476, 486, 562, 670, 754, 755
 Soviet workers' support for Republican cause in, 326–27 as test of Stalin's geopolitics, 314, 373–74, 401, 431
 Trotsky and, 323, 335
 Trotskyites in, 374, 425, 431
Spanish Spring (Koltsov), 334 specialists:
 accused of wrecking, 21–22, 62, 64, 73
 arrests and executions of, 50–51
 Orjonikidze's cultivation of, 66, 73
 Speer, Albert, 411, 556, 585, 586, 629, 769, 900 spies, alleged, mass arrests and executions of, 485–88
 Spiller, Natalya, 594, 595, 732
 SRs (Socialist Revolutionaries), 99, 116, 176, 182, 434, 437, 450, 453, 467, 475
 SS (Schutzstaffel), 174, 475, 688
 Stakhanov, Alexei, 273, 274
 Stakhanovism, Stakhanovites, 273–74, 278, 782
 Stalin, Iosif, 154 alleged assassination attempts against, 470 as archetypal hero, 301 atheism of, 3 in automobile accident, 46–47 awkward gait of, 3–4

charisma of, 4, 304
 class struggle as core tenet of, 190 coarse manners of, 2
 contradictory character of, 5, 552, 579
 cruelty of, 349, 368, 488, 492
 cult of, 7, 58, 155, 226, 257, 289–90, 303–4, 369, 417, 902 darkening mind-set of, 490, 491–92
 European war with USSR expected by, 484, 495 false modesty of, 7, 33, 417, 570 fatigue of, 887 fiftieth birthday celebrations for, 32–34 fifty-fifth birthday of, 212–13 foreign depictions of, 154
 as gambler, 9, 17, 705
 as Germanophile, xv, 903 grudges held by, 303 home life of, 108–9 illnesses and health problems of, 47, 98, 270, 303, 365, 472–73, 731, 743, 887 isolation of, 524, 526
 Lenin's Testament and, 5
 as master improviser, xiv–xv, 10, 16 micromanaging by, 55, 81, 303, 586, 587, 624–25, 738, 800–801, 807, 839, 841, 887 as opportunist, 67–68, 698, 819 paranoia of, 5–6, 8, 11, 309, 396, 397, 480, 492–93, 429, 551, 884 as party general secretary, xi–xii, 10
 as pedagogue, 495 perverse sense of humor of, 4 political intelligence of, 303 populism of, 18, 249–50, 464 religious upbringing of, 2 rise of, xi–xii rumored affairs of, 525
 rumored death of, 62–63
 Russian imperial majesty melded with socialist state building by, 552 as Russian nationalist, 902 ruthlessness of, 552–53 self-control of, 492 self-improvement as tenet of, 495
 sixtieth birthday celebration of, 732–35 small pox contracted by, 4 sociopathology of, xii, 5, 11, 130, 579

state, view of, 493–94, 573–74 statecraft as obsession of, 552, 901 two-front war as concern of, 643 victim playing by, 14–15, 59, 114, 130 as voracious reader, 1–2, 5, 586, 617, 681 willpower of, 552
 Stalin, Iosif, dictatorship of, 4–5, 907 absolute power needed by, 6, 8, 11, 67–68, 308–9, 325, 430 “Caucasus group” in, 548 concentration of decision making in upper ranks of, 440–41, 704–5, 887 conspiracy charges as tool of, 306, 469 conspiratorial worldview of, 422, 429, 551, 902 dysfunctional administrative apparatus of, 430, 440–42, 587, 705 information-gathering apparatus of, 550–51, 586, 705 inner circle’s closing of ranks in, 107, 114, 116–17, 129, 308 mass-based modernity and, 296–98, 901 mass terror as outgrowth of, 493
 Nazi Germany compared with, 696–97 permanent state of emergency as necessity of, 5, 64, 68, 430, 495 politburo bypassed in, 56–57, 58–59, 586 precarious footing of, 68–69 promotion of “new people” in, 442, 462–64, 494–95, 737–38, 832, 846, 902
 Ryutin’s attacks on, 103–5, 107, 303, 308
 “speaking Bolshevik” and, 124
 Stalin’s pathology as nourished by, 5, 901
 Trotsky’s attacks on, 13–14, 374, 434, 494 Stalin, Iosif, inner circle of:
 in closing of ranks behind Stalin, 107, 114, 116–17, 129, 308 compromising files on, xvi
 shrinking of, 500
 Stalin’s psychological breaking of, 375, 386, 433, 526, 709
 Yagoda’s antagonistic relationship with, 393
 Stalin, Iosif, speeches of:
 on class war (December 27, 1929), 35 to 18th Party Congress (March 10, 1939), 607–8, 609, 862 to 8th Congress of Soviets (November 25, 1936), 352–55, 372 at industrial managers conference (June 23, 1931), 76 to Main Military Council (June 2, 1937), 418–19 at military academies graduation (May 4, 1935), 249–50
 at military academies graduation (May 5, 1941), 860–61, 870 to 17th Party Congress (January 26, 1934), 156–57, 210

at Social Industry conference (February 4, 1931), 73

Stalin, Iosif, writings of:

“Dizzy with Success,” 39, 40, 42

Foundations of Leninism, 13

On Lenin and Leninism, 134

Questions of Leninism, 154

“Year of the Great Break, The,” 28

Stalin, Vasily, 2, 3, 103, 108, 135, 165, 179, 187, 209, 230, 234, 263, 270, 281, 388, 466, 526

at military aviation school, 599–600, 720, 751 and mother’s death, 111, 112 rebellious behavior of, 166, 267, 599–600

Stalin (Bey), 154

Stalin: A Critical Study of Bolshevism (Souvarine), 261–62

Stalin: A New World Seen Through One Man (Barbusse), 1, 225–26, 263

Stalin: Czar of All the Russians (Lyons), 780–81

Stalin and Hashim, the Years 1901–1902: Episodes from the Batum Underground, 214

“Stalin and the Crisis of the Proletarian Dictatorship” (Ryutin), 104, 464

Stalin and Voroshilov in the Kremlin (Gerasimov), 733, 854

Stalingrad, 32, 180

Stalingrad Tractor Factory, 44–45

Stalinist Thermidor, The (Trotsky), 787

Stalin School of Falsification (Trotsky), 540, 787

State, Bureaucracy, and Absolutism in the History of Russia, The (Olminsky), 493

State and Revolution (Lenin), 494

“State Capitalism or Totalitarian State Economy?” (Hilferding), 760

statecraft:

Stalin’s preoccupation with, 579

terror campaign as, 309, 494–95, 552

Stepanyan, Nerses (Nersik), 503, 504

Stern, Grigory, 382, 406, 538, 650, 667, 669–70, 726, 736, 755, 878

Stetsky, Alexei, 181, 205, 225–26

Stöbe, Ilse (“Alta”), 220, 699–700, 722, 735, 828, 840, 842, 848, 865–66, 877 stock markets:

1929 crash in, 27–28, 32

1931 crash in, 85

Stolypin, Pyotr, 297, 792

Strang, William, 168, 242, 648

Stravinsky, Igor, 292

Sudetenland, 555, 561–62, 563, 565–66, 598

Sudoplatov, Pavel, 610–11, 627, 764, 801, 894

Suicide, The (Erdman), 148

Sukhanovka prison, 438, 549, 618–19
 Sukhum, 136, 137, 139, 311
 Sumbatov-Topuridze, Yuvelyan, 518, 541
Sunday Express, 166
 Supreme Council of the Economy, 32, 66, 82, 91
 Supreme Soviet, 354, 383, 471, 475–76, 528, 541, 543, 908 presidium of, 475, 543, 908
 Surits, Yakov, 275, 365–66, 402, 403, 623, 633
 Suslov, Mikhail, 205, 603–4
 Suursaari (Hogland) Island, 711, 714, 719
 Svanidze, Alexander “Alyosha,” 108, 388
 Svanidze, Ketevan “Kato,” 3, 33, 108, 388
 Svanidze, Maria, 108, 191, 211, 212–13, 234–35, 251, 273, 277–78, 365, 388–89
 Svechin, Alexander, 2, 168, 825
 Sweden, 711, 717, 800, 889
 Switzerland, neutrality of, 889
 Syrtsov, Sergei, 29, 53, 57–58, 59, 64, 69, 303, 443
 Taganka prison, 497
 Tajiks, 138, 853 tanks, Soviet, 188, 265–66, 290, 668, 755, 839, 857, 861, 893 acquisition of British and U.S. designs for, 91–92
 in Spanish civil war, 344, 346, 351
 Stalin’s order for increased production of, 91–92
 Tanner, Väinö, 712, 713, 714, 715, 717, 718–19, 746, 747
 Tarasova, Alla, 404, 424, 593, 853
 Tatekawa, Yoshitsugu, 811, 878–79
 Tbilisi (Tiflis), 3, 33, 63, 81–82, 503, 504, 505–6, 514, 542 technology:
 Soviet importation of, 71–72
 Stalin’s interest in, 74, 188 terror campaign (1936–38), xii, 553, 902 arrests of managers and specialists in, 434, 444, 445, 599, 821 belief that Stalin was unaware of, 481–82 building socialism as justification for, 308
 Central Committee decimation in, 443
 Comintern arrests in, 446–47
 Communists’ conspiratorial worldview as central to, 439–40, 490
 death toll in, 305, 313 disorder and inefficiency resulting from, 497 as driven by Stalin’s dark personality and political skill, 490 ethnic groups as targets of, 453–54, 476 extrajudicial killings in, 448 fabrication of evidence in, 570 factors contributing to, 307–8, 438, 439 fatalism and willing complicity in, 450, 543–44, 551 “fifth column” rationale for, 428–29, 613 foreign affairs commissariat arrests in, 447–48 inexplicability of, 480–82, 492, 552

 kernels of truth in justification of, 483–84
 Lyushkov’s denunciation of, 532–33
 mass arrests in, 403–4, 434, 438–39, 443–44, 551 “mass operations” expansion of, 433, 448, 457, 460, 517, 520, 522 military intelligence arrests in, 434, 454–55
 Molotov and, 624
 national security as justification for, 551 navy arrests in, 702, 704
 NKVD blamed for excesses of, 482, 578
 NKVD arrests in, 376, 379, 393–94, 405, 415–16, 434, 449–50, 522
 “On Anti-Soviet Elements” resolution in, 450 opposition to collectivization as justification for, 484, 495, 576–77 as outgrowth of Stalin dictatorship, 493
 party purges in, 43, purge of administrative apparatus in, 307 quotas in, 433, 437–38, 448, 452
 randomness of, 545
 Red Army mass arrests in, see Red Army, decimation of officer corps in scholars’ attempts to understand motive for, 306–7 “spy mania” in, 485–88
 Stalin as distanced from implementation of, 552 and Stalin’s need for absolute power, 308–9 as statecraft, 309, 494–95, 552 synopsis of events in, 488–91 total arrests in, 305
 troikas in, 450
 Trotsky on, 480 uniqueness of, 307, 488 unmasking of “hidden enemies” in, 323–24, 325
 winding down of, 578–79
 Yezhov as Stalin’s overseer of, 436–37, 448, 453–54, 515, 517, 522–23, 528–29, 578
 Tevosyan, Ivan, 752–53, 805
 Thälmann, Ernst, 119, 143
They Wanted Peace (film), 548

Thorez, Maurice, 171, 189, 328
Thoughts and Recollections (Bismarck), 791–92
Three Little Pigs (cartoon), 230
 Tientsin (Tianjin), China, 125, 233, 457, 653
 Til, Karolina, 108, 110–11, 165, 526, 600
Time, Stalin as 1939 “Man of the Year” in, 735
 Timoshenko, Semyon, 726, 736, 739, 749, 838–39
 as defense commissar, 757–58, 825 full war footing sought by, 881, 895, 897, 898–99, 900, 901 mechanized warfare stressed by, 827 at 1941 military academy graduation, 860, 862
 Red Army reforms of, 758–59, 820 and reports of German invasion plans, 879
 Soviet war plans and, 844, 870, 871
 in Winter War, 743
Tirpitz (battleship), 255, 703
 Togliatti, Palmiro, 347, 365, 405, 406
 Tolmachev, Vladimir, 113, 114
 Tolstoy, Aleksei, 181, 185, 186, 295, 466, 546, 853
 Tolstoy, Lev, 2, 231
 Tomsky, Mikhail, 12, 15, 45, 68, 113, 331, 430, 437
 suicide of, 332, 336, 358, 443
 Toroshelidze, Malakia, 181, 187, 260
 Tovstukha, Ivan, 154–55, 261 trade unions, 908 transport commissariat, 405
 Trilisser, Meyer (Mikhail Moskvín), 22–23, 342, 712, 742
 Tripartite Pact, see Axis pact
 Triple Alliance, Soviet proposal for, 621–23, 625, 630, 637–38, 646, 651, 653, 655, 656–58, 661, 777, 810
 Baltic states as issue in, 633, 634, 638, 639, 647–48
 Britain and, 621, 622–23, 625, 630, 632, 646, 647–49, 652, 653, 674, 777
 Hitler’s rejection of, 662
 Trotsky, Lev, 4, 64, 116, 129, 137, 307, 311, 324, 329, 333, 336, 419, 467
 assassination attempts against, 368, 610, 764–65
 assassination of, 787, 892
 attacks on Stalin dictatorship published by, 13–14
 Barbusse’s depiction of, 225–26 on British and French fears of war, 614 and calls for removal of Stalin, 106, 372 culture as viewed by, 132

on German-Soviet Pact, 670 on Krupskaya, 602
 on mass arrests, 480
 in Mexico, 368, 610, 764, 787, 892 on 1936 constitution, 353
 NKVD surveillance of, 322–23, 349, 476 in Norway, 322, 327, 368, 610
 Paris operations of, 322–23, 610 in power struggle with Stalin, 11, 12, 155
 as Red Army head, 397
Revolution Betrayed published by, 327–28
 Ryutin's praise for, 104
 on Soviet invasion of Poland, 690
 Spanish civil war and, 323, 335
 Stalin dictatorship attacked by, 13–14, 374, 434, 494
 Stalin's coup accusation predicted by, 153–54
 Stalin's demonization of, xii, 13, 62, 237, 299, 314, 320, 322, 335, 352, 375, 386–87, 468–69, 764, 787, 892
 Stalin seen as opportunist by, 67–68
 Trotskyite-Zinovievite trial and, 331–32
 Turkish exile of, 12–13, 28, 130, 506, 610 on Voroshilov, 427, 702
 Winter War and, 747
 Trotskyites, 232, 278, 350, 370, 377, 391, 394, 419, 429, 516, 571, 577 accused of collusion with Nazis, 369, 387 accused of coup plots, 253, 279–80 in China, 371, 469
 mass arrests of, 294, 299, 311, 313, 319, 324, 502
 1937 showcase trial of, 371–72, 373, 376 rightist conspiracy with, 357, 476, 480
 in Spanish civil war, 374, 425, 431
 Trotskyite-Zinovievite conspiracy, 294, 295, 319, 336, 344, 345, 486
 Red Army and, 396
 showcase trial of, 311, 313, 314, 319, 328, 330–33, 335, 336, 337, 338, 343–44, 363, 369–70, 376, 504
 Tsuji Masanobu, 650–51
 Tukhachevsky, Mikhail, 21, 78, 244, 266, 269–70, 272, 341, 395, 404, 412, 418, 758, 825
 accusations against, 52, 54, 58, 377, 378, 397, 407, 411–12, 419, 423, 428, 429–30, 454 arrest and confessions of, 414, 419 attacks on Poland and Romania urged by, 92, 168 in call for modernization of Red Army, 51–52, 91, 96

in Congress of Soviets report on Red Army buildup, 2223 German threat as concern of, 245, 280
military talent of, 428, 431
Stalin and, 96, 290–91
trial and execution of, 422–24, 456, 521, 527, 529, 546, 670, 755, 893
Voroshilov's enmity toward, 51–52, 397–98, 412, 418
Tuominen, Arvo “Poika,” 723–24
Tupikov, Vasily, 829, 845, 848, 858, 880, 883
Tupolev, Andrei N., 425, 696
Turkey, 17, 735, 740, 802, 813, 814, 840, 872
Trotsky's exile in, 12–13, 28, 506, 610
Turkish Straits, 813, 819, 831
Turkmenistan, 138, 444
Twardowski, Fritz von, 269–70, 275
Twelve Chairs, The (Ilf and Petrov), 285
“25,000ers,” 36–38, 42, 43, 123
“Tyrants Destroyed” (Nabokov), 550
Ubolevičius, Jeronimas, 21, 51, 78, 266, 341, 378, 395, 412, 414, 421, 422–23
Uglanov, Nikolai, 104, 107
Ukraine, 38, 77, 81, 125, 127, 138, 147, 180, 275, 773 annexation of Polish territory by, 716 anti-Soviet fifth column in, 774–75, 892
ethnic Poles in, 211
famine in, 98, 100, 102, 113, 122, 123, 129
German aerial reconnaissance of, 855 grain procurements in, 102, 106, 117, 128
mass arrests in, 520, 522
Poland's destabilization efforts in, 89, 102 purges in, 124
terror campaign in, 517, 520, 522
Ulan Bator, 280, 289, 461, 462, 482
Ulrich, Vasily, 212, 331, 373, 423–24, 479
Ulyanova, Maria, 387, 425, 602
Umansky, Konstantin, 854–55
Under the Big Top (Ilf and Petrov), 293
Unforgettable Meeting, An (Yefanov), 733
Union of Soviet Writers, 151, 177–87
United States:
bank failures in, 85–86
British aid from, 833–35, 843, 904
Chinese aid from, 843 and Germany's plans for Soviet invasion, 854–55 Hitler's envy of, 833–34 industrial capacity of, 816, 834

 Japanese codes broken by, 855
 Nazi attacks on Jews criticized by, 598
 1929 stock market crash in, 27–28, 32
 1931 stock market crash in, 85
 Soviet relations with, 63, 145, 263 support for Britain in, 791, 793
 unemployment in, 72
 in World War I, 833
Unpublished Shchedrin, 186
 Urals, 122, 128
 Uritsky, Semyon, 252–53, 341, 342, 378, 413, 423
 Ürümqi, Xinjiang, 167, 459
 Uspensky, Alexander, 449, 499, 521–23, 541, 578, 620
USSR and the Capitalist Encirclement, The, 598
 Utyosov, Leonid, 215–16, 451–52, 888
 Uzbekistan, 138, 354, 451, 453, 773
 Valedinsky, Ivan, 47, 365
 Vannikov, Boris, 738–39, 878
 Varga, Jenő, 172, 401–2, 545, 791
 Vasilevsky, Alexander, 739, 750–51, 806, 843, 869, 871
 Vernadsky, Vladimir, 482, 618, 689–90
 Versailles, Treaty of (1919), xv, 21, 63, 80, 143, 158, 168, 218, 243–44, 288, 557, 559, 566, 591
 Hitler's denunciation of, 240, 254, 612, 630, 675
 Vishnevsky, Vsevolod, 417, 581, 672, 690, 719, 788, 849
 Vistula River, 679, 684, 686, 695
Viva, Villa! (film), 230
 Vladivostok, 133, 528, 535
 Vlasik, Nikolai, 141–42, 166, 178, 267, 526, 618, 663
 Volga military district, 77, 411, 530, 759, 811
 Volga region, 27, 30, 39, 70, 75, 87, 98, 101, 122, 128, 180, 182
 Volynskoe, Stalin's dacha at, see Near Dacha Voroshilov, Klim E.:
 army buildup and, 99, 100–101
 army loyalty defended by, 396–97 army maneuvers and, 265, 266, 341 and decimation of officer corps, 426–27, 754

as defense commissar, 20, 21, 30, 33, 51, 66, 77, 248–49, 251, 262, 290, 340, 395–96, 473, 529, 567, 605
 at February 1937 plenum, 394, 396–97
 as inner circle member, 393, 500, 526
 as key to survival of Stalin dictatorship, 69 and Manchukuo border clashes, 539–40, 644–45, 650, 651 military intelligence and, 172, 252 in military talks with Britain and France, 656, 657–58, 661 military training lacked by, 395, 758 replaced by Timoshenko as defense commissar, 757 sixtieth birthday celebration of, 832
 at Sochi, 135–36
 Soviet Far East and, 536
 and Soviet invasion of Poland, 681
 Spanish civil war and, 381, 382, 405–6
 Stalin's correspondence with, 88, 100–101, 123, 265, 406
 Stalin's psychological breaking of, 500
 Stalin's relationship with, 110, 394–95
 Tukhachevsky despised by, 51–52, 397–98, 412, 418
 Tukhachevsky trial and, 423, 424
 Winter War and, 724, 726, 735, 736, 740–41, 743, 751
 Voznesensky, Nikolai, 840, 843, 863
 Vrang, Birger, 711, 713
 Vyborg (Viipuri), Finland, 712, 743, 746, 748
 Vyshinsky, Andrei, 62, 212, 213, 232, 319, 328, 354, 405, 478, 772, 796, 802–3, 811, 851
 Waffen-SS, 475
Walküre, Die (Wagner), 812
 Wang Ming, 362, 469, 470–71
 Warlimont, Walter, 685, 686, 824 water transport commissariat, 498, 499, 543, 587 Wehrmacht, 341, 420, 431, 566, 609, 654, 766 buildup of, 240, 246, 266, 269–70 in Bulgaria, 872
 in Finland, 792, 808, 813, 829
 Hitler's military leadership criticized in, 473 in Lvov clash with Red Army, 685–86 mechanized units in, 767–68, 877
 in Polish invasion, 620–21, 678–79, 682, 684, 687 Soviet invasion plans and, see Germany, Nazi, Soviet invasion preparations of unpreparedness of, 559, 566–67
 in Yugoslavia invasion, 848–49

Weizsäcker, Ernst von, 621–22, 623, 639, 640, 646, 650, 651, 657, 793, 806, 866, 896
 Welkisch, Kurt (“ABC”), 221, 651, 699, 840–41
 Welkisch, Margarita (“LCL”), 221, 699
 Welles, Sumner, 854–55
 Wells, H. G., 48, 178, 296
 Western military district, 779, 838, 899
 Western Siberia, 16, 40, 41, 48
 mass arrests and executions in, 451, 452, 517, 549
 White Sea–Baltic Canal, 133, 134, 153, 194
 Wilson, Horace, 652, 656
 Winter War, 735, 739, 751, 774, 776, 827, 828, 893
 Finnish “People’s Government” and, 723–25, 729
 Finnish surrender in, 746–47
 Finnish tactical superiority in, 727–28
 opening Red Army attacks in, 723
 Soviet February offensive in, 742–43, 746
 Soviet strategic and tactical mistakes in, 726–27, 731, 748, 820
 Stalin’s assessment of, 753–54, 760
 Stalin’s personal management of, 726, 730, 731–32
 Witte, Sergei, xv, 297, 792 working class:
 absenteeism and job changing in, 782
 consumer goods and, 268 growth of, 72, 73, 85
 peasants and, 368
 World War I, xi, xiii, xv, 275, 301, 485, 833, 890, 903
 World War II:
 air support for mechanized units in, 826–27 onset of, 91, 679
 see also specific countries wreckers, wrecking, 21–22, 27, 57, 60, 62, 64, 73, 551
 arrests and executions of, 50–51, 821
 Wuolijoki, Hella, 712–13
 Xi’an, China, 321, 367
 Chiang’s kidnapping in, 360–64, 366–67
 Xinjiang (Chinese Turkestan), 470
 Soviet invasion of, 167, 458, 459
 Yagoda, Genrikh:
 accusations against, 389, 391, 392, 393, 397
 arrest and interrogation of, 391–93, 529
 as communications commissar, 344–45, 498

elevated to Central Committee, 162 embezzlement by, 392–93
 execution of, 479
 foreign intelligence operations and, 172–73
 Gulag reform and, 286 inner circle's relationship with, 393
 Kirov murder and, 204–5, 235, 236
 Kremlin Affair and, 253, 254
 as NKVD head, 176, 272, 436, 523, 527
 replaced by Yezhov as NKVD head, 344–45, 372, 415
 Yakir, Iona, 58, 340, 341, 378, 395, 411, 412, 414, 419, 421, 422–23, 519
 Yakovlev, Alexander, 737–38, 756, 805, 816–17, 853
 Yakovlev, Yakov (Epstein), 35, 94, 103, 136
 Yan'an, China, 321, 371, 459, 470
 Yaroslavsky, Yemelyan, 113, 179, 261, 387–88, 570
 Yartsev, Boris (Rybkin), 705–6, 713
 Yashvili, Paolo, 512, 513
 Yefimov, Boris, 376, 408, 435, 670, 689
 Yegorov, Alexander, 110, 272, 411, 545
 Yemelyanov, Vasily, 738–39
 Yenukidze, Avel, 75, 103, 133, 135, 144, 150, 169, 205, 228, 264, 295, 393, 419
 in Kremlin Affair, 231–32, 233, 253, 254
 Stalin's correspondence with, 80, 130, 187
 and Stalin's underground years, 214–15
 Yeremin, Grigory ("Yeshenko"), 840–41, 842, 853
 Yerevan, Armenia, 502, 504, 516
 Yevdokimov, Yefim, 23–24, 35, 69, 78, 79, 112, 162, 219, 344, 389, 415, 499, 527, 543 arrest and torture of, 619–20 arrests and executions of cadres of, 499–500
 execution of, 742
Yevgeny Onegin (Pushkin), 379
 Yezhov, Nikolai:
 arrest and interrogation of, 618–20, 635
 Beria and, 509, 542
 as Central Committee secretary, 224, 225, 437, 498, 500, 587
 as Central Control Commission chairman, 225, 437, 587 and decimation of Red Army officer corps, 426 denunciations of, 542, 587 drinking bouts of, 435–36, 498, 521, 522, 540, 619
 execution of, 740, 742
 at February 1937 Central Committee plenum, 386, 389 growing paranoia of, 436–37 homosexuality of, 620 illnesses and disabilities of, 435, 436, 498

 Kirov murder and, 224, 236–37
 Kremlin Affair and, 253, 254, 264
 as NKVD head, 344–45, 392, 415, 437, 449–50, 451, 471, 498, 521–22, 540–42, 618
 NKVD arrests and, 415–16, 498–99
 NKVD resignation of, 587 plots fabricated by, 357, 412, 433–34
 rise of, 224–25
 showcase trials and, 319, 330
 Stalin's correspondence with, 276, 472
 Stalin's relationship with, 224, 225, 416, 436–37 terror campaigns overseen by, 436, 448, 453–54, 497, 498, 500, 515, 517, 522–23, 528–29, 578 as water transport commissar, 498, 587
 Yagoda and, 389, 391
 Yofan, Boris, 171, 411
 Yugoslavia, 62, 189
 in Axis pact, 847, 850
 German invasion of, 848–49, 850, 852, 859
 Soviet pact with, 848, 864
 Zaitsev, Nikolai (“Bine”), 700, 722, 828, 848
 Zakovsky, Leonid (Henriks Štubis), 194, 229, 236, 272, 498–99
 Zaporozhets, Ivan, 194, 202, 220, 235
 Zborowski, Mordka “Mark,” 322–23, 349
Zdravitsa (Prokofyev), 733
 Zelinsky, Koreli, 152–53
 Zenzinov, Vladimir, 728–29
 Zetkin, Clara, 20
 Kremlin apartment of, 58, 59, 67
 Zhang Xueliang, 30, 83, 321, 359–61, 362, 363–64, 366–67
 Zhang Zhizhong, 458
 Zhdanov, Andrei: and arrests of ethnic groups, 476
 as Central Committee secretary, 162, 500
 enmity toward Litvinov of, 624 and Estonian Sovietization, 772
 as inner circle member, 162, 205, 215–16, 262, 500, 605
 as Leningrad party boss, 229, 500, 504
 Stalin's correspondence with, 181, 182, 184, 185

Stalin's relationship with, 211, 605
Winter War and, 723, 724, 726, 736, 747 writers' union and, 183, 184
Zhelyabov, Andrei, 199–200
Zhou Enlai, 360, 366, 744, 887
Zhukov, Georgy, 626, 645, 650, 651, 759, 811, 820 full war footing urged by, 895, 897, 898–99
Mongolian border clashes and, 645, 667, 668–70, 726, 755 offensive strategy as focus of, 825–26 as Red Army chief of staff, 830, 838, 843
Soviet war plans and, 843–44, 870, 871
in warning of imminent German attacks, 895, 900 Zinoviev, Grigory, 12, 104, 105, 134, 161, 254, 371, 386–87, 437, 467
alleged involvement in Kirov murder of, 210–11, 212, 213, 229, 232–33, 236–37
execution of, 333, 376, 602
imprisonment of, 325
internal exile of, 107
Kaganovich's denunciation of, 324
in Kirov murder trial, 219, 532
Stalin's enmity toward, 228
Trotskyite-Zinovievite center testimony and, 319 in Trotskyite-Zinovievite trial, 331
Zinovievites, 106, 278, 391, 394, 429 accused of complicity in Kirov murder, 210–12, 213, 218–19, 220, 236–37
accused of plotting coup, 253, 254
mass arrests of, 220, 299
see also Trotskyite-Zinovievite conspiracy
Zoshchenko, Mikhail, 153, 165
Zubalovo dacha complex, 108–9, 163, 165, 193, 600

Penguin
Random House
PENGUIN PUBLISHING GROUP

What's next on your reading list?

Discover your next great read!

Get personalized book picks and up-to-date news about this author.

Sign up now.

* Like tsarist Russia, the Soviet Union had two sowing seasons: one in the spring, harvested in late summer/fall, accounting for about 60 percent of the year's crop (mostly wheat and barley); another in the fall, harvested in the spring, accounting for 40 percent (almost all the rye, some barley, and some wheat).